REQUEST FOR NATO SUPPORT OF BELGIUM'S CONGO ACTIVITIES

On January 10 Ambassador Rothschild, Belgian expert on African affairs recently returned from the Congo, addressed the Political Advisors' Committee of NATO on the validity of the Belgian action in permitting Colonel Mobutu's troops to enter the Congo from the Belgian Trust Territory of Ruanda-Urundi on January 1, and requested NATO support for Belgium in defending its action.

According to the Belgian account of the incident, Colonel Mobutu asked permission from both the UN and Belgium to send troops into Bukavu in Eastern Kivu Province (now controlled by pro-Lumumba forces) via Usumbura in Ruanda-Urundi. The Belgians state they only just received the message and had not returned any answer before about 200 Congolese troops reached Usumbura on December 30 and 31 from Luluabourg in five aircraft which they had commandeered from the Sabena subsidiary, Air Congo. These troops had with them on arrival at Usumbura a photocopy of the note of the Congolese Foreign Minister requesting permission to use facilities there because those at Bukavu were inadequate. In the circumstances, according to the Ambassador, the Belgian authorities decided to allow the troops to land and to transport them to the Congolese frontier by truck. At least some of the troops were so transported, made an unopposed entry to the Congo, and reached Bukavu. After initial negotiations between this group and the pro-Lumumba forces at Bukavu, a fight developed in which this group of Colonel Mobutu's troops were badly beaten and almost all were captured.

On January 2 the UN Secretary-General charged Belgian authorities in Ruanda-Urundi with complicity in the incursion. On January 7 the USSR permanent representative at the United Nations, V.A. Zorin, demanded that the Security Council be convened to discuss “the threat to peace and security resulting from new acts of aggression by Belgium against the Congo” and further charged that the Belgian actions “represent an open armed intervention . . . and a gross violation of the international status of the trusteeship territory of Ruanda-Urundi.” A Security Council meeting is being held today to discuss this charge.

The Belgians in their defence to be presented to the Security Council claim:

(1) The trusteeship agreement grants Belgium over Ruanda-Urundi, in matters of security, the rights and powers of a sovereign state. Although it was physically impossible for Belgian authorities to prevent the landing of Mobutu forces at Usumbura because Kasavubu’s request was late in reaching Brussels, they did not go beyond the rights and powers of a sovereign state when they authorized Congolese forces to land.

(2) Article 6 of UNGA resolution of September 20 states that “without prejudice to the sovereign rights of the Republic of Congo” all states should refrain from direct and indirect provision of military aid to the Congo, etc. According to the Belgians, Kasavubu, who asked for the right of transit through Ruanda-Urundi, is generally recognized as being the legal authority of the Congo. They were therefore justified in agreeing to his request; otherwise Kasavubu might have accused them of interpreting the resolution in a manner prejudicial to the sovereign rights of the Congo.

(3) The Belgians claim that Mobutu’s operation was not a full-fledged military operation but could be considered as much a negotiating mission as a military undertaking.

In his statement to the PAC the Belgian Ambassador stated that Belgium and the West have both an interest and a moral responsibility in the Congo and added that Belgium could not make the necessary effort in the Congo alone. In respect to the Usumbura incident he stated that Belgium had very little time in which to examine the question before being presented with a fait accompli by the arrival of the troops. It was true that the Belgian authorities in Ruanda-Urundi could have disarmed the Kasavubu troops by force but nobody knew how serious the resulting fight would be. In any case there were political reasons for not taking this course of action; the Belgians wished to support the Kasavubu Government and did not see that the request was in conflict with the Security Council resolution which called upon member states not to hinder the Congolese Government in the exercise of its authority. He further stated Belgium’s argument that it is usual in times of peace to permit the passage of troops from a friendly country into another part of that friendly country. The Ambassador concluded by stating that Belgian reports indicated that the UAR and the Communists were definitely bent on setting up a separate government in Orientale Province. The decisions taken by the more extreme African leaders, at their meeting just concluded in Casablanca, pointed up the grave dangers to the West in the Congo situation. He concluded that it was necessary to face Communist-Afro-Asian unity with Western unity.

The Belgian argument received some support from the Netherlands representative who agreed on the need for unity on the part of the West in facing the Communist bloc.

The Belgian appeal raises a number of important questions. In the first place it is necessary to consider whether the facts, as stated by the Belgian representative, are accurate. Then there is the question of the validity of Belgium’s legal defence of its actions. There is the question of whether the dangers arising out of the Casablanca meeting have been accurately stated. Finally, there is the question of Canada’s response – in the light of these other considerations – to Belgium’s appeal for NATO solidarity.

The Facts of the Incident

We have no alternative, at the moment, to accepting the Belgian version of what happened. This situation might change, however, if the Secretary-General, for example, or the USSR representative, were to submit clear evidence which is not now available to us. In the meantime some scepticism may be permitted. It was no secret that some sort of expedition was planned; the requisition of the aircraft was public knowledge; anyone familiar with local circumstances would have known that they could not land at Bukavu and that Usumbura was the most logical landing-place. This much information, at least, was available, directly or by simple deduction, not only to the Belgians but to the UK, the US and probably others. It is difficult, moreover, although perhaps not wholly impossible, to believe that Belgium would not have been aware of the whole plan of the operation from the many Belgian advisers attached to the Leopoldville régime.

The Belgian Case

As to the general validity of the Belgian case, it appears that Belgian authorities acted contrary to paragraph VI of the September 20 UNGA Resolution in providing, in fact, passage and assistance to the military force from Luluabourg. Even granting that Kasavubu, as the recognized head of the Government of the Congo, has a legal right to request passage through Ruanda-Urundi from Belgium and even assuming, which is not certain, that Belgium, as the administering authority, would under normal circumstances have the right to grant this passage through its trust territory, nevertheless it would be under no obligation to do so and under the present circumstances its action is contrary to the UNGA Resolution which forbids "assistance for military purposes." There also seems to be no justification for transporting the troops to the border instead of requiring them to depart from Ruanda-Urundi in the aircraft in which they arrived.

The Casablanca Conference

It is doubtful whether the Casablanca meeting of African leaders added significantly to the dangers inherent in the Congo situation. These dangers include the possibility of civil war on an increasingly broad scale, with significant forces withdrawn from UN command but remaining in the Congo and aiding the Stanleyville régime; the possible defeat or forced withdrawal of remaining UN forces; and the possibility of open great-power intervention. These dangers remain very real. They were perhaps at their most menacing, however, in December, when the move to withdraw forces from UN command first gained momentum; they have, if anything, diminished slightly since then, if for no other reason simply because the worst possibilities have not materialized. It may be doubted whether the threats and demands of the extremist African leaders are more menacing for having been formally repeated at Casablanca; it might even be argued that they are less so, since leaders noted for the intemperance of their utterances have found so little new to say. There remains the threat to take "appropriate action" at an unspecified time, if the UN does not meet the demands of the African leaders. Without discounting this threat, however, one can doubt whether it really confronts the West with a new and newly-menacing situation.

The Appeal to NATO Solidarity

It would appear from the foregoing that there are legitimate doubts as to whether we know the full story of the Bukavu incident (although we might not wish to say this openly) and that the Belgian case is by no means above criticism, even on Belgium's own account of the facts. Finally there does not appear to be any new and overwhelmingly menacing situation which would make Western unity of overriding importance.

There would seem to be no reason, therefore, to alter our usual stand that NATO solidarity as such is not essential in a UN context. This is all the more the case insofar as the Congo is concerned, bearing in mind that we have continued to support the Secretary-General, and that the Secretary-General and Belgium are directly opposed to each other on this issue.

I recommend, therefore, that we do not respond to Belgium's appeal for NATO solidarity in this instance. Since Canada is not a member of the Security Council, however, I would hope that we would not find it necessary to make any public statement of our position.

Would you agree that the foregoing assessment might be transmitted to Mr. Ritchie and to Mr. Léger?¹

REQUEST FOR NATO SUPPORT FOR BELGIUM'S CONGO ACTIVITIES

You have asked for our views on the enclosed memorandum by our African and Middle Eastern Division to the Minister.²

2. My first remark is that the memorandum has been overtaken by events in the United Nations Security Council where the U.S.S.R. and the three Afro-Asian countries have failed to secure the condemnation of Belgium for having allowed the transit of Congolese troops through Ruanda-Urundi. The United States, the United Kingdom, France, and all the other members of the Security Council, except for the U.S.S.R. and the Afro-Asians, abstained on a resolution which would have found Belgium guilty of violating its trusteeship over Ruanda-Urundi. The matter is likely to come up in the General Assembly, however, as the U.S.S.R. Representative, Mr. Zorin, indicated that he considered the issue should be brought before the Assembly although he did not say whether he would request such action before the Assembly resumes its regular session in March.

3. It also seems to me that our African and Middle Eastern Division has misinterpreted somewhat the Belgian appeal for "Western solidarity" in the Congo. I think you will agree that Ambassador Rothschild, when he addressed the Political Advisers Committee, did not ask for a formal expression of NATO solidarity on the Ruanda-Urundi incident. He was at pains, of course, to defend the action taken by his authorities in this particular instance, but his appeal for "Western solidarity" was of a more general character. As reported by our NATO Delegation in their telegrams 45 and 47 of January 10, † Ambassador Rothschild, in the course of his address to the Political Advisers Committee, raised three problems, namely: (1) the transit of Congolese troops through Ruanda-Urundi; (2) political problems in Ruanda-Urundi; and (3) relations between the Belgian and the Congolese Governments. It is true he prefaced his remarks by stating that "Belgium and the West have both an interest and a moral responsibility in the Congo" and that Belgium "had to have the support of some other NATO countries in attempting to defend the area against the United Arab Republic and the Communist Bloc,” but he asked for an exchange of views only on the General Assembly’s recommendation to delay the elections in Ruanda-Urundi. Insofar as his appeal referred to the Usumbura incident, it was probably directed to the NATO members of the Security Council, who, as you know, gave some support to the Belgians in that forum.

4. The memorandum also suggests that the Belgian version of the Usumbura incident must be accepted with some scepticism. While this may be true, it seems to me that the Security Council’s refusal to condemn Belgium has a bearing on what position Canada should take if and when the question comes before the General Assembly. The Belgian version of the incident has not been openly challenged by the Western members of the Security Council and their friends. While it might be inadvisable to base recommendations to the Minister on the Belgian version of the incident only, our judgment of the Belgian behaviour must not be based on mere suppositions, even though these suppositions may have some foundation. I would suggest that we try and obtain more information from our United States and United Kingdom colleagues, in the light of the discussion in the Security Council.

Reference: African and Middle Eastern Division’s Memorandum of January 12, 1961 to the Minister.

REQUEST FOR NATO SUPPORT OF BELGIUM’S CONGO ACTIVITIES

We note that in its memorandum under reference, the African and Middle Eastern Division recommends to the Minister that we do not respond to Belgium’s appeal for NATO support of its actions in permitting Colonel Mobotu’s troops to enter the Ruanda-Urundi territory.

2. The recommendation of the African and Middle Eastern Division is based on the following reasons:

the facts of the incident: doubt is cast on the Belgian version of what actually happened in the Ruanda-Urundi. – While the Belgians would understandably try to present their case in the best possible light, we do not think for our part that this is a sufficient reason in itself to assume that facts have been distorted. We have heard nothing to this effect from the Americans or the British and the United Nations has not yet provided any such evidence. When this question came to a vote in the Security Council, all NATO powers and non-communist or non-Afro-Asian states sitting on the Council abstained;

the Belgian case: the African and Middle Eastern Division argues that Belgium acted contrary to paragraph 4 of the September 20 United Nations General Assembly resolution. – We are not in a position to comment on this assertion but presumably Legal Division or UN Division could offer useful views;

the Casablanca Conference: the memorandum under reference contends that the Casablanca Conference did not add significantly to the danger inherent to the situation in the Congo. – While this may be so and while strictly speaking assessing the situation would not come within our responsibilities, it nevertheless seems to us that a potentially explosive situation still prevails in the Congo, particularly in the Orientale Province where efforts are being made to set up a separatist pro-communist government, and where at the same time UAR troops technically withdrawn from the United Nations command still remain.

3. On the other hand, we find some merit in the Belgian case as set forth by Ambassador Rothschild. Leaving aside the legal aspect of the question, we find that on political grounds there is much to be said in favour of the middle-of-the-road course of action taken by the Belgians. It seems difficult to see how they could have done otherwise. Had the Belgians not met half-way the Congolese request, their action could have had serious consequences on their relations with the present United Nations-recognized Congolese Government and it is not unlikely that the morale of Colonel Mobutu's troops would have been adversely affected. This is a risk which the Belgians could hardly afford. We think that they have not gone too far either way: they have not prevented Mobutu's troops from crossing the Ruanda-Urundi, but they have not given them all assistance they could have given in other circumstances.

4. In fact we are of the opinion that this incident raises the broader problem of Belgium's relations with the Congo as a whole. Not to mention its economic aspects, the basic problem is a long, close and mutually profitable association with the Congo which the Belgians do not consider desirable to break up completely. We do not see either the necessity of a complete break up even though the Belgians may have made serious mistakes since last July. On the other hand, while there seems to be little doubt that the Belgians are better suited than anyone else to provide the assistance needed by the newly independent Congo, the Soviet Bloc, some Arab and Asian countries, certain quarters in the United Nations, as well as a number of more extremist Congolese are bent on getting all the Belgians out of the Congo and on breaking up all links between the two countries. The purposes of these manoeuvres are obvious. Still there remains a majority of Congolese who would wish to retain Belgian assistance, though, of course, on a different basis than before independence. It seems that in the face of all this, the Belgians have come to consider that the Congo has now definitely become part and parcel of the East-West struggle. Hence Western-minded Congolese leaders like Kasavubu, Tshombe and Mobutu, who are friendly towards Belgium, are given all the support and assistance they need. In view of Belgium's special position in the Congo and of the state of its relations with Lumumba, we think that there is some justification in this policy, until at least a Congolese leaders' round-table conference has settled some of the outstanding problems. After all, there is no evidence that the suppression of the Belgian "presence" in the Congo would be any guarantee against Soviet, communist or Arab penetration.

5. What worsens the situation in our opinion are the strained relations between the United Nations and Belgium on the Congo, particularly with regard to assistance. This provides the communists and the Arabs with welcome opportunities to brew storms in tea cups. Until a modus vivendi between the United Nations and Belgium is reached, there will not be much room for improvement. It is not irrelevant to note in this connection that ever since September 20, 1960,³ the Belgians have made serious efforts to reach agreement with the United Nations on this question. The United Nations have not been able to be nearly as forthcoming.

6. In view of the foregoing, the reasons not to respond to the Belgian request do not appear as obvious to this Division as they do to African and Middle Eastern Division. I might add in this respect that we fully concur with the comments made by Defence Liaison I Division in their memorandum of January 16 to you on the nature of the Belgian request for NATO support.

BELGIAN POLICY IN CONGO

The following notes on Canada's attitude towards Belgian activities in Congo could serve as the basis for a Canadian statement in the PAC if one appears to be necessary.

2. Because of its position as one of the few non-African or Asian countries on the Secretary-General's Special Advisory Committee, and the need to maintain a reputation for disinterestedness if it is to play an effective role, Canada has been obliged to take a detached public position as regards developments in Congo.

3. Apart from wanting to see Congo restored to conditions of stability and progress, Canada has two main objectives (a) to ensure as far as possible that UN effort in Congo is impartial and does not repeat not fail and that its capacity to play an effective role in situations of this sort is preserved, and (b) to ensure that Congo is able to maintain its unity and independence and that the situation there should not repeat not become a threat to international peace.

4. As regards Belgian activity and the regrettable lack of co-operation between Belgium and the Secretariat, we recognize that Belgium and Belgian nationals have qualifications for helping Congo out of its present difficulties. To serve this end and without in any way apportioning blame for past misunderstandings, we hope that Belgium will see the advantage of seeking fuller cooperation with UN Secretariat. We would further hope that Belgian Government would exert greater influence with Belgian nationals who are in Congo under independent auspices or intending to return to cooperate fully with UN and its agencies.

5. Insofar as current developments in Congo are concerned, we are encouraged by the efforts of the Conciliation Commission and hope it may make a positive contribution towards bringing the political crisis to an end. We think it important that there should be at the earliest possible date a renewed effort at consultation and conciliation of all Congolese leaders and the proposed round table conference would seem to offer an opportunity for this. We hope that a provisional Congolese government commanding the widest possible measure of political support can be set up quickly.

6. You might find it useful to quote passages from statements by Mr. Nesbitt in UNGA on December 19 as follows: On the importance of supporting UN effort "Canadian Government considers that UN operations in Congo are of a significance which goes far beyond their immediate impact on the situation in that country ... My government could have wished at different times that different courses of action had been pursued in Congo. It could have sought to influence UN operations to serve particular purposes which Canada believed should be served. But we have considered that it was important to resist these temptations and to exercise a degree of restraint even when events were taking place, the immediate results of which were not repeat not to our liking. "In Canadian view, what is at stake in Congo is not repeat not only the future of that unhappy country, important though that is, but the continuing effectiveness of UN peace-keeping machinery.”

7. Our view of the activities of Soviet Bloc in Congo “... The real objectives of these propagandistic attacks by Soviet Bloc must surely be clear to all states represented here. These are: to achieve control where they can; to subvert what they cannot repeat not control; and to destroy what they cannot repeat not subvert to their own ends. This applies to UN itself, whose success in promoting the welfare and genuine independence of new states is threatened by such policies. It particularly applies in the case of Congo, where the development of peace, tranquility and self-determination on anything but Soviet terms is impeded by every device at their command which they judge will not repeat not result in the ultimate conflict.”

RECOMMENDATION OF CONGO ADVISORY COMMITTEE
FOR RELEASE OF MR. LUMUMBA

In his telegram 126 of January 23[†] Mr. Ritchie reports on the January 20 meeting of the Congo Advisory Committee at which it was the consensus that the Secretary-General should communicate with President Kasavubu to recommend the liberation of Mr. Lumumba⁴ so that he might participate with other leaders in negotiations for a political settlement. The Secretary-General sent such a telegram on January 20, the text of which is contained in Mr. Ritchie's telegram 131 of January 23.[†] This same telegram contains the text of a message of January 21 from Foreign Minister Bomboko which constitutes a reply to Mr. Hammarskjöld and which in effect rejects the request to release Lumumba. Mr. Bomboko asserts that this effort of the Advisory Committee constitutes intervention in Congo affairs.

This is the first time that the Secretary-General has recommended that Lumumba be released from custody to engage in political negotiations and he has thus raised an issue of considerable importance which will, no doubt, be a subject for continuing discussion in the Advisory Committee and outside it. In the circumstances Mr. Ritchie will require some sort of guidance on the attitude he might be expected to express.

The telegram attached for your approval[†] sets out some comments for his guidance.⁵ It expresses agreement with Mr. Ritchie's view that it would be difficult, particularly in the Advisory Committee, to oppose the liberation of political prisoners in the Congo with the aim of encouraging political conciliation. On the other hand it points out that there are a number of considerations regarding the timing of Lumumba's release. The telegram reinforces the view that Lumumba should be treated by due process of law, including the right to a trial without delay. The point is also made that the U.N. might put off any major initiatives in the Congo until the Conciliation Commission has completed its task and made its report. We have also suggested that concern about inhumane treatment should not be concentrated on Lumumba but should be more generally directed. In view of today's press reports about imminent troop withdrawals from the Congo, a separate memorandum† is being submitted on this subject.

CONGO

When I called on Foreign Minister today to make representations about Geneva tariff negotiations he took the occasion to speak to me about Canadian policy toward Belgium and Congo.

2. Mr. Wigny said he was concerned that Canada had not repeat not given Belgium more support in UN. Moreover it had seemed to him that at NATO the Minister had attached such overriding importance to UN and to relations with UN members as to give impression that he was attaching less importance to NATO and to relations with NATO members.

3. I replied that I believed there existed a genuine difference of opinion between Belgians and Canada as to how best to promote our common interests. As Belgium's ally and friend Canada felt that given the present political balance in the world and in UN and given Canada's membership on UN Advisory Committee on Congo and Canadian troops in Congo, the best way for Canada to help was to avoid taking sides too openly. I also drew Minister's attention to position Canadian representative took at PAC meeting and said I thought he would there find support for one of main Belgian contentions, the value of Belgian presence in Congo.

4. Mr. Wigny said he welcomed having the matter put to him in this light but he nonetheless hoped that Canada would re-examine the position and reconsider her attitude, and would come to the conclusion that our common interests would best be served by supporting Belgium more openly and fully in UN and elsewhere.

CONGO: NEW USA APPROACH

Noyes (USA) called on me this afternoon to explain, on instructions from Washington, a new USA approach to the problem of the Congo. He read from a brief the main portion of which is as follows: Begins: The approach is as follows:

(a) A broadly based Congolese Government should be established as soon as possible. If various member states support this and encourage those concerned to establish a broadly based government, we believe it can be achieved and can bring about stability in Congo. A return to constitutionality under the Chief of State is essential.

(b) We also support the proposal of Secretary-General for a new mandate giving UN authority to bring under control all principal military elements in Congo and thus to neutralize the role of Congolese forces in the politics of the country. Under this mandate UN troops could undertake training of Congolese troops. We would also expect UN to step up its efforts to prevent all outside assistance from coming into the Congo.

(c) The UN civilian operation in the Congo should be increased and improved so that it can effectively assist the Congo and provide the only channel for external assistance.

When the military neutralization of Congolese forces is at least well under way and it is certain that a civil war has been averted, we believe that Secretary-General would be able to obtain the release and secure the protection of political prisoners. We also believe the establishment of a new, moderate and broadly based government would be essential if Secretary-General can be expected to have any success on this question. Ends.

2. Noyes described this as a genuine effort to find a middle of the road approach which would command the approval of the more moderate Afro-Asians and the acquiescence at least of all the interested powers. He hoped that in this way the powers concerned could draw back gradually from the "abyss" that faced them if UN failed in the Congo.

3. In reply to my question he said he thought that the two processes of pacification and forming a broadly based government could proceed together. Indeed he seemed to envisage that pacification and neutralization of the Congolese forces would flow from the political agreement that would come in the course of establishing a broadly based government, and that other means of enforcing the new mandate proposed for Secretary-General would only be considered if this did not repeat not succeed. You will see that this approach bears a considerable similarity to that described to us by Weischhoff (our telegram 216 February 3† refers).

4. Noyes said that they were very anxious to hear our comments and to have our active support if possible. Grateful for your views. We shall comment at greater length in separate telegram.

CONGO

Please let the appropriate USA officials in Washington and New York know that the Canadian Government appreciates their having informed us of the new USA attitude to the Congo problem. The USA approach appears to us to be constructive and sensible and generally pretty close to the line you have been following in the Advisory Committee.

2. The following observations are preliminary, pending further study of USA proposals and receipt of more detailed information as to how it is proposed that they should be implemented.

3. In general we concur in the basic USA premises, i.e. that the UN is the key to the Congo problem; that the UN action in the Congo must be supported and re-invigorated; and that its failure would have very serious consequences.

4. We agree that the UN should seek to further an early return to constitutionality and the formation as soon as possible of a broadly based Congo Government. We doubt whether this can be done without making some concessions to the elements which attach great importance to the early release of Lumumba. We would support the Secretary-General's policy under which all military elements in the Congo might be brought under control and neutralized: though we do not underestimate the difficulties in doing so. We attach great importance to the objective of a more effective UN civil operation, with the UN recognized as the only channel for external assistance. It should be noted that one prerequisite to achieving this objective would be the full agreement and understanding between the Secretariat and the Belgian Government which has hitherto been lacking. Perhaps the USA Government and others can make their influence felt to this end.

5. On the further points in the two telegrams under reference our preliminary observations are as follows: (1) Release of political prisoners: We understand and have some sympathy with the reasons for the suggestion that this should await "neutralization" of the military elements and success in forming a broadly based government. However it may have to be faced that the immediate release of Lumumba may be a condition set by some of the Asian and African powers for their cooperation in achieving any of the general objectives now set forth. (2) Tactics and timing: We would fully concur in the desirability of having all three parts of the USA programme go forward as nearly simultaneously as possible. We also would urge the desirability of talking freely and frankly with all interested governments particularly Asian and African. We continue to recognize the necessity of supporting the Secretary-General who can give the necessary lead more effectively and acceptably than any of the Great Powers. Our views and those of the USA are identical that the Secretary-General's efforts to rebuild the UN forces must be supported. So far as the replacement of Dayal is concerned we are worried lest an effort to have him removed might make the situation even more difficult than it is. If there were general agreement on the objectives to be pursued we could all probably work more satisfactorily with Dayal than has been the case in the past.

6. Central to the achievement of the objectives which Canada and the USA would wish to see achieved in the Congo is the cessation of outside interference. We have mentioned above that Belgian cooperation will be required. But it is no less essential that the Soviet Union, the African extremists and the Western countries reach some sort of "hands-off" agreement before pacification of the Congolese army, political conciliation and national reconstruction can proceed. It seems to us that there is a degree of mutuality of interest for both east and west in the Congo and that a basis for agreement exists.

CONGO

Thank you for your reference telegram. We shall pass on to USA Mission your appreciation of their approach and your preliminary observations.

2. We fully agree that we should pay tribute to the motives of USA Government in making this effort to stop the drift in the Congo and to rally moderate opinion behind a constructive approach. Like you we also think the basic ideas behind this approach are commendable and are nearer than previous Western policy to the Canadian approach as expressed for example in the Advisory Committee. In particular we agree with the emphasis on forming a broadly based Congolese Government and on a more effective UN role in preventing outside interference. We also believe USA is wise in seeking a consensus of the interested states on such a policy rather than in trying for an early resolution in the Security Council. However UK is somewhat disturbed that USA has sprung this policy on others without sufficient advance consultation and preparation. When we asked Noyes on February 7 he said it was still too early to form any impression of reactions to the approaches they had made.

3. When it comes to the practical steps required to implement these USA ideas we have found widespread doubts here. As far as we can gather USA envisages that the broadly based Congolese government will result mainly from conciliation between Kasavubu and Mobutu and Tshombe, although "empty chairs" might in the process be left for representatives from Stanleyville. The Americans do not repeat not envisage the release of Lumumba, or the convening of parliament, until after such political agreement is reached because they fear that if he is released before it will simply add to the chaos; they do not repeat not anticipate too much trouble from Gizenga because their reports suggest that his influence is waning. However many of us share your doubts that some of the Asian-African governments not repeat not to mention the Communist governments would ever accept a government as "broadly based" which did not repeat not include Lumumba. This might well prove a sticking point in negotiation with them. One possible compromise which was suggested some weeks ago by the Indian Permanent Representative in the Advisory Committee might be the release of Lumumba (and all other political prisoners) for the specific purpose of participating in negotiations leading towards a return to constitutional government in Congo but without prejudging Lumumba's guilt or innocence under Congolese law. Perhaps the UN might in some way be made responsible for the safekeeping and protection of Lumumba during the period of the negotiations although the Secretary-General has previously expressed in the Advisory Committee some hesitation about such an arrangement which might lead to the accusation that the UN was acting as Lumumba's jailer.

4. There is also widespread uncertainty here about the relationship between the political and the pacification processes in USA approach. USA ideas do not repeat not seem to be completely settled on this point but their main emphasis appears to be on achieving a political agreement which would bring about a broadly based government and at the same time some sort of arrangement for "neutralizing" the Congolese forces perhaps by getting them to deposit their arms in barracks as part of a new UN "training" scheme. On the other hand, UN Secretariat seems to put the emphasis on disarming the Congolese forces as a prerequisite for political conciliation and on changing the UN mandate in whatever way is necessary to achieve this although such a change in mandate might involve the use of force to disarm the Congolese army. Such proposals certainly pose very difficult questions both of principle and of practice. It would seem hard to justify an attempt to impose the disarmament of the Congolese forces on President Kasavubu who is under the constitution their Commander-in-Chief and if he continues to oppose the idea forcible disarming might be held to be a serious interference in the domestic concerns of Congo. Moreover any extension of UN mandate in this direction might involve UN contingents in direct hostilities with recalcitrant Congolese armed forces in a way which was certainly not repeat not contemplated when national contingents were originally allocated to Congo operation. It is hardly necessary to underline the practical difficulties in the way of disarming of "neutralizing" the Congolese armed forces, many of which have of course split up into local levies attached to various provincial leaders. It is hard to see how such a process could be brought about except as the consequence of some measure of political settlement rather than as a prior condition for that settlement. Perhaps a first step could be taken in at least discouraging the Congolese Government and the various warring provincial régimes from undertaking new military adventures against each other.

5. Any consideration of these problems brings one back to what you describe in paragraph 6 of your reference telegram as the "central" question as to whether USSR, the African extremists and the Western countries can reach some sort of "hands off" agreement before the entire process of settlement in Congo can proceed. This indeed seems to us the overriding condition for progress. If it can be attained the Russians might restrain the supporters of Lumumba while it would certainly be necessary for the Western powers to talk very plainly to the Belgians about the dangerous effects of some of their actions. Unfortunately from this point of view the new USA initiative has already apparently awakened Belgian suspicion and opposition. We understand that the Belgian mission to UN were offended at being informed of these new American ideas at the last moment and that they (and indeed the French also to a certain extent) are very negative in their reaction. We learned that a direct conversation on Congo took place February 6 between Stevenson and Zorin without we believe leading to any positive results and with continued Soviet insistence on the immediate release of Lumumba.⁶ However this is no repeat no doubt only a preliminary skirmish.

6. It seems that the Americans have not repeat not yet thought out the question of the relationship between external assistance channelled through UN and bilateral Belgian assistance. However they have indicated that they intend to put greater pressure on the Belgians to cooperate fully with UN in this field.

7. Finally we should perhaps point out that the Americans here have explained that this approach to Congo problem is the first big foreign policy effort of the new USA administration, that they are extremely serious in their determination to see it succeed and that its fate is likely to influence significantly the future USA attitude toward UN.

REPORTED DEATH OF LUMUMBA

I attach for your consideration a suggested statement† in case a question is asked in the House on this matter.

2. We telephoned New York and were informed by Mr. Ritchie that although the United Nations is still not in a position to confirm officially the death of Mr. Lumumba, the Secretary-General and the delegations are accepting the fact that Lumumba is dead as reported by the Katanga Government today. The manner and circumstances of his death however have yet to be clarified. At the meeting of the Security Council this morning the Secretary-General suggested that there should be an official investigation of the Katanga Government's report and in this was supported by the United States Delegate, Mr. Stevenson. The Soviet Representative queried the impartiality of the Secretariat to conduct such an investigation but the Council apparently upheld the Secretary-General and agreed to adjourn until Wednesday pending further investigation by the Secretariat.

CONGO

My Irish, Danish, Swedish and Norwegian colleagues and I had a very informal exchange of views Monday afternoon following the Security Council meeting. All were of course very preoccupied with the recent turn of events. In fact our general assessment of the situation was in terms which could scarcely have been darker even if we had known at that time that USSR would make the move it has today in calling for the removal of Hammarskjöld, the end of UN activity in Congo within a month and the recognition of Gizenga as head of Congolese Government.

2. We were all agreed that death of Lumumba would gravely prejudice the development of the new USA approach to Congo. Of the four essential elements of that approach, the two dealing with the formation of a broadly based government and the release of political prisoners would seem either hollow or impractical in the new circumstances. Something might, however, still be made of the other two, that is, the prevention of external intervention and the neutralization or disarming of Congolese armed forces.

3. With respect to the situation within the Congo itself, with the developing possibilities of massacres and reprisals, etc., UN force might now very well be forced into very difficult positions.

4. Since this gloomy gathering the task statement of Soviet position has darkened the prospects still further. It is interesting however that Afro-Asians particularly UAR and India are still talking of the need for a compromise resolution in the Security Council which might attempt to stave off a deterioration in Congo. Loutfi (UAR) spoke to me of such a resolution yesterday and we learn that today Jha is working on a possible text which might be based on (a) neutralization of ANC forces in Congo and prevention of civil war; (b) withdrawal of all Belgian military and para-military personnel from Congo; (c) an investigation by a subcommittee of the Security Council of the circumstances of Lumumba's death.

5. It is too early to say what prospects such a relatively moderate approach may have but at least at the moment the Afro-Asians apart from Mali and Guinea do not repeat not appear to have associated themselves with extreme Soviet position.

THE SITUATION IN THE CONGO

Over the last few days the situation in the Congo, which was already deteriorating, has taken a sharp turn for the worse as the result of the death of Lumumba. The Soviet Union are repudiating the Secretary-General and a number of African governments have recognized Mr. Gizenga as the head of the legitimate Congolese Government.

2. The implications of these recent developments are potentially extremely serious, both in the Congo and generally. In the Congo it is possible that fighting may develop between Gizenga on the one side and the United Nations on the other. As an alternative which is no less disturbing, the United Nations might withdraw with a very substantial loss in prestige to cut down its losses and then at best there would be chaos in the Congo for a good long while. There is, however, a danger, should the United Nations withdraw, that Gizenga with Soviet assistance might become involved in a struggle against Katanga with Belgian and U.S. assistance. This would open up a new hot and cold war front in the centre of Africa. It is not inconceivable that the conflict might not be limited to Africa. The situation in the Congo is therefore potentially extremely serious.

3. The trouble unfortunately is not limited to the Congo. By challenging the Secretary-General, in allowing aid to be given to the Gizenga Government, the Soviet Union seems to be determined to wreck the special contribution to stability in the world which the U.N. might have been able to make in spite of the present Charter limitations. Furthermore, the Soviet Union seems to be making a determined bid for at least a zone of influence in Africa, extending the present foothold it has in Guinea. There is no doubt that part of this is related to the permanent objectives of Soviet policy. It is also conceivable that they have skilfully taken advantage of our own mistakes and, in particular, of the ill-advised Belgian reluctance to pull out of the Congo. There may well be on the part of the Russians a desire to pick up as many trumps as they can in preparation for the Summit meeting with Kennedy. In return for concessions as to the United Nations or in Africa, the Russians may be in a better position to obtain from the United States advantages in other areas which are of more immediate or substantial interest to the Soviet Union, e.g. Berlin, Germany, etc. The situation is complicated by the fact that a number of African countries seem to have espoused the Soviet view of the situation and to be supporting Soviet manoeuvres. Another element in the situation is that the important neutral countries or uncommitted countries, such as India, Ceylon, and to a certain extent Yugoslavia and Egypt, are either passive or siding with the Soviet Union. The danger therefore is that if the situation is allowed to deteriorate, the United Nations ability to assist in maintaining peace will be substantially reduced and Soviet power in the world will be increased as a result of their acquiring control over the Congo.

4. The conclusion of the above cursory analysis would seem to be that the Soviet operation may succeed unless uncommitted countries are prepared to intervene to frustrate it and it seems that, for the West and for Canada in particular, the problem, insofar as the situation in the Congo and that of the United Nations, is that of determining whether anything can usefully be done to induce these uncommitted states to do anything to prevent what would in fact be a major Soviet victory.

5. It seems to me that the real issue is not whether the Secretary-General is adequate or not and whether a collegiate system should be introduced in the structure of the United Nations, but whether it is not in the interests of small, medium and uncommitted countries to take immediate and energetic action to salvage what can be salvaged of existing U.N. machinery for independent action to sustain peace and security in the world. If Hammarskjöld is compelled to resign and the United Nations in general or in the Congo is discredited, it seems to me that there will be a tendency to deal with international problems on a naked power basis and that this will increase the dangers of war and reduce the potential role which the medium and uncommitted countries can play in the preservation of peace. If this conclusion is accepted, it seems to me that the efforts of countries like Canada should be directed to promoting a greater appreciation on the part of other countries, particularly the uncommitted countries, as to the urgent need for ensuring that the structure of the United Nations is not allowed to disintegrate and the U.N. effort in the Congo is not brought to an immediate end, even though this does not necessarily mean that it should be conducted along the lines envisaged by the Secretary-

General. In the circumstances, it seems to me that it would be open to Canada to appeal to some of the leading statesmen of uncommitted countries to take stock of the situation and to consider whether they do not agree that a continuation of the U.N. effort in the Congo in some fashion and a maintenance of some freedom of manoeuvre for the U.N. are not linked and whether this does not mean that, together with such Western countries as are directly involved in the Congolese situation, they should not seek to find a solution to that situation which would involve making maximum use of U.N. facilities in such a way as to elicit African cooperation.

6. There is at the moment in operation a Conciliation Committee. The trouble with this Committee is that it is not fully representative of the elements vitally involved in this situation and that the outcome of its deliberations is unlikely to affect the situation materially. In view of developments in the last few days, is it not realistic to assume that a number of African states have taken up a position in support of Soviet objectives while a certain number of other states are hesitant to pursue this course and that no solution which does not take into account this polarization of the Congolese situation is likely to be acceptable. The two elements therefore to be reconciled are a division of African opinion on the Congolese issue and the need to rally neutral opinion in support of U.N. machinery.

7. Would it not be possible to achieve this objective in suggesting to the leaders of uncommitted countries that one possible approach to a solution might be to arrange, under United Nations' auspices, for a meeting of leaders of African states directly concerned at the highest level to consider urgently what steps might be taken to bring to Congolese situation under control before it is allowed to threaten peace more directly. I have in mind that perhaps the President of the Assembly might call a meeting of African states which might consider measures to be recommended to the Security Council with a view to providing a solution of the present Congo difficulties. There is an advantage in asking Africans to deal with an African situation but I do not think that the issue with which we are faced concerns the African states alone and I do not think that the United Nations should abdicate completely to African states in the present circumstances. There is bound to be a problem as to the composition of the meeting. This is a matter for negotiation but if the worst came to the worst, I do not think that the West should accept less than a 50-50 proposition. I envisage that the African leaders might come up with suggestions concerning the introduction of arms into the Congo, the withdrawal of "volunteers," the supervision of the kind of assistance which should be provided, etc.

SITUATION IN THE CONGO

1. The Prime Minister, as Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs, said that the government of Mr. Gizenga, as successor to Mr. Lumumba, had already been recognized by the U.S.S.R., Ghana, Guinea and the United Arab Republic. It appeared likely that Mr. Gizenga would try to establish his government in other parts of the Congo.

He deplored the disorders that had occurred⁷ on the previous day at the United Nations Security Council. He expressed gratification, however, at the forthright statement by President Kennedy at a televised press conference later on that day, that the United States would act to support the United Nations if any nation should take unilateral action in the Congo.

2. During the brief discussion it was stated that Mr. Gizenga had a force of 2,000 troops, and might soon attack Stanleyville.

3. The Cabinet noted the statement of the Prime Minister, as Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs, on the situation in the Congo.

CONGO – USE OF RCAF NORTH STAR AIRCRAFT

You will recall that the commitment entered into by the Canadian Government last September to provide two North Star flights per week in support of the external airlift for the U.N. forces in the Congo was extended for a further period of ninety days last December. This extended period will expire on March 9, 1961 and the U.N. Secretariat has now requested that it be again extended for at least an additional period of ninety days. The reason given by the U.N. is that although normal supply requirements for the ONUC are now sea-lifted, the twice weekly North Star flights provided by the Canadian Government continue to be an essential part of the support operation.

2. In view of recent developments in the Congo, and of the public position which the Government has taken on them, it would seem more than ever essential that the U.N. presence there be maintained and adequately supported logistically, and that Canada should not take any action which might suggest a declining interest in the ONUC, or which might imply that we intend to scale down Canadian participation in the Force. For this reason, I would recommend that the further extension requested by the U.N. be granted subject to re-consideration of the problem in the light of developments during the additional ninety-day period. I attach for your signature, if you agree, a letter† along those lines to the Minister of National Defence.⁸

CONGO: SECURITY COUNCIL DEBATE

Early this morning, the Permanent Mission in New York reported by telephone on the outcome of the Security Council debate on the Congo situation. At that time, the Council had rejected the Soviet draft resolution, calling for the dismissal of the Secretary-General and the withdrawal of the United Nations operation in the Congo, by a vote of one in favour, eight against and two abstentions (Ceylon, United Arab Republic). The Council had adopted the draft resolution, submitted by Ceylon, Liberia and the United Arab Republic, and containing a clarified programme for the United Nations operations in the Congo, by a vote of nine in favour, none against and two abstentions (France and the Soviet Union). The Council was still considering another draft resolution, submitted by the African-Asian members, which dealt with the political assassinations and called for an investigation of them. We learned later that this third resolution was not adopted because it failed to have the support of seven members of the Council (the Western powers abstained).

2. The result in the Council has been hailed by the press as a defeat for the Soviet Union and a victory for the Secretary-General. Certainly, the Soviet attempt to remove the Secretary-General through Council action has been blocked. However, the Secretary-General has not been specifically supported by the African-Asians because their draft resolution, while calling for further United Nations action, makes no direct reference to the Secretary-General.

3. By implication, of course, the Secretary-General will continue to be the executive authority in the implementation of the three-power resolution. The African-Asians can be expected to play an active part in seeing to it that the various provisions of the draft resolution are carried out. Some of these, like the withdrawal and evacuation of "all Belgian and other foreign military and paramilitary personnel and political advisers not under United Nations command, and mercenaries" will probably require complementary diplomatic action to persuade the governments concerned to co-operate. The impartial investigation of political assassinations in the Congo and the punishment of "perpetrators of these crimes" is another provision which may be difficult to implement.

Signed by SSEA 22/2. R. C[ampbell]

4. Some of the elements which contributed to the success of the Council deliberations appear to have been:

(a) The firm stand taken by the United States in support of a continuing role for the United Nations. The United States representative made clear to the Council and to all members of the United Nations that the United States would not stand idle in the face of a United Nations collapse in the Congo but would take action to prevent chaos in that country and to counter any outside interference. This strong statement had the effect of persuading the African-Asians to rally behind the United Nations effort in the Congo and to take the steps necessary to make the United Nations operation more effective. The African-Asians were made to realize that, if both the Soviet Union and the United States meant business, the Congo would not only become battleground in the cold war but perhaps the scene of actual fighting involving the Great Powers. Fear of this result prompted the African-Asians to unite in an effort to preserve the United Nations approach.

(b) India shifted its position significantly by concentrating immediate attention on the need to avert civil war in the Congo and to restore order. Before Christmas, the Indians strongly supported Lumumba and called for the immediate convening of parliament. More recently, they have emphasized the urgent need to restore peace and security and, in effect, conditions in which there could be an early return to constitutional government. This important shift of emphasis has not been reflected so much in the public statements of India as in the essence of the position the Indians have taken in recent negotiations behind the scenes in New York. India is now prepared, according to reports, to give strong military support to the United Nations in the Congo.

(c) The position of the United Arab Republic has been interesting and important. The fact that Nasser has chosen to take the initiative in the Security Council rather than to follow Guinea and Mali in supporting the Soviet Union suggests that he may have had his own reasons for wishing to loosen once again the Soviet embrace. Nasser may have regarded, moreover, that open conflict between Gizenga and Kasavubu, each supported from outside, was a risk which he was not prepared to run. It may also have been his calculation that Gizenga in the short term would not be strong enough to resist the combined fighting force of Kasavubu and Tshombe. A return to the United Nations approach could be expected to take the heat out of the situation and allow time for re-organizing the Gizenga faction for the eventual political show-down.

5. The critical factor in the situation now may be the reaction of Belgium and perhaps France. If these countries are prepared to co-operate with the United Nations, it seems possible that with increased military and economic strength the Organization may be able to make headway on the programme contained in the three-power resolution. Particularly, the Belgian position may depend on the degree of pressure which is exerted on Belgium's allies, principally the United States and the United Kingdom. The United States, however, appears firmly committed to the United Nations approach and this would imply a determination to render diplomatic support as well as the material assistance needed by the United Nations.

6. Quite apart from the Belgian attitude will be that of Tshombe. For a time at least, he may believe that he can defy the United Nations. However, if the United Nations presence in Katanga can be reinforced and if the external props are removed, his position will be less tenable and he will be better disposed to reach accommodation with the other political leaders in the Congo.

7. While there is cause for mild optimism about the fact that the Security Council has been able to reach a decision in favour of further action by the United Nations in the Congo, it would be a mistake not to be cautious about the difficulties. In trying to prevent civil war, for example, the United Nations could become involved in heavy fighting. The main source of satisfaction surely is that the United Nations has been authorized to continue its effort, that the initiative has passed to the African-Asians, who seem disposed to support the United Nations, and that United Nations has a fair opportunity to recoup its losses in the Congo.

THE CONGO

A new phase of developments in and relating to the Congo has been opened, with the passage by the Security Council on February 21 of an Afro-Asian resolution designed largely to forestall the prospect of civil war in the wake of the death of Patrice Lumumba. Some encouragement may be drawn from this active re-association of some of the leading African and Asian countries with the UN effort to reverse the trend toward disintegration in the Congo. At the same time, the limitations of the current initiative cannot be ignored. As the Secretary-General pointed out in welcoming the resolution, it provides a "stronger and more clear framework" for UN action, but does not broaden the legal basis for UN involvement or provide any "new means for implementation." Moreover, the alignment of external forces behind the various conflicting elements within the Congo continues to aggravate the situation; since the announcement of Lumumba's death the Stanleyville régime headed by his lieutenant, Antoine Gizenga, has been formally recognized as the legal government of the Congo by most Soviet bloc countries, and by several African states including the UAR and Ghana.

Nevertheless, a Security Council resolution promoted by Afro-Asians which reaffirms the paramount role of the UN in sorting out affairs in the Congo offers a fresh start for all concerned, and an opportunity to introduce new effectiveness into the UN action. The principal clauses of the resolution call for cessation of all military operations, with force to be used by the UN as a last resort to secure compliance; evacuation of all Belgian and other foreign, non-UN military personnel and political advisers; investigation of Lumumba's death; convening of parliament in secure conditions; and reorganization of the Congolese armed forces. While apparently unexceptionable from an objective viewpoint, these proposals have aroused sharply adverse reactions from several of the more actively interested parties both within and outside the Congo. Both the Ileo Government in Leopoldville and the Tshombe régime in Katanga have made clear their opposition to having their forces neutralized. The Soviet Union, which had utilized the Congo debate in the Security Council for an assault of unparalleled ferocity on the person of the Secretary-General, may be expected to continue exploiting every opportunity to undermine the UN operation. Belgium will have difficulty in reconciling itself to the unequivocal demand for further and rapid limitation of Belgian influence. Most critical for the successful implementation of the Security Council resolution, however, will be the response of the leading Afro-Asian states. How realistic and effective this response will be can only be tentatively assessed at this stage.

Co-sponsorship of the resolution by the UAR, which has represented a principal focus of support for Lumumba and in this cause has given physical as well as moral support to the Gizenga régime, may indicate that the UAR has reached a point of decision in its Congo policy. Although it has withdrawn its contingent from the UN force, and while it undoubtedly will seek to interpret the Security Council resolution in a manner favourable to the Stanleyville régime, the UAR with the departure of Mr. Lumumba from the scene may find its way clear to work gradually back to a less negative attitude toward the UN effort.

The Commonwealth country which has been most directly involved in the Congo, Ghana, also was openly committed to the support of Lumumba. Nevertheless, Prime Minister N^oKrumah has persistently clung to the principle of a primary role for the UN in the Congo, no matter how vigorously he has condemned the implementation of the UN mandate. Ghana so far has maintained its 1200-man force in the Congo, and apparently has made some effort to persuade Morocco to keep its contingent there as well. In a message of February 18 to the Secretary-General, Mr. N^oKrumah indicated his deep concern at the further deterioration of conditions in the Congo, and outlined a comprehensive plan for reorganizing the UN activities under an exclusively African UN command. Although Ghana was not directly associated with the February 21 resolution, several elements in it may be expected to appeal to Prime Minister N^oKrumah.

Of the other African states which have most vigorously supported Lumumba, Guinea and Mali remain vociferous in their endorsement of the Gizenga régime and in condemning the UN operation. Morocco has taken a much more cautious position; although it has declared its disillusionment with the UN exercise, there have been indications that Morocco is wavering in its determination to withdraw its 3200-man contingent, part of which still remains in the Congo.

Leaving aside the participants in the Casablanca meeting, several African states – and in particular Ethiopia, the Sudan, Tunisia and the remaining former French territories – have taken a stand generally supporting the UN effort, and have avoided strong commitments to any single faction in the Congo. An exception is the pro-Kasavubu Government of the Congo (Brazzaville) Republic.

Nigeria, with 1500 troops and considerable influence (the President of the Conciliation Commission is a Nigerian) also takes a firm stand in support of the UN role. Nigeria was associated with the drafting of the Security Council resolution of February 21, for which it expressed strong support.

India has been an active participant in the UN exercise in the Congo, and it seems likely that its involvement may assume increased importance. In addition to maintaining a 780-man non-combatant contingent in the Congo, India has several of its nationals in top positions in the UN Congo structure. These include Rajeshwar Dayal, the Secretary-General's political representative, and Brigadier Rikhye, his military adviser. India's position has been that the Congo parliament represents the only acceptable source of a constitutional solution to the struggle for power within the country. This also involved support for Lumumba as Prime Minister, but any other Prime Minister chosen legally by parliament probably would be equally acceptable. India recognizes Kasavubu as head of state. While emphasizing the importance of a distinctively Congolese solution to the country's problems, India has shown grave concern at the prospect of collapse of the UN effort, urging that this would be disastrous both for the Congo and for the UN. Against this background India expressed strong support for the February 21 resolution, and indicated that it would make whatever further contribution to the UN operation might become desirable.

Malaya contributes a contingent to the UN force in the Congo, and it seems likely that Malayan participation will be expanded. Pakistan has contributed a contingent of non-combatant troops to the U.N. operation and in its public pronouncements has conveyed support for the Secretary-General and the UN role.

The general position of the remaining members of the Commonwealth – the U.K., Australia, New Zealand and South Africa – in respect of the Congo has been to avoid involvement in the country's internal conflicts, and to support the UN effort on a pragmatic basis.

Soviet policy in respect of the Congo has involved vehement support for pro-Lumumba elements, and correspondingly violent opposition to Mobutu, Kasavubu and Tshombe. The difficulties of the UN operation have been exploited in destructive criticism of the UN structure and Mr. Hammarskjöld personally, while the attitudes of Belgium and the "imperialist" Western powers generally have been vigorously attacked as well. The recent Soviet resolution before the Security Council, calling for complete withdrawal of the UN forces from the Congo within a month and removal of Mr. Hammarskjöld from his office, received only the Soviet vote, with the UAR and Ceylon abstaining. The Soviet Union abstained on the successful Afro-Asian resolution.

Belgium, with close traditional ties to the Congo and large numbers of nationals employed by both the Tshombe and Kasavubu régimes, retains considerable influence there. Belgian policy presumably has been to support first Congo unity and hence the Kasavubu Government and, if this régime fails, to fall back on support for Tshombe and his régime in Katanga where the bulk of Belgian investments are concentrated. More recently the Belgian Government has shown a tendency to encourage cooperation of Belgian nationals with UN officials in the Congo; but how far this measure of cooperation will survive or be extended under the recent Security Council resolution remains to be seen. The Belgian position is strongly supported by Portugal and, in a more discreet way, by France.

The United States under the Kennedy Administration has adopted a more dynamic approach to the Congo problem. Its declared support for the Secretary-General's recent proposals – including plans for reorganization of the Congolese Army, political conciliation and increased aid for the Congo – provided a useful background for the current Afro-Asian initiative.

The Security Council resolution of February 21 gives expression to a number of proposals included in the preliminary report submitted to the UN Advisory Committee on the Congo by the Conciliation Commission of 14 Afro-Asian representatives, which had spent several weeks in the Congo. It is not clear what will be the future role of the Conciliation Commission, which suffered severe divisions within its ranks in the course of its difficult mission.

In the formidable task of seeking to implement the Security Council resolution, Mr. Hammarskjöld has indicated that he intends to involve the Advisory Committee more directly than previously in his decisions and actions. (This committee includes Canada, Ireland and Sweden as well as its 14 Afro-Asian members.) Initial measures to give effect to the resolution will have to be concentrated on bolstering the UN force; Brigadier Rikhye has estimated that 25 battalions are needed to implement the peace-restoring clause in the resolution, whereas only 16 battalions will be left in the Congo when withdrawals now in progress are completed. In seeking new contributions, appeals are being addressed first to African and Asian states, although it may become necessary or desirable later to ask for reinforcements from other sources. A particular sensitive factor in recruiting enlarged or new contributions involves the reservations which many governments may be expected to hold concerning the manner in which their troops may be used in the Congo. The Security Council resolution apparently gives the force somewhat broader scope for action than previously, when its military function has been largely limited to self-defence.

Concurrent action is being taken by the Secretary-General to implement other clauses in the Afro-Asian resolution. Communications are being directed to the various political leaders in the Congo, and to the Belgian and other governments, exhorting full compliance with the terms of the resolution.

Canada has consistently held that the UN must play the key role in the Congo problem, that the UN operation must be supported and reinvigorated and that its failure would have very serious consequences. To the extent that the resolution of February 21 provides the means for strengthening the hand of the UN and its Chief Executive Officers, and contributes to making the UN the exclusive channel for foreign participation in Congolese affairs, it is a step to be welcomed. Of particular interest to Canada is the support which this initiative has evoked from African and Asian members of the Commonwealth, who may be expected to play an increasingly significant part in determining the course and outcome of the UN effort in the Congo.

CONGO QUESTIONS AFFECTING BELGIUM – GUIDANCE FOR NATO DISCUSSION

It appears certain that the implications for Belgium of the latest Security Council resolution on the Congo will be discussed in NATO early in the week. (Belgium has already taken up in NATO the question of attacks on Belgian embassies.) Attached for your consideration is a suggested telegram† indicating the line our delegation might take in this discussion.

2. It is the Department's estimate both that heavy demands are being made on Belgium, and that Belgium's wholehearted cooperation is essential if the Security Council resolution is to be implemented and if the UN effort in the Congo is to succeed. (These points are the subject of a more detailed memorandum which will be going forward to you.) The preliminary indications are that Belgium is disposed to be cooperative; we know from New York, however, that a somewhat peremptory message has gone to the Belgian Permanent Representative, and the Belgian Government is likely to find this message difficult to accept immediately and in its entirety.

3. In the circumstances, it is recommended that we take an attitude of sympathetic encouragement towards Belgium, while not deviating from insistence on the paramount importance of implementing the Security Council resolution.⁹

CONGO – POLICY QUESTIONS

I should like to comment on two points arising out of your very helpful reference telegram. My thought is that, if you agreed and if it still appeared appropriate to do so by that time, these points might be touched upon in our intervention in the Congo debate.

2. In paragraph 7 of your reference telegram you very rightly emphasize the importance of keeping clearly in view the ends to which the UN operation is directed. It seems to me that it is almost equally important that these ends should be clearly understood by the Congolese themselves. The importance of a major UN public relations effort has been stressed in the Advisory Committee by Slim of Tunisia, and I have given my support. Much of the recent trouble in the Congo arises out of misunderstanding, which is to some extent traceable to the failure of the UN's representatives in the Congo to make their position wholly clear. (This situation is exemplified in paragraph 4 of telegram 67 March 6† from our representative in Leopoldville which states that "no repeat no attempts on the part of the UN command were made locally to deny belief inspired by the government that UN intends to disarm Congolese troops.") While I would not repeat not propose to assign blame publicly, I think it might be useful to urge action to make the UN's position clear.

3. Your emphasis in paragraph 9 of your reference telegram on the urgent need to establish more effective consultation and mutual confidence between the UN and Congolese political leaders underlines an issue which is beginning to take shape in the Advisory Committee and may prove to be of major importance in next week's debate.

4. This issue was stated in crude and provocative but effective terms at Tuesday night's Advisory Committee meeting (on which we are reporting separately) by Wachuku of Nigeria. He accused the Advisory Committee and the UN generally of fighting shy of a most important decision: whether the Congo was to continue to be regarded as a sovereign and independent member of the UN, or as a UN trust territory; if the former, whether there was a valid constitution in existence; if so, what Congolese authorities were legal under it. The UN would have to face up to the decision, Wachuku said, and once it had decided there would have to be an end to propaganda and great power politics.

5. Jha of India took issue with the presentation of the problem in this form, and the Secretary-General expressed the hope that the Congolese themselves would "make up our minds for us."

6. It is becoming increasingly apparent, however, that they are unlikely to do so, or at the least that it will be impossible to obtain any agreement internationally that they have done so. Gizenga's refusal to attend the Tananarive meeting points up the fact that at least one of the factional leaders in the Congo will be likely to boycott any meeting which is called to consider steps leading towards the formation of an all-Congolese Government. Subsequently it will be open to that leader and to his friends in the UN to reject whatever agreement may have been reached. In effect, each factional leader has a veto over such agreement, at any time or in any circumstances he thinks unfavourable.

7. Yet at some point the UN has got to have a Congolese Government with which it can deal, unless, of course, as Wachuku says, it accepts one of the other two possibilities of anarchy indefinitely or some sort of UN trusteeship over the Congo.

8. This last possibility, which Nigeria for one rejects categorically, seems to be what the Congolese civil and military leaders principally fear. The existence of such fears (which may, incidentally, be enhanced by some of N'Krumah's ideas) and the manifestations they can give rise to, lead me to feel that it is urgently important to accompany the current re-definition of the circumstances in which force may be used with some more positive and immediate goal than the vague hope that the Congolese will, at some time in the indefinite future, find for themselves a leadership which will satisfy everyone that it is the valid repository of the sovereignty of the Congolese state.

9. The UN is being pushed towards a decision whose importance and urgency are becoming increasingly apparent, but whose achievement is becoming increasingly difficult. It is happening when some even of those who are not repeat not committed to one of the separatist claimants are moving farther away from acceptance of any existing Congolese authority – witness Jha's belief that Kasavubu has ruled himself out of court as everything but Head of State (which appears to mean little or nothing in the Indian lexicon) by his association with anti-UN acts.

10. My own feeling is that the importance of having some sort of central Congolese authority with which the UN can and will deal must be firmly stressed. This is all the more important if there is to be a chance of a new start under a successor to Dayal. Kasavubu's proposals for re-organization with UN assistance of the Congolese armed forces (see our telegram 438 Mar 8)† might, for example, be a real basis for negotiation between the UN and a responsible Congolese authority if any such were recognized. The proposals themselves raise serious difficulties only if there is no repeat no recognized central authority.

11. This does not repeat not necessarily mean that we should commit ourselves to the Kasavubu-Ileo régime. But we do have a case, I think, for urging that the UN take a more constructive approach to the Congo problem, in two respects. First, the UN should make a determined effort to reach agreement on a realistic statement of the conditions which will need to be met by any authority seeking general recognition as an all-Congolese régime; at the least, there should be agreement on steps which would be accepted as leading towards the formation of a valid all-Congolese Government. Second, there should be a deliberate effort in the meantime to widen the area of practical cooperation between the UN in the Congo and the de facto Congolese authorities in the different areas, without of course either raising any question of de jure recognition or enhancing the military strength of regional régimes.

12. We shall have probably by March 14 the first report of the Conciliation Commission which, if it reflects the principles contained in the preliminary report of the Commission, may give us something to build on (although we do not repeat not yet know how many members of the commission have signed the first report.)

CONGO ADVISORY COMMITTEE MEETING – MARCH 13, 1961

Before yesterday's Advisory Committee met I had a talk with Secretary-General. I found him in a somewhat tense state. He was indignant at the behaviour of the Congolese authorities over Matadi¹⁰ and said that all new evidence reaching him put the Congolese attitude in an even worse light and clearly showed Belgian influences at work. He referred bitterly to a recent episode in which Swedish personnel captured by ANC had been made to walk naked in the street.

2. Turning to the communiqué of the Tananarive Conference¹¹ Mr. Hammarskjöld said that the meeting of the Congolese leaders was simply an assembly of political personalities and that it had no repeat no constitutional status. He was convinced that Belgian influence had been strongly at work in drafting plans for the new Congolese Confederation. He went on to say that the abandonment by President Kasavubu of the loi fondamentale and the new position he had assumed as President of a Confederation raised the whole question of the validity of his position as Head of the Congolese State. He then told me that he proposed to bring this question to the attention of the Advisory Committee and read me quotations from the statement he proposed to make (see my reference telegram). I expressed some doubt as to the desirability of raising at this stage the question of President Kasavubu's position as Head of State. I pointed out that this would certainly lead eventually to a bitter dispute as to whether Kasavubu remained Head of State. Meanwhile it was always possible that the Tananarive decisions might be mitigated in the subsequent round of meetings which were planned by the Congolese leaders as part of the process of constitution making. I added that while it might be difficult to defend the constitutional legality of President Kasavubu's position unless it had received parliamentary or popular approval the fact remained that many states in UN African and other had credentials from heads of state whose own positions in terms of constitutional legality might be very dubious. (We seemed to be applying criteria of legal and democratic purity to Congo which we do not repeat not apply to a number of other governments of member states.)

3. The Secretary-General recognized that the question of Kasavubu's continued position as Head of State would cause a cleavage in UN but seemed to regard this as inevitable. In any event he pointed out that he was not repeat not prejudging the issue but only raising it.

4. I then said to the Secretary-General that he might have noticed that in my interventions in the Advisory Committee I had placed a good deal of emphasis on need to inform such public opinion as existed in the Congo more fully as to the intentions of UN and in particular to disabuse their minds on the idea that UN force was going to disarm ANC. I said that reports from our own representative in Leopoldville strengthened my impression that much too little was being done in this direction and that many unnecessary misunderstandings and suspicions were being allowed to grow up. Mr. Hammarskjöld acknowledged that there was truth in this criticism and said that he now planned to record a statement explaining UN purposes which could be broadcast over Congo radio. I said I was glad to hear of this step which I thought might have been taken earlier.

5. In my reference telegram I have outlined Secretary-General's subsequent presentation to the Advisory Committee and the reactions of the members of the committee. I still feel that it was unfortunate that Mr. Hammarskjöld should have raised the issue of President Kasavubu's status in what seems to me a precipitate manner. I think his reasoning has been that the Casablanca powers and perhaps other Afro-Asians also will raise this matter and that he should get in first. In my opinion however his statement cannot repeat not fail to cast doubts on the President's status and make working relations with Congolese authorities more difficult.

6. I believe that we shall shortly be facing in UNGA a new cleavage as a result of Tananarive Conference decisions. If Congolese leaders had declared themselves for a federation however loose instead of a confederation of separate states the position might be easier (and they could have obtained the same results) but their present decisions will at once lend themselves to the accusation that Congolese State has been dismembered. The cry will go up that Tshombe and his Belgian advisers have succeeded in "balkanizing" the Congo in the interests of continued indirect Belgian control. Apart from USSR which will of course lead attack many African states including probably all the Casablanca powers will react unfavourably to the Tananarive decisions. Even other African states more disposed to friendship with Kasavubu (e.g. Nigeria) will have difficulty in supporting a solution which breaks up the unitary state of Congo as they may hold this a dangerous example for their countries.

7. Of course so far as Congo itself is concerned any step in the direction of conciliation and of peaceable arrangements among its leaders should be welcomed and to this extent there may be an echo of approval from French African states and from others although the absence of Gizenga leaves open the question as to whether the new constitutional arrangements are to be imposed by force on the territories which he controls.

8. Certainly the position of UN in Congo and the position of governments contributing troops becomes daily more complicated and potentially dangerous while the objective of UN operation becomes more obscure. Will countries such as Ghana or even India be disposed to accept the new Tananarive dispensation or will they feel that the object of UN operation in Congo should be to sweep aside the Tananarive decisions, to ensure the summoning of parliament and the restoration of the unity of the Congo? On the other hand will other countries contributing forces conceive it to be their responsibility to impose (perhaps by force), a parliamentary and unitary régime on Congo in defiance of the wishes of most of the Congolese leaders (including incidentally all those who take a pro-western and anti-communist policy line)?

9. It is possible that these differences of opinion may crystallize over the question of the status of Kasavubu as Head of State and the credentials of the present Congolese delegation.

10. It is not repeat not likely that those who were active in seating Kasavubu's representative such as USA, UK etc. will lightly throw him over. Indeed without continued recognition of Kasavubu's status there is no repeat no legal entity left in Congo with whom to deal.

11. I need not repeat not labour the grave difficulties which these developments will present to us. Meanwhile my suggestions would be:

- (1) that whatever the eventual outcome of the constitutional problems posed by the Tananarive decisions we should continue to attempt to improve our working relations with the existing Congolese authorities by a mixture of firmness and active conciliation;
- (2) that we should not repeat not prejudge the question of President Kasavubu's eventual status or the final framework of the Congolese constitution but await the outcome of the series of further meetings that Congolese leaders forecast in the conference communiqué;
- (3) that we should express the hope that whatever the outcome for Congo it may secure parliamentary approval or be submitted to the electorate for confirmation. This may take time in view of the unsettled state of the country;
- (4) that we should attempt to employ our influence with the Belgians themselves and with our allies in NATO to persuade the Belgians that even in their own interests they should avoid crude manifestations of their influence and intentions in Congo (e.g. the continued presence of military and political advisers and the overt hold which they exercise over Tshombe in Katanga.) The Belgians have certainly made our own position infinitely more difficult by their tactics;
- (5) that we should attempt to assimilate our position to those of the Afro-Asian group who find themselves in varying measure in the same situation as ourselves. Tunisia, Sudan, Nigeria, Liberia, Pakistan and some of the French Africans and perhaps others are friends worth cultivating in this connection. We shall also find points of common interest with India especially but also with Ghana, Indonesia and even UAR. We are certainly not repeat not the only ones to wish to avoid an impossible dilemma in Congo.

12. I should be grateful for your comments and instructions on the policy consideration raised in this message.

CONGO POLICY: IMPACT OF TANANARIVE CONFERENCE

I fully endorse the general line which you took in your talk with the Secretary-General about the outcome of the Tananarive Conference. While appreciating the grounds for the Secretary-General's concern at the prospect that the decisions of the conference may further complicate the task of the UN in the Congo, I share your view that the timing and manner of his presentation of these considerations to the Advisory Committee was unfortunate. Undue emphasis on the possibility that such difficulties might arise could indeed contribute to their development.

2. The approach outlined in paragraph 11 of your reference telegram coincides generally with our own thinking here on the current trend of developments. You may be guided by the following views in your discussions with the Secretariat, and in formulating any intervention in the Advisory Committee which may seem desirable. In this respect I agree that there is merit in attempting to assimilate our approach to that of the more moderate and constructive Afro-Asian elements in the committee who share our concern to head off any further complication for the UN operation.

3. The directives governing UN action in the Congo have as a major objective the preservation of its unity; but clearly, within this governing limitation, the ultimate constitutional pattern of the country is not repeat not and cannot be the primary preoccupation of the UN at the present juncture. The events of the past few weeks have underlined the urgency of concentrating upon strengthening and consolidating the working relationship of the UN with the Congolese authorities with whom it must deal in its day-to-day operations. One of the pre-eminent figures in this respect obviously is President Kasavubu, particularly because his position as Head of State has been recognized by the UN and therefore provides a legally established, though not the exclusive, channel for UN relations with the Congolese. As I emphasized in telegram number 82 of March 10,[†] it is important in this respect that every effort should be made to build upon the generally conciliatory tone of President Kasavubu's recent approach to the Secretary-General concerning re-organization of the Congolese armed forces. Any inclination on the part of the UN at this time to call in question or to debate the currently recognized authority of the President could be calculated to impair any hope of establishing the cooperative working relationship with him which is so urgently required. In particular, if the UN purpose is to convince Congolese leaders that their interest lies in preserving a united Congo, whether organized on a unitary or federal basis, any condemnatory statement now by the Secretary-General would defeat this purpose.

4. Moreover, it is surely both premature and hypothetical to make the Tananarive communiqué the basis for a reappraisal of the legitimacy of President Kasavubu's position. The emphasis of the communiqué is on broad general indications of intention; and no less than two further conferences are explicitly envisaged, on dates not yet decided, to take up "the task of specifying measures which have to be taken to apply" the decisions reached at Tananarive. The present stage of this consultative operation could hardly seem to offer sufficient grounds for re-examining the whole question of the validity of Mr. Kasavubu's position as Head of the Congolese State, as the Secretary-General has implied. It may be relevant to note that even Gizenga continues to recognize Kasavubu as Head of State.

5. Almost equally disturbing is the Secretary-General's emphasis on his view that the Tananarive meeting had no constitutional standing. Like his other major point, this contention may enjoy some legal validity. Open enunciation of this attitude, however, would not repeat not assist the UN in its dealings with the various Congolese leaders who attended the conference; and the cooperation of several of these in addition to President Kasavubu is vital if the UN is to make progress with its immediate task of restoring order in the Congo.

6. The reference in the Tananarive communiqué concerning annulment of the Security Council resolution perhaps should be read in the context of the atmosphere in which the communiqué was formulated. From the viewpoint of the relatively unsophisticated Congolese leaders concerned, this may well have appeared as a more or less logical complement to the other decisions taken at the meeting. It should not repeat not be regarded too seriously as a conscious attempt to reject the continued validity of the UN operation.

7. A more constructive approach to the whole question of the Tananarive decisions would seem to lie in adopting the position that they represent a basis for further discussions which are being planned, and that the fact of such consultations among Congolese leaders (as distinct from the specific direction which they seem to have taken thus far) is not repeat not in itself an unhealthy development. While the outcome of these progressive consultations may come to be of fundamental significance for the achievement of the long-term UN objectives in the Congo, the immediate UN concern must be with its more urgent peace-restoring functions. These make it imperative that the UN should make every effort to enlist the support and cooperation of the effective political and military leaders in all parts of the Congo including those from Orientale. Such measure of understanding as may now exist between the UN and these leaders is far too tenuous to bear the strains of censure by the UN of participation by such Congolese personalities in political consultations affecting the future of their country. Discussion along these lines in the Advisory Committee would seem undesirable, and of course similar debate in any public UN forum would be even more unfortunate.

8. In the light of these considerations, I thoroughly agree with the views expressed in sub-paragraphs (1) and (2) of paragraph 11 of your reference telegram, and you should continue to base your comments primarily on these points. Sub-paragraphs (4) and (5) represent continuing aspects of our approach to the Congo problem generally, which should be reflected as appropriate.

9. In the long run, I think the suggestion in your third point has much merit. The people of the Congo should be given the opportunity, either through a parliament or by plebiscite, to approve their future constitutional structure. While there might be value in expressing such a hope in the Advisory Committee, I doubt whether it would be useful at this time for the committee to plan too far ahead. Certainly there is little hope that the real wishes of the people could be accurately ascertained until a much greater degree of stability prevails in the Congo. When the Congolese consultative process has reached a more advanced stage, the precise form in which the UN will have to express itself on this problem may be more clearly seen.

YOUR APPOINTMENT WITH PRESIDENT KASAVUBU

While your first call on President Kasavubu appropriately will be devoted in considerable part to formalities, you should be guided by the following in the substantive discussion.

2. You should indicate to the President Canada's conception of the essential purposes of the UN in the Congo, to which our participation in ONUC is directed. As a distant country with no motives of direct self-interest in Africa, Canada seeks only to see the Congo restored in unity and independence to conditions of stability and progress. Our efforts to assist the Congo are directed through the UN as the appropriate channel for international aid to emerging nations. In the Canadian view, the fundamental purpose of current UN activities in the Congo is to help the Congolese people to achieve conditions in which they can work out for themselves the solutions to their problems. A vital first step in this direction seems to be to assist in restoring public order in the country, for without a reasonable degree of internal security, normal political and economic development can not repeat not go forward.

3. You should express concern about relations between the Congolese authorities and UN personnel. You should say that it is the Canadian Government's hope that the President will do everything in his power, as Commander in Chief of the Congolese forces to prevent clashes between the ANC and the UN forces of the sort which have recently exposed Canadian personnel to attacks, since such incidents arouse widespread resentment and make more difficult a mutually beneficial relationship, to which Canada attaches great importance. You could suggest that President Kasavubu's influence could be made manifest throughout the country and to the world at large by exercising control over the ANC and promoting the fullest possible cooperation with the UN in pursuit of common objectives.

4. We shall, of course, be very interested in any comments the President may be prepared to offer on the outcome of the Tananarive Conference and the prospects for further consultations among Congolese leaders.

CALL ON PRESIDENT KASAVUBU

President received me yesterday. I informed him of views expressed in your reference telegram. President has more forceful personality than I had been given to understand. He definitely has all-Congo approach to Congolese problems and not repeat not only Bas-Congo interests of which he has often been accused. He is anything but a Belgian marionette. Following points were discussed.

2. On Congolese-UN relations President said there was no repeat no question of UN troops returning to Matadi for time being. Their return would result in incidents with local population. I explained difficult position of Secretary-General and said there appears to be no repeat no alternative to Congolese cooperation with UN except UN withdrawal. I mentioned Canadian Government understanding of UN contribution "as means to assist Congolese in achieving conditions in which they can work out for themselves solution to their problems." President said UN had made same mistakes as Belgians i.e. underestimated Congolese treated them as children claiming they knew better what was good for the Congolese. UN aid under Dayal had amounted to the setting up of a UN Government for the Congo ignoring authority of President and creating division within country by encouraging minority groups against central government in addition to showing a marked preference for Gizenga. He criticized UN for trying to impose solutions prepared in New York at "L'échelle des Nations Unies" without knowledge of Congo and in complete disregard of Congolese Government. He wanted aid from UN but he did not repeat not want to be run by UN. I understand that UK ambassador visited him same morning to press President to accept Hammarskjöld's latest request to allow some 100 Nigerian police at Matadi but met with same stubborn refusal. UN-Congolese relations have been allowed to deteriorate for so long a period that I am afraid Congolese have lost complete confidence in UN and any future constructive contribution will have to be done on Congolese terms and conditions. Scott has since shown me his telegrams 702 and 704 April 4† (which Canada House may have already obtained) on talks he had with Nwokedi and Gardener. They are both going to propose that UN confine itself to providing advisers and technicians rather than continuing present overextended operation.

3. Since I was getting no repeat nowhere on Matadi I changed subject by remarking that Tananarive resolutions had failed to state clearly powers of central government and had led consequently to criticism that confederation would amount to Balkanization of former Belgian Congo. President commented along lines of Prime Minister Ileó (reference my telegram 106 April 4). † He went on to recall his role before independence as defender of federalist thesis i.e. Belgian opposition to him and eventual backing of Lumumba as means of establishing unitarian state. He had always opposed unitarism as unrealistic in view of numerous ethnical groups and size of Congo. But he said he had also opposed secession of Bas-Congo at time Katanga declared its secession. He was against disintegration of Congo into weak independent states such as had happened in former French Equatorial Africa. He had never recognized secession of Katanga nor that of South Kasai. "Tshombe can yell as much as he likes I will never agree to anything that would amount to recognition of separate Katanga state."

4. All through interview he was very critical of Belgian policy before and after independence as well as Belgian influence in Katanga. He said Tshombe some time ago before Tananarive conference had sent him a Belgian emissary to propose the merging of Katangese and South Kasai troops with ANC troops under Ileó to form anti-communist army against Gizenga. He had turned down proposal on unequivocal terms saying there was a danger greater than communism for Congolese: it was to be led into a false crusade which would bring civil war and close door irrevocably to negotiations and unity. "What would I do with Tshombe or Kalonji armies. One would kill the Balubas and the other the Lulus. I would not repeat not want my name to be associated with troops over which I would not repeat not have authority or control."

5. Speaking of Tshombe's occupation of Manono he said this was a contravention of spirit of Tananarive where it had been agreed all parties would refrain from use of force and settle their problems through negotiation. It is evident there is no repeat no love lost between him and Tshombe. At one point during interview he said Tshombe's policy did not repeat not benefit Katanga population but international cartels. He blamed Belgians for most of Congo's present difficulties. He held them responsible for Katanga's secession and for having left Congo unprepared for independence. He cited French Government's continued technical and financial aid to former French colonies. At same time he criticized UN for opposing employment of Belgian advisers when French and British citizens acted as such in their former colonies. UN had "deux poids et deux mesures." He said Congolese were capable of making distinction between the good and the bad Belgians.

6. I then asked what the possibilities were of a rapprochement with Stanleyville. President expressed confidence in such rapprochement but I gathered he had in mind a compromise with authorities of Orientale province and not repeat not necessarily with Gizenga whom he called "un homme fini un homme mort." He said Gizenga knew that he had no repeat no hope of ever being considered the legal government but was holding on as long as the communist and some Afro-Asian countries recognized him. He said Gizenga and General Lundula were only "une parenthèse" in solution of problem of return of Orientale and Kivu provinces to Congo family. They would have to come to an agreement. He also expressed confidence that return of Miruho as President of Kivu Province would help rapprochement with Leopoldville.

CONGO RESOLUTIONS IN UNGA

In view of the tactical considerations involved and the remaining uncertainty as to the precise form in which the various resolutions will be taken up in the Assembly, it is not repeat not possible to provide comprehensive guidance at this stage, particularly on voting. The following comments and preliminary advice on voting will serve as the basis for whatever further guidance may be required as the situation develops.

2. The Pakistani resolution concerning Congolese political problems impresses us as being generally constructive both in tone and content. The procedures it proposes for restoring constitutional government seem to provide for a realistic combination of Congolese initiative with United Nations guidance and assistance. It appears desirable to support this sort of approach, particularly at a time when Congolese consultations aimed at national reconciliation are becoming more active. You should therefore plan to vote for the Pakistani resolution, and meanwhile you may make appropriate use of fact of our support for it in informal discussions concerning other resolutions.

3. A further consideration which contributes to the desirability of voting for the Pakistani resolution is the fact that we are unable to accept in its present form the Indian resolution on Belgian withdrawal. Leaving aside the generally uncompromising tone of this resolution, its reference to unspecified sanctions and the 21-day time limit it prescribes are unacceptable. As we have already pointed out in the apartheid debate, the principles of the Charter clearly require that sanctions should be invoked solely for the purpose of preventing or stopping international hostilities. Even if it could be shown that personnel under the effective control of the Belgian Government are contributing to internal disturbances in the Congo, such intervention would fall short of responsibility for a direct threat of international hostilities such as might justify contemplation of sanctions.

4. Moreover Belgium has explicitly confirmed its acceptance of the Security Council resolution and has indicated its readiness to withdraw personnel under unilateral Belgian control. It is of course all too clear that Belgium has by no means responded as promptly or as adequately to the Security Council resolution as we and many other members of UNGA would wish; and a firm reiteration by UNGA of UN insistence on compliance may be salutary. However to frame such a measure in harsh and inflexible terms which take no account of Belgium's practical difficulties in compliance and are only likely to make the Belgian Government more intransigent would seem unfortunate, particularly while Mr. Sahbani is negotiating in Brussels. Moreover, as several Afro-Asian delegations have recognized, abrupt withdrawal of Belgian personnel without adequate arrangements for replacement might well lead to further deterioration of conditions in the Congo.

5. As the situation appears at present, I think you would have to abstain on the Indian resolution unless it were amended. The minimum essential revisions from our viewpoint would be deletion of the reference to sanctions and some modification of the time-limit clause. Possible alternatives in the latter respect might be to extend the time limit substantially, to make it applicable to a progress report on arrangements for withdrawal rather than to completion of such withdrawal, or to couple the time limit with some formula for providing acceptable UN replacements parallel with Belgian withdrawal. Although we fully appreciate the depth of Afro-Asian suspicion of and impatience with what they regard as Belgian procrastination, it would seem desirable to bring reasoning and influence to bear on the more moderate Afro-Asians and others, particularly the Irish and Swedes, with a view to securing constructive amendment of the more unrealistic portions of the Indian draft. I would hope that efforts in this direction may be successful, thereby averting the need for introduction of an alternative resolution.

6. Since the Soviet Union has made clear that its resolution has been submitted as a result of complete Soviet rejection of the Pakistani draft, it presumably will not attract Afro-Asian support, and therefore can be voted down if it is not withdrawn.

7. In view of the rapid pace at which events affecting the form and context of the various resolutions may be expected to develop between now and the time of voting, you will wish to keep in close touch with the department.

ROLE OF THE SECRETARY-GENERAL

On April 5, the Secretary-General made a statement during the course of the Congo debate in order to deal with attacks on him by members of the Soviet bloc. You may be interested in my comments on some of the points made by the Secretary-General.

2. He took the occasion to reject categorically the Soviet accusation that he was responsible for the assassination of Mr. Lumumba. He reminded the Assembly that these charges had not been substantiated and pointed out that, while responsible criticism could be a favourable contribution, irresponsible and destructive criticism could only weaken the United Nations. He no doubt intended this remark to apply mainly to the wild and unjust charge about Lumumba but he probably hoped that Assembly members would reflect as well on some of the other charges and complaints which the Soviet bloc and some others have made without any effort to justify them. Mr. Hammarskjöld has consistently worked to encourage a sense of responsibility in member nations and, in effect, to maintain dignity and justice in the proceedings of the United Nations.

3. Mr. Hammarskjöld had been accused by Mr. Gromyko of taking advantage of the Office of Secretary-General and usurping the prerogatives of United Nations bodies. Consistent with his practice over the years, Mr. Hammarskjöld reviewed in detail the Security Council resolutions on the Congo since last July to show that they had been adopted either with the concurring vote of the Soviet Union or, when there had been no vote in the Council, with no formal objection from the Soviet Union. Mr. Hammarskjöld reminded the Assembly of his persistent efforts to make arrangements for the sharing of responsibility which efforts had not produced the appropriate response either from the Security Council or from the Assembly.

4. This, of course, is not a loose interpretation by the Secretary-General. In recent years, perhaps the most important development of the principal organs of the United Nations has been the evolving function of the Office of the Secretary-General under the leadership of Mr. Hammarskjöld. Especially in peace-keeping operations since 1956, procedures have been evolved whereby the Secretary-General has been given, on the one hand, heavy responsibility and on the other, considerable freedom of manoeuvre. This activity has been widespread in scope, ranging from the direction of complex operations, like the one in the Congo, to the appointment of a special United Nations representatives charged with missions of good offices.

5. The main significance of this evolution has been to provide for smooth and swift action which might otherwise not have been open to the United Nations. Through this means, the United Nations has been able to take effective action in situations in which a dangerous vacuum might have been created, either because the Security Council and the General Assembly hesitated to act or because they were prevented from doing so. Not infrequently, moreover, the Secretary-General has been required to act in response to directives and recommendations which were deliberately kept vague, partly because of the complications of the situation and partly because of the difficulty of obtaining the required support from the United Nations members.

6. This process of "letting Dag do it" gained momentum in the period 1956-1959. During that time, the United Nations was able to render most effective assistance not only to smaller states which had allowed their relations to deteriorate too far, but in allowing the Great Powers to disengage themselves gracefully from awkward situations. Most of these occurred in the Middle East.

7. This trend changed somewhat late in 1959 when the Secretary-General became involved in the situation in Laos. It became apparent his activity there would not be fully acceptable either to the United States or to the Soviet Union. His position vis-à-vis the Soviet Union was made worse, of course, by the clumsy manoeuvre in the Security Council in September 1959 whereby the Western powers managed to send a fact-finding sub-committee to Laos. Judging from my own experience in the Secretariat at that time, I believe that the Soviet concern about the unbridled activities of the Secretary-General became acute. You may recall that Mr. Hammarskjöld decided to place his representative in Vientiane even though he had heard strong expression of Soviet opposition.

8. In all these situations, Mr. Hammarskjöld employed the same technique. If no precise directive was forthcoming either from the Security Council or from the Assembly but only a vague request to the Secretary-General to take some action, he carefully assessed the constitutional position of the Secretary-General and decided what he thought the traffic would bear in terms of that position and in accordance with views which various member states expressed either in public debate or in private consultation with the Secretary-General. Even when no resolution was adopted, the Secretary-General would state in advance the action which he intended to take unless there should be objection. In other words, in these situations the Secretary-General assumed the responsibility and took whatever action he considered necessary but always left it open to the member states to deprive him of responsibility or to block his action as long as they were prepared to object formally.

9. In the Congo, the Secretary-General's activities have been made much more difficult. The United Nations operations there began with a formal resolution by the Security Council which left the decision for detailed action mainly in the hands of the Secretary-General. In the early stages, the United Nations effort was supported by a majority of members. Later, however, various members, including the Soviet bloc, became dissatisfied with the way in which the Secretary-General was carrying out his mandate. Because of the disagreement in the membership, it has not proved possible to make that mandate more precise, although there has been some redefinition of it. The Secretary-General has had the assistance of the Congo Advisory Committee but there has been difference of opinion in that body too. Because of the demands of the situation in the Congo, the Secretary-General has been obliged to proceed with the United Nations operations, notwithstanding heavy attacks and sharp criticism. While he has, to some extent, taken into account the views of his attackers and critics, he has continued to act in what he considers the best interests of the United Nations in the light of the majority opinion. The indications are that he will proceed on this course as long as he has majority support or, in effect, until either the Security Council or the General Assembly has decided that the United Nations effort in the Congo should cease.

10. The Secretary-General's reply to the Soviet complaint that he had not involved the Department of Political and Security Council Affairs in the Congo operation is interesting. The Soviet Union apparently alleged that the Department had been ignored because it was headed by a Soviet citizen. Except for a short period when the PSCA Department was headed by Dr. Protitch, it has always been under the jurisdiction of the senior Soviet citizen in the Secretariat who has had the rank of Under-Secretary. For a long time, it was headed by Mr. Sobolev, who later became Permanent Representative of the Soviet Union and who is now a Deputy Foreign Minister in Moscow. During my period of service in the Secretariat, I was the deputy to the then Under-Secretary, Mr. Anatoly Dobrynin.

11. From members of the PSCA Department I gained the clear impression that it had never been very closely involved in the main political activities of the United Nations. The Department has served mainly as a servicing group for the main political bodies. It has prepared documents for meetings and cleared records and reports of those meetings. It has produced digested material, relating to public proceedings, for inclusion in United Nations publications on political subjects. The Department started out with large ideas about keeping in touch with the main political developments in the world but the scope of its work has gradually narrowed over the years. Now with a staff of about 75, the PSCA Department tends to be under-worked. Whatever substantive work is done usually depends on the initiative and imagination of the various directors and section chiefs.

12. During my two years in the Department, the Secretary-General hardly ever sought its assistance as a Department, although this was a period of great political activity for the United Nations. Mr. Dobrynin was very irritated by this state of affairs because he was both energetic and efficient and he believed that his talent should be put to work. Even so, I was informed by many staff members that the PSCA Department was much more active under Dobrynin than under any of its earlier under-secretaries. Since then, the Department has been headed by Mr. Arkadiev, who has made practically no contribution either to Departmental or Secretariat work, according to my information.

13. From time to time, personnel from the PSCA Department have been selected either by the Secretary-General or by Cordier and Bunche to carry out special assignments. Between them, Cordier and Bunche have organized and directed, in an administrative sense, most of the United Nations Missions in the field. They have selected personnel for those missions and dealt with most of the correspondence and reports. For the most part, the Under-Secretary in charge of the PSCA Department has not been consulted about these matters except in a most superficial way. Similarly, Mr. Hammarskjöld has taken important political decisions and issued important political documents without any reference to the PSCA Department, although from time to time he might have employed individual members in drafting and other routine duties.

14. My understanding is that my successor in the PSCA Department, Mr. Wieschoff, has been the Secretary-General's advisor on the Congo. This probably resulted from the fact that Wieschoff previously had considerable experience in African affairs as a member of the Trusteeship Department. I was told last autumn that, for practical purposes, Wieschoff had ceased to be a member of the PSCA Department but had become part of the Secretary-General's immediate entourage.

15. It is quite clear, therefore, that there is real substance to the Soviet Union's complaint about the Secretary-General's treatment of the PSCA Department. It is not true, however, that the Secretary-General began this practice because of the complication of this Congo situation. He simply continued a practice which he had followed throughout the period of his term of office.

16. I doubt whether Mr. Hammarskjöld followed this practice merely because the PSCA Department had been traditionally headed by a Soviet citizen, although this would be one factor which he would take into consideration. Basically, Mr. Hammarskjöld operates as a lone wolf and he seeks and welcomes the assistance only of a few Secretariat members whom he knows and trusts. In my view, he has very little administrative sense. He has left administrative details to Cordier and Bunche, neither of whom is a sound administrator. They have tended to become involved in details which could easily have been left to juniors of whatever national origin. To some extent, moreover, Cordier and Bunche have carefully guarded their special relationship with the Secretary-General by excluding other senior Secretariat members from operations which, nominally at least, appear to be their business.

17. Presumably the Secretary-General has a right to choose his collaborators, although I do not consider this a proper defence for his administrative methods. Nor do I agree that the Security Council or the General Assembly should be required to appoint specific Secretariat officials to be in charge of field operations. Until the Secretariat is administered in an orderly way, however, the Secretary-General must expect complaints from staff officials themselves and from member states. I have no doubt that many of the internal arrangements which Mr. Hammarskjöld has used may have been unavoidable, especially in view of his own personality and of the difficulty of organizing an effective international team.

18. I came away from the Secretariat convinced that, notwithstanding considerable talent and ability within the Organization, it was, generally speaking, inefficient, especially in the political field, because of poor administration. This had a demoralizing effect within the Secretariat and produced a situation wide open for attacks and criticism from member states. Quite obviously, the Soviet Union is capitalizing on its intimate knowledge of that situation gained from the experience of well-qualified officials like Mr. Dobrynin and others.

Extrait du rapport final de la quinzième session, cinquième commission de l'Assemblée générale des Nations Unies

Extract from Final Report of the Fifteenth Session, Fifth Committee of the United Nations General Assembly

CONFIDENTIAL

[Ottawa, 15th Session ended April 22, 1960]

GENERAL ASSESSMENT OF THE FIFTH COMMITTEE

The main problem before the Fifth Committee at the resumed session was the financing of the Congo operation. The Committee's debates were linked closely to the political discussions on the question taking place in plenary. There was little attempt to confine discussion to purely budgetary matters and the Chairman, Ambassador Majoli of Italy, prudently refrained from attempting to restrain delegates in their expression of views.

The two main impressions derived from the discussions in Fifth Committee were: the unwillingness of delegations to face anything more than the immediate issue at hand, the financing of the Congo costs for 1960; and the minimal part played in the debates by the African delegations.

At the outset of the resumed session the Canadian delegation had talks with a wide assortment of delegations and held meetings with the object of finding out whether there was any inclination among the members to look at the Congo financing issue in terms of the general health of the United Nations. From the very beginning it was obvious that few if any delegates were prepared to put a major effort into this aspect at the resumed session. One important reason for this was undoubtedly the mental weariness and physical exhaustion of many of the representatives and advisors. The atmosphere of crisis which had begun in July, 1960, and had continued without respite through the discouraging weeks of the first part of the fifteenth session had palpably taken their toll.

More specifically, many European delegations had been discouraged by the events of the pre-Christmas session to a point where many of them were talking resignedly of the end of the Organization, with little inclination to do anything about it. The black African delegations, which had rallied significantly to the support of the Congo operation in previous weeks, appeared rarely in the Fifth Committee. Only Ghana was there consistently. The same was true of the North African delegations, with the exception of the Tunisian Vice-Chairman of the Committee, Zouhir Chelli. Chelli took a prominent part in the negotiations which led to the resolution which was finally adopted.

In the very last days of the session there was a significant change in the attitude of the delegations towards the Congo financing question. In the first place there was general satisfaction at the resolutions which had been passed by the Assembly on the political side, and the thesis that these political decisions were meaningless unless backed in practical terms by an adequate financing resolution became to be generally accepted. During debates in the Committee support became wide-spread for the Canadian view that the Assembly, at its sixteenth session, should undertake to discuss in the broadest terms its financing procedures in the light of the strain that the peace-keeping operations undertaken in recent years had put on the resources of the Organization, and the effect that these operations had had on the regular budget by draining the working capital fund, and on the voluntary programmes in view of the borrowing of reserve funds to which the Secretary-General had had to resort.

The behaviour of members of the United Nations during the last night of the Assembly gave some grounds for optimism. Although little had been said in the Fifth Committee about the necessity for ensuring a well supported financing resolution, when the Fifth Committee resolution failed to pass in plenary the reaction to this was immediate and strong. The senior representatives of Tunisia, India, Ghana, Ethiopia, Nigeria and Brazil all indicated their belief that the Assembly could not close without a financing resolution on the Congo, some of them in grave and emotional terms. A significant indication of the spirit of the Assembly was the vote on the proposal to re-open the Congo Item. It was adopted by 67 in favour, 12 against (Soviet bloc, Guinea, Mali, Cuba) with 14 abstentions (including France, Spain and Belgium). Although the vote on the financing resolution finally adopted was 54 in favour to 15 against, with 23 abstentions, a significant number of delegations were able to support the reopening of the question although unable to vote in favour of the resolution put forward.

The response to the Canadian resolution, although the vote took place at 5.30 am, was also encouraging. Forty-four delegations supported it, only 13 opposed it, while the 32 abstentions were made up largely of Latin American delegates, which supported the idea of the working group and the discussion at the sixteenth session but were distressed at the dropping of two paragraphs which had been inserted in the resolution on the basis of amendments submitted by the Latin American group.

The sense of urgency which pervaded the Assembly during the last hours of the fifteenth session was an encouraging sign. However, the results were marred by Latin American insistence on their point of view to the extent of almost wrecking the operations, French/African destructiveness out of rage over rejection of the plea of the Cameroon's Republic on the question of the merger with the neighbouring former British Trust Territory; and the attitude of indifference of several European delegations, including France, Spain, Belgium and Portugal.

The Soviet Position

The representative of the Soviet Union made his Government's position clear on the first day the Committee met. His statement was filled with abuse of the Secretary-General, the Secretariat, and the chief officers of ONUC in the Congo. He repeated the charge of complicity in murder against Mr. Hammarskjöld. He denied the right of the Assembly to discuss the Congo costs and alleged that it was the duty of the Security Council under Article 43 to find the necessary funds for the operation. He repeated his contentions at great length and on numerous occasions throughout the debate. His views were echoed by the other members of the Soviet bloc.

Roshchin, the Soviet representative, also criticized the administrative and budgetary procedures of the United Nations because of the refusal of the Chairman of the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions to include minority views in reports of the Advisory Committee. In private conversation we were told that the Soviet Union had "lost confidence" in the impartiality of the Advisory Committee. It was not clear what this meant in practical terms; however, it is likely that attacks on this useful institution will continue.

Although the Soviet insistence that the Assembly had no right to discuss the Congo costs continued unabated to the end, there was a discernible lessening in the vehemence of Soviet criticism against the Secretary-General and the Secretariat. The Secretary-General was accorded the prefix "Mr." in later statements and even occasionally referred to by his title, although the Soviet Union had denied that he filled the function of Secretary-General once a great power had withdrawn its confidence. The reason for this lessening in the violence of criticism against the Secretary-General and the Secretariat may have been due to the complete lack of support which the Soviet Union received for its position. Even such countries as Ghana and India, which had in varying degrees echoed some previous Soviet criticism against the Secretary-General's conduct of the Congo operation, now insisted that it was essential for members to support fully the Congo operation.

When the financing resolution failed to attain the required majority on the final night of the Assembly, Roshchin rose to propose that the matter be sent to the Security Council. The uncertainty as to what would occur in the Council had a significant effect on delegations and rallied additional support to the call for reconsideration of the financing resolution. The Soviet bloc was thus completely isolated from the rest of the Assembly in its position on financing, although it received support in the voting of Guinea, Mali and Cuba.

The Latin Americans

One of the most troubling aspects of the debates at the resumed session was the stubbornness with which the Latin American delegations stuck to their financing proposal, although it received virtually no other support. It was clear from the start that there were varying shades of opinion in the Latin American group. However, due to one or two individuals, notably Ambassador Garcia Robles of Mexico, the Latin Americans maintained a remarkable solidarity until the very end. Until the re-voting on the resolution, amended as a gesture toward them, most of the Latin Americans seemed impervious to arguments calling for their cooperation in order to ensure that the Congo operation could be continued. The Latin Americans favoured the call for a general review of financial procedures, especially as they pertained to peace-keeping operations, but they wanted both this review and their formula for assessment.

In private conversation it was clear that the Latin Americans were deeply emotional on the issue. They appeared to be uninterested in logical arguments and replied with a show of deep frustration at their position at the United Nations. They claimed, rightly, that they had called for a separate scale of assessments for peace-keeping operations five years ago, when the UNEF costs were first discussed. They expressed resentment at being presented year after year with an agreed solution on financing of peace-keeping costs which made no attempt to take into account their point of view. One representative even burst out with the charge that whenever Hammarskjöld passed a Latin American Permanent Representative, he turned his head away.

In any long-term method for financing peace-keeping costs, the position of the Latin Americans must be taken seriously into account from the beginning if it is to have any value whatsoever. The main arguments of the Latin Americans are:

- (a) that the permanent members of the Security Council bear a special responsibility for peace-keeping and should pay a large part of the share;
- (b) that countries with special interests in regions affected by the peace-keeping operation should also pay a special share;
- (c) that the contribution of the remaining members of the United Nations should be confined to a symbolic sum as a token gesture toward the principle of collective responsibility;
- (d) that the Latin Americans believe that the Organization must be able to undertake peace-keeping operations, and their success must be assured; and
- (e) that there must be no element of charity, rebates or requests for remission in any formula found.

Clearly, this list contains some contradictions, notably between (c) and (d), and (a) ignores the positions of Russia, France and China. The argument in (b) is in contradiction to the principle of collective responsibility, as well as being difficult to apply in practical terms. A formula which will carry Latin American approval may not be as difficult to find as it would seem. Toward the end of the discussions, it became clear that the only "principle" which was important to the Latin Americans was that their share of the peace-keeping costs should be minimal.

France

In private conversations, French representatives and advisers indicated frankly that they were unhappy with General de Gaulle's decision not to pay the Congo costs. To balance this, however, there was a strong feeling on the part of most of them that it was paradoxical that 66 members paying about 8 per cent of the costs had a two thirds majority and could pass any resolution, which 12 nations paying about 80 per cent of the cost had little or no real power in the U.N. They believed that an attempt should be made to find some way of resolving this question.

The Africans

Nigeria, Ghana and Liberia worked closely with Tunisia and Pakistan to draft the Congo financing resolution, although Liberia and Nigeria did not cosponsor in the end. Apart from these, however, very few Africans turned up with any consistency at the meetings of the Fifth Committee. This was understandable in some cases since important African items were being discussed in several other places, but the complete silence of even those delegations which attended sporadically indicated a surprising lack of interest in the proceedings. The announced intention of several of the French Africans not to support the financing resolution because their point of view had not been accepted by the Assembly on the Cameroon's issue was profoundly disturbing. The French Africans, more than any other group, seemed to consider it normal to trade votes on entirely unrelated issues.

Canada's Traditional Friends

Throughout the discussions, Canada was in close touch with all members of the Commonwealth and Western Europe. There was a remarkable agreement on views and complete solidarity on the issues before the Committee. With the help of these friends, Canada was able to achieve the desired result on its own resolution, though only after some complications. There was complete understanding of our reasons for opposing our own resolution after it had been amended, and our friends followed our voting faithfully. Other very helpful delegations at the resumed session were those of Iraq, Liberia and Tunisia. The Chairman, Ambassador Majoli of Italy, managed the Committee well and with a minimum of friction. He was personally most helpful on procedural matters connected with our resolution.

To conclude, the resumed session marked a change to a more cooperative attitude on the part of some important countries, notably India and Ghana. The final vote was perhaps a little better than adequate. However, there were disturbing symptoms of selfishness and short sightedness on many sides. To balance this, there was general agreement on the necessity to undertake a general review of financial procedures, especially as they affect peace-keeping costs.

[Accra], May 5, 1961

I am constrained to make this desperate appeal to you concerning the present situation in the Congo which is deteriorating from day to day. Nearly a year after the outbreak of violence in the Congo, we are still far from achieving a solution in spite of United Nations intervention. In my view, no solution is possible without total elimination of the armed gangs serving the various factions in the Congo, which would make possible the immediate re-convening of Parliament. Since we cannot keep our armies indefinitely in the Congo, I want to suggest most strongly to the governments which have contingents or individuals serving under the United Nations command in the Congo, that we should send representatives to a meeting in Accra or any other convenient place immediately, to consider ways and means of providing protection in Leopoldville to enable Parliament to meet and the elected Congolese representatives to attend Parliament free from fear of intimidation, arrest, detentions and physical violence. Only in an atmosphere of law and order namely, the complete elimination of the armed gangs from the political argument, will Parliament function. Whatever solution is imposed by any combination of Congolese leaders will not last, nor can it be a substitute for the expressed will of the Congolese Parliament. Our experience with the Madagascar conference and the recent one at Coquilhatville¹² confirms this view. The meeting of our representatives should contain both civil and military personnel, since even if Parliament does meet under United Nations protection and produces a solution, this will be impossible to execute so long as private armies exist. My military representative in the Congo has been approached by civil authorities many times begging that the Congolese armed units be disarmed in order that people can live in peace. This cannot be effected without firm military command organization and a clear plan of action both of which are at present woefully lacking. Highest consideration.

SECRET

[Ottawa], May 10, 1961

PRESIDENT N'KRUMAH'S MESSAGE OF MAY 5
CONCERNING THE CONGO

The most striking feature of the message to you from President N'Krumah about the Congo situation is its distinct implication that the United Nations, as such, should be ignored in the proposed discussion of a new plan of action for the Congo. Although the suggested meeting would involve "governments which have contingents or individuals serving under the UN command in the Congo," it is clear that what is envisaged would be consultation by the various governments concerning joint action in their national capacities rather than about participation in an international operation on behalf of the world community. His reference to "our armies" in the Congo also underlines the conception of the UN troops in the Congo as a collection of national units, rather than a unified command responsible to the collective will of the UN Organization.

2. President N'Krumah has never made any secret of his deep N'rservations about the conduct of the UN operation, but in the past he has always taken the public position that, as a matter of principle, there should be no intervention in the Congo except through the United Nations. Even the rather far-reaching proposals which he advanced at the General Assembly at the beginning of March,¹³ for an almost exclusively African command for the Congo operation, envisaged a distinctively UN activity. You will recall also that when Dr. N'Krumah spoke of the Congo situation a few days later, at the Prime Ministers' Meeting in London, he stressed his belief that the United Nations provided the best hope for peace and security in the Congo.

3. The motivating factors, not necessarily in order of importance, behind Dr. N'Krumah's current initiative may include:

(a) Pressure of public reaction in Ghana against the recent maltreatment of Ghanaian troops by Congolese National Army elements at Port Franqui in Northern Kasai province, where several fatalities were suffered by the Ghanaian unit involved. (In the Advisory Committee's discussion of the Port Franqui incidents, the Ghanaian representative pointed out with some vigour that the Ghanaian brigade commander had, before the trouble, unsuccessfully sought reinforcements from the UN command because his troops were over-extended.)

(b) Irritation with the current consolidation of President Kasavubu's position vis-à-vis other Congolese political figures (particularly Gizenga), largely as a result of the agreement reached between the United Nations and the President on plans for effecting withdrawal of foreign personnel from the Congo and for reorganization of the ANC under President Kasavubu's authority.

(c) A desire to reaffirm in a practical manner Ghanaian backing for the Gizenga régime in Stanleyville, which Ghana supports as the legitimate central government of the Congo. In particular, it may be felt that Gizenga's followers would carry the day if a meeting of parliament to endorse a national government could be convened at this time, whereas Gizenga's prospects might be expected to decline if President Kasavubu's position continues to improve.

(d) A general ambition on Dr. N'Krumah's part to claim a leading role in the direction of policy in the Congo, as in other African affairs. His aspirations to Pan-African leadership are well known; recent setbacks in this respect may be impelling him to attempt to recover the initiative. At the moment the Monrovia Conference of heads of African States, sponsored by Nigeria and Liberia, is being ignored by Ghana, and Ghana resents the initiative taken by Nigeria.

(e) Domestic political troubles indicated by dissatisfaction within his own Party and in Parliament and by his dismissal of some Cabinet Ministers.

4. Undoubtedly Dr. N'Krumah's proposal for a meeting of representatives of governments with personnel in the Congo will have attractions for some of the Afro-Asian governments (notably the "Casablanca group," including Morocco, the United Arab Republic, Guinea and Mali) who, like Ghana, have consistently supported the Lumumba faction in opposition to President Kasavubu, and have been critical of the conduct of the UN operation. However, the suggestion seems unlikely to win much support among the major current participants in the UN force.

5. Our Permanent Mission in New York has made hurried consultations there with other delegations. The missions of India, Ireland, Italy, Malaya, Nigeria, Pakistan, Sudan and Sweden generally share our view that the United Nations must not be by-passed, although, except for Ireland, their Governments have not made their views known. The Irish Government has already replied to Dr. N'Krumah, reasserting the authority of the UN with regard to the Congo situation. Telegram 1090 of May 9 from New York† giving the gist of the Irish reply is attached.

¹³ Voir/See Thomas J. Hamilton, "Nkrumah Urges U.N. to Reshape Congo Program," New York Times, March 8, 1961, p. 1.

6. In recent Congo Advisory meetings discussion has centered on the increasingly active role of the UN force in containing the armed forces of Katanga, and on the developing co-operation of President Kasavubu and the other Leopoldville authorities with the United Nations, toward implementation of the February 21 resolution of the Security Council. The Secretary-General has found broad support in the Committee for the more positive posture which the Force (largely as a result of recent additions to its effective strength) has been able to adopt in respect of its basic function of halting military movements and forestalling clashes. The Committee has also endorsed an agreement, reached on April 17 between the Nwokedi-Gardiner mission from the United Nations and President Kasavubu, concerning arrangements for withdrawal of foreign personnel not engaged under the latter's authority, and for UN assistance in re-organising the national army of the Congo.¹⁴ The Secretary-General thinks that this agreement is responsible for the recent active co-operation of the Leopoldville authorities in handing over to the United Nations the Belgian advisers who were detained with Mr. Tshombe at Coquilhatville; and no doubt this aspect of the agreement has gone far towards commending it to those Afro-Asian governments which in general have no high regard for President Kasavubu.

7. The specific question of reconvening the Congolese parliament, to which Dr. N'Krumah devotes particular attention in his message, was referred to in the Afro-Asian resolution introduced by Pakistan in the closing stages of the Congo debate at the resumed 15th Session of the General Assembly. This resolution urged the convening of parliament without delay, under safe conduct provided by the United Nations. It was opposed only by the Soviet Bloc and the French-African community (the latter for special tactical reasons). This Assembly resolution repeated the governing resolution of the Security Council of February 21, paragraph B.1 which reads: "Urges the convening of the parliament and the taking of necessary protective measures in that connection."

8. The Ghanaian representative in the Advisory Committee meeting of May 5 stressed the view that real progress toward a political settlement in the Congo could be made only through a meeting of Parliament. In response, the Secretary-General claimed that the strengthening of U.N. forces was already contributing significantly to an improvement in the political situation. He mentioned increasing contact between the Leopoldville and Stanleyville régimes, and the weakening of the position of the Katanga government. Given further progress in this direction, he thought a meeting of Parliament might complete the achievement of a political settlement. He said that both Abbas and Gardiner had standing instructions to raise with President Kasavubu the matter of holding a meeting of parliament as soon as the political and military situation would permit. They were, however, to use their own judgment in taking up this matter with the President.

9. It seems important that Dr. N'Krumah should be left in no doubt about Canada's support for the UN role in the Congo situation; and you may feel that a prompt answer to his proposal would be useful evidence of the firmness of our reaction. A suggested reply to his message is attached for your consideration. If you approve the attached telegram to Accra, we would give a copy of the message to the Acting High Commissioner for Ghana here.

REPLY TO PRESIDENT N'KRUMAH'S MESSAGE ON CONGO

Please convey following message from the Prime Minister to President N'Krumah.

"I welcome the opportunity afforded by your message of May 5 to exchange views with you about the Congo. I can assure you that I share your anxiety about the situation there. Heavy burdens have been placed on many of the governments which are contributing to the efforts of the United Nations to restore stability and I know that Ghana has paid a tragic price in human lives. I spoke about this in Parliament recently and I want also to take this private opportunity to convey to you the sincere sympathy of all Canadians for the losses suffered by Ghana and also to express our admiration and appreciation of the contribution which your country is making to the United Nations operation in the Congo.

I share your concern that normal parliamentary procedures in the Congo should be restored as soon as this can be effectively accomplished. The Secretary-General has expressed in the Advisory Committee the view that the strengthening of UN forces is already contributing significantly to an improvement in the political situation in the Congo; and he has indicated that his representatives there are actively concerned with promoting a meeting of parliament as soon as the political and military situation will permit this.

However discouraging certain aspects of the situation may be, I am sure you will agree that there have also been some grounds for encouragement arising out of the implementation of the Security Council resolution of February 21. If we are to build on these modest measures of progress, the present impetus of the UN effort, it seems to me, must be promoted and advanced by every means open to us. I confess to doubts that consultation on the Congo elsewhere than in the UN would likely to contribute to an improvement of the present situation.

I recall that when the Congo situation was reviewed at our meeting last March in London, you stressed your belief that the UN provided the best hope for peace and security in the Congo, as indeed for the world as a whole. I agreed with you when you said this in London and I must say that more recent developments have reinforced me in this conviction. John G. Diefenbaker."

2. A copy of the above message will be handed to the Acting High Commissioner for Ghana here as soon as we have your confirmation that it has been received by the President.

TALK WITH SPAAK

When I paid my first call on Spaak today I was impressed by his realistic approach towards Congo problem and I was encouraged to think that it may mean that Belgium will adopt a more cooperative and constructive attitude.

2. He told me his first task on taking office had been to restore order and cohesion in foreign policy, which had been impossible to maintain while there was a separate portfolio for African Affairs.

3. His aim now was to establish closer and friendlier cooperation with UN and a basis for it lay in his conviction that Belgian advisers should be withdrawn. He felt that here was the best hope of assuring the continuation of a useful Belgian influence in Congo. However it was difficult for him quickly to reverse a policy. Furthermore he had to bear in mind that too sudden a move might be construed by Belgians in Congo as a complete withdrawal of Belgian interest and support and lead to a wholesale exodus. Then too Congo gendarmerie should not repeat not be weakened. He hoped for assurances from UN that Belgian advisers would be replaced. I suggested assurances might be too much to expect since that would imply that the terms of the Security Council's resolution of February 21 were negotiable. Might not repeat not a recognition by UN of the need to fill the gaps do? I gather from his reply that he is open to something considerably less than a guarantee.

4. He is proposing to make a move very shortly as an indication of his intentions. He plans to withdraw about thirty Belgian advisers, including Colonel Weber, from Katanga. (Weber, who has been Tshombe's right-hand man, has been generally regarded as the blatant symbol of the intention of at least important Belgian interests, if not repeat not the government itself, to remain in Katanga and support an independent Tshombe régime.)

5. Spaak observed that without wanting to criticize his predecessor he had to admit that there had been a basic inconsistency in Belgian policy. On the one hand it had been a policy of Congo unity but on the other hand it appeared to support Katanga independence. He thought that in general our best hope now lay in a policy of supporting Kasavubu in his endeavours to assert his authority over all sections of Congo.

6. In particular with reference to Belgium-UN relations he said that he had found Sahbani a reasonable man and thought it would be useful if negotiations were continued with him. This seems clearly to support the line our representative took in the meeting of the Advisory Committee which discussed Sahbani's report (telegram 1157 May 18 from Permis New York).†

7. Spaak was happy with the decision at Oslo NATO meeting to provide for consultative committees as a step in the right direction he had long advocated. He attached much importance to the coming meeting of Africa Committee in Paris with Congo as the first item.

We had understood that Rothschild was to present Belgian case but Spaak told me that he now intends to do so himself in recognition of the importance of the meeting not repeat not only to Belgium but to NATO. (He will it so happens be in Paris at that time with King Baudouin.)

8. He commented that he had welcomed the new and substantial interest that USA was now showing in NATO in world problems, including African. He interpreted this as an outcome of their increased concern for Latin America arising out of their difficulties with Cuba.

9. Spaak at no repeat no time criticized USA or Canada for their actions in UN or for lack of support for Belgium. He seemed to accept what I said, that our position, like that of USA, was I thought one of general sympathy with Belgian objectives of independence and unity for Congo and of a continuing useful association between Congo and Belgium, and that our differences had been mainly over the ways and means of attaining them.

10. Spaak appears to have brought good sense and good intentions into a ministry that seemed to me up to now to have lacked both. I hope Belgian Cabinet on the one hand and UN on the other will give him the time and the room he needs to show what he can do.

I have the honour to refer to my message about convening a meeting in Accra or elsewhere to consider ways and means of providing protection in Leopoldville to enable Parliament to meet. I thank you for your reply and wish to state that since I sent my message to you on May 5 events have moved rapidly. It now appears that consultations and action within the present framework of the United Nations may pave the way for the Congolese Parliament to meet in a free and calm atmosphere. In the circumstances I no longer consider the meeting that I suggested necessary and I hope that our efforts in the Congo will soon be crowned with success by our continued support of the United Nations highest consideration.

SITUATION IN KATANGA

I spoke to Bunche today about the Katanga situation without eliciting much further view or information. I think that with the Secretary-General in Leopoldville the Secretariat is less than usually fully informed.

2. The Irish Permanent Representative told me in confidence today that he was very much concerned about the lack of adequate information in the Secretariat regarding developments in the Congo. He has much cause for concern as the Irish troops are in difficult position both in Leopoldville and Jadotville. He feels that the lack of clear and up to date information is leaving the field open to sensational press stories.

3. My own concern is that the Secretariat or preferably the Secretary-General himself should make an early statement as to the UN objectives in the Katanga operation establishing their action in a legal framework and explaining the grounds which have necessitated the methods used in Katanga. I feel that if we are left too long without such an authoritative explanation criticism of the operation and misunderstanding as to its intention will flourish.

4. Boland and myself talked over these preoccupations with Governor Stevenson of US Mission today and Boland is seeing Cordier of the UN Secretariat later this afternoon.

5. We have no repeat no doubt that the UN has been faced with difficult choices as to methods and as to timing but that its ultimate objective of bringing Katanga into constitutional relationship with the general government of the Congo is fully justified and that it has operated within a legal framework. What we really doubt is how skilfully this operation has been handled and whether it has been fully and coherently reported from UN sources.

6. Mr. Hammarskjöld is expected back Sunday night or Monday morning. However it is possible that the events in Leopoldville might lead him to delay his departure.

UN ACTION IN KATANGA

As seen from Congo in opposition to New York I find little justification for recent UN action in Katanga. Although UN claims it acted to prevent civil war, there exists no repeat no evidence whatsoever that such a threat was imminent. However desirable may be unification of the Congo it is inexcusable that it should have served as a pretext for relying on force which could only have been justified as last resort had overt action been taken by Katanga Government against UN.

2. UN troops presence in Katanga as well as reinforcements in recent months and implementation of Security Council resolution February 21 regarding withdrawal of mercenaries have all been very much through negotiations with Tshombe's Government. The UN having thus treated Tshombe as a provincial authority we can understand Tshombe's reaction "I have been betrayed all down the line by the UN."

3. Until Wednesday there was no repeat no reason to suppose that by patient negotiations aim of the UN and of Central Government could not repeat not eventually have been accomplished. It was not repeat not a situation which could be helped by a deadline. Although there were rumours recently that Munongo was planning commando type actions against UN troops, no repeat no such actions had taken place as of date UN offensive. It is evident from developments since Wednesday that UN operation was not repeat not only ill advised and unnecessary but hastily conceived and with apparent disregard of military logistics of such an operation. They have also underestimated the will to resist of Katanga army. Evidence of this is that last night at UK consulate in Elizabethville UN were prepared, according to USA Embassy here, to consider ceasefire on the basis that both sides would remain in their position.

4. By using force in support of Central Government to settle what is after all an internal political issue, UN has set a dangerous precedent. Implication is that if tomorrow Gizenga managed to take over from Adoula without overt use of force (Adoula's position as Head of Government is far from secure) UN troops paid by Western Powers would have no repeat no other choice than to consolidate his power throughout the country.

5. It appears from Mr. Hammarskjöld's own admission (paragraph 4 Permis New York telegram 1840 September 7)† that Adoula was forced to take strong action over Katanga by extremists in his government. If this is so, UN action is even more inexcusable. It should be its role to help Adoula's government cope with rather than give in to such pressure.

6. Grateful for Department's assessment of situation.

THE CONGO

The untimely death of Mr. Hammarskjöld¹⁵ and the apparent change in the military situation in favour of the Katanga forces has, it seems to us, presented the UN (and the Western Powers) with a new set of factors in the Congo.

2. The most obvious one is that Tshombe's prestige has increased and it will now be more urgent than ever to reach a negotiated settlement with him. Another is that the latest developments would seem to have strengthened the influence of the extremists in both ¹⁵ Le 18 septembre 1961./On September 18, 1961.

Elizabethville and Leopoldville with the result that one may expect increased pressure on the one hand for the secession of Katanga and on the other for reunification of the Congo by force.

3. Where we see some danger is in the possibility that Tshombe will again overplay his hand as he did at Coquilhatville and attempt to impose conditions which neither the UN or the Central Government can accept. In such a case the danger of civil war would be great. It seems doubtful that at the present time Mobutu's ANC could mount a successful offensive against Katanga in view of the logistical problems involved. What is less predictable, however, is the likely reaction of Lundula's forces in Eastern and Kivu provinces. Another danger is that unless Tshombe can be persuaded to meet with the Central Government leaders as soon as possible, the latter may feel obliged to call for outside help against Katanga.

4. In the above circumstances the most urgent task of the UN now that a provisional cease fire has been arranged should in our opinion be to do what it can to bring about political negotiation between Tshombe and the Central Government and then return to its impartial role of preventing civil war. It goes without saying of course that the UN should take all necessary steps to protect its personnel in the Congo.¹⁶

The fighting in Katanga coupled with the death of Mr. Hammarskjöld has produced a serious situation in the Congo which could pose the threat of civil war and foreign intervention.

2. The Central Government of Mr. Adoula is based on an uneasy alliance between the moderates and the more extreme followers of Gizenga. It has enjoyed the active support of the U.N. including the Casablanca Powers and other non-aligned countries. One of the bases for Gizengists' support of Adoula was the latter's willingness to take a strong line with Tshombe and establish the Central Government's authority over Katanga. Adoula has therefore been under pressure to bring Tshombe to heel quickly and on several occasions he has publicly threatened to use force. But just as Adoula was under pressure from the Gizengists Tshombe has also, it would seem, been under some pressure from extremists in his Government led by the Minister of Interior, Mr. Munongo, who still nourished hope of keeping Katanga politically independent. Accordingly Tshombe was in no hurry to go to Leopoldville for negotiations. He expressed fears for his safety and claimed that Katanga deputies in the Central Parliament had been forced to take refuge in Brazzaville. Basically his attitude to the Adoula Government was one of suspicion that it would soon fall under the control of Gizenga and that in Leopoldville his life would be in danger. He was also opposed to the idea that the Katanga Gendarmerie should come under the control of the Central Government and was particularly concerned that the posts of Defence Minister should not go to his enemies.

3. It had been the U.N. hope that the reintegration of Katanga could have been brought about peacefully through negotiation once the Belgian and other foreign advisers and military personnel in Katanga had been withdrawn in accordance with the Security Council Resolution of February 21. Unfortunately it was the United Nations efforts to implement this part of the resolution at the request of the Central Government and in particular their decision to seize the radio station in Elizabethville on September 13 which precipitated the present conflict in Katanga. In this connection the report of the officer in charge of the United Nations operation in the Congo draws attention to the role of foreign military personnel and extremist elements in the Katanga Government in spreading panic and disseminating inflammatory propaganda against the United Nations thereby threatening the security of United Nations personnel. The legal basis for the United Nations action apparently was the ordinance issued by President Kasavubu providing for the expulsion of all foreign officers and mercenaries serving in the Katanga forces not under the control of the Central Government and a letter from Prime Minister Adoula requesting United Nations assistance in the execution of this ordinance. While the U.N. could thus claim to have acted within a legal framework and have probably stayed within the letter of their mandate, they left themselves open to criticism by appearing to use force to bring about a political settlement in favour of the Central Government. This aspect of the United Nations action has been criticized in certain Western countries as well as by some African states of the former French Community.

4. Against this background the death of Mr. Hammarskjöld would seem to have had the following results:

(a) The United Nations finds itself in a sort of legal vacuum in the Congo since Mr. Linner was, strictly speaking, the personal representative of the Secretary-General and subordinate officers must now operate within the limits of existing instructions;

(b) The influence of the extremists around both Adoula and Tshombe has been strengthened. This means that the pressures for secession on the one hand and reunification of the Congo by force on the other hand are likely to increase. Already we have received reports from Leopoldville that the Gizenga group has been demanding that the Government send its armed forces to Katanga. The U.S. Ambassador in Leopoldville seems convinced that Adoula will resist such pressure but it is clear that he will be encountering opposition in the Government.

(c) The role of the United Kingdom in arranging for talks between Tshombe and United Nations representatives has been interpreted in a sinister light in a number of Afro-Asian countries, notably India and Ghana where the press have accused the United Kingdom of being responsible for the death of Mr. Hammarskjöld. In this connection the statement issued by Prime Minister Adoula has taken a distinctly anti-British line, accusing British interests of complicity in Katanga.

CONGO: U.N. REQUEST FOR ASSISTANCE

On September 20 an urgent request was received from the U.N. Secretariat for Canadian assistance in support of U.N. operations in the Congo. This request was three-fold:

(a) for new equipment and spare parts required to recondition teletypes used by Canadian signallers. (We understand that the teletype in Leopoldville is the only one now in operation and that, only at half-strength; communications are now being operated by radio);

(b) for transport aircraft, aircrews, maintenance personnel and spares for internal air transport (these aircraft, the number of which is left to Canadian discretion, would be used for a period of two weeks "after the Fuga aircraft employed against the U.N. by Katanga forces has been dealt with");

(c) for technical assistance in installing radio equipment on four C-47 U.N. aircraft now in Leopoldville.

These demands are related to other requests submitted at the same time to ten other countries (Ethiopia, Denmark, Norway, Sweden, Yugoslavia, United Arab Republic, Pakistan, India, U.S.A. and Iceland) for transport and fighter aircraft and crews as well as weapons and military equipment. The purpose of these requests has not been stated explicitly.

Just before the operations in Katanga had reached an acute stage, another request for Canadian assistance to Congo operations had been received from the Secretariat. This request came to us under cover of letter No. 644 of September 12 from our Mission in New York. † At that time, the Secretariat transmitted to us and twelve other countries (Argentina, Ethiopia, India, Iceland, Morocco, Peru, Senegal, Sweden, Tunisia, Upper Volta, the United Arab Republic and Switzerland) a request by the Government of the Congo to assist in the re-organization and training of the Congolese National Army. The Secretariat enquired therefore whether the Canadian Government would be able and willing to provide a number of qualified French speaking military personnel to serve as advisers to the Congo Government and instructors for the ANC. Our Mission in New York was informed that the Secretariat would like us to forward the names of a number of candidates for some, but not all, of the 18 officer and 11 NCO positions requested. It was made clear to us that the U.N. would give preference to qualified African candidates where such were available.

We were informed in this connection that the military advisers to be provided under this scheme would be independent of ONUC. Only one, an Ethiopian officer, had been recruited so far. The Secretary-General had decided against making any request to countries, such as Guinea, whose participation he considered to be politically undesirable.

Brigadier Rikhye indicated at the same time to our Mission that it might be possible to reduce the staff at ONUC in the not too distant future and suggested that the U.N. would welcome the transfer to the future Military Advisers Staff of Canadian officers already in the Congo. On the other hand, it was pointed out that further requests for military advisers might be submitted next year.

The U.S. Embassy in Ottawa, on instruction from their Government, has approached us to suggest that we give the request for military training assistance our most sympathetic consideration.

A copy of this U.N. request has been passed to National Defence but no views on this matter have been exchanged between the two Departments, pending your return. Action on both these requests has had to be deferred, awaiting clarification on the current role of the U.N. in the Congo generally and in Katanga in particular, resulting from your discussions in New York.

Attached for your convenience is a copy of the Security Council resolution of February 21, 1961 on the Congo.†

Since preparing this memorandum, we have received another telegram from our Mission in New York providing further information on the U.N. request for Canadian military transport aircraft. A copy of this telegram† is attached.

REQUEST FROM UNITED NATIONS FOR TRANSPORT PLANES FOR CONGO OPERATIONS

6. The Secretary of State for External Affairs said that the United Nations had requested about eight countries, including Canada, to make transport aircraft available for the carrying of United Nations troops and supplies to Katanga. Other countries had been asked to provide fighter protection for the transport planes. The United Nations had formerly used chartered planes, but these had been attacked by the Katanga air force, and the charter companies had withdrawn most of them. Only two or three out of a total of thirty transport aircraft were now continuing to operate. The transport aircraft would probably be required for a period of between three and five weeks.

The decision was a difficult one. Canadian troops were operating in the Congo, and the transports would doubtless be helpful to them as to others. On the hand, the aircraft would be exposed to possible attack. If the U.N. should fail in Katanga, its influence could be seriously impaired.

7. The Minister of National Defence said that Ethiopia, Norway, Sweden, Denmark and the United States had agreed to supply some of the required aircraft. Air Commodore Morrison, R.C.A.F., the U.N. Staff Officer in command of transport flying in Katanga, had telephoned to him and stated that the service also needed twelve Grade 3 N.C.O. technicians to supervise aircraft repairs. He has stated that the local situation was so confused that he was uncertain as to how many commercial transport planes were still available, and uncertain whether the recent ceasefire might make the charter companies more willing to operate over Katanga. He had recommended that Canada provide four C119 aircraft, plus the related ground crew, for a period of at least one month. This would involve a total of 124 personnel, including the 12 technicians. If only two C119 aircraft were made available, a total of 68 personnel would be involved, including the technicians. The aircraft might be attacked if the cease-fire should end, but the U.N. operation ought to be supported. The government would be criticized by the Canadian public if it refused the request.

8. The Cabinet agreed, subject to the concurrence of the Prime Minister,

(a) that two C119 aircraft, together with the necessary personnel (56 including aircrews and ground crews), be made available to the United Nations Congo Force for an estimated period of one month; and,

(b) that twelve N.C.O.'s Grade 3 (technical) be made available to the U.N. Congo Force to assist in supervising aircraft repairs.

CONGO: U.N. REQUEST FOR ASSISTANCE

In telegram No. 2162 of October 10, 1961, a copy of which is attached,† our mission in New York forwarded a request from the Secretariat to provide eight control tower officers and two maintenance ground communication technicians to assist in the operations of the Swedish and Ethiopian jet fighters and Indian Canberras in the Congo. In view of the policy implications of this request, we have asked our mission to provide additional information on the Secretariat's policy concerning the use of these fighters and light bomber aircraft. In telegram No. 2222 of October 14, a copy of which is also attached,† our mission further explained that in the event of a resumption of hostilities, the task of the jets and Canberras would be to provide escorts for U.N. military transport aircraft and, if it became necessary, to render unusable the only runway now available to Katanga's Fuga jets.

2. The Swedish and Ethiopian jet fighters and Indian Canberras were provided to the U.N. in reply to the general request for assistance made by the Secretariat. You will recall that Canada has already provided two C-119 transport planes with personnel, in reply to the same request, for a period of one month.

3. The required Canadian personnel would be assigned presumably to the technical operations of fighter control equipment, under the orders of the U.N. commander in the Congo. The U.S. Air Force, which has agreed to provide the complex and costly control equipment required for these planes, has indicated that it would much prefer to have this equipment operated by RCAF personnel.

4. The fighters and Canberras are already at the U.N.'s disposal in the Congo. Five fighters were moved on October 8 to Luluabourg in the province of Kasai, not far from the Katanga border. The other jets and the Canberras are based in Leopoldville. Our mission in New York, which has obtained some information in confidence on General McEoin's plan in the event of a breach of a cease-fire in Katanga, has reported that it is the U.N.'s intention to move eventually all jets into Kamina in Katangese territory. The Canberras have the range to operate from Leopoldville.

5. There is, of course, a possibility that if we agree to the present U.N. request, we could be placed later on in an awkward position if the U.N. engages in warlike operations in the Congo, and particularly in Katanga. The situation would be especially delicate if these operations were undertaken in circumstances about which we may have some reservations. It is to be expected that the jets and Canberras would play an important role in such operations.

6. Under terms of the cease-fire agreement in Katanga, the U.N. has ceased military operations in the region and we do not anticipate any U.N. initiative pending an agreement as to who is to head the Secretariat, without which, as you have said, the Congo operation lacks political direction. At the last meeting of the Congo Advisory Committee, no indication has been given that the Secretariat would be thinking in terms of resuming military operations on its own initiative. However, the danger of further U.N. operations in Katanga cannot be ruled out absolutely.

7. In the circumstances, you may wish to put the above considerations to Mr. Harkness, suggesting that, on balance, sympathetic consideration should be given to the U.N. request for control tower officers and ground communications technicians, since this personnel would not have a combatant role and the aircraft involved would, in effect, provide protection both for the RCAF transport aircraft now in the Congo, as well as for Canadian personnel now operating signals equipment for the United Nations. Attached for you signature, if you agree, is a letter† along the above suggested line to the Minister of National Defence.¹⁸

CONGO: UN REQUEST FOR ASSISTANCE – FLYING CONTROL PERSONNEL

Your reference telegram which notified that Canada could not repeat not provide requested flying control personnel, brought an immediate and concerted reaction. In a personal approach to our Permanent Representative, Bunche asked for urgent reconsideration on basis that lack of control personnel could seriously jeopardize ONUC Air Defence. Ethiopian Ambassador added his plea stating that without control personnel Ethiopian jets in Congo are non-operational (a point of national prestige is also involved). Members of USA Mission expressed concern for effectiveness of UN defensive air operations and hoped for reconsideration of Canadian decision. UN military advisers re-emphasized that USA Government had agreed to provide costly and complex control equipment on condition UN could assure operation only by qualified personnel and on understanding RCAF personnel were being asked for.

2. USAF representative stated necessary equipment is in such short supply it is necessary to withdraw it from a unit in Oklahoma. If upon reconsideration Canada cannot repeat not provide personnel there would be no repeat no point in shipping it to Congo. Shipment is expected to be made in two or three days.

3. Yesterday in Congo Advisory Committee Meeting Secretariat was under pressure to take effective action to deal with aircraft operating from Katanga which had bombed railroads and villages in South Kasai. Bunche stated Katangese would be given clear warning that aircraft positively identified as engaging in hostile acts would be destroyed on ground or in air.

4. These reactions and requests for reconsideration of Canadian decision are reported for such action as is deemed advisable in light of all factors known in Ottawa.

CONGO – UNITED NATIONS' REQUEST FOR ASSISTANCE

Attached is a copy of telegram No. 2473 dated November 1, 1961, in which our mission in New York sets forth the immediate reactions in the United Nations resulting from the notification that Canada, because of a serious shortage, could not provide the personnel needed to man the control equipment for United Nations' aircraft in the Congo. Our mission sent this report for such action as we deem advisable in the light of all the factors known in Ottawa.

You will recall that in a letter dated October 17,[†] you recommended to the Minister of National Defence that we should agree to the United Nations' request provided the necessary personnel were available. Mr. Harkness replied, however, on October 25[†] that the provision of the requested personnel would seriously affect the operational efficiency of the RCAF.

In view of the strong reaction caused by this statement and in the light of the recent outbreaks in the Congo, we consider that Canada should endeavour to provide the assistance requested by the United Nations, if at all possible. Continued inability by Canada to provide the flight-control personnel, which would apparently have the consequence of delaying or making impossible United Nations' air action against Katangese aircraft, could lead to very strong criticism of Canada by the African and Asian countries who are pressing for strong action against Mr. Tschombe and Katangese separatism. Attached for your signature, if you agree, is a letter[†] to Mr. Harkness asking him to reconsider the matter.¹⁹

Also attached for reference purposes are copies[†] of your earlier letter to Mr. Harkness and of his reply.

LOAN OF R.C.A.F. PERSONNEL TO U.N. CONGO FORCE

5. The Minister of National Defence said that several weeks ago the United Nations had requested the government of Canada to make 11 or 12 R.C.A.F. officers and technicians available to help in the control of fighter aircraft of the U.N. Congo Force. A reply had been made that R.C.A.F. personnel suitable for such duties could not readily be spared because they were currently engaged in the conversion of training squadrons to F101 and F104 aircraft.

The U.N. had today renewed its request, explaining that the control equipment was to be supplied by the United States but would not be provided unless R.C.A.F. personnel would operate it. Apart from U.S. personnel, only R.C.A.F. personnel had the necessary training for the operation of this equipment. In the circumstances, the government would probably be criticized if it should refuse to supply the personnel and, as a result, the control equipment could not be used.

6. During the brief discussion some said that the fighter aircraft would be used in Katanga. The Canadian government was not committed to support a united Congo, and indeed this was a question of national self-determination rather than one to be forced upon the population by the U.N. The U.N. Congo Force, however, was trying to get between the Congo and Katanga forces, to act as a buffer. At this time about 300 Canadian personnel were serving in the Congo, as compared with the maximum of 500 authorized by the Cabinet. The duration of the assignment of the 11 or 12 R.C.A.F. personnel would be indefinite.

7. The Cabinet agreed that 11 or 12 R.C.A.F. officers and technicians would be made available at this time to the U.N. Congo Force to assist in the control of the Force's fighter aircraft operations.

CONGO – REQUEST FOR MILITARY TRAINING ASSISTANCE

You will recall that on October 19, while you were in New York, a telegram† was sent to our mission suggesting that we consider taking up with the Department of National Defence the proposal from the U.N. Secretariat that Canada should provide military instructors and advisers for the Congolese Defence Ministry. Our mission replied on October 20† that the U.N. authorities were not pursuing the matter at the present time because of the situation in Katanga and of the non-integration of the Congolese forces in the Orientale province.

2. We have now been informed by our Acting Consul General in Leopoldville (a copy of his message No. 313 of November 7 is attached)† that General Iyassu, the Ethiopian officer appointed as Senior Military Adviser to the Congolese Government, considers that the matter should be pursued in spite of the uncertainties of the present situation and indeed has threatened to resign unless the U.N. takes immediate action. General Iyassu told Mr. Gauvin that he would like to obtain from Canada one Lieutenant Colonel, four Majors or Captains and four NCO's for the proposed officer training school and two French-speaking Colonels or Lieutenant Colonels to be assistant advisers to Congolese defence authorities. Iyassu thought that if Canada could reply affirmatively and quickly, the U.N. would be willing to fill the most important positions by Canadian officers, leaving other appointments to other nationalities. He hoped that the Secretariat would agree to sending a formal request to us in the very near future.

3. As you know, the U.S. authorities have told us that they would be grateful if Canada could provide military advisers and instructors for the Congo and General Mobutu has made several approaches to Mr. Gauvin along the same line.

4. I think we should ask our Mission in New York to consult the U.N. Secretariat again, in the light of the information from Mr. Gauvin, to get the most recent views and intentions of the Secretariat in this regard. It seems likely that because of the military situation in the Congo and also because of the recency of U Thant's appointment that the Secretariat may not have reached very firm conclusions.

5. Would you agree with the view that there is little point in approaching National Defence on this matter until the prospects in the Congo are clearer and until the Secretariat is in a position to renew its request for military instructors from Canada?²⁰

SECURITY COUNCIL MEETING ON THE CONGO

Ethiopia, Nigeria and Sudan have requested a meeting of the Security Council "to consider the situation prevailing in the Province of Katanga, Republic of Congo (Leopoldville) caused by lawless acts of mercenaries." Mr. Zorin, the current President of the Council, has proposed a meeting for early next week. It is expected that Spaak, Bomboko and Menon, as well as the above-mentioned three countries, will ask to participate.

2. In view of the unsuccessful attempt of General Mobutu's forces to invade Katanga and the role which European mercenaries are reported to have played in repelling the invasion, the forthcoming meeting will be important for the future of the United Nations operation in the Congo.

3. The two main points of discussion are expected to be:

- (i) clarification of the United Nations mandate in the Congo and particularly the role of United Nations forces, and
- (ii) what to do about the mercenaries.

The choices under (i) are:

(a) UN troops would actively assist the Central Government forces in a military conquest of Katanga.

(b) UN troops would stand aside if the Central Government wished to renew its military operations against Katanga.

(c) UN forces would interpose themselves between Central Government and Katanga forces.

4. While there may be support for (a) from the Congo Central Government, Ethiopia and some of the Casablanca powers, it is doubtful that many of the countries contributing to the UN military operation would agree to their forces being used in this way. India and the Western powers, as well as Mr. U Thant are said to be against such a course. The United Kingdom for one would probably be unwilling to approve such a step in view of their declared position that the differences between Katanga and the Central Government should be settled peacefully by negotiation. (The United Kingdom's chief concern is to avoid disruption of the mining operations in Katanga).

5. In the case of (b) it seems doubtful that the Central Government forces could successfully reduce Katanga unassisted especially if they are without air cover. Prime Minister Adoula appears to realize this and it may be that he will refrain from any further attempts at least so long as the Katanga forces can count on the services of European mercenaries.

6. The remaining possibility (c) of the UN forces interposing themselves between Katanga and Central Government forces seems the best solution provided it has the tacit consent of the Central Government and negotiations with Tshombe are not unduly delayed. Intervention is envisaged under the resolution of February 21 which authorizes the UN forces to prevent civil war. Such a course would, however, mean a change of attitude on the part of the Secretariat who have tended to take the position in the Advisory Committee that Central Government operations against Katanga were essentially a police action.

7. Our own view is that if fighting breaks out again between the Central Government forces and the Katanga gendarmerie it can hardly be regarded as anything less than civil war and the United Nations would therefore be obligated under the terms of the February 21 resolution to intervene.

8. As for the mercenaries, Cordier has suggested that instead of deporting those apprehended, the UN should hand them over to the Central Government for service in work camps. Announcement of this policy would, he believes, cause most of them to leave Katanga of their own accord. Although there would probably be considerable support in the Advisory Committee for such a course it would mean stretching the terms of the February 21 resolution which only provides for measures to bring about the withdrawal of mercenaries from the Congo. Moreover we have reservations about this suggestion because of likely public reaction in Western countries especially those where UN prestige has already suffered considerably as a result of the events in Katanga.

9. Basically the main problem facing the Security Council and all member countries is whether, and to what extent, the UN should side with the Central Government in its quarrel with Katanga. Since the United Nations is committed to the unity of the Congo it clearly must give moral and political support to the Central Government on the issue of secession. It would not, however, in our view be appropriate for the United Nations, whose purpose is to serve the cause of peace, to engage in offensive military operations with the Central Government forces against Katanga. Do you agree that the Canadian representative may take this position if the subject is raised in the Congo Advisory Committee?²¹

CONGO: SECURITY COUNCIL MEETING

Two draft resolutions are now serving as focus of negotiations in connection with Security Council's discussion of situation in Katanga. Afro-Asian draft resolution in drafting of which UAR, Ceylon, India and to some extent Liberia have participated is given in our telegram 2670 November 14. † Anglo-American draft resolution is given in our telegram 2669 November 14. †

2. Principal purpose of Anglo-American draft resolution is to demonstrate genuineness of Anglo-American desire for ending of secession in Katanga. It is also intended for use in negotiations with drafters of Afro-Asian resolution since it has been recognized from first that it would be preferable for draft resolution to be presented in Council by Afro-Asians or possibly by all non-permanent members of Council. Anglo-American draft in several respects is broader than that of Afro-Asian members and UK and USA missions will be trying to add to Afro-Asian draft. Specifically they will press for inclusion of a paragraph along lines of operative paragraph two of their draft resolution to effect that Republic of Congo is responsible for conduct of external affairs. They would also like to see a reference to desirability of continuing negotiations to achieve territorial unity and integrity of Congo. They will suggest that this might be done by amplifying operative paragraph eight of Afro-Asian draft. Only principle objection to Afro-Asian draft is reference in operative paragraph four to "use of force" to apprehend mercenaries in Katanga. It is felt that this might lead to a resumption of fighting in Katanga and therefore frustrate political settlement.

²¹ Note marginale :/Marginal note:
O.K. H.C. G[reen] 11/11

3. Anglo-American draft was prepared largely by USA Mission and accepted by UK Mission on understanding that they would have to secure approval of Foreign Office. The Foreign Office has since objected to operative paragraph nine. USA are now suggesting that UK position might be protected by addition of a term such as "without prejudice to ceasefire."

4. Prospects are that resolution which emerges will gain unanimous support of Council. It is recognized however that while this will have some psychological effect, new efforts will have to be made to bring Tshombe to negotiating table. Spaak has some encouragement from fact that he had received on November 13 a letter from Tshombe referring to negotiations but letter continues to insist on need to maintain entity of Katanga. USA Mission which has seen letter considers that Tshombe has given no repeat no ground. They see principal hope in possibility of threatening Tshombe with division of Katanga into two parts. We sense that USA are working along these lines with Central Government. Bomboko referred in his statement to fact that Tshombe does not repeat not control North Katanga. We understand that Sendwe has gone to Albertville to emphasize possibilities of an alternative government for North Katanga. Faced with this threat it is USA hope that Tshombe will become more amenable.

5. As indicated in our telegram under reference only four governments who are not repeat not members of Security Council have asked to participate in debate. Neither Nigeria nor repeat nor Sudan whose representatives had co-signed letter which requested meeting of Security Council have yet asked to take part although they both expect that they will receive instructions. Fact is that both governments have apparently changed their minds since signing letter and would have preferred to have meeting delayed for sometime in order to give U Thant more time to study problem. We have been told by representatives of a number of countries which participated in February series of meetings, e.g. Guinea, Indonesia, Poland that they do not repeat not plan to participate in this series of meetings. One of uncertainties is Ghana. Their delegation have asked for instructions. They consider that if a resolution is likely to gain general support there is no repeat no advantage to be gained from their participation. Only if it seems that a resolution will not repeat not be approved so that Secretary-General will have to be influenced by consensus of opinion, would they expect to participate.

THE CONGO

The Security Council is debating the situation in the Congo and is expected to adopt a resolution clarifying and strengthening the United Nations mandate. An Afro-Asian draft (attached)[†] has already been submitted to the Council by Ceylon, Liberia and the UAR. The USA are expected to submit an alternate draft perhaps along the lines of that contained in telegram 2669 from New York (attached).[†]

2. The Afro-Asian draft resolution reaffirms United Nations support for the Central Government of Prime Minister Adoula, calls for an end to all secessionist activities in Katanga, and requests all states to take measures to prevent army equipment and material from reaching the Congo except in accordance with the decisions, policies, and purposes of the United Nations. (This latter condition would leave the door open to providing equipment and possibly aircraft to the Central Government through United Nations channels if this seemed desirable.) The draft also authorizes the Secretary-General to use force if necessary to apprehend foreign mercenaries and goes further than previous resolutions by providing not only for their deportation but also (presumably at UN discretion) for their detention pending legal action. This is designed to solve the problem of mercenaries returning to Katanga after they have been deported. The feeling in New York is that the possibility of detention and the implied threat that they may be handed over to the Central Government authorities will be enough to cause most of the mercenaries to leave the Congo of their own accord.

3. The Afro-Asian draft is silent on the question of whether the United Nations forces in the Congo should actively assist the Central Government in a military operation to reduce Katanga. Most Western countries, as well as India and Mr. U Thant are against this and, as you know, Mr. Green has stated publicly that Canada does not believe the United Nations should engage in offensive operations against Katanga.²² This would not mean, however, that the United Nations could not use force to protect its own personnel or, for example, to relieve United Nations units which might be surrounded or attacked.

4. The main USA objection to the Afro-Asian draft is that it is directed against one aspect of the Congo problem, Katanga, and does not take account of the recent anti-Central Government activities of Gizenga. We understand the USA proposal will include strengthening the Congolese National Army by creation of a small air force. This is in response to a demand from the Central Government for an air force. The USA are apparently afraid that if they refuse this request the Central Government may turn elsewhere.

5. The events of the past few days at Kindu in Kivu Province and at Albertville in Katanga have added a new element of urgency in the Congo problem. In Kindu Congolese troops from Stanleyville arrested and killed thirteen Italian United Nations air crew. The troops involved disregarded the orders of General Lundula, who has now made his peace with the Central Government and are believed to be under the control of Gizenga, who is reported to have gone to Kindu after denouncing the Central Government and appealing to left wing elements in the country to join his new Panalu Party. Mr. U Thant has issued orders to the United Nations forces in the Congo to punish those responsible for the murder of the Italians. He also seems to be prepared, without waiting for a further mandate, to authorize the United Nations to take the strongest measures, including force to restore order in Kindu and according to latest reports United Nations aircraft have bombed Congo troops at Kindu. The United Nations may also need to take stern measures in Albertville where some elements of the Congolese forces got out of hand recently when the city was taken over by anti-Tshombe elements of the population.

6. The main new element in the Congo situation is the open break between Gizenga and the Central Government. Gizenga appears to have quarrelled with Lumumbist provincial leaders in Stanleyville and to have moved to Kivu Province, taking with him loyal elements of the Congolese Army in Stanleyville. His plan appears to be to start a new nationalist movement aimed at overthrowing and replacing the Adoula Government in Leopoldville. Another new element is the report of the United Nations commission investigating the death of Lumumba which casts strong suspicion on Tshombe and the Katanga Government and also blames President Kasavubu for having handed over Lumumba to his political enemies.

7. Tshombe still seems to be as unwilling as ever to negotiate a reconciliation with Adoula, even though the United Kingdom, the Belgian Government and the French have apparently been advising him strongly to do so. He maintains that he will not negotiate so long as the Central Government continues its threats and propaganda attacks against him. He also refuses to acknowledge the applicability of the "fundamental law" (constitution) which is one of the conditions demanded by Adoula. The Central Government demands that Tshombe acknowledge the supremacy of President Kasavubu as Chief of State of a united Congo, whereas Tshombe will only recognize him as a Head of a confederation of autonomous states.

8. The most recent figures available on the dispersal of Canadian signallers in the sensitive parts of the Congo are those for November 2 as follows:

Kamina	9
Elizabethville	11
Luluabourg	9
Bukavu	10
Albertville	11
	50

In each place there is one officer; the remainder are signals NCO's.

CONGO – REQUEST FOR MILITARY TRAINING ASSISTANCE

On November 9, I sent you a memorandum informing you of the latest development concerning the U.N. request to provide military training assistance to the Congolese forces. You indicated that you would agree with the view that there would be little point in approaching National Defence on this matter until the prospects in the Congo become clearer and until the Secretariat were in a position to renew its request. On the basis of this memorandum a telegram† was sent to our mission in New York to get the most recent views and intentions of the Secretariat in this regard. A copy of this telegram was referred to the Chairman, Chiefs of Staff, for his information. Attached for your information is a letter, dated November 20, 1961,† from Air Marshal Miller with reference to this message. He has advised us that his Department is doubtful of its ability to meet any requests for further French-speaking officers for the Congo and suggested therefore that no encouragement be offered to the U.N. authorities on this request.

2. Attached, therefore, for your signature, if you agree, is a telegram† bringing the reaction of the Chairman, Chiefs of Staff to the attention of our mission in New York and suggesting that, in view of this, they should not approach the Secretariat at the present time. If they have already done so on the basis of our telegram of November 16, it is suggested that they should inform the Secretariat that it is unlikely that Canada could provide the assistance requested.²³

3. We have received a further telegram from Leopoldville on this subject, a copy of which is attached (No. 329 of November 20, 1961).† As you will see, the Secretariat has informed General Iyassu, the Ethiopian officer appointed as Senior Military Adviser to the Congolese Government, that none of the countries which have been asked to provide officers and instructors have replied. It is General Iyassu's impression that this matter is being given a low priority in the Secretariat. He has suggested that if Canada is willing to send personnel, we should reply without awaiting further requests. A copy of our telegram to New York is therefore being sent for information to Leopoldville in order to inform Mr. Gauvin that we are not prepared to agree to General Iyassu's suggestion.

CONGO

While recognizing that U Thant is under pressure to do something positive we would hope that whatever action may be taken would be compatible with the basic assumption of the UN operation that a final solution to the Congo problem should be reached peacefully by the Congolese without foreign interference.

2. In view of what happened to the Italian airmen at Kindu and the apparent nervousness and lack of discipline amongst the ANC, we believe a high degree of priority should be given to the problem of regrouping UN forces in such a way as to afford maximum protection to UN personnel. While there may be valid reasons why the Malayan troops were unable to protect the Italians at Kindu it seems unlikely that public opinion will accept them. (In this connection the Italian ambassador called on the Department to inform us that his government was very disturbed at the apparent inability of the UN to protect its personnel.) As you know, we have taken a position against the use of force by the UN to suppress Katanga but this does not of course mean that we are against the use of force, if necessary, to protect UN personnel and in the last resort to maintain law and order.

3. We agree with you that U Thant's ideas about settling the mercenary problem could lead to a renewal of fighting or at least a number of unsavoury incidents. We would hope therefore that it could be recognized that the primary responsibility for getting rid of mercenaries should rest with the Katanga authorities and that before any action is taken an effort would be made to persuade Tshombe to issue a statement such as he made at the end of August accepting in principle that mercenaries be withdrawn.

4. We have never been too happy about the proposal to hand mercenaries over to the Central Government and we are glad to note that U Thant's idea is to have those not deported guarded jointly by UN and ANC. However, this still leaves the problem of what to do if the Central Government should press to have them tried under Congolese law. Regardless of how strongly one may feel about these soldiers of fortune it would not sit well with public opinion in many Western countries if they were handed over for trial to an administration which has little or no judicial apparatus or experience.

5. We are glad to note that the UN are aware of the dangers of permitting the ANC to enter areas in the wake of UN forces. This would apply especially to the southern non-Baluba part of Katanga when and if the mercenaries are eliminated.

6. In general we are not over-optimistic about finding an early solution to the Congo's problems. It would seem however that Gizenga's latest moves posing as they do a threat to the moderates in the Central Government have made it more important than ever that Tshombe and Adoula be brought together. There seems little prospect at the moment of Tshombe agreeing to Adoula's prior condition that he recognize the loi fondamentale and Kasavubu as President of a United Congo (although he seems to be willing to recognize Kasavubu as President of a Con-Federal Union such as was discussed at Tananarive.) Some effort will have to be made therefore to find a face-saving formula for breaking the deadlock. One idea which has occurred to us is that the suggestion might be put to Tshombe that as a goodwill gesture he declare unilaterally his willingness to begin without prejudice making financial contributions to the Central Government treasury. Such a concession might enable Adoula to drop his prior condition regarding the loi fondamentale and agree to meet Tshombe elsewhere than Leopoldville, say in New York under UN auspices. This is only an idea and we would be interested to know of any others (such as the suggestion of a mediator from Ivory Coast or Sudan) which may have been made by the Secretariat or other delegations.

SITUATION IN THE CONGO

On November 24 the Security Council adopted an Afro-Asian resolution which inter alia reaffirmed United Nations support for the Central Government, deprecated secessionist activities in Katanga, as well as attacks on United Nations forces and personnel, requested all states to take measures to prevent arms from reaching the Congo and authorized the Secretary-General to use force if necessary to apprehend mercenaries and political advisers.

2. In addition to dealing a severe blow to Tshombe's secessionist ambitions, the main feature of the resolution was that it strengthened the hand of the Secretary-General in dealing with mercenaries in Katanga: he was specifically authorized to use force to apprehend them, and the resolution went further than previous ones by providing not only for their deportation, but also (presumably at UN discretion) for their detention pending legal action. This was designed to solve the problem of mercenaries returning to Katanga after they have been deported. It also held over them the threat that they may be handed over to the Central Government.

3. In a statement prior to the vote, U Thant said that he intended to discharge his responsibilities vis-à-vis the mercenaries with vigour and determination. At the same time, he warned that it would not be possible to concentrate all UN resources in Katanga in view of the unstable situation in other parts of the Congo. He appealed for additional troops, especially from African countries (Ghana has already responded). He also indicated that the UN would not take sides militarily between the Central Government and secessionists but would continue its efforts at conciliation. In this connection, he mentioned the possibility of appointing an individual of high standing to mediate between the Central Government and Katanga.

4. Mr. U Thant is expected to outline his plans for implementing the Security Council Resolution at a meeting of the Congo Advisory Committee this week. It would seem, however, that at least before the fighting mentioned below, he had been hoping to make one more attempt at conciliation before considering the use of force against the mercenaries.

5. Western consultations before and during the Security Council debate revealed a certain divergence of views between the United States and Britain. This was confirmed when the United States voted for the resolution while the United Kingdom (and France) abstained. While the United States has generally been prepared to accept a strong UN policy towards Katanga, the United Kingdom Government, under pressure from the popular press and financial interests has been reluctant to see force used against the mercenaries and has restated in strong terms its position that the role of the UN should be primarily to conciliate and pacify and that the differences between Tshombe and the Central Government must be settled through peaceful negotiations. In a way this amounts to a pro-Tshombe policy since any negotiations which take place while mercenaries remain in Katanga and Tshombe has not recognized the supremacy of President Kasavubu would find Tshombe in a strong position at the bargaining table. In short, it would seem that the United Kingdom in the past few months has tended to adopt a more "European" policy towards the Congo.

6. The immediate result of the Security Council resolution was to increase tension in Katanga, particularly amongst the gendarmerie who were angered at the prospect of a new UN drive to round up white volunteers. Tshombe condemned the resolution and called upon the population to be prepared to defend their homeland. A number of incidents followed his speech: two high-ranking UN officials were arrested and beaten by the Katanga gendarmerie; one Indian soldier was murdered and an officer kidnapped; eleven UN soldiers (mostly Swedes) were captured. These incidents appear to have been perpetrated without the specific authorization of the Katanga Government (presumably at the instigation of individuals who hoped to force the UN out of Katanga), and suggests that the Katanga authorities may no longer be able to control events.

7. On December 5 the Katanga gendarmerie set up a road block between Elisabethville and the local airport. After protracted and futile talks with Katanga ministers to have the road block lifted, the UN authorities on the spot decided to take military action to clear it. In the course of this action (which was successful), fighting broke out between UN forces and the Katanga troops. There were also reports of sniping by local Belgians. Faced with this situation U Thant authorized the UN forces to take all necessary action to ensure freedom of movement including the occupation of key points. Additional UN troops (Nigerian, Irish and Swedes) are being airlifted to Katanga with the help of United States aircraft in Leopoldville and UN (Indian) jet [bombers] are reported to have destroyed four Katanga aircraft on the ground at Kolwezi.

8. It seems clear that the current military action is related essentially to the protection of UN personnel and the UN Command in Katanga; in this respect, it is quite different from the action initiated by the UN last September which was connected with removing mercenaries. It is also clear that the UN action was taken only after every attempt had been made to reach agreement with the authorities in Katanga and after the situation regarding the security of UN personnel had become quite intolerable with individuals being picked off, held as hostages or killed.

9. Mr. Ritchie is confident that the Acting Secretary-General Mr. U Thant and his representative on the spot, Mr. Bryan Urquhart, will act with every possible restraint but with firmness in ensuring that all necessary measures were taken for the safety of UN troops; in this connection Mr. Urquhart is considered to be far less emotional and prejudiced than his predecessor, Dr. O'Brien.

10. Mr. Ritchie informs us that the report about abandonment of UN positions in Elisabethville is related to a deliberate policy of regrouping in order to concentrate on the essential points of communication, particularly the protection of the airport, in the interests of the best protection of UN personnel and the UN Command.

11. Although there may be some public outcry in Western countries and particularly in the UK, the forceful action of the UN should serve to restore its prestige with the Central Government and will benefit the moderates in Leopoldville. It will presumably be welcomed by the Afro-Asian member states and particularly the Indian contingent who have been smarting from the so-called victory of the Katanga forces last September and were in an highly excitable mood following the murder of the Indian soldier.

12. There may now be increased pressure on Tshombe to negotiate although it will be more difficult for him to do so without losing prestige. That he is anxious to negotiate was demonstrated when he tried to arrange a meeting with Adoula on an island in the Congo River during a recent stopover in Brazzaville. The main stumbling block is Adoula's insistence that the negotiations take place in Leopoldville and that Tshombe first recognize the loi fondamentale as the present constitution and Kasavubu as Chief of State of a united Congo. Tshombe, for his part, is afraid to go to Leopoldville and maintains that the loi fondamentale is no longer applicable in the present situation in the Congo. He will only recognize Kasavubu as President of a federation of sovereign states as agreed at Tananarive. In fact, Tshombe wants to protect his bargaining position by making it clear that he is sitting down with Adoula as an equal. What the present situation demands, therefore, is a face-saving formula for a meeting which will preserve the unity of the Congo and enable UN forces gradually to extricate themselves with their own prestige intact.

13. According to the latest information in the Department of National Defence the deployment of Canadian Army signallers in Katanga is 10 at Elisabethville, 11 at Kamina and 11 at Albertville. A party of Canadian air control personnel (4 officers and 6 airmen) arrived at Leopoldville on November 24. Some of them may have gone on to Luluabourg or Kamina. There has been no sign so far that Canada will be requested to send additional personnel as a result of the fighting in Katanga.

My dear Colleague:

On 24 October 1960, the Secretary-General, acting on a recommendation of the first United Nations Commander (Major General Von Horn), requested Canada to fill the Air Commander position in the rank of Air Commodore at Headquarters United Nations Force in the Congo. Canada accepted this commitment on the understanding that the tour of duty for this officer would be for a period of six months and that the filling of this position by a Canadian would be subject to review when he is due for replacement. I now consider that the Air Commander position should no longer be filled by a Royal Canadian Air Force Officer.

In accordance with the Security Council's resolution of 22 July 1960, the aim of the United Nations was to provide assistance with a view to preserving the unity, territorial integrity and political independence in the Congo in the interests of international peace and security. The main instrument of the United Nations, created for the maintenance of law and order and the protection of civilian life, was the United Nations Force. Realizing the importance of air transport to the fulfilment of the objective, the Secretary-General requested a large air transport force both for external and internal support. Canada responded quickly to this request by providing North Star aircraft for external support and plans were made for the provision of a rather large Canadian air contribution for internal support. For this reason, coupled with the fact that of all the countries contributing to the Air Transport force the Royal Canadian Air Force was the most experienced in directing large scale transport operations and the Headquarters Air Staff was to be largely Canadian, my predecessor recommended that Canada fill the Air Commander position.

The Security Council on 20-21 February 1961 enlarged the aim of the United Nations operations in the Congo to include the urgent purpose of countering the development of a serious civil war situation. Additionally there was evidence in the spring that fighter aircraft would be made available to the Katanga Air Force. In light of this and the fact that the Air Commander's staff did not reach predominately Canadian status, it was with some reluctance that I agreed in May 1961 to provide the Air Commander for a further six months.

On 21 September 1961, the United Nations decided to build an Air Force military component within the ONUC. Accordingly, the acting Secretary-General requested various countries to provide military air transport, jet fighters and jet bombers. These have been provided and consequently the Air Commander's staff will have to be enlarged which will result in a further dilution of Canadian content and if he is to be of maximum use to the United Nations Force Commander his responsibilities will have to be increased to include defensive and offensive military operations.

On 17 November 1961, the Security Council reaffirmed their resolution of last February and authorized the acting Secretary-General to use force in support of the Central Government. Following a breakdown in negotiations between Dr. Linner and the Katangan authorities, the former advised the acting Secretary-General that the situation had deteriorated sharply and that large scale incidents could be expected. The acting Secretary-General has now delegated authority to his representative to use force if required to effect the UN mandate. The ONUC aircraft, including the nine jet fighters and six jet bombers, are now engaged in support operations and the Katanga air force base at Kolwezi has been attacked.

The above review points out the changing role of the United Nations Force in the Congo. The original requirement for an Air Commander experienced in large scale Air Transport operations has clearly been overtaken by events. In fact the present situation is such that I believe that the accepted international principle of the country supplying the largest force also provides the Commander should be adopted by the United Nations.

For the reasons stated, I strongly recommend that upon completion of the present Air Commander's tour of duty this position no longer be accepted by Canada.

Yours sincerely,

DOUGLAS S. HARKNESS

CONGO – REPLACEMENT FOR A/C MORRISON

Attached is a letter from the Minister of National Defence which is dated December 7, 1961 but was received during your stay in Paris. As you will see, Mr. Harkness argues strongly that the position of Air Commander in the United Nations Force in the Congo should no longer be filled by an RCAF officer. He has recommended that, on the completion of A/C Morrison's tour of duty, "this position no longer be accepted by Canada."

2. We are informed that A/C Morrison's tour ends on January 4, 1962, but that the RCAF wishes to have him repatriated in the last days of December. The U.N. Secretariat has already requested us to provide a replacement for him. Our letter to Air Chief Marshal Miller,[†] endorsing the Secretariat's request, crossed with Mr. Harkness' letter. General McEoin has informed Mr. Ritchie in New York that he was highly satisfied with A/C Morrison's performance in the Congo and there is little doubt that the U.N. is relying on us to keep him, or appoint somebody of like ability, to command the U.N. air operations which are playing such a vital role in the Congo.

3. Several reasons occur to me why it would be to Canada's interest to have this position filled by a Canadian for a further period. The Air Commander is in a favourable position to watch over the safety and welfare of Canadian troops serving in the Congo in widely scattered locations. Not only would he quickly learn about trouble when it occurred, but he would be in a key position to notify the Canadian authorities in Ottawa and take appropriate action on the spot to evacuate Canadian personnel or otherwise assist them. Also the U.N. might find it very difficult to recruit elsewhere a suitably qualified replacement who would be politically acceptable. The appointment of a less fully qualified Air Commander could seriously affect the morale of our personnel in the Congo.

4. The argument that the "accepted international principle" is that the country supplying the largest force should also provide the Commander, referred to in Mr. Harkness' letter, has not always been followed by the U.N., particularly in the case of General Burns. Other political considerations must be taken into account when a U.N. Commander is selected.

5. Whatever the pros and cons which may be put forward on the question of the advisability in general of the selection of a Canadian for this post, it is obvious that in the present circumstances the decision will have to be taken in the light of the current developments in Katanga. We have little information on the role exercised by A/C Morrison in the operations in Katanga. His main responsibility is to keep U.N. aircraft operational, whether they be transport or combat. It seems likely that the day-to-day control of the combatant aircraft in Katanga would be the responsibility of the local Commander, Brigadier Raja. There is little doubt, however, that A/C Morrison cannot have escaped being involved to some extent in the U.N. air operations in Katanga. These operations have become the object of controversy, as you know. However, on December 14, the Prime Minister stated to the press that –

"It is our understanding that recent U.N. action in Katanga is the result of a series of provocative acts and was taken only when all efforts to discuss the situation with Katanga authorities had failed. It is also our understanding that the main purpose of the U.N. action is to assure safety of U.N. personnel in Katanga and to ensure freedom of movement without which it cannot carry out its mandate in the Congo."

A/C Morrison's return at this time might, therefore, be interpreted as an expression of the Canadian Government's disapproval of the U.N.'s current operations in Katanga and as a variance with this statement. Moreover, this would, I think, be an inauspicious moment to replace the Air Commander by an officer who would not have had time to familiarize himself with local conditions at a particularly difficult time.

6. For these reasons, I believe that the repatriation of A/C Morrison should be postponed for three months, by the end of which time the situation will be clearer and a decision taken on the merits of appointing a Canadian replacement without having to take into account the exceptional circumstances of the present hour.

7. You may wish to raise this matter personally with Mr. Harkness. Alternatively, we attach for your consideration a possible letter† to him which incorporates some of the arguments mentioned above.²⁴

UNITED NATIONS OPERATION IN KATANGA

You will recall our discussion with the Under-Secretary about this subject. In the attached memorandum, which should be regarded as a draft, I have tried to set down the main considerations which appear to have a bearing on the current situation in Katanga. The assessment is based on the point of view of United Nations Division and you may not agree entirely with the general approach of the paper. However, I hope that it may be of some value in preparing a Departmental position, possibly for presentation to the Minister on his return to Ottawa.

2. I shall be glad to discuss the matter further at your convenience. Presumably, if a position paper is prepared for Ministerial approval, it may be desirable to have further consultation involving the other Divisions to which this memorandum has been sent for information.

*Note de la Direction des Nations Unies
Memorandum by United Nations Division*

SECRET. CANADIAN EYES ONLY.

UNITED NATIONS OPERATION IN KATANGA

The most recent outbreak of fighting in Katanga, between United Nations forces and the Katanga gendarmerie, makes it very desirable to reassess the United Nations operation in that province and in the Congo generally. Already the repercussions of the fighting are very serious for the United Nations itself and for several member governments, especially the United Kingdom and Belgium. Perhaps the most disquieting factor in the present situation is that the United Nations has announced no clear aims and no plan for the immediate future. Ostensibly the fighting is intended to ensure that the United Nations military force in Katanga has freedom of communications and movement. There is more than a suggestion, however, that in the armed conflict the Katangese forces will be shattered and that Mr. Tshombe will be obliged to enter into negotiations with the United Nations and with the Central Government of the Congo.

2. An added worry is the continued activity of white mercenaries. According to the United Nations sources, they continue to be the rallying force behind the armed resistance of Katanga and that, in doing so, they are the paid agents of the Union Minière. The indications are that the eviction of the mercenaries, called for by the Security Council resolution of February 21, 1961, would be virtually impossible, even if the United Nations had sufficient military strength at its disposal, because individual mercenaries or small groups of them could conceal themselves in the jungle and in the guise of civilians employed by private companies. Besides, any detailed search for mercenaries by the United Nations could easily develop into a witch hunt with an anti-white bias.

3. There is also the threat that if the fighting continues and if the United Nations seems to be getting the upper hand, the expensive installations of the Union Minière, including mines, power stations, dams and other facilities, will be destroyed. Some reports say that this "scorched earth" policy would be carried out by Tshombe's followers but others suggest that the Union Minière, perhaps acting through the mercenaries, would destroy its own facilities rather than have them fall into the hands of the Central Government. The Union Minière seem convinced that the Central Government would at once nationalise all the industrial holdings of the Company in Katanga. Destruction of the extensive facilities would, of course, be a severe blow to the whole economy of the Congo.

4. Another disturbing factor is that, in concentrating its military force in Katanga, the United Nations is spread very thinly in other parts of the Congo. This could play into the hands of Lumumba followers and particularly Mr. Gizenga. At an appropriate time, he might be tempted to make another move to establish himself either in Orientale province or in Kivu. He might make a move against the Central Government. Even if no such attempt were made, there is a risk that with the prolongation of the Katanga situation, the Adoula Government would collapse, opening an opportunity for Gizenga. This possibility undoubtedly enters into the calculations of the Soviet Union and perhaps of some of the Casablanca powers. In the circumstances, it is most desirable that the Central Government should not divert its attention from other problems in the Congo by attempting to force an outcome in its favour in Katanga.

Objectives

5. The foreseeable objectives in the Congo should be as follows:

(a) As soon as possible, negotiations between Adoula and Tshombe should be arranged. Adoula and Tshombe need each other to preserve the strength they need to offset the influence of Gizenga. If a mediation effort is needed, it can probably not be made by the United Nations because undoubtedly the fighting in Katanga has eliminated any beneficial influence which the United Nations might have on Tshombe. This probably applies as well to most of the countries participating in the United Nations operation but especially to those whose troops are actively engaged in Katanga. Many of the African states would fall into this category, although not the Brazzaville group.

(b) The United Nations military operation in Katanga must achieve quick success. This means primarily that the immediate military aims should be limited and that they should be clearly enunciated. It seems desirable that, in the process of achieving these aims, the United Nations should ensure that the gendarmerie and the mercenaries are effectively brought under control so that they are unable to regroup in future for another armed contest. Some other means than direct eviction by the United Nations must be found to eliminate or reduce the threat from the mercenaries.

(c) The Union Minière should be persuaded to drop its continued opposition to the United Nations and to see that the United Nations is perhaps the only attainable assurance that the Union Minière will not lose the whole of its investment in Katanga. The Company will be more readily persuaded on this score if it can secure some kind of assurance from the Central Government that immediate nationalization will not follow the reintegration of Katanga into the Congo Republic. Private conversations between the Union Minière and the Adoula Government might be the best means for trying to bring about this result.

(d) The prestige and influence of the United Nations should be restored not only in the Congo and Africa but in a general sense. This implies that all member states should make every effort to bring about an early Congo solution which would redound to the credit of the United Nations. It could be very serious for the United Nations if there should develop, because of the present fighting in Katanga, a sharp debate which would bring to the surface the doubts, differences and disagreements about the conduct of the Congo operation. It would be especially serious if major countries in Western Europe took sharp issue with the Acting Secretary-General, with the African-Asian states and possibly with the United States as well. The Soviet Union would benefit from rifts of this kind; the Western powers would probably suffer severely; and the United Nations might be dangerously weakened, all this at a time when the Organization is desperately trying to rally support for financing methods urgently needed to meet peace-keeping costs.

Canadian Policy Considerations

6. In the current situation, the main Canadian policy considerations appear to be:

(a) to continue to support the United Nations effort in the Congo so that, with United Nations assistance, the Congolese can achieve a peaceful settlement.

(b) to ensure, as far as possible, that United Nations personnel, especially Canadians, serving with the United Nations in the Congo are adequately protected.

(c) to use Canadian influence with the United Nations, with the parties directly concerned and with friendly states to encourage peaceful reconciliation in the Congo.

(d) to seek to preserve the United Nations capacity for peace-keeping by helping it maintain its prestige and influence in the Congo dilemma.

7. If these considerations are applied to the actual fighting in Katanga, they suggest that Canadian influence in the Advisory Committee and elsewhere in the United Nations should be to encourage the Acting-Secretary-General to define as clearly as possible the limited objectives which the United Nations is now seeking in Katanga and to relate these to the general United Nations objective of attaining a peaceful reconciliation for the whole Congo. Canadian representatives should also urge that the fighting be brought to a halt as soon as the United Nations position is made secure and that, in the meantime, every effort should be made to minimize bloodshed and destruction from United Nations action. In presenting these views, however, Canadian spokesmen should be careful not to create the impression that Canada's support for the United Nations operation is diminishing in any way. In all probability, the Western powers will be closely watched by the African-Asians for any sign that they are weakening in their resolve to ensure that the Congo is reintegrated with United Nations assistance. Sharp criticism could be expected if Canada appeared to equivocate in the current situation.

8. Perhaps even before the fighting stops in Katanga, some further move should be made to make contact between Adoula and Tshombe. At the moment it is not clear which country could act as intermediary; perhaps a small group would be required. The alternative would be to choose some individual with an established international reputation. Again a suitable candidate might not be easily found.

9. The key to the problem created by the activities of the mercenaries probably lies in persuading the Union Minière that they cannot hope to gain anything by continuing their opposition to the United Nations. Their only hope of maintaining viable business operations in the Congo depends on an agreement with the Central Government and possibly with provincial authorities, concerning the future of the Company in Katanga. This agreement could be underwritten to some extent by the United Nations, that is, the United Nations would seek in its future relations with the Central Government to persuade them to co-operate with Union Minière. Presumably the United Nations will have a sizeable role in the Congo for some time to come because of the essential need for economic aid and technical assistance from international sources. If some way could be found to give the Union Minière assurance of this kind, they might be better disposed toward the United Nations operations in the Congo and change their position from last-ditch opposition to co-operation. This should mean that the activities of mercenaries would virtually cease or at least be reduced to manageable proportions.

10. This memorandum contains a current assessment based on known factors, which could change quickly because of the pace of developments in Katanga and elsewhere in the Congo. The assessment is based on the point of view of United Nations Division.

SITUATION IN KATANGA

The military situation in Elisabethville is moving towards a climax. For the past forty-eight hours the UN has been engaged in a ground offensive aimed at a series of limited objectives to regain control of the city. Reports indicate that morale is flagging amongst the gendarmerie and that without the mercenaries there would be little fight left in them, although it is always possible because of tribal loyalties that they might take to the bush. The UN does not envisage a formal cease fire but would be willing to co-operate in creating an atmosphere for a meeting between Adoula and Tshombe by stopping all action except for absolute minimum self-defence, once their minimum objectives have been reached and it was clear that Tshombe has abandoned his defiance.

2. U Thant and President Kennedy have made parallel efforts to arrange a meeting between Adoula and Tshombe. U Thant has authorized Bunche, who is in the Congo on his way back from the Tanganyika Independence celebrations, and Gardiner (Ghana) to try to mediate and President Kennedy, in response to an appeal from Tshombe to call a cease fire, has designated the United States Ambassador in Leopoldville (Gullion) as his personal representative for this purpose. The present idea seems to be that Bunche will talk to Tshombe while Gullion tackles Adoula. Since Adoula does not return to Leopoldville from Kivu until Sunday and Tshombe is reported to have moved to Kipusi, a mining town on the Rhodesian border, it may be some time before such a meeting can be arranged, if at all.

3. The United Nations appear to be losing some ground with public opinion in the United States and perhaps in certain Canadian circles, as a result of the emphasis which is being placed on the anti-Communist and self-determination aspects of the Katanga case. A Citizens Committee for Aid to Katanga Freedom Fighters has been formed in New York and United States policy on Katanga was the object of a partisan attack yesterday by the Chairman of the Republican National Committee. It would seem, therefore, that unless the fighting can be brought to an end soon it will be more and more difficult to maintain public support for the UN action.

4. France and Congo (Brazzaville) have denied their air space to UN aircraft bringing troops or munitions to the Congo. Brazzaville has called for an urgent meeting of the Security Council but we understand there is no support for this from any of the permanent members or from the Afro-Asian group in general.

5. The Congo Advisory Committee met this morning and a report from New York is expected Sunday. In general the discussion was not controversial and the Africans took a surprisingly restrained view of things. There was general recognition that although the immediate objectives were military they would inevitably have political consequences. In this connection Brigadier Rikhye warned against expecting an overall military victory for the UN. The military operation could only create a situation conducive to a political solution. The Committee recognized the necessity for talks between Adoula and Tshombe but not at the price of a premature cease fire. U Thant was in favour of such talks provided:

- (a) Adoula approved, and
- (b) Tshombe did not insist on conditions.

Everyone praised the United States position (supported by Canada and Norway) and were extremely critical of the British and French. U Thant announced that Tunisia has agreed to send 300 troops to the Congo immediately.

6. Attached for your information are copies of the latest telegrams† and also a draft statement which we understand the Prime Minister used to-day.²⁵

CONFIDENTIAL

VISIT OF CONGOLESE DELEGATION TO CANADA, DECEMBER 4-6, 1961

The visit of the Congolese Delegation, having been cancelled twice, was uncertain until the arrival of the visitors at the airport in Ottawa. For this reason, the visit started in a state of confusion quite similar to that existing in the Congo.

3. After a brief call at Mr. Cadieux's office, where Mr. Cadieux officially welcomed the Congolese Delegation to Canada and expressed to them the best wishes of the Canadian Government, a meeting was held with External Affairs Officers, under the Chairmanship of Mr. Cadieux. Mr. Kapongo, Leader of the Delegation, gave a resumé of the present situation in the Congo. The points which he developed were explained with different emphasis during the various calls of the visit. They are as follows:

- (a) Katanga is not the richest Province in the Congo but is the most exploited; indeed Kasai is richer in natural resources but unfortunately these resources have not so far been put into use,
- (b) The Central Government will do whatever possible to come to an agreement with the Katangese Government. Negotiations are given priority but if negotiations prove useless the Central Government would approve the use of force to bring Tshombe to the conference table. The Central Government supports the United Nations action in the Congo and is grateful for the help so far accorded to the Congo by the United Nations,
- (c) There is no Gizenga problem in the Congo. Unfortunately too much publicity is given in the Western press to Gizenga's role in both Orientale Province and in the Central Government. This tends to give Gizenga a stature that he does not actually have,

²⁵ La déclaration a été communiquée à la presse le samedi 16 décembre, mais il semble qu'aucun journal canadien d'importance ne l'ait publiée.

The statement was issued to the press on Saturday, December 16, but no major Canadian newspapers seem to have printed it.

(d) The Congo has been colonized by Belgium but the Congo has been educated by the Congolese. When the Belgians accorded independence to the Congo there were only 30 people with a university degree. Under the Belgians it was virtually impossible to receive any education beyond the secondary level. This was not due to a lack of Congolese talent but to an intentional Belgian policy of limiting the educational facilities. Although the Congolese could have much resentment against Belgium, they were willing to re-establish diplomatic relations with them and ask for their assistance in many fields.

4. In reply to questions Mr. Kapongo and Mr. Dericoyard stated that the Federal system in the Congo would probably be the best solution to the existing problems. The provincial governments would be given very broad powers, leaving to the federal government, Finance, external affairs, excise and customs duties, national defence, justice and a few other powers which they did not mention. The revenue of the Central Government would come from taxes imposed on the population and business of the federal capital with a 50% part of customs and excise duties. The other 50% going to the provinces in order to stimulate them to export.

5. Mr. Dericoyard also pointed out that the Congo could not afford to lose Mr. Tshombe because he was a competent leader and that since there was not an overflow of competent people in the Congo, Tshombe was much needed. Because of Mr. Kapongo's uncertain pronunciation a good part of what he said was lost.

6. The visit of the Parliament Buildings proved very instructive. The Congolese were quite impressed by the fact that pictures of members of both the Opposition and the Government were displayed on the walls. This, they mentioned, was real democracy, since members of the Opposition were not put in oblivion but could share their part of public recognition.

7. They particularly enjoyed the call on Mr. Sévigny. During the call Mr. Dericoyard (during the trip he was the dominant figure) was the main exponent of the Congo situation. He explained to Mr. Sévigny why the Congo could not become Communist. The land, he said, belongs to the people. The Congolese people are very traditionally minded and would not wish to change their ways of living to adopt a completely new system. He pointed out that the Congolese were very religious and that Catholicism and Communism obviously could not get along.

8. Mr. Dericoyard and the other members of the Delegation obviously made a very strong impression on Mr. Sévigny who vaguely promised that he would take the cause to the highest authorities and that he himself would visit the Congo. On his return he would be able to give to both the Canadian Government and the Canadian people a true and realistic picture of what is needed in the Congo.

9. The official luncheon given by the Canadian Government was presided over by Mr. Cadieux and was very lively.

10. A press conference was then held in the suite of the Congolese Delegation at the Chateau Laurier. The Congolese pointed out with very strong emphasis that the Western press had given a false picture of the Congo. Most of the journalists who come from the United States and Canada and who report on the situation cannot speak French and because of that they are all confused with the statements made by our leaders. They in turn give a wrong interpretation of events taking place in our country. There are some very difficult problems in the Congo, they would say, for instance, there is a province which wants to secede, but Canada has the same problem with Quebec. At that point, a journalist remarked that the comparison between Katanga and Quebec had some grounds since Katanga was the richest province of the Congo! The journalists did not seem to approve or appreciate the remarks of the Congolese and left the suite in a rather bad temper.

11. The call on Mr. Day was not very productive. As Mr. Day had explained to us before the meeting, there was not much the External Aid Office could offer to the Congo. Indeed this year no money out of the $300,000 given to French-speaking Africa would be given to the Congo and it is uncertain whether there would be any next year. However, the Congolese explained to Mr. Day what their needs were and in turn Mr. Day gave them some words of encouragement saying that the External Aid Office would give sympathetic consideration to their problems and needs.

12. The journey in the train to Montreal was fairly pleasant, the Congolese attracting a good deal of attention since it was quite a discovery for many passengers to hear black people speaking French.

13. The Montreal visit started with a call on the Rector of the University of Montreal. After the Congolese had explained their needs, M. Lussier pointed out that although there were quite a few French-speaking universities in Canada, not all of them could supply professors to the Congo. He mentioned, however, that the University of Montreal, together with Laval University and the University of Ottawa could probably spare a few professors to help the Congo. The visit at the University of Montreal was rather short since the Congolese Delegation had an appointment with business men belonging to the Chamber of Commerce of Montreal, before the luncheon offered by this group to the Congolese.

14. The luncheon was the last weekly one for this year and because the Chamber of Commerce of Montreal celebrates its 75th Anniversary and that CBC celebrates its 25th Anniversary, they had arranged for the popular morning programme Chez Miville to be made during the luncheon. The Congolese sat at the table of honour and were presented to the audience of about 350 people during the programme. They enjoyed the luncheon very much, for it gave them the opportunity of being present at the production of a radio programme.

15. The visit at CBC/IS which was supposed to last 1½ hours lasted 3½ hours. The cordial welcome extended to the Congolese by Mr. Marcotte and the team of CBC/IS was very engaging. A programme of half an hour was produced for re-transmission in the Congo. Each member of the Delegation was given a record of the programme and a pamphlet on CBC/IS.

16. Mr. Kapongo then appeared on the TV programme Carrefour which reviews the events of the day in Montreal. He was interviewed by Mr. Jean Hamelin who asked him questions related to the Congo.

17. Mr. Jean Marc Léger, President of Le Comité Afrique-Canada offered a private dinner to the Congolese. He had invited members of the Committee and also the two Congolese students in Montreal. The conversation as usual was very lively, Mr. Dericoyard making the most of it. Mr. Léger outlined briefly the aims of his Committee. He intends to have a meeting in February which would assemble in Montreal all the French-speaking African diplomats in Washington and New York. His Committee is also planning to open a welcome centre in Montreal for French-speaking African students and residents. As President of the Comité Afrique-Canada and as Journalist for Le Devoir he will keep in touch with Mr. Kasongo in New York.

18. The visit in Quebec started very early. The Congolese Delegation were shown Quebec City by Mr. Barnard, the Director of Public Relations of Laval University. They called on Mgr. Vachon, Rector of Laval University, who had just come back from a trip to French-speaking Africa which included the Congo. He announced that there would be an exchange of professors between Laval University and Lovanium University and that most probably Laval University would provide more professors than it would get in return.

19. A press conference was held in Mr. Barnard's office which, in contrast with that held in Ottawa, was very friendly. Luncheon was given by Laval University and was attended by the Deans of a few Faculties and some "Maristes" Fathers. The Congolese, having been educated by Maristes Fathers, were quite pleased to meet people of the same Order.

20. In the afternoon the Congolese paid a call on M. René Tremblay, Deputy Minister of Industry and Commerce. Mr. Tremblay expressed a special interest in knowing more about the possibilities of investments in the Congo, and asked the Congolese to send him all the legislation governing such investments.

21. After a brief meeting with Law students at Laval University the Congolese departed Quebec City to go back to New York via Montreal. They were obviously very pleased with their trip to Canada and they particularly enjoyed their stay in Quebec City. There, they would say, they found the Latin exuberance which they like and which they feel they also possess. It was quite a change after New York where, because of language difficulties, they lived a monastic life, being unable to talk to anyone.

22. Some of Mr. Dericoyard's remarks made in the course of the many conversations I had with him might be worth recording. Mr. Dericoyard, as I mentioned above, was the strong figure in the Delegation. He told me that if, when he goes back to the Congo after the UN Session, the Katanga problem has not yet been settled, he would try to become the Minister of Defence and then, according to him, the problem would soon be a thing of the past. He would be a candidate at the 1964 Presidential election.

23. Their visit was, I think, very successful. The Congolese had come to Canada with very limited knowledge of our country and left it with a spirit of gratitude for the cordial welcome which had been extended to them.

CONGO

This is to confirm that on the evening of December 23 a telegram arrived from U Thant addressed to the Prime Minister in the following terms:

“The central government of the Republic of the Congo, Leopoldville, has appealed urgently for assistance to train its army and as first step has asked the United Nations to establish an Officers' Training School. You no doubt are aware of the immediate need to train Congolese officers.

I therefore sincerely hope that the Government of Canada would make available fifteen French-speaking officers to provide the instructor establishment for an Officers' Training School for the Congolese Army.”

2. On the morning of December 24, I gave this message to the Prime Minister and subsequently to Messrs. Ignatieff and Campbell. The Prime Minister's instructions were that the Departments concerned should prepare a paper which could be discussed on Thursday, December 28.

CONGO – REQUEST FOR MILITARY TRAINING ASSISTANCE

I understand that a direct appeal to you has been made by the Acting Secretary-General of the United Nations for assistance in training the Congolese National Army, specifically asking that fifteen Canadian French-speaking officers be provided as instructors for an officers' training school.

An indication that the United Nations had in mind setting up such a school was given last September when twelve member governments were asked as to what assistance they might be able to provide for such a project. Because of the fighting which broke out shortly afterwards in Katanga, and which opened up difficult issues regarding the role of the U.N., no response was forthcoming from any of the governments approached.

The following considerations are relevant:

(1) U Thant has made it his goal to wind up the Congo operation in 1962. This can only be done if the Congolese Army is in a position to maintain law and order. The first step toward this goal is to train suitable officers for the Congolese Army to enable it to become a reliable and disciplined force. By responding affirmatively to U Thant's request we should be advancing the date of termination of Canada's military commitment.

(2) A positive response would be consistent with our policy of support for the U.N. operation in the Congo and our policy to do what we can to enable the Congolese Government progressively to assume responsibility for its own affairs.

(3) Canada has provided Canadian officers to Ghana and will probably do the same for Nigeria. A favourable reply to U Thant would give further evidence that our assistance to Africa is not exclusively to English-speaking countries.

(4) Canada represents one of the very few acceptable sources of French-speaking instructors. Canadian officers would represent an important factor of Western influence in the Congolese Army.

CANADIAN ASSISTANCE TO ESTABLISH AN
OFFICERS' TRAINING SCHOOL IN THE CONGO

1. It is understood that you have received a request from the Secretary-General of the United Nations for Canada to provide fifteen French-speaking officer instructors to be the staff of an officer training school to train Congolese national officers.

2. We have in the past received indications that some plan for training the Congolese national forces was being considered by the UN. A General Iyassu, who we understand is an Ethiopian, has been in the Congo for some time as the designated head of a UN training mission. General Iyassu, in discussing his problems with the Canadian Representative in the Congo, has indicated that he would like Canadian help in the form of a lieutenant-colonel to be adviser or deputy to the Congolese Commandant of a training school. He also indicated a requirement for four majors or captains to be general military instructors and four sergeants familiar with clerical duties: all these personnel to be French-speaking. In addition he has indicated a requirement for a French-speaking colonel to fill the position of assistant adviser to the Congolese Minister of Defence and another French-speaking colonel to be adviser to the Congolese General Staff. Whether or not the proposals set out by General Iyassu bear any relation to the request you have now received is not known.

3. From the point of view of this Department, the provision of additional French-speaking officers for the Congo will be most difficult. We already have to provide thirty-eight Army officers to the Congo, the majority of whom must be French-speaking; and we also have a requirement for French-speaking officers for the International Truce Commission in Indo-China and for certain of our commitments for NATO staff officers. As living conditions in the Congo are difficult, the medical staff of the Department consider that a length of tour of six months in the Congo is all that can be expected if reasonable safeguards are to be maintained. Additionally we cannot expect our limited number of French-speaking personnel to be rotated to the Congo at frequent intervals. The result is that for every French-speaking soldier in the Congo we should have a back-up of about four or five for proper rotation.

4. Because of the uncertainties of the Congo situation and the day-to-day shifts that are occurring there, it is the view of this Department that we should not undertake this commitment until much more is known of what the United Nations intends in any training scheme. We would not wish to become involved in the machinations of the Congolese Army and we would not wish to be put in the position of supplying white officers for the Congolese national troops. Unless the United Nations can give some firm assurance that this would not happen, it is considered that we should not have any part in any such proposal.

5. It should be pointed out that this Department considers that the problem of training the Congolese national army is not instruction in arms but is one of instilling the basic military disciplines that will enable the Congolese Army to be welded into an effective instrument of government policy. With the background of the personnel there, this is going to be a long and difficult operation. It is not one that can be achieved overnight and Canadian involvement, once undertaken, would probably continue for a very long time.

6. It is recommended therefore that we do not make any immediate commitment in response to this request but that we explore further what the United Nations are attempting to do in this matter so that a sound judgment can be arrived at in the light of the difficulties and unknown factors outlined above.

7. This paper has not been cleared with the Minister of National Defence but it does represent his views as discussed with him prior to his departure for Western Canada.

U.N. REQUEST FOR CANADIAN INSTRUCTORS
FOR OFFICERS' TRAINING SCHOOL IN THE CONGO

11. The Secretary of State for External Affairs said that the Acting Secretary-General of the United Nations had requested that Canada provide 15 French-speaking officer instructors to be the staff of an officers' training school to train Congolese national officers.

U Thant was aiming to conclude the U.N.'s operations in the Congo during 1962, and officer training was a necessary first step toward the achievement of this objective. This would also help to bring an end to Canada's military commitment in this area. Canada had agreed to send about 30 military personnel to Ghana and would probably send others to Nigeria, and such Canadian assistance should not be confined to the English-speaking countries. Few countries other than Canada were in a position to offer acceptable French-speaking personnel to help the Congo.

12. The Associate Minister of National Defence said that it would be difficult for the Canadian Army to meet this request. If the government decided that the officers should be supplied, it should be clearly specified that they would be on loan for a period of perhaps 6 or 12 months. Climatic conditions in the Congo were hard for Canadians to bear for longer periods.

13. The Prime Minister said that he had received a report on the subject from the Chairman of the Chiefs of Staff, stating that the provision of these officers would be most difficult. Canada was already providing 38 Army officers to the Congo, and also required French-speaking officers for the International Truce Commission in Indo-China and for NATO staff. Unless the period of posting to the Congo was relatively short, a back-up of four or five French-speaking soldiers would be needed for every soldier in the Congo for proper rotation. Air Chief Marshall Miller suggested that the commitment should not be undertaken until much more was known of the U.N. intentions for the training scheme. Canada should not in any circumstances be put in the position of supplying white officers for Congolese national troops.

14. The Cabinet,

(a) noted a request from the Secretary-General of the United Nations asking that Canada provide 15 French-speaking officer instructors as the staff of an officers' training school to train Congolese national officers; and

(b) agreed to give further consideration to the request at another meeting of the Cabinet when the Minister of National Defence was present.

[Ottawa], January 3, 1962

CANADIAN MILITARY ASSISTANCE TO THE UNITED NATIONS IN THE CONGO

On January 2, Brigadier Rikhye telephoned me from New York about two United Nations requests for Canadian military assistance to the operation in the Congo. Rikhye said that the Secretary-General had asked him to make the call because U Thant was very concerned about the two matters.

2. The first concerned the replacement for A/C Morrison. Rikhye said that Morrison's contribution to ONUC had been outstanding and that, without him, the United Nations air transport would have been unable to function, especially during the very difficult days in December when air transportation was essential to the purpose of maintaining the United Nations military forces in Katanga. Rikhye emphasized that the United Nations command had become accustomed to dealing with RCAF officers on air matters and that the smoothest co-operation had been possible because the RCAF officers "understood the United Nations." It was most desirable at this time to keep these working arrangements intact because of the delicate and difficult phase through which the Congo operation was passing.

3. Rikhye said that it might be possible to find an air commander in some other country but that the Secretary-General and other senior United Nations officials were very reluctant to look elsewhere at this time. For this reason, the United Nations had been disturbed by the negative Canadian reply to the request for a replacement for Morrison. The Secretary-General and his advisers believed that they should make a further effort to persuade the Canadian authorities to reconsider. Accordingly, the Secretary-General was contemplating a direct appeal to the Prime Minister. Presumably this may be expected in the near future.

4. United Nations officials were also worried about the question of establishing a training school in the Congo for the ANC. Prime Minister Adoula had been pressing very hard for the establishment of this officers school and had set a deadline for January 15. His threat was that if the United Nations did not act in this matter within the next two weeks, he would look elsewhere, because it was essential to provide training facilities for ANC officers.

5. Rikhye re-emphasized that the United Nations was prepared to employ recently-retired officers and that their terms of service should be satisfactory. The civilian equivalent in the United Nations would be a professional officers, grade 3 or 4. While serving in the Congo, the instructors would receive a liberal per diem. Rikhye expressed the hope that there would be a favourable Canadian reply to the United Nations request for instructors.

6. I undertook to inform the appropriate officers of the Department about Rikhye's enquiry. Yesterday, I spoke to Mr. Campbell and to Mr. Robinson.

New York, January 3, 1962

Air transport plays a vital role in the United Nations operations in the Congo. Since September 1961, three jet fighter units have also been added to ONUC for defensive purposes. The Air Commodore in charge of air units must be an officer with sufficient operational and technical experience to direct a large air transport fleet of aeroplanes and helicopters, jet fighters and commercial aircraft under charter. Since the start of the United Nations operations, we have had the benefit of successive Royal Canadian Air Force officers in command of ONUC air units, each of whom has made a valuable contribution in the organization and employment of these units.

The present situation in the Congo continues to demand highly efficient air units in support of the United Nations force. I most earnestly appeal to you, therefore, to find it possible to replace Air Commander Morrison, who has rendered outstanding service in that position, with an RCAF officer of similar qualities.

CONGO – REPLACEMENT FOR A/C MORRISON AS U.N. AIR COMMANDER

I understand you have asked for the comments of this Department covering the urgent request sent to you by the Acting Secretary-General of the United Nations that Canada should provide a replacement for Air Commodore Morrison as Air Commander for the U.N. operations in the Congo.

2. This matter has been the subject of correspondence between the Ministers of External Affairs and National Defence since the beginning of December when the first U.N. request to extend Morrison's tour of duty or to replace him with a Canadian of equivalent qualifications was first raised. National Defence, for reasons which no doubt they will be putting to you, have been unable to accede to the request of the U.N. As a result the U.N. was informed on December 28 that A/C Morrison's duties in the Congo would have to terminate not later than January 15 and that Canada could no longer fulfil this U.N. requirement. U Thant has now decided to appeal directly to you to reconsider that decision.

3. The reasons which led the Minister to recommend a favourable reply to the U.N. were as follows:

(a) The Air Commander was in a favourable position to watch over the safety and welfare of Canadian troops serving in the Congo in widely scattered locations. Not only would he quickly learn about trouble when it occurred, but he would be in a key position to notify the Canadian authorities in Ottawa and take appropriate action on the spot to evacuate Canadian personnel or otherwise assist them. In this connection, it could also be noted that A/C Morrison had played an important role in securing the release of the RCAF Yukon aircraft which was seized by Congolese troops at Leopoldville airport last November.

(b) The U.N. might find it very difficult to recruit elsewhere a suitably qualified replacement who could be politically acceptable, especially since this replacement would have to be made at very short notice; Brigadier Rikhye mentioned that the United Nations had established very satisfactory arrangements along Canadian lines for its air transport in the Congo and were anxious to continue this working cooperation.

(c) Both the U.N. and the U.S.A. Government (see Washington letter No. 1700 attached)† have stated how highly satisfied they were with A/C Morrison's performance in the Congo. There was little doubt that the U.N. were relying on Canada to keep him or to appoint somebody of like ability, to command the U.N. air operations which are playing such a vital role in the Congo.

(d) It was obvious that a decision would have to be taken in the light of the current developments in Katanga. A/C Morrison's return to Canada at this time could be interpreted as an expression of the Canadian Government's disapproval of the U.N.'s current operations in Katanga and as at variance with your statement on December 14.

4. While the comments given to the Minister of National Defence by the Secretary of State for External Affairs were prepared at the time when the situation in Katanga was at its most serious, we believe that they are still valid. The present apparent lull in that area may be temporary and peace could be disturbed by any incident between U.N. and Katangese troops.

5. In the light of the foregoing and of the Acting Secretary-General's telegram to you, you may wish to consider whether a temporary extension of Morrison's tour of duty for say three months might be advisable to give all concerned further time in which to review the situation.

 MILITARY TRAINING ASSISTANCE FOR THE CONGO
 (Previous reference December 28, 1961)

10. The Secretary of State for External Affairs again reported that the Acting Secretary-General of the United Nations was anxious to withdraw U.N. troops from the Congo this coming summer. In order to do this the Congolese forces would have to be better trained to take over responsibility. The U.N. accordingly needed a number of French-speaking officers to direct and carry on the training of military officers for the Congo. A request had been made for 15 such officers as Canada was one of the few acceptable sources for French-speaking instructors. This was a compliment to Canada. Such a contribution would boost Canada's prestige in the U.N. It would similarly be a matter of pride for Quebec to have such an important role.

11. The Minister of National Defence pointed out that Canada had already supplied the Congo with some 38 French-speaking officers. Canadian forces were spread all over the world at present and the army was now too short-handed to undertake this additional task. Canadian officers had been requested in Nigeria and Ghana in Africa. Service in the African climate required fairly quick rotation. Rotation on a 15 months basis would be too long and would raise the question of sending over dependents. Reports indicated that this would be most inadvisable in the Congo. On the other hand, rotation on a 6 months basis did not provide sufficient stability and continuity. Either programme called for a substantial number of trained officers. Moreover, Air Commodore Morrison, who was in Canada on leave from the Congo, estimated that the training programme proposed might last any where from four to ten years. Furthermore, a non-commissioned officers course seemed to be what was required at this stage. General Iyassu, who initiated the scheme, although highly intelligent, had had no military training and was not considered a military expert.

He recommended that the request should not be met.

Explanatory memoranda had been circulated, (Memoranda, Secretary of State for External Affairs, Jan. 17 – Cab. Doc. 35-62, Minister of National Defence, Jan. 23 – Cab. Doc. 39-62).†

12. During the discussion some said that internal conflicts still raged in the Congo, and that, until the various factions had come to some settlement little could be expected from the training of a Congolese army. What was most needed was the continuation of efforts by U.N. forces to bring about an armistice among the warring elements. It would be unwise to expose Canadian officers at a time when they could not be expected to produce useful results. Were the problem of Katanga to be settled, the picture would be different. At present the Congo was a very troubled place.

13. The Cabinet decided that Canadian army officers should not be sent to staff an Officers Training School for the Congolese army, as had been requested by the Acting Secretary-General of the United Nations.

LAW OF THE SEA

Following is text of draft letter of instructions as tentatively agreed upon by Rogers and Simpson:²⁷ Since the joint Canada-U.S. "six plus six" proposal failed by the narrow margin of one vote to gain the required two-thirds majority at the second Geneva Conference on the Law of the Sea, (a table of the voting is attached),† consideration has been given in various capitals to the courses which might offer the best way out of the impasse in which the large number of supporters of the joint proposal have been placed. UK and Canadian governments have discussed the feasibility of opening for signature a multilateral convention based on the joint Canada-USA proposal.

2. For your information, USA declined last summer to participate in a confidential survey, the purpose of which would have been to determine the extent of support for such a multilateral convention. Consequently UK and Canadian governments have decided themselves to undertake a joint preliminary confidential survey restricted to certain key countries (which have been selected on the basis of likelihood of support, geographical distribution and importance of shipping or fishing interests), the results of which, it is hoped, can be used as a basis (a) for determining the likelihood of more general support for a multilateral convention, and (b) for persuading USA to join a wider survey (it is considered that American support is probably vital to the eventual successful conclusion of a multilateral convention.)

3. Plan of Action. Attached as Annex "A"† is a list of the eighteen countries which will be canvassed in the first (or preliminary) survey. You are requested to make representations at the highest suitable level to the country to which you are accredited to enlist its support for a multilateral convention based on Canada-USA "six plus six" formula put forth at the 1960 Geneva Conference. As appears from Annex "A", certain countries will be approached by both UK and Canada, and it will be necessary in such cases for the missions of our two countries to consult with one another so as to insure that these approaches are coordinated. Where dual approaches are intended the country named first in the annex will make the initial approach and the country named second will make the follow-up approach.

4. The government of the country being approached should be informed that it is intended that the operation shall be conducted in three stages:

(1) a preliminary confidential survey restricted to certain key countries, which, if the results are encouraging, will be followed by (2) a wider, more complete survey of countries, which, if the results confirm and augment those of the preliminary survey, will be followed by (3) the opening for signature of a multilateral convention.

5. It is intended that the following countries should be informed about the intentions of UK and Canada to conduct this preliminary survey

(a) USA: USA will be approached both before and after the first stage. Canadian Embassy will first approach USA authorities in Washington to inform them of the decision to conduct the preliminary survey and invite them to instruct their missions in the eighteen countries concerned to express at least a benevolent interest in the project. Supporting action will be taken by UK Embassy there. The active support of USA for the project will not repeat not be requested until the conclusion of the first phase.

(b) France and Belgium: These countries may not repeat not yet be ready to support the proposal. However, they would be bound to learn about the proposed survey in view of their participation in the forthcoming North Sea Conferences to be held at the Hague. For reasons of general policy, therefore, UK will inform them of the project in broad terms.

(c) Argentina and Brazil: It has been agreed that Canada should decide, after raising the matter with American officials, whether or not repeat not to inform Argentina and Brazil in general terms that consideration is being given to the conclusion of a multilateral convention. It is considered that these two countries should probably be informed unless USA should express objections.

6. Possible Doubts Concerning the Survey. It should be stressed that the existence and the results of this preliminary survey will be kept confidential. Should anyone express the fear that an unsuccessful preliminary survey may be “counter productive” you should explain that it is recognized that if the initial survey discloses that the majority of the shipping and fishing countries do not repeat not favour a multilateral convention then the idea is dead. The initial survey will not repeat not, however, have worsened the situation since its results will be kept confidential except amongst those countries approached. If it should transpire that support for Geneva formula had waned since the second conference to a point where even perhaps with American assistance a convention would attract so few signatories that it would be ineffective, no repeat no country would gain by remaining in ignorance of this state of affairs (if it exists) and there would, in fact, be advantages in learning of it so that attention might be directed to other solutions.

7. Definition and Scope of Canada-USA Formula. The “Geneva Formula” comprises three main elements (a) a territorial sea not repeat not exceeding six miles (b) an exclusive fishing zone not repeat not exceeding twelve miles (with in certain cases a ten-year phasing out period in the outer six miles) and (c) a procedure for examining claims to preferential fishing rights outside that zone (Brazilian amendment).

8. In referring to the “Geneva Formula”, however, the countries to be approached in the first phase of the survey should be asked only if they would in principle favour the conclusion of a multilateral convention “based on Geneva Formula.” No repeat no reference should be made, if it can be avoided, to the third element of the formula ((c) above). On the other hand nothing should be done or said which would prejudice one way or the other the possible retention or elimination of the “Brazilian amendment.” If the question is raised, any views in favour or against this provision expressed by the countries being approached should be reported immediately.

9. Arguments to Use

(a) The following general observations should be borne in mind in making these representations.

The initiative is in no repeat no sense a cold war project or an attempt to avenge the “diplomatic defeat” at Geneva. On the contrary, it is motivated by a desire to further the orderly development of international law, and in particular to complete the codification of the Law of the Sea so nearly achieved at 1960 Geneva Conference. (One of the most telling arguments with some of the older and more conservative countries, who might not repeat not otherwise be favourably disposed towards the convention, is that of the desirability of achieving uniformity and certainty of international law, and this should not repeat not only be stressed in the initial approaches, but should, where appropriate, be followed up with the legal advisors to the foreign ministers in question.)

10. The general desirability of reaching agreement on the two important questions left unanswered (i.e. the breadth of the territorial sea and fishery limits) is underlined by the present uncertainty and the likelihood of a continued drift towards chaos in the Law of the Sea. The sooner therefore that a multilateral convention can be concluded the sooner this disturbing drift can be stopped. It is hoped that if a multilateral convention is concluded in time, enough countries will accede so as to obtain substantially the same purpose as would have been achieved at Geneva. The potential influence and importance from a shipping and fishing point of view of the countries acceding to such a convention is considered to be as important as the numbers concerned.

(a) Support for a multilateral convention at this stage, rather than later, would have a good chance of building on the large measure of agreement reached at the conference and avoiding the loss of the effort put into it.

(b) The existence of an agreement would help to prevent disputes arising out of incidents on the seas and would encourage countries with outstanding disputes to arrive at an early solution.

(c) The movement to a twelve mile territorial sea would be slowed down and countries might be restrained from making more extravagant claims. Maximum freedom of the seas would thereby be ensured for security, navigational and commercial purposes.

(d) It would provide a convention to which new countries could adhere when they gain their independence.

(e) The convention, especially as it will number among its signatories the chief maritime and air transport nations of the world, would provide an important source of law from which a universal rule of law might gradually evolve.

(f) The conclusion of a multilateral convention on the remaining questions in issue might further encourage states to ratify the conventions adopted by the 1958 Conference.

11. There may be other advantages of particular attraction to the country to which you are accredited, or, on the other hand, disadvantages peculiar to that country and you should draw on aide mémoires you may have presented before the Second Conference. Similarly, some of the points listed above might be dropped (or varied) if you believe that it would be inadvisable to use them in their present form or at all.

12. Provisional Assessment of the Attitude of States. Attached for your background information as Annex “B”† is a very provisional assessment of the probable attitude of the 107 members (including Mauritania) of UN and Specialized Agencies towards the idea of a multilateral convention.

13. It may be that certain other countries will be added to the original eighteen being canvassed but for the time being the list is limited to that number.

14. Preferential Rights Proviso. For your own information, the two surveying countries intend to give further consideration, in the light of the replies received, as to whether or not repeat not the balance of advantage would lie in retaining or discarding the clause on preferential rights (Brazilian amendment). There would appear at this stage to be two possible points of view on this question: on the one hand most Western European countries and probably also USA would wish to see the provision eliminated, while on the other hand a number of Latin American countries might not repeat not be prepared to support a proposal which did not repeat not contain the preferential rights proviso. Consequently Latin American countries have not repeat not been included in the list of countries to be approached in the first (or preliminary) survey.

15. You should treat this matter as important and urgent and should take the earliest opportunity, before making an approach, to discuss it fully with your UK-(Canadian) colleague and to ensure that your USA colleague will take the necessary benevolent attitude.

LAW OF THE SEA – MULTILATERAL CONVENTION

Canada House has been informed by United Kingdom officials that their Ministers had, in taking the decision approving the proposed preliminary confidential survey, contemplated the possibility that Norway would not take part in it and “had decided to go ahead with Canada in any case.” (Telegram number 18 of January 3 from London, a copy of which is attached)†

Agreement has also been reached in London at the official level on the text of the draft letter of instructions to be sent to the Canadian and United Kingdom missions in the eighteen countries which will be canvassed (telegrams numbers 27 of January 3 and 31 of today’s date, † copies of which are also attached). United Kingdom approval at the Ministerial level has not yet been obtained to the amended text (which is, even after the further amendments suggested in telegram number 31, almost word for word as contained in our telegram number 344 of December [29],²⁸ a copy of which is also attached). The only important amendments suggested are those instructing our respective missions to ensure the benevolent attitude of their United States colleagues before making approaches to the governments in question and informing them of the kind of replies to give to press inquiries. The only point of substance which has been queried is the statement that “the convention would provide an important source of law,” which we think is correct, but which has been referred to the Foreign Office Legal Department for an opinion, and may therefore have to be altered.

Apart from the text, other United Kingdom suggestions which require approval are that:

- (a) Canada rather than the United Kingdom approach Sweden, and possibly Denmark as well;
- (b) Canada inform the United States authorities, as soon as agreement on the proposed instructions has been reached, of the intention to conduct the survey;
- (c) Canada inform the United Kingdom Government should we decide to notify Argentina and Brazil of the survey;
- (d) the missions concerned be instructed not to approach the governments in question until their instructions to do so are confirmed by telegram; and ²⁸ Voir/See Volume 27, document 62.

(e) the “passive” mission, in cases where a dual approach is not envisaged, be informed fully.²⁹

In addition to these suggestions it would, I think, be advisable to notify the Norwegians at the same time (and for the same reason) as we inform the U.S.A., of the commencement of the survey.

As to the phrase queried by the British, it would be preferable to alter the wording rather than incur any delay on its account.

I have therefore drafted for your signature, if you agree, a telegram to London confirming approval of the amendments to the draft letter of instructions and agreement to the suggestions which have been made and incorporating the two points last mentioned above.³⁰

MULTILATERAL CONVENTION ON BREADTH OF TERRITORIAL SEA AND CONTIGUOUS ZONE – PRELIMINARY SURVEY

Although we had understood that the United Kingdom officials had agreed to the text of the instructions to be sent to our respective missions in the eighteen countries being canvassed, further amendments have now been suggested by them, (London's telegram 77 of January 9† a copy of which is attached). If we understand paragraph five of the telegram correctly, some further alterations may still be suggested, after which, if we agree to them, it will still be necessary to obtain United Kingdom Ministerial approval. In the meantime the changes which have been suggested thus far appear reasonable and they have been incorporated in our working paper on the draft instructions, an up-to-date copy of which is attached for your information.†

2. A more serious question, also raised in the same telegram, (paragraph 4), is the question of the elimination of Denmark and Sweden from the preliminary survey. The reduction of the numbers being canvassed to sixteen might possibly raise doubts in the minds of the United States authorities and others, as to whether such a small survey is really representative; moreover, the absence of Scandinavian countries from the list might, in the light of their known interest in the Law of the Sea, create further doubts as to the likelihood of more general support for a multilateral convention. On the other hand it would be extremely damaging for us to approach these two countries with negative results.

³⁰ Notes marginales :/Marginal notes:

3. There would seem to be three possibilities open to us:

(a) to agree to the elimination of Denmark and Sweden from the survey, with no substitution of other countries in their place, (the simplest way, probably of getting the survey moving quickly);

(b) to attempt to find two other countries to substitute in place of the two countries eliminated, (a rather difficult task, and one that may entail further delays through the consequent consultations with United Kingdom authorities); and

(c) to go ahead with the survey as planned, including the two countries in question, (a rather dangerous procedure in the light of the dependence of the attitude of the two countries in question on that of Norway, and the probable difficulty in the case of Sweden of the job of persuasion required).

4. As you know, we have suggested that Norway be informed as soon as the survey is commenced and that Norway be requested to adopt a benevolent attitude towards the survey and to so inform its missions, but to do nothing further; these suggestions have not yet however been passed on to the United Kingdom authorities (paragraph 5 of London's telegram 77). Since the attitudes of the Swedes and the Danes might well turn on the kind of comment made to them by the Norwegians, it would seem that before deciding on one of the three courses of action mentioned it is essential to know the extent to which the Norwegians would be prepared to give us unofficial behind-the-scenes support vis-à-vis Sweden and Denmark, should Norway receive enquiries from these countries. The domestic political reasons which influenced Norway against participating in the survey would not, presumably, influence the attitude of Sweden and Denmark, nor should they make the Norwegians reluctant to reveal to the Swedes and the Danes their active interest in the project and their hopes for its success. One of the reasons behind the Norwegian reluctance to participate is their fear that the survey would not be completed by late February, when they may feel compelled to take unilateral action in their parliament, and the sooner therefore that we get the survey underway the more likelihood there is that we can complete it in time to bring the Norwegians in.

5. I have therefore drafted for your signature, if you agree, a telegram to London outlining our thinking and requesting United Kingdom approval to our approaching the Norwegians immediately to ask their views, (in the light of their close association with this project,) as to the advisability of including Denmark and Sweden in the survey.³¹

We concur in your suggestion that you approach Lord Home and urge on him the advisability of a direct approach to Denmark and Sweden at this time. In so doing you may wish to make use of the arguments outlined in paragraph 3 of our telegram L-7 of January 10† and suggest that the Norwegians be asked to adopt a benevolent attitude towards the survey and so inform their missions (and also the Danes and the Swedes) in much the same way as the U.S.A. will be asked to do. Should he express doubts however we are agreeable to beginning the preliminary survey without Sweden and Denmark, rather than incur further delays, and bringing them in at a later stage, if possible, through Norway. (This could be done either as suggested in our telegram L-7 of January 10, by asking the Norwegians for their unofficial support with Sweden and Denmark or, as suggested by you, if the survey goes quickly enough, by using the initial results to bring in Norway and therefore Sweden and Denmark.)

2. In order to cut down on delays and telegraphic costs we have already sent off the agreed instruction letters to all our missions concerned, but have cautioned them (our telegrams L-9† and L-10 of Jan. 12†) against taking any action until instructed to do so. There would seem to be no reason why you should not inform the British of our action and suggest that they do likewise.

LETTER OF INSTRUCTIONS ON MULTILATERAL CONVENTION

Mr. Nutt telephoned from Washington yesterday afternoon to discuss certain points which he did not think the letter (copy attached) covered.³² He said that he would not be able to raise these questions by telegram before Monday and wondered if there was any urgency about clearing them up sooner than that. I explained that the text of the letter had been agreed to by the British and ourselves after considerable discussion and that any changes at this stage might delay operations considerably. Mr. Nutt therefore mentioned the points he had in mind, (in guarded language because of the means of communication used,) which were as follows:

(1) He wanted to know if he were free to discuss the project at this stage with his U.K. colleague.

I said that this was not yet possible since we did not know whether the British missions had been informed, although we had suggested this week that this be done.

(2) He asked that our people in Washington be kept informed about the timing of our approaches.

³² Note sur le bordereau d'envoi joint :/Note on attached routing slip:

Beesley and I decided that the time had come when we just had to bring Washington into the picture although we realized that this might open the flood-gates of advice and counsel by telegram. Fortunately the telephone conversation forestalled this and the points raised by Jim [Nutt] will – as they would have been – be borne in mind when (and if) Washington is asked to move. There is a possibility that Jim – not knowing Beesley – might phone or write you. Hence the memo attached. G.C. Langille

I explained that we hoped that the approaches could be co-ordinated as much as possible so that none of the people concerned would hear of it first from the wrong sources, but that in any event we would keep him informed as to timing as requested.³³

(3) With respect to paragraphs 4 and 5(a) of the letter it was not clear to him whether or not it was our intention to inform the United States and/or the other countries concerned of the purpose of the first phase (i.e. to bring in the United States). He emphasized that if we intended to inform any other countries then we should also inform the United States.

I said that I did not know whether or not this point had been already discussed and decided on. My view was that there did not seem to be any objection to informing the United States or the other countries, and that it might be impossible to avoid doing so, but that this point would have to be verified. (I have since discussed this question with Mr. Langille and he feels that it would be undesirable to inform anyone on this point³⁴ – the purpose of this survey being to decide whether the larger survey should be undertaken.) You may wish to consider this question so that it can be covered in the instruction telegram to Washington and, if you consider it necessary, in those to our other missions concerned in the survey.

(4) With respect to paragraph 7 of our instruction letter, Mr. Nutt wanted to know which proposal we had in mind, “the original agreed one or the second one which had not got through.” His view was that we should be non-committal on this point.

I said that I did not know once again whether or not this point had been specifically decided on and while I agreed with him that we should be non-committal, this point also would have to be verified. (Mr. Langille agrees that we should be non-committal but considers that if eventually we have a choice the first agreed proposal is the preferable one.)³⁵ You may wish to consider this point also so that it can be covered in the instruction telegram to Washington and our other missions.³⁶

2. For your information the United Kingdom and Canadian Governments have discussed the feasibility of opening for signature a multilateral convention based on the joint Canada-United States proposal. The United States declined last summer to participate in a confidential survey, the purpose of which would have been to determine the extent of support for such a multilateral convention. Consequently the United Kingdom and Canadian Governments have decided themselves to undertake a joint preliminary confidential survey restricted to certain key countries (which have been selected on the basis of likelihood of support, geographical distribution and importance of shipping or fishing interests), the results of which, it is hoped, can be used as a basis (a) for determining the likelihood of more general support for a multilateral convention, and (b) for persuading the United States to join a wider survey (It is considered that American support is probably vital to the eventual successful conclusion of a multilateral convention).

3. Plan of Action

Attached as Annex "A"† is a list of the eighteen countries which will be canvassed in the first (or preliminary) survey. You are requested to make representations at the highest suitable level to the country to which you are accredited to enlist its support for a multilateral convention based on the Canada-United States "six-plus-six" formula put forth at the 1960 Geneva Conference. As appears from Annex "A", certain countries will be approached by both the United Kingdom and Canada, and it will be necessary in such cases for the missions of our two countries to consult with one another so as to insure that these approaches are co-ordinated. Where dual approaches are intended the country named first in the Annex will make the initial approach and the country named second will make the follow-up approach.

4. The Government of the country being approached should be informed that it is intended that the operation shall be conducted in three stages

(1) a preliminary confidential survey restricted to certain key countries, which, if the results are encouraging, will be followed by

(2) a wider, more complete survey of countries, which, if the results confirm and augment those of the preliminary survey, will be followed by

(3) the opening for signature of a multilateral convention.

5. It is intended that the following countries should be informed about the intentions of the United Kingdom and Canada to conduct this preliminary survey:

(a) United States – The United States will be approached both before and after the first stage. The Canadian Embassy will first approach the United States authorities in Washington to inform them of the decision to conduct the preliminary survey and invite them to instruct their missions in the eighteen countries concerned to express at least a benevolent interest in the project. Supporting action will be taken by the United Kingdom there. The active support of the United States for the project will not be requested until the conclusion of the first phase.

(b) France and Belgium – These countries may not yet be ready to support the proposal. However, they would be bound to learn about the proposed survey in view of their participation in the forthcoming North Sea Conferences to be held at Hague. For reasons of general policy, therefore, the United Kingdom will inform them of the project in broad terms.

(c) Argentina and Brazil – It has been agreed that Canada should decide, after raising the matter with American officials, whether or not to inform Argentina and Brazil in general terms that consideration is being given to the conclusion of a multilateral convention. It is considered that these two countries should probably be informed unless the United States should express objections.

(d) Norway – The Norwegians have been in close touch with us on this question, and although it was hoped that they would be able to co-sponsor the preliminary confidential survey the Norwegian Government have found it necessary for domestic reasons to decide against doing so. They will however be informed as soon as the survey is undertaken and your Norwegian colleague can be expected to adopt a benevolent attitude towards the project.

6. Possible Doubts Concerning the Survey

It should be stressed that the existence and the results of this preliminary survey will be kept confidential. Should anyone express the fear that an unsuccessful preliminary survey may be “counter productive” you should explain that it is recognized that if the initial survey discloses that the majority of the shipping and fishing countries do not favour a multilateral convention then the idea is dead. The initial survey will not, however, have worsened the situation since its results will be kept confidential except amongst those countries approached. If it should transpire that support for the Geneva Formula had waned since the second conference to a point where even perhaps with American assistance a convention would attract so few signatories that it would be ineffective, no country would gain by remaining in ignorance of this state of affairs.

7. Definition and Scope of Canada-United States Formula

The “Geneva Formula” comprises three main elements

- (a) a territorial sea not exceeding six miles.
- (b) an exclusive fishing zone not exceeding twelve miles with a ten-year transitional period in the outer six miles for those countries which have traditionally fished there.
- (c) a procedure for examining claims to preferential fishing rights outside that zone. (Brazilian amendment).

In referring to the “Geneva Formula,” however the countries to be approached in the first phase of the survey should be asked only if they would in principle favour the conclusion of a multilateral convention “based on the Geneva Formula.” You should not yourself make reference to the third element of the formula i.e. (c) above. On the other hand nothing should be done or said which would prejudice one way or the other the possible retention or elimination of the “Brazilian amendment.” If the question is raised, however, you should report as fully as possible any views in favour or against this provision which are expressed to you.

8. For your own information, the two surveying countries intend to give further consideration, in the light of the replies received, as to whether or not the balance of advantage would lie in retaining or discarding the clause on preferential rights (Brazilian amendment). There would appear at this stage to be two possible points of view on this question: on the one hand most Western European countries and probably also the United States would wish to see the provision eliminated, while on the other hand a number of Latin American countries might not be prepared to support a proposal which did not contain the preferential rights proviso. Consequently Latin American countries have not been included in the list of countries to be approached in the first (or preliminary) survey.

10. Arguments to Use

(a) The following general observations should be borne in mind in making these representations.

The initiative is in no sense a cold war project or an attempt to avenge the “diplomatic defeat” at Geneva. On the contrary, it is motivated by a desire to further the orderly development of international law, and in particular to complete the codification of the Law of the Sea so nearly achieved at the 1960 Geneva Conference. (One of the most telling arguments with some of the older and more conservative countries, who might not otherwise be favourably disposed towards the convention, is that of the desirability of achieving uniformity and certainty of international law, and this should not only be stressed in the initial approaches, but should, where appropriate, be followed up with the Legal Advisors to the Foreign Ministers in question).

11. The general desirability of reaching agreement on the two important questions left unanswered (i.e. the breadth of the territorial sea and fishery limits) is underlined by the present uncertainty and the likelihood of a continued drift towards chaos in the Law of the Sea. The sooner therefore that a multilateral convention can be concluded the sooner this disturbing drift can be stopped. It is hoped that if a multilateral convention is concluded in time, enough countries will accede so as to obtain substantially the same purpose as would have been achieved at Geneva. The potential influence and importance from a shipping and fishing point of view of the countries acceding to such a convention is considered to be as important as the numbers concerned.

(b) Support for a multilateral convention at this stage, rather than later, would have a good chance of building on the large measure of agreement reached at the conference and avoiding the loss of the effort put into it.

(c) The existence of an agreement would help to prevent disputes arising out of incidents on the seas and would encourage countries with outstanding disputes to arrive at an early solution.

(d) The movement to a twelve mile territorial sea would be slowed down and countries might be restrained from making more extravagant claims. Maximum freedom of the seas would thereby be ensured for security, navigational and commercial purposes.

(e) It would provide a convention to which new countries could adhere when they gain their independence.

(f) The convention, especially as it will number among its signatories the chief maritime and air transport nations of the world, and includes some of the more important fishing nations would provide an important source of law from which a universal rule of law might gradually evolve.

(g) The conclusion of a multilateral convention on the remaining questions in issue might further encourage states to ratify the conventions adopted by the 1958 conference.

10. There may be other advantages of particular attraction to the country to which you are accredited, or, on the other hand, disadvantages peculiar to that country, and you should draw on aide mémoires you may have presented before the second conference. Similarly, some of the points listed above might be dropped if you believe that it would be inadvisable to use them in their present form or at all.

11. Provisional Assessment of the Attitude of States

Attached for your background information as Annex "B"† not to be shown to or discussed with other parties is a very provisional assessment of the probable attitude of the 107 members. (including Mauritania) of the United Nations and Specialized Agencies towards the idea of a multilateral convention.

12. The foregoing instructions are provisional and will be confirmed by telegram. Similar instructions are being sent to your Canadian-United Kingdom colleague. You should treat this matter as important and urgent and should take the earliest opportunity, before making an approach, to discuss it fully with your United Kingdom - (Canadian) colleague and to ensure that your United States colleague will take the necessary benevolent attitude. In reply to press enquiries it is undesirable to go beyond saying that consideration is being given in various capitals to the situation arising out of the failure of the Geneva Conference (see Paragraph 1).

13. You should stress throughout the desirability of keeping the operations secret from countries not being canvassed.

LAW OF THE SEA – MULTILATERAL CONVENTION

Since the United Kingdom has now agreed to the remaining points outstanding (the inclusion of Denmark and Sweden and notification to Norway; see Mr. Drew's telegram 225 of January 20 attached)† we can begin the preliminary survey as soon as our missions and those of the United Kingdom in the countries being canvassed have received their instructions. Our missions will all have received their instructions by tomorrow, and the United Kingdom missions will have received theirs by January 26. I have therefore drafted a telegram to Mr. Drew for your signature, if you agree, proposing a timetable for notifying the U.S.A. and Norway and beginning the survey, and outlining our thinking behind the timing suggested.

LAW OF THE SEA

I am pleased to learn of the results of your discussions with Lord Home, which I agree are very satisfactory.

2. Since the U.K. missions and ours in all the countries concerned in the survey will have received their instruction letters by January 26 we would suggest the following timetable for U.K. approval:

(1) Instructions to be sent as soon as possible to our respective missions in Washington and Oslo requesting that on the morning of Friday January 27 they notify the U.S.A. and Norway about the survey. (In the case of the U.S.A. our missions would be asked not to raise the question of the Latin American countries at this stage and to confine themselves to informing the Secretary of State or an appropriate senior official of the State Department of our plans and attempting to persuade them of the desirability of

(a) informing the United States embassies at the capitals concerned, so that they will not be taken by surprise if questioned by officials of those governments, and also, if we can so persuade the State Department,

(b) informing them that the State Department takes a benevolent interest in the project.

Our missions in Oslo would be asked merely to inform the Norwegian Foreign Office of the start of the survey and to request that Norwegian missions abroad, particularly those in Stockholm and Copenhagen, be informed of the survey and of the Norwegian Government's favourable attitude towards it.

(2) Instructions to be sent not later than January 26 to our respective missions in all the countries concerned requesting that co-ordinated representations be made on (but not before) Monday, January 30 or as soon thereafter as possible.

(3) The Canadian Embassy in Washington to be instructed to raise the question of the Latin American countries sometime during the first week in February.

3. You may inform the U.K. authorities that we have had the following considerations in mind in proposing this timetable. We feel that we must give the U.S.A. and Norway some advance notice of the survey, if we are to obtain any assistance from them, and we cannot therefore wait until the survey starts before informing them. On the other hand, we see no advantage in delaying the survey until the response of the State Department is known. (Presumably the U.S. missions will be notified very quickly, and we have previously been told that the State Department has no objection to our going ahead with the survey without them). In order to get the survey underway as soon as possible, and at the same time lessen the likelihood of premature leaks, the delay between notifying the U.S.A. and Norway and commencing the survey should be as short as possible. For these same reasons the approaches in the various capitals should be co-ordinated so as to take place around the same date.

4. For your information, we have attempted, in drafting the timetable, to strike a balance between giving the State Department enough time to inform their missions about the survey and of their attitude towards it, while not giving them time to raise possible reasons for delaying the survey. For similar reasons we feel that the question of notifying the Latin American countries should not be raised until the survey is well under way.

LAW OF THE SEA

Please make representations to State Department during morning of January 27 along following lines:

(a) Informing them that on Tuesday January 31, Canada and United Kingdom will begin canvassing 18 countries listed in Annex "A" to our reference letter to determine extent of support available for a multilateral convention based on Canada-USA "six-plus-six" Geneva Formula;

(b) Explaining proposed plan of action, basis on which these countries have been selected, and confidential nature of operation;

(c) Making clear that in present (preliminary) phase we are not repeat not requesting active support of USA; and

(d) Inviting State Department to inform its missions in countries concerned of survey and explain that although USA is not repeat not taking part in it State Department looks favourably upon project and is hopeful that it will succeed.

(e) Informing State Department that we will be in touch with them after we have carried out preliminary survey.

2. In making these representations you may wish to bear in mind following points:

(1) Your approach should precede but be coordinated with that of your United Kingdom colleague, who will be making supporting representations;

(2) We hope that USA missions in countries concerned will be informed about survey soon as possible so that they will not repeat not be taken by surprise if questioned by officials of those countries;

(3) Purpose of preliminary survey is to determine whether a larger survey should be undertaken; fact that we hope to be able to use results of preliminary survey to persuade USA to join us actively in second phase of survey is not repeat not being mentioned in other capitals and you should therefore not repeat not refer to it;

(4) Question of desirability or otherwise of notifying Latin/American countries should not repeat not be raised at this stage;

(5) A non-committal reply should be given to questions as to which of two Geneva formulas is being put forth; (for your information we favour original agreed version rather than later amended one actually put to vote).

LAW OF THE SEA – MULTILATERAL CONVENTION

As you know, in our telegram L-17 of January 24 to London (a copy of which is attached) we suggested that Washington and Oslo be informed on the morning of January 27 of the preliminary survey and that the active canvassing of the eighteen countries to be approached begin on the morning of Monday, January 30. LAW OF THE SEA

We saw Yingling (Assistant Legal Adviser and whose office is responsible for policy recommendations on Law of the Sea matters) this morning (January 27) and made representations to him in accordance with your reference telegram, augmented by appropriate portions of the more detailed information contained in your letter L-36 January 12. † In the interest of greater certainty we left with Yingling an informal "piece of paper" recapitulating the substance of our representations. We subsequently informed Ivan White (Deputy Assistant Secretary for European Affairs) of representations. United Kingdom Embassy has followed up our approach this afternoon.

2. Yingling's reaction was generally sympathetic to the purposes of the preliminary survey as we had outlined them. He recognized the desirability of informing USA mission in the countries concerned of the joint survey but doubted that it would be possible to do this prior to the commencement of the survey. In view of the change of Administration it would be necessary for him to consult his superiors, who are new appointees, and other interested agencies concerning what attitude USA missions should be instructed to adopt. He could say, however, that there would be no repeat no question of USA missions adopting an attitude of opposition, tacit or otherwise, to the project. We emphasized that we were not repeat not soliciting USA's active participation but rather hoped that the State Department would agree to instruct their missions to indicate that USA look favourably on the project. We urged the desirability of informing USA mission as soon as possible and hoped their position would be a benevolent one. Yingling undertook to inform us later as to the attitude USA missions are instructed to adopt towards the project.

3. Yingling recalled the position which had been held by the former Administration that it would not repeat not be desirable to promote a convention based on the six plus six proposal unless such a proposal had adequate support, and that when last reviewed, it was considered that the requisite support was not repeat not available. However, Yingling's personal attitude is sympathetic though coupled with a conviction that the promotion of a convention based on six plus six should proceed with deliberation and caution. He thought that it would be desirable eventually to convene another conference for the purpose of signing a convention.

4. Yingling continued to believe that Western European and particularly French support for a convention was crucial. He considered that various discussions in Western Europe regarding fisheries matters like the UK-Norwegian agreement, the UK-Icelandic discussions, and the forthcoming North Sea Conference augured well for the solution of local difficulties in Western Europe. Once these had been settled he believed that the Western European countries might well favour a multilateral convention based on the six plus six proposal. Thereafter the aim should be to try to rally the support of most of the Latin/American countries plus a representative group of countries from other geographical areas. Yingling thought there would not repeat not be much point in a multilateral convention unless at least forty to forty-five adherents were guaranteed.

5. Yingling said that there was continued opposition among USA fishing interests to the six plus six proposal. They had "been brought along" at the last conference but it was no repeat no secret that they were not repeat not unhappy since the joint USA-Canadian proposal failed of adoption.

6. Yingling was optimistic that in time some countries now opposed to the six plus six proposal might eventually, with changing circumstances, come to support the six plus six rule. He was not repeat not without hope that at some stage the Arab States might change their position. He also noted that of all the new African States only the Sudan had taken unilateral action since the conference. He believed it important not repeat not to stimulate the African States to early action since at the moment they would be likely to adopt the twelve mile rule. However, if the groundwork were carefully prepared, many of them might be persuaded eventually to support the six plus six formula. He had no repeat no hope that a six plus six proposal would be acceptable to the Soviet bloc.

7. We pointed out that the preliminary survey we proposed to undertake did not repeat not conflict with Yingling's views on how the problem should be approached. He conceded this and agreed that it would be useful to have an up-to-date assessment of the views of the countries listed. He thought that, excepting Spain, Portugal and Japan, concerning which he had some doubts, we would get a favourable response.

8. Yingling fully agreed that the survey should be kept completely confidential. If it were not repeat not, the "opposition" would come to hear of it and might be stimulated into taking counter-measures which could wreck the prospects for a convention based on the six plus six proposal at some future appropriate time.

LAW OF THE SEA – U.S. REACTION TO CANADA-U.K. SURVEY

Mr. Nutt phoned from Washington shortly after 1.00 p.m. today to say that they had received a reply from the State Department to their latest request that instructions be sent to U.S. missions in countries where either Canada or the U.K. are to make representations concerning a multilateral convention embodying the Canada-U.S. proposal at Geneva.

2. Apparently Yingling has advised the Embassy that a telegram will probably be sent out this afternoon. This telegram will advise U.S. missions that, for a number of reasons, it was not possible for the State Department to undertake this survey but that the State Department has no objections to the Canada-U.K. initiative. The telegram will also make the point that the U.S. authorities are in sympathy with our purposes and that, in their view, the results of the survey will be useful. It seems that, in the circumstances, we could hardly have expected more from the State Department.

LAW OF THE SEA

Although the response from the Japanese Foreign Office is probably as satisfactory as can be expected at this stage, it would seem advisable to make follow-up approaches to the Foreign Office with specific reference to the points raised, (and also, if you think it would be useful, to the Treaties Bureau and/or the Ministry of Fisheries, who may be the same people who will be attending the Whaling Conference in London later this month), along the following lines.

(a) How Long Can a 3-Mile Sea Be Maintained?

While we understand the Japanese preference for a 3-mile limit, it has become increasingly obvious in the light of the developments at the two Geneva Conferences that it is no longer realistic to attempt to hold the line at three miles. During the 1958 Conference it became apparent that a 6-mile territorial sea was the narrowest one likely to be acceptable to any substantial number of countries. Subsequent attempts to extend the territorial sea by unilateral action confirmed the existence of this state of affairs and emphasized the desirability of attempting to stop the clearly apparent trend towards a wider territorial sea. The "six-plus-six" formula was put forward in the hope of holding the line at six miles. Under present conditions it is questionable how long any state can maintain a three-mile limit, and the question arises therefore as to whether it would not be better to concentrate the efforts of all countries desiring to establish and maintain the rule of law amongst nations towards a realistic goal of six miles, rather than dissipate their strength in isolated attempts to establish territorial seas of varying widths.

(b) Continued Attempts to Maintain a Three-Mile Limit May Well Result in a Twelve-Mile Limit Being Established.

Apart from doubts as to whether it is any longer realistic to maintain a three-mile limit, it must be asked whether attempts to do so are not in fact counter-productive. The trend towards a wider territorial sea, may, if not arrested soon, result in chaotic conditions in this important branch of international law, and for this reason it is not enough for countries to remain passively in favour of a narrow territorial sea. Active steps are required in order to prevent its further extension. Unless however a proposal is put forth which is acceptable to those states desiring a wider territorial sea, (and 3 miles is totally unacceptable to them), not only will the trend not be arrested, but the inaction of those countries standing by a three-mile limit will have had harmful results. It is imperative therefore that a compromise be found which is acceptable both to those countries desiring a wider territorial sea and those desiring to maintain the freedom of the high seas. The experience of the two conferences has shown that the only such proposals is the "six-plus-six" formula.

(c) Fishing Interests.

If the countries of the world continue to attempt to extend their territorial sea, by unilateral action or otherwise, this will obviously have harmful effects on those countries dependent on distant water fishing. (A twelve-mile territorial sea would carry with it an exclusive fishery zone at least that wide, with no assurance that it would not be even wider.) It was with the hope of proposing a compromise between those states desiring to protect their off-shore fisheries and those dependent upon distant water fishing ground that the "six-plus-six" formula was proposed. Once again developments at and since the two Law of the Sea Conferences have made it abundantly clear that there is no trend towards narrower exclusive fishery zones. It is recognized that certain countries such as Japan may be obliged to make some sacrifices in accepting the "six-plus-six" proposal, but this is equally true of those countries desiring a much wider exclusive fishing zone, (in their acceptance of the ten-year aspect of the formula). It seems clear that the "six-plus-six" proposal is a compromise which, involving as it does sacrifices on both sides, is the only one giving promise of achieving a rule of law on this important branch of international jurisprudence.

(d) Dangers of Following Policies Dependent on Those of U.S.S.R. and Mainland China.

The question arises as to whether the approach of the U.S.S.R. and Mainland China should be allowed to become general as a result of the attempts of other countries to revive the three-mile limit. While on the face of it the three to twelve-mile policy of the U.S.S.R. (and presumably Mainland China) seems to pay lip service to the three-mile limit, its real essence is the choice it provides of territorial seas up to twelve miles. This choice not only contains the seeds of international legal chaos, with each state adopting its own limit, (in effect a legalization of the present increasingly disturbing conditions), but it carries with it also the danger, which is a probability rather than a possibility, that it would result in a large number of nations adopting a twelve-mile territorial sea, given the choice. Support of the U.S.S.R.-mainland China approach is therefore tantamount to conceding a wide-spread twelve-mile limit for all purposes. It seems clear that it is not possible to reconcile a preference for a narrower territorial sea with the policies of the U.S.S.R. and Mainland China on this issue. On the contrary, the best way of holding the line to as narrow a territorial sea as possible is to support the "six-plus-six" formula.

2. We should be grateful to receive a further report in due course.

HAGUE CONFERENCE ON FISHERIES' QUESTIONS

Informal meeting convenes in Peace Palace February 7 with representation from Ireland, UK, France, Belgium, West Germany, Denmark, Norway, Sweden and Netherlands. There will be no repeat no agenda and purpose will be to explore possibilities of organizing official conference to plan regional agreement.

2. Bogh-Tobiassen, First Secretary in Norwegian Embassy here, who will be representing Norway with observer status, gave us following reasons for Norway's lack of enthusiasm for conference:

(1) Proposed conference would be too restrictive in geographical sense and would not repeat not exclude outsiders from invading waters concerned.

(2) Objectives would be "protectionist" with "three-miles" in majority.

(3) Long-range aim was to ensure that fishing fleets of countries providing main markets for North Sea fishery products had access to fishing fields.

3. Contrary to reassurance given us by Riphagen (our telegram 342 September 16)† Bogh-Tobiassen said Norwegian authorities considered promotion of Hague Conference constituted on 6-6 basis. Dear Mr. Beesley,

In my letter to Mr. Langille of the 8th November last I said that the United Kingdom had agreed in principle to participate in a Conference on fishery policies to be held at The Hague between representatives of states bordering on the North Sea.

2. I have now been asked to tell you that we have accepted an invitation from the Netherlands Government to attend an informal preliminary meeting at The Hague, beginning on 7th February. The purpose of this meeting is to explore the desirability of convening a formal North Sea Fisheries Conference later in the year with a view to concluding a treaty. The meeting would discuss the agenda for such a Conference. The instructions to the United Kingdom delegation are that they should seek to ensure that any further discussions cover the whole field of fishery policy including conservation measures and trade in fish; that they should reserve our position fully on the possibility of future extensions of fishery limits and base-lines; and that they should let it be known that in certain circumstances we might be compelled to consider such extensions.³⁷

LAW OF THE SEA: PRELIMINARY SURVEY

As you know, the results of the preliminary survey, while still incomplete, are generally favourable. Certain countries, such as Spain and Ireland have indicated support for the convention, while others, such as Sweden, Turkey, and Italy have indicated probable support but have been unable to give a definite answer as yet. As was expected however, difficulty has been encountered with Germany and Japan, both of whom have given a qualified approval dependent amongst other things upon the attitude of other countries. The survey appears therefore to have reached a point where, the initial approaches having been made by our missions and those of the U.K., most countries are in the process of giving consideration to our representations.

2. Because of the desirability of completing the survey as soon as possible, so that, assuming that it will be successful, its results could be used to persuade other countries such as Norway and Turkey against taking the unilateral action they are now contemplating, (while at the same time lessening the likelihood of leaks prior to the commencement of the second phase of the survey), we should try to prevent the survey from bogging down at this stage. I have therefore drafted for your signature, if you agree, a telegram to all our missions concerned urging them to press this question actively with the countries to which they are accredited and, if necessary,³⁸ to conduct continuing dialogues in the hopes of achieving a quick and favourable response.

[Ottawa], February 16, 1961

LAW OF THE SEA

In the course of a conversation yesterday about other matters, the French Ambassador said that he had received a request from Paris for clarification of our position.

2. Apparently, in an earlier message the French Ambassador had reported that we were prepared to revive in the form of a multilateral convention the six plus six formula. United Kingdom representatives, in discussing the survey, had referred to the Geneva formula. The French authorities were wondering whether there was not a difference between the two positions and whether we envisaged special bilateral negotiations concerning the tapering off period for historic fishing rights.

3. The other day, when the French Ambassador had raised the question directly, I told him that there was a move in progress as to the Geneva formula and that United Kingdom representatives (by agreement with us) were to inform the French authorities of what was involved. I was deliberately vague and the French Ambassador had clearly misunderstood and misrepresented our position. I was therefore quite clear in stressing that we were conducting a survey as to the prospects of the Geneva formula which had received a 5 affirmative vote. I also explained that in our view this was somewhat a package deal and that the prospects of success seemed related to faithful adherence, as far as possible, to the original formula although we would of course take note of comments on any of its main features. It seemed to us however that unless countries were prepared to revive the original formula, any suggested variations would be likely to involve substantial renegotiations and therefore very likely the abandonment of the scheme.

4. The French Ambassador raised the question of bilateral negotiations. I said that it was too early to discuss this. We must first find out whether the Geneva formula can be revived. If this fails, Canada, like other countries, e.g. Norway, will have to determine the best course to follow. I could not guarantee that we would negotiate first and move later. No decision had been made by the Canadian Government on this point. In fact, the French Government may have to decide in the case of Canada, should there be no multilateral solution, whether we would be content to claim unilaterally six plus six or whether in the absence of a convention we, like so many other countries, would not be prepared to go much further. While, in the absence of an agreed scheme, sympathy for France might of course influence the Government here to take a generous attitude, France was not the only or even the main country fishing along our coasts and the maximum limit for the tapering off period (if there was to be any and this remained to be seen) might well have to be determined in relation to U.S. operations and applied across the board to other countries. I then explained that the ten year period embodied in the Geneva deal had represented for us the very extreme limit of concessions vis-à-vis the United States. In fact, the Government here at the time was only reconciled to it with great difficulty.

LAW OF THE SEA: DESIRABILITY OF INFORMING THE LATIN AMERICANS OF THE PRELIMINARY SURVEY

It has occurred to me that the American thinking behind their reluctance to have the Latin Americans notified might be along the following lines. The U.S.A. is not really very enthusiastic about the convention, yet it would not like to be blamed by the United Kingdom and Canada for its failure. Since the U.S. attitude would probably be the determining factor with the Latin Americans, mere "benevolent interest" on the part of the U.S.A. might not be enough to bring them in, and the U.S.A. would, therefore, be forced to decide for or against the convention, and even worse perhaps from the U.S. point of view, for or against the Brazilian Amendment. The State Department may feel that by sitting tight there is always the possibility that the survey will be a failure, in which case the U.S. would not have had to antagonize anyone and could not be blamed, except indirectly, for the failure. On the other hand, should the survey be successful then the U.S. would be in a somewhat stronger position to deal with the Latin Americans, and the fate of the Brazilian Amendment would not in any event be laid directly at the door of the U.S., as might be the case were the issue to arise at this stage.

2. The real importance for the U.S. on the question of notifying the Latin Americans may, therefore, be much greater than they have indicated, although Yingling's initial response is consistent with the foregoing – particularly his worries about the Latin Americans not appreciating the precise balance of the American position. It would follow from this that we should be careful about pushing the Latin American question with the State Department until we are sure the time is right to use it as a means of forcing them to take a stand. As Mr. Drew has pointed out, it might be wise to wait until Mr. Dean's influence has been brought to bear; we could get some indication concerning this from Mr. Dean's reply to Mr. Drew's letter.³⁹

I have been wondering about the possibility of coordinating our policies with those of Norway and the United Kingdom should the results of the preliminary survey be unfavourable. We know that Norway is contemplating unilateral action on the basis of the "six-plus-six" formula and that the United Kingdom may be considering similar action judging from the instructions to their delegation to the Hague Meeting. Were we to take unilateral action then presumably it would have a sounder basis if it were coordinated both as to timing and substance with similar action by the United Kingdom and Norway. The action of all three countries might then be mutually reinforcing, both legally and politically. It is even conceivable that such action by three of the countries who have taken the most prominent roles in this field could provide the beginnings of an international rule of law on the six-plus-six basis. In any event, we would all feel that we were in good company, and could share the brickbats.⁴⁰

LAW OF THE SEA: PRELIMINARY SURVEY

The preliminary survey appears to have reached a stage where it is possible to make a tentative assessment of its results to date. None of the countries canvassed appears to be opposed to the proposed multilateral convention, and most have indicated that they favour it in principle. In summary, although Japan, Turkey and Pakistan may all require further persuasion it seems likely that their support will eventually be forthcoming, and the survey appears to be progressing favourably in other quarters. A rather disturbing development has occurred outside the context of the survey however, which we fear may have damaging effects on the survey, and even perhaps ruin the possibilities for a multilateral convention.

2. The Scandinavian countries, the Low Countries and Germany, France, Ireland and the United Kingdom have just concluded a fisheries meeting at the Hague during which it was agreed that a North Sea Conference would be held in October. In the meantime, with the exception of the United Kingdom and Ireland, these countries will probably be unwilling to give definite answers on the multilateral convention. France, Belgium and the Netherlands are actively promoting a regional North Sea Agreement, partly because they are fearful of losing United Kingdom fishing grounds through the terms of the proposed convention; before agreeing to it they want to try to obtain concessions from the United Kingdom through bilateral negotiations. Consequently, while appearing to favour the proposed convention, what they are saying in effect is that they would agree to it so long as its provisions do not apply to them (at least with respect to fisheries). Germany has been in the reverse position since the proposed convention would have given Germany concessions from Norway which she would otherwise have been able to obtain only at some cost in return; this is also the partial explanation of Norway's decision not to participate in the survey. These two countries have, according to press reports, now reached agreement however and this may effect the attitude of both. The other countries concerned are also hopeful of securing their positions through bilateral negotiations, and are therefore unlikely to be willing to commit themselves on the multilateral convention until either a regional agreement is reached or their bilateral negotiations are concluded, whichever occurs the sooner.

3. The real significance of the proposed North Sea Regional Agreement therefore is that it renders the results of the preliminary survey inconclusive. The equivocal answers of the countries involved in it would not provide a very firm basis for approaching the U.S.A. nor for dissuading the Norwegians from taking unilateral action. Moreover, by seeking to exempt themselves from its provisions the North Sea countries are taking a position basically incompatible with the proposed convention, which, if followed elsewhere, could result not only in interminable delays before conclusion of a convention, but in a convention whose terms would be virtually meaningless because of the many exceptions to it. Furthermore, if the U.S.A. were to take a position similar to that of the North Sea countries it could have serious implications for Canada. It seems clear therefore that the proposed North Sea Conference presents a real obstacle to the conclusion of a multilateral convention.

4. There would appear to be several possible courses of action open to us as means of overcoming this difficulty, namely:

(a) to consider the survey a failure on account of the attitude of the North Sea countries, and give consideration to taking unilateral action on the "six-plus-six" basis;

(b) to keep the preliminary survey open and postpone the second phase until definite answers are received from the North Sea countries;

(c) to go on with the second phase of the survey and treat the North Sea countries as being in favour of it;

(d) to make a further strong effort to persuade the North Sea countries to agree now to the convention.

5. As to course (a), there would be some basis for concluding that, having made the effort now and the project having been defeated by those very countries most likely to suffer from unilateral action by the United Kingdom and Canada, we owe them no further obligation to refrain from taking such action. However, while we may eventually be brought to this position, it would seem to be somewhat premature to adopt it at this stage.

6. As to course (b), it would not be practicable to keep the preliminary survey open and postpone the second phase until late fall. Not only would the momentum of the survey be lost, with possibly harmful effects on those countries who have indicated interest in it, but the danger of leaks or of unilateral action or regional agreements during the intervening period would increase. Moreover, if the survey were to stall at this stage amongst those countries considered most likely to accept it, then it is not likely that other countries would consider it a sound proposition.

7. As to course (c), it might be possible to proceed with the second phase of the survey and treat the North Sea countries as having indicated approval in principle to the convention, but the feasibility of this course would depend to a large extent upon the willingness of the U.S. to proceed on this basis. It seems rather unlikely that we could gain U.S. support without more concrete evidence of active interest on the part of the North Sea countries, bearing in mind also that the Latin Americans have not yet been approached. Furthermore, it is our hope that all the countries being canvassed would join actively in promoting the convention during the second phase of the survey, and the equivocal attitude of the North Sea countries would seem to preclude this possibility. However, this course of action remains open and it would be preferable to course (a).

8. On balance, although it may eventually prove necessary to adopt course (c) or even course (a), it would seem to be worth while first to make a strong effort to persuade the North Sea countries that it would be in their own best interests to agree to the convention; (course (d)). This could, we think, best be done by the British, since they are in a position to put considerable pressure on France, Belgium and the Netherlands.

9. The United Kingdom may already be half-way along the path towards unilateral action, judging from their position at the Hague Meeting, during which they specifically reserved their position on possible extensions of their baselines and fishery limits. With unilateral action by Norway in the offing, it might not be difficult for the United Kingdom to capitalize on fears by the North Sea countries of similar action by the United Kingdom. It could be intimated that while under the multilateral convention there would be a ten-year tapering off period, there need be no such provision if the six-plus-six formula were implemented unilaterally by the United Kingdom and Canada, and if it were hinted that such action could be timed to coincide with similar action by Norway, the other North Sea countries might well be moved to look more favourably upon the proposed multilateral convention.

10. Before such a position could be taken it would have to be agreed to by our Government and that of the United Kingdom, but in the meantime there would seem to be no reason why we should not explore such a possibility with the United Kingdom and if they concur, subsequently raise the question with Cabinet. I have therefore drafted a telegram to our High Commissioner in London† for your signature, if you agree, outlining our thinking (with the exception of possible unilateral action on our part) and requesting that he solicit the views of the United Kingdom authorities on the various courses of action possible.⁴¹

PRELIMINARY SURVEY; CONDITIONAL ANSWERS

As you know we are continuing our discussions with those countries who have indicated doubts about the convention, and are giving consideration to appropriate action with respect to those who have stated their approval in principle, subject to the conclusion of a regional agreement. There is a third broad category however comprising countries such as Israel, whose approval in principle is dependent upon the attitude of certain other countries, and Sweden, whose approval is conditional upon a sufficiently large number of other signatories and, Japan, whose approval is qualified by a mixture of both conditions. As in the case of the North Sea countries, the question arises as to whether we should proceed on the basis of expected support from these countries, or go back to them and point out that other countries are not likely to support the convention unless the eighteen key countries being canvassed in the preliminary survey indicate definite approval.

2. This is the kind of problem which could perhaps be discussed during the proposed official level meeting in London at the conclusion of the preliminary survey, when we can compare notes with the United Kingdom authorities and analyze the results more fully, but it may then be too late to go back to the countries already canvassed, particularly if it had become known by them that the preliminary survey had been concluded.

3. The real test would seem to be whether such countries would be willing to join actively in canvassing other countries during the second phase of the survey. It could prove necessary to proceed with the second phase without the active support of certain countries which might prefer to adopt an attitude similar to that of Norway and the U.S. during the preliminary phase, and it would be difficult to criticize such a position. It would be even more difficult to criticize such countries on the basis of the answers they have given thus far, which, after all, are not too different from our own position, since we also have no wish to become involved in a convention that does not have wide support, and in particular that of the U.S.A. All things considered, it would seem the wiser course to refrain from analyzing too closely the attitude of those countries indicating conditional approval until the London meeting, when a detailed examination can be made. Do you agree?

As you know, we had hoped to complete by the end of February the preliminary confidential survey of the eighteen key countries being canvassed. In setting such an early date we were aware that it might not be possible to meet it, and this has proven to be the case; while the preliminary responses in all quarters have been reasonably favourable, several countries have not yet given us full and definite responses to our representations.

2. We have not yet received a firm answer from the United Kingdom on the possibility of their putting pressure on certain countries for more definite answers, but the preliminary reaction (as reported in telegram 995 of March 14 from London,† a copy of which is attached) indicates that it is unlikely that the United Kingdom will be prepared to do so. It seems possible therefore it could be some time before complete results are obtained, and there is a consequent danger of the survey losing momentum. The question arises as to whether we have obtained sufficient evidence with which to persuade the U.S.A. to join in the survey, or whether we must await fuller results.

3. Although it would be desirable to present the U.S.A. with as much evidence as possible, at the same time certain countries may be reluctant to commit themselves definitely to the convention in the absence of clear indications of U.S. support. I have therefore drafted for your signature, if you agree, a telegram to Canada House† requesting that the approval of the United Kingdom authorities be sought for the fixing of a date sometime during the last week in March on which to make an assessment of the survey results up to that date, with a view to deciding on the nature and timing of the next steps, and in particular, whether there is sufficient evidence for approaching the U.S.A.⁴²

As you know, we have gathered both from reports from Washington and from certain of our missions abroad that the attitude of the State Department to the preliminary survey and to the proposed convention is one of “benevolent neutrality,” or even “benevolent interest,” but in telegram 53 of March 23 from Oslo,† (a copy of which is attached) William C. Herrington, Special Assistant to the Under-Secretary of State is reported as having conveyed in conversations with the Norwegians the “strong impression ... that the U.S.A. attitude was definitely negative.”

2. We know from our experience before and during the two Geneva Conferences on the Law of the Sea that Mr. Herrington is personally opposed to the “six-plus-six” formula and that U.S. support for it was obtained over his opposition, and it would not be surprising therefore to learn that he is not in favour of the proposed convention. In the light of our prior knowledge of the position of the State Department it seems rather unlikely that Herrington was accurately reflecting the State Department position in his conversations with the Norwegians, but it would seem desirable to confirm this by making an inquiry in Washington. However, in Mr. Drew's telegram 1091 of March 20† (a copy of which is attached) he suggests that, for reasons he did not go into in his telegram, the utmost caution should be exercised with the U.S.A. until we have a further indication of their intentions. You may consider it advisable therefore to obtain his comments before raising the question in Washington, and I have drafted for your signature, if you agree, a telegram to Mr. Drew requesting his views.⁴³

Before his departure on Friday Lord Home sent me the following letter.

“I have now had the opportunity to give further thought to the points which you made to me, both orally and in your aide mémoire,† in the course of our conversation on March 20 about the multilateral convention on the Law of [the] Sea.

It is our view that the outcome of the North Sea Conference suggested for next October at Hague, to which you draw attention in your aide-mémoire, need not repeat not be incompatible with the proposed multilateral convention. Nor do we consider that so far as the majority of North Sea countries are concerned, the possibility of such a conference in October need delay them in declaring their attitude in principle to such a convention. I agree, therefore, that there would be advantage in taking steps to encourage them to do so.

As soon as the remaining replies to the preliminary survey have been received it will of course be necessary for Canada and UK, perhaps in conjunction with Norway, to consider in the light of the survey what the next steps should be. UK authorities therefore agree that it would not repeat not be possible to adopt course (b) at this stage and they also share the doubts of Canadian Government about the wisdom of course (a).

As regards the action to be taken in pursuance of course (c), you will remember that as was agreed at the meeting on December 8 the object of the preliminary soundings was not repeat not to seek agreement now to a convention but only to ascertain whether governments would in principle be in favour of the conclusion of such a convention.⁴⁴ It is however true that the answers even to this preliminary survey have in certain cases been only of a tentative nature. Of the countries which you mentioned to me this applies to Portugal, Holland, Denmark and Italy. I would therefore suggest that the next step would be to make a further approach to these governments to enquire whether they have yet been able to reach a decision of principle.

If you agree to this proposal I would suggest that Canadian representatives should renew representations to Portuguese and Danish authorities, to whom they made the original approach, and in that event UK representatives would similarly approach Netherlands and Italian authorities.”

2. While this letter mentions only Portugal, Holland, Denmark and Italy I had mentioned other European countries with which this subject has been discussed. However it may be best now to agree to this approach immediately so that Canada can renew representations to Portuguese and Danish authorities. Further approaches could then be suggested for early consideration.

3. The fact that Herrington expressed such concern in Oslo to Stabell about the decision of Norwegian Government to establish a six-mile territorial sea on April 1 and a twelve-mile fishing zone on September 1 may suggest we are getting nearer the appropriate time to approach the State Department because of the evidence that unilateral action by some of the most important fishing countries is no repeat no longer merely a threat but in this case a reality.

LAW OF THE SEA – PRELIMINARY SURVEY

As you will recall, in our telegram L-68 of March 3, † (a copy of which is attached) we requested the United Kingdom views on three possible courses of action for dealing with the effects of the decision of the North Sea countries to hold a further meeting in October, certain of them having given non-committal answers to our representations while awaiting the outcome of these further regional talks. The three courses of action suggested for discussion were:

(a) to keep the preliminary survey open until definite answers had been received from the North Sea countries, (a course we did not recommend);

(b) to go on with the second phase of the survey and treat the North Sea countries as being in favour of it, (a course which we thought possible but probably not the best one in the circumstances); and

(c) to make a strong effort to persuade the North Sea countries to support the convention, (the course of action which we recommended).

2. In telegram 1091 of March 20, † (a copy of which is attached) Mr. Drew reports on the favourable reaction of Lord Home concerning our suggestions, and in his telegram 1202 of March 27, (a copy of which is also attached) repeats the contents of Lord Home's letter to him confirming the agreement of the United Kingdom to make further representations to the Netherlands and Italy and suggesting that we make further representations to Portugal and Denmark.

3. By the time Lord Home's reply had been transmitted to us we had received favourable replies from Portugal and Denmark, and further representations would not therefore seem to be required, at least at this stage. I have therefore drafted for your signature,† if you agree, a telegram to Mr. Drew so informing him and asking that he pass on this information to Lord Home.⁴⁵

In Mr. Drew's telegram 1275 of April 4† (a copy of which is attached) he suggested that Lord Home be urged to raise with Mr. Rusk during his discussions with him today the question of the proposed multilateral convention on the territorial sea and contiguous fishing zone based on the Canada-U.S. "six-plus-six" Geneva Formula, and to endeavour to persuade Mr. Rusk of the urgency of joint action at the earliest possible date to establish such a convention. Although on the face of it this would seem to be a useful suggestion there are a number of reasons against adopting it, the chief of which are:

- (1) We expect to be raising with the U.S. authorities very shortly the question of their support for the proposed convention, and it might be premature to do so at this stage, since
 - (a) we have not yet completed an assessment, in conjunction with the United Kingdom, of the results of the preliminary survey, which we think would be of considerable assistance in obtaining U.S. support, and
 - (b) we understand that the State Department legal adviser recently assigned the task of studying the proposed multilateral convention has not yet completed his studies;
- (2) The question of unilateral action is, on the instructions of Cabinet, still under study, and
 - (a) the full implications of unilateral action, including the possible effect on Canada's trade relations with the United Kingdom and the U.S.A. and the general context of our relations with these countries and with others, have not yet been fully assessed;
 - (b) it would in any event seem to require Cabinet authority before the possibility of unilateral action could be mentioned to the United Kingdom or to the U.S.A.

LAW OF THE SEA

We have made a tentative assessment of the results of the preliminary survey to date on the basis of the information in our possession. Although certain countries have not yet given full and definite responses, the preliminary responses from all quarters are in our opinion reasonably favourable. This assessment is subject to such further information as may be obtained before your discussions with the U.K. authorities, but with that proviso our conclusions are as follows.

2. The replies from Australia, New Zealand, Portugal, Ireland, Spain, Switzerland and Greece have indicated definite support at a governmental level. Those from South Africa and Italy are still incomplete, but the initial reaction at the official level, with some ministries still to be heard from is favourable, with the exception, in the case of Italy, of the Ministry of Merchant Marine, which has some doubts. The response from Germany, while initially unfavourable, has been considerably modified, and Germany has indicated a willingness to sign the convention provided a substantial majority of European nations do so, and provided also perhaps, that some 12-mile states could be lined up. The official level response from Israel is similarly favourable in principle, but dependent upon the degree of support from other countries, particularly the Mediterranean states. The attitude of the Netherlands is "cautiously favourable," or one of probable support provided a regional agreement giving access to U.K. fishing grounds can be worked out. Denmark has indicated approval in principle of the proposed convention, subject to recognition of such agreements as the Danish Government may conclude concerning the phasing-out period for Greenland waters and scope of fishing rights during that period, and to a special arrangement being concluded between Denmark and the U.K. concerning the Faroes Islands. Pakistan and Turkey have both indicated indecision due to special problems, but our most recent information suggests that Pakistan would not be opposed to the convention if it appears to be the best arrangement attainable, while Turkey might give qualified support dependant upon the possible incompatibility of proposed Turkish reciprocity legislation and the inclusion or otherwise of the Brazilian amendment. The official level reply from Japan, while initially unfavourable, is now one of approval in principle, the ultimate decision depending upon the number of other signatories, especially Asian, and the non-inclusion of the Brazilian amendment. Sweden has expressed reservations and is not at this stage prepared to undertake any commitment, but its official (i.e. final) position would be influenced by the number of other signatories, particularly major fishing and shipping nations. Thailand is hesitant to commit herself to a multilateral convention of possible advantage mainly to large Maritime nations and thereby isolate herself from other "small coastal states" in the area, but is still considering the proposal. In addition to the countries which have been canvassed the positions of France and Belgium are assumed to be similar to that of the Netherlands, while Norway can be expected to support the convention. Copies of all the material on which the foregoing is based have been forwarded to you.

⁴⁶ Note marginale :/Marginal note:

P.M. concurs telegram sent April 5. H.B. R[obinson]

3. Assuming that the U.K. assessment is similar to ours, then the results would seem to be as favourable, if not more so, than we had hoped for, and there would seem to be no reason why we should not now make a joint approach with the U.K. to the U.S.A. authorities and request their active support for the next phase of the survey. The actual timing of the approach is a matter which should be discussed with the U.K. authorities, but we would assume that they would agree that the approach should be made later this month.

4. There are several questions on which an agreed approach should be worked out with the U.K. prior to speaking to the State Department. One of the most important of these is whether we should attempt to canvass all the countries represented at the last Law of the Sea Conference, plus those countries which have achieved statehood since, or whether we should restrict our approaches to likely supporters. The answer to this would seem to depend to a large extent on whether the next phase should be kept confidential. Since it is still too soon to be certain of our objective, (i.e. enough support quantitatively to open the proposed multilateral convention for signature), it seems better to maintain the confidential character of the canvass during the second phase also. Both the U.S.A. and a number of the countries to be approached may find it easier to indicate support for the scheme if it is clearly understood that they are not committed should it transpire that the multilateral approach has to be given up. There is also the point that abandonment of the scheme if it were publicly undertaken would weaken the significance of the Geneva vote on the Canada-U.S. proposal. Finally, there are the views of the eighteen countries already canvassed to be considered; presumably they would not want their views made generally known. These considerations would seem to rule out including possible opponents. What we envisage therefore is that the U.K., Canada, the U.S.A. and such countries as have already indicated a willingness in principle to sign a multilateral convention should either individually or collectively, as may be agreed, approach another group of some 25-30 countries who may be expected to react favourably. By an agreed date, the results of this second stage in the canvas would be reviewed and a decision could then be made whether further efforts should be undertaken, or the whole scheme dropped for lack of sufficient support. In making this final decision, it will of course be necessary to balance the risks in eliciting a reaction from the 12-milers against the possibility of attracting countries which had been hesitant until the end, or which had not been approached, which might be prepared to join the "club" later on.

5. We expect that U.S.A. influence may be decisive, particularly as regards Western Europeans and Latin America. We assume that, should they join the exercise, the role of the U.K. and Canada as regards these areas will be mainly in support. France, if she could be persuaded to support the scheme would, we expect, have considerable influence on a number of African countries. U.K. and Canada would then concentrate their efforts on Commonwealth countries and on isolated potential supporters in other parts of the world.

6. Another question requiring consideration is whether some or all of the eighteen countries which have been canvassed should be asked to lend their active assistance during the second phase of the survey. Our initial view is that such countries as France and Thailand, assuming their active support could be obtained with U.S. assistance, and Australia could give us considerable assistance, while it would be inadvisable to request such support from such lukewarm countries as the Netherlands and Sweden. We see no particular disadvantages of being selective as to potential canvassers, although we could see some disadvantages in having nearly but not quite all of the countries already canvassed joining in with us. Since the support of all would in any event be implicit, we think it would be advisable for the sake of simplicity of operations to restrict the numbers of canvassing countries to six or seven.

7. Another question to be decided is the position we should take concerning the Brazilian amendment. It would be unrealistic to include some of the Latin Americans in the next phase of the survey, as we assume is the intention, while hoping that they would not raise the question of the Brazilian amendment. (Thus far only Australia, Turkey and Japan have inquired concerning the amendment, but the support of Turkey is partly conditional upon it, and that of Japan almost entirely so.) In our view the only sensible course we can follow is to continue to give the same kind of answers as have been given thus far to the initial eighteen countries, and to defer final determination of this question until a later stage. A decision either for or against the amendment is bound to involve the loss of some potential signatories. It will be a question of determining which is the least expensive course.

8. The question also arises as to what should be said to countries we have already approached and what should be said to France in particular. We would assume, if the U.K. generally agrees with the assessment given in paragraph 2 above, that this information could be passed on to the other countries in question. Furthermore, if we agree to approach the U.S. we might also give these countries the main elements of our proposal to the U.S.A. This may invoke an element of pressure on the U.S.A. and may therefore require careful consideration as to presentation and timing. We do not see however, in view of our commitments to these countries that we can withhold this information. Our inclination is to think that we should move simultaneously in Washington and in the various other capitals involved and stress the confidential character of the material. We would not wish, at least initially, to encourage representations on the part of these countries while the U.S. were considering our assessment and proposals. As to France, we think that the U.K. might simply indicate in general terms that the results of the first phase are positive and that the next step is being discussed with the U.S.A.

9. As to the possible inclusion of Norway in the discussions, in our view Norway should not be invited to the next round of talks in London and later in Washington. The Norwegians have not assisted in the first phase of the survey and they have put themselves in the position merely of the other countries which have been approached so far and have given a favourable reaction. In principle they may well be informed of the results achieved so far and, if the U.S. joins us we should consider whether Norwegian assistance might not be enlisted when we approach certain countries. There is also (for your private information) the point that Stabell is unusually pessimistic and difficult in negotiations and Norway's recent record may not be an unqualified asset in approaching another group of countries which it is hoped to discourage from taking unilateral action.

10. We will also have to discuss of course the question of how many supporters will be required to warrant opening the convention for signature. We have adopted the functional approach all along, considering that if the convention could bring together the most important shipping and fishing countries this would be sufficient; such a line-up would be bound in turn to attract increasing support by its own weight of usefulness. There are others who have expressed agreement with this basic approach but, like the U.K., have emphasized the importance of broad geographical distribution, partly for strategic reasons and partly out of concern for a possible opposing 12-mile multilateral arrangement which, if it secured numerically more support than the six-plus-six convention, would leave us in a worse position than we are now in. For this reason varying figures have been advanced as the required number, such as 45, 50, 55 and this argument about numbers in turn has an effect on the purpose and shape of the exercise. It seems clear that if a minimum number of say, fifty, is considered to be essential, not only must the canvass remain confidential until this target is in sight, but the whole scheme may be compromised if it falls short of the agreed figure.

11. It seems to us that it may be wise not to get into an argument at this stage as to what should be the magical number. We are inclined to think that it may be better to persuade the U.S. to join us in the second stage, in an effort to approach and persuade as many countries as possible. By an agreed date, we could review the results of our individual and joint efforts and determine what the next step should be. If we could line up say 40 countries, including all the key countries from the functional point of view, and achieve a reasonable geographical distribution, this would be preferable to a group of, say 50 but badly distributed, not including important fishing or shipping countries, and numbering such entities as Monaco, the Vatican, etc. The ideal would of course be to have the requisite number both as to distribution and importance, and the next phase of the survey should be devised with this in mind. It may be useful to have some tentative figure in mind as a provisional goal to be assigned to this second stage, but we would very much hope that the U.K. would agree that we would suggest to the U.S. the more flexible and tentative formula outlined above rather than proceed on the basis of an arbitrary and possibly dangerous set figure as our target. The main object at this time should be to obtain more supporters. We can always decide later whether we have enough to open the convention for signature.

12. Finally, the question arises as to which countries should be approached, and by whom. We think it might be good tactics to present the State Department with a concrete plan of action, including the names of those countries we should like them to approach, should they be prepared to join us in this operation. It would be made clear of course that such suggestions were being raised merely for consideration by the State Department, and that their support for the convention and assistance in the survey would be in no way tied to the particular plan of action. Such a procedure might lessen the delay which could result from the three-way discussions otherwise required and would, we think, be more persuasive, than a mere request for support. The list of countries which we would put forth for consideration by the U.K., and subsequently, if they agree, by the U.S.A., is as follows:

Austria (USA),	Belgium (USA),	Bolivia (USA)
Brazil (USA)	Ceylon (UK & Canada)	China (USA)
Columbia (USA & Canada)	Cyprus (UK & Canada)	France (USA)
Guatemala (USA)	Haiti (USA)	Holy See (USA & Italy)
Honduras (USA)	Iceland (UK & USA)	Jordan (UK & USA)
Korea (USA)	Lebanon (USA)	Liberia (USA)
Luxembourg (USA)	Monaco (France)	Nigeria (UK & Canada)
Paraguay (USA)	Philippines (Australia & USA)	San Marino (Italy)
Tunisia (USA & UK)	Uruguay (USA)	Vietnam (USA)

In addition to the foregoing consideration can be given later to approaches involving the Casablanca states, assuming French support can be obtained and possibly Ghana. It seems from an examination of this list, (and this is why we think it may be advantageous to present it to the U.S.A.) that the support of approximately half of these countries could be fairly easily obtained with U.S.A. assistance. This would mean in effect that if a figure of approximately 44 or 45 is used as the target then we have already obtained support in principle of varying degrees from nearly half of the required number, and with U.S.A. assistance that of a further quarter can be assumed. The question to be decided by the U.S.A. therefore is whether it would be worthwhile to try and obtain the support of the remaining few countries required. Put in these concrete terms the State Department might find our representations more persuasive than if they are made only in general terms. In any case the list would be reviewed during the tripartite U.K.-U.S.A.-Canada talks.

LAW OF THE SEA

The text of the Memorandum of Agreement is as follows:

“CANADIAN-UK SURVEY FOR A MULTILATERAL CONVENTION

On May 2, a meeting was held at Foreign Office between UK and Canadian officials to discuss future policy following the conclusion of the first phase of Canadian-UK survey of the prospects of support for a multilateral convention on the Law of the Sea. The following conclusions were reached for submission to the two governments as agreed recommendations:

(1) UK and Canadian assessments of the results of the preliminary survey coincided in all important respects. It was recognized that if USA support could be obtained for the project, most of the implicit or explicit reservations made by some of the countries so far approached would tend to disappear.

(2) Both UK and Canada regarded the results of the preliminary survey as sufficiently encouraging to warrant making an approach to USA with a view to enlisting their support for a survey of a further selection of countries. It was considered that USA participation was essential to the continuation and success of the project.

(3) The approach to USA authorities would be made initially by Canada and would be supported by UK. This would be done as soon as possible, privately and quietly, by the ambassadors of the two countries at a time to be decided on the spot. The instructions to the ambassadors would be drafted by Canada, jointly agreed, and locally coordinated.

(4) Immediately the approach to USA has been confirmed, the 18 countries included in the preliminary survey would be informed in broad terms that the results were sufficiently encouraging to justify an approach being made to USA, and that UK and Canada were proceeding accordingly. At the same time UK would inform France and Belgium in similar terms. In all cases the need for secrecy should be stressed. Norway should also be informed at the same time and not repeat not earlier than the 18 countries above referred to.

(5) In giving Norwegian authorities the results of the preliminary survey, UK authorities might, at their discretion, give a numerical breakdown of the main trends revealed, but without mentioning names of the countries concerned, and express the hope that, should USA react positively to Canadian-UK approach, Norway might be prepared to reconsider its position and be willing to take an active part in the second phase of the survey.

(6) With a view to enlisting their support, USA authorities would be given full details of the survey. A concrete plan of action for the second phase would at the same time be suggested to them. Such a plan would be presented merely for consideration by USA, but it would also serve to illustrate and emphasize the merits and practicability of the whole scheme.

(7) The method of conducting the second phase of the survey and the final selection of countries to be approached would be discussed and agreed between UK, Canada and USA. The list of countries that would initially be suggested to USA for inclusion in the second phase of the survey is reproduced in annex. The second phase of the survey would be conducted by USA, UK and Canada jointly, possibly with the assistance of additional countries as might be desirable in certain cases.

(8) It would be suggested to USA that France should not repeat not be approached until the second phase of the survey had proceeded some distance and a sufficiently impressive amount of support had already been gathered.

(9) The governments to be approached in the second phase of the survey would, as was done in the first phase, simply be asked whether they would in principle favour the conclusion of a multilateral convention based on Geneva formula. Note would be taken of any comments made in respect of the so-called Brazilian amendment. The question of whether Brazilian amendment should be retained or discarded would be decided at a later stage in the light of the balance of advantages and disadvantages involved. It would be for consideration, in this connection, whether Argentina, Brazil, Uruguay and Iceland, which are known to be in favour of Brazilian amendment, should be approached in the second phase of the survey or later.

(10) The final decision concerning the desirability of opening a convention for signature would depend upon the importance (from a shipping and fishing point of view), the number and geographical distribution of the states prepared to accept it. It was recognized that the number should be such as to confer some status in international law to the convention and discourage the conclusion of "rump" conventions in competition with it. The sponsors would, however, adopt a flexible attitude to this question and reserve their final decision until the results of the survey had been ascertained.

Following is annex of countries to be approached in second phase of survey:

Argentina (USA)	Austria (USA)	Belgium (USA)
Bolivia (USA)	Brazil (USA)	Ceylon (UK & Canada)
China (USA)	Colombia (USA & Canada)	Costa Rica (USA)
Cyprus (UK & Canada)	Dominican Republic (USA)	France (USA)
Guatemala (USA)	Haiti (USA)	Holy See (USA & Italy)
Honduras (USA)	Iceland (USA & Canada)	Jordan (UK & USA)
Korea (USA)	Lebanon (USA)	Liberia (USA)
Luxembourg (USA)	Monaco (France)	Nicaragua (USA)
Nigeria (UK & Canada)	Paraguay (USA)	Philippines (Australia & USA)
San Marino (Italy)	Tunisia (USA & UK)	Uruguay (USA)
Vietnam (USA).

LAW OF THE SEA

I was able to see the Acting Secretary of State (Bowles) this evening. With him was Yingling, Assistant Legal Adviser, who is responsible for Law of the Sea matters. Because of the urgency and importance which we attach to this question, I had a copy of the aide mémoire which I left with Bowles'† passed on to Yingling earlier in the day. I also had a preliminary talk with Yingling before seeing Bowles.

2. In my talk with Bowles I did not repeat not go into the details of the agreed Canada-UK approach but suggested that if there were any elucidations required I would be glad to have further discussions arranged with Yingling. Meanwhile I contented myself with a brief outline of the background of the Canada-USA Geneva formula and of the joint UK-Canada canvass from which we had concluded that the portents for a convention were encouraging. However, if the scheme for a convention were to have any chance of success, USA participation was now essential. I went on to say that we hoped very much that USA would be able to join UK and ourselves in a second phase of the canvass and that to facilitate this we had set out some suggestions for a proposed plan of action, assuming USA support. We also proposed three way talks be held as soon as possible to discuss the timing and nature of the next step of the canvass.

3. I pointed out that not repeat not only would a convention have the advantages which were outlined in the aide mémoire, perhaps one of the most important of which was helping to curb the drift to the twelve mile territorial sea, but that it would also make unnecessary unilateral action on the extension of fishing limits which could generate disharmony among friendly countries. I recalled that during the debate in the House of Commons on the Fisheries Act on May 2 there had been expressed sentiments in favour of Canada taking unilateral action to extend its fisheries limit in the light of the failure of the Geneva Conference and assuming there were no repeat no convention which might capitalize on the wide measure of agreement obtained at Geneva. I said that not repeat not only in the interests of international relations generally but also in the interests of Canada-USA bilateral relations, building on the agreement already reached was important to all of us.

4. The Acting Secretary who, is not repeat not of course familiar with the details of this question, expressed his interest in our proposal and undertook to have USA position reconsidered actively and to let us know the results of their reconsideration as soon as possible.

5. Incidentally UK Embassy will follow up our approach with Yingling tomorrow morning, May 16. It will apparently not repeat not be convenient for UK Ambassador to see Bowles. However we suggested that it would be helpful, in the interests of persuading USA to join in the survey, if Caccia could take an early opportunity of mentioning UK interest in the success of this project and their hope of USA active participation, either to Secretary Rusk on his return to Washington or to Acting Secretary Bowles.

LAW OF [THE] SEA

We anticipate further inquiries similar to that contained in Hague telegram 200 May 17 as a result of differences between our instructions and those of UK to our respective missions in countries canvassed. As you know, it is our view that countries canvassed could be treated as having implicitly agreed by their participation in survey to their position being made known to other countries canvassed, and we were prepared therefore to pass on this information in limited terms to each of them. As a result of discussions with UK officials however it was decided that this could not repeat not be done without permission first having been obtained. We have therefore instructed our missions to obtain this permission. (Our letter of provisional instructions of April 28† as amended by our telegram 263 May 16).‡ Our reasons for doing so are as follows.

(a) We think that it is at this point – before a USA decision is made – that countries concerned will be particularly interested in knowing results of survey. Should USA say no repeat no to operation, then they will have little reason to care about positions of one another, while if USA should say yes: then information will be of secondary interest. Now is the time when they will be interested in it, and the time when they have been led to expect it.

(b) Each of countries concerned has made a difficult decision in making its confidential position known to us, and in so doing is, we think, entitled to something in return. We do not repeat not consider that it would be fair to them, nor desirable tactics, in terms of future co-operation in this field, to hold back real information, thereby implying that they could not repeat not be trusted with it, while making it evident that we are using it in our discussions with USA. Moreover, our missions would be embarrassed if they were not repeat not permitted to pass on results of survey in face of definite requests for it from certain countries (such as Italy, Japan and Israel) while having no repeat no sensible reason to give for not repeat not being able to do so. In requesting permission to pass on this information they are not repeat not only giving a reasonable answer to possible inquiries but are taking the operation a stage further.

(c) Should countries concerned be told of results of survey now they might well wish to supplement our representations to USA, if they are genuinely interested in signing proposed convention, whereas they are hardly in a position to do so merely on basis of information that we and UK have considered that results warrant such action on our part. We would have no repeat no objections to other countries doing so; danger of leaks could be guarded against and possible results would be worth risks.

(d) We do not repeat not have communication facilities of UK, and we have therefore taken advantage of delays in decisions by UK, both in our original instructions and those on this point, by sending out our instructions ahead of time by bag in somewhat fuller form than could have been done by telegram (and subsequently confirming them, subject to necessary amendments, by telegram) so as to eliminate as much as possible necessity for later inquiries.

2. We have not repeat not felt it proper to comment at any stage on UK instructions to their mission, although, as you know, UK has not repeat not had similar inhibitions. We feel however that in this case the question is sufficiently important that you should raise it informally with UK officials, so as to give them an opportunity to have their instructions conform more closely to ours, and thereby avoid difficulty mentioned by Sarell of having a certain amount of confusion and misunderstanding develop, particularly since our requests for permission to circulate results are only being made in those countries where we are one of sounding countries.

LAW OF [THE] SEA

Informed today Foreign Office greatly upset by different instructions sent to missions accredited to 18 countries included in preliminary survey.

2. Am unable [to] reassure them. On the contrary am personally greatly disturbed by your reference telegram.

3. After several telegrams and two phone calls memorandum of recommendations approved by the officials of both governments was forwarded to Ottawa on May 10.

4. I had been urged to press for earliest possible approval by UK Government in view of impending arrival in Ottawa of President of USA. As a result of my emphasis on importance of early decision, UK Government approved of Memorandum of Understanding between officials and the instructions to ambassadors as amended by our telegram 1752 May 11.†

5. I submit that the decision of Canadian Government to act upon that message and approach USA authorities on Monday May 15 could only be interpreted as unqualified acceptance of the same Memorandum of Understanding between officials and the instructions to ambassadors which had been the condition of approval by UK Government. Otherwise we were in fact acting without their approval.

6. We have had most satisfactory relations with UK Government and officials since initiation of these discussions, and am greatly concerned about effect of action taken upon basis of agreement which was clearly subject to explicit conditions covered by my telegram 1766 May 12† unless we are prepared to accept same conditions.

7. Hope this will be reconsidered immediately and that further approaches may be made on basis of agreed instructions. If that is not repeat not the decision then I suggest immediate instructions should be sent to Canadian missions to take no repeat no further action until new directions can be sent. As for pressing for reply would welcome information at earliest convenience.

LAW OF [THE] SEA

As I am reporting on discussions with Sarell today, as suggested in your reference telegram, I shall not repeat not mention in detail points raised in the early part of your reference telegram. However, I do wish to make it clear there has been no repeat no attempt by UK to control our instructions to Washington or our missions in countries canvassed as suggested in paragraph 5.

2. Since beginning of these discussions several months ago Canadian and UK officials have had most cordial relationship and have sought in every way possible to assure uniform action in carrying forward the plans upon which both governments were agreed. When a copy of the instructions to be sent to UK missions was forwarded to Ottawa, this was done with the thought that if there were any difference of opinion those differences might be reconciled before further action was taken. Concern expressed yesterday by UK Government was because of queries they were receiving as a result of the difference in the two sets of instructions.

3. There is no repeat no evidence whatever of any reluctance on the part of UK to cooperate in every way. On the contrary they acted very promptly when we indicated to them the need for an early decision the week before last. At a time when they were under extremely heavy pressure, I do wish to emphasize that ministers and officials showed the utmost desire to obtain a favourable decision from UK Government as quickly as possible.

4. As Sarell was senior official available today points raised by your reference telegram were taken up with him as suggested.

5. Sarell explained that their concern had been based upon the fact that the instructions given to Canadian missions were more comprehensive than those given to UK missions in three main respects. More specifically, Canadian missions were asked:

(a) To seek permission from the governments to which they are accredited to pass on to the other 17 countries canvassed information on the attitude which they have taken during the preliminary survey.

(b) To inform them in some detail of the plan of action which UK and Canada had submitted to USA for the second phase of the survey.

(c) To enquire as to whether they would have any objection to their attitude on the proposed convention being passed on to any of countries to be approached in the second phase of the survey.

6. Sarell was reticent in responding to our efforts to obtain reasons why UK thought it desirable to limit the information given to the 18 at this stage. He merely reaffirmed that in the opinion of UK the action we are taking is "premature and tactically unwise." This referred particularly to Canadian decision to divulge to the 18 the plan of action submitted to USA for consideration. Nevertheless he said that what had been done had been done, and UK authorities would now re-examine the situation to see what could be done to bring their instructions more closely in line with ours. Sarell conceded that in the end UK fears, which he did not repeat not further define, might well prove to have been groundless.

7. Sarell seemed to be particularly concerned about the fact that we should be giving as much information as we are to Sweden, as they are known to be rather lukewarm to our plan. He thought that it would be necessary for UK to supplement the rather limited information which they had already given to Norway as the latter was bound to hear from Sweden in due course.

8. We reminded Sarell that he had indicated to us at an earlier stage that it would be necessary for Foreign Office to obtain further ministerial approval before supplementary instructions similar to Canadian instructions could be sent to UK missions concerned. Sarell thought that as far as Foreign Office is concerned a further ministerial decision may not repeat not be necessary. He could not repeat not assure us, however, that the other ministries concerned, and particularly the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, would necessarily take the same view. Sarell conceded that this question is largely one of interpretation of paragraph 4 of the memorandum of agreement, involving procedure rather than substance.

9. Sarell undertook to consult the other ministries concerned immediately and to let us know as soon as possible what further action UK may now be able to take.

LAW OF THE SEA; PROPOSED MULTILATERAL CONVENTION

The attached telegram 1927 of May 26 from London† reports that the French have decided to support the proposed convention and wish to join in the next stage of the survey. As you know, we had assumed on the basis of the French reactions to date that they would be among the most difficult to persuade, and this change in the French position is therefore an extremely favourable development.

2. The importance of French support goes beyond the mere increase in the number of potential signatories. Last fall, when we were endeavouring to persuade the U.S.A. to join us in this operation, French support was made a virtual precondition to obtaining that of the U.S.A., and the preliminary survey was designed in large part as an alternative method of bringing in the U.S.A. The encouraging results of the preliminary survey, coupled now with the news of French support, should have very favourable effects on the U.S.A.

3. Apart from their potential influence upon the U.S.A. the French could also prove very helpful with several European countries, and, equally important, with some of the French-African states. It would not in fact be going too far to say that the support of France added to that of the U.S.A. could assure the success of the convention.

4. The French have attached certain conditions to their support, one of which is that the proposed convention shall not effect conventions or other international agreements already in force as between parties to them or preclude the conclusion of bilateral or multilateral agreements for the purpose of regulating matters of fishing.

5. The first part of this reservation (existing agreements to remain in effect) has a direct implication for Canada in the light of Canada's fishing treaty obligations to France, but the provision is in any event merely a restatement of the law since we would in any event be bound by pre-existing treaties. The proposed convention would however raise certain questions which would require renegotiation with the French, such as whether or not the French rights to fish within Canada's territorial waters off Newfoundland shores would extend over the whole new six-mile territorial waters belt or only over the three-mile belt closest to shore. It would be necessary to point this out to the French in due course, but this would not require our non-acceptance of the French stipulation on this point.

6. Perhaps more important, particularly for the United Kingdom is the second part of this reservation, (the right to conclude bilateral or multilateral agreements on fishing) coupled with the suggestion that France would not wish to sign the proposed convention until a regional North Sea fisheries agreement had been concluded. The United Kingdom may choose to regard the proposed North Sea discussions at The Hague as supplementary to the proposed convention and intended to cover chiefly conservation measures and various technical matters, but the French no doubt intend to try and extract fisheries concessions from the United Kingdom at The Hague as a precondition to signing the convention.

7. The effect of the second reservation concerning the possible extension of the tapering-off-period remains to be seen, but both the French and the United Kingdom have chosen, at least at this stage, not to emphasize the importance of this condition.

8. It may be said therefore that while the French reservations suggest the possibility of difficult negotiations for the United Kingdom and, to a lesser extent, for Canada, they do not outweigh the benefits of obtaining French support for the proposed convention.

9. I have therefore drafted for your signature if you agree, a telegram to London† stressing the importance with which we regard this development, suggesting that the United Kingdom Embassy in Washington pass on the news to the U.S.A. as soon as possible, proposing that the French be included in four-way talks if the U.S.A. agrees to support the proposed convention, and raising also certain other questions partly connected with the French decision.⁴⁷

Projet de Note
Draft Memorandum

SECRET. CANADIAN EYES ONLY.

[Ottawa], June 1, 1961

POSSIBLE CONSEQUENCES, IN TERMS OF CANADA-UNITED STATES TRADE RELATIONS, OF A UNILATERAL EXTENSION BY CANADA OF TERRITORIAL WATERS AND CONTIGUOUS FISHING ZONE

In considering the possible economic consequences of a unilateral extension, without prior bilateral negotiations between Canada and the United States, of Canadian territorial waters and contiguous zone, it should not necessarily be assumed that the only consequences would be the possible effects on the Canadian fishing industry arising out of the obvious quid pro quo in the case of the United States in the connection between fishing rights and markets. (This connection has been made, however, in the disputes between the United Kingdom and Iceland and in the negotiations between the United Kingdom and Norway.)

⁴⁷ Note marginale :/Marginal note:
Sent 30.5.61. [Auteur inconnu/Author unknown]

2. Although it is probably unrealistic to envisage direct retaliation by the United States, it is likely that unpalatable consequences for Canada wider than those relating to the Canadian fisheries market in the U.S.A. might ensue. The most serious foreseeable result could take place with respect to United States trade agreements legislation which is vital to us since in the absence of such legislation (by which Congress delegates certain specified tariff-modifying powers to the President) it would be almost impossible in future for us to bring about reductions in the level of the United States tariff or to benefit from negotiated reductions in favour of other countries.

3. The present Trade Agreement Extension Act expires on June 30, 1962. On previous occasions when this legislation (originally adopted in 1934) was presented for renewal Congressional approval was granted only grudgingly and there is good reason to believe that the forthcoming battle for renewal will be even closer. Protectionist pressures in Washington are very strong now; on the other hand the Kennedy Administration has been seeking to resist these pressures and to encourage solutions more compatible with United States international obligations. Since the vote in Congress is expected in any case to be close, the approach taken by New England and the West Coast representatives could be decisive. An extension of our territorial waters and exclusive fishing zone, which could be interpreted as adversely affecting the ability of New England and United States Pacific Coast fishermen to earn a livelihood, might influence the large number of representatives which these areas send to Congress to vote against the Trade Agreement Extension Act. This would mean that for an indefinite period the Administration would be without authority to negotiate United States tariff reductions.

4. If our action were to result in impairment of Canadian access to the United States market for fishery products, the economic consequences could be serious and geographically widespread. Our exports of fishery products to the United States have an annual value of some $100 million, and represent 50 per cent of total Canadian production. This market is vital to the fishing industries of the Atlantic Coast and inland provinces, as well as to the halibut fishery of British Columbia. The loss of any significant part of it would seriously affect employment and income in these areas.

5. From the economic point of view the advantage to our fishing communities of extending our territorial sea and fishing zone is difficult to evaluate but the most careful estimates available suggest that it is not substantial. Clearly enough though, if the increased catches which could result were not marketable at remunerative prices (because of United States reaction to our move) our fishermen would realize no benefit, and might well suffer a worsening of their economic position.

6. The reaction of the U.S.A. of unilateral extension not proceeded by negotiation might take one or more of three forms:

- (i) Withdrawal, by the Administration, of tariff concessions or the imposition of quotas on fisheries items which have been negotiated with Canada.
- (ii) Tightening up, or more stringent application of the Food and Drug Regulations, a measure which would have particular significance for Canada's inland fisheries.
- (iii) Legislative action by Congress.

7. While the possibility of the Administration taking action along the lines set out in (i) and (ii) cannot be completely discounted, it is likely that the President and his advisers would be restrained by their estimate of the effect that such action would have on their general relations with Canada, and on the United States' future ability to play an effective role as the responsible leader of the Western Alliance.

8. Congress, on the other hand, is less likely to be inhibited by such considerations and it is in the area of Congressional action that the greatest danger would lie. More specifically, the risk would be that Congress, out of sympathy with the United States fisheries interests affected by our action would provide those interests with the restrictive legislation they have been seeking for some years now. This could place in jeopardy some very important segments of our trade in fisheries products. To cite a few examples: our valuable trade in lobster would have been seriously curtailed if Congress had adopted a bill which has been put forward by Maine interests; in 1958 a bill was introduced into both Houses (Senator J.F. Kennedy was one of the co-sponsors of the Senate bill) which would have had the effect of increasing the tariff on fish blocks from 1¢ to 2½¢ per pound; United States producers of fish meal and solubles have been vocal in their demands for increased protection; representatives of the New England ground fishery have been persistent in their efforts to obtain increased protection from import competition. While very few of these efforts to restrict the United States market have succeeded in the past, any measure which antagonized New England and Pacific Coast public opinion would increase the probability that Congress would look at future efforts more sympathetically.

9. Quite apart from the field of fishery products, bills are continuously introduced before Congress which, if enacted, would prejudice our access to the United States market for one product or another. The great bulk of these bills either are not reported out of committee or, if they reach the floor of Congress, are talked out. To provide the politically-active fishing industry of the United States with a grievance, real or imagined, would be to raise the possibility that Congress would enact more of these restrictive bills into law.

10. However, if Canadian action were to be preceded by substantive negotiations with the United States, the forces within the United States which are favourable to imports from Canada could be brought into play. These forces include: importers who depend on Canadian supplies; United States fishing companies which have large investments in Canada; and important segments of the Administration. The influence of these groups could have a valuable tempering effect on Congressional reaction to the Canadian move.

Conclusions

11. In terms of Canada-United States trade relations the most probable, and potentially most damaging, consequences to Canadian interests of a unilateral extension (without prior bilateral negotiations between Canada and the United States) of Canadian territorial waters and contiguous fishing zone would result from adverse Congressional reaction which would take the form of specific legislation designed to restrict the United States market for fish (and other products) as well as modification of United States trade agreements legislation. Action by the Administration through withdrawal of tariff concessions or application of quotes cannot be completely ruled out, but this would seem to be less likely.

12. In the area of restrictive legislation aimed at particular products any action by us which could be construed as harmful to New England and Pacific Coast fishing interests would increase the probability of sympathetic consideration by Congress to demands for increased protection, which, if not, could place in jeopardy important segments of our trade in fisheries products. Similar considerations might well apply to other products where protectionist forces might gain the margin of additional support required to secure passage of restrictive legislation which could seriously damage Canadian export trade.

13. In the wider area of United States trade agreements legislation, any action by us which antagonized New England and Pacific Coast public opinion might adversely affect the attitudes of congressmen from those areas to the Trade Agreements Extension Act which expires on June 30, 1962. If this legislation is not renewed or replaced the Administration will be without authority to negotiate on the United States tariff, making it almost impossible for Canada to realize reductions in the levels of United States tariffs in future and could lead to increasingly protectionist policies throughout the rest of the Western trading world, including particularly our European markets.

London, June 6, 1961

My dear Marcel [Cadieux]:

The reason I was concerned about an apparent misunderstanding in regard to the instructions to be sent to the Canadian and British Missions was simply the result of my very firm conviction that the success of our efforts depends on complete co-operation and understanding with the British Government and the officials directly connected with these activities. I don't believe this has deprived us of any support we require at this time.

As I indicated in a telegram I sent to the Minister yesterday,† there is no feeling of rancour as a result of the misunderstanding regarding the difference in instruction which has already been fully explained. On the contrary, I found Godber in very good spirit and apparently most anxious to co-operate in every way he can. But I do come back to the fact that between Canada and Britain we have carried the whole load of this enterprise. It would therefore be most unfortunate if any lack of confidence should develop as a result of any misunderstanding, whether justified or not. Undoubtedly, they were disturbed at the time. I am sure that concern is now resolved. There apparently was some justification for their hesitation about adopting similar instructions to those which were sent to the Canadian Missions. You will recall that some of the countries they had agreed to approach did indicate their opposition to the course suggested in our instructions. However, I can only repeat that there seems to be no further cause for worry on this score.

Quite frankly, I am not too greatly impressed with the importance of supporting arguments by other countries at this time. I think the United States will make up their mind on the basis of the representations we have made as to the result of the survey already completed. I think our main objective should be to employ every available argument to obtain their consent. It is even possible that if some others start to present their arguments at this time it might only result in some measure of confusion. Either the State Department accepts our assessment or they do not. If they do, I don't know that anything need be added in the way of further arguments by representatives of other countries at this time.

I was very happy to learn from your letter† that the Prime Minister had spoken to President Kennedy while he was in Ottawa about the plans for a Convention on the Law of the Sea. As this subject was raised also with Dean Rusk, who had already been approached by Arnold Heeney after a fairly thorough personal briefing on the subject by our friend Arthur Dean, I would hope that the combined result of these approaches would mean an early consideration at the highest level of the United States position in regard to this problem. I recognize that they have some vitally important issues immediately in front of them. Perhaps for that reason Heeney might be asked to find some reason for bringing this subject again to Rusk's attention at the earliest convenient date.

I shall deal first with the last question in your letter as to why I thought we should agree with the United Kingdom in an interpretation of the memorandum of understanding which deprived us of some support. Quite frankly, I do not think that is quite what I suggested at any time. We had reached complete agreement on the memorandum of understanding. The point in regard to which a difference of opinion arose was in connection with the instructions to the Canadian and British Missions.

I hope that Yingling's comments to Jim Nutt may be a favourable indication of the way the wind is blowing at Washington. Assuming that we do get a favourable reply, as I hope we shall, then I would think that the wishes of the State Department might very well be given the utmost consideration in deciding the place where the tri-partite talks will take place. Unless the United States authorities are greatly concerned about the possibility that a meeting in Washington would attract attention from their fishing lobbies, it may well be that it would have a beneficial effect on the representatives of countries whose support we hope to gain if this positive evidence were given of United States initiative in carrying this plan toward completion. But I can only repeat that I regard the approval of the United States as our main target. Obviously, the question as to where the talks will take place does not arise until they have indicated their approval, but if, as and when that approval is given then I should think this subject should be brought up immediately and we should go a long way in meeting their wishes for tactical reasons. I think there are obvious reasons under the circumstances why Ottawa is not the logical place for this meeting. There has been no question at any time about the fact that this is a Canadian plan. For that reason, I think we have much to gain by the meeting taking place either in Washington or in London, and for the reasons I have indicated I would advise that we follow the course which seems most satisfactory to the United States.

I doubt very much that it would be advisable to consider asking France to be a party to the talks which will follow United States approval in the first instance. I have never believed that the approval of France was a real pre-condition of agreement by the United States. I was under the impression, and I thought you shared that impression, that when Dillon seized upon the reservations raised by Couve de Murville it was merely an excuse for postponing discussion of this subject until after the elections. Certainly that was the impression shared by Arthur Dean himself. I should think that the first discussion should be a discussion of tactics by three countries fully committed, and that the presence of France at those discussions, with the reservations they have made, might prove a serious handicap. In any event, I find it difficult to think that we could invite France and not invite Norway, which was in on the first discussions. It does not seem to me that their reservations are in fact nearly as serious as those now put forward by France.

Please do not misunderstand me. I think everything should be done to gain French support. I think, however, that it is usually a fairly sound proposition that, when you are trying to build up strength behind a clear proposition, it is not wise to have anyone on the inside at the outset who is not wholeheartedly committed to the plan which it is intended to put forward. I still come back to the fact that once the approval of the United States is gained, I am convinced that there will be a very rapid accession of supporting countries.

I am greatly interested in the bill introduced by Frank Howard seeking unilateral action by the Canadian Parliament. While this bill will undoubtedly go the way of all similar private members' bills, it might do no harm if this were brought to the attention of the State Department as an indication of the way independent thinking in Canada is moving on this subject. Perhaps that has already been done. By the same token, I think it might also be very helpful if this were brought to the attention of the Quai d'Orsay simply as a matter of information.

I am hopeful that we shall get an early decision. You know that I have taken a fairly firm stand on several occasions in our dealings with the United Kingdom representatives. On the other hand, I do not think it is wise to assume too readily that any delay on their part means a lack of interest in this subject. The fact is that there has seldom been a time since the war when there were so many vitally important subjects before the British Government. Lord Home has hardly been in his office for the past two months. Heath has been similarly engaged all over Europe. Christopher Soames has been deeply involved in some of the agricultural negotiations which have been under way. I mention this only to indicate that there perhaps have been some reasons for difficulty in obtaining ministerial action on points which we have dealt with more quickly.

You know how strongly I reacted to the attempted intervention by Duncan Sandys, who was in fact openly opposed to our plan. I assure you, however, that my own impression has been strengthening, rather than otherwise, that since we got this back on the track the subject has been dealt with by the British Government in a favourable atmosphere.

George Carty dropped in to see me today. I was delighted to know that he had been attending a conference in Geneva which was discussing Government action in promoting tourist business. I believe that much can be done to build up a real tourist trade from this country to Canada, and I am hopeful that what he sees in London on this trip will persuade him that this is desirable.

Warmest personal regards.

Yours ever,

GEORGE DREW

Note d'information pour la visite du premier ministre japonais

Briefing Note for Visit of Japanese Prime Minister

SECRET. CANADIAN EYES ONLY.

[Ottawa], June 13, 1961

LAW OF THE SEA

Japan is the most important fishing nation in the world; her distant-water fishing fleets operate in widely separated areas and the total catch of her fishing fleet exceeds that of any other country. For this reason Japan was included amongst the 18 key countries canvassed by Canada and the United Kingdom in order to determine the extent of support for a multilateral convention on the breadth of the territorial sea and a contiguous zone based on the "six-plus-six" formula.

2. Japan's initial response to our representations indicated support in principle for the proposed convention, provided that a sufficient number of other countries support it, and provided also that the convention does not recognize the fisheries jurisdiction of a coastal state beyond the 12-mile limit. (The joint Canada-U.S.A. "six-plus-six" proposal which came so close to acceptance at Geneva included the so-called "Brazilian Amendment," whereby states able to prove "special situations" could exercise certain kinds of control beyond the 12-mile limit.)⁴⁸ In recent discussions, however the Japanese have declined to consent to their position being made known to the other countries canvassed, and have also watered down their original response by saying that while it is believed that in fact Japan would approve a multilateral convention if there were sufficient support for it, they were not sure whether Japan could now adopt that definite a position.

3. This vacillation is consistent with Japan's past record on this question, (at the 1960 Conference, after having indicated support for the Canada-U.S.A. proposal, Japan did not in the event vote for it, but abstained, with the result that the proposal failed by only one vote), and suggests that further persuasion may be required.

4. Japan's support is by no means as essential as it was at Geneva in 1960, since the basis of the present approach is functional rather than numerical, and the proposed convention would not stand or fall by one vote more or less. However, the support of Japan as one of the world's major shipping and fishing nations would greatly contribute to the acceptance of the proposed convention, in time, as a "law-making treaty," and could also have considerable influence on the attitudes of other countries.

5. You may wish therefore to take the opportunity, should the subject be raised during your discussions, to suggest that since the proposed convention could, as a potential "law-making treaty," go a long way to achieving a rule of law on the breadth of the territorial sea and a contiguous fishing zone, and since Japan's position as a major fishing and shipping nation would seem to give her a considerable interest in obtaining certainty of the law in this field, we are hopeful that Japan will lend her support to the proposed convention.

LAW OF THE SEA

At the request of the Minister (please see his note on the attached memorandum),[†] I saw this afternoon at 4.00 Mr. Merchant, the U.S. Ambassador, who was accompanied by Mr. Smith.

2. I reminded the Ambassador that more than six weeks had elapsed since we had submitted a memorandum to the State Department enquiring whether the United States would be prepared to join the United Kingdom and Canada in the second phase of the survey concerning the proposed multilateral convention. We were hoping that it might be possible for the State Department to let us have a reply fairly soon.

3. I reminded Mr. Merchant that, in the first phase of the survey, we had approached a fairly large number of countries and that it could be assumed that these countries like us would be interested in knowing whether the United States would be prepared to join in this exercise. If there was too much delay, there was danger that the impetus might be lost and that some countries might develop interests in other solutions. It was also possible that unilateral action might be taken by other countries which had not been approached and this would not improve the general conditions in the next phase of the survey should it be decided that it should be pursued.

4. I also said that it should not be assumed, if the United States decided not to join the survey, that Canada would simply do nothing. I could not say what action was contemplated. The matter had not yet been considered by Cabinet but I felt sure that the Embassy had noticed that there was a good deal of pressure developing in the country, on both coasts, for some kind of solution to be found to these problems. There has been a good deal of discussion in the House of Commons and the Government had been able, but with some difficulty, to hold the line and not to say anything as to what they had in mind. Should the United States decide not to join in the next phase of the survey, I felt that the United States authorities should appreciate that the Government here will be under increasing and very substantial pressure to consider some kind of action. As the United Nations multilateral convention had been rejected in Geneva, if the United States were to reject the multilateral convention approach, the possible courses open to the Government in Canada would appear to be somewhat limited.

5. Mr. Merchant said that, as a result of the change in the Administration, there was now a new set of officials in policy-making positions and it was always a little difficult for them, as they were taking over, to make decisions quickly. He had also anticipated when we had made the move that a good deal of inter-departmental consultation would be required and that an early reply could not be expected. He undertook, however, to transmit our request immediately to Washington. He said that he had noticed that pressure on the Government for action on the Law of the Sea had been building up.

SUMMARY OF DISCUSSIONS WITH MR. W.C. HERRINGTON, ET AL, SEPTEMBER 8, 1961, 10.30 A.M.

The discussions were held in Mr. Herrington's office at 10.30 A.M. In attendance were Messrs. Herrington, Hubbard and Taylor, representing the State Department, and Mr. Terry, representing the Fish and Wildlife Service of the Department of the Interior. Mr. Brimelow of the United Kingdom Embassy was also present.

The writer introduced the subject and explained the advantages of a multilateral convention and the difficulties in not proceeding with a further survey with U.S. participation.

It was evident that as far as the Fisheries group was concerned they were opposed, not only to participation by the U.S. in the continued survey, but to the very idea of a multilateral convention. Mr. Herrington and his associates expressed the view that the U.S. was prepared at the Geneva Conference to sacrifice its security and fisheries interests in order to achieve stability in this branch of international law. A multilateral convention outside the United Nations would not achieve the same purpose. He thought that at Geneva in 1960 we reached the peak of support for our proposal and that from then on it would be difficult to get a sufficient number of countries to make the project worthwhile. He referred to the fact that it would not be possible to keep the survey secret and to the possibility of the opposing camp getting as many if not more countries to sign a straight 12-mile territorial sea convention.

As between unilateral action by other countries and a multilateral convention, he thought the U.S. would be losing less in taking a chance on other countries taking unilateral action. The U.S. interest may be affected in some cases of unilateral action by other countries but in signing a multilateral convention the U.S. would be willingly sacrificing its interests in security and fisheries without achieving the desired stability.

Mr. Herrington was also pessimistic as to the degree of success of the proposed survey. He thought that without the South American amendment the 6 + 6 proposal would have little support in South America. On the other hand, its inclusion would alienate the support of the West European countries. In addition, this amendment would, according to Mr. Herrington, hurt the U.S. interests in fishing even more than the 6 + 6 formula. He referred frequently to the Navy's opposition to a multilateral convention to support his position in fisheries.

After the meeting, in private conversation, Mr. Herrington informed me that the U.S. would be hurt less if Canada took unilateral action with bilateral arrangements with respect to historic rights than by signing a multilateral convention. He confided that he thought that would be the preferable course for Canada to follow.

Memorandum by Legal Division

SECRET. CANADIAN EYES ONLY.

[Ottawa], September 13, 1961

MINUTES OF MEETING HELD IN WASHINGTON AT 10:30 A.M.
ON SEPTEMBER 8 ON THE LAW OF SEA

Present

Mr. Cadieux, Legal Adviser, Dept. of External Affairs
Mr. Chayes, Legal Adviser to State Department
Mr. Yingling, Assistant Legal Adviser to State Department
Miss Guttridge, Legal Adviser to the U.K. Permanent Delegation to the U.N.
Mr. Nutt, Counsellor, Canadian Embassy
Mr. Beesley, Legal Division, Dept. of External Affairs

Mr. Chayes opened the meeting by welcoming the visitors and apologizing for the delay in reaching a decision concerning the Canadian and British representations in support of the proposed multilateral convention on the breadth of the territorial sea and a contiguous fishing zone. He explained that the delay had occurred partly because of difficulties in reaching agreement amongst the various agencies concerned with the question and partly because of the onset of the summer months. He mentioned that one of the more important considerations to which thought was being given is that the convention must be assured of widespread and representative support. Japan, for instance, was more important in this field than say, Laos. He then suggested that Mr. Cadieux might like to outline the Canadian position.

Mr. Cadieux explained that the meeting had been suggested because of the absence of a U.S.A. reply to our representations and those of the United Kingdom. While we appreciated the difficulties as mentioned by Mr. Chayes, we and other countries concerned were anxious for a reply, and it was thought that it might be useful to discuss the question informally. Canada and the United Kingdom considered that the results of the preliminary survey justified proceeding with the second phase of the confidential survey. Assuming that a minimum of 40-45 countries would be required to make the convention worthwhile, something over 20 supporters had now been obtained and a further 10 would appear to be readily obtainable with U.S.A. support, leaving only 10 or 12 to be obtained through the joint efforts of Canada, the United Kingdom and the U.S.A. It was recognized that the supporters of the convention would have to be representative as well as numerous, and it was with this in mind that most of the major shipping and fishing countries had been included either in the preliminary survey or in the projected second phase. It was recognized also that the proposed convention would not be an ideal solution, but it was considered to be far preferable to the only alternative, – doing nothing, – while the drift toward a 12-mile territorial sea continues. It should not be overlooked that the lack of many recent moves towards a wider sea may be due in part to the present initiative, which had helped to hold the line for the time being. This could not continue indefinitely, however, in the absence of some response from the U.S.A. In the case of Canada, for instance, there was considerable pressure both in the House and in the press for some kind of action. Since the present operation is confidential it had not been possible for the Government to say anything concerning it in order to show that some action was being taken. The result was that the Government was in a very difficult position and it could not be said how much longer it would be possible to continue to withhold any further action. The only alternatives for Canada, should the convention fail, would be to do nothing or to take unilateral action. Although the question of alternative courses had not been considered as yet by the Government, it should not be assumed that the Government would be willing to do nothing should the proposed convention fail. Both the pressure and the precedents (of Iceland and Norway) existed for unilateral action.

As to the prospects of success for the proposed convention, there was room for legitimate differences in assessment, but all that was being asked was participation in a further confidential survey. Its confidential nature would avoid damage to the status of the “six-plus-six” formula achieved at Geneva, and the proposed survey was intended for the sole purpose of finding out what the prospects were for the proposed convention.

Miss Guttridge then stated that she fully supported what Mr. Cadieux had said, with the exception, of course, of his references to the possibility of unilateral action by Canada. The United Kingdom was very concerned about the continuing drift towards a wider territorial sea and felt that the proposed convention could act as a brake on it. As an example of the kind of danger she had in mind she mentioned a recent conversation she had in New York with Mr. Robles of Mexico in which he had told her of a Burmese move to table a request that the International Law Commission consider the question of the breadth of the territorial sea. Robles had explained to Miss Guttridge that he was confident that if another conference was called in a few years time agreement would be reached on a 12-mile territorial sea.

Mr. Chayes made some general comments concerning the prospects of success of the proposed convention and then suggested that Mr. Yingling raise specific questions since he was more familiar with the problem.

Mr. Yingling inquired concerning the likelihood of success amongst the African nations. He considered that some support in both Africa and Latin America was essential if the convention was considered to be representative geographically. Miss Guttridge gave her views on the likelihood of success in Africa and listed the countries which had been suggested for inclusion in the second phase of the survey. Mr. Cadieux confirmed that in his view this list of countries seemed to offer the best chances of success. Yingling then mentioned that although the Sudan had recently extended its territorial sea Senegal had proceeded on the basis of the “six-plus-six” formula. He mentioned also a discussion he had had with Geoffrey Bing when he had been Attorney General of Ghana as indicated that Ghana and probably the rest of the African countries presented an enigma, and it was not possible to know how they would react. Mr. Cadieux pointed out that the best way to find out would be to go ahead with the survey.

Mr. Yingling then inquired as to the Canadian and United Kingdom views concerning the influence of France on the Brazaville group. He commented that France appeared to have done a complete about-face on this question since his discussions with the French about a year ago. Mr. Cadieux replied that before the Bizerte incident he would have replied differently, but that now it was difficult to say what, if any, influence France would have on this group on a question of this nature. It might well be that each country would have to be approached individually. Miss Guttridge concurred in Mr. Cadieux's assessment.

Mr. Yingling then raised the question of the Brazilian Amendment, suggesting that the Western Europeans and Japan were opposed to it. Mr. Cadieux and Miss Guttridge confirmed that Japan had raised the question, although not the Western Europeans and it was intended that it be left until late in the survey to be decided as to whether or not the Brazilian Amendment should be retained or dropped, the decision to be made purely on the basis of the least loss in numbers and importance of signatories. Mr. Yingling pressed this question in an effort to determine whether or not the Canadian and United Kingdom assessments had been made on the assumption that the Brazilian Amendment would be retained, his own view being that the requisite numbers could never be obtained without it. Mr. Cadieux and Miss Guttridge refused to be drawn on this point.

Mr. Yingling then referred to the possibility of unilateral action by Canada and inquired as to what, if anything, Canada would gain by extending its territorial sea to 6 miles. He pointed out that merely the fishery limits and not territorial seas had been extended by Iceland and Norway. He reminded Mr. Cadieux that the original Canadian position had been "three-plus-nine" as part of the compromise package deal at Geneva. Mr. Cadieux confirmed that this was the case, but pointed out that Canada had argued strongly in support of the "six-plus-six" rule at Geneva and it would presumably be the preferred basis for any possible unilateral action. The important difference domestically was that the 6-mile territorial sea provided an immediate further 3 miles exclusive fisheries without any question of tapering off periods, such as might be encountered in possible negotiations concerning the outer 6 miles.

Mr. Chayes concluded the meeting by thanking Mr. Cadieux and Miss Guttridge for having come to discuss the question. He said that we appeared to be agreed in our purposes although there might be some differences in assessment of the prospects for the proposed multilateral convention. The question would be considered urgently, however, and he felt that Mr. Cadieux could report to his Government that these discussions would precipitate an early U.S.A. decision.

LAW OF THE SEA

Our Embassy in Washington got in touch yesterday with Yingling, Assistant Legal Adviser to the State Department, to inquire as to when the U.S.A. reply to our representations in support of the proposed law of the sea convention might be expected. Yingling explained that Mr. Rusk had referred the question back to the Legal Adviser for reconsideration and that as a result there is likely to be a further delay. Our Permanent Mission in New York has now reported in telegram 2434 of October 30,† (a copy of which is attached), that, presumably as a result of your recent conversations with Arthur Dean in New York, Mr. Dean had also raised the question with Yingling and, following their discussion, Mr. Dean hoped that “a definite U.S.A. reaction would be forthcoming in about a week’s time.”

2. It is not possible to assess the possible significance of these developments with any certainty, but it would seem a not unlikely assumption that Mr. Rusk would be favourably disposed personally towards the proposed convention, (as was Mr. Bowles), and that he may have so indicated in referring the matter back to the State Department. (Mr. Dean’s influence may safely be assumed to have been beneficial.) In these circumstances it would seem worthwhile to accept this further slight delay on the part of the U.S.A.

3. Our Ambassador in Washington has been considering the advisability of writing to Mr. Rusk on a personal basis urging an early reply to our representations. Such an approach would be timely and would seem to be preferable at this stage to a more formal move. I have therefore drafted the attached telegram to Mr. Heeney† for your signature, if you agree, endorsing his proposed personal approach.⁴⁹

4. The relevant papers, prepared for use in the event of a negative reply or none at all being received from the U.S.A., have been re-examined and brought up to date by the Interdepartmental Committee on Territorial Waters so as to enable the question to be brought before Cabinet on short notice.

LAW OF THE SEA

On November 10, Beesley, Legal Division, called me to say that Mr. Pearson had made a statement in the Maritimes criticizing the Government for not having extended Canadian fishing limits. Beesley said that the Prime Minister’s office and the Minister’s office were both disturbed and that, as a consequence, the pressure was mounting to do something in the absence of a United States reply to our Aide Mémoire of last May. Beesley said that Cadieux had instructed him to tell me that we should let Yingling know informally of these pressures.

2. I was unable to get Yingling on Friday (November 10) since it was a State Department holiday, but spoke to him first thing Monday morning, November 13.

3. I started out by mentioning (as the Ambassador had previously agreed) that I had intended to pass to him, the previous week, a copy of the Ambassador’s personal letter to Mr. Rusk. Yingling said that he had heard that there was such a letter and that he understood it was on the way to him for action. He declined my offer of a copy of the letter, saying that he would have the original momentarily.

4. I also mentioned to Yingling the additional reasons in support of a multilateral convention which Mr. Drew had raised in his telegram (3927, November 2).†

5. Additionally, I mentioned Mr. Pearson's statement in the Maritimes and the increasing urgency which the Government was attaching to receiving a reply from the United States to the May Aide Mémoire.

6. Yingling quite understood the concern of Canadian officials. As we knew, there were deep differences of view between United States authorities which had to be reconciled. An answer was not yet forthcoming and Yingling could not hazard what the answer would be though he was hoping that a decision could be reached soon. Any decision would have to be made "at the top." In this connection, he mentioned that Mr. Green had recently mentioned the matter to Arthur Dean in New York.

Washington, December 15, 1961

Dear Marcel [Cadieux]:

Last Monday (December 11) when I called on Jack Pender, Yingling's deputy, on another matter, I enquired of him whether there were any developments on the law of the sea. (Yingling I gathered is on a month's holidays.) Pender was not completely on top of current developments but he made one or two background comments which will be of interest to you.

Pender recalled that both the fisheries interests and the United States Navy considered that the situation was best left alone. He described this as "the short run pragmatic approach" but nevertheless this was how the fisheries interests and the United States Navy saw their present interests. Beyond this the Navy were suspicious of Canadian motives. They believed that Canada was really interested in promoting a twelve mile limit rather than the six plus six proposal. Pender said the Navy based its view on "discussions with Canadian naval officers" and because they had concluded that "Canada seemed to want, like the Russians, to claim as much water as she could." [Une phrase omise./One sentence omitted.] Some of the Navy's suspicions went back to Canadian actions during the first Law of the Sea Conference though Pender was not sure what the incident or incidents were. We both surmised that it was probably Canada's brief flirtation with the "choose it yourself up to twelve miles" proposal. I told Pender that I thought the United States Navy quite wrong in suspecting that we were after a twelve mile territorial sea. It was true that in 1956 Prime Minister St. Laurent had made references to a twelve mile territorial sea but that with the further development of Canadian policy, we had come to believe that the six plus six proposal represented a realistic (and from our own point of view most acceptable) proposal.

The Navy's second worry, and I gathered from Pender that this was not restricted to the Navy alone, was that taking measures to open a multilateral convention for signature would stimulate claims. The Navy had pointed to the fact that the main rash of claims had been before the first and second conferences on the Law of the Sea rather than after. A multilateral convention would be like a third Law of the Sea Conference and would, the Navy was certain, stimulate another rash of claims. I confessed to Pender that I had been surprised that there had not been more unilateral claims in the wake of the second conference. It seemed to me, however, that over the ensuing years if nothing were done to try to reach an agreed practice, there would be a gradual accumulation of unilateral claims. Pender agreed that this might well be so in connection with the “new countries.”

Pender also said that the Navy had succeeded in convincing a number of law professors of the validity of their case. He mentioned specifically a Professor MacDougall(?) who had protégés in many law schools across the country who were converted to the view that the existing situation was the proper one.

Pender mentioned that Abram Chayes (States Department Legal Adviser) had been instrumental in bringing Arthur Dean back into Law of the Sea discussions within the United States Administration. Pender thought Dean favoured the idea of exploring the possibilities for a multilateral convention. This might be advantageous to our cause since Dean had the ear of the President. At the same time, however, he no longer had the confidence of the United States Navy or the United States fisheries interests.

While what the United States fisheries interests and the United States Navy think may not be decisive, it seems to me that it would be helpful if some effort were made to put straight the record of our intentions vis-à-vis a twelve mile territorial sea with the United States Navy. The only way to do this would be, I think, for some senior Canadian naval officer to take the opportunity to speak privately to some senior United States naval officer and preferably one concerned with the Law of the Sea. The best opportunity would be for the Naval Attaché, Commodore O’Brien, to take a suitable opportunity to discuss the matter. Another opportunity would present itself at the forthcoming PJBD meeting though this will not now be held until February. This approach would obviously have to be done informally and with some delicacy, perhaps under the guise of an enquiry as to how the reply to our Aide Mémoire of May 4 is progressing and what the United States Navy thinks about it.

I take it that a good deal of thought has been given to what we should do in the event that the United States refuses to go along with a multilateral convention. I would hope that we were not wholly past the point where we could consider whether we would really need to invoke unilaterally the six plus six proposal or even the three plus nine, at least over our entire coastline. While part of the motivation for the Geneva proposal, on our part, was national interest, I believe that part of it also was that the six plus six proposal, while benefiting us, might, at the same time, prove acceptable to a majority of states. That this was so was proven at the second Geneva Conference although, unfortunately, not decisively so. Assuming that the idea of a multilateral convention were to be dropped, then that element of the proposal relating to its international acceptability would not be relevant, except insofar as the results of the second Geneva Conference might be invoked to give respectability to any unilateral claim to a six plus six or three plus nine limit. It seems to me, therefore, that in any future moves, we should be governed by the real utility to Canada of an extension of jurisdiction, the effect of proposing unilateral action on our relations with the United States and the international example which we set by proposing unilateral action, albeit based on what was accepted at Geneva by a rather large majority.

Yours sincerely,

JIM [NUTT]

P.S. Please ensure that Pender’s name is not mentioned in connection with the information about the United States Navy’s views.

LAW OF THE SEA

On December 15 at the end of our last five power meeting on disarmament, Mr. Arthur Dean approached me privately to ask me to convey to you a message on this subject.

Mr. Dean said that he had recently recommended strongly to the State Department that the United States cooperate with us in our proposal that a survey be conducted to determine the extent of interest which may exist in working out a multilateral agreement on the basis of the Geneva formula.

SECRET AND PERSONAL.

Dear Jim [Nutt],

I found your letter of December 15 of considerable interest; it was also very timely since it arrived just before a meeting of the Interdepartmental Committee on Territorial Waters. In the light of your letter, and various other factors, I felt it inadvisable to go ahead with the next step of delivering a formal note to the U.S.A. (explaining that unless a reply was received we should have to act on the assumption that the U.S.A. was not interested in the proposed convention, so inform the other countries involved in the survey, and notify all concerned that Canada considered itself free to take such action as may be necessary to protect its fishery interests). The members of the Committee agreed, and so for the time being no action will be taken, unless and until the Government requests it.

I have some doubts as to the usefulness of trying to convince the U.S. Navy of our good faith in this matter. The short answer to their suggestion that we are really interested in a twelve-mile sea is for them to agree to the proposed convention for a six-mile territorial sea. If it is not obvious to them that we would not be going to such great lengths to obtain an international agreement based on the "six-plus-six" formula, (if what we really wanted is a twelve-mile territorial sea), then I doubt if anything we could say would persuade them otherwise.

You may be interested in knowing I had lunch with Chayes in New York recently, and he told me that his biggest problem was to determine whether the State Department should add this question to their already existing list of matters on which it had been necessary to take a line different from the Department of Defence, and, in this case, the Department of Fisheries also. You may be interested too in knowing that Arthur Dean told General Burns last week that he had recommended to the State Department that it take part in the confidential survey.

There seems to be nothing further we can do at present to bring about a favourable answer, and we can only continue to wait for the time being either a U.S.A. answer or a directive from the Government that we proceed with the preparatory steps for unilateral action. I strongly doubt, with the likelihood of the question becoming an election issue, that the Government will be prepared to refrain from unilateral action much longer.

I should be interested in anything further you are able to learn. In the meantime, my best wishes for a Merry Christmas and a Happy New Year.

Yours sincerely,

M. CADIEUX

LAW OF [THE] SEA

At this request I saw Under Secretary Ball this morning for the purpose of being informed of the Administration's position on our proposal that USA join in the second stage of the survey on a multilateral convention. Ball said he had hoped to be able to give us an affirmative reply. He regretted however that there continued to be strong opposition within the Administration (USN) and, even more important, amongst the fishing interests; consequently, it had been concluded that our invitation would have to be declined. Ball said that the State Department was the only department which saw advantage in our proposal; they had pressed hard to persuade others; to have persisted further would have jeopardized the Department's credit in more critical matters where support would be badly needed.

2. I said that naturally we regretted USA decision. We felt it was a pity. We believed that the narrow miss at Geneva in 1960 justified a real joint effort to reach multilateral agreement on the "six plus six" proposal. (Ball interposed that USA would have gone along with us if it had not repeat not been for the kind of opposition they had encountered, especially in the Northwest.) We were, perhaps, losing an opportunity to achieve a multilateral agreement which would have solved many outstanding problems. As the Under Secretary would know, pressure was being brought to bear on Canadian government, to take action in view of the failure at Geneva. I was not repeat not in a position to say what the government might decide to do but, in view of USA decision, some action on our part would be required. Ball hoped it would not repeat not be necessary for Canada to proceed unilaterally since we would be bound in such an event to have "a very difficult time."

3. I can appreciate that the decision USA has now taken finally will be most disappointing to you. Nevertheless, before any decision on our part to proclaim unilaterally an extension of fishing limits, I know that the consequences will be very carefully weighed, not repeat not only in terms of our relations with USA, but also in context of broader international relations. At least initially I would hope we could explore the extent to which, and how soon, our legitimate fisheries needs could be satisfied through bilateral negotiation.

4. State Department will be informing British Embassy of the position taken on our joint approach of last May.

DISARMAMENT AT THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY

When the General Assembly recessed before Christmas, there remained on the agenda of the First Committee ten draft resolutions on various aspects of disarmament. There was a Soviet draft resolution calling for the addition of five neutral countries to the Ten Nation Disarmament Committee; three draft resolutions concerning the principles of general and complete disarmament; an assortment of resolutions dealing with the prohibitions of nuclear weapons, the establishment in Africa of a de-nuclearized neutral zone and the dissemination of information on the consequences of nuclear war; and the Canadian draft resolution co-sponsored by 18 other countries concerning the early resumption and the conduct of negotiations. These resolutions remained to be disposed of at the resumed session.

2. During the recess, the new Administration was established in Washington. President Kennedy's advisors on disarmament have made it quite clear that although they recognize the urgent need for the resumption of constructive negotiations at the earliest possible time, they will require several months to complete their comprehensive review of the United States position on disarmament. In the meantime, understandably, they have no wish to become involved in a premature discussion of substantive questions. A substantive discussion would be necessary if the disarmament resolutions remaining on the First Committee agenda were to be pressed. Accordingly, the United States Government has been trying to avoid their consideration for the time being. In fact, the discussion of several of these resolutions would be embarrassing to the West generally.

3. Just before the 15th session resumed on March 7, the United States entered into discussions with the Soviet Union about the possibility of having all controversial items remaining on the Assembly agenda either postponed or dropped. The aim of this move was to ensure that the atmosphere in the resumed session would not disturb the trend toward improved relations between the United States and the Soviet Union. It also meant, however, that there would be no controversial discussion of disarmament questions. This move did not succeed, partly because the Soviet Union would not agree and the Assembly has continued its proceedings in the ordinary way. The atmosphere so far, however, has been relaxed.

4. The discussion of disarmament has not yet been resumed. In fact, the First Committee has not been reconvened to date. At the present time, the United States, in consultation with its allies, has been seeking to evolve a disarmament position which can be put before the Soviet Union as a basis for an agreed recommendation by the General Assembly. The Soviet Union has shown some disposition to co-operate but it has not altogether abandoned its pre-Christmas position.

5. The main effort is to make provision for the resumption of disarmament negotiations. Three questions are involved: date, composition of the negotiating body and principles for guiding the negotiations. The two sides have now more or less agreed that the date should be "on or before August 1, 1961."

6. As for composition, the Soviet Union has submitted to the United States a draft resolution which calls for adding to the Ten Nation Committee representatives of India, Indonesia, United Arab Republic, Ghana and Mexico (in other words, the Soviet pre-Christmas proposal on composition). The United States does not wish to have uncommitted countries participating directly in the negotiations. It is prepared, however, to see some neutral representatives added as impartial officers, namely, Mexico and India respectively as chairman and vice-chairman-rapporteur. This United States position is contained in a draft resolution which Mr. Stevenson intended to discuss on March 20 with the Soviet Delegation in New York.

7. The Canadian Embassy in Washington has said that the United States has fall-back positions: reverting to the formula of the Outer Space Committee (12 West, 7 East, 5 neutrals); or turning the whole problem over to the Disarmament Commission. Neither of these is thought to be desired by the Soviet Union.

8. As for principles, the two sides seem prepared to settle for a general formulation which would guide the negotiations rather than the detailed list of principles which caused earlier deadlocks not only in the Ten Nation Committee but in the General Assembly before Christmas. Both the Soviet draft resolutions, which has been shown to the United States, and the United States draft, which Mr. Stevenson intended to show to the Russians, contain broad formulations. While neither of these is likely to be entirely acceptable, there is room for hope that as the consultations continue, a common formulation can be evolved.

9. What is missing from both the Soviet and United States drafts is any provision for a close link between the disarmament negotiations in future and the United Nations. This is the link which the Canadian draft resolution seeks to establish through giving the Disarmament Commission a specific rôle. This Canadian approach has been explained to Mr. Stevenson, who has shown interest in it.

10. Earlier, the Soviet Union expressed opposition to the Canadian proposal which was regarded as diversionary. However, if some agreement were reached on a draft resolution dealing with the date of resumed negotiations, the composition of the negotiating body and the principles to guide negotiations, Soviet opposition to the establishment of a link with the United Nations might soften. Accordingly, the Canadian Delegation has been consulting with the United States about incorporating some of the Canadian ideas in the resolution which is being negotiated with the Soviet Union. For this purpose, the Canadian resolution has been re-drafted somewhat.

11. Copies of the Soviet and United States draft resolutions are attached and also of the Canadian re-draft.†

of the United Nations General Assembly*

CONFIDENTIAL

[Ottawa], April 5, 1961

ITEMS NOS. 67, 69, 73 AND 86: DISARMAMENT

Summary

At the first part of the fifteenth session of the General Assembly the First Committee had before it thirteen draft resolutions on disarmament and related subjects. Three of these resolutions (two dealing with the discontinuance of nuclear weapons tests, and one with the prevention of the further spread of nuclear weapons) were adopted at the first part of the session, the remaining ten being left over for consideration at the second part. A full explanation of the substance and origin of these resolutions is given in the final report on the first part of the session and, with the exception of the Canadian resolution, they are not discussed further below.

2. It was apparent well before the commencement of the resumed session that a large number of delegations wished to avoid a repetition of the acrimonious and unproductive dispute over disarmament which had characterized the first part of the session. Furthermore, the United States hoped to dispense with any debate whatever on the substance of disarmament, on the grounds that they were undertaking a thorough review of their policy on this subject and were not prepared to engage in substantive discussion at this time. In general, this position met with the support of the Western Powers, but at first it was completely rejected by the Soviet bloc, which insisted that disarmament be discussed at the fifteenth session (or, if necessary, at a special session), and that the Assembly agree on basic "principles" or "directives" on disarmament for the guidance of future negotiations. In addition to this firm Soviet position, the apparent desire of a number of delegations to see their own proposals discussed, even if others were to be abandoned, seemed to militate against the chances of an agreement to avoid substantive debate.

3. Nonetheless, after several weeks of private negotiations between the Soviet Union and the United States, a draft resolution was agreed upon which had the effect of deferring the question of disarmament and all resolutions before the Committee to the sixteenth session of the General Assembly. On March 30, after a very brief debate, this resolution was adopted unanimously by the First Committee without a vote. On April 21 it was unanimously approved in plenary without a vote and without further debate. The text of the resolution, No. A/RES/1617(XV) is given at Annex II.†

Canadian Position

4. Since the breakdown of the Ten-Nation Committee in June, 1960, it has been the Canadian position that detailed negotiations on disarmament should be resumed as soon as possible. Accordingly, Canada welcomed the intention of the United States to resume negotiations on this subject as soon as their policy review had been completed. In the Canadian view, however, the mid-September date which the United States had originally considered satisfactory as a starting point for new negotiations was too late, and it was therefore cause for satisfaction that the United States Representative later announced in his statement to the First Committee that his Government would be ready to resume negotiations "by the end of July."

5. The Canadian position called for any future negotiating body to maintain a suitable relationship with the United Nations and the Disarmament Commission. Our objective here was to ensure both that the negotiating body should report periodically to the Commission and that the members of the Commission should be in a position to communicate their views on disarmament to the negotiating parties. We also considered that certain specific problems of disarmament might require study in groups of a smaller size than the ninety-nine-member Commission as a whole, and we believed that it might be desirable to establish ad hoc committees of the Commission for this purpose.

6. The Canadian position on the composition of the negotiating body was flexible. Although in our opinion the Soviet proposal to add five neutral members of the Committee was not satisfactory, we were prepared to accept two or three additional members, preferably as officers of the Committee, but possibly as participants in a fuller sense if this appeared necessary. In this connection, it was the Canadian view that the procedure described in the preceding paragraph would provide a useful means for associating all non-negotiating states with the negotiating body without making them actual participants, and that it might go a considerable distance toward meeting the views of those members of the United Nations who wished to play a more active rôle in future negotiations.

7. On the question of "principles," the Canadian Delegation stressed in private discussions with the Western Five the desirability of achieving a clearly defined framework within which future negotiations could be conducted. We considered it particularly important to specify as precisely as possible the method of negotiation which the negotiating parties would follow, and thus remove an important difference between the two sides (the "one-treaty" approach of the Soviet union versus the Western approach through stages) which had caused great difficulty in the negotiations in the Ten-Nation Committee.

8. During the course of the private negotiations between the United States and the Soviet Union, it was the Canadian position that any agreement on substance between the two sides should incorporate the ideas just discussed. However, in the later stages of these negotiations it became apparent that an understanding would be reached between the United States and the Soviet Union which would include little or no reference to matters of substance. In the circumstances, the Canadian Delegation considered it imperative as a minimum that a reference should be made – either in the resolution to be submitted to the First Committee or in the accompanying statements – to the date of resumption of negotiations and to the relationship between the negotiating body and the Disarmament Commission, which has been described in paragraph 5 above. Although our Western colleagues believed that the inclusion of our ideas on the relationship of the Commission to the negotiating body might result in a further prolongation of negotiations with the Soviet Union, and possibly in a substantive debate in Committee, the United States Delegation eventually agreed to include a paragraph which met most of our views in the statement which they proposed to make to the Committee.

9. However, in accordance with the understanding reached between the United States and the Soviet Union, it was still necessary for the Soviet Delegation to concur in the wording of the United States statement in order that both statements would represent agreed views. Although they accepted the United States statement as a whole, the Soviet Delegation objected to certain paragraphs which they alleged were "extraneous" to the understanding reached between the two delegations. Among the paragraphs which were deleted from the United States statement at a Soviet request was the section reflecting Canadian views on the rôle of the Disarmament Commission in relation to future negotiations.

10. In order to give proper recognition to the rôle of the Disarmament Commission, which was now to be omitted from the United States statement, we explained to our allies that we would be obliged to make a statement on our own behalf. Although the fear was expressed by some of our colleagues that an intervention by our Delegation might bring on a lengthy debate, we argued that it was necessary not to let the important rôle of the Disarmament Commission go by default through failure to give it clear expression at this time. In the event, our colleagues' fears of a lengthy debate proved to be unwarranted.

11. Shortly before the disarmament debate in the First Committee, a meeting of our co-sponsors was called to explain the results of the United States-Soviet discussions, and to inform them of the statement which we wished to make in order to clarify our position on the progress achieved to date and steps which remained to be taken in the future. It was suggested by our co-sponsors that the United States-Soviet initiative might be given a broader basis of support in the Assembly if our statement were to be made in the name of all the co-sponsors of resolution A/C.1/L.255. After discussion it was agreed that this idea could be suitably conveyed to the Committee by amending the last paragraph of our statement so as to indicate that the other co-sponsors of our resolution also supported the joint United States-Soviet resolution.

East-West Negotiations

12. In summary, the private negotiations between the United States and the Soviet Union may be considered as falling into three stages:

(i) At the beginning of their discussions with the United States Delegation, the Soviet Delegation stood firm on their earlier position that five neutrals should be added to the negotiating body and that the General Assembly should adopt "principles" or "directives" which would be based on the Indian compromise resolution put forward at the first part of the session. The United States Delegation were willing to discuss the date of resumption of negotiations and the composition of the negotiating body, but they were not prepared to enter into a discussion of "directives" and they wished generally to see as little substantive debate on disarmament as possible. Negotiations on this basis were, of course, unlikely to be productive, and it appeared by the time the resumed session had been under way for one week that the bilateral discussions had ended in complete failure and that a sharp and lengthy debate on disarmament could be expected.

(ii) At this point, however, the Soviet Delegation presented the United States with a new proposal which constituted at least a small advance on two points. First, they abandoned their earlier insistence on a date for resumption of negotiations which was far in advance of the date the United States wished. The United States having moved at the same time toward Soviet demands for an earlier date, virtual agreement was reached on a starting-point around the end of July or beginning of August. Of greater importance was the Soviet willingness to abandon their insistence on the Indian compromise resolution as an absolute minimum so far as "principles" were concerned. After further discussion it appeared likely that some form of compromise might be possible on this question, although probably only as a result of adopting a very vague set of principles which might have led to difficulty at a later date. Further progress also appeared possible on the question of composition when the Soviet Delegation moved from their earlier insistence on tripartite representation (five Western, five Communist and five neutral participants) in favour of the addition of three neutrals only, while at the same time the United States were preparing to advance a formula for the addition of two or three neutrals in a status which would fall somewhere between the original Soviet demand for full participation and the Western position that neutrals should be added to the Committee as officers rather than participants. However, it was not to be known whether agreement might have been reached through further efforts in this direction, for after one week of discussion along the above lines the Soviet Delegation put forward a radically different proposal for dealing with disarmament at the resumed session.

(iii) In brief, the final Soviet suggestion was that the two sides should abandon their efforts to reach agreement on substance before the end of the resumed session. For their part, they were willing to accept a date of resumption around July 31, but they could not agree to United States views as they now stood on principles and composition. They therefore proposed that both delegations should make short statements indicating that an understanding had been reached to continue their bilateral talks during the summer, and that a brief resolution should be introduced in the name of the two delegations which would take note of these statements and defer United Nations consideration of the question of disarmament “and all pending proposals relating to it” until the sixteenth session of the General Assembly. Since this suggestion appeared to represent a concession to the original view of the United States that there should be no substantive discussion of disarmament during the resumed session, there was relatively little difficulty in reaching agreement between the two delegations to proceed on this basis.

13. The principal Western objection to the Soviet statement was that the last paragraph, with its reference to a report to the sixteenth session only on the progress of United States-Soviet discussions, could be taken to imply that international disarmament negotiations would not yet have been raised by that time, and would also emphasize unduly the bilateral character of the preparatory discussions which were to take place during the summer. After discussion among the Western Five, it was agreed that the question of the timing of resumed negotiations could be resolved satisfactorily by including a reference in the United States statement to their readiness to resume negotiations “by the end of July.” It was also eventually agreed that the two statements would call for a report to be made to the sixteenth session of the General Assembly merely “on the progress made” without giving any precise indication whether this report would deal with the progress of resumed negotiations. Finally, the preparatory discussions which were to take place in the summer would be described in the United States statement as taking place between “the States concerned,” a wording which was designed to cover United States and Soviet allies as well as these states themselves.

14. In paragraph 5 above, the Canadian reaction to the Soviet request for the deletion from the United States statement of our ideas concerning the relationship of the Commission to future negotiations has already been discussed. Paragraphs relating to the Geneva negotiations on nuclear tests and to procedures for the peaceful settlement of disputes were also deleted from the United States statement after objections by the Soviet Delegation that they were not relevant to the present understanding between the two countries. With these changes and other more minor alterations the statements were agreed between the two delegations, thus opening the way to a short, non-controversial debate in the First Committee.

First Committee Debate

15. Although the two great Powers had come to an understanding on a procedure which would curtail debate in the First Committee, the fear was expressed until the very last that certain delegations would not permit discussion of their own resolutions to be put aside in this matter until the sixteenth session. It was felt in particular that the African delegations might insist that the two resolutions which they co-sponsored be fully discussed and perhaps put to a vote at the resumed session. In the event, however, no such difficulties arose.

16. In all, there were seven speakers in the First Committee debate, each of whom intervened only very briefly. The Soviet representative spoke first and was followed by the representatives of the United States and Canada. (The texts of the three statements are contained in the verbatim record attached at Annex III.)† Three African representatives also spoke primarily to emphasize their view that their own resolutions – which deal largely with problems relating to nuclear weapons – were not related to disarmament as such, and to make plain that they reserved the right to raise them at a later date. The French representative, who was under firm instructions to speak if delegations other than the United States and the Soviet Union intervened, also spoke after the vote, alluding very briefly to his country's views on the importance of effective measures to deal with modern weapons and on the adequacy of the Ten-Nation Committee itself as a forum for future disarmament negotiations.

Recommendations for Future Action

17. The main lines of possible future action to which further thought might be given before the sixteenth session are indicated in the statement delivered by the Canadian representative in the First Committee. If detailed negotiations on disarmament are resumed on or about August 1 the major part of the original Canadian concern will have been met, but the matter of the relationship which is to be established between the negotiating body and the Disarmament Commission will remain to be considered.

18. Our proposal that progress reports be forwarded periodically by the negotiating body to the Disarmament Commission may not be a point of controversy since a procedure such as this has frequently been followed in previous negotiations. However, in view of past opposition to the idea, it may be more difficult to devise a satisfactory procedure which would promote non-negotiating states to communicate their views on disarmament to the negotiating body. As a result it might be advisable to suggest a procedure such as that referred to in the paragraph relating to this point which was eventually included in the draft United States statement discussed with the Soviet Delegation. This course of action would have the advantage of making use of language which has already been accepted by the United States and to which, as we have been informed by Mandelovich, the Counsellor of the Soviet Delegation, the Soviet Union has no objection in principle. The terms of the relevant parts of this paragraph are as follows:

“In recognition of the interest of the United Nations, the USA and the USSR ... will request any future negotiating body to submit reports to the General Assembly through the Disarmament Commission and to consider any memoranda embodying views on disarmament submitted by members of the Disarmament Commission.”

19. If the ideas embodied in the passage just quoted were to be accepted, it would remain only to consider the desirability of establishing additional machinery within the Disarmament Commission to provide for more effective consideration of specific problems which might be referred to it. The resolution presented by Canada at this session included the suggestion that ad hoc committees of the Disarmament Commission should be set up for this purpose. Whether this particular suggestion should be pursued and, if so, the exact timing and method of the establishment of such committees will require further examination. In a conversation with the Minister at the resumed session, the Chairman of the Disarmament Commission, Padilla Nervo of Mexico, suggested that this question might best be raised after the negotiating body had begun its meetings and perhaps when it had indicated in a progress report to the Commission that there was a need for studies of a kind which could best be conducted in smaller groups. A second possibility which would complement Nervo's suggestion would be to establish a procedure that would enable the Commission to receive the views of member states on disarmament for transmission in the form of memoranda to the negotiating body, and then to decide later, when this procedure had been in operation for a time, whether any views or problems put forward by member states required more detailed study in subordinate groups. In any case, it would appear that until international negotiations on disarmament are again under way it will be too early to judge with any degree of certainty whether either or both of these possibilities would provide the most suitable arrangement for any further action on disarmament which might be required of the Commission.

CONFIDENTIAL

[London], May 27, 1961

My dear Green,

In their March statement on disarmament, the Commonwealth Prime Ministers stressed the importance of rapid agreement to secure the permanent banning of nuclear weapons tests by all nations.

Our High Commissioner has been sending to your people a weekly account of the negotiations at the Nuclear Tests Conference at Geneva. I thought, however, that you would like to have personally a short summary of the position as we see it.

Frankly the Russian performance at Geneva since the Conference re-opened on the 21st March has throughout been most disappointing. The Americans went to Geneva, as we did, determined to make every possible effort to achieve progress. To this end we and the Americans, at the very start of the conference, tabled a set of important concessions, designed to meet many of the Russian objections to earlier proposals. For instance, in regard to research nuclear explosions, we have agreed to the four safeguards proposed by the Soviet Union; these among other things would in practice permit the Russians to see the internal mechanism of American nuclear devices.

These concessions were embodied in the text of a complete draft treaty which we and the Americans tabled on the 18th April, in an endeavour to get the Russians to enter into constructive and detailed negotiation. We have several times told the Soviet Delegation that this is not a "take it or leave it" draft. We have said that it is open to negotiation and that we are very ready to consider any positive alternative proposals.

The Russian response has been entirely negative. They have refused any detailed and specific discussion of the new Western concessions and they have made no new proposals of their own. Indeed, on one matter of key importance, they have gone back on their previously agreed position. Instead of a single Administrator of the Control Organisation, they are now proposing an Administrative Council of three members, one each representing the Western Powers, the Soviet bloc and the uncommitted countries. This in our view would paralyse the work of the control system.

The Russians are also taking the line that the French nuclear tests make negotiation at Geneva impossible. Of course, as is well known, we are opposed to the French carrying out these tests. But it is clear that the Russians are using this only as another excuse for their refusal to negotiate. They have even suggested that we are in favour of the French tests because we are deriving military information from them. There is, of course, no truth in this. We have always refused to give the French nuclear information of a military nature and they have given us none.

As we said in our March statement, an agreement on nuclear tests, apart from its direct advantages, would provide a powerful impetus to agreement over the wider field of disarmament.

As you know, the Americans and the Russians have agreed, with the approval of the U.N. General Assembly, to have general disarmament discussions in June and July. We very much hope that these bilateral discussions will set the stage for a forward move over the whole field.

But the Russian behaviour at Geneva does not augur well. It is, of course, to a very large extent a question of mutual confidence and from this angle the forthcoming meeting in Vienna between the President and Khrushchev will, we trust, be productive.

With best wishes.

Yours sincerely,

DUNCAN SANDYS

[Ottawa], June 1, 1961

Dear Mr. Sandys,

Thank you for your letter of May 27 giving me your assessment of the present position in the negotiations at the Nuclear Tests Conference in Geneva. I very much appreciate the arrangements which have been made to keep us fully informed of the course of these negotiations.

The important and constructive steps which you and the United States have taken to meet some of the Soviet objections to earlier proposals have of course been noted here with full approval. I share your concern at the hardening attitude and uncooperative response so far demonstrated by the representative of the USSR.

Success in these talks would certainly improve the atmosphere for general disarmament discussions, and the continued deadlock, in spite of the efforts of the United Kingdom and United States, is very disappointing. Nevertheless it is my sincere hope that the difficulties now being experienced in Geneva will not be allowed to prejudice the forthcoming bilateral USA-USSR disarmament discussions or the prospects for a resumption of general disarmament negotiations later this summer. The USSR will be quick to blame the Western countries if arrangements cannot be made to resume general negotiations on disarmament and I am sure you will agree that it is very important not to give them any pretext, arising from the difficulties in the Tests Conference in Geneva, for shifting responsibility to the West.

Yours sincerely,

H.C. GREEN

CALL OF UNITED STATES AMBASSADOR

When USA Ambassador Merchant came to see me this afternoon on Berlin military preparedness and related matters our talk included reference to the Soviet announcement of their intention to resume nuclear testing and the possible area of negotiability on Berlin.

2. On reactions in the United States to Soviet announcement, Merchant said that there was a conviction in Washington that Khrushchev had made a great mistake. Coupled with concern that the threatening tone of the Soviet announcement was sense of relief that Khrushchev had taken upon himself the responsibility to resume testing. Merchant did not think that there would be any early decision to resume tests and if such tests were resumed they would be limited to underground. Full opportunity would be taken at the United Nations as well as at the Belgrade Conference of the uncommitted nations to allow the implications of the Soviet decision to sink in.

3. As regards effects on disarmament Merchant did not think that this would affect the United States efforts to enter into discussions with the Soviet Union or to present their plan which was the best that had been put together since the war.

4. The views I expressed to Merchant on the Soviet announcement were based on the statement approved by the Prime Minister and released to the press this morning⁵⁰ as contained in telegram you have already received.

5. As regards Berlin Merchant noted the disregard of world opinion reflected in the Soviets' position on resuming nuclear tests as well as building up a wall in the centre of Berlin and cutting off the flow of refugees. Taken together he thought they represented a toughening of the Soviet position.

6. Asking about possible areas of negotiability in the Western position Merchant listed mainly those narrow issues in the Western position which had been incorporated earlier in East-West negotiations on Berlin in Geneva such as in movement of military forces, reciprocal restraint on propaganda and subversive activities that might endanger the peace, reduction of troop strength and exclusion of nuclear weapons from Berlin. When asked whether de facto recognition of East Germany might be offered as a quid pro quo for Communist concessions to the West, Merchant replied that that would depend on what constituted de facto recognition. The United States would be prepared to work out practical arrangements on such matters as access to Berlin with the East German authorities and accept contacts with East German officials for this purpose but would not repeat not be prepared to offer de jure recognition of the East German régime. Merchant did not think that the Soviet Union and the East German authorities were interested in de facto dealings only.

7. On the possibility of bargaining recognition of the Oder-Neisse line against Communist concessions, Merchant said had been a matter of principle with the USA not to recognize this line until a duly elected all-German government was in a position to accept responsibility for such a position.

SOVIET ANNOUNCEMENT ABOUT RESUMING NUCLEAR WEAPONS TESTS

The Soviet announcement this morning about resuming nuclear weapons tests has produced a general reaction of "shock" in Western countries. Some United States Senators regard the announcement as a propaganda blunder and others see it as bringing nuclear war nearer. I wonder whether any of these snap reactions has validity if we consider the impact of the Soviet announcement on United Nations members. In this regard, the timing of the announcement appears significant. It has been made on the eve of the Belgrade meeting of top-ranking leaders of certain non-aligned states. Surely the Soviet announcement was calculated to have an effect on that meeting. The uncommitted leaders, like those in the West, may be initially "shocked" by the suddenness of the Soviet announcement; they may see it as a very discouraging new trend in Soviet policy. However, they may also be persuaded that this Soviet move is one more in a series designed to show that the Soviet Union is serious about achieving a solution on Berlin and on the recognition of East Germany.

2. As well, the Soviet move could have been calculated to stampede uncommitted leaders into believing that the issue of war or peace was imminent. The fact that the announcement about resumed testing mentioned as well that super bombs were involved and that these could be carried by existing Soviet space rockets suggests that the Soviet strategists may be trying to cause panic in the ranks of the uncommitted and also in some of the countries of the West. In any event, the Soviet Union has demonstrated that it is not to be deterred from its purposes merely by the prospect that public opinion in Western and other countries may react unfavourably to the announcement about testing.

3. If the uncommitted leaders do regard the Soviet announcement as substantially increasing the danger of nuclear war, they may be more disposed than before the announcement to inject themselves into the East-West conflict concerning Germany. My assumption has been that the uncommitted states, certainly in the United Nations, would seek to steer clear of German issues as long as they remained cold-war issues and did not constitute an actual threat to international peace. If there appeared to develop an emergency in which war or peace seemed to be the issue, the "peace-makers," like Mr. Nehru, President Tito and even President Nasser, might consider themselves under some compulsion to act, in order to save the world from disaster.

4. The Soviet announcement may be intended to produce that kind of reaction. It could be turned to Soviet advantage because of the likelihood that the uncommitted states would exert more pressure on the West than on the Soviet Union to offer concession. If, for example, the uncommitted leaders interpreted the Soviet announcement as an indication that Soviet leaders were in a dangerous mood, the uncommitted might shrink from irritating the Russians further and might instead appeal to the Western leaders to be reasonable and accommodating. In other words, the Soviet calculation in stampeding the uncommitted leaders would be that they would run in panic to the West for help rather than react strongly against the Soviet move. Moreover, the Russians could expect a similar reaction in some Western countries by “ban the bomb” groups and others.

5. If the uncommitted states do react in the manner suggested, they will undoubtedly carry their campaign to save the world from disaster into the 16th session of the General Assembly. The results of the Belgrade Conference could be very significant in this regard. The West may still find itself in the defensive in the Assembly, even though the Soviet Union appears to have burned its bridges as regards negotiations on tests and disarmament generally and even though the substantive Western position on both has been greatly improved. As well, the Western powers might find themselves hard pressed to defend their position in West Berlin. These could all result from a panic reaction by the uncommitted states to this most recent Soviet move.

6. If this analysis is correct, presumably the Western powers should do what they can to prevent a stampede. One way would be for the West to remain calm in the face of the Soviet announcement which, in essence, is merely an extension of the tough policy of the past few months. Western leaders should try to avoid hysteria at home and abroad by expressing firm determination not to be driven to extremes on their side, by demonstrating their preparedness for the worst but by emphasizing their willingness and readiness not to lose any opportunity to negotiate their way out of the present difficulties. They could appeal to all concerned not to be alarmed by Soviet bluster. This could have a calming effect on the uncommitted states. On the other hand, too much shock, alarm, despondency and bravado in Western countries could have the opposite effect.⁵¹

UNITED STATES DECISION TO RESUME NUCLEAR TESTING

The United States decision to resume nuclear testing gave rise to certain comments by the Prime Minister.

2. The Prime Minister's first reaction last evening on learning the news was to say that he could not understand the President's decision and that he thought it “preposterous.” Mr. Diefenbaker did not dissent when I conveyed the suggestion that it would be wise to withhold press comment although he expressed concern that the statement he had made earlier in the day (about the Anglo-American appeal to the U.S.S.R.) looked “incongruous” now. In the event, no statement was issued last night.

⁵¹ Note marginale :/Marginal note:

This is very much to the point. [N.A.] R[obertson]

3. First thing this morning, the Prime Minister again expressed his misgivings in very strong terms, adding that he was annoyed that the Canadian Government had been given absolutely no warning of the United States decision. As I mentioned to you on the telephone, he asked me to secure an immediate report on the circumstances in which the decision had been taken and the reasons why it had apparently been communicated only to the U.K., French and German Governments.

4. After speaking to you, I again saw the Prime Minister just before Cabinet and conveyed once more your advice that it would be best not to make public comment on the United States decision, at least for the moment. I took the line that the absence of comment was probably the best way of conveying our misgivings. The Prime Minister implied that this was perhaps a shade too subtle and said he was tempted to say something which would reflect Canadian concern. I said that the Russians would be encouraged by any signs that the Allies of the United States were in disagreement with the United States decision and that if we could not give clear support, it would be better to remain silent. The Prime Minister did not seem convinced and, although he refused to comment on this question when speaking to reporters on the way to Cabinet, we may not have heard the last of this.⁵²

DISARMAMENT – SIXTEENTH UNGA

Following is the text of substantive paragraphs of a memorandum approved by the Minister which discusses the broad outlines of the Canadian position at the 16th UNGA on Disarmament, discontinuance of nuclear tests, and prevention of the wider spread of nuclear weapons. Text begins.

2. General. Since the end of the 15th Session, Soviet policy on questions of disarmament and nuclear tests has reflected an uncompromising position which it will be important for the

The Prime Minister made only a brief statement on the American resumption of nuclear testing. See Canada, House of Commons, Debates, 1960-61, Vol. VIII, pp. 8167-75. Western Powers to attack effectively at the forthcoming session. The latest Soviet move in unilaterally abandoning their commitment to abstain from nuclear tests makes forceful Western action even more imperative. Moreover, in view of the degree of international tension engendered by the Berlin crisis – which may well increase during the period of the General Assembly – it will be important for the Western allies to be as united as circumstances will permit in their approach to problems of this kind, where the Soviet Union is not on firm ground and is likely to try to discredit the Western position by “unmasking” an alleged unwillingness to get on with disarmament and by seeking to “uncover” points of difference within the Western side.

3. The most effective way of refuting Soviet allegations will be to concentrate on a positive and forceful exposition of the Western disarmament plan, Western views on “principles,” and the overriding necessity of reaching speedy agreement on the cessation of nuclear tests, while at the same time demonstrating flexibility on procedural matters such as the question of composition and making plain the Western desire to move ahead quickly with serious multilateral negotiations. To some extent it will be necessary in pursuing this objective to adopt a negative line – the refutation of Soviet propaganda statements – but this approach should not be given the main emphasis lest it lead the uncommitted countries to believe that the West is concerned only with winning a “cold war” battle. Instead, the Western Powers should take full advantage of one of the major differences between this year’s session and last – that the Western Powers now have well-founded, carefully reasoned and attractive proposals to put forward in each of the areas concerned. Thus, we should attempt to convey, in as convincing a manner as possible, that the Western plan is a substantial advance from previous Western positions and clearly represents a desire to achieve a comprehensive programme of disarmament under effective control; that it takes full account of important statements such as that contained in the Commonwealth Prime Ministers’ communiqué; that as a result of careful study and willingness to compromise it has taken a significant step toward meeting the views of the Soviet Union; and finally that the Western position is being put forward as a basis for serious multilateral negotiations during which the Western Powers would be ready to modify their views to meet any new Soviet proposals of a sincere and practicable nature.

4. Canada can and should play an important role in this exposition because we have participated fully in the drafting of the new Western plan and statement of “principles,” and because we have continued to exercise all our influence toward reaching a satisfactory solution to the related problems of nuclear tests and the prevention of the wider spread of nuclear weapons. Our main effort should be directed toward private diplomatic initiatives designed to convince the smaller and middle powers of the validity of the new Western approach, and to encourage them to give their active support to the early resumption of negotiations on a reasonable basis. Canadian initiatives in this direction should be supported by a forceful statement in the general debate and by timely and energetic interventions in committee, but we should try to avoid committing ourselves to any one approach to the problems involved – whether substantive or procedural – until the extent of common ground between the United States and the Soviet Union and the reactions of the smaller powers to the initial Western exposition are clearer. Action along these lines should preserve our ability to influence the final outcome of the debate in the more decisive period when decisions are to be taken on resolutions before the Assembly.

5. Disarmament. If, as now seems likely, the resumed United States-Soviet bilateral talks should fail to produce concrete results, it is assumed that the new Western plan and probably the statement of “principles” will have been made public during the first days of the general debate, if not earlier.⁵³

6. Our main object in the debate on general disarmament should be to show that if the bilateral talks – on which the Assembly placed considerable hope last spring – failed to achieve results, it was not because of Western policies or tactics. As suggested above, the best way to achieve the impression that the Western position has significant merits in its own right will be to demonstrate that the United States conducted their side of the talks from the very beginning in a manner designed to achieve a resumption of serious and constructive disarmament negotiations. Because the allies were not present at these talks (and also because French disagreement is likely to make a fully coordinated approach impossible), the United States will have to initiate discussion of the points involved in setting forth this case.

7. Canada can exercise considerable influence in promoting a favourable reaction from the members of the United Nations:

(a) Where questions of substance are concerned, by assisting in the presentation of a carefully reasoned and at the same time attractive outline of the new Western plan. The fact that the West has a new plan incorporating many important features not present in previous versions should be kept well to the foreground and contrasted with Soviet unwillingness to make any move forward. No opportunity should be lost in emphasizing that the Western plan contains significant proposals for nuclear disarmament, the reduction of “strategic vehicles,” the prevention of the further spread of nuclear weapons, etc., all of which are additions to earlier plans. The fact that Canada has continually pressed for early measures to deal with nuclear weapons and missiles will make a Canadian presentation of these new features all the more effective. Similarly, the new plan makes it very plain that the Western Powers are prepared to negotiate as comprehensive a series of measures as possible, and to put them into effect at the earliest possible time, both of which are very important points in meeting the wish of smaller and middle powers to get on with disarmament and in refuting the Soviet claim that they alone are interested in disarmament while the West concentrates on “partial measures” and “legalized espionage.”

(b) By supporting the present statement of “principles” if resolutions along this line are debated. As a member of the Commonwealth, and as a middle power, Canada should concentrate on revealing the evident development in the “principles” paper toward the views expressed in the Prime Ministers’ communiqué, and the resolution on this subject which was submitted last year by India and a number of other uncommitted countries. We should also argue that the Western “principles” as they now stand would be a useful guide to future negotiations, while again asserting that we would be receptive to reasonable suggestions which the Soviet Union or other members of the United Nations might wish to put forward on this question.

(c) By further efforts to achieve a reasonable compromise on the question of composition. While continuing to support the composition of the Ten-Nation Committee, plus an impartial chairman and perhaps other impartial officers, we should encourage the development of a Western position which will make clear that resumption of negotiations should not be delayed as a result of disagreement on this subject alone. In private, we should try to persuade the United States to give serious consideration to the Soviet 5-5-3 formula, and to give full weight to the wishes of the neutrals themselves in deciding the extent to which their representatives would participate in the work of the negotiating body. We should also try to ascertain from the Soviet delegation whether they are still prepared to accept this formula, and if so, whether they show any sign of willingness to accept a compromise on the status of the 3 neutrals. In our public statements we should show plainly that the West is prepared to agree to any reasonable composition, and we should be very careful not to give the impression that we are less willing than the Soviet Union to accept the inclusion of neutrals in the negotiating body.

The plan was announced by President Kennedy in a speech to the General Assembly on September 25. See United Nations, Official Records of the General Assembly, Sixteenth Session, 1013th Meeting, September 25, 1961, pp. 55-59. See also “Declaration on Disarmament: the United States programme for general and complete disarmament in a peaceful world.” United Nations, Official Records of the General Assembly, Sixteenth Session, Annexes, 1961-1962, document A/4891, pp. 22-25.

(d) By working for procedural arrangements which will assist the work of any negotiating body which may be agreed. Depending on the character of the debate, and on the attitudes shown by influential uncommitted countries or other states not directly concerned with disarmament negotiations, we may wish to pursue some of the ideas which were contained in the Canadian Resolution put forward at the last session, especially the need for effective means of communication between a future negotiating body and the United Nations, and any smaller committees within the United Nations Disarmament Commission which might be required to strengthen the role of the commission. Our main point of emphasis in this context should be to continue pressing for the resumption of negotiations which will be so organized as to have a greater chance of success than other attempts which have been made in recent years. Should it become clear during the course of the debate that there is no prospect of arranging a resumption of negotiations, we will need to reconsider – in the light of circumstances at the time (particularly East-West relations and the situation in Berlin, and the views expressed by smaller and middle powers at the Assembly) – what means could best be used to apply continued pressure to resume disarmament negotiations, and to keeping the urgency of the disarmament problem before the public and the members of the United Nations. A move to convene the Disarmament Commission or to try to devise another United Nations forum are both possibilities, but we should not commit ourselves to this or any other specific solution until later in the debate when the temper of the Assembly can be more adequately assessed.

8. Nuclear Tests. While the Indians have submitted their customary item on this subject, one major difference between this session and previous years is that the United Kingdom and the United States, the two main Western nuclear powers, have themselves taken the initiative on the question of tests by submitting their own item. In addition, the Soviet action with respect to the moratorium, resulting in the resumption of testing by both sides, has been a severe shock to world public opinion and should be used to highlight dramatically the urgent necessity to achieve a final cessation of nuclear tests. Canada, which has always adopted a very firm position on the question of tests, should take full advantage of these developments in explaining its position to the Assembly.

9. From the outset we should make plain that Canadian policy has been firmly opposed to the testing of nuclear weapons. This unequivocal stand adds considerable strength to our ability to influence the non-nuclear powers, particularly the uncommitted states, and it should be used to the greatest extent possible.

10. We should go on from this statement of our basic position to stress the importance we attach to reaching lasting agreement on the cessation of nuclear tests. The withdrawal by the Soviet Union and the United States from their undertaking not to test has shown very clearly that a voluntary moratorium does not by itself provide a reliable assurance that testing will not be resumed. The delegation should therefore leave no doubt that a carefully worked out treaty containing provisions for effective international control is the only satisfactory solution to the problem of testing in the long term.

11. In support of this position we should argue that while we fully share the widespread desire to avoid further testing, we wish to go further by ensuring that tests will be stopped once and for all, and their cessation guaranteed by an international treaty which will ensure, through agreed arrangements for verification and inspection, that all parties are living up to their obligations. In our public statements we should make plain that resolutions which are introduced in the Assembly should emphasize the urgency of achieving international agreement among the nuclear powers, and that only those which do can be expected to receive full Canadian support. We should also argue that while it cannot be expected that all members of the United Nations will accept the United Kingdom-United States proposals on this subject they should recognize at least that these countries have reasonable proposals and are prepared to negotiate; that the Soviet Union should show a willingness to consider these proposals; and that in these circumstances an effective agreement could still be achieved.

12. Prevention of the further spread of nuclear weapons. The Irish have again requested the inclusion of an item dealing with the prevention of the further spread of nuclear weapons. However, the tactical situation has altered considerably from last year as a result of the inclusion in the first stage of the Western disarmament plan of a clause prohibiting the further dissemination of nuclear weapons. This fact should make it a good deal easier for the West to argue convincingly not only that a solution through international agreement is the only satisfactory one, but that the Western powers have now included concrete proposals to this end in their plan. Canada, which stressed the importance of a solution through international agreement at the last session, should also lay considerable stress on this point in statements during the debate.

13. In order to make this point effectively in any resolution which the Irish may eventually introduce, we should initiate consultations with their delegation at the outset of the Assembly with a view to persuading them to emphasize the importance of multilateral agreement on this subject rather than temporary unilateral measures which provide very little assurance that an effective prohibition has been achieved. We should argue that we ourselves share their views as to the importance of dealing with this problem (as is shown by our support for their resolution last year) and that we believe that the new Western plan has gone a long way toward meeting their views. We would hope that their resolution will reflect a recognition of this point by emphasizing the importance of international agreement. To do otherwise, particularly by placing great stress on the need for unilateral measures outside a disarmament agreement, will only serve to support the propaganda activities of the Soviet Union, which has shown quite plainly that it has no real interest at this time in taking concrete steps to meet this problem.

14. We have recently received from our ambassador in Dublin a copy of a "preliminary draft" of a resolution on this subject which was given him by the Irish Foreign Minister. (Copies of the draft resolution and the ambassador's covering letter are being sent you separately.)† It appears from this text that the Irish are in fact working along the lines suggested above. The delegation should therefore lose no time in putting our views to the Irish delegation, with a view to supporting this approach and ensuring that possible pressure from the Soviet Union, or less moderate delegations among the uncommitted countries, will not persuade them to alter their draft along less acceptable lines. Text ends.

USA RESUMPTION OF NUCLEAR TESTS

While seeing Richard Davis, Deputy Assistant Security for European Affairs, and later Secretary Rusk yesterday on other matters I took the opportunity of conveying to the State Department the views set out in your reference telegram concerning the lack of prior notification of USA decision to resume underground nuclear weapons tests.

2. As you are aware the Secretary had earlier expressed his regret that there was no repeat no prior notification in this instance and yesterday his principal comment was to indicate that in view of the very strong congressional reaction to the resumption of Soviet testing the line had been held over the labour day weekend only with difficulty. While the Secretary did not repeat not say so specifically it is my definite impression that while the various considerations relating to the timing of the announcement of USA decision were canvassed the decision itself was taken at White House level in the light of both international and domestic considerations.

3. You will no repeat no doubt wish to take an early opportunity in New York to discuss with USA and other delegations the position with respect to possible UN action with regard to nuclear tests. In this connection we are repeating text of USA reply to Japanese note on nuclear testing in which USA Government reaffirms its earnest desire that an international inspection and control will be concluded without delay. To this end USA has asked for full and complete consideration of the urgent need for an effectively controlled treaty banning nuclear weapons tests at the forthcoming Sixteenth General Assembly of UN.

DISARMAMENT: VISIT OF THE SOVIET AMBASSADOR

You asked for an outline of points which might be made with respect to disarmament and nuclear tests during your interview with the Soviet Ambassador.

Disarmament

2. If the Soviet Ambassador calls after September 21, when the United States representative (perhaps President Kennedy) is due to speak at the General Assembly,⁵⁴ it may be possible to centre your comments on disarmament on the main features of the new plan which is likely to be made public at that time. If the plan has not yet been released, I would suggest that the best approach might be through a more general exposition of Canadian views, perhaps along the following lines:

(a) The overriding consideration for Canada is to get disarmament negotiations started again;

(b) The purpose of the United States-Soviet bilateral talks, as we understood them, was to achieve this end by agreeing on a suitable composition and statement of "principles." We regret that full agreement has not yet been reached. We consider however, that it is even more imperative in this time of crisis for the powers principally concerned to make a renewed effort to achieve a satisfactory basis for resumed negotiations;

(c) We consider that the latest United States statement of "principles" represents a real effort to meet the Soviet point of view, the position expressed by India and other countries at the 15th session, and the Statement of the Commonwealth Prime Ministers;

(d) Canada is flexible on the question of the composition of the negotiating body. We would prefer a body the size of the Ten-Nation Committee with the addition of an impartial Chairman and perhaps one or two impartial officers. However, we are prepared to consider other suggestions. Does the Soviet Union still favour the 5-5-3 composition suggested privately by Mr. Gromyko at the 15th session? If so, what status does the Soviet Ambassador consider the three neutrals would have?

(e) Canada will also work for an effective relationship between the United Nations and any future negotiating body. The Soviet Ambassador will be familiar with the ideas contained in the resolution submitted by Canada and others at the 15th session with a view to improving the effectiveness of this relationship and the efficiency of the Disarmament Commission, through the establishment of sub-committees and other suitable arrangements. These ideas still seem to us to be valid.

Nuclear Tests

3.(a) The Soviet Ambassador will be familiar with the firm opposition of the Canadian Government to the testing of nuclear weapons.

(b) Canada therefore attaches the greatest importance to achieving lasting agreement on the discontinuance of nuclear weapons tests.

(c) The recent action of the Soviet Union regrettably shows that a voluntary moratorium can be denounced at any time, and points up the necessity of ensuring that nuclear tests will be stopped permanently by agreement at the earliest possible time on an international treaty containing safeguards designed to guarantee that all states live up to their commitment not to test.

4. The above comments are based largely on the Under-Secretary's memorandum to the Minister of September 6† suggesting lines which the Canadian Delegation should follow at the 16th session (Telegram N-67 of September 11 containing the text of this memorandum is attached).⁵⁵

5. You also asked about the possibility of raising with the Soviet Ambassador Canadian views as to Arctic inspection which have been discussed on a number of occasions and were put forward again by the Prime Minister at the outset of the 15th General Assembly. While this proposal is one to which we will no doubt wish to return later on, I think on balance that it would probably be best not to pursue it with the Soviet Ambassador at this time. You will recall that there was considerable opposition in the NATO Council to the section of the new disarmament plan referring to “zones of aerial and ground inspection” (largely as a result of French and German fears that it would lead to proposals for zonal disarmament). While we do not share the views of the French and Germans on this point, it would probably not be timely, in view of their strong opposition, to raise it again with the Soviet Ambassador especially since the section of the plan which relates to this point has now been amended.

UNGA FIRST COMMITTEE: NUCLEAR TEST RESOLUTIONS

This memorandum summarizes a series of telephone calls last evening and this morning concerning the highly confused and difficult procedural situation which has developed in the First Committee in connection with the Six-Power (now eight with Pakistan and Iran) Resolution on the 50-megaton bomb.

2. By pre-arrangement when the debate resumed yesterday afternoon, the Norwegian representative, Hans Engen, moved that priority be given to the Six-Power Resolution and be voted on at once. Unfortunately, some other members of the Six-Power group also spoke in a similar sense, which tended to diffuse the efforts of the co-sponsors to gain a quick procedural decision. The Indian representative, Mr. Chakravarty, then intervened, to say on instruction from his Government his delegation could not accept the legality of the move for priority, as priority had already been given to India's own resolution over that of the United States and Britain – the only two resolutions originally before the Committee. General debate on these other two items had already begun and the Indian delegation would have to insist on a two-thirds majority vote to set aside the priority already given to their item.

3. The Soviet-bloc countries then mounted a massive filibustering counter-attack on the move for priority and by marshalling one speaker after another managed to consume the entire time remaining for the afternoon discussion. At one stage the Argentine chairman Amadeo tried to adjourn what was in effect a continuation of the general debate on the other two items before the Committee with the intention of reconvening it to discuss the Six-Power Resolution, but this move did not gain support from the floor. In the end Hans Engen made a short statement deploring the undignified debate that had developed over the question of priority, and withdrew the motion.

4. It was at this point that word began to reach New York that a very large explosion, possibly one of 50-megaton size, had taken place in the Soviet Union. As this injected an entirely new element into the debate – whether or not the raison d'être for the Six-Power Resolution had disappeared – the chairman adjourned the meeting.

5. It is perhaps worth recording that a senior member of the Soviet delegation then spoke to Mr. Ritchie saying that since the explosion was “all over” why did the six powers not withdraw their draft resolution. Mr. Ritchie expressed the Canadian Government’s horror and disappointment at this private confirmation that a major detonation had taken place (no member of the Soviet bloc had publicly stated as much), but only evoked the reply that the text was regarded by the Soviet Government as “necessary.”

6. After the Committee rose the co-sponsors met to discuss next steps. The Danish representative read a statement received from his Prime Minister stating that the 50-megaton explosion had taken place in the Soviet Union. The Danish representative thought this meant that there was no point in pursuing the resolution further. Uden (Sweden) supported him adding, that since it would take at least two days to extricate ourselves from the procedural confusion, it would be sensible to withdraw the resolution. The Japanese on the other hand were reluctant to give up so readily. Mr. Ritchie took the line that we should not withdraw the resolution unless some clear confirmation was received from the Soviet Union itself that they had in fact detonated a 50-megaton bomb. Some preliminary consideration was given to a Danish proposal that there be a declaration by the co-sponsors stating that the group had noted reports that the explosion had taken place and registering the shock and disappointment of themselves and all peoples. The group closed their meeting by agreeing to meet at 10 a.m. this morning and meanwhile to say nothing to the press except that the resolution still stood and plans for the next step were being considered.

7. In telephone conversations late last night and again early this morning the Minister reiterated his instructions that the Canadian delegation should not agree to abandon the draft resolution. The delegation was instructed to take the line that on the basis of seismographic recordings of an explosion of 30 megatons, and in the absence of confirmation from the Soviet Union that one of 50 megatons had taken place, the international community had no choice but to assume that a 50-megaton explosion might yet occur. They therefore had no alternative but to proceed on the assumption that the original purpose of the resolution still had validity. The Minister felt that Canada would suffer a considerable public defeat if the resolution were withdrawn without a fight and asked the delegation to make a determined effort to win over the Afro-Asian bloc (none of whom had participated in yesterday’s debate) who clearly held the key to the procedural impasse.

8. Hans Engen of Norway, who has taken over from the Danes the procedural management of the Six-Power Resolution, was to see the chairman Amadeo (Argentina) at 10 a.m. to see whether there was not some procedural device or precedent which would permit the chairman to set aside the general debate in order to allow priority to be given to the Six-Power Resolution. The Committee was to meet from 10:30 to 1:00 and then adjourn for the United Nations Day ceremonies. Mr. Ritchie was not optimistic that any progress could in fact be made in so limited a time.

9. In conveying the Minister’s instructions by telephone to Senator Brooks, the following points were suggested as lines of action to be taken by the Canadian delegation:

(1) both within the Six-Power group and in the Committee the line should be taken that the 50-megaton bomb had not definitely been detonated and that the justification for the resolution remained;

(2) that an attempt should be made to swing Afro-Asian opinion behind the resolution – perhaps by having the Japanese convene and speak to the Afro-Asian group;

(3) that a Canadian statement should be prepared for use in the Committee this morning which would record publicly in strong terms the Canadian determination to press ahead with the appeal to the Soviet Union.

UNITED NATIONS RESOLUTION ON RUSSIAN 50 MEGATON BOMB TESTING; ATTITUDE OF RUSSIA TO WORLD OPINION

1. The Secretary of State for External Affairs said that the results of Canada's successful efforts to have the United Nations register its objections and address an appeal to Russia to cancel its plans to explode a fifty megaton bomb had been good. The Russians had tried a series of procedural moves to block the resolution in committee but without success. The vote held on Tuesday, October 24th, showed 75 countries in favour of the resolution, 10 opposed and one abstention. The vote had isolated the Communist bloc. The outcome had been considered a diplomatic victory for Canada.

2. The Minister of National Defence said that he was worried over the resolution put forward by India. If a voluntary moratorium on tests were now agreed to, the U.S.S.R. would be finished this big series but could, as in the past, continue developing and manufacturing bombs, while the U.S.A. would be held up. It played into the Russian hands. To accept it would undermine the whole western position on controls.

3. Mr. Green noted that it was the kind of resolution which would be difficult to vote against. The U.S. and U.K. resolution was not too helpful, in that it only provided for negotiation. It would fail to arouse public opinion and Russia would not negotiate if she wanted to continue testing.

He emphasized that, if Russia had decided now to ignore world opinion, the whole policy of the West must be changed. He went on concerning the particular issue of testing to say that the U.S. might now have to return to testing. This would logically have to be opposed by Canada. Mr. Adlai Stevenson had admitted that President Kennedy had been foolish early in September to say the U.S. would start testing again. If this race continued there could be but one end.

4. During the discussion the following points were raised:

(a) Without inspection and other international controls the U.N. resolution to abstain from testing meant nothing. It would give the Russians the advantage – time to carry on their preparations, while others held off further development.

(b) Some said that every effort should be made to assemble a majority of world opinion on this issue. Progress could be made a step at a time.

(c) Although Canada's lead had brought about a major diplomatic victory which was popular at home, many segments of the population, including the dairy industry, were greatly concerned over the effects of the present publicity about fallout.

(d) Some felt that the press report of a statement by the Chairman of the Defence Research Board indicated views different from those of the government. Others said that his statement referred to present conditions of fallout and merely sought to allay some of the panic which was developing. There was in fact no contradiction.

(e) It was felt that there should be some co-ordination of statements being made by different government sources. Statements were being made by Health and Welfare and other agencies. There should be some clearing centre and statements on the subject should not be too technical.

5. The Cabinet noted the statement of the Secretary of State for External Affairs regarding the leading role played by Canada in having a resolution passed in the United Nations objecting to the testing of a 50 megaton bomb and appealing to Russia to desist from such tests.

INTERVIEW WITH GOVERNOR STEVENSON IN NEW YORK,
NOVEMBER 14, 1961

I attach for your information a memorandum recording an interview which I had with Governor Stevenson on November 14, in which we discussed disarmament, nuclear tests, the African resolution on nuclear weapons and Chinese representation.

[PIÈCE JOINTE/ENCLOSURE]

Note du sous-secrétaire d'État adjoint aux Affaires extérieures

Memorandum by Assistant Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs

[Ottawa, no date]

In response to a question from the Minister about Mr. Stevenson's expectations as to how the debate on disarmament would go in Committee One, Mr. Stevenson thought that Zorin would begin by repeating the established Soviet positions on both substance and procedure. He would probably assert that the idea of total and complete disarmament should be accepted before the consideration of international control measures and insist on composition of 5-5-5 by the negotiating forum.

Mr. Stevenson hoped the Committee would not become too concerned with details of the composition of the negotiating body, but would emphasize the urgency and necessity of resuming negotiations leaving the matter of composition to be settled bilaterally between the USA and USSR. As regards USA views on composition, there were several possibilities; they would prefer to start with 5-5-10 formula, but in the last resort in order to obtain agreement Mr. Stevenson said he would be prepared to recommend acceptance of 5-5-3 composition.

In reply to a question from Mr. Stevenson, the Minister said he hoped that if it was necessary to reach agreement on composition, the possibility of 5-5-3 would not be ruled out. The Minister indicated that some thought had been given to a possible composition of the negotiating body in Ottawa and that one idea being considered was to add to the members of the Ten Nation Committee two states from each of the following areas, Africa, Asia and Latin America, under the chairmanship of the Chairman of the Disarmament Commission. This would amount to seventeen in all. He also recalled that Canada had suggested the addition of a neutral continuing chairman and two other officers from neutral countries. Mr. Stevenson said that either formula was acceptable to the USA.

He again emphasized that he hoped the Committee would put emphasis on the idea that the USA and USSR should agree on the composition of the negotiating forum and get started with the negotiations. His own experience in the bilateral consultations with Zorin made him wonder whether the Soviet Union was as serious in their intention to reach agreement on disarmament as they professed to be. The Minister stressed the importance of putting their good faith to a test in further discussions on disarmament.

The Minister recalled that General Burns had suggested that one way of getting over the obstacle the Soviet Union had placed in resuming negotiations on banning nuclear tests was to consider this as a first item in any resumed negotiations on disarmament. The Minister asked what the USA reaction might be to his suggestion. Mr. Stevenson replied that it would be a complicating factor if the negotiations were transferred to another body. The USA preferred that the negotiations on nuclear test ban should be resumed where they had been left off at Geneva, with the same participants. The aim should be to finish off the treaty. General Burns suggested that it might be possible to have the negotiations on nuclear tests conducted in the sub-committee and the set-up for negotiations on disarmament could thus consist of the same group which had been negotiating in Geneva. The Minister gave Mr. Stevenson a copy of the Canadian draft resolution on disarmament and Mr. Stevenson thanked him saying it could be useful in his further consideration of the matter.

Mr. Stevenson said that it was his impression that the Soviets were going to be stubborn about the nuclear test ban talks. He expressed the view that the passing of the Indian resolution on a moratorium banning the resumption of tests and the passing of the resolution sponsored by African countries outlawing the use of nuclear weapons might encourage the Soviet Union in their intransigence. The latter resolution put the USA in a difficult position as their defence against the Soviet Union was dependent upon nuclear weapons.

The Minister suggested that it might have been wiser for the NATO countries to agree on abstention rather than opposing the resolution which obviously had appeal not only to Africans but to public opinion everywhere, namely the desire to ban the use of nuclear and thermo-nuclear weapons. Mr. Stevenson said that none were more anxious to ban the use of these weapons than the people of the USA, but repeated the argument that since the defence of the USA and its allies depended upon these weapons they had no alternative but to oppose the resolution. The Minister suggested that tactics which had the effect of isolating the NATO countries on resolutions in the UN on issues reflecting majority opinion in the UN, made it more difficult to influence members of the UN on issues just as important to NATO. He said that on such questions NATO should not vote as a bloc in the UN. The Minister suggested to Mr. Stevenson that the position taken by the western countries over nuclear testing, and particularly in the vote against the 50 megaton bomb, had strengthened the western position in the UN. Mr. Stevenson said he was glad to hear this, but he repeated that the USA was still unhappy about finding itself isolated from its friends on matters such as the resolution on the moratorium of nuclear tests and the African resolution outlawing nuclear weapons.

On Chinese representation, Mr. Stevenson outlined USA ideas on a resolution to establish a committee to be appointed by the President of the UNGA to study the question of the representation of China and related matters such as the enlargement of UN councils, reporting to the Seventeenth Session. He explained that it was the USA policy not just to keep communist China out of the UN, but to ensure arrangements that would keep nationalist China in. He did not see any other way of accomplishing this aim except through establishment of a committee which would study the matter. Some might interpret this as a way of postponing the decision for a year. Although it may have that results, the USA did not see any other way of working towards a solution which would enable Nationalist China to remain in the UN. The Minister said that while he favoured the idea of a study he would not be prepared to agree to Canadian co-sponsorship of a resolution. Opinion in Canada was divided on the issue of Chinese representation, and it would not be helpful to sponsor a resolution initiated by the USA. Mr. Stevenson said he understood, but was glad to hear that Canada might support the idea of the study. He wondered whether Canada might be prepared to serve on a study committee. The Minister indicated that such an idea would be regarded sympathetically.

SWEDISH DRAFT RESOLUTION ON THE PREVENTION OF THE FURTHER SPREAD OF NUCLEAR WEAPONS

The draft resolution on the above subject which Sweden has now submitted in the First Committee (text attached as Annex I to this memorandum)† has direct implications for NATO defence arrangements as well as Canadian policy on the acquisition of nuclear weapons. Accordingly, it will be necessary to give very careful consideration to the Swedish draft before deciding on voting instructions for the Canadian Delegation as well as the substance of an explanation of the Canadian vote.

Analysis of the Swedish Proposal

2. In essence, the Swedish draft calls on the Secretary-General to make an enquiry "as to the conditions under which" the non-nuclear powers would be willing "to enter into specific undertakings to refrain from manufacturing or otherwise acquiring" nuclear weapons and "to refuse to receive in future nuclear weapons on their territories on behalf of any other country." In his introductory remarks on the proposal in a statement before the First Committee on October 26, the Swedish Foreign Minister, Mr. Uden, gave a further indication of what he had in mind by speaking of a declaration by the non-nuclear powers that they did not intend to manufacture nuclear weapons or "permit stockpiling of such weapons on their territories for their own or some other state's account." He also compared his idea to the Rapacki Plan as a means of "sealing off" the countries concerned "from nuclear weapons," but commented that the Rapacki Plan concerned only Central Europe, whereas his proposal was universal in scope.

3. It is clear from the above considerations that the Swedish resolution as now drafted envisages an extremely stringent formulation of the prohibition of the spread of nuclear weapons. In effect it would create "denuclearized zones" in the countries to which it applied, since it would require countries to "enter into specific undertakings" not only to refrain from the manufacture of such weapons, but also from their acquisition by other means and, more important to Canada, their stationing on a nation's territory "on behalf of any other country." This last clause must, of course, be interpreted as prohibiting any arrangements for the stationing of nuclear weapons on Canadian territory regardless of whatever arrangements for control of the weapons might be agreed.

4. It may be argued that the resolution itself does not carry the implications just suggested because it only calls for a Secretariat "enquiry" which would not require states to take a position on the substance of the matter at this time. In my opinion, however, this argument cannot affect our attitude toward the resolution since its adoption would bring early action by the Secretariat which would then result in our having to take a stand on substance. In considering the Canadian attitude toward the resolution, we must therefore be prepared not only to justify our stand on what might be called the procedural question (whether the enquiry should be made) but also on the substance of the matter (how Canada would reply to any such enquiry).

Likely Attitude of Other States

5. Since the Swedish draft has only just been submitted in the First Committee, the total number of co-sponsors and the voting position of key delegations must remain in doubt for the time being. However, our latest information from the Canadian Delegation suggests that the resolution is likely to command fairly wide support.

6. Our Delegation has reported that the resolution has been submitted in the First Committee with Austria, Ceylon, Ethiopia, Libya and the Sudan as co-sponsors. According to the Delegation, Sweden is not seeking additional co-sponsors, although there could be others which would wish to join the present group. We will keep in close touch with our Delegation on this possibility.

7. Most Delegations apparently have not yet received firm voting instructions on the Swedish proposal, but some idea of their probable positions can be gained from their statements and voting on related resolutions which have already been adopted. It seems very likely that the Communist bloc will support the resolution, since the Soviet Representative has already referred to it in favourable terms in Committee. Judging by the co-sponsorship, and their votes on related resolutions (particularly the two African proposals), it is also probable that the majority of the Afro-Asians will support the Swedish draft, although it is possible that a number of French African states might abstain. The position of the Latin American group and states participating in Western alliances is more difficult to predict in the absence of further information, but a member of the Netherlands Delegation has suggested to our Delegation that an abstention seems to be the position which most NATO countries would be likely to adopt. (Among the Scandinavians themselves, our Delegation has indicated that the Danes and Norwegians will probably abstain, although they are far from happy with the resolution.) Of some interest in this context is the indication given our Delegation by a member of the Irish Delegation that they are inclined to view the Swedish proposal as complementing their own, and are likely to vote in favour of it.

8. In summary, on the basis of incomplete information available to us at this time, it seems likely that there will be numerous abstentions on the resolution but that very few states will vote against it. In the circumstances it seems probable that the resolution will be adopted by a sizeable majority, perhaps by two-thirds.

The Canadian Position

9. Canada has consistently taken a strong stand against all nuclear weapons tests and in favour of measures to promote nuclear disarmament and to prevent the wider spread of nuclear weapons. Our basic position on these questions, and the policy we have adopted with respect to relevant resolutions at this and past sessions of the General Assembly, makes plain that it would not be consistent for Canada to oppose the Swedish draft resolution. Moreover, the fact that the Swedish proposal is likely to obtain fairly wide support at the Assembly suggests that it would be unwise for Canada – or other NATO states – to take a stand in opposition to an initiative which reflects the concern of many states (particularly the uncommitted) over the dangers of the wider spread of nuclear weapons. For these reasons it would be difficult, in my opinion, to justify Canada voting against the resolution.

10. There are a number of reasons why it would also be very difficult for Canada to support the Swedish proposal. A vote in favour of the resolution would almost certainly be interpreted, both at the United Nations and in the eyes of public opinion, as constituting at least tacit approval of the basic purpose of the draft, i.e., the formation of a “non-nuclear club” comprising a broad range of states whose territory would in effect become “denuclearized zones.” Furthermore, support for the resolution could carry with it the implication that the Canadian Government was prepared to bind itself now, in advance of and in isolation from disarmament negotiations, to an undertaking which would spell out once and for all the conditions under which it would renounce the right to acquire nuclear weapons or have them stationed on Canadian territory. Finally, a vote in favour of the resolution could well be interpreted by our NATO allies (including the Scandinavian members, if they maintain their present position) as a significant development in Canadian policy with respect to the acquisition of nuclear weapons which in their eyes would be prejudicial to the interests of the Alliance. On the basis of these and similar considerations, it is my opinion that it would not be appropriate for Canada to vote in favour of the Swedish resolution.

11. The fact that Canada is sympathetic to the motives behind the Swedish proposal, and yet unable to vote in favour of it for a variety of reasons, suggests that an abstention is the most logical position to adopt in voting on this resolution. In casting an abstaining vote, I believe that we could, and should, give a very clear statement of our reasons for taking this position.

12. In summary, the explanation of our position, which parallels the statement we made last year on the Irish Resolution, might take the following form:

(a) Canada supports the underlying purpose of the Swedish resolution, namely, that early measures should be implemented to prevent the wider dissemination of nuclear weapons;

(b) However, no state can legitimately be expected to bind itself unilaterally – completely in isolation from agreement on either nuclear or conventional disarmament – to an undertaking which would remove for all time its freedom to acquire nuclear weapons or allow them to be stationed on its soil for purposes of self-defence;

(c) Furthermore, the proposed survey as to “the conditions under which” states would make such an undertaking would be likely to result in a large variety of divergent national views on this subject which would hinder rather than assist the adoption of effective and universally applicable measures designed to prevent the wider spread of nuclear weapons;

(d) The Canadian view is that the only fully satisfactory method of putting a stop to the further spread of these weapons is through broader international disarmament agreements applicable to the nuclear and non-nuclear powers alike, which would give all countries an assurance that the whole problem of nuclear weapons would be dealt with effectively;

(e) For these reasons, although Canada sympathizes with the motives of the co-sponsors, it is not possible for Canada to vote in favour of this resolution; Canada intends, however, to vote for the Irish resolution on this subject (see below) because this proposal makes plain that an international agreement binding all powers is the best way to achieve the prevention of the wider spread of nuclear weapons. Attached for your consideration (Annex II)† is a draft statement incorporating the above points which might be made during the debate on this resolution or in explanation of the Canadian vote.

Related Proposals – The Irish Resolution

13. The draft resolution on the prohibition of the spread of nuclear weapons which has been submitted by the Irish Delegation (copy attached as Annex III)† meets all the points which we have raised in consultations on this subject. In my opinion, it would therefore be desirable to vote in favour of this resolution.

14. The main recommendation of the Irish resolution is that states should endeavour to conclude “an international agreement” under which the nuclear powers would “refrain from relinquishing control” over nuclear weapons to non-nuclear states, and the latter would “undertake not to acquire control of or to make such weapons.” This recommendation is fully in accord with the position we adopted on the Irish resolution at the 15th session, when the Canadian Representative said that “we consider that the only satisfactory way to dispel the dangers inherent in this possibility (i.e., the wider spread of nuclear weapons) is through international agreement on a comprehensive and carefully verified system of disarmament.” Furthermore, as far as we know, the resolution as now drafted is satisfactory to our NATO partners and is likely to be supported by virtually all of them.

15. Our support for the Irish resolution should assist us in stating our position on the recommendation contained in the Swedish draft. As suggested above, our basic argument would be that while we cannot support unilateral measures in this field which would be binding on us in isolation from any measures of disarmament, we strongly favour the adoption of appropriate international agreements as suggested in the Irish proposal. In my opinion, this argument represents a fully defensible position on this subject, which is consistent both with our strong desire to see early progress on nuclear disarmament and the necessity of maintaining our freedom of action until effective international agreements can be achieved.

Recommendation

17. In summary, I would recommend that the Delegation be instructed to abstain on the Swedish resolution and vote in favour of the Irish resolution, if they are brought to a vote in their present form. I would also recommend that the Delegation explain the Canadian position on these resolutions along the lines of the statements attached at Annexes II and IV to this memorandum.

18. I should be grateful for your reaction to the above comments and recommendations, in order that instructions may be prepared for our Delegation.⁵⁶

16TH UNGA: SWEDISH RESOLUTION ON NUCLEAR WEAPONS

After its discussion of the African Resolution (reported in a separate telegram) Council this morning in private session turned to a discussion of the Swedish Resolution on the basis of the personal views of Permanent Representatives.

2. The Secretary-General introduced the discussion by saying that the resolution seemed to him to contradict NATO defence policy and that he therefore hoped all would agree that it was unacceptable. The French Permanent Representative agreed with this view stressing particularly the fourth preambular paragraph. I questioned this interpretation suggesting that this paragraph seemed to refer to an inquiry. It was certainly conceivable that the inquiry might lead to a difficult situation but I wondered whether we could reasonably oppose a request for an inquiry. The French Permanent Representative thought that to accept the request for an inquiry implied acceptance of the point of the question. I again differed from the French Permanent Representative, pointing out that this paragraph referred to the conditions under which an agreement might be reached. USA Permanent Representative wanted to know whether the fourth preambular paragraph applied to communist China and Danish Permanent Representative replied that the Swedes themselves did not repeat not know the answer to this question.

3. I received support from UK Permanent Representative who thought there was considerable difference between the Swedish draft and the African Resolution L-292. Swedish draft did not repeat not commit us even though it was dangerous and suggestive. He expected that UK would try to secure postponement of consideration of Swedish Resolution until Irish Resolution was discussed because that was the appropriate point at which to discuss it. There might then be a possibility of having the resolution withdrawn or amended to harmonize with the Irish draft. He would not repeat not wish to exclude the possibility of voting against the draft however and expressed dislike for preambular paragraph 3. But in the long run, he wondered whether, if the Alliance opposed all attempts to restrict the spread of atomic weapons, the Western image would not repeat not become distorted in the eyes of others.

4. USA Permanent Representative made a statement on instructions which will be distributed later. We shall telegraph this statement to you when we receive it. In summary, the USA was concerned over the implications of the resolution and feared that once more the effects would rebound on the Alliance by casting doubts on Western defence policy both in relation to future multilateral ownership and in relation to present and future arrangements for storage. Swedish Resolution played into the hands of those who hoped for disarmament by passing a stream of resolutions with an emotional content. The USA feared the continued split in NATO solidarity; it opposed the future spread of national nuclear capabilities; and would vote for the Irish Resolution. USA however considers that Swedish Resolution should be opposed. Italian, Danish and Netherlands representatives took much the same sort of view as had been expressed by UK Permanent Representative and myself.

5. French Permanent Representative agreed with USA approach as also did the Belgian. The latter advanced the interesting suggestion that the answer to the inquiry contained in the Swedish draft had already been provided in the form of the Western peace⁵⁷ plan. He pleaded against a piecemeal approach to disarmament and in this was joined by USA Permanent Representative in a second intervention in which he said the Alliance should beware of agreeing to partial disarmament measures which would in practice, through well-sounding resolutions, apply to the West alone. Such resolutions took attention away from the fundamental question whether it was possible to control nuclear weapons under a disarmament scheme. By accepting too many resolutions of this sort, we were in danger of damaging our ultimate purpose of making sure nuclear weapons would be properly controlled.⁵⁸

6. Danish Permanent Representative added in the course of his remarks that his authorities were not repeat not happy about the Swedish initiative which they recognized would be difficult. On the other hand, the initiative had been taken and Danish public would not repeat not be able to understand it if Danish government voted against a resolution proposed by another Scandinavian state and containing nothing more than a request for an inquiry. To this Netherlands Permanent Representative replied that the ultimate damaging effect of the Swedish draft would probably be less than that of the African Resolution L-292 but he was unable to see why the Scandinavian members of the Alliance had to be so careful of Swedish initiatives. The Secretary-General picked this point up in his concluding remarks by suggesting that if the Swedes did not repeat not care enough about Danish and Norwegian governments' feelings to restrain themselves, there seemed to be no repeat no reason why Swedes should receive special consideration from Denmark and Norway. Finally, the Secretary-General said that he recognized that the final preambular paragraph was not repeat not a statement of policy but an inquiry. Nevertheless, if the resolution were adopted, it would lead to the creation of pressure groups within NATO countries to do what the inquiry in the resolution was obviously aimed at. Secondly, the Secretary-General doubted whether the new Secretary-General of United Nations should be asked to make enquiries of this nature. His concluding plea was that Sweden should be asked to drop its own draft resolution and vote for Irish Resolution.

SWEDISH RESOLUTION ON NUCLEAR WEAPONS

In view of the information contained in telegram 3201 of November 25 from Mr. Léger (copy attached)† that a further discussion on voting on the Swedish Resolution would take place today (Monday), Ignatieff called Léger by telephone. Ignatieff stressed the point you had made to him about the undesirability of conducting parallel discussions on voting in Paris and in New York. The discussions in New York were obviously more profitable since they were conducted by those more fully aware of the various UN considerations and the changing tactical situation going on in the Assembly. In fact, such consultations were going on among representatives of NATO countries at this very time in which General Burns was representing the Canadian view. Mr. Léger was also told that there was probably no chance of the Canadian Delegation voting against the Resolution; it would be more probable that the Delegation would be voting for or abstaining.

2. Mr. Léger said that this information was very helpful since the meeting with other delegations slated for today had been postponed. He completely agreed about the undesirability of parallel and simultaneous discussions on UN votes going on in Paris and New York and recalled that he had made this point but he would make it again with greater emphasis. The initiative for these consultations came both from the Secretary-General as well as from the US Delegate on the grounds that the pattern of voting on nuclear weapons was important to NATO.

3. Mr. Léger strongly recommended that the Canadian Delegation should abstain on the Swedish Resolution particularly if, as he expected, Britain would be abstaining also. He thought that there was no chance of all NATO countries agreeing to an identical position since France and probably the United States would vote against.

SWEDISH RESOLUTION ON NUCLEAR WEAPONS

Livingston Merchant telephoned me about 5 p.m. this evening to ask us to vote against the Swedish Resolution on nuclear weapons. After expressing satisfaction at the changed voting on the African Resolution in plenary last week, Merchant said the U.S. Government is concerned at the implications of the Swedish Resolution, particularly in its reference to prohibition of storage facilities being granted to nuclear powers. (Reference is in paragraph 2 of Candel New York Telegram 2706 of November 15:† “Taking note of suggestion that an inquiry be made as to conditions under which countries not possessing nuclear weapons might be willing to enter into specific undertakings to refrain from manufacturing or otherwise acquiring such weapons and to refuse to receive in future nuclear weapons on their territories on behalf of any other country; ...”)

2. Merchant also said that the British Government had agreed to vote against the Resolution. This, I gather, is contrary to the earlier understanding we had from other sources that the British were going to abstain.⁵⁹

SWEDISH RESOLUTION ON NUCLEAR WEAPONS – GENERAL BURNS' REPORT

Ignatieff spoke to General Burns at approximately 6 p.m. and was given the conclusions just reached at a meeting of representatives of NATO countries in the United Nations. Although it was felt that unanimity was highly desirable among NATO countries on this Resolution, the discussion revealed that this could only be based on abstention. The U.S.A. Delegation (contrary to Merchant's telephone message to the Under-Secretary) did not reveal that they had final instructions but referred to their general opposition to this Resolution as expressed in NATO. The French apparently have instructions that would permit them to vote against or abstain. Pressure was directed on the Scandinavians at the meeting to persuade them to abstain rather than vote in favour. Burns said that he would be confirming this report by telegram.

It was clear from the discussion at the meeting that no delegations had final instructions.

16TH UNGA SWEDISH RESOLUTION

You will have seen the statement made by Candel New York (their telegram 2910 November 24)† in explanation of Canadian vote in plenary on African Resolution concerning the prohibition of nuclear weapons. In voting on Swedish Resolution, it will be important to take a position which is consistent both with that explanation and our more general policy on related proposals under consideration at the 16th Session.

2. Our preliminary examination of Swedish draft resolution suggests that the most consistent position for Canada to adopt is an abstention. We might then explain our vote along the lines of the following statement.

3. Text of proposed statement begins: Canada fully supports the basic desire of the co-sponsors of this resolution to prohibit the further spread of nuclear weapons. Canadian government has consistently favoured the adoption of an international agreement on disarmament which would include measures to prevent the wider spread of nuclear weapons.

We recognize that the draft resolution now before us does not repeat not, in itself, call for action in this field but only for an enquiry as to the conditions under which states would be prepared to accept certain undertakings. My delegation is certainly not repeat not opposed to a survey of this kind although we believe that it could result in a variety of divergent national viewpoints, conditions and reservations.

So far as the substantive question is concerned, however, it would be unreasonable to expect that states should bind themselves now – completely in isolation from any agreement on disarmament – to an undertaking which would tie their hands in respect of the acquisition of nuclear weapons or their stationing on their soil for purposes of self defence. In the absence of an international agreement on this subject no repeat no country is likely to lay aside its responsibilities to its own people by accepting unilaterally commitments of this kind.

My delegation has also made plain in stating our position on resolution number ____ (African Resolution on the prohibition of use) that it would be undesirable at this time, when there is a good chance of resuming disarmament negotiations, to detract from the efforts to reach binding agreements which are the only satisfactory means of finally removing the threat of nuclear weapons.

It is on the basis of these considerations that my delegation has decided that we cannot repeat not give our full support to the resolution now before us. However, because we are not repeat not opposed to a survey such as that proposed, and because we fully sympathize with the motives underlying the resolution, it is not repeat not our intention to cast a negative vote.

My delegation therefore proposes to abstain when the draft resolution now under consideration is brought to a vote. Text Ends

4. In discussing Canadian position with your colleagues you should say that a final decision has not yet repeat not been taken as to how Candel New York will be instructed to vote on Swedish draft resolution. However, you should make it plain that it is most unlikely indeed that your authorities would agree to vote against it. You may then make use of the arguments in the draft explanation of vote quoted in paragraph 3 above to explain our attitude toward the draft, but you should not repeat not quote directly from the proposed statement.

5. You should go on to say that we consider it important to avoid a situation in which NATO would find itself voting as a bloc, with very little support from other delegations, in opposition to Swedish draft. You should emphasize that strictly speaking the draft resolution calls only for an enquiry by Secretary-General and that it could be very harmful to basic Western interests to give the impression that NATO is opposed even to an initiative designed to bring out national views on this subject. In our opinion these considerations dictate that the most appropriate vote for all members of the Alliance would be an abstention.

6. Finally, with respect to further consideration of Swedish draft, you should say that it is impossible to work out a consistent position in a context removed from day-to-day developments at UNGA. We therefore consider that the main centre of consultations for NATO members should be in New York rather than in Paris.

For London

7. You should inform UK authorities that it is most unlikely that Canada will vote against Swedish draft. You should make use of above arguments to support our view that an abstention is the most appropriate vote, and impress upon them that we hope UK will follow this course rather than vote against the resolution. Report UK reaction as soon as possible.

For Copenhagen and Oslo

8. You should inform Foreign Ministry of our views on Swedish Resolution along the above lines and report their reaction as soon as possible.

For Candel New York

9. I wish you to report as soon as possible your estimate of the way in which friendly delegations are likely to vote on Swedish draft. I am particularly interested in knowing how many of the Latin American group are planning to abstain, and whether we may expect abstentions (rather than votes in favour) from any of the Afro-Asian countries.

IRISH RESOLUTION ON THE PROHIBITION OF THE WIDER SPREAD OF NUCLEAR WEAPONS

This memorandum has been prepared in accordance with your request for a comparison of the main differences between this year's version of the Irish proposal and the resolution on this subject which was adopted last year at the 15th session. Attached for reference are the texts as submitted this year and last, and the text of the explanation of vote which the Canadian Delegation made on this resolution last year.†

2. The Irish resolution as drafted this year differs in two important respects from the resolution adopted at the 15th session:

(a) In addition to calling upon states to work towards “permanent agreement” on this question, last year’s Irish resolution called for “temporary and voluntary measures” pending permanent agreement, whereby the nuclear states would not relinquish control of such weapons or transmit information necessary for their manufacture to non-nuclear states, and the latter would refrain “from manufacturing these weapons and from otherwise attempting to acquire them.”

In explaining our vote in favour of the resolution, the Canadian Delegation stated that we welcomed the emphasis given in it to the desirability of achieving “permanent agreement” because we believe that the only satisfactory solution lay in the adoption of an “international agreement on a comprehensive and carefully verified system of disarmament.” The Delegation also said that other “admittedly less satisfactory” measures were deserving of encouragement, and that we therefore supported the temporary and voluntary measures called for in the resolution. However, the Delegation concluded by saying that if there was no significant progress towards disarmament in the immediate future we would have to reconsider our position on the temporary measures proposed in the resolution.

This year’s version of the resolution does not raise this difficulty because the passages relating to “temporary and voluntary” measures have been deleted. The resolution as now drafted calls upon states to make an effort to secure an “international agreement” which would contain provisions designed to prohibit the further spread of nuclear weapons. It is therefore consistent with the position which we adopted in explaining our vote at the 15th session. Provision for measures to prevent the further spread of nuclear weapons is also included in the new U.S. disarmament proposals, and we understand the U.S. regards the present formulation of the Irish resolution as consistent with the measures set out in their plan.

(b) Last year’s version of the Irish resolution called upon the non-nuclear states to refrain not only from manufacturing such weapons but “from otherwise attempting to acquire them.” It was thought that this very general formulation could cause some difficulty for Canada in view of the possibility of our entering into agreements with the U.S. whereby nuclear weapons would be stationed in Canada under some form of joint control.

This year’s version of the resolution avoids this difficulty entirely, because it calls upon the non-nuclear states not to attempt to “acquire control of such weapons” rather than not to acquire them in any manner whatever.

3. In my opinion, the two changes just described fully protect Canada’s position. Their incorporation in the new version of the Irish resolution also removes difficulties which it might have caused for possible NATO arrangements with respect to nuclear weapons. Our understanding is that virtually all our NATO partners consider the resolution to be satisfactory as now phrased, and that they are prepared to vote for it. We will inform you immediately if there is any indication of a change in the attitude of any of our NATO partners.

4. If it is decided that Canada should abstain on the Swedish resolution dealing with this subject, Canadian support for the Irish resolution should assist us in stating our position. Our basic argument would be that we cannot support unilateral measures in this field, which would be binding on us in isolation from disarmament, but that we fully support the adoption of appropriate international agreements such as that suggested in the Irish proposal. In my opinion, this reasoning would be consistent both with our desire to achieve early agreement on nuclear disarmament and the necessity of retaining freedom of action until such agreement can be reached.

5. In my memorandum to you of November 18 on the Swedish resolution, I suggested that it might be considered desirable for the Canadian Delegation to restate our position on the Irish resolution either during the debate or when that resolution was brought to a vote. If you agree, we might suggest to the Delegation, when giving them voting instructions on the Irish proposal, that they make an explanation of the Canadian position along the lines of the draft attached to my memorandum to you of November 18.†

16TH UNGA: SWEDISH RESOLUTION

Second meeting of NATO delegations on this subject was held this evening at 5:30pm. It became immediately apparent that unanimity on basis of an abstention was virtually impossible since USA Representative reported that his delegation has received firm instructions to vote against the resolution. (We learned later that this was a presidential decision.) Representative of Denmark made a number of heated interventions emphasising that Scandinavian members would find it exceedingly difficult to abstain unless all NATO group could do likewise. He implied that refusal of USA to agree to a common abstention would have severe repercussions on Scandinavian attitude to similar questions in NATO, and made an emotional appeal that reconsideration be given by USA. (USA delegation will make an effort on basis of Scandinavian attitude to have their instructions changed but has very little hope of success).

2. Danish Representative reported that Swedes had suggested to Scandinavians the insertion of a final preambular paragraph which would draw attention to the necessity of the agreed principle that all measures of disarmament should be balanced to prevent any state or group of states securing an advantage and that reference to this principle might be inserted in operative section as well. It was the general feeling of the group that a revision along these lines would not repeat not affect in any way the substance of resolution or the attitude of group to it.

3. UK Representative said that UK had been prepared to abstain in order to obtain unanimity. Although they did not repeat not have final instructions if unanimity on basis of an abstention was impossible it was likely that UK's "dislike of the resolution would predominate" and result in a UK vote against. Representatives of Italy, Netherlands, France and Belgium reaffirmed their opposition to the resolution. Representative of Iceland indicated that he might have to vote in favour in view of the impossibility to agree on a common abstention.

4. We spoke on the lines of your telegram N-126 November 28, reiterating our desire to see a common front. We made clear that Canada could not repeat not oppose the resolution and preferred an abstention. We also indicated general line we were thinking of taking in explanation of our abstention in committee.

16TH UNGA – SWEDISH DRAFT RESOLUTION

If Norwegian, Danish and Icelandic delegations decide to abstain on the Swedish draft resolution, you should also abstain. If these delegations decide to vote in favour of the resolution you would vote in favour as well. If further complications arise with respect to their voting positions (particularly a divergence among them) you should report to me by telephone immediately.

2. I am transmitting in my immediately following telegram† the text of a draft statement which you could use to explain a Canadian vote in favour of the Swedish Resolution.

3. The procedural suggestion made in your telegram 2988 of November 28† raises difficulties for Canada. If the Swedish delegation were to object to adjournment of the disarmament debate, the motion to adjourn could well be put to a vote. In that event it might be rejected by a large majority with only a few Western delegations voting in favour. Since this development would be very undesirable from our point of view, I believe that no Canadian initiative along these lines should be considered without full consultation with the Swedish delegation. If there are further developments on this question you should also report them by telephone as soon as possible.

UNGA – SWEDISH RESOLUTION

Your telegram not repeat not deciphered here until late today and we understand vote may have already taken place in New York. We are told that our two delegations have been in close contact there but Danish position as explained by Ministry of Foreign Affairs is that in all probability they will vote in favour of Swedish Resolution although we gather last minute discretion has been left to their delegation. This position worked out in close consultation with Norway as only other Scandinavian NATO country. While Danish Government fully cognizant of implication of resolution considerations of inter-Nordic solidarity at this time and in present circumstances are almost overwhelming and they would expect very adverse domestic reaction if they were to oppose a Swedish Resolution directed to ends with which Denmark is basically sympathetic. They do not repeat not regard resolution as binding commitment in that its passage will not repeat not prejudice response of individual state to survey. They expect resolution to pass and do not repeat not see how any member state could then refuse to take part in survey. It would only be at this stage that basic Danish position would be brought out and there is no repeat no room to assume that it would be inconsistent with NATO policy.

SWEDISH RESOLUTION

Instructions have gone today to Norwegian Permanent Mission New York to abstain on some preambular paragraphs but to vote for resolution as a whole. The context of an explanation vote also cleared by Norwegian Cabinet will include a statement that resolution is impracticable and that Norway reserves its position for reasons of domestic defence and NATO membership regarding reply which might be made to questionnaire. It is assumed Denmark and Iceland will also abstain.

2. Foreign Office's recommendation for an abstention was changed to favourable vote by Cabinet mainly because of Sweden's sponsorship. This reason will also be mentioned in explanation of vote. Norway has unsuccessfully attempted to have resolution withdrawn by Swedes or amended to follow Irish pattern. Norway regards Swedish proposal as impracticable and unwise but for domestic political reasons and budget consideration for Sweden and we believe for Finland Cabinet was unwilling to endorse abstention.

This morning Foreign Office received report from British Embassy Washington to the effect that Embassy had urged State Department in strongest terms to instruct USA delegation to abstain on Swedish Resolution but had subsequently received word from State Department that President Kennedy had decided that USA delegation should vote against resolution. Notwithstanding this British Embassy is being instructed to return to the charge and to endeavour to obtain a reversal of American decision. British Government shares our views on desirability of achieving NATO unanimity and realizes that unanimity can be achieved only on basis of abstentions. They expect that if USA votes against Norway and Denmark will vote in favour and the disarray will be complete. They suggest that we bring our influence to bear urgently in Washington.

2. On the other hand if unanimity cannot repeat not be achieve on basis of abstentions and in particular if USA votes against Swedish Resolution then it is now almost certain that UK will also vote against. We reported arguments in favour of abstention in accordance with your instructions but we fear that British Government's decision is firm.

SWEDISH RESOLUTION

Following receipt yesterday of your telegram N-128, November 29,† containing instructions to our delegation and our first telephone conversation yesterday afternoon, I spoke to Burns to ascertain the situation in New York. He told me that it appeared probable that the resolution would come to a vote in an hour or so and that Norway, Denmark and probably Iceland would be voting in favour as it seemed there was no repeat no possibility of NATO agreement on abstention.

2. I then called the British Ambassador to enquire the result of their attempts to persuade USA to abstain. (London telegram 4271 November 29). Ormsby-Gore said that the President and Secretary of State had made their decision on November 28 and that he had concluded that there was no repeat no use in going back at the State Department.

3. I next spoke to the Deputy Under Secretary of State, Alexis Johnson. I explained that we understood that the Scandinavians would be voting in favour in the absence of an agreed NATO position to abstain. While we considered that abstention would be the least unsatisfactory position for NATO representatives, if no repeat no agreement could be reached in that sense, we also would feel constrained to vote for the resolution. It looked as if the voting might begin very shortly; therefore, we wished the State Department to know of our views and our intentions. Was there no repeat no possibility that USA even at this stage would reconsider their decision and abstain? If not repeat not, there would be serious disarray among the NATO delegations.

4. Johnson reminded me of the strong case which had been put by USA Representative in NATO Council for a negative vote. The whole question had been re-examined by the President with his advisers the previous evening and their conclusion to vote against had been confirmed for the same reasons. He undertook nevertheless to explore the possibility of reopening the position and to let me know the result.

5. In my second telephone conversation with you last evening I reported the above to you.

6. Johnson called me again this morning to say that on the basis of my call, the State Department had again re-examined their position, and had again come to the same conclusion "for the same reasons" and that they would oppose the Swedish Resolution (which had not repeat not yet been voted). He added that there was "serious disappointment" at our decision to vote in favour of the resolution.

SWEDISH RESOLUTION

We have been informed by General Burns that the United States Delegation's instructions to vote against the Swedish Resolution have now been confirmed. The possibility of NATO unanimity based on abstention is therefore finally ruled out. The Resolution will probably come to a vote before noon.

2. Norway spoke last night and although the text of the Norwegian statement would seem to justify a vote against or at best an abstention, (see copy attached)† the Norwegian representative (Engen) nevertheless announced his Government's decision to support the Swedish Resolution. General Burns believes that Denmark and Iceland will also vote in favour. In accordance with the instructions General Burns already has, Canada will also be voting in favour and give the short explanation of vote which you and the Prime Minister approved yesterday.

3. Following the vote on the Swedish Resolution the Committee will probably move on immediately to a discussion this afternoon of the Irish Resolution. That Resolution has, incidentally, been slightly amended by the Irish themselves to include an additional phrase which does not substantially affect the purport of the Resolution or our stand in favour of it. Attached is the text of the existing operative paragraph (1), with the amendment now proposed by Ireland inserted and underlined.

4. In view of the indication that the Delegation had yesterday that even the Soviet Union intended to vote for the Irish Resolution, General Burns believes that there will be nothing controversial about the discussion and therefore no real need for Canada to make any explanation of vote. In case for any reason you believe such an explanation nevertheless desirable, a draft statement is being prepared.†

16TH UNGA: DISARMAMENT – SWEDISH RESOLUTION ON NON-NUCLEAR CLUB (L/297)

The debate on Swedish Resolution began at yesterday afternoon meeting of the First Committee and was concluded this morning. Resolution was adopted on a roll call vote of 57 in favour (Canada) 12 opposed with 32 abstentions. We joined the three Scandinavian NATO members in supporting the resolution. The other ten UN NATO members opposed the resolution and were joined by Spain and Nicaragua. The abstentions came chiefly from Latin America and the French-speaking Africans. All Latin American delegations abstained except Brazil and Cuba. The abstentions from the Brazzaville group came as a surprise even to the French delegation which told us that they had not repeat not lobbied against the resolution with the group which apparently abstained for the same reasons as they had on the resolution calling for a denuclearized Africa.

2. Before the vote some fifteen delegations participated in the debate. The representatives of Denmark and Norway expressed support for the idea of conducting the proposed survey to determine the conditions under which non-nuclear nations might agree to measures to limit the spread of nuclear weapons but made clear that they reserved their countries' position as regards the nature of the reply to the survey. We delivered the brief explanation of vote contained in your telegram N-128 November 29.†

3. The Representative of USA delivered a forcible statement explaining why the USA could not repeat not support the resolution. Since his statement is of considerable interest as a reflection of basic USA policy on this question we are transmitting it in total in a following telegram (Ottawa and Washington only).† In terms somewhat less strong than those employed by USA delegation the Representative of UK also stated his government's opposition to the resolution.

4. The Representative of USSR said that Soviet Union would support the draft as a positive contribution to the reduction of danger of nuclear war although the resolution did not repeat not go as far as his delegation would have wished. In particular Soviet Union would have preferred the omission of the words "in the future" in the final preambular paragraph since as presently drafted the resolution seemed to condone the possession of nuclear capability by states such as Germany. Developing this theme Soviet representative launched a violent attack on the position adopted on the resolution by the USA and UK. Referring to USA statement he said that USA should not repeat not argue against the resolution on the grounds that it would effect the defensive arrangements which USA had developed with its allies since as had already been shown in the debate a number of NATO members were prepared to vote in favour of the draft. He accused the West in particular of supporting the nuclear rearmament of Germany. The representative of Bulgaria chimed in to support the line taken by Soviet Representative. His statement also contained references to Soviet bloc proposals for a denuclearized zone in the Balkans.

New York, December 4, 1961

Dear Ken [McIlwraith]:

Enclosed are two copies in draft of a memorandum giving my views on the situation we face as a result of the latest Soviet proposals in the test ban talks. The draft memorandum relates more particularly to the problem with which we would have to deal if following the reports of the negotiating powers to the Disarmament Commission on December 14 on the progress of the Geneva talks, a resolution endorsing the Soviet test ban proposals was introduced at this session.

I do not suggest that this memorandum should be presented for consideration by the Minister at this time, since the specific situation to which it is primarily addressed is not yet before us in concrete form and the Minister has doubtless a great many other matters to consider in preparation for the NATO ministerial meeting. I would, however, like you to examine this memorandum carefully at the divisional level and to discuss the problems it raises with Mr. Ignatieff and with the Under-Secretary.

In about ten days' time when we know in what form, if any, these problems will confront us at this session we can decide whether it will be necessary to send the memorandum, revised as appropriate, to the Minister.⁶¹

NUCLEAR TESTING – SOVIET DRAFT “TREATY”

You will recall that the USA-UK resolution on the need for a treaty to ban nuclear weapons tests (resolution 1649 (XVI) adopted by Plenary on November 8) requests the negotiating states to report to the Disarmament Commission by December 14 on the progress of their negotiations. This raises the prospect that the nuclear testing issue will be reopened before the conclusion of the present session. We have learned from USA Delegation that they anticipate this possibility and are now engaged in the preparation of a report which will, embody a considered response of the two Western negotiating states to the Soviet proposal of November

⁶¹ Notes marginales :/Marginal notes:

Mr. Ignatieff We agree with Gen. Burns' analysis as far as it goes. We would like to discuss the implications with you before you leave for Paris. K.D. M[cllwraith] Dec. 7/61

27 for an agreement which would prohibit atmospheric, outer space and under-water tests relying for verification only on national systems of detection.

On the basis of the reports of the Geneva meetings held since negotiations were resumed on November 28, it would seem most unlikely that the USSR will agree to negotiate further on the points at issue in the draft treaty tabled by the Western powers in the conference last April. The Soviet position in the resumed talks indicates that the line the Russians will take in their report to the Disarmament Commission will be that a treaty to ban tests under an international control system is no longer feasible in the present international situation. This would mean that the Soviet Union now rejects the basis on which the Geneva negotiations were conducted during the past three years. The Soviet report will no doubt argue that this basis has been "discredited" because the West insists on control measures which would give it unacceptable unilateral advantages. The Soviet report will probably also argue that their proposed "treaty" is a means of achieving a rapid interim solution of the nuclear testing problem on a new basis.

On the Western side both the USA and UK have made clear that the Soviet proposal of November 27 is a retreat from previous commitments undertaken by the Soviet Union in the conference and is unacceptable since it provides for no international control machinery. At the first meeting of the resumed conference in Geneva on November 28, Dean emphasized that the USA government will make no "paper undertakings" not to conduct nuclear tests after the USSR's cynical disregard of its previous pledge not to be the first to resume tests. As regards the Soviet proposal that France should be associated in a new moratorium on tests the USA has also stated that the participation of other states in the negotiations does not appear required by Soviet security interests.

Although at the moment it is not possible to forecast the manner in which this Assembly will take note of the reports to the Disarmament Commission called for by resolution 1649, it would seem important that we should be prepared for some discussion of these reports at this Assembly before Christmas. The Soviet Union may go so far as to attempt to obtain the passage of a resolution which would involve Assembly endorsement in some form of its proposed treaty. Alternatively, pressures might develop for the adoption of a resolution which would ask the states negotiating in Geneva to continue their discussions taking fully into account the new Soviet proposal, while maintaining an unsupervised "moratorium."

The USA and UK may be expected to take the strongest exception to any move at this session suggesting that the draft "treaty" put forward by the USSR offers an acceptable alternative to an internationally controlled agreement to ban nuclear tests. The USA has made it clear that it intends to reserve its full freedom of action if the results of the evaluation of the extensive Soviet testing programme makes it necessary for the USA to conduct atmospheric tests in the interest of its national security.

One cannot ignore the fact however that the Soviet Union's latest proposal may hold considerable attraction for non-aligned opinion in the Assembly as a possible basis for future agreement. It was doubtless in the expectation that it could repair the damage done to its public position by its resumption of tests that the Soviet Union agreed to return to the Geneva negotiations presenting at the same time a proposal which it realized would be rejected by the Western powers.

Presented with a situation in which this Assembly would be asked to vote on a resolution implying approval of the Soviet proposal for an unsupervised ban on tests, Canada would be placed in an awkward position. On the one hand, our strong opposition to tests has been expressed in our unqualified support of the Indian resolution (A/1648) which was opposed at the time for different reasons by all the nuclear powers. On the other hand, we voted in favour of the Western resolution (A/1649) calling for the conclusion of an effectively controlled treaty. According to the terms of the latter resolution, the permanent cessation of testing can be guaranteed “only by an effective impartial system of verification in which all states have confidence.” The latest Soviet proposal rejects this essential requirement but the Russians could be counted on to argue that their proposed “treaty” is in full harmony with the spirit of the Indian resolution and meets that resolution’s call for the conclusion of “internationally binding agreements in regard to tests.”

One can hope that the situation described above will not materialize at this session in this acute form. If the current bilateral talks on the composition of the negotiating forum for disarmament are fruitful, neither side may wish to reopen the nuclear tests issue and the bitter debate which this would entail. I believe however that the inherent dilemma which this situation presents for Canada should be faced now.

It appears almost certain no progress can be expected in the Geneva test-ban talks in the ten days remaining until the dead-line. Failing agreement on the conditions for the resumption of negotiations on general and complete disarmament, the Soviet Union will, in all probability, exploit to the full its offer to enter into a formal agreement to ban tests on a basis which it knows the Western nuclear powers cannot accept. As was predicted by several Western speakers during the debate on the Indian resolution, the Soviet offer comes at a moment when the USA cannot renounce its freedom to conduct atmospheric tests until it has reached a firm conclusion regarding the necessity of such tests to ensure the defences of the free world.

It seems to me that this raises grave problems for the Western alliance as a whole and that the problems involved may very well receive attention during the forthcoming ministerial meeting of NATO. The possible repercussions of a USA decision to conduct atmospheric tests on the prospects of renewed disarmament negotiations also merit consideration in this context. In any case, I believe the position taken by Canada at this session on the nuclear testing question should be carefully reviewed in the light of these latest developments.

The recent series of Russian nuclear tests has presented the Americans with a grave problem and they are now considering whether further tests may not be called for on their side if the balance of the deterrent is to be preserved. President Kennedy recently asked me whether we could make facilities available at Christmas Island to carry out atmospheric tests if he should decide (which he has not yet done) that such tests were essential. He does not wish to use Eniwetok or Bikini because the use of a trust territory would subject the Americans to considerable criticism at the United Nations.

I said in the House of Commons on the 31st October that if I were convinced that a further nuclear test was necessary in order to maintain the balance of the deterrent and to preserve freedom in the world, Britain would be bound either to co-operate in or support its conduct.

After careful consideration and discussion here, I replied to President Kennedy pointing out that both he and I were committed by our public statements, mine of the 31st October and his of the 1st November, and that our two countries should stand together in making further atmospheric tests if we were convinced that these were really necessary within the meaning of our statements. But our first step must be to satisfy ourselves that such tests would in fact be firmly within our public positions. To this end I proposed an Anglo/United States meeting of experts to look at the proposed content of the tests so that the President and I could make our individual political judgments whether such a programme is within our public definitions. I made it clear that we should have to be satisfied that the proposed tests cannot be made underground, and indicated that we ought to exclude tests of really marginal value.

My own preliminary view is that we might be prepared to accept tests directly related to preserving the balance of the deterrent, and that these might include tests to protect the validity of our weapons or which promised a break-through in defensive measures.

I am, of course, aware that a resumption of atmospheric tests will be much disliked throughout the world. We are judged by different standards from those applied to the Communists. We should be proud of this and jealous of our moral advantage which may in the end undermine their atheist creed. I have impressed this on President Kennedy.

He has now sent a message which shows that he is resisting pressure for tests as such, and shares my broad view on the criteria which should be applied. Our experts and theirs will be getting into touch in accordance with my proposal and I expect to have further discussions with President Kennedy on this when I meet him in Bermuda.⁶²

We naturally do not want, if we can help it, to prejudice whatever prospects there may be, now that the Geneva Conference has resumed work, of a treaty providing for the cessation of nuclear tests under adequate control. We have however had to make it clear publicly that pending the conclusion of such a treaty we cannot, in view of the massive series of tests held by the Soviet Government, bind ourselves not to engage in or support the conduct of any further tests. I am sure you will agree that we cannot tie our hands when it might be a question of the balance of the deterrent being tipped against us, and when in any case the Soviet proposals now tabled at the Conference clearly suggest that they are more interested, after completing their own programme of tests, in imposing an uncontrolled moratorium on the United States than in any serious negotiations for a treaty.

I should be grateful if you would keep knowledge of the contents of this message to the smallest possible circle.

ITEM 19: QUESTION OF DISARMAMENT

Summary

The item on disarmament appeared on the agenda of the sixteenth session in accordance with resolution 1617(XV) adopted at the last session, in which the General Assembly (a) noted the declarations of the United States and the Soviet Union that they would continue to examine between the sessions on a bilateral basis the question of the resumption of disarmament negotiations (viz. the problem of the principles which would guide future negotiations and the composition of the negotiating forum) and (b) decided to renew its consideration of disarmament at this session. At the outset of the sixteenth session the General Committee recommended that the question of disarmament be allocated to the First Committee after the defeat of a Soviet proposal to have this item considered in Plenary immediately after the General Debate.

The paramount question at this session concerned the conditions for resuming detailed disarmament negotiations, which had been broken off following the Soviet bloc walk-out from the Ten Nation Committee in June 1960. Since it was generally recognized that this was a matter which could be most satisfactorily resolved by intensive bilateral talks between the United States and the Soviet Union, the First Committee adopted promptly and unanimously a resolution introduced by India early in the debate calling upon the two major powers to reach agreement on the composition of a disarmament negotiating body and to report before the end of the sixteenth session on the results of their negotiations. This resolution, which was unanimously passed by Plenary on November 28, is contained in the first part of the report of the First Committee on this item (document A/4980 of November 22) and also appears as A/RES/1660(XVI) of November 30, 1961.

In a series of private meetings the delegations of the United States and the Soviet Union reached agreement on the text of a joint resolution on the resumption of disarmament negotiations. It was agreed between the two powers that a new disarmament committee be constituted, whose membership should consist of the ten members of the Ten Nation Disarmament Committee, with the addition of eight other countries not members of either military bloc (Brazil, Burma, Ethiopia, India, Mexico, Nigeria, Sweden and the UAR). The resolution endorsed this agreement and recommended that the new committee undertake as a matter of urgency disarmament negotiations on the basis of the joint statement of agreed principles. The resolution also requested the disarmament body to submit a progress report on the negotiations to the Disarmament Commission not later than June 1, 1962. The joint resolution was introduced in the First Committee on December 13 where it was adopted by acclamation. It was subsequently adopted unanimously in Plenary. The text appears in the second part of the report of the First Committee (document A/4980 Add.2) and also appears as A/RES/[blank].

In addition to the central problem of the resumption of detailed disarmament negotiations, the Committee had before it a proposal submitted by the delegation of Sweden concerning the formation of a "non-nuclear club." This resolution inter alia requested the Secretary-General to conduct an enquiry "as to the conditions under which countries not possessing nuclear weapons might be willing to enter into specific undertakings to refrain from manufacturing or otherwise acquiring such weapons and to refuse to receive in the future nuclear weapons on their territories on behalf of any other country." Although many delegations felt that this was a matter which could more appropriately be dealt with under the Irish item on the prevention of the wider spread of nuclear weapons, the Swedish resolution was discussed at the end of the Committee's general debate on disarmament. It was adopted in Committee by a vote of 57 in favour (Canada), 12 opposed, with 32 abstentions. It was subsequently adopted in Plenary on a vote of 58 in favour (Canada), 10 opposed, with 23 abstentions. A description of the position adopted by the major groups on this resolution is included in the following section of this report. The text of the resolution appears in Part II of the report of the First Committee A/4980 Add. 1 and in document A/RES/1664(XVI).

The Debate

Many speakers in the General Debate in Plenary gave a prominent place in their interventions to the question of disarmament and this may have been a factor in curtailing the length of the disarmament debate in Committee. On September 25 President Kennedy presented to the Assembly the new United States disarmament programme, while the Soviet position was presented by Mr. Gromyko in his Plenary speech in which he introduced a memorandum by the Soviet Government on measures “to ease international tension, strengthen confidence among the states and to contribute to general and complete disarmament” (document A/4892).

The fact that agreement had been reached in the bilateral talks between the United States and the Soviet Union during the summer of 1961 on a statement of principles to guide future disarmament negotiations was warmly welcomed by most delegations as a hopeful first step. The presence of this agreement and the fact that the delegations of the United States and the Soviet Union were engaged in bilateral negotiations on the forum for renewed disarmament negotiations meant that the disarmament debate in Committee was relatively subdued in comparison to the long and bitter discussion of nuclear testing which had gone before. A major theme in the interventions of many delegations was that a basis for future progress had been laid through the agreement on principles and that concrete negotiations should be undertaken without delay. The question of the control and verification procedures to accompany disarmament was recognized as a crucial issue, and a good deal of attention was given to the disagreement between the Western powers and the Soviet Union about whether only the agreed reductions in forces and armaments should be verified or whether it was equally necessary to inspect and verify the levels of forces and armaments retained after reductions have been implemented. Western insistence that the latter was essential provoked the usual Soviet charge that the United States was seeking “control over armaments” instead of disarmament and wished to impose on the Soviet Union a system of “legalized espionage.” Soviet bloc criticism of the latest Western disarmament programme was relatively restrained although the programme was attacked for not containing enough actual disarmament in its first stage and for including measures which would place the Soviet Union at a disadvantage.

Following a two week debate in the First Committee it was decided unanimously that the item should remain open to permit the receipt of the report concerning the bilateral discussions on the negotiating forum called for in the Indian resolution mentioned in the previous section (A/RES/1660). The Committee then turned to the discussion of the Swedish proposal concerning the possibility of forming a “non-nuclear club.” This resolution, although it envisaged at this stage only an enquiry by the Secretary-General as to the conditions under which non-nuclear powers would be prepared to undertake obligations not to accept nuclear weapons, was opposed by the United States which considered that it raised grave problems which touched the very centre of the defensive arrangements of the NATO alliance. The basis for the United States objection to the Swedish proposal as stated in Committee was that it might set in motion a chain of events which would “call in question the right of free nations to join together in collective self-defence, including the right of self-defence with nuclear weapons if need be.” A serious effort was made to obtain unanimity among NATO members regarding the resolution. These efforts included extensive consultations in the NATO Council as well as two meetings of NATO delegations in New York (the latter were without precedent since such meetings have been generally regarded as undesirable in the past). The Scandinavian members of NATO made clear that they were unable to oppose the resolution due to their special relationship with Sweden, as well as for domestic reasons. The only possible common stand by the NATO delegations would have been on the basis of an abstention, but this possibility disappeared when Washington refused to authorize the United States Delegation to abstain. In the vote Canada, Norway, Denmark, and Iceland supported the resolution, while the other ten members of NATO opposed it. Abstentions came chiefly from Latin America and from the French-speaking African countries. The Soviet bloc, as was to be expected, gave the Swedish initiative its full support and placed the resolution in the context of various plans for nuclear free zones, such as the Rapacki Plan. The Soviet bloc also took advantage of the situation to attack vigorously the United States for opposing a measure which the Soviet delegate claimed would contribute to easing international tensions. In explaining their votes in favour of the resolution the NATO members which supported it made clear that their position on the resolution did not prejudice the nature of the reply they would be making to the Secretary-General's enquiry.

As explained in the first section of this report, the Committee concluded its work under the disarmament item by adopting unanimously on December 13 the joint United States-USSR resolution on the resumption of disarmament negotiations in a reconstituted disarmament committee. It should be noted that the wording of this resolution does not make the new negotiating committee an organ of the United Nations. In the course of the bilateral negotiations on this subject the Soviet Union made clear that it preferred that the Assembly merely endorse an agreement reached between the two powers on the composition of the committee. At the same time a close relationship with the United Nations has been established since the committee is requested to report to the Disarmament Commission not later than June 1, 1962 on the progress of the negotiations.

Canadian Position

In his speeches in Plenary on October 3 and in the First Committee on November 24, the Secretary of State for External Affairs set out Canada's position on the question of disarmament, stressing in particular the urgency of resuming detailed substantive negotiations. The text of the Minister's statement in the First Committee is annexed to the present report.†

As for the Swedish resolution, Canada's support was based on our concern with the problem of the further spread of nuclear weapons and on our belief that an enquiry by the Secretary-General as called for in the resolution might serve a useful purpose in clarifying national viewpoints on this important matter. The Canadian Representative, in explaining our vote on this resolution, emphasized that our reply to the proposed survey would be governed by our basic policy that the only effective means of prohibiting the wider spread of nuclear weapons is through the adoption of broad international agreements on disarmament which would bind the nuclear as well as the non-nuclear states.

Future Action

The most important decision taken at the sixteenth session under this item is that endorsing the agreement to undertake disarmament negotiations early in 1962 in a new disarmament committee on which Canada will serve.

We must also anticipate the necessity of formulating a careful reply to the survey which the Secretary-General will conduct in accordance with the terms of the Swedish resolution. Close consultations with our NATO allies will be required before submitting Canada's considered reply to this enquiry.

UNITED NATIONS FOOD BANK

At the fifteenth session of the General Assembly, on September 26, 1960, the Prime Minister proposed the establishment of a World Food Bank to provide surplus food to countries in need. On October 27, 1960, the General Assembly of the United Nations unanimously adopted Resolution 1496 XV (copy attached)† entitled: "Provision of food surpluses to food deficient peoples through the United Nations system." The main operative sections of the Resolution are paragraphs 4 and 5. The latter, which reflected the Canadian initiative, invited the FAO to "undertake a study of the feasibility and acceptability of additional arrangements, ... having as their objective the mobilization of available surplus foodstuffs and their distribution in areas of greatest need, particularly in the economically less developed countries." The Director General of FAO was asked to report to ECOSOC this summer.

2. Following the General Assembly, the Director General of FAO convened a group of independent experts to aid him in his study. On the basis of their recommendations, he submitted a draft report to an Intergovernmental Advisory Committee which met in Rome April 5-12.

3. The report of the Director General suggests an expanded programme of aid involving $25 to $30 billion over the next five years, of which up to about $12.5 billion might take the form of contributions of food. The report recommends that in using these surpluses, major emphasis be placed upon economic development programmes including the establishment of national reserves of commodities. Approximately two-thirds of the total would be devoted to these purposes. The balance, namely $4 to $4.5 billion, would go into social development and welfare distribution. The report also says that if international action is to be extended to the relief of famine and other emergencies, some plan would need to be agreed upon and implemented. The report does not make specific proposals for action.

4. At the meeting of the Advisory Committee, the Canadian Delegation considered the Director General's proposals to be over-ambitious and suggested that to avoid the failures of earlier proposals, a modest beginning on a multilateral basis should be made, so as to be within the financial reach of most United Nations member countries and with the initial objective of meeting the world's emergency food requirements arising out of distress or disaster conditions. This idea was carried further by the United States Delegate, the Director of the Food for Peace Programme, who proposed a $100,000,000 three-year multilateral programme to which the United States would contribute $40,000,000 in commodities, with a possibility of a supplementary cash contribution. In addition to meeting emergency requirements, the United States proposal envisaged the use of limited resources for pilot projects such as school lunch programmes and/or labour incentive schemes.

5. During the meeting of the FAO Committee on Commodity Problems and the Council in late May and June, it became clear that very few countries had yet given serious consideration to the United Nations Resolution, and that the initiative for devising a workable scheme continues to rest with Canada and the United States. There was, however, considerable support in both meetings for a modest approach on a multilateral programme embracing in the beginning emergency aid and selected pilot projects, and it was widely recognized that much of the programme envisaged in the Director General's report, which is devoted to economic development purposes, is now being carried on by means of bilateral arrangements, and will continue to be handled bilaterally.

6. The various proposals for a Food Bank will be discussed at the Thirty-Second Session of ECOSOC in the third and fourth weeks, July 17-28, 1961, and at the 16th Session of the United Nations General Assembly. It will also be dealt with at a special two-day session of the FAO Council at the end of October, 1961, and at the Conference immediately following. It is desirable that a more detailed Canadian position on this matter be developed for use at these meetings and in other international bodies where the Food Bank will be discussed, for the purpose of promoting the Canadian concept and eliciting the support of other countries.

CANADIAN POSITION

7. In the light of previous Canadian initiatives, Ministers would presumably wish Canada to continue to support the creation of a multilaterally-financed Food Bank of a modest size which would initially be devoted to meeting emergency needs with the possibility that, if proven successful, and resources permit, it may later undertake more extensive multilateral activities. The undersigned accordingly recommend the following outline of the objectives, organization, and operation of the kind of World Food Bank that might most appropriately be supported and promoted by Canada:

A. General Objectives

- (a) that more should be done to meet the food needs of undernourished peoples throughout the world,
- (b) that these costs should be underwritten on a broad multilateral basis,
- (c) that the commercial interests of countries exporting food should be protected.

B. Specific Objectives

- (a) A modest start should be made with the main emphasis on emergency needs, but with provision for limited use of funds for selected pilot projects.
- (b) As conditions and experience permit, consideration should be given to broadening the scope of the Food Bank to permit the raising of food consumption and standards of nutrition to levels that countries are likely to be able to sustain by their own efforts through improved productive capacity.
- (c) Ultimately, consideration might also be given to co-ordination of the Food Bank's efforts with those of other international bodies in accelerating economic development.

C. Membership

Membership and participation of countries in the Food Bank should be on a voluntary basis, but once countries join they should be responsible for a compulsory contribution based on an agreed scale related to their capacity to pay. Maximum participation by the more developed countries should be sought, and it is to be hoped that they (other than Canada and the United States) would put up at least 40%.

D. Initial Programme

(a) There should be established a fund of $100 million (United States currency), to be administered by the Food Bank and to be made up of contributions of cash (in convertible funds), pledges of selected basic commodities, and services.

(b) Country contributions should consist of at least one-third cash. The selected basic commodities and services of a kind agreed upon should be valued at world market prices.

(c) Member countries should contribute to the Bank's fund on the basis of the FAO (or United Nations) scale of assessments. The ideal situation would be one where all the members of the FAO or United Nations agree to join the Food Bank. In such a case, Canada's share of the Bank's fund would be about $4 million (United States currency) on the FAO scale and on the United Nations scale, about $3.10 million (United States currency). In any event, Canadian participation in this programme might be more dependent upon the contribution by developed countries, other than the United States and Canada, of the order of 40% of the total fund.

(d) To place the Bank on a business-like footing, its $100 million fund should be deposited in the case of cash, or pledged in the case of foodstuffs and services, before the Bank begins its operations. The rate of disbursement from the Bank should not exceed $100 million over three years, or $50 million in any one year. Member countries should be required to replenish the Bank at the end of each of the first three years of operations and to do so in such a way that the proportion of at least one-third cash is maintained in the Bank's resources.

(e) Not later than at the end of the third year of its operations, member countries should review the Bank's original charter and decide whether to revise it and/or the Bank's scale of operations.

E. Administration

The Bank's terms of reference should include the following:

(a) to receive contributions (including those of a voluntary type which may be offered by either government or non-government groups in addition to compulsory contributions by governments);

(b) to receive requests for assistance and offers of products;

(c) to investigate, or cause to be investigated, the basis for claims of need;

(d) to acquire products on terms and conditions to be prescribed;

(e) to distribute, or cause to be distributed, contributions acquired under (a) and (d), to food-deficient people in areas of need on terms and conditions to be determined.

(f) to act as a clearing house for information on needs in food-deficient countries and on food supplies that could be made available for transfer to these countries.

The Food Bank should be a semi-independent business-type organization with a Chief Executive Officer assisted by a small executive board carrying major managerial responsibility. It would be required to make periodic reports to a governing council appointed by either (a) the contributing countries, (b) the United Nations, or (c), the FAO. It would be understood that the Bank would use the facilities, including staff, of existing agencies, to the greatest extent possible.

F. Canadian Contribution

Having regard to Canada's initiative and interest in the establishment of a Food Bank, it is suggested that Canada should be prepared if necessary to offer up to $5 million, of which at least one-third would be paid in cash and the remainder pledged in acceptable commodities. It is the present intention that Canada's share would not exceed one-tenth of the United States contribution. Canada's liability over the proposed initial three-year period of the Bank's operations would be limited to an initial contribution of up to $5 million, plus possible replenishment contributions at the end of each year up to a maximum of a further $5 million, making a maximum total of $10 million (United States currency).⁶³

WORLD FOOD PROGRAMME

The Food and Agriculture Organization Conference on November 24 adopted the resolution establishing a World Food Programme. The text of this resolution is contained in the attached telegram no. 496 of November 23 from Rome.†

2. The resolution establishes that the Programme will be known as the "World Food Programme." It also provides that contributions will be in the form of appropriate commodities, acceptable services and cash ... "aiming in the aggregate at a cash component of at least one-third of the total contributions." The resolution stipulates that countries "should give due regard to the importance of achieving this overall objective, when determining the cash element in their contribution."

3. An intergovernmental committee of 20 countries which are members of the FAO or of the United Nations is being established to provide guidance on policy, administration and operations. This committee will be elected half by the FAO Council and half by the ECOSOC, and it is envisaged that Canada will be nominated tomorrow by the FAO Council for membership. The committee is to meet in Rome early in 1962 to develop detailed procedures and arrangements for the Programme. These procedures and arrangements are to be reviewed and approved by the FAO Council and the United Nations ECOSOC in New York next April, following which a pledging conference of contributing countries will be convened.

4. The FAO resolution has recommended that the Programme be administered by a joint FAO/UN administrative unit located at the FAO headquarters in Rome.

Approved by Cabinet on August 9, 1961, with the provision that the initial Canadian contribution of up to five million dollars should not exceed one tenth of the contribution of the United States. Further contributions might be made up to a limit of another five million dollars during the first three year period of the programme's operation if necessary, subject to a similar limitation.

5. The establishment of this World Food Programme will now be discussed further by the General Assembly in New York, presumably fairly shortly, and our Delegation there will be reporting on these discussions. In view of the approval given by the FAO Conference to this Programme, it is not envisaged that the General Assembly will recommend any basic changes, although in theory this could happen.

CONFIDENTIAL. OPIMMEDIATE.

16TH UNGA: ITEM 28(E): WORLD FOOD PROGRAMME

We consider it important that you should play a leading role at the Assembly in relation to item 28(e) and other delegations will be looking to Canada to play an active part in securing the adoption by the Assembly of a suitable resolution with respect to the World Food Programme. We are grateful for the suggestions regarding a resolution which you have sent us. It is, of course, of the greatest importance that the resolution adopted by the Assembly should, along with the FAO conference resolution, provide a sound basis for the development of an effective programme conforming to the greatest extent possible with the Canadian position. We understand that the item will be coming up for discussion at the end of next week. You should therefore lose no time in seeking support from other delegations for a satisfactory resolution, consulting as appropriate with Secretariat officials on the matter.

2. From our point of view, the Assembly should adopt a resolution which would (a) accept the FAO resolution (subject to (c) below) as a basis for proceeding with the establishment of the World Food Programme; (b) annex the text of the FAO resolution and (c) contain a provision which would read as follows: "Instructs the Intergovernmental Committee, in preparing recommendations on the conditions and procedures for the establishment and operation of the programme for the review and approval by ECOSOC and the FAO Council, to consider the FAO resolution, this resolution, the UN/FAO report (Document A4907), statements made during the debates in the FAO Conference and General Assembly, and such other conditions and procedures as may seem appropriate."

3. For your information we consider a provision such as contained in (c) above essential in order to give the Intergovernmental Committee sufficient scope and authority to develop what in effect would constitute a proposed charter for the programme. We would hope that such a charter would incorporate the main safeguards and conditions which we consider important for the achievement of this programme and which are spelled out in the Cabinet memorandum of July 21. The above wording in (c) above has been carefully considered here and should be adhered to as closely as possible.

4. Unless it develops that you are unable to secure a provision of this kind in the Assembly resolution, you should not propose the insertion of additional concepts and conditions to the FAO resolution. In our view such an attempt would (a) detract from our main objective of giving the Intergovernmental Committee a fairly free hand in developing the conditions and procedures for the establishment and operation of the programme; and (b) open the way for controversial debate in the large forum of the Assembly which could lead to delays or to the introduction of undesirable proposals by other countries. You should also discourage other delegations or the Secretariat from introducing at the Assembly controversial additions to the FAO resolution.

5. The Assembly resolution, of course, would have to incorporate appropriate instructions to ECOSOC regarding the election of the U.N. half of the Intergovernmental Committee and related questions.

6. The formulation suggested above would instruct the Intergovernmental Committee to take account of statements made during the Assembly debate. Therefore in speaking to a resolution of this kind, you should take the opportunity to restate the Canadian position along the lines of the Cabinet memorandum of July 21. In your statement you should avoid developing your points in a way which would lead to controversy or delay but it would be entirely appropriate to re-emphasize in particular our position with respect to the cash component of contributions. We should be glad to have an opportunity to review your statement if possible before delivery, and look forward to seeing the text of a draft resolution along the lines suggested above.

7. The FAO resolution and the U.N. resolution as proposed in this telegram would provide that the initial Intergovernmental Committee charged with the development of a 'charter' may differ from the composition of the Intergovernmental Committee which will provide direction following the establishment of the programme. In view of the important function of the initial committee you should use your influence to have ECOSOC elect key countries such as Denmark and Australia as well as potential major contributing countries such as United Kingdom, Germany and Japan. You will have noted that with the exception of the United Kingdom these are listed in suggestions of the Canadian FAO delegation in Rome (reference telegram 508 of November 27 from Rome).† The FAO delegation further reports that Liberia, Venezuela and Haiti of the original U.N. sponsors gave little assistance in Rome but that Mexico and Yugoslavia were extremely helpful.

8. We should welcome a report from you on the position likely to be taken at the Assembly by the Soviet bloc toward the World Food Programme. We hope they will not attempt to obstruct the development of the programme, and from our point of view see no objection to Soviet participation on a constructive basis, which we recognize may also involve their representation on the Intergovernmental Committee.

WORLD FOOD PROGRAMME

On December 13 the Second Committee of the General Assembly approved a proposal for the establishment of a World Food Programme in a resolution which corresponded basically to the resolution adopted in November by the FAO Conference. The approved programme is of a kind that Canada has been advocating and which is in line generally with the principles approved by Cabinet last July. The Second Committee's resolution will be placed before the Plenary Session early next week where it is assured of approval. The vote in favour of the resolution, which was initiated by the Canadian Delegation and co-sponsored by seven other countries including the United States, was 72 in favour and 10 abstentions (Soviet bloc excluding Cuba) and no votes against. The corrected text of this resolution is contained in attached telegram 3275 of December 13 from New York.†

2. The World Food Programme, which the Prime Minister proposed in a statement at the General Assembly last autumn, has now been approved by the FAO Conference and, in practical terms, by the United Nations. The next step will be the convening early in the new year of a twenty-country committee (of which Canada is a member) to work out and agree on a charter for the new programme, which will be submitted in April to concurrent sessions of ECOSOC and the FAO Council. This is to be followed by a pledging conference planned for the Spring, and the programme should get under way and begin operations well before the end of next year.

3. As approved by the FAO and United Nations, the programme will be for an initial experimental period of three years. Contributions of approximately $100 million are called for on a voluntary basis in the form of "appropriate commodities, acceptable services and cash." The aim is to have the cash element amount in the aggregate to at least one-third of total contributions. Canada, the United States and Denmark have already undertaken to contribute to the programme; Canada up to an amount of $5 million, of which one-third could be cash; the United States up to an amount of $40 million in commodities and possibly a further donation in cash; and Denmark up to $2 million in commodities and cash. It is important, of course, that the programme should have the widest possible multilateral support. There are grounds for hoping this support will be forthcoming in view of the virtually unanimous endorsement which the international community has given to the programme.

4. The precise nature of the programme remains to be agreed by the meeting of the twenty-country committee which will present an opportunity for Canada to seek to ensure that the programme will be developed in detail along lines we have advocated. The FAO and United Nations resolutions and debates clearly envisage a programme devoted mainly to meeting famine and other emergency food situations or to projects in areas of chronic malnutrition, although a limited use of the programme to assist economic and social development is also foreseen. The debates at the FAO Conference and particularly the General Assembly revealed that many countries are cautious about the idea of using food as a form of development assistance, as favoured by the United States and as the FAO Director-General has advocated as a long-run objective. Many food exporting countries have shown concern about possible damage to commercial export trade, and a number of less-developed countries have expressed fears about the effects of the programme on domestic agricultural producers in recipient countries. The United Nations resolution in particular contains safeguards against dangers of this kind. The Canadian position that the programme should not develop into a surplus disposal operation has been generally endorsed.

5. The approval given to the programme on December 13 by the Second Committee of the Assembly was widely noted by the press and radio in Canada.

APARTHEID ITEM AT THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY

In an effort to head off the introduction of a resolution calling for economic or other sanctions against South Africa (possibly including expulsion from the U.N.), our delegation has been lobbying informally in the corridors against such a resolution. They have pointed out the advantages of a reasonable resolution which could attract a large affirmative vote, probably including Canada and other moderates. These private discussions have had little effect. The delegation would now like to speak as soon as possible in the debate, in an effort to encourage the introduction of a resolution somewhat along the lines of last year's resolution or, failing that, to attract as large a group as possible to abstain on any extreme resolution. The line which the delegation would like to take in its statement is contained in the attached telegram (No. 639).†

2. While we sympathize with the delegation's objective, we have some doubts about the wisdom of speaking early. Nothing we say is likely to prevent the introduction of a violent resolution, if the Africans are bent on pillorying South Africa. We might possibly persuade a few moderates such as New Zealand, Ireland and the Scandinavians to abstain, but the number of potential converts is quite small. Moreover, if we speak publicly, our position becomes much less flexible; it would be taken as virtually committing our vote in advance, before a resolution was even tabled. In addition, whatever we say publicly may be interpreted as forecasting our approach to the broad question of our future economic and political relations with South Africa.

3. We recommend, therefore, that at least until the resolution is introduced, the delegation not speak publicly, but continue to work for moderation by speaking privately whenever appropriate, and making the following points:

(a) Canada continues to follow its traditional policy of opposing racial discrimination in South Africa or wherever it appears.

(b) We realize that South Africa's racial problems are complex, but we continue to hope that the Union will begin reversing the policy of apartheid.

(c) The General Assembly cannot ignore Article 2 of the Charter which says “Nothing contained in the present Charter shall authorize the U.N. to intervene in matters which are essentially within the domestic jurisdiction of any state, or shall require the members to submit such matters to settlement under the present Charter...” The Canadian view has always been that this article does not prevent discussion of domestic subjects or prevent the Assembly from expressing opinions, but that it does not permit the Assembly to call for specific action (other, in this case, than appeals to the South African Government for action.)

(d) A resolution calling for sanctions would be harmful because it would probably force South Africa out of the U.N. and, thus, cut the only channel of communication now left between South Africa and the international community. It is difficult to see how anything can be accomplished by driving South Africa into complete isolation; the problem is that the Union is already too isolated from the changing ideas and conditions in the modern world. When the Prime Minister of Malaya suggested that we join in boycotting South African goods, Mr. Diefenbaker rejected the proposal in his letter of September 1st which pointed out that (i) not only would this fail to move South Africa, but it might strengthen extremist tendencies and cause new hardships to South African negroes and (ii) “if every country refused to trade with every other nation whose domestic policies were repugnant to it, the international economic scene would be very distorted indeed.”⁶⁴

(e) Perhaps the most important argument against a resolution on sanctions is that it would run counter to the Charter principle that sanctions are intended solely for the purpose of preventing or stopping international hostilities.

4. Alternatively, should you agree with the delegation that they might speak early in the debate, we suggest that the text in the attached telegram be rewritten. Apart from detailed drafting points, the present text seems to raise the following difficulties: it could be taken as outlining the general character of future relations between Canada and South Africa before the time is ripe; and it focuses too much attention on the Commonwealth Prime Ministers’ Meeting, instead of merely establishing that our opposition to apartheid in London was consistent with our position in the U.N.

5. In view of the relationship between the question of apartheid at the U.N. and the general problem of relations with South Africa, you might wish to bring this matter to the attention of the Prime Minister.

6. You may consider it desirable to give to the delegation some general guidance on voting, in case a resolution be pressed quickly to a vote. This, if you agree, could be based on the points made in paragraph 3 above. If the draft resolution called for economic sanctions or expulsion from the United Nations, it would seem that we would have no choice but at least to abstain or possibly to vote against it. At the same time we would, no doubt, support any clauses passing judgment on South African racial policies.⁶⁵

APARTHEID AT THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY

On April 4 Mr. Arthur Smith telephoned me to report that (a) the African delegations had submitted a draft resolution strongly condemning South Africa for its policies of apartheid and containing recommendations for drastic measures like the severance of diplomatic relations and the closing of ports to South African shipping. These were the measures which the Ghanaian representative had listed in his speech earlier. (b) Ceylon, India and Malaya had submitted a moderate resolution which is contained in telegram 716 of April 3 from the Permanent Mission in New York.† Mr. Smith believed that this resolution would have the support of the majority of members of the Special Political Committee.

2. Mr. Smith said that the Canadian Delegation required instructions on the following:

(a) How to vote on the two resolutions. Mr. Smith wished to vote in favour of the Ceylon-India-Malaya resolution and against the African resolution. Later Miss Dunlop reported that the United Kingdom Delegation was seeking instructions to vote in this way.

(b) Whether the Canadian Delegation should speak, when the statement should be made and what the line should be. Mr. Smith was of the opinion that a Canadian statement should be made which would be somewhat more than an explanation of vote, that is to say, it should contain a forthright expression of Canadian views on apartheid and on the principles underlying Canadian policy as regards racial discrimination. He agreed that it was no longer necessary to explain in detail developments during the Commonwealth Prime Ministers' Conference. He assumed that the statement should refer to the position which Canada would adopt on both the draft resolutions. He suggested that some of the material contained in the draft statement, sent to Ottawa by the Delegation, should be used. He hoped that instructions as regards the proposed statement could be received soon.

3. Miss Dunlop reported later that the general debate on this item would probably end on the morning of April 5 at the latest and that the Committee would vote on the resolution immediately afterward. This meant that the Canadian statement should be made either this afternoon or tomorrow morning. The Special Political Committee is meeting in Conference Room 2.

4. I informed Mr. Smith and Miss Dunlop that these views would be taken into account and that appropriate instructions would be telephoned today. As you know, I passed the information to Mr. Glazebrook and to Mr. Duder this morning.

5. From the point of view of United Nations Division, it would be desirable (a) to vote against the African resolution in order to demonstrate Canada's opposition to recommendations from the General Assembly which sought, through direct pressure, to change domestic policies of a member state. This surely would constitute "intervention" in the sense of Article 2(7) which permits the United Nations to intervene only in the application of enforcement measures under Chapter VII (Security Council action with respect to threats to the peace, breaches of the peace and acts of aggression). (b) To make a statement explaining Canadian attitude on apartheid and stating clearly our views on the kind of United Nations action which we consider appropriate in the circumstances. While opposing drastic measures which amount to sanctions, we would go along with efforts to mobilize support for the fullest expression of concern about the continuation of South Africa's racial policies.

U.N. RESOLUTIONS ON APARTHEID

Attached for your approval is a telegram to the Canadian delegation to the United Nations giving instructions for voting on two resolutions concerning apartheid. It is recommended that the delegation vote for the India, Ceylon and Malaya resolution contained in the attached Permis telegram 716 of April 3,† in order to express our concern over South Africa's racial policies. It is recommended, however, that we explicitly state that we have some reservations about the broad phrasing of operative paragraph 3, and that we do not interpret this as condoning the use of force or punitive measures by member states.⁶⁶

2. It is recommended that the delegation vote against the African resolutions on sanctions because

(a) The Canadian Government is on record as opposing sanctions (your statement in the House of Commons on April 27, 1960, and your letter to the Prime Minister of Malaya on September 1st).

(b) We have doubts about the competence of the General Assembly to call for sanctions, especially in a case where there is no threat of international hostilities.

(c) It is important to have as large a negative vote as possible in order to show the Union that there are responsible elements that do not want to force it out of the United Nations by such extreme resolutions.

The suggested statement is based on a combination of suggestions from the delegation and the Minister's most recent instructions on the subject.

The delegation would like to speak as soon as possible in the hope of influencing the voting which may take place as early as tomorrow. Preliminary indications are that a number of

AGENDA ITEM 72 – CHAPTER V-5

[Ottawa, n.d.]

RACE CONFLICT IN SOUTH AFRICA RESULTING FROM THE POLICIES OF APARTHEID OF THE GOVERNMENT OF THE UNION OF SOUTH AFRICA

I. Summary

The apartheid issue has been on the agenda of every General Assembly since 1952. Although most member states have condemned the discrimination involved in a planned separation of the coloured and white races as a contravention of Charter provisions on human rights, the South African Government has continued to maintain that the matter is one of domestic jurisdiction and that its consideration by the United Nations contravenes the provisions of Article 2(7) of the Charter. For this reason, the South African delegation does not take its seat in committee, although it does keep observers in the public gallery to take notes on the course of debate.

The debate at the resumed fifteenth session took place immediately following the conclusion of the Commonwealth Prime Ministers' Conference, at which Dr. Verwoerd had announced that since the South African Government could not accept the views of other Prime Ministers, it would not re-apply for membership in the Commonwealth after South Africa became a republic. This additional demonstration of the Union Government's intransigence removed to a considerable extent the restraint formerly shown by a number of delegations in drafting moderate resolutions which, by avoiding strongly condemnatory terms, aimed at encouraging a change of attitude in South Africa. In addition, the many new African member states, critical of the absence of results from previous Assembly resolutions, and feeling strongly about this subject, exerted pressure for a strong resolution recommending punitive measures against South Africa.

⁶⁷ Note marginale :/Marginal note:

P.M. agreed:

(a) vote for India, Ceylon, Malaya resolution & all paras thereof

(b) vote against African resolution as a whole & on paragraphs as given in para 3 of telegram No. 727 of April 4† from Permis NY.

Statement as sent in telegram to NY (No. [K-72] of Apr. 5)† carries P.M.'s approval. H.B. R[obinson] Apr. 5

Intense negotiations took place over a ten-day period between Asian and African delegations in an attempt to draft a single acceptable resolution. However, since the African delegations insisted on the inclusion of recommendations for economic and diplomatic sanctions against South Africa, and most Asian delegations considered such recommendations inconsistent with the provisions of Article 41 of the Charter (whereby the imposition of sanctions is the responsibility of the Security Council alone), the two groups submitted separate draft resolutions, both of which deprecated policies based on racial discrimination, censured the racial policies of the South African Government as inconsistent with the Charter and the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, and noted that these policies had led to international friction endangering international peace and security. The main difference was that the African resolution recommended that all states consider taking various forms of sanctions against South Africa, while the more moderate Asian resolution requested all states to consider taking such separate and collective action as was open to them, in conformity with the Charter, to bring about the abandonment of racial discrimination.

The African resolution, after being given priority, was approved in committee 47 in favour (including India, Ceylon, Soviet bloc, Haiti, Nepal, United Arab Republic) to 29 against (Canada, Scandinavia, Australia, New Zealand, U.K., U.S.A., Belgium, Portugal, most Latin Americans, Ireland) with 18 abstentions (China, Cyprus, Pakistan, Japan and other Asians, Iran, Togo, Latins) following 13 separate votes on individual paragraphs or clauses. The Asian resolution was also adopted 93 (including Canada)-1 (Portugal)-0. In Plenary, however, the paragraph recommending sanctions in the African resolution failed to obtain the necessary two-thirds majority (42-34(Canada-21) and the resolution was therefore dropped. The Asian resolution was adopted 95(Canada)-1 (Portugal)-0. (The text is attached at Annex II.)†

II. The Debate

At this session the debate was much more heated than at previous Assemblies, partly because of the Sharpeville and Langa incidents of 1960 which had been brought before the Security Council, and partly because of the strong feelings of the new African member states. An indication of the atmosphere is the number of interventions in committee – 55 during the debate and 39 in explanation of vote. The Soviet bloc also was able to inject its own portion of venom into the debate by pursuing its attack on the Secretary-General – in this case, for having so long delayed his visit to South Africa in accordance with the mandate of the Security Council. India, which has usually taken the lead in drafting a resolution and marshalling sponsors, became increasingly irritated by the refusal of African states to work out a compromise text acceptable to the more moderate Asian delegations, and by the attempts of Ghana to make the item its own. Old Commonwealth delegations found India and Ceylon extremely secretive during this period and unwilling to divulge either the terms of their own draft or the prospective sponsors until a few minutes before its submission. Malaya alone kept us fully informed. The new African members manifested their usual impatience with counsels of moderation and juridical objections based on Charter provisions. Resolutions, in their view, must always show an advance over those of previous years, punitive measures must be applied if exhortations do not produce results and Charter limitations on the permissible scope of action may be ignored if political reasons so dictate, particularly since these new members do not always feel themselves bound by conventions concluded before their admission to the Organization. The Africans rejected the argument that sanctions recommended by the General Assembly not only had a very dubious juridical basis, but would also be more likely to harm than help the non-white population of South Africa, on the grounds that that population could not be brought lower and punitive measures would at least give them a “spiritual uplift.” The Ghanaian representative and Wachuku of Nigeria in particular expressed the opinion that when all African States put forward a resolution on any question concerning Africa, they would not tolerate any opposition or criticism from other member states, which were necessarily less well informed. The intransigent attitude of all African delegations prompted the Arab states actively to support that draft rather than the Asian and explains the abrupt withdrawal of the UAR as co-sponsor of the Asian resolution to become a co-sponsor of the African draft. Also, although Krishna Menon spoke in opposition to the African proposal for sanctions, India later contented herself with an abstention on that particular paragraph, while voting in favour of the resolution as a whole, obviously fearing that to abstain, along with other Asians, on the resolution would weaken her position of prestige and influence within the Afro-Asian group.

While South Africa remained the chief target for criticism, the Soviet bloc plus Cuba and those African countries which tend to echo the Soviet line blamed the continuing intransigence of South Africa on the support received through the capital investment policies of friendly Western countries.

III. The Canadian Position

As Canada and South Africa are still fellow members of the Commonwealth with a long history of close association, the Delegation aimed at encouraging the submission of a resolution which did not condemn South Africa but rather encouraged the Union Government to modify their policies to take into account the general abhorrence of the doctrine of apartheid. A moderate resolution could be expected to attract a large number of favourable votes and reduce the number of abstentions, thereby demonstrating forcibly to South Africa the strength of world opinion. The Delegation therefore carried on intensive private consultation urging moderation for more than a week preceding the submission of the two draft resolutions. The factors stressed in these talks and in a statement (Press Release No. 39 of April 5, as Annex III)† included an expression of opposition to all forms of racial discrimination and also a warning that while Article 2 of the Charter, in Canada's view, did not prevent the Assembly from discussing domestic subjects or expressing its opinion, it did not permit the Assembly to call for specific action (other, in this case, than appeal to the Union Government for action). Regarding the proposal of sanctions, the Delegation expressed the opinion that such a recommendation could be counter-productive, as it might force South Africa out of the United Nations and thereby cut the only channel of communication left between the international community and a country already too isolated from the changing conditions in the world. The main argument used by the Delegation against sanctions was that the proposal ran counter to the Charter principle that sanctions were intended solely for use by the Security Council for preventing or stopping international hostilities. Similar arguments were used by other friendly delegations with an interest in heading off an extreme resolution, but African delegations refused to take these opinions into consideration. They stated that they were less interested in obtaining widespread support than in expressing an "African" viewpoint; should their proposal fail to be accepted, they would re-introduce it at all future sessions until it was accepted.

Fortunately, the sanctions proposal was unacceptable on juridical grounds to a large number of delegations, and the fact that the milder Asian resolution remained as an alternative enabled delegations to vote against or abstain on the African draft while indicating disapproval of apartheid by voting for the Asian. The Canadian Delegation was therefore able to support the Asian draft in all the parts (with the reservation that the resolution did not condone the use of force or punitive measures).

IV. Recommendations for Future Action

Since it is most unlikely that the South African Government will moderate its apartheid policy in the near future, this item can be expected to reappear on the agenda of the sixteenth session. It seems clear also that African members will try again to have a recommendation of sanctions included in draft resolution. The fact that many African states have openly committed themselves at a number of African conferences to the application of sanctions will make it difficult for them to appear to accept at the United Nations the many arguments against sanctions advanced by older Member States. The practical and juridical problems of implementing such recommendations do not seem to have been important to them in comparison with the personal satisfaction which could be derived from a tangible form of retaliation and punishment.

The fact that the African States as a group refused to take advice from any other states, together with their desire for vengeance rather than reform, led them to choose one of the most extreme forms of punitive recommendations. Tactically, they would have been much wiser to choose instead some of the courses of action to be found in Chapter VI of the Charter (Pacific Settlement of Disputes), particularly Articles 33, 36 and 37. In the interval before the opening of the sixteenth session, consultations with Ghanaian and Nigerian officials could be useful. It could be pointed out to them that the Asian resolution provided a sufficient opening for the independent application of economic sanctions by those states which desired some or all of the various forms available; indeed, a number of states had already taken such action without reference to the United Nations. There is also evidence that the overwhelming support given to the Asian resolution, together with the results of the Commonwealth Prime Ministers' Conference, has made a strong impression on public opinion in South Africa. In addition to these arguments, it might be useful to mention the alternative tactical approach by Chapter VI of the Charter, which might form the basis for a compromise between moderate and extremist opinion and permit the drafting at the sixteenth session of a single, generally acceptable resolution.

Mr. Nesbitt telephoned this afternoon to put the following proposition: the Fourth Committee has adopted a broadly-sponsored resolution presented in the names, inter alia, of India, United States, Norway, one of the principal recommendations of which is to be found in paragraph 9, calling for a full and unconditional amnesty for political prisoners. You will recall that a rider has been added to paragraph 9 which would require that grave crimes be examined by the representatives of three member states, to be selected by the United Nations General Assembly, with a view to securing the release from prison or the repatriation of the persons detained.

2. Mexico, Tunisia and Sweden were the three countries originally selected to supply the examining officers. Mr. Nesbitt's phone call was to say that Mexico and Tunisia had accepted but Sweden had declined for lack of a suitable appointee. He asked permission to have Canada volunteer to take Sweden's place provided the Belgians did not object. Subsequently Parry phoned to say that the Belgians would welcome a Canadian appointment. It was added that Tunisia had pressed Canada to accept.

3. This proposition was put to the Minister tonight, who approved it; the Mission in New York was notified by telephone. The matter will now have to go to plenary.

4. If approved in plenary and a Canadian representative is required, the Mission has indicated that a person with legal training and, if possible, some background knowledge of the area and facility with French will be needed. It is a three-week assignment (there are only about a dozen serious cases to be examined) in May or June 1961. The time will be spent partly in Brussels and partly in the territory.

15TH UNGA; QUESTION OF FUTURE OF RUANDA-URUNDI

Ruanda-Urundi item came up in plenary April 21 (rapporteur's report is contained in document A/4735).†

2. Norwegian Representative said that after consultation with other delegations, he wished to nominate Brazil, Canada and Tunisia as members of the special commission to be set up under paragraph 9(b) to examine cases of very grave crimes. No repeat no objection was raised to this proposal.

3. Belgian Representative (Loridan) then made a statement which was markedly different from Belgian attitude in committee. After saying that Belgium wished to cooperate fully and loyally with UN, Belgian Permanent Representative acknowledged that UN Commission for Ruanda-Urundi "did not repeat not find altogether fit conditions for the accomplishment of its mission." He said "I keenly regret that, which was the result only of a regrettable combination of circumstances. Moreover, it should like to express the greatest respect for the eminent qualities of the President of the Commission, Ambassador Dorsinville, who had earlier undertaken several missions to Ruanda-Urundi in perfect agreement with the administering power." In mild terms Loridan said that Belgium could not repeat not vote for the resolution because of (a) the disagreeable character of the preamble; (b) the contradiction between "decisions" imposed by Assembly and the full and exclusive responsibility of Belgium as administering authority; and (c) the "constitutional confusion" of the terms used in drawing up the resolution. Loridan concluded with an explicit assurance that Belgium would heed the Assembly recommendations and that UN Commission would meet with "the assistance and complete cooperation of Belgian administration." Full text of statement is being airmailed to Ottawa and Brussels.

4. Earlier it had been hoped to work out an understanding under which the word “decides” in operative paragraph 6 of draft resolution I would be changed to “recommends,” while some language would be inserted in operative paragraph 3 paying due regard to the wishes of the people; in return, Belgium would abstain on the resolution as a whole. However, instructions from Brussels were firm: Belgium would have to vote against unless a respectable number of Western delegations would agree to abstain. The project for introducing amendments of this kind in plenary was therefore abandoned, probably wisely, since it is doubtful if they would have been accepted.

5. Prior to voting on draft resolution I (the 25-power resolution on the future of Ruanda-Urundi), the President announced that a separate vote had been asked for on preambular paragraphs 4, 5 and 6. Liberia opposed division on the grounds that the whole of the resolution represented a delicate balance between various views. The motion for a separate vote (probably requested by UK) was denied by 25 in favour (Canada), 41 against, with 12 abstentions (USA, Latins).

6. Boland then said he felt bound to draw the attention of the Assembly to the need for a separate vote on operative paragraph 13 of the resolution (the Nepalese amendment) the Assembly had decided to set April 21 as the closing date for the 15th Session. Therefore, if this decision was to be reversed, the President suggested, it could only be reversed by a specific decision of UNGA under rule 83 (which requires a two-thirds majority). He therefore asked the Assembly to vote separately on operative paragraph 13.

7. Once again, Liberia (Miss Brooks) challenged the suggestion for a separate vote. She was supported by Guinea while Bingham (USA) spoke in favour of division, pointing out that the paragraph had been added to text as an amendment, its inclusion would create a precedent and moreover would be looked upon as a “club” over Belgium. Bolivia also supported the suggestion for a separate vote on the paragraph. The motion for division was lost by a roll-call vote of 33 in favour (Canada), 46 against (African-Asians and Soviet bloc) with 13 abstentions (Cyprus, Laos, Thailand, Latin Americans).

8. Draft resolution I was then put to a vote after the President had drawn the Assembly’s attention to the composition of the special commission to be set up under operative paragraph 9(b). The Assembly approved the selection of Brazil, Canada and Tunisia without a vote being taken. Draft resolution I as a whole was adopted by 86 in favour (Canada), one against (Belgium), with 4 abstentions (France, Portugal, Spain, South Africa).

9. Draft resolution II on land tenure and agrarian reform in Ruanda-Urundi was adopted unanimously.

10. As you will appreciate, rejection of the request for a separate vote on paragraph 13 and adoption of the first resolution means that the 15th Session of UNGA did not repeat not end on April 21 but is left open for further consideration of the Ruanda-Urundi item if UN Commission decides that the performance of its duties is hindered “through deliberate obstruction or lack of requisite cooperation from any quarter.” The vote on division can also be interpreted as meaning that Western delegations can no repeat no longer muster enough support for a separate vote on a controversial paragraph in a “colonial” resolution, even when this reverses a previous decision of the Assembly and is proposed by the President so that vote becomes an appeal against his ruling.

TERMS OF REFERENCE OF THE COMMISSION OF JUDICIAL REVIEW FOR RUANDA-URUNDI

Attached are two memoranda† which treat the background and the development of the Ruanda-Urundi item in the fifteenth Session of the United Nations (See particularly paras. 10, 12 and 13 of the memorandum of April 20 and paras. 2 and 4 of the memorandum of April 26. A copy of the main resolution on Ruanda-Urundi adopted in plenary on April 21 is also attached† (See telegram 933 of April 19 from Candel† and particularly operative para. 9).

2. Political affiliations in Ruanda-Urundi are determined largely by the feudal tribal pattern, accentuated by the division between the landowning Tutsi tribes, comprising about 15% of the population, and the subject Hutu tribes, comprising about 80% of the population. The Belgians have played off the more numerous, disgruntled Hutu factions against the Tutsi factions and have encouraged them to undermine the formerly dominant position of the Tutsis. The Tutsis, in an attempt to maintain their dwindling ascendancy, have adopted an anti-Belgian and nationalist attitude.

3. Many of the detainees in the territory are nationalists who have been convicted of political offences, and it has been one of the aims of the strongly anti-colonial elements in the United Nations to secure their release. A broad African-Asian group and the Soviet bloc have supported a demand for general amnesty, which was contained in a resolution adopted by the General Assembly during the first part of this Session, and which has been adamantly opposed by Belgium, other European powers and many non-colonial Western countries. In negotiations between the African-Asian group and certain non-colonial Western delegations led by the United States, a position of compromise was eventually reached whereby a general amnesty would be proposed, providing cases of a grave criminal nature were excepted and submitted for consideration to a commission of judicial review.

4. A provision was accordingly incorporated as operative paragraph 9 of a draft resolution, which was eventually adopted in plenary:

“Notes the information given by the representative of the administering authority concerning measures of amnesty already implemented, and recommends that: (a) Full and unconditional amnesty, as envisaged in resolution 1579 (XV) be immediately granted by the administering authority, and (b) the few remaining cases which, in the administering authority’s view are guilty of “very grave crimes” be examined by a special commission composed of the representatives of three member states to be elected by the UN General Assembly with a view to securing their release from prison or return from abroad in the full implementation of the UN General Assembly’s recommendation concerning amnesty not later than two months before the national elections.”

Belgium was strongly opposed to the provision. The Canadian attitude was that, although it was an unsatisfactory provision, it went some way towards meeting the Western position, it did not detract from the general value of the draft resolution, the unexpectedly moderate resolution had overwhelming support from both African, Asian and Western countries, and the membership of the commission of judicial review was likely to be acceptable to Canada. The originally proposed members were Mexico, Sweden and Tunisia, but the first two countries, being unable to serve, were replaced by Brazil and Canada. The developments leading up to the Canadian nomination are outlined in paragraphs 2 and 4 of the attached memorandum of April 26.

5. Should the selected Canadian commissioner not have a sufficiently broad legal and political background, it may be advisable to consider the appointment of a suitably qualified official adviser.⁶⁸

Second Part of the Session

After the experience of the first part of the session, it was the hope of many that controversy could be kept to a minimum during the resumed session. In spite of considerable discussion about limiting the rest of the session to "essential" items only, however, it proved impossible to devise a scheme which could command general agreement. The only thing on which all could agree was that the session should end by a fixed date, regardless of whether or not the agenda had been completed.

⁶⁸ Martial Asselin a été nommé commissaire canadien. Pour consulter le rapport de la Commission, voir Nations Unies, Documents officiels de l'Assemblée générale, seizième session, Annexes, 1961-1962, Point 49 de l'ordre du jour, le 19 septembre 1961 au 23 février 1962, pp. 2 à 70, et additifs.

Martial Asselin was appointed as the Canadian commissioner. For the commission's report, see United Nations, Official Records of the General Assembly, Sixteenth Session, Annexes, 1961-1962, Agenda Item 49, September 19, 1961 - February 23, 1962, pp. 2-74, and Addenda.

The resumption of the session was marked by an evident anticipation on the part of the Soviet bloc, shared to some extent by some others, that the change of administration in the United States would bring a "new look" in United States policies which might make it possible to soften the confrontation of East and West in the United Nations. Under the leadership of Adlai Stevenson, the United States Delegation, for its part, seemed anxious to demonstrate greater initiative and a willingness at least to re-examine its position on the issues before the Assembly. In some cases this resulted in a more understandable and more appealing presentation of United States policies. Before too long it became apparent, however, that the basic features of the Soviet and the Western positions had not changed and that the room for manoeuvre was a very small one on both sides. This was made particularly clear by the Cuban crisis. The only question on which even limited agreement was reached between the United States and the U.S.S.R. was disarmament; even then the agreement was only to discuss further the resumption of negotiations. African influence at the resumed session continued to make itself felt most strongly on the basic issue of colonialism. Apart from that, however, and the questions of economic aid and technical assistance, there was nothing that could be called a united expression of African opinion and there were, on the contrary, many signs of incipient conflicts of interests and ideology. This tended to modify somewhat the shift in the balance of voting power in the Assembly that resulted from the influx of African members. Although the African-Asians commanded enough votes to block a proposal they did not like, they could pass a proposal only if they were themselves united on it and could enlist the support of one of the other groups in the Assembly. On the whole, the African states did not use their new-found influence in support of extreme positions.

I. ASSESSMENT OF THE FIFTEENTH SESSION OF THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY

The atmosphere during the first part of the fifteenth session was charged with East-West tension and acrimony. Largely because the Soviet Union chose to wage political warfare, there was little that could be done by other members, especially the uncommitted group, to check the deterioration in East-West relations which had developed since the collapse of the Summit in May 1960. Faced with presidential elections and with the Soviet onslaught, the United States was in no position to give leadership and the West found itself, for the most part, on the defensive. The Soviet Union seemed determined to capitalize on the fact that a large number of new African states had just entered the international arena at a time when African issues, especially the situation in the Congo, were at a critical stage. The United Nations difficulties in the Congo, moreover, were ripe for exploitation.

The Soviet propaganda campaign, especially the attack on the Secretary-General, had a sharp impact. Confidence in the United Nations was badly shaken, and, generally speaking, the membership was in disarray at a time when cohesive support was needed to bolster the United Nations effort at peace-keeping. Nevertheless, the Soviet Union did not succeed in mobilizing uncommitted support for its attack either on the Secretariat or on colonialism. The African-Asians, especially the new members, were confused but the majority of them chose to rally around moderate positions. The helplessness of the United Nations in the pre-Christmas session was very disturbing, however, and cast gloom over the Assembly for the future prospects of the United Nations.

By the time of the resumed session, the Kennedy Administration had been installed in Washington and significant steps had been taken by the United States and the Soviet Union to mend their relations. The United Nations had managed to hold on in the Congo, although the situation there had not improved. About the time of the Security Council resolution of February 21, the African-Asians began to rally to the support of the United Nations in the Congo and civil war was averted. Notwithstanding continuing difficulties, the resumed session took place in a changed atmosphere which permitted the Assembly to deal with most of the remaining items on its agenda. Of course, this was partly accomplished by playing down or postponing a number of controversial items. The impression left is that many of these issues will be re-opened at the sixteenth session but there is at least a chance that by the autumn there will be a further improvement in the international climate which will permit the member states to approach the main problems of the Organization more objectively and dispassionately.

There is an urgent need for all member governments to ascertain for themselves the United Nations' worth as a means for international co-operation in the fields of peace and security, economic and social development and humanitarian progress. This calls for a determination of the degree to which the Organization serves not only the international requirements of the present time but the national needs of several member governments. Canada has consistently looked upon the United Nations as an Organization whose primary function is to maintain peace and security and the Canadian aim is to strengthen the United Nations' effectiveness for that purpose. Rather than let the present tendencies develop unchecked, Canada will work to restore confidence in the United Nations and to adjust the balance in relations between the various power groupings. This may require, among other things, some changes in the composition of the various organs, including the Secretariat, but the main requirement is a change of attitude on the part of all member states, so that in asserting their rights in the Organization they will be careful to respect the rights of others and willing to assume an equitable share in the responsibilities and obligations, including the all-important collective sharing of financial costs.

[Ottawa], September 21, 1961

INSTRUCTIONS FOR THE CANADIAN DELEGATION TO THE SIXTEENTH SESSION OF THE UNITED NATIONS GENERAL ASSEMBLY

The provisional agenda of the sixteenth session of the General Assembly includes 93 items. This memorandum contains suggested lines of policy to be followed by the Canadian Delegation on a number of more important questions. Separate memoranda are being submitted on Chinese representation, the Berlin question and on Canadian financial contributions to various United Nations programmes. As the session progresses, supplementary instructions may be required on specific issues.

2. The sixteenth session will meet in an atmosphere of increased international tension resulting from the Berlin crisis, the partial mobilization in the Soviet Union and the United States and the Soviet Union's decision to resume nuclear weapons testing which has evoked a United States intention to resume underground testing. While the Assembly may be expected to be preoccupied with East-West relations, questions of special and immediate interest to the uncommitted and under-developed countries will also continue to be featured prominently at this session.

3. As well, the Assembly will be faced again with a number of contentious organizational and constitutional questions resulting partly from the increased membership and the evolution which has taken place in the functions of the Organization. These raise fundamental questions about the character and role of the United Nations and the Assembly may be called upon to take decisions of utmost significance for the future.

4. At this critical time in international affairs, it is important that the prestige and authority of the United Nations should be strengthened as far as possible. In its general approach to the sixteenth session and in keeping with the strong support which Canada has given to the United Nations, the Canadian Delegation should be governed by a desire to see the United Nations strengthened as an effective instrument for maintaining international peace and for promoting the economic and social progress of the member countries. While pursuing these and other objectives in the General Assembly, it should be the Delegation's aim, in co-operation with like-minded delegations, to ensure that the work of the session is conducted in an orderly and effective manner and with a restraint and moderation calculated to reduce existing tensions.

5. The remaining paragraphs of this memorandum contain recommendations concerning the position which the Canadian Delegation should adopt on some of the main items before the Assembly. Attached to the memorandum is an annex† containing brief explanatory notes of the items concerned.

ORGANIZATIONAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL QUESTIONS

Admission of New Members

6. If the admission of Outer Mongolia, through insistence by the Soviet Union, is linked with the applications of other states whose membership Canada would wish to support (Mauritania, Kuwait, Sierra Leone), the Canadian Delegation should vote in favour of the package resolution. If there should be a straight vote on the Outer Mongolian application and general support for its admission, including that of close friends, the Delegation should vote affirmatively. If on a separate vote support for Outer Mongolia is divided, the Delegation may abstain or seek further guidance from Ottawa.

Assembly Slate of Officers

7. Canadian support has already been indicated for Mr. Mongi Slim (Tunisia) as President; for Greece as one of the vice-presidencies; for Ambassador Amadeo (Argentina) as Chairman of the First Committee and Mr. Lannung (Denmark) as Chairman of the Fifth Committee. The Delegation was guided by the established geographical distribution for the remaining offices, supporting Italy for the Second Committee, the Philippines for the Third, Liberia for the Fourth and Panama for the Sixth.

Security Council Elections

8. As candidate for the Commonwealth seat, Ghana has the support of all Commonwealth countries and Venezuela's candidature is expected to prevail over that of Cuba for the Latin American seat. Canada should support these two candidates. As for the competition between Romania and the Philippines for the so-called "East-European" seat, the Delegation should support the Philippines on the first ballots but if a deadlock should occur, the Delegation should be authorized to support either a compromise candidate or ultimately an arrangement for a split term. Canada should support Ireland for the seat to be relinquished by Liberia, in accordance with the compromise reached at the fifteenth session.

ECOSOC Elections

9. Canada is committed to support Australia and India and should also support the United States for re-election and the agreed Latin American candidate likely to be Colombia. As for the remaining two seats, the Delegation should, in the first ballots, vote in favour of Yugoslavia and either Senegal or Tunisia, depending on the outcome of Slim's candidature for the Presidency. Because of the multiplicity of candidates, the Delegation should be given some discretion in subsequent voting, when taking into account existing commitments and the need for greater African representation.

Charter Review and Amendment

10. Because of the current international tension, the obstacles to a general review of the Charter remain formidable despite the pressures for existing amendment of the Charter, especially in relation to the enlargement of the Security Council and the Economic and Social Council to give more adequate representation to Africa and Asia. The Canadian Delegation should continue to urge that enlargement of the Councils will be the only satisfactory way to achieve equitable representation.

Re-Organization of the Secretariat

11. Together with a great many members, Canada has rejected the Soviet proposal for a three-man directorate to replace the Office of the Secretary-General and the Delegation may be required to restate this Canadian position. Canada has recognized the need for some re-organization of the Secretariat in order to provide representation for under-represented areas and a more equitable balance in the composition of the Secretariat. This should be accomplished, however, in an orderly way and without harm to the concept of an independent and impartial international civil service, free from national pressures. The Canadian Delegation should welcome Mr. Hammarskjöld's proposals for re-organizing the senior echelons of the Secretariat.

POLITICAL QUESTIONS

Angola

12. As regards this most contentious problem, the Canadian Delegation should support that part of any resolution reaffirming the right of the people of Angola to self-determination. Canada recognizes, however, that the means of bringing about full independence, and particularly its timing, must be related to conditions within the territory concerned. In addition, any proposal to send a mission over the objections of Portugal or to impose diplomatic or economic sanctions should be referred to Ottawa.

Congo

13. The Canadian Delegation should support any initiative directed toward facilitating a comprehensive political settlement which will preserve the unity of the Congo. On the question of reducing the United Nations Force, the Canadian Delegation should be guided by the recommendations of the Advisory Committee on the Congo and any precipitate action to withdraw the United Nations military presence before the local authorities are prepared to take over their full responsibilities should be discouraged. As for the extent of future United Nations technical and financial assistance, proposals calculated to meet genuine and urgent needs of the Congo within the capacity of the United Nations and with due recognition of its commitments elsewhere should receive Canadian support.

Apartheid

14. No doubt should be left in the minds of the South African Government about the complete disapproval by nearly every member of the United Nations of their apartheid policies. Accordingly, the Canadian Delegation should be prepared to support those parts of a resolution, even though they may be phrased in very strong terms, which condemn apartheid policies. If the same resolution should contain proposals concerning sanctions or the expulsion of South Africa, the Delegation should refer to Ottawa for instructions.

Disarmament and Nuclear Tests

15. The Western position can be most persuasively stated by avoiding propaganda and by emphasizing the merits of the new Western plan, a flexible and accommodating approach to the problems of composition and procedure and a clear indication that the West is anxious to proceed with constructive disarmament negotiations as soon as possible. The Canadian Delegation should use its influence to promote a favourable reaction from the General Assembly and give special emphasis to important features ("measures to deal with nuclear weapons and strategic vehicles" in the first stage) which were not present in previous Western plans. The Delegation should also stress the attempt made in the latest Western statement of principles to take into account the position adopted by the Commonwealth Prime Ministers and the resolution introduced by India and other states at the 15th session. It should try to secure agreement on a satisfactory composition for the negotiating body, including the participation of neutral states, and should work for the establishment of procedures for facilitating negotiation, through appointment of impartial officers and similar arrangements.

16. Depending on developments during the debate, some of the ideas contained in the Canadian resolution put forward at the 15th session may be re-introduced, especially as regards the need for ensuring effective means of communication between the negotiating body and the United Nations. The Delegation's main effort in this context should be to ensure the early resumption of negotiations in a body which will have a greater chance of success than in previous years.

17. Canada's unequivocal stand against nuclear weapons tests should be the basis for constant and vigorous efforts by the Delegation to impress upon the Assembly the importance of achieving a permanent and guaranteed cessation of testing. The Delegation should, therefore, press for recognition of the urgent necessity of reaching agreement on an international treaty which will ensure, through agreed arrangements for inspection and verification, that testing will cease for all time.

18. On the question of preventing the further spread of nuclear weapons, the Delegation should also stress the need for international agreement and reference should be made to the clause included in the new Western disarmament plan prohibiting the further dissemination of nuclear weapons. The Delegation should work closely from the outset of the session with the Irish delegation to ensure that their present inclination toward a resolution which emphasized the desirability of reaching international agreement will be reflected in the final draft of any proposal they may put forward. Every effort should be made to combat any tendency to emphasize unilateral measures outside a disarmament agreement which might result from pressures on the part of the Soviet delegation or extremists among the uncommitted countries.

Outer Space

19. Because of recent scientific developments and Soviet threats to arm space vehicles with super bombs, the Canadian Delegation should urge vigorously that immediate action be taken to ensure that specific scientific and legal questions concerning the peaceful uses of outer space will be studied seriously under United Nations auspices with the least possible delay. As a first step, the Delegation should work for an acceptable reconstitution of the Committee on the Peaceful Uses of Outer Space with a composition which avoids the troika concept. If it should prove impossible to reconstitute the Committee, other methods of pursuing the tasks assigned to the Committee should be explored with friendly Delegations.

Radiation

20. In view of the Soviet resumption of nuclear weapons testing in the atmosphere, the Canadian Delegation should restate its deep concern about radiation hazards. The measures already taken by Canada to set up a programme of radiation analysis should provide the Canadian Delegation with an opportunity to make a constructive contribution during the debate on the progress report of the United Nations Scientific Committee on the Effects of Atomic Radiation and to strike a new note of urgency about the need to continue monitoring programmes.

Korea

21. Efforts will be made at the 16th session to postpone the debate on Korea and keep it as non-controversial as possible. As a result of informal meetings in Washington in August, Canada has agreed to join with the United States, United Kingdom, Australia and New Zealand in co-sponsoring a mild resolution which, while reaffirming United Nations objectives in Korea, will avoid other controversial matters and should not provoke acrimonious debate.

Tibet

22. To achieve the widest possible support, the Canadian Delegation should, as in 1959, work and vote for a moderate resolution emphasizing human rights and avoiding political judgments about the international status of Tibet.

ECONOMIC QUESTIONS

Food Banks

23. If, by early December, the FAO Conference should have produced concrete proposals for a Food Bank, the Delegation should be guided by the position paper approved by ministers on August 9 (Cabinet Document 286-61 of July 21, Annex I)⁶⁹ and should continue to support the creation of a multilaterally financed United Nations food bank devoted initially to meeting emergency needs for food. The Delegation should also urge participation by a maximum number of members, especially the more developed countries, in a $100 million food bank with contributions based on the FAO or United Nations scale of assessments, subject to the Canadian contribution not exceeding one-tenth of the United States contribution, nor $5 million initially.

QUESTIONS CONCERNING NON-SELF-GOVERNING TERRITORIES

Target Dates

24. Canada should continue to oppose the fixing of target dates for independence, since this is relevant both to the welfare of the dependent peoples concerned and to international stability. The Delegation should also oppose any resolution which so specifically demanded independence for all dependent territories as to ignore the evident impossibility of some very small territories ever surviving as independent entities. On the other hand, Canada should support a formulation in more general terms expressing the Assembly's concern that the aspirations of dependent peoples toward self-determination should be advanced as rapidly as possible.

Information on Non-Self-Governing Territories

25. Canada can no longer oppose measures calling upon Portugal to adopt a more forthcoming attitude about transmitting information to the General Assembly on Portuguese dependencies. However, Canada should not accept any contention that administering powers have any legal obligations to transmit information beyond those specifically listed in Article 73. Canada should therefore not support any move to make obligatory the transmission of information on political conditions. The Delegation could support, however, any moderate Assembly resolution encouraging voluntary transmission of such information on political conditions.

South-West Africa

26. The Delegation should support any resolution which urges all parties to this dispute to accept the judgment of the International Court and, if it is clear that South Africa is prepared to appear before the Court, the Delegation should support moves to postpone discussion of questions of substance until after the Court decision is rendered. The Delegation, while making clear Canada's strong opposition to the application of apartheid policies in South-West Africa, should vote against any resolution calling for direct United Nations intervention in South-West Africa. If an opportunity arises in discussion, the Canadian Delegation should continue to urge that the best solution for South-West Africa would be a United Nations trusteeship agreement entered into by South Africa.

⁶⁹ Voir/See document 140.

UNITED NATIONS FINANCING

27. At the 16th session, the Canadian Delegation should continue to work for generally acceptable methods and procedures for the future financing of peace-keeping operations which will place United Nations activities in all fields on a sound financial footing. The exact nature of proposals for this purpose will depend on the outcome of the meetings, still in progress, of the Working Group on the Examination of Administrative and Budgetary Procedures, established as a result of the Canadian initiative at the resumed 15th session. Canada should continue to press the view that, especially in the field of peace and security, the financial expenses should be the collective responsibility of the whole membership with the recognition, however, that some relief may have to be given to the less-developed countries as regards the scale of assessment. While every effort should be made to obtain Assembly approval for a pattern for future financing of peace-keeping operations, the Delegation will be required, in consultation with like-minded states, to evolve a satisfactory ad hoc formula for dealing with the current financial deficit. The Delegation should seek further instructions when proposals for financing have emerged in a more precise form.

UNITED NATIONS GENERAL ASSEMBLY;
INSTRUCTIONS TO CANADIAN DELEGATION
(Previous reference September 6)

9. The Secretary of State for External Affairs said that consideration should be given to the instructions to be issued to the Canadian delegation to the sixteenth session of the United Nations General Assembly.

10. During the discussion the following points were raised:

(a) Any proposals for increased contributions by Canada for U.N. operations in the Congo should be referred to the Cabinet for consideration.

(b) Some said that Canada should not contribute funds to support U.N. efforts to compel Katanga to join the Congo. The U.N. Congo Force had not taken decisive action to prevent the Communist elements in the area from obtaining shipments of arms, but was now opposing Tschombe who was one of the few local leaders who supported the western viewpoint.

(c) Others said that the U.N. policy of preserving the unity of the Congo had already been established, and that Canada should support that policy. Tschombe was in reality the front man for a large Belgian mining company.

11. The Cabinet,

(a) approved the memorandum of the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Cab. Doc. 349-61 of September 21st, 1961) as the basis of instructions to the Canadian delegation on the position they should adopt on questions to be considered at the sixteenth session of the United Nations General Assembly; and

(b) agreed that, with reference to paragraph 13 of the explanatory memorandum, the Canadian delegation should make no commitments regarding further Canadian financial participation in Congo operations of the United Nations, but should refer any proposals for such participation to the Cabinet for consideration.

V. COLONIAL QUESTIONS

With the admission to the United Nations of 16 new African states (raising the total of Africans to 24, and of the African-Asian group to 45), colonial issues have become the focus of significant and urgent attention in the General Assembly and, to some extent, in the Security Council. During the past year, the Security Council dealt with the Sharpeville incident in South Africa and with the situation in Angola. As well, the Congo situation has been depicted by the Soviet Union and others as a colonial struggle. In the Assembly, colonialism has been raised as a separate issue as well as in the form of questions like apartheid and treatment of persons of Indo-Pakistan origin in South Africa, Algeria, the Congo, Angola, South-West Africa, Ruanda-Urundi and other questions concerning non-self-governing territories. The cumulative effect has been to put many Western states on the defensive during much of their time at the United Nations.

In the United Nations, the emerging states of Africa and Asia have long pressed for full independence to all non-self-governing territories but now, strengthened by the rapid enlargement of their group, they have sought to extend their power and influence largely at the expense of the West Europeans. Moreover, they have tried to obtain, through U.N. channels, an ever-increasing amount of economic and technical aid. The complex relations between the so-called colonial powers and the anti-colonial group have been often exploited by the Soviet bloc for its own purpose and with an idea of injecting the cold war element into the "colonial struggle."

African-Asians see the U.N. in a somewhat different light from the Western powers. Whereas the West tends to emphasize the U.N. peace-keeping role, the African-Asians see the Organization as a source of economic and technical aid and as a means of mobilizing world opinion. Also, they rely on the U.N. perhaps more than other group, as a means of collective political (rather than military) security.

A disturbing feature of the recent Assembly was the tendency of the African-Asians to use their voting strength irresponsibly. The U.N. is not effective if a majority tries to over-ride minority opinion and rejects solutions reached through negotiation. This tendency could be a temporary development, produced partly through inexperience, partly out of a desire to exploit new-found strength and partly by the atmosphere of confusion in the Assembly at the first part of the session. To avoid becoming isolated in the U.N., Western powers must maintain close consultation with the aim of providing leadership and initiative on a broad front, and in the interests of moderation. Colonial questions are, of course, among the greatest internal problems of the Western group. While acknowledging this situation and adjusting to it, Western states at the same time should not give way to extremist pressure, particularly regarding the essential element of Article 2 (7), by which the U.N. is prohibited from intervening directly in the domestic affairs of member states. This article does not preclude discussion or expression of opinion, but should preclude condemnations, sanctions, precise target dates for governmental action, and so forth.

This aim of encouraging moderation and a practical approach, especially to colonial questions, can be achieved largely through consultation and negotiation, for although the West no longer possesses a dominant voting position in the Assembly, Western support is frequently desired by African-Asians for their initiatives. More over, the African-Asian group is divided by conflicting factions and has tended to be pushed along by the noisy extremists rather than the moderates; it is both in their own and the Western interest for Western states to encourage the moderates to assert their leadership.

At the U.N. Canada can no more afford to vote blindly in favour of African-Asian proposals affecting Canada's close allies, than it can to join the hard core of colonial powers. It is rather in Canada's interest to base policy upon the need for an orderly adjustment of relations between emerging states and their former colonial masters; the need to resist Soviet efforts to dominate the U.N., particularly at the expense of the Western powers; and the need to strengthen the U.N. prestige and influence.

DEPARTMENTAL PANEL ON AFRICA

Since 1957 when Ghana became the first colonial territory in Africa, South of the Sahara, to attain full independence, Canada has found itself increasingly concerned with African questions; in the Commonwealth, in the UN, politically, economically and in terms of assistance. Not only the Canadian Government but also the Canadian public is confronted daily by headlined African news in all the mass media. The positions which African states adopt can often become determining factors in the success or failure of Western endeavours, particularly in the United Nations or in other international forums. In the balance of power between East and West, the attitude of the nations emerging from colonial rule, particularly those in Africa, may tip the scales.

2. Canada has been able to understand and to sympathize with the problems and aspirations of new and emerging nations, but Canada's close ties, based on common tradition and on common defence needs, with the old Commonwealth and other Western nations have caused us to consider the problems and aims of these European countries with at least equal understanding and generally, if not always, with equal sympathy. This has, however, sometimes led to misunderstanding and disillusionment from both sides, since both have had occasion to feel that, when it came to the count, we were not prepared to back them up. We believe that this unsatisfactory situation might be avoided if we were in a position to explain and possibly justify our policies to Africans and Asians, to the "Colonial" powers, and especially to the middle group of countries which have neither been colonized nor have administered colonial territories (and which could wield considerable influence if joint policies could be reached). For this to be effective we should hold discussions well in advance of the public display and treatment of these issues.

3. At the last session of the General Assembly – even earlier – the Canadian delegation and this Department found that our pattern of voting on African and other colonial items was often ragged, based on no firm policy, and marked by only too visible inconsistencies. The result has been that Canada has failed, in many cases, to make a positive contribution to the debates and decisions of the Assembly and, at the same time, it is highly questionable that Canada's standing and influence has been greatly enhanced with either old or new friends in the course of discussion of African items. Canadian decisions on individual items have generally been based on a rather precarious balance between the substantive and legal merits of the case and an assessment of the tactical line-up of votes. The result has often not been such as to be clearly explicable to the Assembly, to individual delegations, or to Parliament and the Canadian public. The source of our difficulties, I think, has been that we have faced the African items, one at a time, resolution by resolution, amendment by amendment, and have never tried to chart a general course which could provide guidance in specific circumstances. Similarly, we have found great difficulty in helping our NATO delegation to explain to the Council or its subordinate bodies the general lines of policy which Canada might recommend that Western countries ought to pursue in Africa.

4. This Division has recently given some thought to suggesting a range of ideas which might provide guide lines for Canadian policy towards African problems and has not come up with anything of a general nature in which it has much confidence. I therefore suggest that, in this case as in so many others, we might begin by examining a number of immediate African problems with which our delegation to the next session of the Assembly will be faced, compare our recommendations on each of these, and attempt to assess what positive elements we think should govern Canadian reactions in these cases and, probably, in other cases. The sort of early problems we have in mind are moves to establish target dates for colonial independence, the sending of on-the-ground UN commissions to report and recommend on conditions in colonial territories, recommendations for boycotts or sanctions against administering countries, or particularly violently phrased condemnations of the practices of colonial powers. Longer-term objects of consideration might be Canadian acceptance or qualification of developing concepts such as "neo-colonialism" with its various interpretations, and the divergent trends towards definitions of the "African personality" and forms of African unity.

5. It is therefore suggested that a Departmental panel on Africa should be established immediately, with a long-term purpose of trying to formulate and coordinate Canadian policy recommendations concerning the newly independent and emerging states of Africa, particularly south of the Sahara, but with an immediate short-term task of preparing the Canadian position on the main subjects which are likely to be raised at the 16th General Assembly in so far as they concern Africa and colonialism.

6. The membership of the panel might be drawn from
- African and Middle Eastern Division
 - Economic Division
 - United Nations Division
 - Commonwealth Division
 - European Division
 - Defence Liaison (1) Division
 - Defence Liaison (2) Division.

If you agree, the Head of African and Middle Eastern Division would normally chair the meeting and that Division would also provide the Secretary.

DEPARTMENTAL PANEL ON AFRICA

The panel met at 3:00 p.m. in the Large Conference Room, with Mr. Stephens of African and Middle Eastern Division in the chair. In attendance were Mr. Murray and Mr. Chistoff (United Nations Division), Miss Ireland (Commonwealth), Miss Osborne (African and Middle Eastern), Mr. Wilson (Economic), Mr. Brown (DL-2), Mr. Boyd and Mr. Cousineau (DL-1) and Mr. Maranda (European). Secretary: Mr. Elliott (African and Middle Eastern).

Objectives of the Panel

Mr. Stephens outlined the purposes behind the establishment of the panel. There had been an evident lack of clarity and consistency in Canadian policy on African and other "colonial" questions. This had been particularly marked in recent sessions of the United Nations General Assembly, where there had seemed to be no pre-determined and agreed criteria or guide lines which could be applied to all the various issues that called for voting decisions or expression of Canadian views. We had appeared rather to face African items one at a time, often making our decisions largely on the basis of immediate tactical considerations, rather than in conformance with clearly established lines of policy. We had encountered similar difficulty in expressing in NATO Canadian views on African questions. It seemed desirable that we should try to work out an agreed set of principles or guide lines, which could be applied consistently to a broad range of African issues. By establishing such a set of basic attitudes and sticking firmly to them, we might hope to exert a measure of useful influence in the United Nations, by organizing a respectable group of more or less like-minded medium-sized and smaller powers. We would, of course, hope that such a group might lead to majority support in the General Assembly for positions which we adopted; but the essential consideration would be that we should be prepared to stand up and be counted, if necessary, on the losing side but in respectable company, on issues we considered it right to oppose. The basic policy considerations which the panel would seek to formulate, Mr. Stephens added, could be equally valid and useful (with appropriate modifications of expression and emphasis) in guiding our NATO Delegation, and in bilateral exchanges of views with governments interested in knowing Canada's position.

Commenting on the decline of Canadian influence (and that of other middle powers) at recent sessions of the United Nations, Mr. Murray suggested that a variety of factors had contributed to this. The middle and smaller powers had risen to the occasion after Suez, in 1956, and had established a considerable measure of influence based partly upon the particular conditions and relationships which existed at that time. The effectiveness of consultation within this group, and its cohesiveness, had gradually declined, as conditions had altered and personalities in New York had changed. Another major factor had been the vast expansion of UN membership, bringing to the Assembly large numbers of representatives with little or no experience of international affairs. They had not received the leadership and guidance they had needed. It was most important that effective consultation with the newer delegations should take place well before the next session begins.

Mr. Murray noted that at the XVth session Canada had placed a great deal of emphasis on the disarmament question, and had often tended to look at other issues in terms of securing support for the Canadian position on disarmament. It would be better to have a set of basic principles and to stand by them, rather than to be constantly trying to accommodate opposing points of view. If a set of basic policy considerations could be evolved, these principles could be applied to all developments in the United Nations and similar forums – in determining the Canadian stand on resolutions, formulating statements, or whenever decisions were needed quickly.

It was suggested by Mr. Wilson that the basic principles underlying Canadian foreign policy in fact were already laid down and recognized, several of them (such as the right of self-determination, respect for individual liberty, etc.) in the UN charter. The task of the panel apparently would be to enunciate these long-standing principles in a form which would be useful in meeting day to day problems.

Miss Osborne observed that the facts of international life had changed sharply in recent years, and some of the long-established principles might well need not only re-definition but re-casting.

Mr. Brown and Mr. Maranda indicated that they agreed with the proposed lines of the panel's efforts.

Mr. Boyd observed that it might be necessary to consider whether there was any conflict between Canada's participation in NATO and our unqualified support for the United Nations, both of which have been regarded as fundamental to our foreign policy. Referring to this point later in the meeting, Mr. Murray suggested that there was no basic conflict between membership in NATO and support of UN efforts. Both organizations were designed, by different approaches, to prevent war. The trouble was that in recent UN sessions the attitude of our Delegation had not been consistent with our participation in NATO. We had tried to pose before Africans and Asians as an uncommitted nation; but the fact was that obviously we were not uncommitted, nor were we expected by African and Asian countries to behave as such. We should not try to be two different things at once. Our objective should be to have Canada recognized as a forward-looking member of NATO, to which Africans might look as a country likely to interpret some of their viewpoints to other NATO governments.

Miss Ireland remarked that a fundamental element of the Canadian approach to African problems was our desire that the African nations should be enabled to achieve the same political, economic and social benefits as we enjoy. Because of the rapid pace of current developments, the necessary progress had to be telescoped into a very short period. Miss Osborne wondered whether we could necessarily accept without qualification the pace of change demanded by the Africans, and also how far we were prepared to back up our support in principle for African aspirations, with concrete assistance in achieving them.

Lines of Procedure for the Panel

Mr. Brown observed that if approval for whatever basic principles the panel might arrive at were to be sought at Cabinet level, political realities would have to be borne in mind. In this connection, Mr. Wilson pointed out that there seemed to be little prospect in the next few years for any increase in funds available for Canadian assistance to African states. It was agreed that Mr. Wilson should get in touch with the External Aid Office about this matter.

Concerning the outline of topics suggested for consideration by the panel (a copy of which is attached), it was agreed that, initially, papers should be prepared on the subjects listed in Section A. These would involve a brief examination of each item as a "colonial" issue, indicating the problems which each involved for Canadian policy, and what lines Canadian policy had in fact followed. By examining these studies, and perhaps identifying features common to the various cases, it was hoped that the panel might be assisted in drawing deductions relevant to the formulation of the policy guide lines which it seeks to define.

Preparation of papers on the topics in Section A was to be the responsibility of African and Middle Eastern and United Nations Divisions. It was also agreed that Defence Liaison (1) Division would undertake preparation of a paper on Section B (4) of the outline of topics for consideration, while European and Commonwealth Division would deal with their respective areas of interest under Section C.

Regarding the frequency of meetings of the panel, it was suggested that a fairly intensive programme should be followed in the early stages, with a view to producing some conclusions as soon as possible. It was also felt that the panel might meet during the forthcoming UN General Assembly session, perhaps weekly, to keep in touch with the pattern of developments in the Assembly.

The next meeting of the panel was scheduled for Wednesday afternoon, June 14, when it was proposed that the papers to be prepared under Section A of the outline of topics for consideration should be examined.

OBSERVATIONS ON AFRICAN PANEL PAPERS

The papers prepared under Section A of the list of topics for consideration by the African Panel suggest the following:

1. On "colonial" questions, Canada has tried first of all to look at the issues from the point of view of the effects which proposed action would have on the peoples concerned. This is in keeping with our own concern with upholding human rights and our acceptance of the principles embodied in the Charter.
2. Secondly, we seem to have looked at the legal implications of the action proposed. Where there were legal considerations involving Charter provisions, (e.g. South West Africa, apartheid, target dates for independence and transmission of information on non-self-governing territories), we have adopted a restrictive interpretation of the Articles concerned. This approach usually placed us on the side of the administering authorities, or at least not on the side of the Asians and Africans.

3. By the resumed fifteenth session, legal considerations began to carry less weight in our policy decisions. The most notable evidence of this was our acceptance of the Angola resolution creating a sub-committee of inquiry and our support of the South West Africa resolution which renewed the invitation to the Committee on South West Africa to make on-the-spot investigations.

4. Where no clear legal considerations were involved, and policy decisions have had to be based on political factors, we have had difficulty in reconciling our close ties with the "colonial" powers and our desire not to offend African-Asian aspirations. In recent months, political considerations have tended to have us accept the lead of the African-Asian group on colonial questions even though we have had some reservations about specific courses of action proposed.

CANADIAN APPROACH TO AFRICAN PROBLEMS

The Fifteenth Session of the United Nations General Assembly demonstrated with particular force the urgency and importance of African issues in terms of international stability, and the impact which the large number of newly emerged African states are able to make in the determination of world problems. Developments at the last Assembly session, as well as in other international bodies and in bilateral relations with African states, also have underlined the difficulties faced by middle powers like Canada, who have limited direct concern with African affairs, in formulating realistic and constructive policies on issues affecting Africa. It has not been easy to reconcile our concern to find some accommodation with the vigorous and sometimes extravagant aspirations of African and Asian states in respect of "colonial" questions, with our long-standing ties of friendship and co-operation with most of the current or former administering powers. Moreover, to the extent that Canada has attempted to go along with Afro-Asian initiatives on such matters, the record suggests that our efforts in this direction have not necessarily resulted in a more restrained or realistic attitude on the part of the sponsors. Still another difficulty in trying to accommodate "anti-colonial" views which we find objectionable or unconstructive is that, with increasing frequency, there are sharp divisions among the Africans themselves on some issues in this field.

2. With another General Assembly session approaching, and in view of the continuing expansion of Canadian contact with Africa and African problems in various fields, it seems desirable that we should try to formulate in broad terms a comprehensive approach to the major African issues. An agreed statement of basic considerations which should determine Canada's position on a variety of specific African questions as they arise would be very useful, particularly to the Canadian Delegation to the General Assembly, but also to our representatives at other international meetings, and to Canadian posts abroad where African issues are regularly discussed. Advance consultation with representatives of friendly governments would be facilitated, and the possibility of exercising a useful influence with the parties to a particular issue would be increased, if our representatives were able confidently to explain the general lines of Canada's approach, before the public airing of the question. Adoption of and adherence to a consistent approach to these issues might also encourage similarly-minded governments to join Canada in seeking to exercise a constructive and moderating influence.

3. In taking up a moderate and, in our view, constructive position on highly controversial colonial issues, Canada might find itself voting with a minority on some major questions, particularly in view of the growing strength of Afro-Asian voting power in the United Nations and other international bodies. However, experience has shown that the more extreme Afro-Asian initiatives are unlikely to be modified in any event by taking a more flexible line. Canada's standing with African states generally seems unlikely to be impaired, and with some of the more moderate among them it would undoubtedly benefit, if we were to show a readiness firmly to maintain reasonable and realistic positions on controversial questions, voting if necessary in the minority but in respectable company of like-minded moderate countries.

4. A panel made up of representatives from the various interested divisions of the Department has examined the principal current African issues, in terms of Canada's interest in and concern with developments in Africa. In the light of this study, the panel has drawn up a statement of considerations which might be adopted as the basis of the cohesive Canadian approach to African problems which is proposed above. These factors are set forth in the concluding paragraphs (Nos. 37-38) of the attached report by the panel, which is prefaced by a summary. Also attached is a second paper in which the general terms of the approach envisaged by the panel are applied to the formulation of proposed guidance on major African items for the Canadian Delegation to the 16th session of the General Assembly.

5. If you approve of the terms of the approach to African problems outlined in the attached papers, they will be made the basis of the relevant instructions to the Delegation, and will serve as general guidance on these issues during the session, both in New York and at the other posts abroad which are principally concerned. You may also wish to consider whether the basic elements of the proposed Canadian approach to African issues, particularly in relation to the forthcoming General Assembly session, should be made the subject of a memorandum for Cabinet.

Summary Report of Panel on Africa

REPORT OF PANEL ON AFRICA: SUMMARY

The achievement of independence by more than twenty African states over the past five years has dramatically increased the impact of African issues and development on international affairs. Canada, with few direct interests in Africa, inevitably has been affected by the growing awareness of the continent and its problems; in particular, we are regularly confronted with African questions through our participation in the United Nations and its specialized agencies. A realistic and consistent approach to these problems is important, both for our relations with African states themselves and in terms of Canada's position in the world community.

Among the major factors which contribute to Canadian interest in Africa are concern that the continent should not fall under Communist domination; recognition of Africa's growing political and economic importance in international life; our desire to promote Canadian commercial relations with Africa; concern that African peoples should enjoy fundamental human rights in conditions of stability and progress; Commonwealth ties with some African countries; and Canadian missionary activity.

Features common to the national outlook of most newly emergent African states are anti-colonialism, a vigorous nationalism often reflected in sensitivity about "neo-colonialism," determination not to become involved in the cold war, and concern to secure economic and technical assistance without conditions. In terms of East-West rivalry for influence in Africa, the Soviet Union enjoys the negative advantage of having no record of colonialism there – and Africans have shown little concern about Soviet imperialism in Europe. Moreover, even where there may be a tendency to examine Soviet methods critically, the attractiveness of Soviet offers of assistance may prove irresistible to new African states in difficult economic circumstances. Nevertheless there is some evidence, at least among the more moderate African nations, of conscious resentment towards obvious Soviet attempts to exploit African nationalism for cold war purposes.

It is very difficult, however, for any African state to adopt an openly pro-Western position on any international issue; and to do so on a colonial question is to invite denunciation as an "imperialist stooge" by rival African or Asian leaders. It would therefore be unrealistic for the West to expect too much of even the more moderately inclined African states. Probably all we can look for in the short term is genuine non-alignment. Later, as colonial questions are progressively resolved and anti-colonial bitterness recedes, increasingly friendly relations between most African states and the West may become feasible, while those African countries whose present policies seem to be oriented toward the Soviet bloc may develop a more independent outlook.

We cannot expect explicit African support for Western defensive arrangements against communist expansion, such as NATO, particularly since the alliance includes most of the colonial powers and this gives rise to African suspicions of NATO support for surviving colonial administrations in Africa. Inevitably, the fact of our membership in NATO has to some extent affected the attitude of Africans toward Canada.⁷⁰ We should seek African understanding of the importance which we attach to the alliance and our participation in it. It should also be emphasized that Canada's membership in NATO in no way detracts from our wholehearted support of the United Nations, or from our sympathy with the aspirations of African states to pursue independent policies of their own.

The recent substantial increase in the number of African states in the United Nations has created a powerful new voting bloc. On issues relating to colonialism, which evoke strong emotional reactions among Africans, there has been a tendency to use Afro-Asian voting strength to force through extreme resolutions, often with scant regard for the intrinsic political requirements of a given situation. Some African members, however, seem to be aware of the limitations of relying solely upon majority votes to advance their policies;⁷¹ and there are indications that understanding of this may be spreading.

Prior to the 15th Session of the General Assembly, the Canadian voting pattern on African questions was based to a considerable extent on our interpretation of the legal implications of the measures proposed. For example, on controversial issues such as apartheid and transmission of information on non-self-governing territories, we were inclined to accept as the overriding consideration the provision of Article 2(7) of the UN Charter, that the United Nations may not intervene in matters which are essentially within the domestic jurisdiction of any state. There has been a general retreat from this position by moderate United Nations members, including Canada, partly because UN intervention in colonial situations has sometimes seemed desirable in support of human rights, but largely because mounting anti-colonial voting strength has rendered the position untenable.

At the 15th Session, tactical considerations sometimes tended to incline Canada to be guided by African opinion on colonial questions. Leaving aside the dissatisfaction with which this attitude was viewed by some of our Western friends, there is reason to question whether this approach was successful in gaining for Canada increased understanding from the Africans and Asians. It seems likely that a more rewarding approach might lie in setting forth clearly to African representatives, in advance of the disposition of colonial items, both our interest in the welfare and progress of colonial people and our determination not to be party to extreme measures which we consider to be unconstructive.

In respect of economic and technical assistance – a major factor affecting the approach of African states to their international relations – Canada's activities must be viewed in terms of a collective Western effort. While Soviet contributions to the development of Africa are in themselves unexceptionable, African unawareness of or indifference to Soviet motives poses a danger that Soviet bloc aid may be instrumental in establishing a dominant communist political influence in some of the states concerned. Smaller Western countries like Canada probably can confer maximum benefits and make the most impact by applying most of the available aid funds to projects which can be completely implemented under a distinctively Canadian label. This should not exclude special circumstances, such as the Congo situation, where for political reasons only multi-lateral aid is appropriate.

In shaping the development of Canadian relations with African states, Commonwealth affiliation evidently is a significant consideration. While it is probably desirable to continue to place special emphasis on links with Commonwealth countries in Africa, this should not be carried to the point of excluding assistance to, or restricting closer relations with, other African states.

The following emerge as the broad general considerations which it would seem desirable to take into account in the formulation and implementation of Canadian policy on African issues:

(a) As a matter of procedure, the fundamental terms of Canada's approach to major African issues should be clearly defined and made known, both to African states and to the many other friendly Governments concerned with African developments. This seems particularly relevant in the United Nations context, where making our general position known in advance and adhering firmly to it would seem preferable to attempting, for tactical reasons, to accommodate objectionable viewpoints at the cost of consistency on matters of principle.

(b) Canadian recognition that there can be no acceptable alternative to self-determination as the ultimate and declared objective of surviving colonial relationships should be made equally clear to both African states and the administering powers.

(c) At the same time, we should emphasize Canada's concern that the means of bringing about orderly progress to independence, and the timing of the transition, should be realistically related to conditions in the particular territory concerned; the fixing of firm target dates far in advance is not acceptable.

(d) Canada's opposition to racial discrimination, whether practiced by whites against Africans or by African governments against minority expatriate communities, should be stressed, at appropriate opportunities and in constructive terms.

(e) Especially in view of the prospect of more serious confrontations between Africans and the Governments of Portugal and South Africa, the Canadian view that sanctions are not a normally acceptable method of bringing international pressure to bear on governments practising objectionable policies should be clearly set forth.

(f) It should be made abundantly clear that Canada has no desire to intervene in African affairs.⁷²

(g) We should not be apologetic about Canada's commitment to the Western alliance, but rather should volunteer explanation to Africans about our membership in NATO.

(h) The emphasis which Canada places on the importance of preserving and enhancing the authority and influence of the United Nations, as the essential force for international peace and security, should be stressed in our relations with African states.

(i) Such aid as Canada is able to allocate to Africa should be so distributed as to confer the maximum benefit to Africans while achieving the broadest impact.

TELEGRAM 1918

New York, September 20, 1961

SECRET. OPIMMEDIATE.

Repeat for Information: Washington, London, Geneva (OpImmediate).

I called on Dean Rusk yesterday afternoon at 4 p.m. and had a frank and extensive discussion with him on current problems facing United Nations. I was accompanied by Senator Brooks, Messrs. Ritchie and Cadieux. Mr. Stevenson attended part of the conversation on the appointment of a United Nations Secretary-General. The conversation lasted more than an hour and was very cordial. Mr. Rusk was in good form and in an understanding and reasonable mood as regards the various issues which came up for discussion.

Appointment of an Interim Secretary-General

2. USA feel that in view of the situation in Congo with UN troops requiring control and direction, it is important that a successor to Mr. Hammarskjöld be appointed as soon as possible. As USSR have indicated that they will not repeat not agree to a permanent or an interim arrangement but will insist on the acceptance of "troika" USA hope that on basis of Article 101 UNGA may be persuaded to pass a resolution calling on a suitably qualified person to administer Secretariat pending the appointment of another Secretary-General. In avoiding reference to the nomination of a Secretary-General now, they hope to get around the constitutional difficulty involved in action based on Article 97 of Charter. They are not repeat not clear whether a two-thirds majority will be required.

⁷² Note marginale :/Marginal note:

3. In order to emphasize the interim nature of the arrangement and thus facilitate approval of Assembly, USA delegation have approached Slim and Boland but they also have in mind, as a possibility, U Thant of Burma.

4. According to Mr. Stevenson, Slim is not repeat not inclined to accept the appointment. He feels that there might be incompatibility between his responsibilities as Acting Secretary-General and as President of Assembly. In the former capacity he might have to take action which would be embarrassing to him as President. Furthermore, he expects to become foreign minister after the current session and he is not repeat not confident that his government would agree to his taking on this task. Besides, he is keen on the presidency and he realizes that the interim job he is asked to undertake may take a long time. In his view, it might also be easier to get Assembly to go along with USA scheme if the matter had first been dealt with by Security Council and USSR had used veto to block an appointment.

5. Apparently, Boland, United Kingdom, French, Nigerians and half a dozen other delegations which have been consulted do not repeat not feel that a Security Council discussion is necessary or desirable. Boland himself it is thought might be a desirable candidate: it seems likely that a good number of African and Asian countries might be disposed to vote for him. On the other hand, while U Thant might be suitable, it was recognized that there might be danger in promoting the candidature of persons who have not repeat not been elected president of Assembly.

Situation in Congo

6. Mr. Rusk reported that Tshombe has grounded jet plane which has paralysed UN air operations by day. USA had been considering ways of providing fighter protection and even hoping that, if this became necessary, UN might have obtained fighter planes from Greece or Sweden. This was the immediate problem. As to the general situation, USA were concerned about the extent of recent fighting. They had not repeat not been consulted on the point whether UN should ferret out mercenaries and in their view UN had not repeat not made adequate preparations. UN forces were not repeat not equipped to carry out sustained operations and they might well face disaster if Katangans are determined.

Chinese Representation

7. Mr. Rusk confirmed that there is no repeat no intention to revive the moratorium. Speaking as one of those who had invented the scheme, he expressed surprise that it had lasted ten years. He added that both Slim and Boland are prepared to rule out on procedural grounds any attempt on the part of USSR to secure a decision on credentials. The plan is to have the issue treated as an important one and a possible line of argument with Afro-Asians may be that if Peking occupies Chinese seat in Security Council, Soviet bloc are unlikely to agree to any concessions to Afro-Asians as to their representation in the main organs of UN. USA assessment is that they will get a majority for having the item declared an important one requiring a decision by a two-thirds vote even if French African states vote against: a more comfortable majority will be assured if they abstain. USA hope that a study group will consider all aspects of Charter revision and do not repeat not have in mind confining work of such group to Chinese issue. Mr. Rusk agreed that it is not repeat not absolutely clear that a two-thirds vote is required to set up a committee: there were precedents on both sides of the argument.

Disarmament

8. Mr. Rusk stressed that one sentence in USA statement of principles⁷³ to which USSR raise objections could be fairly important. The substantive point involved however runs all through USA paper. Sentence was added by USA delegation in New York because perhaps of a little excess in caution. USA are anxious to discover what Soviet objection involves and they wish to discuss the matter with USSR.

9. When I urged Mr. Rusk to be flexible in view of the great impact which an agreement on disarmament would have on the general world situation and on the prospects of a negotiation on Berlin, he agreed but made a number of incidental points. He gave me the impression of being keen about reaching an agreement if this could possibly be done.

(a) The matter at issue is important. It is a question whether inspection is to cover not repeat not only armaments already eliminated but also what is left. USA are working out other forms of language to cover the point. As another possibility, USA may record their reservation in a letter which could be made public.

(b) At a time when an effort is being made to stiffen West in relation to negotiations over Berlin, the task might become more difficult if there were an agreement on disarmament.

(c) Headway on disarmament will be easier if some of the other issues can be disposed of. USSR could easily disarm USA anytime they wanted if they pursued reasonable policies. If they had chosen to cooperate in 1946, USA defence budget would now be 5 instead of 45 billion a year.

(d) Too much eagerness might be interpreted in Moscow as a sign of weakness. There could easily be a dangerous situation if Soviet leaders cannot repeat not be persuaded that we mean business over Berlin and it is particularly hard for democracies which speak with a variety of voices and emphases to get across to dictators that on certain issues they are serious. Dictators are then tempted to go too far and the situation gets out of control.

Berlin

10. Mr. Rusk expressed appreciation for the comments received from us on Berlin.⁷⁴ He went on to say that they had deliberately avoided getting into details of the negotiating position before German elections and informal contacts had been established with USSR. While the general lines of the substantive USA position have already been reported to NATO, it will now be possible to adjust and simplify it. As I mentioned that we had been concerned about the lack of details as to the Western substantive position, Mr. Rusk said that such position was already well known and agreed on the vital issues which provided the immediate framework for negotiations.

11. While stressing that German elections had been an important inhibiting factor in discussing possible negotiating positions, Mr. Rusk thought that as a result of these elections Germans may become less sensitive to theoretical aspects of the problem of relations with the East Germans. They may now be ready to accept a number of mixed East-West German commissions to deal with practical problems such as trade and to accept the implications of a de facto situation where 95 percent of the problems relating to access are already being handled by East and West Germans themselves. When I asked him whether they might agree to a nuclear free zone, Mr. Rusk saw a possibility that NATO and Warsaw pact countries might come to some agreement involving regional limitations which might be tolerable to Germans. They were very sensitive on this issue and might object to any scheme involving only Germany. The problem was that the forces of the two blocs were in contact in Germany and any attempts to limit or reduce forces almost accidentally and incidentally was likely to appear to involve discrimination against Germans.

12. Throughout this part of the conversation, I argued very strongly that with UNGA in session, with the widespread concern resulting from the resumption of tests, with death of Secretary-General, neutral opinion would expect a considerable effort on our part to find an accommodation. There was also the possibility that USSR itself might be seeking ways of reducing tension. It was not repeat not yet possible to assume that they would be prepared to disregard the aspirations of world public opinion.

Laos

13. On Laos, Mr. Rusk reported that recently USA had developed their contacts with USSR and the impression was that USSR "had been trying to say encouraging things to us." They had been using all the right words and had been much less difficult and belligerent than in public at Geneva. It was hard however to translate this into practical arrangements on the ground.

14. USA had not repeat not been encouraged by Mr. Harriman's talks with Souvanna Phouma: while USA were not repeat not trying to be sticky or difficult on the composition of a new government and were not repeat not attempting to set up a pro-western government under the guise of neutrality they could not repeat not agree to a pro-communist régime under this label. USA saw however, as a result of their discussions with USSR, a possibility of having all foreign military personnel removed out of Laos. The problem was how to achieve this. While USA personnel are readily identified, it was not repeat not so easy to do this as regards the Vietminh. USSR were unlikely to agree to ICC getting permanent and detailed terms of reference to undertake this job but they might agree to a short term operation. USA were wondering whether this could not repeat not be done by ICC if it were to be assisted by Cambodian and Burmese personnel. Burmese who had been approached had indicated a willingness to help. I indicated that, in principle, I saw no repeat no objections to such a scheme. We might agree to a temporary expansion of the commission if this could facilitate a solution.

15. When I mentioned the possibility that operations in Laos might be resumed after monsoon season, Mr. Rusk said that the principal change they had noticed during the last month was that substantial reinforcements had been sent through Southeast part of the country in an apparent attempt to strengthen the rebels in South Vietnam. Questioned whether Chinese or Russians controlled the Vietminh he said that Soviet wing were still in control in Hanoi and that if adequate machinery could be set up, USSR might handle Vietminh.

Nuclear Tests

16. I asked Mr. Rusk why it had been necessary to announce resumption of tests before end of time given to Mr. Khrushchev to reply to Kennedy-Macmillan offer. Mr. Rusk said that after third Soviet test President felt that both nationally and internationally he could not repeat not take responsibility for delaying action any further. One essential aspect of the problem was of course that of controlling congressional reaction. He went on to say that the problem was a mixed one, involving partly public opinion, partly power relationships. USSR decision had not repeat not elicited the expected reaction in Belgrade. I made point with which Mr. Rusk agreed that many of neutrals (Nehru and Nasser in particular) had taken a positive attitude and that their influence might help in inducing USSR to take a more reasonable line.

Law of Sea

17. I reminded Mr. Rusk that we were still expecting an answer to our proposal that USA might join us and UK in second phase of a confidential survey intended to establish the degree of support which might exist for a multilateral convention based on Geneva formula. Mr. Rusk's brief to which he referred on this point merely said that State Department are still trying to make a more definite assessment of the various factors involved. I explained that there was pressure at home for early action in this field and Mr. Rusk undertook to look into the matter.

COMMONWEALTH SEAT ON THE SECURITY COUNCIL

Attached is an Aide Mémoire left with us by the United Kingdom Deputy High Commissioner. † The United Kingdom believes that South Africa has no hope of election to the Commonwealth seat on the Security Council in 1961 because not even a majority of the Commonwealth would support the Union. They also believe that the South Africans should be told that they can no longer count on support from the older countries of the Commonwealth if they decide to contest the seat formally. The United Kingdom think it advisable to dispose of this question before the Commonwealth Prime Ministers' meeting lest this controversial issue be brought up at the meeting and complicate the question of South African membership of the Commonwealth. If Canada, Australia and New Zealand agreed, the United Kingdom would speak to the South Africans along these lines on behalf of the old Commonwealth and urge the South Africans not to bring up the matter at the Prime Ministers' meeting. The last point made by the United Kingdom is that, because Ghana is at present the only Commonwealth candidate openly in the running for the Security Council in 1961, we should accept it as the agreed Commonwealth candidate.

2. To deal with the last point first, it would seem advisable not to pledge Canada's support for Ghana at this early stage. We have no way of knowing whether any other Commonwealth candidate, such as Nigeria from Africa or Malaya from Asia, is likely to appear. There could develop a competition between Asian and African candidates for the Commonwealth seats. If there were to be any choice, it would be desirable to give our support to the best candidate and the one most likely to be elected by the Assembly. Ghana, no doubt, considers itself a natural successor to Liberia as a representative of Africa, south of the Sahara, but it is far from clear that all the African states themselves share this view, especially in view of Ghana's equivocal attitude on the Congo situation and on the United Nations intervention there. Moreover, the composition of the Security Council as regards non-permanent seats in 1962 presents a confused picture, in relation to the representation of Asia as well as of Africa, and elections in the Council may continue to be further complicated as long as the question of enlargement is not resolved. In our view, these are sufficient reasons for withholding Canadian support for Ghana at this time.

3. As regards the South African candidature, you will recall that when the Union asked us to support its claim to the seat in 1959 we considered it to be entitled to the seat on rotational grounds. When it became apparent that the Union was planning to withdraw in favour of Ceylon in 1959 and to contest the 1961 election instead, we told South Africa in an aide mémoire of June 26, 1959: "While it would be manifestly impossible to anticipate all contingencies which might arise in two years, Canada would, subject to unforeseen developments, expect to be in a position itself to vote for South Africa and to give the Union its support in seeking the concurrence of the other Commonwealth members, should the Union be a candidate for the Security Council in 1961." The other old Commonwealth members took somewhat different positions. The United Kingdom undertook to try to secure the Union's acceptance as agreed Commonwealth candidate. New Zealand said only that it would be prepared to vote for South Africa if it were the agreed candidate. Because of our distinctive approach to this subject, as well as on general grounds, we opposed the United Kingdom suggestion that, after consultation, it would act as the sole spokesman for the old Commonwealth. We recommend, therefore, that the British be told that we still prefer to deal directly with the South Africans.

4. As to the substantive question, the South African candidature for the Commonwealth seat is obviously closely related to the larger question of whether South Africa is to remain a member of the Commonwealth, not only because its candidature assumes continuing membership of the Commonwealth, but also because both issues hinge on South Africa's racial policies.

5. I would suggest, then, that we should in any event not agree that a decision be made on Ghana's candidature before the Prime Ministers' Conference. As to the action to be taken in respect of South Africa's candidature, one of the following courses might be chosen:

(a) To tell the United Kingdom that, in our view, it would be preferable to leave the Security Council matter in abeyance until after the Prime Ministers' Meeting had decided the related – and in one important respect, prior – question of South Africa's continued membership in the Commonwealth.

(b) To tell the United Kingdom that we agree that it would be useful to clear the air before the Conference but that, since our positions on the South African candidacy have been different, the Department would explain orally to the South Africans as a routine matter that, as they themselves were no doubt aware, circumstances have altered fundamentally since we made our conditional promise of support in 1959. Not only has there been an unfavourable international reaction to events in the Union, but there has also been a sizeable influx of new African members to the United Nations who would be unlikely to support South Africa. As a result there would seem to be no point in our canvassing support for South Africa at this time because there was no chance that it could be elected in 1961.

(c) To suggest that the Security Council question be discussed at the Conference itself (the proposed agenda of which already provides for discussion of the United Nations), and before the item on Commonwealth membership. To explain why South Africa could not be elected would be, in effect, to prove that South Africa's racial policies had an international aspect. It is possible that Dr. Verwoerd might regard this as the type of humiliating condition that he has said he could not accept and decide on withdrawal from the Commonwealth. Should he do so, it would be, from our point of view, on a better issue than the wisdom of racial policies within the Union itself, which the South African Government vigorously argues are purely domestic, or on a difference over principles guiding the Commonwealth which are, in any case, not agreed.

6. I should be glad to know which of these courses you prefer, so that an answer can be given to the United Kingdom Government, which has asked for an early reply.

COMMONWEALTH SEAT ON THE SECURITY COUNCIL

On February 9 the Prime Minister examined the Minister's memorandum on this subject and gave the following instructions:

(a) We should not pledge Canada's support for Ghana.

(b) The United Kingdom authorities should be told that the Canadian Government will deal directly with South Africa.

The Prime Minister also said that we should tell the South Africans and the British that in our view the South Africans should withdraw their candidacy since there is no hope of its being successful.

With regard to course (c) in paragraph 5 of the memorandum, the Prime Minister said that he regarded it as a useful means of demonstrating that South Africa's racial policies do have an international aspects, but that for the time being no indication need be given to other governments that consideration is being given to this course. A decision whether or not to act on this suggestion could not be taken until the Meeting.

SOUTH AFRICAN CANDIDATURE FOR SECURITY COUNCIL

You are authorized to inform the government to which you are accredited that a message along the following lines was conveyed to the South African High Commissioner today. He was reminded of the Canadian aide mémoire in 1959 when South Africa withdrew its claim to the Commonwealth seat on the Security Council for that year but asked for support in 1961.

We had replied to the effect that subject to unforeseen developments we would expect to support South Africa. He was told today that there had been unexpected developments during the past year which bore on the whole ferment throughout Africa and in addition there had been a large number of new African members of the U.N. Under existing circumstances, we see no possibility of South Africa being elected to the Security Council and for that reason it would be idle to support their candidature for the Commonwealth seat. We added our regrets that this situation had developed.

2. We had previously conveyed the same views to Earncliffe in response to their earlier memorandum on the subject.

ELECTIONS TO THE SECURITY COUNCIL

In addition to Ghana, which Canada is already committed to support as the Commonwealth candidate to the seat now held by Ceylon, there are four other candidates for the two Security Council seats to be vacated by Turkey and Ecuador. Romania and the Philippines are competing for the Turkish seat, which is nominally the East European seat. Cuba and Venezuela are candidates for the seat held by Ecuador, one of the two allocated to Latin America.

Latin American Seat

2. Cuba's candidature is not endorsed by the Latin American group, many of the members of which are now expected to support Venezuela. In line with Canada's usual policy of accepting the choice of the region concerned as envisaged in the gentleman's agreement of 1945, the Canadian Delegation to the sixteenth session will, if you approve, be authorized to support Venezuela if it has the support of the Latin American group.⁷⁵

East European Seat

3. As you know, Turkey is completing the term of Poland on the Security Council in accordance with the agreement reached at the fourteenth session to resolve a deadlock in the election for the East European seat. The Soviet bloc candidate to replace Turkey is Romania. The Philippines is also a candidate to that seat and has the support of the United States.

4. Canada's general approach to the gentleman's agreement suggests that Canadian support should go to Romania as it did to Poland at the fourteenth session. However, important considerations prompting the Canadian decision to support Poland do not apply in the case of Romania. In 1959 Canadian support for Poland was justified by the relative independence which that country had been able to achieve within the Soviet bloc. Poland's relatively independent stand in international councils and its more advanced internal policies merited a gesture of encouragement from a country such as Canada. Romania, on the other hand, is one of the least independent of the East European countries.

⁷⁵ Note marginale :/Marginal note:
OK. [H.C. Green]

5. Moreover, the addition of many new African members of the United Nations has increased more than ever the pressure for greater African-Asian representation in the various organs. The increased pressure is, for the most part, applied against the Western European countries since most of the African-Asians are reluctant to seek election to seats traditionally reserved for the Soviet bloc. This is particularly unfair as it is the determination of the Soviet Union to prevent the enlargement of the Security Council and ECOSOC until Communist China is represented in the United Nations which frustrates the African-Asian desire for additional seats on the Councils. In seeking election to the Eastern European seat, the Philippines might thus serve a useful purpose, if it were to contribute to shifting the pressure for greater African-Asian representation on to the Soviet bloc.

6. Finally, in the present international atmosphere, it would be a welcome gesture of Western solidarity on the part of Canada, if we were to join with Western allies in supporting the Philippine candidature.

7. African-Asian reluctance to take a stand against a Soviet bloc candidate may lead to an election deadlock between Romania and the Philippines. If an acceptable compromise candidate were not then to appear, a split-term arrangement would be the only solution.

8. If you approve, therefore, the Canadian Delegation to the sixteenth session will be authorized (a) to support the candidature of the Philippines on the early ballots, and (b) in the event of an election deadlock, to exercise its discretion in supporting a compromise candidate or a split-term arrangement as the exigencies facing the General Assembly may warrant.⁷⁶

One non-permanent seat on the Security [Council] remains to be filled. This is the so-called "Eastern European" seat which is being contested by the Philippines and Romania. At the last restricted ballot held on October 30 the result was: Philippines 54, Romania 48.

2. Under Rule 96 of the Assembly's Rules of Procedure this afternoon's voting will open with a series of 3 unrestricted ballots (i.e. Members are free to vote for anyone they want). If no country obtains the required two-thirds majority, the next series will be 3 restricted ballots, confined to the two candidates with the greatest number of votes in the third of the unrestricted ballots. And so on, until someone obtains the necessary two-thirds majority.

3. The USA have informed us that the position remains much the same as when voting was suspended on October 30. They will of course be attempting to rally as much support for the Philippines as possible.

Instructions

4. The Delegation is authorized to support the Philippines on the early ballots but may exercise its discretion in supporting (a) a compromise candidate or (b) a split-term arrangement as a means of assisting the General Assembly to circumvent a possible election deadlock.

⁷⁶ Note marginale :/Marginal note:

5. There seem to be good reasons for Canada to continue to support the Philippines as long as there appears to be any chance of securing its election. Romania is one of the least independent of the Soviet bloc countries and its election could result in a composition of the Council which would be unfavourable to the West. If Romania were elected, there would be 2 Soviet bloc reps (USSR, Romania) plus 2 undependable neutrals (Ghana, UAR) on the Security Council. The West would then require the concurring votes of all of the 7 remaining members (UK, USA, France, China, Venezuela, Chile, Ireland) to take any positive action. The USA argue that the net effect would be to give the right of veto to any of the Western seven.

6. In the previous voting, held on October 30, Ghana and Venezuela were elected for two year terms. Ireland was elected for one year (1962) to replace Liberia under the split term arrangement agreed upon last year.⁷⁷

B. Issues Facing the 16th Session

There is little doubt that South Africa's policies of racial discrimination will be one of the most strongly debated issues at the 16th session.

2. The resolution passed at last year's session Resolution 1598(XV), passed on April 13, 1961 by 95 votes in favour, with one against (Portugal) and no abstentions, marked a turning point in discussion of this item at the United Nations. The resolution censured South Africa in the strongest terms but while it requested all states to consider taking such separate and collective action as was open to them in conformity with the Charter to bring about the abandonment of these policies, it did not include recommendations for sanctions which had been demanded by the African members.

3. Since this resolution was passed, South Africa has left the Commonwealth, becoming a Republic on May 31, 1961, and has not shown the slightest sign of complying with the wishes of the United Nations Assembly on racial issues. Indeed the South African Government has become even more rigid and unyielding in its determination to apply its apartheid policies. A general election will be held on October 18, 1961, and the Nationalist government is making approval of its racial policies the central issue of the election campaign. Nearly all political observers have predicted that Dr. Verwoerd will be given an increased majority by the South African electorate.

4. In these circumstances, the African members will be inclined to argue that at last year's resolution has proved ineffective in bringing about any alteration in the apartheid policies of the South African Government, direct action by the United Nations is now called for.

C. Attitude of Directly Interested Parties

5. Apartheid is an issue with which all members of the United Nations, without exception, feel that they are directly concerned.

6. South Africa has always maintained the view that this is a matter of domestic jurisdiction in which the United Nations is forbidden to intervene. It will have recorded its objection to inscription and will probably not participate in any discussion of the subject.

7. The African members, under the leadership of Ghana, will pursue the issue most strongly. The resolution which they sponsored at the resumed session of the 15th Assembly, after the usual condemnation of South Africa's racial policies, recommended all states to break off diplomatic relations with the Government of South Africa, to close their ports to South African vessels and to prevent their own ships from entering South African ports, to boycott all South African goods and to refrain from exporting goods to South Africa and to refuse landing or passage facilities to all South African aircraft. When the operative clause containing these recommendations failed to obtain a two-thirds majority in the Plenary Session, the vote being 43-34(Canada)-21, the resolution was dropped.

8. The African members have stated that they will continue to press for sanctions against South Africa at each succeeding Assembly. It is conceivable that they might also ask for South Africa's expulsion from the United Nations.

9. The Asian members feel as strongly as the African members about racial discrimination. However, they thought that the imposition of economic and diplomatic sanctions was inconsistent with Article 41 of the Charter, whereby the imposition of sanctions is the responsibility of the Security Council alone. They may also have taken into consideration the fact that a resolution recommending sanctions would have little chance of obtaining the necessary two-thirds majority. Among the Asian group, Ceylon, India and Indonesia voted in favour of the African resolution. Burma, Cambodia, Japan, Laos, Pakistan, Philippines and Thailand were among those who abstained. The resolution sponsored by the Asian members condemned South Africa in the sharpest terms and noted with grave concern that South Africa's racial policies had led to international friction and had endangered international peace and security. The resolution requested that all states should consider taking such separate and collective action as was open to them in conformity with the Charter of the United Nations to bring about the abandonment of South Africa's racial policies.

10. The Soviet bloc has always supported Afro-Asian resolutions on this subject and will presumably continue to do so.

11. The strength of world opinion against South Africa was reflected in the remarkable shift of Western members from opposing or abstaining on apartheid resolutions, as they had done in recent years, to voting in favour of the Asian resolution which, as mentioned above, was passed by 95-1 (Portugal)-0. The resolution on apartheid passed at the 14th session, which was considerably milder than the Asian resolution of the 15th session, was passed by 67-3 (France, Portugal, UK) with 7 abstentions (Australia, Belgium, Canada, Dominican Republic, Finland, Netherlands, Spain).

D. Likely Course of Events

12. The letter of inscription dated July 18, 1961 placing the apartheid item on the agenda of the 16th General Assembly was signed by 39 countries, with 7 more names being added later. These included, as might be expected, all the African members, most of the Asians, and also such countries as Ireland, Cyprus, Brazil, Uruguay, Denmark, Iceland and Norway.

13. The letter of Inscription refers to Resolution 1598(XV) which had been passed by an overwhelming majority but had failed to bring about any change in the policies and actions of the Republic of South Africa, which continued "with increasing ruthlessness and disregard of world opinion and of the successive resolutions adopted by the United Nations." The letter warned that the South African Government's policy of apartheid was a continuing cause of international friction and was likely to endanger peace and security.

14. The events of the past year in South Africa would seem to rule out any possibility of a moderate resolution. The division of opinion will be between those who think that South Africa can be forced by physical means to alter its racial policies and those who feel that application of the strongest possible moral pressure by mobilizing world opinion is the most effective way of bringing about change in South Africa.

15. The African members will again bring forward a demand for universal sanctions which will include those which they asked for at the last session, breaking off diplomatic relations, trade boycott and cancellation of shipping and air links. Some of the African members may feel that South Africa should be expelled, from the United Nations. Even if South Africa is not expelled, many African members would welcome the passage of a very strong resolution which was so harshly critical of South Africa that South Africa would voluntarily withdraw from United Nations as it did from the Commonwealth.

16. The question is therefore not whether a moderate resolution can be obtained, but rather what limits can be set on the expected tough resolution.

E. Policy Considerations Involved for Canada

17. Many factors are involved. Racial discrimination, as practiced by the South African Government, is abhorrent to nearly all Canadians and public opinion in Canada is extremely critical of the harshly abusive attitude of the South African Government on this issue.

18. The following considerations need to be taken into account.

19. In the past it was felt that attacking or condemning the South African Government was more likely to be harmful than helpful to the non-white population of South Africa. However, this policy of restraint has not proved to be of noticeable value and does not seem to have influenced the policy of the South African Government. There seems therefore no alternative to placing more reliance on the hope of bringing about a change in South Africa's policies by the power of world opinion, as reflected in very strongly worded resolutions passed by the General Assembly of the United Nations.

20. Canada has had close associations with South Africa in the past and recognizes the many excellent qualities of the English and Afrikaner inhabitants of South Africa. We realize the great difficulty of finding a solution to the problem of relations between the races in this country and we appreciate that the South African Government, within the limitations of its philosophy, has made great efforts to improve the social and economic conditions of the native population. At the same time we believe that the policy of apartheid is both inhumane and unworkable and, if pursued in its present manner, can only lead to catastrophe. We believe that efforts should still be made to try to bring about a change from within in South Africa by peaceful methods of persuasion and negotiation.

21. The arguments against applying sanctions to South Africa under present conditions are that their use would be counter to the Charter's provision that sanctions were intended solely for use by the Security Council for preventing or stopping international hostilities. Their use would also mean applying to South Africa something which has not been used against perpetrators of international crimes even more opprobrious. It would set a precedent of questionable legality which under different circumstances could be used to coerce other small nations.

22. There are also strong practical arguments against the use of economic sanctions for exerting political pressure. If every nation refused to trade with any other nation of whose policies or principles it disapproved, the pattern of international trade would quickly become extremely distorted. Economic sanctions would also be ineffective unless accepted by all the major industrial countries which have substantial trade relations with South Africa. There is no guarantee that some of these countries, who question the legality of such action by the United Nations, would continue to trade with South Africa at the expense of those countries which did comply. Finally, there is the point that those who would suffer first and most in South Africa from economic sanctions would be the African workers.

23. The breaking off of diplomatic relations as a means of expressing disapproval for South Africa's racial policies would require careful consideration. We have diplomatic relations with many countries of whose policies we strongly disapprove but with whom we have to conduct international business of one kind or other.

24. It is also possible that if a resolution calling for sanctions was passed by a two-thirds majority, South Africa would withdraw from the United Nations. There is no doubt that many members would welcome such a withdrawal and would even favour expulsion of South Africa at the present time. On the other hand it may be argued that membership of the United Nations continues to place some restraint on the South African Government in its treatment of its non-white population and that withdrawal, or expulsion, could lead to more extreme measures of discrimination with even less regard for international opinion.

F. Instructions

25. No doubt should be left in the minds of the South African Government about the complete disapproval by nearly every member of the United Nations of their apartheid policies. Accordingly, the Canadian Delegation should be prepared to support those parts of a resolution, even though they may be phrased in very strong terms, which condemn apartheid policies. If the same resolution should contain proposals concerning sanctions or the expulsion of South Africa, the Delegation should refer to Ottawa for instructions.

26. The Delegation should keep the Department informed of any approaches which are made to it by other delegations and about any proposed resolutions which it learns of while they are still in the drafting stage. The delegation will perhaps wish to consult with the Department concerning the nature of the response it makes to any approaches by other delegations and regarding its attitude on any proposed resolutions which may appear to be gaining support.

G. Suggested Lines to be Followed in Statement

27. If it is found appropriate for the Canadian representative to participate in the debate in committee, some or all of the following points might usefully be made. The exact nature of the statement, however, and certainly the emphasis to be given to specific points will depend to a considerable extent on the action which Canada has found it possible to take.

(1) Canada opposes racial discrimination in South Africa or wherever it appears as a denial of fundamental human rights to which all members of the United Nations have subscribed.

(2) Canada deplores the suffering and frustration which the South African Government's apartheid policy has brought to the non-white population of South Africa. The objectionable features of the system have completely obscured any progressive measures which the South African Government has taken for its native population, such as the provision of low cost native housing, the provision of hospital and medical facilities, the beginnings of the economic development of the native reserves, the provision of educational facilities, etc.

(3) Canada is convinced that apartheid, as well as being an evil policy, is also unworkable and extremely dangerous. If continued on its present lines, it will bring economic, and eventually, political and social disaster to all the people of South Africa.

(4) Canada regrets the position of isolation in which South Africa has placed itself by following those policies. We still believe, even at this stage, that South Africa should reverse its course and work for a policy of true racial partnership. This would have to be by a gradual process of moving away from apartheid, with concessions on the part of the white population and continued patience by the non-white population. We believe that an atmosphere in which a multi-racial society in South Africa would be possible could only be achieved by peaceful cooperation between white and non-white South Africans. We are therefore opposed to the use of force to try to bring about a change.

CONFIDENTIAL

[Ottawa] October 25, 1961

APARTHEID

The apartheid issue is being discussed by the Special Committee of the UN General Assembly in New York this week, the debate having started on Monday, October 23. In their inscription of this item the African delegations pointed out that last year's apartheid resolution, which was approved by 95 to 1, has failed to bring about any change in the policies and actions of the Republic of South Africa. They also claimed that apartheid is a continuing cause of international friction and is likely to endanger peace and security.

2. The Ghanaian delegation has circulated a draft resolution recommending sanctions against South Africa similar to those contained in the African resolution which failed to obtain a two-thirds majority at the last session, but also including a demand for South Africa's expulsion from the United Nations. In addition to inviting the Security Council to recommend the expulsion of South Africa, the resolution recommends that all states should:

- (a) break off diplomatic relations with South Africa;
- (b) close their ports to South African vessels;
- (c) prevent their own ships from entering South African ports;
- (d) boycott all South African goods and refrain from exporting goods to South Africa; and
- (e) refuse landing and passage facilities to all South African aircraft.

3. The Ghanaian resolution has not yet been tabled in the Special Committee. It will probably be altered before it reaches the Committee and in committee and it is possible that the demand for South Africa's expulsion may be dropped. Feeling against South Africa remains very strong and it is possible that the demand for sanctions will receive the necessary two-thirds support in plenary.

4. It should be noted that the Assembly can only recommend sanctions. To be mandatory a sanctions resolution would have to be approved by the Security Council. It could be defeated in the Security Council either by failure to obtain seven votes or by a veto.

5. The British are very strongly opposed to the use of economic sanctions against South Africa on grounds of both principle and national interest and are most anxious to obtain enough support to defeat them in the Assembly, rather than be faced with the possibility of having to use a veto in the Security Council.

6. In making a decision as to the position which our Delegation should adopt, there are many factors which should be taken into consideration. The question of expulsion has been discussed in a separate memorandum to Cabinet. † With regard to breaking off diplomatic relations, it has been the Canadian view that the question of maintenance of diplomatic relations with a particular government should not be related to approval or disapproval of that government's policies. With regard to the economic sanctions proposed in the Ghanaian resolution, the following aspects are involved.

7. The arguments in favour of supporting a demand for sanctions are:

(1) It is true that the South African Government has paid no attention to the resolution passed by an overwhelming majority at the last session calling on it to bring its policies and conduct into conformity with its obligations under the Charter. The fact that the many hortatory resolutions of the past years have all been ineffective adds weight to the African contention that sanctions are the only means remaining to the UN enforcing its will.

(2) The South African Foreign Minister, Mr. Louw, in his speech in the General debate has stated that the South African Government has no intention of altering its racial policies in deference to United Nations opinion. The uncompromising and aggressive tone of his speech has destroyed any remaining sympathy for the South African position.

(3) The African delegations consider that the apartheid issue is of direct and vital concern to them. Failure to support their resolution might offset the benefit we have gained from our strong stand against apartheid in the past and would leave us open to the accusation that we are insincere in our opposition to apartheid.

(4) As we have obtained the support of nearly all the African delegations on matters of great interest to Canada, they may feel that we should support them on issues which they regard as vital. Our attitude might affect their votes on other issues of direct interest to us. It might also prejudice the special relationship which we have been able to develop with the French-speaking African states.

(5) In the recent general election, the Nationalist government increased its majority, winning two-thirds of the seats in parliament, while campaigning on its racial policies. It is therefore irrelevant to argue that the United Nations pressure will increase the support within South Africa for the Verwoerd Government.

8. On the other hand, there are a number of reasons why it would be in Canada's interest to oppose the application of sanctions to South Africa because of its apartheid policies. These include:

(1) Their use would be counter to the Charter's provision that sanctions were intended solely for use by the Security Council for preventing or stopping international hostilities.

(2) Their use would also mean applying to South Africa something which has not been used against perpetrators of international crimes even more opprobrious. It would set a precedent of questionable legality which under different circumstances could be used to coerce other small nations.

(3) If every nation refused to trade with any other nation of whose policies or principles it disapproved, the pattern of international trade would quickly become extremely distorted.

(4) Economic sanctions would be ineffective unless accepted by all the major industrial countries which have substantial trade relations with South Africa.

(5) Those who would suffer first and most in South Africa from economic sanctions would be the African workers.

9. While the Canadian Delegation voted at the last session for the Asian resolution on apartheid, which noted that the continuance of the South African Government's racial policies "endangers international peace and security," it is difficult to believe that a situation such as that which exists now in South Africa was meant to be covered by the relevant articles of the Charter dealing with measures designed to "maintain or restore international peace and security." The use of sanctions against South Africa because of apartheid policies would set an extremely bad precedent for the United Nations. It might lead to a number of further sanctions proposals. Certainly Portugal would be next in line but some delegations might be tempted to propose sanctions against the Soviet Union, France, Israel or the Netherlands. Moves like this could produce a difficult, embarrassing and confusing situation in the Assembly. Added to the internal problems which already exist in the United Nations, resort to the sanctions procedure might bring down the Organization.

10. In terms of Canadian interests, it is probable that a vote for economic sanctions, or even an abstention, would call into question the special contractual arrangements of 1932 with South Africa which govern our trade relations. Either party can cancel after due notice and the balance of advantage from these preferences is substantially in our favour, as is also the balance of trade itself ($50 million Canadian exports as opposed to $10 million imports). When consideration was being given to cancelling these arrangements at the time South Africa left the Commonwealth, numerous representations against such action were received from Canadian exporters. It is also probable that special legislation would be necessary to enable Canada to implement a sanctions resolution passed by the United Nations.

11. In the light of the foregoing considerations, Cabinet guidance would be appreciated as a basis for instructions to the Canadian Delegation to the Sixteenth United Nations General Assembly.

POSSIBLE EXPULSION OF SOUTH AFRICA FROM THE UNITED NATIONS

15. The Secretary of State for External Affairs said that the Special Committee of the United Nations was discussing South Africa and the apartheid issue at the present session of the General Assembly this week. The Ghanaian delegation had circulated a draft resolution recommending sanctions against South Africa and also including a demand for South Africa's expulsion from the United Nations. In addition a number of actions to be taken by states were recommended.

(Minister's memorandum, Cab. Doc. 396-61, Oct. 25)

16. Mr. Green considered that the idea of sanctions or the expulsion of a member was foreign to any past practice in the United Nations. Although Canada had voted at the last session for the Asian resolution on apartheid, the proposed resolution was going much further.

Britain was worried about the imposition of sanctions because of its possible effect on their trade with South Africa and because South African ports were required in moving naval vessels around the Cape. On the other hand if Canada voted against sanctions she would be lined up with a very small group because the large Asian and African blocks would vote for sanctions. Canada needed the support of these groups on other matters. Even abstaining would create some difficulty with the African and Asian groups.

17. During the discussion some said Canada should vote against the resolution because some of the sanctions, such as the breaking off of diplomatic relations, were acts just short of war. Others wondered whether by abstention Canada would be committed to carry out sanctions if the resolution passed. It was made clear that this would not be the case.

18. The Cabinet agreed that the Canadian Delegation to the United Nations General Assembly in New York be instructed to abstain from voting on a resolution recommending sanctions against South Africa.

The present position seems to be as follows:

1. Cabinet has recommended to the Prime Minister that the Delegation should,
 - (a) express Canadian views on apartheid,
 - (b) vote "no" on expulsion,
 - (c) abstain on sanctions.
2. This will be communicated to the Prime Minister by the Minister by telephone.

APARTHEID

I attach a copy of the Apartheid Resolution sponsored by the Congo (Leopoldville), Ghana, Guinea, Iraq, Libya, Mali, Sierra Leone, Somalia, Sudan and the United Arab Republic which has been tabled in the Special Committee.† Attached also is the text of the Indian resolution, tabled late last night and sponsored by Afghanistan, Ceylon, Malaya, India and Venezuela.‡ The text was obtained by our Delegation from the Malaysians, and there may be some slight alterations in it.

2. The Indian resolution follows very closely the wording of last session's resolution 1598 (XV), which was passed by 95 votes in favour (including Canada) to 1 against (Portugal), although the wording of most of the operative clauses has been strengthened to a greater or less degree.

3. When this matter was considered by Cabinet, there was no firm prospect of an alternative moderate resolution and the possibility of there being such resolution was not mentioned in the Memorandum to Cabinet of October 25.

4. If, as I suppose, you would wish the Delegation to support the Indian resolution,⁸⁰ you might consider that, by thus fully expressing our opposition to apartheid, there would be less likelihood of being misunderstood if we voted against the sanctions clause in the African resolution (while abstaining on the resolution as a whole).⁸¹ African opinion is still divided on the sanctions paragraphs, whereas there must be virtually unanimous support of the Indian resolution.

5. A second new element is the depth of feeling which has been aroused by the Soviet explosion of their 50 megaton bomb and their continuance of testing since its explosion. Should the United Nations take the important decision to turn to sanctions at all, it might well seem inappropriate, under present conditions, to establish the precedent in the case of South Africa rather than that of the Soviet Union, which has flagrantly defied world opinion.

APARTHEID

After examining your memorandum under reference, the Minister has reaffirmed that the Delegation is to support the Indian Resolution; and to abstain on the sanctions clause in the African Resolution while abstaining on the Resolution as a whole.

2. The Minister's instructions have been passed to the Delegation by telephone.

3. The Delegation in New York is aware that an abstention on the question of sanctions means that this issue cannot form a main feature of any statement they make. They intend to send us the draft text of Tremblay's statement for the Minister's consideration by the weekend if possible.

4. A new development mentioned by Tremblay on the telephone is that whereas until now the Africans have been divided on the question of expulsion, with resulting uncertainty as to whether it would appear in the final version of their Resolution, they have now closed ranks and have taken a position in favour of both expulsion and the imposition of sanctions. The Minister has authorized Tremblay to vote against the expulsion clause, unless the great majority of others intend to abstain or vote for.

UNGA SPECIAL COMMITTEE: APARTHEID

The new situation which has arisen as a result of the uncertainty as to whether a blocking third can be maintained in Plenary in respect of the African Resolution (calling for expulsion and sanctions) was discussed at length with the Minister last night, including the possible influence that the Canadian position would exert on the Scandinavian and certain Latin American Delegations.

2. The Minister reiterated his conviction that it would be impossible to explain to the Canadian public, who are aroused about South African race policies, a vote against sanctions and therefore apparently in defence of apartheid. He therefore confirmed that the previous instructions should stand, viz that the Delegation should vote against operative paragraph 5 (expulsion) and abstain on operative paragraphs 6, and all parts thereof, and 7, both dealing with sanctions.

3. These instructions have been conveyed by telephone to Senator Brooks.

APARTHEID

The Ethiopian Delegation this morning introduced the following new operative paragraph as an amendment to the draft Indian Resolution (L 72) to be inserted after the present operative paragraph 3:

“Calls the attention of the Security Council to the provisions of Article 11 (3) and to consider what measures should be taken against the Republic of South Africa for its persistent violations of the Charter of the United Nations.”

2. Article 11 (3) states that “The General Assembly may call the attention of the Security Council to situations which are likely to endanger international peace and security.” Taken in conjunction with the existing operative paragraphs 4 and 6 of the draft Indian Resolution (urging all States to take such separate and collective action as is open to them in conformity with the Charter, and reaffirming that the continuance of South Africa’s policies seriously endangers international peace and security), this is considered by a large number of Delegations to be in effect a request to the Security Council to impose sanctions.

3. The wording of the second half of the amendment, requesting the Security Council to consider measures against South Africa for its persistent violations of the Charter, is a clear reference to Article 6 of the Charter, which reads as follows:

“A Member of the United Nations which has persistently violated the Principles contained in the present Charter may be expelled from the Organization by the General Assembly upon the recommendation of the Security Council.”

4. The Ethiopian amendment would therefore appear to be designed to introduce into the Indian draft Resolution, in another form, the recommendations contained in the Ghanaian draft Resolution that the Security Council consider both sanctions and expulsion of South Africa. In view of the decision that the Delegation should vote against operative paragraph 5 of the Ghanaian Resolution (expulsion), you may wish similarly to instruct the Delegation to vote against the Ethiopian amendment and, as a consequence if this paragraph is not deleted, to abstain on the Indian Resolution as a whole.

5. It is understood that the Ethiopian amendment has the backing of a number of Latin American Delegations. It is the estimate of our Delegation that this may well enable it to obtain a two-thirds majority both in the Committee and in Plenary.

6. According to our Delegation, the Danes and Norwegians, who have been co-sponsors of the Indian Resolution, are very much disturbed over this development and the fact that the Indians appear willing to accept the amendment, however much they may deplore it in private. It is likely, therefore, that the Danes and Norwegians will withdraw their co-sponsorship. It is their present intention to vote against the amendment and abstain on the Indian Resolution as a whole.

7. We understand that a similar position will probably be adopted by the following Delegations: Australia, Ireland, Japan, Netherlands, New Zealand, U.S.A.

8. If we vote against the amendment and abstain on the Indian Resolution as a whole, you may consider it advisable for our Representative in the Committee to make a brief statement reiterating our previous intention to give full support to the Indian Resolution and expressing our regret that the terms of the Ethiopian amendment make it no longer possible to do so.

VOTING PROSPECTS FOR APARTHEID ITEM IN PLENARY

Following upon the discussion of this matter with you this afternoon, you may wish to have the following summary of the situation.

The report of the Special Political Committee on the apartheid item may come before Plenary late this week, or early next week. As you know, if the voting pattern recorded in the Committee can be approximately reproduced in Plenary, a result generally satisfactory from the Canadian viewpoint will be achieved. The expulsion and sanctions provisions of the African draft resolution will fail to secure the two-thirds majority needed for adoption, as will the objectionable elements which were introduced into the Indian draft resolution by amendments in the Committee. The African resolution, if proceeded with at all, thus will be in a form acceptable to us, while the Indian text will be restored to its original form, which we support.

The achievement of the results outlined above of course depends upon repeating in Plenary the separate votes which were taken in Committee on the contentious paragraphs of the two resolutions. A request for such separate votes will be made in Plenary, and normally it would not be contested. It is, however, quite conceivable that the Africans or (more probably) the Soviet bloc may attempt to obstruct the request for separate votes on the various operative portions of the resolutions; and while the procedural motion involved would only need a simple majority, there can be no assurance that this could be won. We should therefore be prepared to meet this possible eventuality when the apartheid item comes to Plenary.

Should separate votes on the various contentious portions of the two draft resolutions be denied in Plenary, the only way remaining to prevent adoption of the expulsion and sanctions provisions of the African resolution, and of the undesirable elements added to the Indian draft by amendment in Committee, would be to block adoption of the two resolutions in their entirety. Those delegations which have participated in the opposition to sanctions (whether the specific ones spelled out in the African resolution or the sweeping general sanctions envisaged by the Soviet and Ethiopian amendments to the Indian resolution) evidently would seek vigorously to mount "blocking thirds" against the two resolutions in these circumstances. Clearly, the Canadian delegation would come under strong pressure to alter its position on the resolutions as a whole in the light of any such development. We would be strongly urged, particularly by our Scandinavian and Irish friends as well as by the United States, the United Kingdom, Australia and New Zealand, to vote against the African resolution, and to at least abstain on the Indian resolution.

The issue in the voting on the two draft resolutions in this situation would be squarely whether or not expulsion and sanctions provisions should be adopted by the General Assembly. The margin for blocking the resolutions if they were thus voted on only as a whole, with no opportunity to deal separately with the contentious portions, would be very narrow indeed; and the Canadian vote could be of special importance to the outcome.

We understand your instructions to be that should the contingency envisaged above arise, we are to abstain on the African draft resolution and vote for the amended Indian draft resolution, explaining our vote on the latter.⁸² Copies of the two relevant texts as they will be taken up in Plenary are attached for your information. †

APARTHEID IN PLENARY

Yesterday you requested us to review the probable situation in Plenary when the apartheid item comes up for discussion. We have taken into consideration the memorandum of November 15 on this subject prepared for you in New York by Mr. Tremblay. Attached for your approval is telegram V-576 of November 17⁸³ which reviews the various voting possibilities and suggests the policy line which the Delegation should follow in consultation with other delegations and in the voting in Plenary when it actually takes place. The main recommendations are as follows:

(a) The Delegation should try to persuade the Africans, and particularly the Indians, not to block the paragraph by paragraph vote on either of the resolutions.

(b) If paragraph by paragraph voting is not permitted on the 31-power (African) text and it is presented as a whole, the Canadian Delegation should vote against it.

(c) The Indians should be more disposed than the Africans to have a paragraph by paragraph vote on the 8-power text, particularly in view of the Soviet and Pakistan amendments. The Canadian Delegation should strongly urge the Indians to follow this procedure. In the event that such voting is blocked, however, the Delegation would continue to vote in favour of the 8-power text but express opposition to expulsion and reservations about the use of sanctions in the situation which exists in South Africa.

(d) The Delegation should make known its position on voting not only to the co-sponsors but to other Delegations which abstained on both texts or voted in favour of the 8-power text.

2. Mr. Tremblay's memorandum of November 15 and the text of the two resolutions are also attached.⁸⁴

16TH UNGA: ITEM 76 – VOTING PROSPECTS FOR APARTHEID ITEM IN PLENARY

We participated today in a meeting on this subject at which were represented delegations of Australia, New Zealand, Denmark, Japan, Argentina, France, United Kingdom and USA. Decisions agreed upon concerning handling of apartheid item in plenary may be summarized as follows:

(a) United Kingdom, USA and Danish delegations, and perhaps one other delegation from among co-sponsors of Indian draft resolution (L72), will submit letters to President of UNGA asking that separate paragraph votes be taken in plenary on the contentious paragraphs of both African draft resolution (L71) and Indian draft as amended in committee. Aim of course would be to have the opportunity to approximate report in plenary voting pattern which was recorded in committee, whereby (because of the requirement for a two-thirds majority in Plenary) the expulsion and sanctions provisions of African resolution and the objectionable elements introduced into Indian text by amendment in committee, would be voted down;

(b) Danish Representative tentatively agreed that his delegation would formally move from floor in Plenary a motion embodying request already conveyed in letters to President for separate paragraph votes on two resolutions;

(c) To provide against the eventuality that motion for separate paragraph votes may fail, every effort will be made to ensure that a number of delegations which abstained on African resolution as a whole in committee will vote against it in Plenary if it is treated as a whole without separate votes to eliminate the objectionable paragraphs. It should be just possible to defeat African resolution as a whole on this basis;

(d) It was recognized that Indian resolution probably could not repeat not be defeated in Plenary if voted upon as a whole including the objectionable amendments. There was some discussion of the possibility of moving a substantive amendment in Plenary to excise the objectionable amendments; while this would probably not repeat not secure the required two-thirds majority, it was suggested that it would at least enable delegations to register their objections to the elements introduced into text by Soviet Ethiopian and Pakistani amendments. This idea remains tentative, however, depending upon the procedural feasibility of moving such an amendment in Plenary.

2. It was agreed that all delegations represented [at today's] meeting would share in advance efforts to line up support for the procedural proposal calling for separate paragraph votes on the two resolutions. This campaign of course will be directed primarily at the various delegations which in course of voting in committee registered objections to specific portions of one or other of draft resolutions by either abstaining or opposing these paragraphs, and therefore may be expected to want an opportunity similarly to register their attitude in the voting in Plenary.

3. It remains our expectation that the apartheid item will be taken up in Plenary during the early part of next week, although it is difficult to predict with any certainty when Assembly will find time for it.

TELEGRAM V-590

Ottawa, November 24, 1961

CONFIDENTIAL. OPIMMEDIATE.

16TH UNGA: ITEM 76 – APARTHEID IN PLENARY

We understand that you might consider it helpful to have the text of the draft telegram on this subject prepared for the Minister on November 17 but not approved because of developments in New York. That text is contained in the following paragraphs.

2. As you suggest, when the apartheid item comes before Plenary, the result would be generally satisfactory if the voting followed the pattern established in committee. The expulsion and sanctions provisions would probably fail to secure two-thirds support. The Indian draft resolution, more or less in its original form, would emerge as the recommendation of the Assembly. However, since the sponsors of the 31-power resolution may not permit paragraph by paragraph voting, and presumably they have sufficient voting strength to prevent this procedure, an awkward situation could be created.

3. In the period between now and the voting in Plenary, the delegations opposed to expulsion and sanctions will undoubtedly seek to block those provisions in both resolutions. You should seek, in your consultations with the co-sponsors of the two resolutions, to persuade them to accept paragraph by paragraph voting. You should explain that Canada is opposed to expulsion and has grave reservations about the propriety and efficacy of sanctions as a means of changing the apartheid policies of South Africa. The Charter provisions concerning sanctions clearly envisage that they should be invoked only in the event of an actual threat to the peace, breach of the peace or act of aggression. The Security Council is the appropriate organ to make such a finding and call for action. Attempts to use voting strength in the Assembly to impose sanctions are unwise and likely to be ineffective. Canada fully shares the desire of those delegations who wish to exert the maximum influence on South Africa to change its policies but we consider that this result can best be obtained by adopting proposals which have an overwhelming support of UNGA, in other words, proposals like those contained in the original Indian text.

4. If the 31 co-sponsors cannot be persuaded to permit paragraph by paragraph voting, we assume that there will be an Assembly vote on this procedural question. You should support any motion calling for paragraph by paragraph voting on the 31-power resolution. If paragraph by paragraph voting occurs, you should vote as you did in committee, that is, against operative paragraph 5 and abstain on operative paragraphs 6 and 7. However, if the resolution as a whole is put to the vote, because paragraph by paragraph voting is blocked, you should vote against the 31-power resolution.

5. Your vote against the 31-power resolution would ensure its defeat, if one other member, who abstained in committee, followed Canada's example in the voting in Plenary. We would hope that the co-sponsors of the 8-power resolution in the interests of having a heavy supporting vote would allow paragraph by paragraph voting on their text. If this should happen, Canada should vote as it did in committee, that is, abstain on the first part of the Ethiopian amendment; vote against the second part; abstain on the Ethiopian amendment as a whole; and against the Soviet amendment; and abstain on the Pakistan amendment. Our hope is that the objectionable parts of the 8-power text would be rejected for want of two-thirds support.

6. Some delegations which voted in favour of the Indian resolution as a whole and also most of those who abstained should be in a strong tactical position to persuade the 8 co-sponsors to permit paragraph by paragraph voting. You should strongly urge the Indians not to oppose such voting because of Canada's desire to give full support to the text originally proposed and because of our inability to support without reservation the amended text. It would do no harm if the Indians gained the impression that in Plenary there might be even more abstentions than there were in committee. The African-Asians as a whole will have failed in their main objective if the final vote in favour of this year's resolution on apartheid is considerably smaller than the one last year.

7. If, in spite of all efforts, the 8-power text as amended is voted upon only as a whole, we would be obliged to follow the vote cast in committee but with reservations about the objectionable clauses. This would require an explanation of vote emphasizing: (a) Canada's outright opposition to and condemnation of apartheid; (b) Canada's opposition to expulsion, and (c) Canadian serious reservations about the use of sanctions as a means of bringing about a change in South African policies. For tactical reasons our vote on the resolution as a whole if amendments remain should not be disclosed in advance.

8. In the period before the voting in Plenary, we believe that it may be desirable to make known the Canadian position on other voting, not only to the sponsors of the two texts but to those delegations which have abstained. You should also inform some of those who voted against the 31-power resolution. Our aim, of course, should be to bring about the most satisfactory result attainable in the various contingencies mentioned in this telegram.⁸⁵

RESOLUTION ON SOVIET COLONIALISM

On September 27 the Prime Minister requested a memorandum from the Department setting out arguments for and against introducing, in the course of the Canadian statement in the General Debate, a resolution on Soviet colonialism. Attached for your approval is a memorandum which discusses possible procedures involved, the nature of any such resolutions and the arguments in favour and against introducing it.⁸⁶

2. The balance of argument tends to run against submitting a resolution on Soviet colonialism. There will, of course, be opportunities at the 16th session to criticize the Soviet Union for its domination of subject peoples in Eastern Europe. You will recall, however, that Western efforts to persuade the African-Asians that their declaration on colonialism could be applied equally to traditional colonialism and to Soviet domination, met with little success at the 15th session. A Canadian resolution on Soviet colonialism would probably have little support at the 16th session because of the wide spread anxiety about the prevailing East-West tension. I fear that a Canadian initiative along these lines would be regarded, by many of the uncommitted delegations and even by some of our friends, as a cold war manoeuvre. If you agree with our assessment of the situation, you may wish to initial the memorandum for the Prime Minister.⁸⁷

You have asked for a Departmental assessment, including a description of procedures, of the prospects for introducing during the Canadian statement in the General Debate a resolution on Soviet colonialism. In this regard, the Canadian statement is scheduled for the morning of October 3.

Procedure

2. It is not the normal practice for member states to introduce substantive resolutions during the General Debate, although there is no specific rule prohibiting this. The General Debate is used mainly as a means of indicating the intentions of member states as regards proposals they wish to make at a later stage in the proceedings.

3. There are some precedents for submitting draft resolutions during the General Debate for immediate consideration by the Assembly. Last autumn, the five neutralist leaders formally proposed a meeting between President Eisenhower and Mr. Khrushchev. That proposal was mainly of a procedural nature and did not fall under any specific item on the Assembly's agenda.

4. The Soviet Union has inscribed an item entitled "The Situation with Regard to the Implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples." Mr. Gromyko has indicated that the Soviet Union will call for the establishment of a new United Nations commission to control that implementation. The whole subject will be discussed in plenary session some time after the General Debate. All proposals concerning colonialism are likely to be discussed under the Soviet item. If it were decided to submit a Canadian resolution, it would be appropriate to follow such a procedure.

⁸⁷ Note marginale :/Marginal note:

Initialed by SSEA & sent to H.B. R[obinson], 29/9. R. C[ampbell]

5. Alternatively, Canada could ask for the inclusion of an additional item on the Assembly's agenda concerning Soviet colonialism. Such an item would be governed by Rule 15 which provides that "items of an important and urgent character" may be placed on the agenda if the Assembly so decides by majority vote. Besides, this would involve consideration by the General Committee and by the General Assembly, both of which might be disposed to reject an additional item on the ground that the subject matter could be dealt with under the existing Soviet item on colonialism.

Nature of the Resolution

6. Presumably, the proposed resolution should be related to the one adopted by the General Assembly on December 15, 1960 which was the African-Asian version of the declaration on the granting of independence to colonial countries and peoples (copy attached).† That resolution contained, both in its preambular and operative paragraphs, language applicable to subject peoples under Soviet domination. The preamble of any new resolution could refer to that declaration and perhaps reaffirm its relevant provisions. In its operative part, such a resolution, among other things, could call for the exercise of the right of self-determination by peoples under Soviet domination. In your statement at the 15th session, you emphasized that those peoples should be given the opportunity to determine the kind of government they wanted under genuinely free conditions. In his statement on September 25, President Kennedy called for the application of "the principle of free choice and the practice of free plebiscites in every part of the globe."

7. The details of any such resolution would have to be carefully examined. At the 15th session, mainly out of consideration for the United Kingdom, Australia and New Zealand, the African-Asians avoided language which could be said to apply to any specific member state. While a resolution could be aimed specifically at the Soviet Union, there would be a risk that the anti-colonial powers, including the Soviet bloc, would succeed in turning it to their own advantage, either through amendment or by using it as a precedent. The colonial powers might suffer disadvantage with adverse effects for Western unity.

Arguments in Favour

8. In view of the rapid development of the former colonial territories into nationhood, mainly through the conscientious effort of Western powers, there is little reason why the Soviet Union should be permitted to pose as a champion of freedom. Its own record of domination should be fully exposed and the hypocrisy of its stand on colonialism. The Soviet authorities have shown themselves sensitive to such criticism. Far from being on the defensive, most of the Western powers are now in a position to point with pride to their record of freely granting independence. The uncommitted states should be urged to take as firm a stand against Soviet domination as they have taken against traditional colonialism. Moreover, the whole picture of freedom and independence should be placed in proper perspective when the General Assembly is debating colonialism.

Arguments Against

9. The uncommitted states, and especially those from Asia and Africa, still see colonialism only in terms of past conditions in these two continents. They persist in rejecting Western efforts to draw parallels between Soviet and traditional colonialism. That they do not wish to see colonialism turned into a cold war issue was demonstrated last autumn when they rejected the Soviet declaration. Moreover, as part of their general reluctance to be drawn into cold war issues, they resist Western attempts to expose Soviet domination of subject peoples and dismiss them as tactics designed to ward off African-Asian attacks on the Western colonial powers. The luke-warm attitude of the uncommitted states as regards the situations in Hungary and Tibet illustrates these points.

10. At the 16th session, attention most probably will be focussed on three main East-West issues: Berlin, nuclear tests and disarmament. The principal aim of the Western powers, and certainly that of the uncommitted states, will be to bring about negotiations with the Soviet Union on these questions which are closely related to the fundamental issue of peace or war. With this aim in mind, even those members who are fully conscious of the fact of Soviet colonialism will nonetheless be opposed to adding new sources of East-West friction at this time.

11. In the circumstances, it seems unlikely that a Canadian resolution directed against the Soviet Union would attract the two-thirds support needed for its adoption. The uncommitted states (some 40 votes) can be expected to oppose it or abstain. In addition, it would probably not have the support of the Scandinavian countries, Ireland, Austria or several of the Latin Americans (Brazil, Cuba, Venezuela and Mexico certainly would not). Even among the colonial powers, France, Portugal and possibly the United Kingdom might find difficulty in supporting the resolution on doctrinaire grounds because it could be regarded as intervening in the domestic affairs of a member state. Recent votes in the Assembly on the inscription of items indicate a cool attitude toward so-called cold war issues; Hungary, for example, was inscribed by a vote of 51 in favour, 15 against and 30 abstentions; the vote on Tibet was 48-14-35. The vote in favour of any new item or of a proposal specifically condemning the Soviet Union might be much less.

12. While the balance of argument tends to run against submitting a resolution on Soviet colonialism, there will be opportunities at the 16th session to expose Soviet hypocrisy on colonialism. These opportunities will occur in the General Debate and in the debates on colonialism, Hungary and Tibet. To introduce a resolution, however, without a careful canvass of Assembly opinion would be to run the risk of a voting defeat. In any event, at best such a resolution would attract a simple majority, probably with a large number of abstentions, a voting result which would be insufficient for the adoption of the proposal.

PRIME MINISTER'S SPEECH ON COLONIALISM IN THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY

The Prime Minister said on October 17 that he was still inclined to proceed with his earlier intention to address the General Assembly during the debate on Colonialism. He made it clear that he had in mind concentrating on Soviet colonialism as the main element in his speech. He did not rule out the inclusion of other themes, but I took it from his comments that any such additional points would be supplementary to his main objective. He said that he did not intend to propose a resolution but he indicated that, in the course of his speech, he might foreshadow the submission of a resolution at the next session of the Assembly. He asked me to confirm his earlier request that the Department should prepare a draft speech.⁸⁸

2. As you perhaps know, United Nations Division is now discussing with other Divisions concerned an outline for such a speech with a view, if possible, to securing an initial reaction from the Prime Minister before he leaves next week for Japan. On the basis of his comments, it would then be possible to complete the preparation of the draft for submission to the Prime Minister on his return from Japan, probably on November 2.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY DEBATE ON COLONIALISM

The General Assembly is scheduled to have a Plenary debate on colonialism possibly during the course of the next week. The Assembly has two agenda items which relate to the general question: the main one is the Soviet item entitled "The situation with regard to the implementation of the Declaration on the granting of independence to colonial countries and peoples." The Resolution of the fifteenth session is attached.†

2. Indications are that, in the Plenary discussion this year, the Assembly will be required to deal with several proposals. Already there are the Soviet proposals (a) calling for an end to all colonial régimes in 1962 and (b) establishing a standing commission to supervise the implementation of the Declaration. The Nigerians have been canvassing support for a resolution calling for a general target date of 1970 but this may not be satisfactory to other African states, which are looking for a shorter timetable. The Netherlands has submitted a resolution, for consideration under the Soviet item, which is designed to establish a kind of United Nations trusteeship for West New Guinea, but Indonesia has already expressed opposition to this. There may be other proposals as well.

3. The explanatory memorandum, submitted by the Soviet Union, sought to include in the discussion of colonialism: trusteeship matters; the affairs of the non-self-governing territories; questions like Angola, Goa, the Congo, Algeria, Bizerta, Kuwait, Oman, Aden, Puerto Rico, and South African racial policies. The Soviet Union apparently intends to fire a propaganda broadside, designed to do as much harm as possible to all the Western powers and their allies. In doing so, the Soviet Union will try to identify the attitude of the so-called "socialist countries" with that of the independent states of Asia, Africa and Latin America "in their joint struggle against colonialism and imperialism."

⁸⁸ Le premier ministre n'a pas proposé de résolution et n'a pas parlé de colonialisme à l'Assemblée générale en 1961. Il a toutefois annoncé, lors d'un discours prononcé à Toronto le 22 novembre, qu'il présenterait une résolution à cet égard l'année suivante. Voir "Canada to Attack Soviet Colonialism," Globe and Mail, November 23, 1961, pp. 1-2.

The Prime Minister did not propose a resolution or speak on colonialism at the General Assembly in 1961. However, he announced in a speech given in Toronto on November 22 that he would introduce such a resolution the next year. See "Canada to Attack Soviet Colonialism," Globe and Mail, November 23, 1961, pp. 1-2.

4. The hope is that the African-Asians can be encouraged to resist efforts by the Soviet Union to assume the leadership in the field of colonialism and that they will wish to attract support for proposals of their own, which presumably will be more moderate than those of the Soviet Union. The Nigerian proposal on a general target date is an indication in this direction.

5. There should be three main elements in the Western position on colonialism:

(a) The Western powers, as far as possible, should identify themselves with progressive policies for eliminating colonial régimes in the shortest possible time. Proposals for premature target dates, sanctions and conceivably the expulsion of South Africa and Portugal, however, [could] cause acute embarrassment to the West.

(b) The record of most Western powers in promoting independence in the colonial areas should be given the most favourable presentation. This will probably mean that South Africa and Portugal will be isolated.

(c) The Western powers should seek to expose Soviet motives in promoting unworkable proposals on colonialism and in appealing to the ideals of democratic procedures. The Declaration of the 15th session, which was initiated by the African-Asians, contains many clauses and phrases which can be employed effectively against the Soviet Union because of its subjugation of people in the Baltic states, the Ukraine, Central Asia and elsewhere.

6. Before the Assembly deals with concrete proposals, it will no doubt engage in a general debate on colonialism in which positions of principle can be fully explained. It will not be necessary in this general debate to deal with specific proposals and it may be undesirable to do so, because of the possibility that further proposals will be forthcoming before the proceedings on colonialism are completed. Any counter-attack against the Soviet Union could best be made during this general debate.

7. The experience of the past has been that Western attacks on Soviet colonialism have produced the following results:

(a) Either in exercise of their right to reply or on a point of order, Soviet bloc representatives have responded at once. They might, for example, try to persuade the President of the Assembly to rule remarks out of order; they might confine themselves to attacks on the speaker; they might advance counter-arguments.

(b) Representatives of uncommitted states might deplore Western efforts to turn the discussion on colonialism into a cold war debate. In the past, they have tended to concentrate unreasonably on the evils of traditional colonialism in Asia and Africa and to shrug off the Soviet Union's domination of subject people. The African-Asians might argue, as well, that attacks on the Soviet Union were designed primarily to evade the real issues of colonialism in which the Western powers are the real culprits.

8. In view of the foregoing, any attack on the Soviet Union should be combined with a clear recognition of African-Asian preoccupations about traditional colonialism and should be placed in the broad context of United Nations purposes and principles. The Assembly can be urged to apply these with equal force wherever the situation seems to demand their application.

9. A related factor is the impact of any sharp cold war debate on the tense Berlin situation. Sharp attacks on the Soviet Union during the debate on colonialism could increase the tension and would certainly alarm many of the uncommitted members, who will be seeking to avoid further aggravation of East-West relations.

10. Consistent with these considerations, a statement has been prepared for possible use in the General Debate on colonialism. The draft is attached for your approval.†

U.N. ASSEMBLY DEBATE ON COLONIAL INDEPENDENCE

The general debate on colonialism and on U.N. assistance to Africa, which has been proceeding this week, is expected to be completed on Friday morning and the debate on the resolutions would begin Friday evening. These include the Soviet resolution and the African-Asian resolution on the implementation of the colonial declaration, a Dutch and an Indian resolution on West New Guinea, and the Nigerian resolution on African independence.

2. Our Delegation has asked in their telegram 2833 of November 21, attached,† whether they should remove their name from the list for the general debate and whether, if we wish to intervene in the debate on colonialism, they should place our name on the list to speak on the African-Asian resolution.

3. Before answering their question, you will no doubt wish to consider our views on the African-Asian resolution and our probable vote on it.

4. I attach a copy of the African-Asian resolution (telegram 2817 of November 20).† Its principal proposal is the establishment of a seventeen-member committee, to be named by the President of the Assembly, which is to examine the application of the declaration on colonialism contained in UNGA resolution 1514 XV (for which Canada voted), and to make suggestions and recommendations on the progress and extent of its implementation. The Committee can decide its own procedures and may meet at places other than the U.N. headquarters, but only “in consultation with the appropriate authorities.”

5. The main difficulty for the administering powers in accepting the resolution will be the interpretation to be placed on the Committee’s powers of making recommendations – whether it will make detailed recommendations for specific territories and attempt to set target dates. The administering powers would naturally hope that it will restrict itself to general recommendations on the progress of colonial independence. Another unknown factor is the actual membership of the Committee of seventeen, which could greatly affect its usefulness.

6. The African-Asian resolution is, of course, greatly preferable to the Soviet resolution, which calls for a general 1962 target date, immediate elections in all colonial territories, removal of all military bases, etc., and which, it is to be hoped, will be defeated as was the Soviet colonial resolution last year. It will be all the more important, therefore, that the African-Asian resolution, by contrast, should have the widest possible support and it would be in Canada’s interest to vote in favour of it. If you decide that we should vote for the African-Asian resolution, it might be desirable for us to speak in the debate on the resolution before the vote is taken, in order to indicate our support, rather than to speak in explanation of vote. We could define in our statement the way in which we interpret the duties of the proposed Committee.

7. The Delegation has pointed out that if we speak in the debate on the African-Asian resolution rather than in the general debate, this would enable us to avoid speaking on the question of West New Guinea which has become a somewhat bitter issue.⁸⁹

8. If you agree, I attach a telegram to New York† for your approval suggesting that they should remove our name from the speakers list for the general debate and place it on the list to speak on the African-Asian resolution.⁹⁰

9. When in New York you may wish to discuss the African-Asian resolution with the Delegation, and a telegram suggesting lines for their statement could be prepared on your return, in the light of your discussion.

IMPLEMENTATION OF THE COLONIAL DECLARATION
SEVENTEEN-MEMBER COMMITTEE

The British Delegation has asked our Delegation in New York whether Canada would be interested in serving on the seventeen-member Committee which is to be nominated by the President of the General Assembly under Resolution 1654 (XVI) adopted in plenary on November 27.

2. As you know, the Committee is to examine the application of the Colonial Declaration, to make suggestions and recommendations on the progress and extent of its implementation, and to report to the General Assembly at its seventeenth session.

3. Our Delegation points out that the Committee will have to deal with forty-eight non-self-governing territories on which information is supplied to the United Nations (forty-one being British), Spanish Overseas Territories and South West Africa. The Committee will be the most important United Nations supervisory body dealing with colonial questions and its recommendations may be expected to carry great weight in the Assembly.

⁸⁹ La phrase « The Nigerian resolution on independence for Africa, with its 1970 target date, has run into considerable African and Asian opposition and its sponsors might not necessarily welcome too open Western support, » a été rayée par M. G. de T. Glazebrook, qui a écrit dans la marge : « This requires more detailed study of how we could best encourage a valuable resolution. »

A sentence reading "The Nigerian resolution on independence for Africa, with its 1970 target date, has run into considerable African and Asian opposition and its sponsors might not necessarily welcome too open Western support," was crossed out by G. de T. Glazebrook, who wrote in the margin, "This requires more detailed study of how we could best encourage a valuable resolution."

⁹⁰ Note marginale :/Marginal note:

Not sent. Discussion passed orally to PermisNY. R. C[ampbell] 23/11

4. Various combinations have been suggested for the choice of members, as set out in Candel New York's telegram 3125 attached,[†] and Canada might be chosen as one of the countries from America, or for a "floating seat."

5. For a number of reasons, Canada might be considered a desirable candidate for membership. We have no past history as a colonial power and have taken an active interest in colonial questions at the United Nations. We have good relations with the great majority of newly-independent states, many of whom might support our candidature. Equally, a number of the administering powers, particularly the British, would like to see us on the Committee. Finally, the Committee will cover a very important field and will have a serious and challenging task to which Canada could make a useful contribution.

6. On the other hand, there would be serious disadvantages for Canada in membership of such a committee. As a member, it would be necessary for us to take sides on many detailed questions affecting colonial territories administered by other Commonwealth countries. We might often find ourselves faced with a choice between offending either our closest allies or our friends among the newly-independent states. The usefulness of the Committee will depend to a great extent on the nature of its membership. If it is over-weighted with Soviet-bloc and other extreme "anti-colonial" representatives, its discussions will not be productive. The ideal slate envisaged by the United Kingdom (paragraph 2D of the attached telegram) is, as our Delegation points out, unlikely to be achieved.

7. In any competition for a floating seat, other moderates such as Ireland or one of the Scandinavians might have a better chance of election than Canada, particularly if several other Commonwealth countries are fairly certain of election. If Canada were nominated for an American seat, there could be objections to having both Canada and the United States occupying two of three seats allocated to America.

8. In view of the above considerations, I would suggest, if you agree, that the Delegation might be instructed to inform the British that we would not wish our name to be suggested for membership on the seventeen member Committee. We could also inform our own Delegation that if a strong pressure for Canada to accept membership on the Committee were to develop, we would be willing to reconsider our position.⁹¹

THE CHINA QUESTION AT THE 16TH SESSION
 OF THE UNITED NATIONS GENERAL ASSEMBLY

The United States Government, through its Embassy in Ottawa, has informed the Department of External Affairs of its thinking concerning the treatment of the China question at the 16th session of the General Assembly and has instructed its representatives here and in a number of countries to seek the reaction of the governments to which they are accredited to the approach which the United States is now considering.

CURRENT UNITED STATES VIEWS

The Moratorium

2. The United States has decided that the moratorium proposal – a procedural device which has prevented United Nations consideration of the China question for the past eleven years – would be unlikely to obtain a majority at this session. They have so informed the Nationalist Chinese, who have, with considerable reluctance, accepted the United States judgment in this regard. Accordingly, the moratorium will not be proposed at the 16th session.

3. At the same time, the United States is determined to preserve the voice of Nationalist China in the United Nations. It is opposed to any change of Chinese representation which would allow the Chinese Communists to take China's seat and cause the Nationalist Chinese to be expelled. Moreover, because of the strongly adverse reactions in Congress to reports that the administration was considering some form of "two-Chinas" solution, any thought of putting forward such a proposal has been abandoned – at least for the present.

Chinese Membership

4. The United States believes that the whole question of Chinese membership should be treated by the General Assembly as an "important" question within the meaning of Article 18 (2) of the Charter. In other words, decisions of the Assembly in relation to the China question should be made by a two-thirds majority of the members present and voting. Since questions of credentials are decided by simple majority vote, it follows that the United States cannot accept that the question of Chinese representation should be merely a matter of credentials.

5. Accordingly, the United States proposes to seek at an appropriate time in the General Debate on China a decision, which would be taken by a simple majority, that the China question is "important" and must be decided by a two-thirds vote. This is a primary objective of United States policy at the 16th session.

Study Group

6. In view of the importance of the China question and its implication for other important matters pending before the United Nations, the United States believes that a study group should be established by the Assembly to consider the whole question. This study group would look into the implications of changing Chinese representation in various United Nations organs, but especially the Security Council and the Economic and Social Council. Whether or not the terms of reference for the study group called for consideration of broader questions such as enlarging those Councils to bring about a more equitable geographical distribution in their composition, these questions would almost inevitably arise. The United States sees some advantage in such a broadening of the study. Various criteria governing membership in and the composition of the Councils might also have to be considered. Presumably, the study group would report to the 17th session of the General Assembly.

7. In essence, the United States position which is now being considered is that:

- (a) the moratorium should not be employed again;
- (b) the Chinese representational question is an "important" one requiring a two-thirds majority vote, not simply a credentials question to be decided by a simple majority, and
- (c) a study group should be established by the Assembly to consider the whole question of Chinese membership.

8. United States officials believe that there may be a considerable body of opinion at the United Nations which would support this approach. They recognize, however, that some member governments (the communists, and probably at least some of the uncommitted) would almost certainly argue that the real intent behind the two main moves was merely to delay the entry of the Chinese Communists – in other words, that it was a new form of moratorium.

9. There can be little doubt that one important immediate objective of the United States Government in this matter is in fact to gain time. It may well be that they hope their own public opinion would, as a result of such an international study of all the implications, become more reconciled to eventual acceptance of Communist Chinese representation in the United Nations, though continued representation from the government in Formosa would, of course, continue to be an important objective of United States policy.

10. The Assembly's decision in this matter would have a most important bearing on United States attitude toward the United Nations in the future. The United States takes the position, therefore, that the question is of sufficient importance domestically to warrant an insistence that the General Assembly not only treat the question as important but study it thoroughly before taking any decision involving a rearrangement of Chinese representation.

SUGGESTED CANADIAN REACTION

11. My assessment of the situation which is likely to arise in the General Assembly in relation to the China question is very similar to that of the United States. Certainly, there is no doubt about the conclusion that the moratorium is no longer a practical proposal and that it would be extremely risky to put it forward again at the 16th session. It seems a safe assumption that some of the governments, which in the past have either opposed the moratorium or abstained on it, would nonetheless agree that the China question should not be decided by a bare majority of the members. In other words, there are good reasons to believe that a move, either put forward by the United States or by one of its supporters, to have the China question treated as an "important" one would be supported by the required simple majority. Certainly, this seems to be an effort worth making.

12. The proposal for a study group can also be justified. The argument that this would be a delaying tactic is not as valid as it appears. If the Assembly had decided that a two-thirds majority was necessary to decide the China question, there would be some delay in any event because two-thirds of the members are not yet ready to take that decision. It would be wise and justifiable, a gain in any event, to provide suitable machinery for studying the question of Chinese membership in all its implications. The Soviet Union and others have insisted that proposals, like those for enlarging the Councils, cannot be dealt with until the question of Chinese representation has been resolved.

13. One real problem of forming a study group might be to reach agreement on its composition. This should not prove insurmountable, however. Quite obviously, the study group would have to be widely representative of the various geographical areas and power groupings. If such a study group could be established early in the 16th session, the pressure for increased representation on the Councils from the African-Asians should be eased somewhat, for it would be possible to say that the problems of enlarging the Councils and reallocating seats and determining a new basis for their composition would be fully considered by that study group.

14. Whether sufficient support could be attracted to this proposal for a study group is difficult to assess. The idea has been aired at United Nations Headquarters. The Swedish Mission, for example, has been canvassing opinions concerning it. It probably would not have the support of those who have been pressing strongly for a straight change of Chinese representation but they might be prepared in the end to go along with it since it would represent a considerable improvement over the stalemate of the past eleven years. Moreover, many delegations might wish to take some constructive step which would clear the ground for a final solution of this longstanding question which may be of vital significance for the future of the Organization.

15. The fundamental United States position is not too far removed from the Canadian policy on China, particularly as regards preserving some position in the United Nations for the Formosan authorities. There is plenty of opportunity for developing a respectable case for the two main proposals which the United States is considering. There is also room for hope that they will have the support of a sufficient majority of members. Accordingly, I recommend:

(a) that the United States Government be informed that we consider the course proposed by them is probably the best course to follow in present circumstances, that we would like to be kept informed as the proposals are developed, and that we would anticipate being able to give them what support we could;

(b) that we express this reaction not only to the United States Government but also to others who share our interest in the matter;

(c) that we suggest to the United States that steps be taken as soon as possible to concert positions of like-minded states and to attract the support of as many other United Nations members as can be persuaded to adopt the proposed course.

THE CHINA QUESTION AT THE 16TH SESSION
OF THE UNITED NATIONS GENERAL ASSEMBLY

Since my memorandum of August 30, 1961, the United States Government has approached Canada, Colombia, Ireland, Japan, Malaya, New Zealand, Nigeria and Norway with the suggestion that they jointly request the inscription of an item on the Agenda of the 16th Session of the General Assembly entitled "The Question of Chinese Representation." Co-sponsorship of an item for inscription does not necessarily entail the obligation to advance or co-sponsor subsequent resolutions, although this is generally so, and in this instance the United States hopes that in fact this would be the case.

2. United States representatives have told us that they consider the study group an essential element in obtaining agreement on a two-thirds majority, and see it as something more than just a blocking device to maintain the moratorium under another name. The United States would not itself be a member of the co-sponsoring group, but would expect to support inscription and to give "quiet support" during the subsequent substantive debate.

3. Indications are that Ireland and possibly Nigeria would not be prepared to co-sponsor inscription of an item on this question, that Colombia would, and that Japan, Malaya, New Zealand and Norway might be willing to co-sponsor, subject to the establishment of a sufficiently representative group and provided assurances of United States support can be obtained. So far, these conditions have not been met. Steps are, however, being taken to obtain clarification of the United States position and to clear up the remaining uncertainties about procedure and the composition and terms of reference of the proposed study group on Chinese representation.

4. Since this year there appears to be no possibility of avoiding a substantive debate, and since the advocates of the immediate seating of Communist China are likely to be active in pressing their case, I believe that a solution at this Session along the lines indicated in my memorandum of August 30 would be the best we could reasonably expect.

5. The questions for decision are, therefore, whether the Canadian delegation should be instructed:

(a) to consult with the United States and other delegations with a view to ultimate joint action;

(b) to co-sponsor a request for inscription of an item on Chinese representation and subsequently to co-sponsor resolutions on:

(i) having the Chinese representation issue designated (i) "an important question" requiring a two-thirds majority.

(ii) the establishment of a study group, provided that a broadly representative group of sponsors can be found.

THE CHINA QUESTION AT THE 16TH SESSION OF THE UNITED NATIONS GENERAL ASSEMBLY

Cabinet consideration of this item today concentrated only on the immediate problem of the United States approach to us and others as set out in the Supplement dated September 13. It resulted in a Cabinet decision that Canada should not become involved in the proposed middle power initiative on the ground that it was preferable on this issue to retain freedom of manoeuvre, which might be lost if we were associated with a United States-inspired initiative.

2. There was apparently a general inclination to have Canada go slow until more was known of the distance the United States was itself prepared to go in seeking a solution to the China problem. The decision of Cabinet amounted to an endorsement of the views expressed by the Minister himself.

3. The Minister has already telephoned this decision to Mr. Ritchie, and asked him to offer careful explanations to Mr. Stevenson, so worded as to make it clear that we appreciate fully the United States Government's wish to find a reasonable interim solution to the China question at the Assembly.

4. I shall endeavour to obtain from the Minister clarification of Cabinet's reaction to the two proposals in the main memorandum dated August 30, viz., that Canada support the idea that the China representation question is not simply one of credentials but an important one requiring a two-thirds majority, and that we favour the suggestion for the creation of a study group.

OF THE UNITED NATIONS GENERAL ASSEMBLY

Two items on Chinese representation in the United Nations have been inscribed on the agenda of the General Assembly. As the procedural device of the moratorium on discussion of the question has been abandoned, a substantive debate on these two items will take place in the Assembly, probably with a week or ten days. The purpose of this memorandum is to outline for the approval of Cabinet the general approach which I would propose to instruct the Canadian Delegation to follow in this debate.

Because opinions of member governments on this question are sharply divided – ranging as they do from the proposal for simple acceptance of Communist China’s credentials to the position of those who firmly oppose any seating of the Communist Chinese – the question is clearly a complex one which is not susceptible of easy solution. Between the two extreme positions, there are many who favour a so-called “Two-Chinas” – or more accurately a “One China and a One Taiwan” – solution, with United Nations representation for both Communists and Nationalists. This approach is, however, complicated by the fact that neither Peking nor Taipei is at present prepared to accept such a solution, since each administration claims to be the government of the whole of China.

In the past we have consistently maintained the right of the people of Taiwan to determine their own political future. We have also argued that the question of Chinese representation is a question of major political significance which should not be resolved by a simple rejection of Nationalist Chinese credentials in favour of Communist Chinese credentials.

It is politically important for a number of reasons, the most important of which are as follows:

- (a) The fate of eleven million people on Taiwan is at stake.
- (b) The issue continues to complicate relations between the Western powers and so many of their friends in Asia and Africa, while at the same time it acts as a focus of agreement for the latter and the Soviet bloc.
- (c) The fact that no solution to the question has been possible for the past twelve years is a measure of the importance attached to it by all interested parties.
- (d) There are strong United States Congressional feelings on the subject. Hasty and ill-considered action to seat the Communist Chinese representatives at the expense of the Chinese Nationalists, without preserving United Nations status for Taiwan, could result in a withdrawal or reduction of American support for the United Nations, including heavy financial contributions, which would effectively cripple the organization.

It also appears to us technically “important” within the meaning of the United Nations Charter, not only because it relates to representation in the General Assembly but also in the final analysis to the disposition of a permanent Security Council seat. To have the question of a change in Chinese representation declared “important” by the Assembly would require only a simple majority vote, but once the issue is designated as such, any change in Chinese representation would require the vote of two-thirds of those members present and voting. In essence, this procedure, which is favoured by the United States and a number of other countries, would prevent precipitate action simply to replace Chinese Nationalist with Chinese Communist representatives without preserving a place for Taiwan in the United Nations. This is the objective of all those countries, including Canada and our closest friends, which believe that Taiwan is entitled to self-determination and to representation in the United Nations.

Because an attempt to apply a two-thirds majority rule, without at the same time giving some indication of willingness to seek a compromise solution to the problem, would be construed by many governments as nothing more than the moratorium in another guise, a second step would be necessary to ensure progress towards a solution of the issue. To this end, a number of delegations, including the United Kingdom, the United States, Sweden, the Netherlands and some others, favour the establishment of a committee to thoroughly study all aspects of the question and to make specific recommendations for its solution to the 17th Session of the General Assembly. Provided countries like India, which recognize the Peking

Government, would be prepared to serve on such a committee, a number of advantages could be expected to follow, including:

(a) There would be more time for detailed consideration of a solution involving the seating of Communist Chinese representatives while preserving separate membership for Taiwan.

(b) Necessary time would be gained in which to prepare Congressional and public opinion in the United States for a change in Chinese representation, thereby helping to ensure continuing United States support for the United Nations.

(c) Because a number of countries, including Britain, the Netherlands, Norway, Denmark and Sweden, have made their support for a two-thirds majority rule in this case dependent to an important degree on the formation of a study committee and on American assurance that the latter would not be regarded as a device to delay action on Chinese representation, success of the first step of declaring the issue "important" is dependent upon the second step of establishing a study committee.

Because we recognize that the question is both complex and important, and because we have consistently upheld the principle of self-determination for Taiwan, I believe it is essential to avoid the adoption of simple solutions such as a vote on rival Chinese credentials, which is favoured by the U.S.S.R. and its supporters. Accordingly I would propose, with Cabinet approval, to instruct our delegation to the United Nations to take the following action:

(a) To support in debate and with our vote a resolution designed to have the question of a change in Chinese representation declared "important."

(b) To support in debate and with our vote a resolution to establish a special committee to study the question of Chinese representation in all its aspects and to make specific recommendations to the 17th Session.

(c) To consider accepting membership in the committee if asked, provided that a representative group of other countries will also agree to serve.

CHINESE REPRESENTATION IN THE UNITED NATIONS

The question of Chinese representation in the United Nations is unlikely to be discussed in plenary session before the end of November when it is estimated that the debate on colonialism should end. Whether it is discussed then or a week or more later, will depend largely upon the African delegations who are anxious to press on with consideration of the Angola report before the Chinese question. It is understood that the President of the Assembly wishes to insert the question of Chinese representation between colonialism and the Angola report. As yet the matter of timing has not been decided and it is clear that the Soviet delegation is not pressing for early consideration of its resolution on the Chinese question.

The present situation is that two items on Chinese representation have been inscribed on the agenda of the General Assembly, one requested by New Zealand and one by the Soviet Union. In addition, the Soviet delegation has submitted a draft resolution in the following terms:

“The General Assembly,

Considering it necessary to restore the lawful rights of the People’s Republic of China in the United Nations,

Bearing in mind that only representatives of the Government of the People’s Republic of China are competent to occupy China’s place in the United Nations and all its organs,

Resolves to remove immediately from all United Nations organs the representatives of the Chiang Kai-shek clique who are unlawfully occupying the place of China in the United Nations,

Invites the Government of the People’s Republic of China to send its representatives to participate in the work of the United Nations and of all its organs.”

The United States has been working behind the scenes in an effort to obtain sponsors for two resolutions, one seeking to have the question of a change in Chinese representation declared “important” within the meaning of Article 18 (2) of the Charter, thereby requiring a two-thirds majority vote to effect a change, and the other seeking the establishment of a committee to study the question of Chinese representation and to report to the General Assembly at its 17th Session. Initially, they wished the committee to also study “related questions,” such as enlargement of the Security and Economic and Social Councils, and “to report with recommendations for their resolution” to the 17th Session. At present they appear to be willing to drop “related questions” and “recommendations” in favour of simply studying the Chinese representational question and reporting to the next Assembly session.

On the basis of a survey of delegations at the UN it now appears that the United States will be able to find sponsors for the “importance” resolution and should be able to muster sufficient votes to achieve acceptance of the two resolutions it favours which will require only simple majorities (although it is argued by some delegations that if a change in Chinese representation is “important,” the establishment of a committee to study the question must also be “important,” requiring a two-thirds majority vote). Barring unforeseen shifts, it is estimated that at least 60 delegations, and possibly up to 65, would vote to declare the question of a change in Chinese representation “important.” Included amongst those who would probably vote affirmatively are at least 15 Latin American, 16 African, 18 Commonwealth, USA and West European, and 10 Asian and Middle Eastern countries. A similar degree of support is probable for the establishment of a study committee, although there would likely be one or two fewer possible votes. The Soviet resolution seems destined to obtain a maximum of 20 affirmative votes and will therefore be defeated.

There are, however, serious misgivings about the establishment of a committee, even amongst those who would vote for the “importance” resolution and who could probably be persuaded to vote for the committee. These misgivings have been reflected in the Americans’ inability to date to discover any delegations which would be willing to sponsor a resolution to establish a committee, primarily because of genuine doubts about the committee’s ability to accomplish anything beyond delaying a solution to the question. Even if sponsors for this resolution are found, it will be still more difficult to find a broadly representative group of committee members. In particular, it will be difficult, if not impossible, to persuade countries like India or Poland, which already recognize the Peking régime, to serve on the committee. A further obstacle is the Americans’ insistence that the committee should reflect the current United Nations situation as regards those who recognize the Communist Chinese government, those who recognize the Nationalist Chinese government and those who recognize neither, i.e. they assert that it should be on a 6 - 4 - 2 basis. Finally, even if the foregoing obstacles are overcome, it is arguable whether or not such a committee could develop any useful recommendations to resolve the question of Chinese representation.

There are rumours (as yet unsubstantiated) to the effect that a “neutralist” resolution seeking the seating of Communist Chinese representatives will be proposed in place of the Soviet resolution which seems assured of defeat. Such a resolution, if couched in reasonable terms, would probably attract close to 40 votes or more but, in the face of the American proposals mentioned earlier, could not be successful at the present session.

Whatever the final outcome of all these possible manoeuvres, it appears to be certain that Communist Chinese representatives will not replace Nationalist Chinese representatives at the present session. It also appears that adequate support is assured for American efforts to have the question declared “important.” The fate of the committee idea is less certain and it seems that the Americans will not be particularly unhappy if it does not succeed. The net effect will be a delay in resolving the question for another year. However, if this is the case, it may well hasten a decision on Chinese representation on a simple credentials basis – probably at the 17th Session of the United Nations General Assembly.⁹²

THE PROGRAMME FOR CO-OPERATIVE FALLOUT STUDIES

This memorandum contains the most recent information about the programme for co-operative fallout studies which was initiated by the General Assembly in 1959.

2. As you know, Burma, Malaya, Ghana and Pakistan have indicated their desire to co-operate with Canada in the analysis of certain samples for radioactivity. All four have been in touch with the appropriate Canadian authorities about the methods for collecting and transporting these samples. This has involved considerable correspondence through diplomatic channels but in recent weeks, as part of the administrative arrangements for the programme, the authorities both in Canada and in the other four countries have begun to communicate directly. Since the final administrative arrangements are nearly completed, the actual programme is expected to begin shortly.

3. The Department of National Health and Welfare has completed its arrangements in Canada, having assembled the necessary equipment and trained personnel. The Canadian authorities are anxiously awaiting the arrival of the first samples and they have been offering advice to the other four countries about collecting methods and apparatus.

4. Arrangements with Pakistan were completed rather more quickly than those with the other countries but arrangements with all four are now well in hand. The Canadian laboratory should soon be dealing with samples of soil, food and bone collected in the other countries participating in the programme.

Canadian officials responsible for implementing this initiative are also pleased with the effect that the resolution adopted during the 14th Session has had on the amount of attention being given to radiation problems internationally. In Canada, the National Research Council Associate Committee on Radiation Biology has since been established in order that the biological effects of radiation might be more thoroughly studied. While parallel interest has been stimulated in other countries there has also been increased attention given to physical measurement of radiation samples. In addition, there has been a marked increase in the number of member countries supplying the United Nations with data on fallout levels.

In response to the resolution adopted during the 14th Session, at least twelve other nations (United Kingdom, Australia, France, Norway, Belgium, Sweden, Denmark, Japan, Israel, USSR, Argentina, Italy), the International Atomic Energy Agency and the World Health Organization have made offers similar to that of Canada to test samples for radio-activity that are sent in to them. A similar offer was made in 1956 by the United States.

An incidental benefit to Canada has been that, because of the demands of the programme for laboratory staff and facilities, we are now extremely well equipped to carry on work of this nature, both for cooperating nations and for Canada itself.

UNSCLEAR: CANADIAN RESOLUTION ON RADIATION

On October 11, Mr. Armstrong of the United States Embassy called on me to discuss the Canadian draft resolution which the Delegation intends to submit to the Special Political Committee when the UNSCEAR item is being discussed. Mr. Armstrong said that the Canadian draft had been the subject of discussion between the United States Delegation and our own. The United States has made certain suggestions for revising the Canadian draft which are contained in the attached draft, which Mr. Armstrong left with me.

2. Mr. Armstrong made three points in commenting on the Canadian draft:

(a) The United States authorities objected to the scientific judgements contained in the first two preambular paragraphs of the Canadian draft. In other words, they did not like the relating of the resumption of nuclear weapons testing to the sharp increases in levels of radioactive fallout nor the thought that the Assembly should be "convinced" that prolonged exposure to increasing levels constituted a growing threat to this and future generations. The United States draft simply expresses concern about the prolonged exposure to increasing levels.

(b) The United States was opposed to the first operative paragraph of the Canadian draft, which contains the declaration that no state has a right to take action known to have harmful biological consequences and calls upon all member states to conduct themselves accordingly as regards action by them that would increase the levels of radioactive fallout. In the United States view, this paragraph would inject a most controversial issue of a political nature into the debate and an issue which could be more appropriately dealt with in the First Committee debate on nuclear weapons testing. The United States is concerned about the possibility that a sharp political debate on radiation might adversely affect the work of UNSCEAR. Paragraph 3 of the United States draft, which expresses the belief that all member states have a responsibility and a duty concerning actions that have harmful biological consequences, is intended as a substitute for our first operative paragraph.

(c) The United States did not consider it practical to request from UNSCEAR an interim report on the increased level of radioactive fallout. Instead, UNSCEAR should be encouraged to complete its forthcoming comprehensive report.

3. I explained to Mr. Armstrong that the Canadian draft was being discussed with a number of Delegations in New York and that some changes had already been made. I referred to the revisions, contained in telegram 2166 of October 10 from the Canadian Delegation,† inviting the World Meteorological Organization to examine urgently the feasibility of extending its present meteorological reporting system to include measurements of atmospheric radioactivity. Although paragraph 9 of the United States draft suggests alternative wording, Mr. Armstrong had the impression that this part of the resolution did not give rise to any difficulty in Washington.

4. My understanding is that the Canadian Delegation has been consulting energetically with a number of delegations and that, as a result, some additional revisions to the original text have been proposed (telegrams 2177 and 2178 of October 11.)‡ While some of these changes tend to meet the objections raised by the United States, other paragraphs may still be considered objectionable, in particular the re-draft of paragraphs 1 and 4 (as designated in telegrams 2178). There may be some additional revision before the draft resolution is tabled. It seems to me that we shall have to leave the details to the Delegation, who will no doubt be consulting with you and with the Department as the matter develops.

5. Mr. Armstrong asked that the United States comments be brought to your attention. You may wish to take them into consideration when reacting to suggestions for revision received from the Delegation. The draft prepared by the United States seems too weak for our purposes, especially in view of the concern in Canada and elsewhere about the recent increase in radioactive fallout. However, we may be able to make some concessions to the United States viewpoint. This can best be left to our Delegation, who are keeping in touch with their United States colleagues in New York.

6. If you agree, you may wish to approve the attached telegram to the Canadian Delegation, informing them about the United States approach here.

CONFIDENTIAL. OPIMMEDIATE.

16TH UNGA: ITEM 24 – UNSCEAR REPORT

On October 11, Armstrong of the USA Embassy called on the Under-Secretary to express USA reservations about the Canadian draft resolution and to leave with us a USA draft which he understood had been given to you by USA delegation. USA objected mainly to the first preambular paragraph, the use of “convinced” in the second preambular paragraph and to the first operative paragraph. Armstrong explained that the USA was worried about the possibility that a sharp political debate on the UNSCEAR report might not only upset the scientific work of UNSCEAR but would cut across the debate in the First Committee concerning the items on nuclear tests. The USA also considered it impractical to request from UNSCEAR an early interim report.

2. I assume that you have been discussing the draft with the USA delegation among others and that you are aware of USA preoccupations. They may be met by the suggested revisions contained in your telegram 2177 of October 11 which I have approved. It will probably be impossible, however, to remove all USA misgivings because some of them relate to interests which do not correspond to our own in this matter. For this reason, I consider the USA draft handed us by Armstrong too weak for Canadian purposes. I expect that you will be keeping in touch with USA opinion about the draft resolution as it develops in the next few days.

RADIATION RESOLUTION

The Delegation has reported that the draft resolution was submitted to the Secretariat today at 5:00 p.m. There were 19 co-sponsors as follows: Argentina, Austria, Bolivia, Brazil, Canada, Chile, Costa Rica, Denmark, Ecuador, Guatemala, Japan, Iran, New Zealand, Norway, Pakistan, Panama, Spain, Tunisia and Uruguay. The resolution will be United Nations Document A/SPC/L69. The following countries may add their names to the sponsorship during the week-end: Philippines, Ireland, Netherlands, Malaya and Sweden. Although the African states have been canvassed thoroughly, none has yet agreed to co-sponsor. In particular, Nigeria seemed primarily interested in its own proposal concerning target dates.

2. Late this afternoon, Senator Brooks held a press conference to distribute and explain the text of the resolution. The United Nations Document will appear in five languages tomorrow morning. The debate will begin at 3:00 p.m. on Monday and Canada is inscribed to speak first.

3. Czechoslovakia earlier today submitted a draft resolution (A/SPC/L68) containing three paragraphs: taking note of the report of UNSCEAR; welcoming the progress in its work; and urging it to complete its second comprehensive report in 1962. The Delegation estimate is that this Czech move will not adversely affect the Canadian initiative.

4. All the indications are that the United States, the United Kingdom and other Western powers are quite relaxed about the present text of our resolution. There are signs of wide-spread support for it.

RESOLUTION ON THE EFFECTS OF ATOMIC RADIATION

The Canadian resolution on the hazards of atomic radiation having been adopted by the General Assembly will now be entering the implementing stage. While the proposal is no longer in Canadian hands, Canada through its membership in the United Nations Scientific Committee on the Effects of Atomic Radiation and its participation in the work of the World Meteorological Organization will have occasion to exert some influence on the course of action which is now expected to be taken on the resolution.

2. With particular reference to the implementation of Part II of the resolution requesting W.M.O. to consider the feasibility of extending its present meteorological reporting system to include the transmission of data on radioactivity, collected on a world-wide basis, we understand that the first steps will be as follows. The text of the resolution may now already have been transmitted by the United Nations Secretariat to the Secretary-General of W.M.O., who will then request in the very near future the Organization's Panel of experts on Radioactive Debris to carry out a complete evaluation of the feasibility of the General Assembly's recommendation. The panel will be required to carry out a full study of the synoptic reporting scheme in all its technical details seeking advice from U.N.S.C.E.A.R., and from the International Atomic Energy Agency on such questions as the type of instruments to be used to measure radioactivity, and measuring standards. In view of the complexity of this task it is important that the Panel be encouraged to start its work as soon as possible.

3. Following this study the Panel will make recommendations to the Executive Committee of W.M.O., based on its evaluation of the technical feasibility of the scheme. Assuming that the Panel will make a positive recommendation to the Executive Committee and unless there were concerted opposition to the scheme in the Executive Committee itself, member countries of W.M.O. would then be requested to undertake the monitoring of radioactivity in accordance with prescribed standards and transmit this information according to a predetermined timetable on the W.M.O. reporting network.

4. To facilitate the implementation of the scheme in underdeveloped countries, it would then probably be necessary for the more advanced member states of the Organization to offer to make available the instrumentation and technical advice required for monitoring radioactive fallout to countries not adequately equipped. At a later stage, it may thus be desirable for Canada to offer financial and technical assistance to countries which may be unable to accede to W.M.O.'s request because of financial considerations.

5. Canada is not represented on the W.M.O. Panel on Radioactive Debris, but Mr. McTaggart-Cowan, Director, Meteorological Services, Department of Transport, and Canadian representative in W.M.O., is a member of the Executive Committee. We have been discussing with Mr. McTaggart-Cowan the steps which Canada might take to ensure that the General Assembly's proposal will be given diligent and sympathetic consideration by the W.M.O. Panel of experts and the Executive Committee. As a first step we intend, if you agree, to authorize Mr. McTaggart-Cowan to write to the Secretary-General of W.M.O. and ask for his confirmation that the Panel on Radioactive Debris will soon be undertaking its study of the proposal. Mr. McTaggart-Cowan has also offered to keep in close touch with his counterparts in the United States Weather Office to encourage them to play an active role in the Panel on Radioactive Debris to ensure that the General Assembly's proposal receives early and positive attention.

6. In addition, we will be instructing Canadian Missions in those friendly countries which have representatives on the Panel on Radioactive Debris as well as on the W.M.O. Executive Committee, to discuss with these officials the implementation of the synoptic reporting scheme with a view to stimulating their interest in and encouraging prompt and positive action on this proposal. We shall also keep Canadian Missions in New York and Geneva fully informed of subsequent developments to enable them to keep in touch with officials concerned with the implementation of the scheme in the United Nations and the W.M.O. Secretariats.⁹³

PROGRESS REPORT ON THE IMPLEMENTATION OF THE UNITED NATIONS
GENERAL ASSEMBLY'S PROPOSAL FOR A WORLD-WIDE SYNOPTIC REPORTING SCHEME ON ATMOSPHERIC RADIOACTIVE LEVELS
UNDER THE WORLD METEOROLOGICAL ORGANIZATION

This memorandum reviews recent developments concerning the implementation of the proposal in the General Assembly's radiation resolution for the establishment of a world-wide synoptic reporting scheme on radioactive levels under the World Meteorological Organization, which have taken place since our last report to you on this subject.

2. Dr. P.D. McTaggart-Cowan, Director, Meteorological Branch, Department of Transport, and Permanent Canadian Representative on the Executive Committee of the World Meteorological Organization has been in constant communication with the Secretariat of the World Meteorological Organization's as well as with his United States colleague on the Organization's Executive Committee with a view to stimulating prompt and positive action on the study of the feasibility of the programme as called for in the General Assembly's resolution. The Secretariat of the World Meteorological Organization has already taken encouraging steps along these lines. A meeting has taken place in the latter part of November between officials of the Organization's Secretariat and of the Secretariats of United Nations Scientific Committee on the Effects of Atomic Radiation and the International Atomic Energy Agency as a result of which a course of action was set to ensure that an early start is made on the study of the proposal's technical feasibility.

3. On November 27, the Secretary-General of the World Meteorological Organization addressed a letter to all members of the Organization's Executive Committee outlining his plan

⁹³ Note marginale :/Marginal note:

OK. Push this ahead just as fast as possible. H.C. G[reen] 2/11 of action and requesting their comments. This plan calls for the early preparation by the Organization's Secretariat of a draft reporting scheme which will shortly be sent to the five members of the Organization's Panel of Experts on Atomic Energy (USA, Britain, France, The Soviet Union and India) and to the Presidents of the Organization's Technical Commissions, for their early comments. When these comments are received and a detailed plan for the scheme has been approved, the President of the Organization will decide in the light of comments received from the members of the Executive Committee on the further action required for the final approval and implementation of this scheme on behalf of the World Meteorological Organization.

4. The Canadian Representative on the Executive Committee has already replied to a letter dated November 27 from the Secretary-General of the Organization. Dr. McTaggart-Cowan has strongly endorsed the course of action proposed by the Secretariat of the Organization and supported the idea that the President of W.M.O. be empowered to decide on the early implementation of this scheme if the response he receives from members of the Executive Committee indicate a clear majority support for the plan. If on the other hand, the Executive Committee is divided on the feasibility of the proposal or if the preparation of the detailed plan by the Panel of Experts and the Technical Commission is delayed it will be necessary to wait until the next meeting of the Executive Committee scheduled for the Spring of 1962, to obtain a final decision on the proposal.

5. We have instructed Canadian Missions accredited to those countries which have nationals as members of the Executive Committee and the Panel of Experts of the Organization, to establish early contacts with these individuals to obtain their personal reaction to the General Assembly's proposal. As these individuals act in their personal rather than their official capacity in the World Meteorological Organization, it would be undesirable at this stage for Canada to make formal representations with their respective governments. This question however may have to be considered further depending on the results of the survey of opinion among individuals concerned which is now being undertaken by some fifteen of our missions abroad.

6. We shall report further on the progress of the action taken by the Secretariat of the World Meteorological Organization as well as on the results of the survey we have undertaken as soon as further significant developments occur.⁹⁴

UNEF – POLICY RE WITHDRAWAL

You may recall that since February 1960 we have been endeavouring to have an understanding with the U.N. Secretariat concerning the position of the U.N. Emergency Force in the Middle East in case of large scale hostilities. Our purpose in these discussions has been two-fold:

(a) to establish that in such a case the Force would not engage in combatant activities and that the U.N. Secretariat would have the responsibility of deciding whether a withdrawal would be warranted.

(b) to determine what plans, if any, have been prepared in case it is considered necessary to re-deploy or withdraw the Force.

2. In conversations with Mr. Bunche and Mr. Hammarskjöld, Mr. Ritchie was able to reach a satisfactory verbal understanding on point (a).⁹⁵ It was also established that plans for eventual withdrawal had been prepared by General Burns when he was Commander-in-Chief of the Force. These plans have been left, reportedly, with General Burns' successor. We do not know, however, whether General Gyani has considered them. On our instructions, Mr. Ritchie set forth the Canadian viewpoint in a formal letter to Mr. Hammarskjöld on January 5, 1961.† The late Secretary-General, however, had not sent any reply at the time of his death.

3. In the attached letter No. 791 of October 31, 1961,† our Ambassador in Cairo reports that neither the Chief of Staff of General Gyani nor the Commandant of the Canadian contingent at Gaza have any knowledge of plans for a withdrawal in case of an emergency. Mr. Ford does not anticipate any serious outbreak in the UNEF area in the near future, but he pointed out that the general feeling in Gaza was that the situation was somewhat more fluid than a few months ago and that there was always a danger of serious incidents occurring. Mr. Ford was told that in case of an emergency the situation of the RCAF at El Arish would be particularly difficult.

4. We have sent a copy of Mr. Ford's letter to our mission in New York with a request to take up the matter either with Mr. Bunche or the new Secretary-General as soon as Mr. Ritchie considers that an approach would be opportune. The appointment of a new Secretary-General would make it even more desirable to reach a formal understanding on the position of the Force, in case of an emergency. We realize, however, that it might not be possible for our mission to raise the matter in the midst of the current Session, especially since Mr. U. Thant has had little time to become acquainted with this matter.⁹⁶

UNEF – POLICY RE WITHDRAWAL

CCOS has suggested that following points be discussed with General Gyani.

(a) Remembering the strength of UNEF, CCOS feel that any plan which calls for the defence of the UNWRA depots would have little chance of success against the type of force likely to be employed by either side.

(b) The majority of the UNEF base camps are located on the main roads. For this reason, they will most likely be involved in the early stages in any fighting. Again, because of the size of our force, the successful defence of these bases is a questionable operation. CCOS feel that consideration should therefore be given to evacuation of the bases very soon after hostilities have started with personnel being directed to assembly points.

(c) In deciding how to evacuate troops after the outbreak of hostilities, it should be remembered that the airfields at El Arish and Gaza may not be useable and air evacuation, from those fields at least, may not be feasible. Consideration should therefore be given to evacuation by air from alternative fields or by sea over the beaches.

2. The above points are based on the understanding that UNEF was only intended to secure and supervise the cessation of hostilities and was in no sense to be considered a buffer force between the two belligerents if active operations commenced. The force is therefore only able to defend itself against small marauding groups.

3. You may wish to keep in mind points raised in our telegram DL-532 of May 18, 1960⁹⁷ and in your letter of January 5, 1961 to the Secretary-General.

UNEF – POLICY RE WITHDRAWAL

Accompanied by Barton and Speedie I saw General Gyani yesterday. We had a useful and reassuring discussion which I think covered all points which have been concerning us.

2. Gyani started by confirming our understanding of position of UNEF as covered in discussion with Mr. Hammarskjöld in June 1960 (our telegram 858 June 28, 1960 refers).⁹⁸ Gyani agreed that (a) force is intended only to secure and supervise cessation of hostilities and can therefore in no repeat no circumstances be considered as capable of undertaking an active combat role; (b) withdrawal of force should be considered only in event of large-scale hostilities which render it incapable of discharging functions assigned to it without undue physical risk; (c) ultimate responsibility for any decision to withdraw or to curtail functions of force either because of large-scale hostilities or of changing conditions rests with UN acting through Security Council or General Assembly; and (d) as long as force remains in being UN are primarily responsible for its safety.

3. Gyani also agreed that (a) there can be no repeat no question of unilateral withdrawal of components of force in any emergency involving force; and (b) in event of large-scale hostilities Secretary-General would take necessary measures for safety of force through consultation with UNEF Advisory Committee and, if necessary advise Security Council or General Assembly on need for withdrawal or otherwise.

4. Gyani said that UNEF can carry out its functions only with cooperation and assistance of Egypt and Israel and that in event of hostilities UNEF could not repeat not stop belligerents by military intervention. On other hand any sign from UNEF that it was contemplating withdrawal as a result of heightened tension between Israel and Egypt might precipitate hostilities. For this reason preliminary withdrawal measures that were obvious to potential belligerents must be avoided until last moment.

5. It is General Gyani's opinion that if hostilities did break out any attempt to withdraw UNEF during initial moves of belligerents would involve grave risks. With exception of RCAF detachment at El Arish he considered that force is not repeat not in a likely battle area and that it would be better for his troops to "sit it out" until battle had moved one way or other rather than to take risk of moving through a confused battle area.

6. His plan of action in event of hostilities takes into account requirements of accommodation, communications and water for force. He envisages some five areas for concentration. These include Rafah and "keeps" for non combatant personnel. He has approximately five battalions available and these would be deployed as follows: (a) two battalions for defence of vital points; (b) one battalion for defence of Rafah installations; (c) one and one half battalions in camps as a reserve force. He has eight armoured cars and these would be employed in a liaison role and for communications with belligerents. Because of their location and number he does not repeat not consider that UNRWA dumps could be defended.

This seems to be an error for Permis New York telegram 855 of July 2, 1960. See Volume 27, document 124.

7. Since El Arish is a military target area he envisages moving RCAF detachment to Beirut at outset of hostilities. If air field at Gaza is useable air detachment could be used between Beirut and Gaza for supply purposes and if necessary evacuation. Otherwise in event that evacuation is necessary reliance would have to be placed on withdrawal of force by sea. Only source of shipping for this purpose would seem to be USN 6th fleet. Beaches have been surveyed and this information could be made available to beach landing force as soon as required.

8. A coordinated plan and operation order taking into account various contingencies is now in existence at UNEF headquarters. Stocks or wire emergency food supplies petrol etc. are on hand and additional water containers have been ordered.

9. General Gyani said he felt that so long as he kept his force concentrated and did not repeat not get in way of opposing forces there should not repeat not be too much danger of being caught up in military action. He was more concerned about danger of uncontrolled mobs. He said that original plan had called for concentration of whole force at Rafah but that he had come to conclusion that there was insufficient water supplies available there for whole force and for this reason he modified plan slightly to provide for establishment of "keeps" referred to above.

10. Gyani said that morale of UNEF forces was high and he was obviously very proud of his command. He seemed quite confident that they could look after themselves in event of trouble.

Mr. S.C.H. Nutting, Department of External Affairs, Visitors:

Dr. John H. Davis, Director of UNRWA,
Mr. Sherwood Moe, UNRWA Liaison Officer, New York.

2. On the invitation of the Chairman, Dr. Davis opened with a statement dealing at length with UNRWA's programme for the education and training of young refugees.

3. He described the basis for UNRWA's decision to continue relief at the 1960 level in order to free his funds for vocational and technical education. In a sense this meant concentrating on helping young people while ignoring old people and adults. Natural increases in the refugee population will require an increase in spending on relief of about $4 million over the next three years. The planned increase in secondary education will cost an additional $4 million over the same period. An extra $8 million, however, will go towards the advancement of young people, in the form of increased facilities and a doubling of the number of university scholarships. The small loan programme will continue but will be limited by the amount of funds not otherwise committed.

3. Among the projects recently completed, or in the course of construction, two owe their establishment to the shipments of Canadian wheat in connection with World Refugee Year which have allowed UNRWA to divert budgetary funds to training programmes. The first is the Vocational Training Centre for Boys which will open in Lebanon in September 1961. The remainder of the Canadian gift has been devoted to the Teacher Training Center for girls, which, combined with a Vocational Training Centre will open in Jordan in 1962.

4. Dr. Davis informed the meeting that the construction part of his programme was going ahead according to schedule. He explained, however, that in order to keep up the rate of progress he had to take what he regarded as a justifiable risk. UNRWA income necessarily lagged behind the expanded programme and he had decided to reduce his working capital and reserve funds to a minimum in order to provide the money for construction.

5. Dr. Davis considered that UNRWA's prestige and the acceptance of the Agency by the host countries had improved. Although the training programme provides only an oblique solution to the refugee problem, UNRWA's main importance was the stability it helped maintain in the area. A political solution to the problem of the refugees could not be forced on the area – and indeed was not necessarily the sole answer. A solution could be obtained only by the play of long term forces. These could operate best in an atmosphere of stability and this it was UNRWA's aim to provide. He mentioned the improvement that would necessarily occur in the acceptability of the refugees in the course of a considerable improvement in economic development in the Middle East.

6. In answer to questions put to him following his statement Dr. Davis explained why it was essential to go ahead with vocational and technical training of youths. He pointed out the super-saturation of the agricultural and handskill labour market and recited the complete success that UNRWA graduates had had in obtaining jobs both in the area and as far off as Libya (which had received 200 teachers trained by UNRWA). He was certain that 2,500 UNRWA graduates, his annual target figure, could be absorbed and he referred in particular to the possibilities within Syria's economic development programme.

7. UNESCO's assistance was valuable since it created such a high standard of training. This was an important influence on the host countries as well as increasing the acceptability of UNRWA graduates. Insofar as the possibility of UN Technical Assistance supplanting UNRWA's training, however, the problem was that aid given by the UN to the host countries would not filter past the needs of the people of these countries: the refugees would have lowest priority and would get nothing.

8. In referring to national attitudes towards UNRWA, Dr. Davis mentioned the reluctance of Lebanon to accept any refugees, even if employment were available. Jordan was somewhat half-hearted, but Syria was the best country in this way. Contrary to indications that have been given, refugees could and did leave the Gaza strip.

9. He also devoted some time to countering the thought that an enforced closing down of UNRWA would solve the refugee problem and to explaining why emigration to Europe or the Americas was not a feasible proposition. On the first his thesis was that not only governments, but also the people of the Arab states were determined never to recognize the continuance of Israel as an independent state. This is an important factor in the Arab refusal to help eliminate the refugee problem by absorbing the refugees and the refusal itself goes far deeper than governments in that it springs from an attitude of the peoples concerned. As for emigration, Dr. Davis believes that the old people and the young adults provide virtually insuperable problems of rehabilitation. The trained youths although offering adaptability, were needed in the Middle East. Moreover, mainly the refugees were Moslems and naturally preferred to live in Moslem communities.

10. With regard to the rationalization of the relief rolls Dr. Davis described the family or tribal justice which prevented malnutrition even though 125,000 refugee children were not on the rolls. He said that 40,000 names had been taken off the rolls in the last ten years, but that an additional 90,000 names should be removed. Nevertheless, UNRWA calculated that a full revision of the list would increase the number of refugees by a net figure of 30,000 to 40,000. He commented on a law under consideration by Jordan to make illegal the holding of refugee cards by third persons. This, if it is passed, will make it possible for UNRWA to take effective action against trafficking in these cards.

11. Dr. Davis, referring to Canada's assistance to UNRWA, had said that UNRWA could use a donation from Canada like that given last year (i.e. $500,000 in cash, $1.5 million special grant in the form of wheat flour and $1 million in wheat flour in connection with World Refugee Year). In closing, he expressed his gratitude for his warm welcome, and reiterated his optimism regarding the usefulness of UNRWA's programme as a factor creating stability in the Middle East.

[Ottawa], August 21, 1961

USE BY UNRWA OF CANADIAN CONTRIBUTION IN CONNEXION WITH WORLD REFUGEE YEAR

In telegram 94 of August 8, 1961, of which a copy is attached for your information,† the Canadian Chargé d'Affaires in Lebanon has informed us that the second vocational training centre to be paid for by the Canadian gift to UNRWA in connexion with World Refugee Year will be located in Homs, Syria.

2. The cornerstone of the first "Canadian" centre, Sibliin Vocational Training Centre for men near Sidon, Lebanon, was laid on June 15. We have grounds for believing that construction of the centre at Homs has already begun. We have no word, however, concerning the Vocational and Teacher Training Centre for women in Jordan, which is to be the third project, the costs of which will be shared with the United Kingdom.

3. In letting the Embassy in Beirut know that Homs had been chosen as the site for the second centre, the Director of UNRWA also said that he had received an unexpected gift of $500,000 from the United States of America. Since the USA has so far contributed no "bricks and mortar" to UNRWA's construction programme Dr. Davis asked if Canada would agree to allow the United States a 50 percent share in the Centre at Homs. This would mean that one-half of the Canadian gift earmarked for this centre would be directed towards the general fund, as would, of course, 50 percent of the US contribution. Dr. Davis said that if there were any objection whatsoever on the part of Canada he would withdraw his suggestion and consign the US contribution to the general fund.

4. It occurs to me that Dr. Davis' query raises once again the problem of obtaining credit for the gift made by Canada. This problem was brought to your attention in a memorandum of September 9, 1960, when it appeared likely that the credit for Sibliin Vocational Training Centre might be shared with Germany from which a relatively minor contribution had been obtained. At that time, while approving the idea of a "Canadian" centre in Syria, you agreed with the recommendation that the Canadian contribution should bear a Canadian label.

5. The fact that the Canadian gift to UNRWA in connection with World Refugee Year was made without conditions as to its use suggests that Dr. Davis is free to dispose of the counterpart funds produced by the million dollars worth of wheat in the best interests of UNRWA, as he sees them. Although Sibliin Vocational Training Centre cannot be identified as Canadian through its name, the UNRWA representative at the laying of the cornerstone took pains to announce the Canadian identity of the school and Dr. Davis has said that a plaque will be placed within the school to indicate that the Canadian Government and private citizens gave the buildings and equipment.

6. It would seem to me that we cannot hope for superior treatment in regard to the school at Homs and, following this line of thought, there would seem to be little point in offering any objection to sharing the school with the United States.⁹⁹ In any case all the centres will be joint ventures in the sense that the land is being provided by the government or by private individuals in the country concerned and the school in Jordan, yet to be built, will be a joint venture with the United Kingdom.

7. If you agree, therefore, I shall see that Dr. Davis is told that we accept his suggestion but that in the dedication of the school at Homs emphasis must be placed on the humanitarian interest in the welfare of the refugees shared by Canada and the United States, rather than on any aspect of political cooperation or joint political interest in the problems of the Middle East. Further, I think we might ask Dr. Davis to devote the unspent portion of the Canadian gift to the operating expenses of the three "Canadian" centres.

[Ottawa], September 7, 1961

CONFIDENTIAL

CANADIAN CONTRIBUTION TO THE UNITED NATIONS RELIEF
AND WORKS AGENCY FOR PALESTINE REFUGEES, 1962

At the present time, there appears to be no likelihood of a political solution for the problem of the Palestine refugees. In view of this, it is the present policy of the Canadian Government to support UNRWA fully in the discharge of its humanitarian task of caring for more than one million Arab refugees. The mandate of the Agency runs until June 30, 1963.

2. During the course of the current mandate of the Agency, the General Assembly has approved a plan put forward by the director of the Agency, Dr. John H. Davis, to increase education and training for the Palestine refugees and thus concentrate the meagre resources of the Agency on the younger refugees, who would otherwise face a life without opportunity or hope.

3. For some years past, the Canadian regular contribution to the Agency has been $500,000 in cash. At a time when the Agency is implementing a particularly useful programme of the expansion of the education and vocational training facilities, a cut in the Canadian cash contribution would have serious consequences on the programme, as well as on the attitudes of the Arab hosts governments and on the other major donors. Under these circumstances, the cash contribution of $500,000 should be maintained in 1962.

4. During the past four years, since 1958, an amount of $1,500,000 worth of Canadian wheat flour has been contributed on an ad hoc basis each year. In 1960, which was designated by the United Nations as World Refugee Year, the Canadian Government made another special contribution of wheat flour in the amount of $1,000,000. This gift of flour generated counterpart funds which were used in the construction of vocational training schools for the refugees. This annual gift of flour has in the past been the subject of a separate memorandum to the Cabinet which has been put forward during the first half of the year in which the contribution was made. There are a number of reasons why it would seem desirable for the Canadian contribution of $1,500,000 worth of wheat flour to be pledged at the same time as the annual cash contribution; that is to say, at the time of the UNRWA Pledging Conference which takes place during the course of the United Nations General Assembly. This year the Pledging Conference is to be held in early November.

5. The reasons for making this recommendation are the following:

(a) The Agency would be informed at an early date, in good time for their subsequent planning, of a contribution which has in the past been approved in final form only late in the actual year of contribution, thus causing difficulties for the planning of combined purchases.

(b) The Agency has recently been approached by the United States Government which has offered to contribute all of UNRWA's flour requirements as a charge against its regular contribution. So far, the Agency has been able to reply that the Canadian Government has, in the past, given an annual contribution of flour and the Agency would not wish to accept the United States offer without the knowledge that Canada was no longer in a position to supply the flour. If the United States' contribution included all the flour, this would result in a serious loss of revenue to the Agency. At the present time, the Canadian contribution generates a matching contribution from the United States in the ratio of 30 percent to 70 percent. Furthermore, if the United States would fulfill this gap of $1.5 million worth of flour, the Agency would lose that amount also in cash.

(c) If a Canadian contribution of flour could no longer be accepted by the Agency, in view of their requirements being met by the United States, it would be very much more difficult for Canada to justify a contribution of $2 million in cash, since the flour is available in surplus and since the Agency's requirement is for flour of a relatively low grade, No. 5, which is not as readily saleable as the better grades.

(d) A reduction of the Canadian contribution to the level of $500,000 cash would be embarrassing for our relations with the Arab host governments, since it would be taken as a withdrawal of support from the refugees and, by implication, from the Arab position in the Palestine problem. It would be even more embarrassing for UNRWA. Not only would the contribution of the United States be automatically reduced, but the apparent withdrawal of Canadian support from UNRWA would add to the strength of the arguments current in contributing states to the effect that general support for UNRWA be withdrawn, in order that the Arab host governments may be compelled to bear the full financial responsibility for the refugees. On the other hand, pledging the $1,500,000 of flour, together with our cash contribution, would be a welcome indication to UNRWA, to the Arab countries, and to other contributing countries of Canada's continued humanitarian concern for the Palestine refugees.

(e) The report of the director of UNRWA to be submitted to the 16th Session of the General Assembly contains an estimate that the shortfall in contributions for 1961 will be higher than the estimated shortfall for 1960, which was $4.7 million. As indicated above, the Canadian contribution of $2 million a year in cash and in kind is probably at its highest possible level at this time. A commitment to the $2 million gift would not perhaps forestall pressure to increase the Canadian contribution, in view of the serious financial difficulties which will face the Agency this year and next.

Recommendation

It is therefore recommended that a contribution of $500,000 in cash and $1,500,000 in wheat flour be approved, subject to the appropriation of funds by Parliament, and that provision be made for their inclusion in the main estimates of the Department of External Affairs for 1962-63.

I further recommend that a pledge in the above amount be announced by the Canadian representative to the UNRWA Pledging Conference to be held during the course of the forthcoming session of the General Assembly of the United Nations.

CANADIAN CONTRIBUTION TO THE UNITED NATIONS RELIEF
 AND WORKS AGENCY FOR PALESTINE REFUGEES, 1962

14. The Secretary of State for External Affairs said that since there appeared to be no likelihood of a political solution for the problem of Palestine refugees, he was recommending that Canada maintain its contribution at about the same level as in previous years, i.e. $500,000 in cash and $1,500,000 in wheat flour.

An explanatory memorandum had been circulated, (Minister's memorandum, Sept. 7 – Cab. Doc. 340-61).

15. The Prime Minister wondered whether, in the light of the financial situation which had been described by the Minister of Finance recently, Canada should continue such contributions.

16. Mr. Green said that one hopeful sign for the future of these refugees was the training being given to the younger ones with a view to fitting them for an independent life of their own.

17. The Cabinet agreed that the Secretary of State for External Affairs should produce for the information of the Cabinet a list of other contributors to the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees, and the amounts of their contributions.

CANADIAN CONTRIBUTION TO UNRWA FOR 1962

In the Memorandum to Cabinet on this subject, it was recommended that Cabinet approve at the same time Canada's regular cash contribution of $500,000 and an ad hoc contribution of $1.5 million in wheat flour which it has made for the past four years. In the past these two contributions were dealt with separately, the cash contribution being decided in September for inclusion in the main departmental estimates and the flour contribution being decided in the first half of the year in which the contribution was made.

2. You have asked whether there would be any serious consequences if the Government were to defer a decision on its 1962 contribution to UNRWA until sometime next year. One of the problems in delaying the present submission to Cabinet is not of direct concern to the Canadian Government. This is the problem presented to UNRWA of organizing its "pipeline" to ensure continuous receipt of flour during the year so that its reserve stock position does not fluctuate too widely. As you will recall, a virtual crisis developed in UNRWA's "pipeline" management earlier this year when the decision regarding the Canadian contribution was delayed until UNRWA doubted that the even flow of flour could be maintained.

3. UNRWA could, of course, avoid these uncertainties by relying entirely on the United States to meet its flour requirements. As noted in the Memorandum to Cabinet of September 7, the United States Government has offered to contribute all of UNRWA's flour requirements as a charge against its regular contribution. From the Agency's point of view, this would not be desirable since it would result in a serious loss of revenue. If the United States were to provide the $1.5 million worth of flour which has been contributed by Canada in the past, not only would the Agency lose this amount in the form of a Canadian contribution, but it would also lose funds which the United States provides on a 30:70 matching basis. For these reasons, the Agency has so far put off the United States' offer with the argument that the Canadian Government has in the past made an annual contribution of flour and that unless Canada was no longer in a position to supply the flour, the Agency would not wish to accept the offer.

4. There are, of course, other considerations in support of the recommendation that both cash and kind contributions be decided at the same time and announced together at the UNRWA Pledging Conference; and these are contained in the Memorandum to Cabinet.

5. From the Department's point of view, there is some urgency in obtaining an early Cabinet decision on these contributions. The main estimates are now before the Treasury Board and provision has been made for contributions to UNRWA, subject to Cabinet approval. The Department must, therefore, make an immediate application to Cabinet for approval of the cash contribution at least, unless we are to break with the procedure of past years and in doing so leave ourselves open to suspicion that Canadian support for UNRWA is dwindling. This will undoubtedly be the inference drawn should the Canadian Delegation be unable to make some sort of announcement at the 1962 Pledging Conference for UNRWA which has now been set for November 17. The approval of the cash contribution would indicate the continuance of Canada's interest in UNRWA. The approval of the wheat flour contribution at the same time would have the added advantage of indicating Canada's keen interest in the educational and vocational training programme of UNRWA which seems to benefit particularly from our wheat flour contribution.¹⁰⁰

CANADIAN CONTRIBUTION TO UNRWA FOR 1962

The date of the Pledging Conference for UNRWA has now been set for Friday, November 17,¹⁰¹ and I understand that Cabinet may give consideration to the question of a Canadian contribution at its next meeting. As the Secretary of State for External Affairs will be away in New York during the week, I thought you might wish to have the attached statement of governmental contributions to UNRWA in 1961 as well as a statement of Canada's contributions to UNRWA since its establishment in 1950.

2. In the Memorandum to Cabinet of September 7 on this subject, it was recommended that Cabinet approve Canada's regular cash contribution of $500,000 and an ad hoc contribution of $1.5 million in wheat flour which it has made for the past four years.¹⁰² In the past, these two contributions were dealt with separately, the cash contribution being decided in September for inclusion in the main estimates of the Department of External Affairs and the flour contribution being decided in the first half of the year in which the contribution was made. (While Cabinet's decision of June 16, 1961, covered both the cash and flour contributions for 1961, the cash contribution had in fact been approved earlier, on September 16, 1960.)

3. Cabinet decision on the cash contribution at least should be taken now unless we are to break with the procedure of past years and in so doing leave ourselves open to suspicion that Canadian support for UNRWA is dwindling. If the Canadian Delegation is unable to make some sort of announcement at the 1962 Pledging Conference on December 6, this may be the inference drawn.

4. The Minister's decision to include the flour contribution with the cash contribution this year was based partly on the desire to present to Cabinet a consolidated recommendation which would provide a complete picture of the Canadian contribution to this Agency, and partly on the desire to assist UNRWA in its planning of flour shipments.

5. Each year UNRWA faces the problem of organizing its "pipeline" to ensure continuous receipt of flour during the year so that its reserve stock position does not fluctuate too widely. Last year, a virtual crisis developed in UNRWA's "pipeline" management when Canada's decision regarding its flour contribution was so delayed that UNRWA doubted that the even flow of flour could be maintained.

6. As noted in the Memorandum to Cabinet, the United States has offered to provide all of UNRWA's flour requirements as a charge against its regular contribution. While acceptance of this offer would eliminate past uncertainties, the Agency would not wish to take up the United States offer unless and until it is known whether or not Canada is in a position to supply flour which it has contributed in the past.

$500,000 cash and $500,000 wheat flour approved by Cabinet 30/11/61. R. C[ampbell]

7. The approval of the wheat flour contribution at the same time as the cash contribution would, therefore, be of considerable benefit to the Agency. It would have the added advantage of indicating Canada's keen interest in the educational and vocational training programme of UNRWA which seems to benefit particularly from our wheat flour contributions.

E.E.C. AGRICULTURAL POLICY – TARIFF NEGOTIATIONS

We note that Mansholt's view, in effect, has been that a satisfactory tariff solution to the problem of access to the E.E.C. for outside exporters may not repeat not be feasible at this time, due particularly to the position of Germany. Mansholt thus has considered that it may be necessary to find an interim formula, along the lines described in paragraph 7 of your telegram of December 12.

2. We agree that the Commission should come forward with an offer which could serve as the basis of fruitful negotiations. You will doubtless wish to test E.E.C. position fully, to ascertain whether a satisfactory solution along the lines of a reasonable tariff, or a reasonable system of levies, may not repeat not be attained.

3. If such a satisfactory solution is not repeat not in fact attainable, we would not repeat not preclude consideration of the kind of interim solution suggested by Mansholt, with the proviso which you have made (your paragraph 7). If necessary, we are prepared to consider a proposal for a minimum commitment to purchase for a period of years, coupled with a commitment by the Six at the end of the period to negotiate the maximum protection at a level such as to provide access on terms permitting maintenance and growth of trade, under conditions of competition between imported and home produced products.

4. You will no doubt wish to keep in close touch with USA representatives as well as other exporting countries on this matter, since USA attitude may have a determining influence on position of the Six. We have had few recent indications of their thinking, although we understand their initial reaction to Mansholt suggestion was rather cool. At the same time, we are not repeat not aware that USA has formally rejected current negotiating offer of Six. Our Embassy in Washington may be in a position to furnish up to date information on USA attitude and their assessment of the prospects for a satisfactory settlement.

5. If you think it worthwhile at this stage, we could make a more detailed analysis of the Mansholt proposal and of the manner in which it could be implemented. Grateful for your advice on this point, which depends on your assessment of prospects.

6. New Zealand representative has shown us a copy of a telegram from their Geneva Delegation reporting on meeting called by Wyndham-White on December 20, at which he outlined to New Zealand, Australian and Canadian representatives, his views on a settlement through the use of tariff quotas. (From your reference telegram, Mansholt view earlier was that tariff quotas could not repeat not be considered.) As we understand it, Wyndham-White's formula could be used both for an interim and for a more definitive solution.

ARTICLE XXIV:6 RENEGOTIATIONS – REPRESENTATIONS
IN NATIONAL CAPITALS

Following is text of note which subject to your comments we would recommend be presented by our ambassadors in EEC capitals. Since the Article III Committee is scheduled to meet on Tuesday January 24 and Wednesday January 25, these representations should, if possible, be made on Tuesday. We would suggest that the Ambassador in Brussels, in addition to presenting this note to the Belgian Foreign Minister, should also present it (with certain obvious drafting changes) to the Chairman of the EEC Council of Ministers. In addition Brussels may wish to pass copies to appropriate commission's officials and to members of the Article III Committee. Text begins

The Ambassador of Canada presents his compliments to the Minister of Foreign Affairs of ___ and on instructions from Canadian Government has the honour to refer to the current tariff renegotiations in Geneva under Article XXIV:6 of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade, and to the forthcoming January 30 meeting of the Council of Ministers of the European Economic Community. It is understood that at this meeting consideration will be given to the question of additional and improved offers which might be made by the community with a view to securing a satisfactory settlement of these renegotiations.

The present renegotiations under Article XXIV:6 of the GATT have as their objective the maintenance between the European Economic Community and other Contracting Parties to the General Agreement of a general level of reciprocal and mutually advantageous trade concessions no repeat no less favourable than those negotiated previously between such Contracting Parties and the Member Countries of the Community.

Canada is an important and traditional trade partner of the six EEC countries, and in recent years the trade has greatly expanded in both directions. This growing trade reinforces the close political and defence links which bind our countries. It is of great importance to the continuations of satisfactory relations between Canada and the countries of the Community that in the future, as in the past, trade should serve as a positive and cohesive force.

The proposed Common Tariff of the EEC provides for increased rates of duty on products of great importance in Canada's trade the tariffs on which were previously bound to Canada by one or more members of the Community in return for concessions in the Canadian tariff bound to them. The Canadian Government is confident that these member countries and the Community will wish to fulfill their responsibilities by offering adequate concessions to avoid impairment of Canada's contractual rights.

Since September 1 the Canadian Delegation in Geneva has reviewed with representatives of the Community the EEC's offers to bind some positions in the Common Tariff, in settlement of the renegotiations under Article XXIV:6. In these discussions the Canadian Delegation has drawn attention to the inadequacy of the Community's offers so far as Canada is concerned. In the agricultural sector, accounting for over 40 percent of Canada's exports to the EEC, few meaningful offers have been made. In the field of raw materials the EEC has offered to bind tariffs on a number of items at rates which are unduly high relative to the terms of access previously enjoyed by Canadian exports and which would represent increased barriers to Canada's trade. Similar considerations apply in respect of a number of industrial items.

Canada's exports to the community are made up of a narrow range of products. It is the level of the tariff for these which is of critical importance, the offer of lower tariffs for other products or of additional bindings which would not result in increased Canadian trade cannot adequately compensate for the upward movement of tariffs of interest to Canada.

In an aide mémoire dated December 6, 1960 the Canadian Delegation in Geneva summarized the views it had previously expressed to the representatives of the Community concerning the inadequacy of the offer made by the EEC and indicated those priority items in respect of which it was considered imperative that this offer be materially improved. In this aide mémoire it was made clear that any settlement with Canada must comprise satisfactory arrangements for both agricultural and industrial items. Further, for many important items tariff reductions as well as tariff bindings would be essential.

The Geneva Tariff Conference has now been in session for nearly five months and little or no progress has been made towards a satisfactory settlement of the Article XXIV:6 renegotiations. Such a settlement will have an important bearing on the proposed multilateral tariff negotiations, for and Canada and no doubt for other countries on the maintenance of satisfactory trade relations between Canada and the Community.

The Ambassador of Canada is confident that at the forthcoming meeting of the EEC Council of Ministers the representative of ___ will take fully into account the views of the Government of Canada as expressed in this note, and in the aide mémoire of December 6, and endeavour to ensure that the Community will make substantially improved offers in both the agricultural and industrial sectors which would hold the promise of a satisfactory settlement of the Article XXIV:6 renegotiations with Canada.

ARTICLE XXIV:6 RENEGOTIATIONS – REPRESENTATIONS TO EEC

Please present note immediately in form suggested by Tariff Delegation subject to minor amendments indicated below, to appropriate ministers in EEC capitals, to the Chairman of the EEC Council of Ministers, and to the EEC Commission. The Ambassador in Brussels might also wish to pass copies to members of the Article III Committee.

2. In view of rather different problems which concerns Canada in the renegotiations with the Six, as reflected in our note, we have decided that our representations should be made independently, and that it would be undesirable to have them appear as part of a co-ordinated approach with the UK. Accordingly you need not consult with UK missions regarding the delivery of this note.

3. The following are amendments to the text contained in Tariff Delegation telegram 19 of January 20:

Paragraph 3 - Delete the word “many” in the first sentence before the words “products of great importance.” Last sentence, of same paragraph, delete the words “full and” and substitute “concessions to avoid” for “compensation for any.”

Paragraph 4 - Third sentence - Delete the words “or acceptable.” The end of the sentence would then read simply “few meaningful offers have been made.”

Finally, the last sentence of penultimate paragraph should be changed to read as follows: “Such a settlement will have an important bearing on the proposed multilateral tariff negotiations for Canada and no doubt for other countries and on the maintenance of satisfactory trade relations between Canada and the Community.”

4. To London: You may inform UK authorities that we are going ahead immediately with representations to EEC in hope of influencing Article III Committee discussions. You may also show them copy of our note. In return we would appreciate receiving a copy of the UK note, if the UK decide to go ahead. We are informing Earncliffe.

5. To Washington: Please inform appropriate USA officials of our decision to make representations to the Six and to the Chairman of the EEC Council in advance of the January EEC Council meeting. You should also express our hope that the USA will also take steps promptly to inform the Six that their current offers in the Article XXIV:6 renegotiations in Geneva are inadequate.

DILLON NEGOTIATIONS – REQUEST LIST ON EEC

In light of the likely outcome of Article XXIV:6 negotiations we have again reviewed the request list suggested in paragraph 3 of your reference telegram. We propose subject to further amendment in the light of the Article XXIV:6 Conclusions the following deletions and additions and would welcome your early comments and suggestions.

2. Items to be deleted: 03.02AIB salted cod; 10.01 wheat; 10.02 rye; 10.03 barley; 10.04 oats; 11.01A flour of wheat; 17.02C maple sugar and syrup; 39.01BV polyamides; EX 39.02 polystyrene, polyethylene and polyvinyl chloride; 84.52AI calculating machines (electronic); EX 85.15B radio wireless navigational equipment.

3. Items to be added: 02-01BII edible offals fresh, etc.; 02.06B and C edible offals, salted, etc.; EX 03.01AI fresh, chilled or frozen salmon; 03.02AIC sardines and fish other than herring, etc. (including “mild cured” salmon); EX 04.04 cheddar cheese; 08.06AI and AII apples; 20.02G canned vegetables; EX 44.15 plywood-Douglas fir; 69.02 firebricks; 77.01A unwrought magnesium.

4. As regards the proposed deletions we feel that the proffered duty free quota for salted cod for Italy should meet our needs and that therefore we should not repeat not seek to negotiate a reduction in the tariff as such. In view of the nature of the prospective wheat settlement and the proposals for a variable levy and Common Market system for coarse grains we consider that wheat coarse grains and flour could not repeat not be negotiated in the Dillon Round (as you know the Six are withdrawing tariff bindings for these items). The rate we have obtained for maple sugar and syrup is already satisfactory. In view of the capacity being installed in Europe and the comments forwarded with Campbell Smith's letter November 17 and January 31 we have come to the conclusion that it would not repeat not be worthwhile to negotiate the chemicals of traditional interest to Canada under EX 39.01 and EX 39.02. We will of course receive indirect benefit from reductions which USA and UK may be able to obtain for such items. We would welcome your further views on EX 84.52 and EX 85.15. As regards calculating machines UK and Sweden are requesting concessions; we consider that having regard to the limited true Canadian content in these machines it would not repeat not be worthwhile including this item. We are inclined to question the value of a concession on the radio wireless navigational equipment since we understand the product sells on quality design and performance rather than price and 16 percent is not repeat not a high tariff for complex equipment of this kind. If in your view it would be worthwhile to negotiate either or both these items we would be prepared to reconsider our position in the light of the reasons you may advance.

5. We offer the following comments covering certain items we suggest for retention on or addition to our request list:

(a) Various Edible Offals - Our trade with Europe has been growing. We propose to seek a 4 or 5 percent reduction in proposed Common Tariff;

(b) Powdered Skim Milk - No repeat no binding offered of proposed 18 percent tariff. We propose seeking binding at 15 percent. Like cheese this is a residual product of our dairy products industry and we should seek to improve access to foreign markets;

(c) Cheddar Cheese - We propose seeking a reduction from 23 percent to 18 percent in cooperation with other suppliers; see comment under (b) above;

(d) Fresh Apples - As price will be a factor over long-term we propose seeking reduction from 14 to 12 and 10 to 8 respectively in the first two delivery periods;

(e) Grass and Clover Seeds - We have already secured a reduction to 8 percent and hope to get more under XXIV:6; we propose to seek a further reduction of 3 or 4 percentage points in new negotiations;

(f) Canned Salmon - Tariff has been reduced to 18 percent and we hope for more under XXIV:6; we propose to seek 12 percent rate in new negotiations;

(g) Other Salmon Items - We have already secured a reduction to 10 percent on frozen salmon but propose to seek a further reduction in the Dillon Round. Re mild cured salmon the outcome of our Article XXIV:6 negotiations is still obscure. In any event we propose seeking a rate of 10 percent or better in new negotiations.

(h) Canned Vegetables - Community imports $10 million a year of which nearly half from USA. We consider our canners have good prospects here and that item should be negotiated.

(i) Whisky and Tobacco - We shall be guided in our request by rates being sought by UK and USA respectively, i.e. about 0.80 ua per hl for whisky and 28.00 ua per 100 kg for tobacco;

(j) Pentaerythritol - Depending on whether our product is classified under 29.04 BII or 29.04 CI Common Market rate will likely be 19 percent or 16 percent. We require detailed industry advice as to proper classification of our product, and T&C indication of rate we should seek to negotiate. We previously had one binding on part of this item (diols) and 30 percent;

(k) Vanillin - Growing trade Common Tariff 20 percent no repeat no previous bindings. We suggest seeking 15 percent. You might wish to ascertain whether the following decision by EEC Council could relate to tariff item 29.11 EI: in the "Journal officiel des Communautés européennes" of January 30 the Council has decided to add to Annex II tariff item 17.05 which now reads "flavoured or coloured sugars syrup and molasses (including vanilla sugar or vanillin) but not repeat not including fruit juices containing added sugar in any proportion;"

(l) Coniferous Wood Sawn Lengthwise - As 44.05BI and C are to be free we assume your suggestion relates to 44.05BII rate 13 percent - our briefing shows no repeat no trade for this small dimension wood. Please ascertain whether we in fact have trade under this item and advise whether there are other coniferous wood items not repeat not covered by zero or very low CT rates which you consider we might put on our request list. We have assumed that our interests were covered by 44.03BII; 44.04B and 44.05C, 44.13 and 44.15;

(m) Douglas Fir Plywood - Outcome of XXIV:6 is still obscure but as a minimum we expect an ex item to be established. We propose requesting duty-free entry as for planks and boards.

(n) Woodpulp for Papermaking - There will be bound quotas at zero rate. Scandinavians under pressure from industry are considering refusing binding of proposed tariff rate of 6 percent. We disagree. Whether or not repeat not the Scandinavians decide to negotiate rate in

Dillon Round we believe it should be on our list at least for tactical reasons. We consider any payment from Canada in multilateral negotiations should be very small in view of quota provisions our much smaller trade relative to Scandinavians and our understanding that inter company arrangements limit our participation in European markets;

(o) Newsprint - Rate to be requested will be worked out in consultation with Scandinavians. Please confirm our understanding that Canadian newsprint is competitive at proposed Common Tariff rate of 7 percent;

(p) Firebricks - We have a growing trade. Briefing suggests our trade will move irrespective of tariff. Our view is that a binding at a reduced rate would be worthwhile. Please tell us in detail the qualities and shapes we export and the purpose for which used in order that we may consider requesting an ex item;

(q) Copper Bars Profiles etc. - So far our trade with the Six in these products as opposed to copper in ingot form has been small. Presumably it should however be included if the expectation is for an expansion of processing in Canada. You might also consider whether with an eye to the future we should include similar advanced forms of other nonferrous metals and/or alloys;

(r) Aluminum - It seems most unlikely that in the new negotiations the EEC would be prepared to go as low as the existing tariff quota rate of 5 percent. In view of our negotiations with USA and as a token of our interest in securing the lowest possible rate for this product it may be that our initial request should be for a zero tariff;

(s) Unwrought Magnesium - We are third supplier after Norway and UK with trade of over $1½ million in 1959. Consider binding would be useful. Should a reduction in the proposed 10 percent tariff be sought and if so to what rate?;

(t) Zinc Spelter - Although Common Tariff has an ad valorem incidence of only 4-6 percent at current prices we consider some reduction would be useful both as a help to exports and as a disincentive to the establishment of further smelting capacity in community. Suggest requesting 1.00 cmu per 100 kg.

6. In our work on the request list we have been guided by various criteria and have limited the list to items where binding or reduction seems necessary to aid expansion of trade or to avoid short or longer run impairment. For some of the items notably aluminium we will be expected to provide reciprocal concessions of interest to the Six but even for this product Norway, Austria and USA will be in the payment's picture. (Norway sells nearly as much as we do.) For most of the other items suggested our supplier position is not repeat not such that the weight of the demand for reciprocity will be focussed on Canada. In the new negotiations with the Six we should stand to gain considerable indirect benefits of real interest to our export trade. However we have not repeat not considered in precise terms the payment that would be required from us primarily because we believe that for tactical reasons our initial request list should include all those items which we deem to be negotiable by the EEC and on which tariff concessions would benefit important Canadian exports.

7. We intend to present initially a products list (i.e. with no repeat no rates); we therefore require a reply to this message before March 31 as regards products and before April 7 as regards rates. If there are any new Canadian products being developed in respect of which tariff concessions in the Common Market would be of interest no repeat no doubt you will consider suggesting them for inclusion. We dispose here of only very limited information on items not repeat not now of importance in Canadian trade but which are likely to be significant in the future. As regards proposed request list items other than those which were up for negotiation under Article XXIV:6 our information is inadequate. We should be grateful if for such items usual briefing could be prepared in T&C and sent to us in due course.

DILLON NEGOTIATIONS – REQUEST LIST ON EEC

In keeping with the tactical approach you suggest we have re-examined the proposed request list on the E.E.C. in conjunction with your reference telegram and in consultation with commodities branches of Trade and Commerce. We are not repeat not proposing deletions from the list for the sake of shortening it, and have confined the examination to a consideration of Canadian export interests. Following your method, we are dealing firstly with deletions and then with items to be retained or added.

Deletions

2. We agree salted cod should be deleted from the request list and assume that the bound duty free quota for Italy obtained in XXIV:6 negotiations covers present imports and provides for some expansion of the market. We would be interested to know the amount of the quota to be bound in the first round. Regarding calculating machines while we agree to the deletion of this item the Canadian industry is fairly substantial both in terms of investment and employment. Canadian content of bookkeeping and calculating machines (D.B.S. 5625) varies widely and is highest in the more complex equipment which accounts for a substantial part of Canadian exports to the Six. Since all Canadian producers are subsidiaries of U.S.A. companies and the U.S.A. has not repeat not requested to negotiate the relevant items (84.52 and 84.53) we are prepared to leave the negotiations to the U.K. and Sweden. With reference to radio wireless navigational equipment we concur in its exclusion from the list but are examining the whole range of electronic equipment with a view to establishing new items as discussed in paragraph 5 below. We also agree with the other suggested deletions in your paragraphs 2 and 4.

3. In addition we would suggest that of the items in your paragraphs 3 and 5 (items to be retained or added to the request list) the following be eliminated on the basis of insufficient Canadian trade interest: 02.06 B and C edible offals, salted or in brine, dried or smoked: as indicated in our paragraph 4 Canadian exports consist only of frozen beef and pork offals. 74.03 copper bars, profiles and wire: in the light of the substantial decline in Canadian exports of this item to the Six in 1960 we suggest its deletion from the request list. As you suggest we are examining the possibility of negotiating semi-fabricated non-ferrous metals and will include in the briefing any items which appear to warrant consideration for the negotiations.

The Request List

4. The suggested request list together with our comments on individual items and duties follows:

(1) 02.01 B II – Edible offals, fresh chilled or frozen of bovine animals and pigs. The E.E.C. is expected to be a continuing market for Canadian offals. Our interest is solely in frozen offals of beef and pork with the former accounting for 20 percent and the latter 80 percent. Shipments have been made mainly to Germany over a duty of 5 percent for livers and 10 percent for other offals. 70 percent of Canadian shipments to Germany was of livers. Since the proposed C.T. rate is 20 percent a 5 percent reduction as you suggest would result in a 15 percent duty and would represent a significant impairment in access to the German Market. Accordingly, you may wish to request a rate of 10 percent.

(2) EX 03.01 A I – Frozen Salmon. The 10 percent rate secured in the first round corresponds with the rate in France, our best market. Industry would of course welcome any further reduction you may be able to obtain.

(3) EX 03.02 A IC – Mild Cured Salmon. As indicated in our telegram TC-711 March 8 this is a raw material for further processing. The proposed C.T. rate of 15 percent is high. Commodity experts share your view that we should seek a rate of 10 percent or lower in the new negotiations.

(4) EX 04.02 A – Powdered Skimmed Milk. Canadian trade, now on a commercial basis, with an anticipated continuing supply, at present faces competition from heavily subsidized U.S.A. exports. In view of our long term interest the 15 percent rate you propose to request would be satisfactory.

(5) EX 04.04 – Cheddar Cheese. Commodities Branch agrees with your comments and proposal to seek reduction to 18 percent. In view of present limited demand for Canadian cheddar cheese in the E.E.C. you would not repeat not wish to pay very much for this concession and therefore cooperation with other suppliers in negotiations as you suggest would be appropriate.

(6) EX 08.06 – Fresh Apples. We agree with your suggestion to seek reductions of 2 percent in the first two delivery periods. In our view this is largely a presentational item since we expect that imports from Canada will continue to depend on the size of E.E.C. harvests.

(7) EX 12.03 B – Grass and Clover Seeds. We concur in your appraisal of this item and your proposed action.

(8) 16.04 B – Canned Salmon. Industry expects to have increased supplies for export in the coming years. Benelux, where the duty has been suspended since the war, is our best market and West Coast suppliers feel that any duty above 10 percent would restrict imports. Although the 12 percent rate which you propose seeking would not repeat not be insurmountable you may wish to start at a lower rate in your initial request. We assure that the possibility of a duty-free quota for Benelux has been explored.

(9) 20.02 G – Canned Vegetables (Other). We share your views regarding Canadian long term interest in E.E.C. market. However, owing to climatic and other factors affecting Canadian competitive position, we do not expect to become a leading supplier. You may wish to seek a secondary binding on this item. According to our information Sweden and the U.K. are proposing to negotiate it.

(10) EX 22.09 CII – Whisky and 24.01 – Tobacco. We have nothing to add to your suggestion and note that you are seeking as favourable access for Canadian whisky as for scotch and bourbon.

(11) EX 29.04 CI – Pentaerythritol. As outlined in our telegram TC-900 March 24 this product is a petrol on which the proposed C.T. is 19 percent. Production in the E.E.C. is increasing but does not yet meet domestic requirements. Competition from producers in the Community poses the greatest threat to Canadian exporters who therefore would welcome the lowest rate possible. The U.S.A. and the U.K. are at present our main competitors. Canadian chemicals, as the main supplier, have been consulted and inform us that 12 percent would be the maximum rate “they could live with.” You will have noted that the U.S.A. and Sweden have requested negotiations on this item.

(12) EX 29.11 EI – Vanillin. Commodity officers agree that your suggested 15 percent rate would be satisfactory to Canadian industry. You will have noted that the U.S.A., the U.K. and Switzerland have included this item on their lists and we assume you have checked the rates they are requesting. Regarding the question you raise in your paragraph 5 as to the significance for vanillin of classifying vanillin flavoured sugar under Annex II of the Rome Treaty we doubt whether this would have any bearing. However we are asking Brussels to confirm with the Commission and advise you directly.

(13) 44.05 C – Coniferous Wood Sawn Lengthwise (Planks and Boards). Canadian interest is in standard sizes of planks and boards under sub-item C. This item was included in the proposed request list (our telegram ET-1337 October 5) with the binding of duty free entry in mind. If this binding should be obtained in XXIV:6 negotiations you will wish to delete this item from the list. Your assumption is correct that our interest in wood items is covered by 44.03 B II, 44.04 B, 44.13, 44.15 and the above item.

(14) EX 44.15 – Douglas Fir Plywood. We agree with your comments. You will have noted that Norway and Sweden have requested to negotiate an ex item for pine and northern fir plywood. However we do not know whether Scandinavians share our interest in plywood for use in construction in competition with lumber.

(15) EX 47.01 – Woodpulp for Papermaking. Trade and Commerce are consulting industry through the pulp and paper association and will report in a separate telegram. We agree that for tactical reasons this item should be on our list regardless of the outlook for the Dillon Round. The association understand from the Swedish trade that the E.E.C. duty free quota may be broken down by countries and grades and they would appreciate receiving details through us to assist in assessing the significance of the quota.

(16) 48.01 A – Newsprint. The Canadian Industry for its own tactical reasons continues to hold to the position that free entry is appropriate. Our impression from discussions with them is that Scandinavia which has equally efficient production enjoys a relative advantage in the E.E.C. owing to its proximity to that market and to its industry’s cooperative shipping arrangements. Because of our small supplier position we could probably not hope to obtain anything more than a secondary binding on any reduction from 7 percent that may be obtained by the Scandinavians.

(17) EX 69.02 A – Refractory Bricks (Fire Bricks). Canadian interest is in magnesite and chrome magnesite refractory brick used principally for the lining of kilns in the cement industry and to a lesser extent in the steel industry. It is a high quality, high price product, the composition and shape of which generally conform to individual kiln specifications. Austria is our main competitor and has requested negotiation of this item. There is also some domestic production within the Six, particularly in Germany and France. Accordingly we agree with your assessment that we should seek a reduction to the lowest level of duty possible.

(18) 76.01 A – Primary Aluminum. You are in the best position to assess the appropriate request to put forward, and we would not repeat not disagree with your suggestion of an initial request for duty free entry for aluminum.

(19) 77.01 A – Unwrought Magnesium. Norway has replaced Canada as principal supplier to the Six and the Canadian industry does not expect to regain the leading position. Norway is proposing to negotiate this item and owing to our supplier position a secondary binding would appear to be the best we could hope to achieve.

(20) 79.01 A – Zinc Spelter. We concur in your suggestion to request 1.00 cmu per 100 kg and assume you are taking into account that Norway and Australia have requested negotiation of this item.

Possible New Items

5. Trade and Commerce are examining for inclusion in the negotiations possible new items as well as established export commodities which have not repeat not been moving to the E.E.C. A preliminary study suggests that items such as black masterbatch, aluminum covered steel reinforced cable, lithium hydroxide and lithium carbonate might possibly qualify. After this examination has been completed we will send you detailed briefing material for any appropriate commodities.

Detailed Briefing Material

6. We are preparing briefing sheets for inclusion in next week's airbag for the following items on the request list: frozen edible offals, canned vegetables, unwrought magnesium and whisky. We assume that the other items on the list are adequately covered by the briefing already in your possession.

For Brussels

7. Please note the comments on vanillin in paragraph 4 (12) above and advise Tariff Delegation directly repeating your reply to Trade and Commerce Ottawa.

II. PROGRESS REPORT ON GATT TARIFF NEGOTIATIONS

15. Mr. Warren said that the first phase of the GATT negotiations were about to come to an end and the general picture appeared to be as follows. The common tariff would be lower than the present legal incidence, and Canada would have certain new bindings where it previously had no contractual rights, e.g., bindings for oil seeds and apple juice. An acceptable tariff basis would be established for 53% of our trade, instead of the previous 44%. For the balance, 27% represented our trade in wheat. 3.5% involved products over which we had no negotiating rights but which were being negotiated by other countries. For 1.6% of the remainder, it was not essential that we get any undertakings. It was essential, however, for us to obtain some concessions for the remaining 13.7% which represented $40 million worth of trade and involved such things as aluminum and synthetic rubber. If possible, it would be desirable to obtain a further reduction of 1/2% of the tariff on aluminum and a satisfactory tariff rate on canned salmon.

16. Pulp and newsprint had created some difficulty. Bindings had been offered at a rate of 6%, but this was not acceptable to Canadian producers who considered that there should be no tariff at all. The question of wheat and cereals was in suspense. The United States had made a proposal to the Six and were waiting for a reply. Nevertheless, they had agreed to go ahead with the Dillon Round on the understanding that the final agreement would be dependant on a satisfactory solution of the agricultural issue. This situation placed Canada in a position of having to decide whether to proceed with the Dillon Round or await an agreement on the question of wheat and cereals. Art. XXVIII-1 negotiations with the United States were not yet complete. Although we were satisfied with the negotiations, the U.S. were not. Moreover it appeared that their position was hardening. Efforts were being made to complete negotiations before the Dillon Round. It would be unfortunate if these were to be held up by Art. XXVIII-1 negotiations.

17. In summary, this phase of the GATT negotiations had produced something tolerable and liveable for Canada, and had not necessitated any tariff concessions on our part.

18. For the Dillon Round the tactics proposed were that we begin by putting forward an "opening card." This would mean that we would wait to see what indirect concessions might be offered in response to our request list. We could then determine what position to adopt in the light of these offers.

DILLON NEGOTIATIONS – REQUEST LIST ON EEC

As indicated in paragraph 6 reference telegram we have despatched by airbag April 21 briefing sheets for four items for inclusion in request list on Six. You will note from comments on edible offals given below that Canada's supplier position is probably not repeat not sufficiently strong to justify our requesting a rate of ten percent as mentioned in our reference telegram. Our comments on four items for which briefing has been prepared and on possible new items follow.

REQUEST LIST ITEMS

EX 02-01 B II – Edible Offals

Canada's export interest in edible offals is centred in frozen beef and pork offals. Supplies for export of these products are good and it is expected that Canadian meat packers would be in a position to continue to offer these items. The trade view EEC as a continuing market with Canada Packers principal shippers.

As revealed by EEC country import statistic Canada as a supplier ranks last among major supplying countries. Since import statistics for France, Germany and Italy include all offals (fresh chilled or frozen) it is impossible to pinpoint proportion of imported frozen offals. USA which is principal supplier is also interested mainly in frozen beef and pork offals. USA's large volume of supply of these products enables that country to offer at prices lower than ours which gives them a distinct competitive advantage.

Our information indicates that only Sweden and New Zealand have requested negotiation of this item. In view of Sweden's very limited supplier interest, as shown in EEC country import statistics, it is difficult to understand why they have included it on their request list. We presume New Zealand's interest would be in frozen mutton offals. Because of Canadian exporters interest in this item any concession you may be able to obtain would be useful. At same time our supplier position in Common Market would seem to indicate that USA would have to do main running on this item. However USA has not repeat not included edible offals in its request list on Six.

20.02 G – Canned Vegetables, Other

Canadian canning industry has expressed keen interest in developing export market for canned vegetables in EEC. Canadian interest is mainly in canned peas, corn, beans, carrots, beets, gherkins and relishes. Available supplies for export are substantial and we are advised prices are competitive with those of USA. However owing to climatic and other factors affecting Canadian competitive position we do not repeat not expect to become a leading supplier.

Import restrictions in Germany, Netherlands and France have limited our sales to those markets.

According to EEC country import statistics Canada is not repeat not a major supplier of canned vegetables in any of markets of Six. In view of our supplier position a secondary binding at any reduced rate might be best we could expect to obtain. Sweden and UK have included this tariff item in their request lists on Community.

EX 22.09 C II – Whisky

In view of fact UK is principal supplier of whisky to EEC and is our competitor in this market we concur with your views (your telegram 175 March 24) that we should be guided in our request by rates being sought by that country.

77.01 A – Unwrought Magnesium

Canadian industry views EEC as an important market and will have good supplies of this metal to offer for export. Norway has supplanted Canada as principal supplier to Six and will likely maintain its competitive advantage owing to proximity to European markets. Norway has included unwrought magnesium on its request list. In view of our supplier position you may wish to seek a secondary binding on this item.

New Items Considered

2. Regarding paragraph 5 reference telegram, in cooperation with Commodities Branch we have completed our exploration of possible new items for inclusion in negotiations. While our exam has not repeat not revealed any commodities which could be added to list following summary of our review together with our comments may be useful. Commodities examined were as follows:

- EX 28.28 A - Lithium hydroxide 13 percent
- EX 28.42 A VI - Lithium carbonate 14 percent
- EX 29.04 A II - Propyl alcohol 15 percent
- EX 29.04 A III - Butyl alcohol 8 percent and 14 percent
- EX 39.03 C I (non plasticized) cellulose acetate 19 percent
- EX 40.05 - Black masterbatch 10 percent
- EX 73.02 F - Ferro-titanium 7 percent
- EX 73.02 IJ III - Ferro-columbite 7 percent
- EX 74.03 - Copper rods for wire making 10 percent
- EX 85.23 - Aluminum covered steel reinforced cable for communications 17 percent.

3. Of above items lithium hydroxide, lithium carbonate, black masterbatch ferro-titanium and ferro-columbite are now reaching production stage and within next year or so it is expected they will be available in sufficient quantity for export. Industry has indicated a keen interest in developing export markets for these new products and view EEC as a particularly promising area. However in our view until such time as export performance can be established competitive position of these commodities in Common Market and degree of impairment resulting from proposed Common Tariff rate cannot repeat not be assessed satisfactorily. However in view of our potential interest in these items and further fact that USA has included lithium hydroxide and lithium carbonate in their request list on Six, you will probably wish to follow closely any negotiations on above items.

4. With regard to propyl alcohol, butyl alcohol and cellulose acetate, these products have been moving to EEC markets in small quantities. Propyl alcohol, a solvent used widely in chemical synthesis, is produced in Canada by Canadian Chemicals Ltd. In 1960 this product which previously was in short supply was sold in following quantities: Belgium 15,000 pounds, Germany 1.5 million pounds and Netherlands 10,000 pounds. It is valued at approximately 12 cents per pound. Canadian company is expanding its production facilities and will have greater quantities for export in coming years. Butyl alcohol, also a solvent, has been in very short supply in Canada and is produced by Canadian chemical and Shawinigan who are expanding capacity by 40 percent and expect to have increased supplies to offer for export. Cellulose acetate is also produced by Canadian chemicals, a subsidiary of Celanese of America. Prior to 1960 sales by Canadian company were limited to affiliated concerns principally in South America. Changes in export policy in 1960 allowed Canadian subsidiary to compete in European market which resulted in a first sale in Europe of some 495,000 pounds valued at about 40 cents a pound to Italy. This year company has firm contracts for one million pounds each to Italy and Germany and 750,000 pounds to UK. In course of our study we have discovered propyl alcohol and butyl alcohol are on USA request list and UK has requested negotiations on cellulose acetate. In view of our potentially great interest indicated above in these products you will no repeat no doubt wish to maintain a close association with delegations of countries negotiating these items with a view to pursuing Canadian interests.

5. Regarding copper rod and aluminum covered steel reinforced cable latter product used in communications equipment has an aluminum cover over a steel core wound with copper wire. Industry is of opinion that their competitive position for these secondary products in EEC could be improved if price of primary copper to Canadian manufacturers can be brought into line with European prices. We plan to follow this situation closely. In event that our competitive position is in fact improved as a result of lower copper prices you may wish to consider moving these items from watch list to request list. Our records show UK and Norway have item 74.03 on their request lists. Sweden has requested negotiations on whole of item 85.23.

6. In paragraph 2 reference telegram we indicated that electronic equipment would be examined in context of new items for negotiations. Commodity officers are unable to pinpoint specific items for possible negotiation in wide range of electronic equipment produced in Canada. Of products exported to EEC a substantial volume has been for end use by NATO. Commercial shipments have been mainly of custom built equipment of high unit price and exports have been sporadic. Canadian industry has indicated that it would welcome any concessions which our principal competitors may be seeking. From our scrutiny of request lists on EEC which we hold it has not repeat not been possible to identify specific items. In your exam of request lists of other countries on EEC, if you should come across items that may appear to be starters we would be pleased to try to identify Canadian interest in them.

GATT ARTICLE XXIV:6 NEGOTIATIONS

We were told by Weiss (State Department) today that USA position has now been clarified and that he will be briefing us fully on Monday April 24.

2. In the meantime he wanted to let us know that USA delegation is being authorized to proceed with the Dillon Round even though no repeat no agreement has been reached on agriculture. This authorization is subject to the important proviso, which will be stressed to the Six, that USA do not repeat not intend to settle on the Dillon Round until agreement is reached on agriculture.

3. Weiss told us USA is prepared to make certain adjustments in its proposals on agriculture but that this will still be "a very stiff position" with respect to the wheat proposal, USA is not repeat not prepared to settle on the present basis. Weiss said USA authorities will be refining USA proposal to extract more precise assurances with respect to imports in the interim periods but this would still be within the general framework of the negotiating position agreed between Canada and USA. He expressed the hope that we would delay decision on whether to settle on the present wheat proposal until we had a chance to consider the revised USA position.

TARIFF NEGOTIATIONS – OPENING OF DILLON ROUND

At this morning's meeting of the Tariff Negotiations Committee, it was agreed to terminate Article XXIV:6 phase of the Tariff Conference and to initiate the Dillon Round following procedures along the lines of those indicated in our reference telegram which would permit individual Contracting Parties to agree, to disagree or to agree with reservations regarding the results of the renegotiations. The Secretariat will be circulating a paper outlining the details of the procedures to be followed.

2. We indicated that Canada remains hopeful that the negotiations on wheat will be brought to a successful conclusion and that we will be able to enter the Dillon Round with a minimum of reservations. This view was reciprocated by Donne, Representative of the Six. We warned that in the circumstances it might not repeat not be possible for us to enter the Dillon Round on the agreed date, but that we hoped to be able to do so shortly thereafter.

3. The Tariff Negotiations Committee has agreed that the Dillon Round should open on Monday May 29. On that day T&C will reconstitute itself for the new negotiations and will be composed of countries circulating or able to circulate consolidated offer lists, countries which have put in request lists or otherwise indicated in writing their intention to participate and countries negotiating for accession. At this meeting arrangements will be made for the exchange of offer lists and an opportunity will be given for statements on the nature of the various offer lists. The Committee will probably set up a tariff negotiations working party of more limited membership to deal with the day to day problems of the new negotiations. It is probable that the T&C will also set a date for the commencement of negotiations with acceding countries and will make arrangements for later negotiations with the less developed countries which may not repeat not be able to participate on the basis of reciprocity. Working parties will also be established on the proposed accessions of Ireland and Portugal in respect of which substantive issues are outstanding which need to be resolved prior to actual negotiations.

¹⁰⁵Note marginale :/Marginal note:

Spoke to Jim G[randy] & Bob L[atimer] who agreed no reaction on our part was required – since there is no danger we would go ahead without consulting Americans – & settlement must now be translated into precise language. [Auteur inconnu/Author unknown]

Within the next few days the Secretariat will circulate a draft paper on the procedure to be followed for the exchange of lists and the commencement of bilateral negotiations.

4. Although it was Corse who proposed a date for the beginning of the Dillon Round he did not repeat not state explicitly that USA was in a position to negotiate with EEC. UK again indicated its desire to go forward provided both USA and EEC participated. We think you may assume that USA will find it possible to enter into new negotiation with the community.

5. We are reporting separately on the outcome of our Article XXVIII:1 and 4 negotiations.

6. The Executive Secretary will today be announcing that the Dillon Round will commence on May 29. In the particular circumstances of our negotiations with respect to wheat, we suggest that in response to questions ministers indicate that so far as Canada is concerned good progress has been made in Article XXIV:6 negotiations, that however the discussions on certain important products have not repeat not yet been completed but that delegation is hopeful that these matters will be regulated in the near future in such a way as to permit Canada to join in the Dillon Round on May 29 or shortly thereafter.

GATT TARIFF NEGOTIATIONS

Since September 1960, tariff negotiations have been proceeding in Geneva between the six members of the EEC and the other members of the GATT, including Canada. These talks precede the so-called "Dillon round" where new concessions will be negotiated. The object of the first part of the negotiations is to ensure that concessions negotiated with the Six at previous Tariff Conferences should not be impaired by the institution of their common external tariff. This new round is likely to commence within the next few weeks. If the proposed common tariff involves a deterioration of existing terms of access to the markets of the Six and the latter fail to provide adequate compensation, the injured exporting country is entitled under GATT rules to withdraw concessions previously given the Six. It appears that techniques are now being developed which would permit countries to enter the Dillon round with reservations concerning products about which they had not been satisfied in the preceding negotiations.

Negotiations on agricultural commodities, in which we have an important trade interest, have proved to be especially difficult not only because tariffs are only one among many other measures that can be used to restrict terms of access for agricultural commodities but also because the position of the Six has been that since their common agricultural policy is not yet agreed on among themselves there is no firm basis for negotiation. In close cooperation with the United States, whose interests are close to ours, we have pressed the Six vigorously and a satisfactory settlement on wheat, which is of chief interest to us, may be in sight. However, the United States consider that some of their other agricultural interests have not been adequately safeguarded. Their latest proposals to the Six have been rejected by the EEC Council of Ministers, and we understand that they intend to make vigorous representations at a high level in the capitals of the Six in order to break the deadlock.

In view of the importance attached by the United States to this issue and of our common interests. President Kennedy may raise it with you. If so, you may wish to indicate that we share with the United States the objective of discouraging the Six from adopting a restrictive common agricultural policy and of ensuring that their future régime for agriculture will provide for adequate access on a competitive basis for our exports to the Common Market. You might also wish to suggest that an early settlement on wheat would be in our common interest.

DILLON NEGOTIATIONS – REQUEST LIST ON EEC

We have given today to Mr. Donne, Chairman of EEC delegation in Geneva, our request list on EEC as reproduced in paragraph 3. This list does not repeat not mention any rates of duty being sought by Canada during negotiations but simply enumerates products on which Canada intends to request concessions from Community. List is based on our suggestions contained in our telegram 175 March 24 and your instructions contained in above mentioned telegrams. You will note that we have made two changes which were necessitated by recent developments. We have deleted pulp (47.01 BI and II) and added paper for periodicals (48.01 EI) which now constitutes a subdivision of newsprint in EEC nomenclature.

2. We would suggest that copies of our request list be transmitted as soon as possible to appropriate authorities in all capitals of Six.

3. Following is our request list “List of products on which Canada intends to request concessions from European Economic Community.” Text begins:

02.01 BII – fresh offals; 03.01 AI – frozen salmon; 03.02 AIC – mild cured salmon; EX 04.02 – powdered, skimmed milk; EX 04.04 – cheddar cheese; 08.06 AI, AII – apples; EX 12.03 – alsike; EX 12.03 – grass seeds; EX 16.04 – canned salmon; EX 20.02G – canned vegetables; EX 22.09 – whisky and gin; 24.01 – tobacco; 29.04 CI – pentaerythritol; 29.11 EI – vanillin; EX 44.15 – Douglas fir plywood; 48.01 A – newsprint; 48.01 EI – paper for periodicals; 69.02 A – firebricks; 76.01 A – primary aluminum; 77.01 A – unwrought magnesium; 79.01 A – zinc spelter and unwrought. Text Ends.

TARIFF NEGOTIATIONS AND REY'S VISIT

1. Hugo de Grood who will be leading EEC team in Dillon negotiations with USA and Canada called this morning. He is pessimistic regarding the outlook for the negotiations with USA.

2. Apparently the Community is not repeat not prepared to go very far into the Dillon Round until the general position vis-à-vis USA is a lot clearer. This is a reference to the outstanding USA requests with respect to agriculture. Although no repeat no final decision has been taken. It is possible that Mansholt will go to Washington around June 19 for high level discussions with Americans. If so Rey will join him from Canada.

3. De Grood does not repeat not see any alternative to such a meeting if progress is to be made but he is not repeat not hopeful of positive results. Apparently Hallstein returned from Washington with the impression that important as were the outstanding commercial policy issues, political considerations, including support for EEC, were still paramount and therefore there were no repeat no compelling reasons why the Community should do very much to meet USA on agriculture. This impression has been reinforced in various conversations with Ball in which he is reported to have emphasized the need to consult with State as well as USDA in any talks in Washington. Quite apart from the above consideration Rey and Mansholt remain personally convinced that USA demands are extreme and that in any event it would not repeat not be possible or desirable to meet them given the present delicate stage in intra Six relations concerning the common agricultural policy. In sum Rey and Mansholt would go to Washington without conviction as to the need for substantial compromise and with little if any room for manoeuvre.

4. We told de Grood that Canada would expect to be represented in any meetings between the Community and Americans which touched on the negotiations with respect to wheat and coarse grains.

5. The unwillingness of the Community to move very far with USA pending clarification of the agricultural situation seems likely to affect our own timetable of negotiations with EEC. The long delay in moving forward on the Community's counter offer on wheat seems to be clouding the atmosphere which has hitherto marked our negotiations with EEC. Yesterday Donne showed some signs of irritation with our attitude and indicated that negotiations with Canada would probably have to wait until after EEC has negotiated with countries with which agreements under XXIV:6 had been reached.

6. All addressees please safeguard de Grood's information.

GATT ARTICLE XXIV:6 WHEAT

Last evening we were called to the Office of International Trade, State Department, where Weiss (Deputy Director) speaking under instructions, told us that USA position on the GATT XXIV:6 negotiations had been reconsidered in the light of under Secretary Ball's recent discussions in European capitals. It was now anticipated that Mansholt and Rey would visit Washington on or shortly after July 7 and USA authorities had concluded that the discussions here should be conducted at the Cabinet level (i.e. by Ball and Secretary Freeman) with a view to reaching definitive agreement on an agricultural package which Mansholt could recommend to the Six. In these circumstances USA authorities considered that it would "not repeat not be practicable to provide for Canadian participation in the discussions" and that the Canada-USA Common Front on agriculture should be discontinued.

2. Weiss emphasized that this change of USA thinking did not repeat not imply any intention of USA to settle with EEC at the expense of Canadian interests. It was, he said, motivated by: (a) the desire to retain maximum flexibility in the discussions with Mansholt with a view to reaching bilateral agreement without further consultation with third parties; (b) the desire to concentrate on commodities of primary interest to USA. While USA agricultural package had not repeat not yet been worked out in detail, State Department would argue interdepartmentally in favour of dropping rye and buckwheat, which were of interest to Canada, and it appeared desirable to inform us of this now rather than retract on these two commodities during the course of the negotiations with Mansholt; (c) expressions of Canadian concern that a satisfactory Canadian wheat settlement might be prejudiced by delays inherent in maintaining the Common Front.

3. Weiss went on to say that there had been no repeat no change in the USA estimate of the importance of the wheat settlement or of the desirability of delaying a settlement pending conclusion of the efforts of Canadian and USA representatives in Geneva to work out a satisfactory counter-proposal. They still considered that there was some hope of obtaining EEC agreement to a wheat formula somewhat better than the April 27 offer and that Canadian acceptance of a settlement at this time would be prejudicial to the chances of serving such an improved formula. Weiss indicated that USA authorities were particularly anxious to make provision for normal imports during the "interim period." They therefore hoped that Corse and Warren would continue to work on an agreed counter proposal which USA, for its part, might then submit as part of its own package to Mansholt. This would represent the final "showdown" in the Article XXIV:6 negotiations as far as USA was concerned. If it was not repeat not successful, USA would have no repeat no alternative but to consider withdrawing concessions.

4. Weiss recognized that Canadian authorities would now have to consider how to proceed so as to protect our own interests and that USA authorities had less reason than previously to ask us to delay settling on wheat. He recognized that we might wish to proceed to a settlement without delay but he repeated his personal conviction that USA would not repeat not settle on a wheat formula less satisfactory than Canada could accept and said that he personally thought that it would probably be best for the interests of both countries if we hold off until after USA discussions with Mansholt. Weiss said that USA authorities would in any event keep us informed of the course of these discussions, and the likelihood of EEC acceptance of an improved wheat formula. Conversely, Weiss indicated that if Canada decided to settle more or less on the present basis, USA recognized that it would be unlikely to obtain an improved formula for wheat, and that this formula would also be the best that could be hoped for in respect to coarse grains.

5. Much of the foregoing information emerged as a result of our questioning. However, Weiss was uncharacteristically reticent on a number of points on which we failed to obtain clarification. We are left with the impression that as a result of Ball's European tour, USA authorities have concluded that a settlement of the agricultural package with EEC is possible but that USA will have to withdraw on some of its demands. In these circumstances, they can "live with" the kind of settlement which is shaping up for wheat (and, by projection, for coarse grains) but wish to be entirely free in their discussions with Mansholt to negotiate other elements in the package which perhaps in part because of congressional pressures, are of more unique importance to USA.

6. There is no repeat no doubt that the reversal of USA position has come as a surprise to USA officials, including Weiss. We, of course, did not repeat not comment in substance but indicated that the Canadian authorities had, on the basis of views previously expressed by USA, been acting on the assumption that the "Common Front" would be maintained through the Mansholt discussions and had regarded Canadian participation in the wheat portion of these discussions as important. The abrupt reversal of USA position was, therefore, likely to cause some serious concern. Weiss indicated that USA authorities would be prepared to take another look at the situation if the Canadian authorities had strong views. Weiss ended by saying that a message would be sent this weekend to Corse, who had not repeat not yet been informed. He also asked that the information given above, which bears on USA negotiating position, be restricted to Canadian officials.

GATT ARTICLE XXIV:6 – WHEAT

1. Your proposal to proceed with a wheat settlement with the Six has been considered at the official level. In our latest discussions with Warren on this matter, we had reservations about the appropriateness of Canada being responsible for breaking the Common Front with the U.S. in these negotiations. However, we would agree that in the light of Washington Message 1788 of June 3 this reservation is no longer valid and it would be appropriate for you to proceed with the negotiations on our own account.

2. We have reviewed the terms of your proposed counter-proposal to the E.E.C. and feel that the kind of settlement you suggest we could obtain would meet our preoccupation with regard to quantitative access during the interim period. With regard to timing, you will have noted the suggestion from Weiss reported in the message from Washington to the effect that he personally thought it probably would be best for the interests of both countries if we hold off until after U.S.A. discussions with Mansholt. This is a matter for your own judgment and we assume that you consider it is not worth the risk.

3. In view of the major importance of wheat and since the XXIV:6 settlement is all that we will be getting out of this Tariff Conference with respect to wheat, we have felt it important to seek confirmation from ministers before the agreement is firmed up. In the meantime, it would be appropriate for you to put forward your counterproposals to the Six.

Geneva, July 27, 1961

Dear Mr. Donne:

As you know I am going back to Canada at the end of this month. While I shall continue to lead the Delegation it is unlikely that I will be returning to Geneva during the remainder of the Conference.

I had very much hoped that by now it would have been possible to finish the Article XXIV:6 negotiations with respect to wheat. However, the difficulties which have recently arisen in the Member Countries concerning the agreement negotiated with you and M. Rabot seem to preclude this for the time being. I am glad to hear, however, of M. Rabot's confidence that the wheat settlement can be brought to conclusion in late September or early October.

You will appreciate that the failure to agree on wheat and the absence of any offers from the Community for the coarse grains in respect of which Canada has negotiating rights, together with our concern about the inadequacy of the concessions offered for aluminum and canned salmon, make it impossible at present for the Canadian delegation to consider bringing the Article XXIV:6 negotiations to a satisfactory close.

Given the expectation that the outstanding difficulties can be worked out during the remainder of the Conference it is not my intention to make Canadian entry into the Dillon round negotiations with the Community conditional on prior agreement or understandings with respect to wheat and the other products I have mentioned. To do so would involve further delay in what has already been a long conference and might be prejudicial to a mutually beneficial final result. However you will realize that Canadian willingness to conclude Dillon negotiations with the Community and to terminate the Article XXIV:6 negotiations with or without reservation must be conditional on a satisfactory agreement with respect to wheat and would also require progress in dealing with the other problems I have mentioned.

So that I may give an accurate report on the situation to Canadian Ministers when I return to Ottawa I should be grateful if in acknowledging this letter you would take note of the position herein outlined and indicate your willingness to proceed on the basis I have suggested.

Yours sincerely,

H.B. MCKINNON

GATT: FUTURE OF DILLON ROUND TARIFF NEGOTIATIONS

1. You may have seen press reports, notably that in the Times of September 28, that Dillon Round timing had slipped again and that negotiations could not repeat not be concluded until end November. This is not repeat not quite the whole story.

2. At Tariff Negotiation Committee on September 26 there were some pessimistic comments, notably from the Chairman, Wyndham-White, that insufficient progress was being made to enable the main negotiations to be concluded in substance by October 31 and indeed that the smaller negotiations (Switzerland/EEC, Sweden/EEC) were far behind schedule. This was intended not repeat not as a prophecy but more as an attempt to goad Americans to decisive action.

3. The Dillon negotiations are indeed almost at a stand-still, for the following reasons. First, the inability of USA delegation to take a definitive position on the major items outstanding from Article XXIV:6 negotiations with EEC (wheat, coarse grains, other agricultural products, automobiles and parts) and to decide the scope of the final and revised USA offer to the EEC in the Dillon Round. Second, the inability of the EEC delegation to take any initiative, and even to proceed with the bilateral negotiations with any degree of competence. Our UK and USA colleagues report that in the absence of Donne negotiators facing them show an almost incompetence, and that no repeat no progress is being made on the resolution of even minor statistical difficulties. Hijzen has now recognized this problem and has asked Schell, Dutch representative here, to attend all negotiating meetings and to report to him. Third, the inability of the Special Committee of the EEC, and indeed of the Council of Ministers, to make decisions affecting these negotiations. This is believed here to be due in the main to stalling by French, who are believed to be seeking a watering down of EEC linear offer, either by cutting it from 20 percent to 10 percent, or by having a significant number of items withdrawn.

4. Wyndham-White is convinced (in part by advice from Klein) that in the absence of some USA initiative French stalling tactics will lead to protracted negotiations, running into December and January, and virtual failure of the Conference. Senior members of American delegation are well aware of these difficulties but they have not repeat not been able to get instructions which would enable them to take appropriate steps to force the pace. Corse accordingly returned to Washington last Saturday to seek a new mandate. Meanwhile Wyndham-White has been in touch with Ball, who has promised to get the additional White House authority apparently needed to conclude negotiations with EEC. Wyndham-White has put it to Ball that if the negotiations are not repeat not concluded in substance prior to the opening of UK/EEC negotiations in Brussels in mid-November there will be a serious risk that UK/EEC tariff negotiations here will collapse, in large part because these tariff negotiations will appear more and more anomalous. This could well endanger the whole Conference. Further, if a Ministerial Meeting of CPS is to address itself to new proposals for reduction in barriers to trade it is essential that the main Dillon Round negotiations be concluded in substance prior to that meeting.

5. When October 31st target was set it was realized that a further month or two would be needed for the conclusion of minor negotiations, for documentation, signing of agreements, etc.

6. In part as a result of Klein's urging, Wyndham White has now proposed to Ball that USA make high level representations in Paris to persuade French to abandon their stalling tactics. It is proposed to make similar representations in Rome, Bonn and Brussels so as not repeat not to appear to be singling French out for USA attack. To concert these proposals Wyndham-White is meeting with Martin (State) Freeman, Secretary of Agriculture and Corse next Tuesday in Paris.

7. We have reviewed with Wyndham-White Canadian negotiating position vis-à-vis USA and EEC in outline; we have asked him in speaking to USA representatives about a possible agricultural settlement under Article XXIV:6 to press USA to settle wheat now on the basis of the present Canadian proposals. Wyndham-White is aware that if USA were to open its own negotiations on wheat our position might be undercut.

8. We hope you will agree that these developments make it quite essential that we be authorized to put a significant expanded offer to USA on the table, and to move as rapidly as possible to conclude an agreement. If a result of the proposals to be considered in Paris, USA does move to conclude main negotiations by end October and if we do not repeat not get into real negotiations soon, we will seem to be playing a rather unhelpful and obstructive role. We will find ourselves negotiating under pressure and in a situation which will not repeat not help us to get a balanced agreement. By the same token, if we can now move fairly quickly we should be able to capitalize on the desire of USA delegation to reach agreements quickly. They would value an early agreement with Canada in order to force the pace with their other major trading partners. This could be turned to our advantage.

9. In sum, it seems to us that rapid action by us in getting into effective negotiations with USA is imperative, both to maximize the possibilities of making a good agreement with USA, and perhaps more important of doing what we can to ensure that the Dillon Round does not repeat not collapse, with all the serious consequences that that would have for USA trade policy.

TARIFF NEGOTIATIONS – WHEAT SETTLEMENT

We made our representations to the Commission today to Mansholt who was accompanied by Rabot, Meyer Burckhardt and Mostin as well as Hoven, Rey's Assistant Chef de Cabinet. Rey was unable to attend.

2. Our approach was along the following line. Our Tariff Delegation in Geneva had agreed on a draft settlement which the Commission had undertaken to have approved by EEC countries. Indications that the Community might not repeat not ratify that agreement had seriously disturbed Canadian authorities. The proposed settlement was on the one hand less than Canada considered herself entitled to by virtue of her existing contractual rights and on the other hand was in accord with the Community's philosophy for a Common Agricultural Policy. A satisfactory wheat settlement was of vital importance to Canada in the context of Article XXIV:6 negotiations and Canadian-EEC trade relations generally. We hoped that at their meeting tomorrow the Council would approve the agreement as it had emerged from Geneva negotiations.

3. Mansholt said our representations were timely. The draft settlement as negotiated by Rabot would have the full support of the Commission in Article III Committee and since the matter would probably not repeat not be settled there because a political decision was involved before the Council itself. Unfortunately unanimous approval of all six member states was required and France was opposed. Mansholt did not repeat not give us any reason to believe the draft settlement would be approved in its present form, particularly in regard to coverage but he made it clear the Commission would press for it.

4. Rabot pointed out he had warned our Tariff Delegation during the negotiations that French might cause difficulties, particularly on the question of coverage of the draft settlement.

Following for Minister Trade and Commerce from Warren.

Tariff Delegation's reference telegram reports prospective impasse in our important tariff negotiations with USA. Although delegation is holding line on our latest settlement proposals, there is imminent danger of no repeat no agreement or only a most limited bargain promising little trade gain. From point of view of our exports we should certainly endeavour to secure concessions of priority interest which are offered by USA. But a sound and broad agreement with USA, or failure to secure such an agreement, is also very important from point of view of Canadian interest in USA Government's very recent proposals for a new trade policy which would overcome the limitations of present reciprocal trade agreements legislation.¹⁰⁶

2. In circumstances I wish to suggest that Canadian side make a further effort to help secure a settlement. This should, however, be matched by a change in the rigid attitude so far adopted by USA Delegation in Geneva.

3. Much seems to depend on the exaggerated value which USA Delegation attaches to a concession on aluminum. This is an item we are anxious to obtain and our Department would greatly regret its exclusion from package.

4. Although USA is asking for much more (paragraph 4 reference telegram) I think it would be worthwhile to try for larger package suggested by Tariff Delegation (paragraph 5 reference telegram) through offering to eliminate our tariff on the important commodity on which I gave you a memorandum last month and which you will readily identify.

¹⁰⁶ Voir/See George Ball, "Threshold of a New Trading World," Department of State Bulletin, Vol. 45, No. 1169 (November 20, 1961), pp. 831-37.

5. Mr. Fleming has already discussed this commodity with Prime Minister who at the time was disinclined to authorise. I wish to suggest, and Mr. Fleming agrees, that you might reopen the subject with Mr. Diefenbaker. Thereafter it would also be necessary to talk with Mr. Nowlan. Hector McKinnon would, I know, be glad to brief you for these discussions.
6. Issue is whether or not repeat not we are to get a tariff agreement with the USA covering over $260 million of trade. In this connection particular tariff concession to which I have referred may well be critical. Against this must, of course, be measured presentational difficulties in the province particularly affected. An offsetting factor would of course be the lower costs in the parts of the country where American product is used.
7. Mr. Fleming, who has seen this message and who will be back in Ottawa on Tuesday, would be glad if you should decide to take up this important cause, and would of course continue to support it. He has spoken to Mr. Ball about state of the tariff negotiations and has urged that USA Delegation be given more flexible instructions to permit a mutually satisfactory agreement with Canada.

NEGOTIATIONS WITH U.S.

For Grey from Annis

1. This morning Mr. Fleming reviewed the suggestions for further Canadian offers affecting agricultural products which were set out in Richards' letter of November 16.† Turner was present and had cleared with his Minister where required. Mr. Hees had been expected, but was unable to attend.

2. The Minister's decisions were as follows:

7(b) – Edible offal – You may offer to match the proposed U.S. reduction.

14 – Tallow – You may approach Australian Delegation on basis suggested and if they agree, may offer U.S. a reduction to 15 percent.

EX.45A, EX.46 – Bread – Offer of 7½ percent rate is authorized. Please note that wrapped bread is dutiable under item 45A at 20 percent.

EX.90B – Prepared horseradish – Reduction to 17½ percent is authorized.

99E(2) – Dates, N.O.P. – No repeat no change is authorized. Canadian date packers would strongly oppose any reduction. Present item provides only incentive to import in bulk and pack in Canada. Trade coverage is much less than you thought. Your figures include dates already free under items 99D(1) and (2) and 99E(1). Free entry under item 99D(1) and (2) was provided for in 1959 budget. Since then nearly all imports have been free. Dutiable imports from U.S. were only $66,000 in 1959 and $29,000 in 1960. Effect of a concession on item 99E(2) would be to encourage imports from Iraq and Iran to come in packages rather than being packaged at Halifax, St. John and Toronto as at present.

EX.45A, 66A, 141 – Flour mixes, biscuits and sugar candy – No repeat no reductions can be authorized on these items.

EX.711 et al – Canned dog food and canned cat food – Reduction from 20 percent to 15 percent is authorized on canned product. The concession would not repeat not cover dog biscuits or other pet food.

EX.208T, EX.711 – Dried brewers yeast for animal feed – Removal of duty is authorized. We will accept U.S. suggestion that item 219G be amended by deletion of words “when valued at more than twenty-five cents per pound.” Item should be numbered 219G et al.

5(d) – Animals, living, N.O.P. – If U.S. introduces proposed reduction from 7½ percent to 5½ percent, you may offer to go to 5 percent. However you should know that imports actually dutiable under this item are only about $100,000 per annum. Statistical classification includes some imports free under other items.

152(g) – Blended orange and grapefruit juice – This important item is somewhat sensitive. Accordingly you should not repeat not put it in play unless full value can be obtained for it. The Minister has authorized offer of reduction to 7½ percent only if it is clear that U.S. place a high value on it.

152(h) – Fruit juices, N.O.P. – This item includes apple juice and grape juice. Apple juice is sensitive and grape juice very sensitive. No repeat no concession can be authorized.

TARIFF NEGOTIATIONS: GENERAL REPORT

In your reference telegram you asked for a general report on state of play at Tariff Conference.

2. There are a number of major negotiations not repeat not yet concluded. They all wait upon a settlement between EEC and USA. EEC and USA have more or less merged their Article XXIV:6 and Dillon negotiations; as reported in our telegram 2118 December 21† USA have put to EEC certain proposals involving wheat, poultry, coarse grains, rice, certain non-cap items, automobiles and parts, and are now awaiting EEC's response. Whether EEC can respond effectively while major decisions are not repeat not yet taken regarding cap is an open question.

3. UK/EEC and UK/USA Dillon Round agreements and Canada/EEC XXIV:6 agreement are all integrally connected to USA/EEC negotiation and therefore cannot repeat not be concluded until USA and EEC have reached an overall settlement. Both UK agreements are substantial (i.e. cover some hundreds of millions of dollars to trade) and could, we are told, be signed almost immediately USA and EEC settle.

4. Canada has concluded and signed Dillon Round agreements with Israel, Portugal, Spain, USA; we have had exploratory talks with Switzerland, Sweden, Nigeria and EEC and have concluded that there are no repeat no basis for Dillon negotiations with those countries; Swiss are pressing us to review position; we have had inconclusive talks with Danes.

5. Australia has withdrawn from Dillon Round. Only UK agreement signed is with Israel. USA has formally concluded Dillon Round agreements with Austria, Cambodia. Canada, Denmark, Haiti, Israel, Pakistan, Peru, Portugal and Switzerland, and there are a number of others (e.g. New Zealand) in the mill. (We are sending one copy of each of USA lists of concessions, as they become available, to Warren by bag.) Norway has concluded with Cambodia and Israel. EEC has concluded with Israel (subject to inclusion of certain concessions in EEC/USA agreements) and Cambodia.

6. As for negotiations for accession: Israel and Portugal had concluded enough negotiations to warrant CPS admitting them to agreement at end of 19th session. Cambodian delegation has gone home, having concluded with Norway, Czechoslovakia, USA, Sweden, EEC. Spanish return here January 8 to resume key negotiations with EEC and USA; Spain had formally concluded only with Canada.

7. Swedish and Swiss Dillon negotiations with EEC, which once threatened to hold up Conference, will presumably become less significant now that decisions have been taken to open negotiations for association.

8. For Canadian Tariff Delegation, remaining tasks are to seek XXIV:6 settlement with EEC (wheat, coarse grains, aluminum), to reach agreement on legal issues with EEC, prepare Canadian schedules to protocols, check other countries schedules and to seek settlement of Article XXVIII textile renegotiations.

OSLO MEETING: REVIEW OF THE WORLD SITUATION

The course of events at ministerial meetings is always hard to anticipate but you would probably want us to suggest how discussion might develop. On this basis, we should be inclined to speculate as follows. As you will recall, it has been recommended that Mr. Rusk should open the discussion on the review of the international situation. The usual background papers have been provided on the USSR, Eastern Europe, the Mid East and Far East and Africa. There is also Section 1 of the Secretary-General's annual political appraisal which bears on this subject. This year's appraisal, submitted by the Acting Secretary-General, is more drab than in Mr. Spaak's days. The background papers, while useful reference documents, are not repeat not of themselves likely to promote much discussion if any.

2. It seems to us, therefore, that there is a very good chance that the review of the world situation is likely not repeat not to be closely related to the background papers on the annual political appraisal but to concentrate on certain specific subjects such as Laos, Cuba, Angola, disarmament, Berlin, Germany and possibly China. Laos seems particularly likely to come up for discussion because four of the ministers attending the NATO Conference will presumably be going on to Geneva for the Conference on Laos. It would not repeat not be surprising if many of the remaining eleven wanted the four who will be going to expose their views on Laos. This would be particularly so if the four were to meet together while in Oslo. There might even be some tendency to expect the four to possess somewhat similar attitudes or, alternatively or in addition, to take with them an expression of the views of their other NATO colleagues. In other words, there may be some tendency to want a discussion on Laos. This should not repeat not however lead to a reference to Laos in the communiqué. Lord Home, as co-chairman of Geneva Conference, intends to participate in debate according to UK permanent representative.

3. Cuba is not repeat not mentioned in any experts paper because there is no repeat no expert group on Latin America. We understand that Mr. Rusk will refer to Cuba in his remarks, and there may be a tendency on the part of the majority to give support to Mr. Rusk.

4. Angola is certain to be mentioned by the Portuguese Foreign Minister. His remarks are likely to be bitter. He may concentrate on the Portuguese thesis that when one member of the Alliance deems its vital interests to be involved in a subject being discussed at the UN the other members of the Alliance have an obligation, if they cannot support the member, at least to refrain from strengthening the hands of the ally's opponents. The Portuguese permanent representative has already attacked USA policy in this respect at length and severely. In his reply the USA representative put forward the suggestion, which we understood was his personal idea rather than something taken from his instructions, to the effect that it would be useful in this context to consider whether USA and UN attitudes on colonial questions are in error. This suggests a possible and useful counterpoise to Portuguese complaints over lack of support on Angola, along the line that what the Portuguese want to discuss is only half the question: it is not repeat not just a question of whether what its allies are doing is bad for Portugal, but also of whether Portuguese colonial policy is bad for the Alliance. This problem has never been tackled in NATO discussions. Oslo might provide an opportunity to divert discussion from recriminations into a more fruitful approach to the liquidation of the problem of colonialism. We must realize however that it is bound to make bad blood between some allies.

5. A suggestion has already been made that the Permanent Council should review the Western disarmament position as it was left on June 27, 1960. It is possible that this idea will take root in a number of foreign ministries. An early meeting of the newly created committee would in our view be unrewarding. It is also possible that the depressing course of the Geneva talks on nuclear test suspension will have resulted in a reappraisal of the value of those negotiations by the UK and the USA. It would in addition be surprising if there were no repeat no curiosity to know how the private discussions between the USA and the USSR forecast in their statements in the First Committee of UNGA were progressing.

6. Recent reports speculate about the possibility that Khrushchev has already come to the conclusion that he must not repeat not expect to get much out of the Kennedy administration. It seems possible that some participants might want to link this idea with German and USA ideas which have been current for some time about Soviet intentions to promote another Berlin crisis during 1961. NATO has little part in contingency planning of late and has very little knowledge of what contingency planning has been done by others. There could well be an attempt to try to secure better knowledge of plans already formulated. The Acting Secretary-General's political appraisal notwithstanding, no repeat no substantial progress has been made on NATO consideration of possible economic countermeasures to communist pressure below the crisis level. We believe that Mr. von Brentano will press hard for firm support from Germany's allies for the classical German position on Berlin and Germany, and that he will want a strong reference to it in the communiqué. Lord Home is expected to suggest that the USSR will make things difficult for the West over Berlin shortly.

7. On China in view of closeness of Geneva Conference on Laos there may be a tendency to try to develop a common Western appraisal of the value and modalities of allowing Communist China to take the Chinese seat in the UN. There may even be some desire to try to harmonize Western policies.

8. It seems to us possible that in addition to concentrating on particular questions such as those we have discussed in paragraphs 2 to 7 there will be a tendency to mention some of them in relation to the principle of political consultation. Political consultation is one of the subjects which should come up for discussion under long-term planning and it is most likely that some Foreign Ministers, such as Mr. Spaak, will speak of the inadequacies of our past political consultation (as they see it) in relation to the review of the world situation. In this context they would probably complain about the inadequacy of consultation in relation to specific questions such as Cuba, Africa, etc. In doing so it is to be expected that several will be prepared to welcome a greater degree of harmonization, or co-ordination or agreement on policy even on problems outside the NATO area as a result of consultation in NATO than has been the case until now. The views expressed by Messrs. Harriman and Acheson in their remarks to the Council are likely to lend strength to this tendency. Secretary Rusk's views will be important in this regard.

9. We have heard no repeat no suggestions so far that there will be a post-mortem on the last session of the UN as such. Discussion of questions like Cuba, Angola, and disarmament will probably tend to involve discussion of the UN, but we would suspect that the attitude of most members will show very little change from that which became apparent at the December Ministerial Meeting.

10. Enquiries suggest that Mr. Rusk is likely to concentrate on Cuba, political consultation and NATO strategy. Lord Home is expected to concentrate on Laos and on NATO strategy, without, as the UK permanent representative puts it, becoming involved in military matters. Mr. Spaak is expected to concentrate on political consultation, Mr. von Brentano on Berlin and the German problem, and the Portuguese Foreign Minister (who may not repeat not be Matthias) on Angola.

11. I shall check with Mr. Stikker when he returns next week to try to learn how he intends to conduct the meetings in Oslo.

MEETING OF NATO FOREIGN MINISTERS,
OSLO, MAY 8-10 – CANADIAN POSITION

This is the meeting of Foreign Ministers of NATO countries which takes place each spring to discuss the main issues of international concern, the problems of the Alliance and to review planning in the non-military fields.

2. The agenda includes the following main items:

- (i) Review of the international situation;
- (ii) Annual political appraisal;
- (iii) Long Term Planning;
- (iv) Special economic problems of Greece and Turkey;
- (v) Other business;
- (vi) Date and place of next meeting;
- (vii) Communiqué.

3. Since the agenda is cast in general terms and does not reflect accurately the main substantive issues facing the Alliance, we have prepared for the guidance of the Canadian Delegation the attached paper which sets out proposed guide lines on the main substantive problems which are likely to arise at Oslo.

4. While in accordance with traditional practice, the meeting will be concerned primarily with non-military items, it is reported that two or three Ministers may make reference to NATO strategy under the third item "Long Term Planning." It is expected that Ministers will be asked to approve a procedural resolution recommending that the Permanent Council continue its discussions of NATO strategy. With this in mind we have included a section on NATO strategy in the attached paper. This Section (III) has been approved by the Minister of National Defence.

5. I recommend that the attached paper be authorized as guidance for the Canadian Delegation at the Oslo Ministerial Meeting.

NATO FOREIGN MINISTERS MEETING – OSLO
GUIDELINES FOR CANADIAN DELEGATION

I. GENERAL

Canada wishes to see the Alliance strengthened. To this end it is in favour of the Permanent Council completing its review of Long-Term Planning, particularly on military and strategic questions where the discussion is still at a preliminary stage.

A good deal of progress has been made in defining the scope and objectives of consultation on political and economic questions and it seems likely that Ministers will be able to reach agreement on these aspects of consultation at the Oslo meeting. Canada considers that the exchanges in the Council on the principles and theories of consultation have been most useful. What is now required is that countries should demonstrate by their actions their willingness to consult with their partners on problems which affect the other members of the Alliance.

II. POLITICAL PROBLEMS

A major source of weakness and disunity in the Alliance is the divergence of views on (a) colonial questions and (b) international peace-keeping activities.

(a) Colonial Questions

The current international scene is dominated by the fact that subject peoples everywhere are demanding the rights of freedom and self-determination and will not be satisfied with less. Refusal by the colonial powers or their friends to recognize this fact can in the long run lead only to costly defeats. If, on the other hand, the members of NATO, individually and collectively, will as a matter of policy help the progress of such areas towards the orderly development of their own political, social and economic institutions the end result in terms of peace and stability will be to the mutual advantage of all.

Some members, and particularly Portugal and Belgium, hold the view that their NATO partners should support their positions when colonial issues are discussed in other forums and particularly in the United Nations. They argue that at the very least their NATO friends should not join in attacking their policies and should consequently abstain when resolutions criticising their colonial policies are voted on.

The Canadian view, which appears to be shared by the majority of the members of the Council, is that it would be unwise to attempt to develop a NATO bloc for voting purposes at the United Nations. We consider that there should be frank exchange of views on these issues in the NATO Council so that each country can be informed of the concerns and interests of those directly concerned before deciding what position it should adopt at the United Nations or elsewhere.

(b) Peace-Keeping Activities

We consider that international peace-keeping activities are complementary to the efforts of the Alliance to maintain world peace and security. One of the striking features of the world today is that the situations which pose a serious threat to peace often arise in peripheral areas undergoing transition to independence from colonial rule; e.g. the Congo and Laos. In order to deal with such situations experience has shown that we must often rely on the activities of agencies or peace-keeping machinery sponsored by or under the auspices of broadly based organizations such as the United Nations. In our view the long-term aims of the Alliance can be furthered and NATO can gain strength if all members are prepared to recognize the important role of these peace-keeping activities in the preservation of world peace and are willing to lend their full support.

We believe that this view is shared by the majority members of NATO but there are some who disagree. France, for example, has directly criticized the United Nations and has refused to give its support to the U.N. activities in the Congo.

Progress in overcoming the present divergence of views on these issues cannot possibly be achieved unless the members of the Alliance are prepared to discuss their national policies frankly in the Council as much as possible. The NATO Council should be regarded as the clearing house for all the ideas which allies hold about world problems. Canada recognizes the need to make a more determined effort to find common ground among the allies in their international policies. But wherever common ground is found not possible, the policy of each should not be fixed according to the lowest common denominator, nor should a false unity be maintained through "papering over the cracks."

Consultative Machinery

Canada considers that the existing NATO machinery for consultation is adequate. What is required is a genuine willingness to consult; members should demonstrate by their frequent and timely use of present consultative procedures that they are anxious to avoid a situation in which the Alliance of its members would be seriously affected by the adoption of firm policies or the making of major political announcements without prior consultation.

While we believe the present machinery and procedures for consultation to be satisfactory we would not oppose the suggestion regarding the creation of new committees if and when there seems to be valid reason for their establishment, so long as they report to the appropriate existing agencies of NATO, retain their secret character and are open-ended so that all interested members of the Council may participate if they wish to do so.

We are not in favour of the suggestion for an Atlantic Policy Advisory Group and we would suggest deferring consideration of it until the new Secretary-General and the Permanent Council have had an opportunity to study it carefully since it would clearly have a bearing on his responsibilities on the activities of the Council and on his relations with it.

III. DEFENCE – NATO STRATEGY

Although this question will not be under direct discussion at Oslo, the Alliance is faced with the urgent and continuing problem of how it is to share and control its nuclear weapons in pursuit of NATO objectives. In the Canadian view the Permanent Council should continue to explore these problems; in so doing care should be taken:

(a) to ensure that nuclear weapons are only used on the basis of decisions taken at the highest level of political authority;

(b) not to endanger the chances of negotiating a universal and comprehensive disarmament treaty by letting the spread of nuclear weapons get out of hand;

(c) to prevent the unnecessary build-up of autonomous national atomic forces in order not to prejudice stability or disarmament;

(d) not to detract from the main purpose of nuclear weapons as a deterrent to war.

Canada supports the U.S.A. initiative of stressing the importance of fulfilling the obligations to build up conventional forces required for the NATO shield under MC/70 to raise the threshold of response to possible attack by conventional forces.

IV. OTHER FORMS OF NON-MILITARY COOPERATION

Canada considers that effective and mutually consistent economic policies are essential to the maintenance of the strength and solidarity of the North Atlantic Alliance and to the development of a genuine sense of community among its peoples. Thus any commercial or economic rivalries or divisions which may arise between member countries or groups of countries are a matter of concern to NATO not simply because of their economic consequences but often because of the far-reaching political implications.

Canada considers that the OECD represents an important step towards translating into practical forms of action the principles of economic cooperation embodied in Article II of the NATO Treaty. It is our hope that it may prove possible through consultations in the OECD to reduce and eventually to overcome existing economic and commercial differences and thereby strengthen the Atlantic community.

On economic questions generally Canada believes that the general line of policies which the Western countries have developed in relation to trade and aid problems are sound. We consider that if they are followed with greater vigour and determination they can be effective in countering the spread of communism through economic penetration. The Alliance can play an important role in developing the political will to pursue such policies and to accept the sacrifices which some of them involve.

The two most important consultative roles for NATO, in our view, relate to the economic consequences of the defence efforts of member countries and the methods, aims and consequences of Sino-Soviet economic policy. The implementation of our national policies in this latter respect must, however, be effected through those agencies specially suited for the tasks involved; e.g. the OECD, IBRD, IMF, etc.

Canada recognizes the special problems of the less developed countries in NATO (Greece and Turkey) and supports the proposal that a group of experts should be appointed to examine these problems in detail. While we believe that the more prosperous European countries have a special responsibility to provide assistance to the less developed members of NATO, Canada will be prepared to examine these problems constructively with its NATO partners in the light of the report of the group of experts when it is available.

V. HEADS OF GOVERNMENT MEETING

Canada attaches importance to convening, after due preparation, a NATO Heads of Government meeting. We consider that the possibility of such a meeting should be kept under continuing review by the Permanent Council in the light of developments.

N.A.T.O. FOREIGN MINISTERS' MEETING; CANADIAN POSITION

17. The Secretary of State for External Affairs said that a meeting of N.A.T.O. Foreign Ministers would be held in Oslo from May 8th to 10th to discuss the main issues of international concern, the problems of the Alliance and a review of planning in non-military fields. A memorandum had been prepared for the guidance of the Canadian delegation, setting forth proposed guidelines on the main problems. A section had been included on N.A.T.O. strategy, because it had been reported that a resolution would be proposed recommending that the Permanent Council continue its discussions of N.A.T.O. strategy. This section of the memorandum had been concurred in by the Minister of National Defence.

An explanatory memorandum had been circulated. (Minister's memorandum, May 1st – Cab. Doc. 178-61.)

18. Mr. Green went on to say that the German foreign minister had recently indicated that he wished to discuss the Berlin problem at the conference and that the West German government was proposing the inclusion of a strong reference to this subject in the conference communiqué. From the Canadian viewpoint, however, there had been no recent developments to warrant re-examination at this time of the N.A.T.O. position on Berlin, and numerous other questions were more in the forefront. On the other hand, some reference to Germany might be included in the communiqué. He recommended that the Canadian position should be that the communiqué should state that the Alliance supported the reunification of Germany by democratic means and asserted the right to protect the freedom of the people of West Berlin. He believed such a declaration would be acceptable to the United States.

19. During the discussion the following points were raised:

(a) The Berlin problem should not be a principal feature of the communiqué, but some reference to it should be included because of its importance. The approaching election in West Germany was probably a reason for the desire of that country's foreign minister to have a strong reference included.

(b) Discussion of economic assistance to Greece and Turkey would probably give rise to proposals for a greater level of assistance to underdeveloped countries. The more prosperous European countries had a special responsibility to the less developed members of N.A.T.O.

20. The Cabinet approved the recommendations of the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

(a) that the Minister's explanatory memorandum of May 1st (Cab. Doc. 178-61) be authorized as the statement of the Canadian position on various international subjects, for the guidance of the Canadian Delegation to the meeting of N.A.T.O. Foreign Ministers to be held in Oslo from May 8th to 10th; and

(b) that the Canadian Delegation be authorized to concur in the inclusion in the conference communiqué of a statement that the Alliance supported the reunification of Germany by democratic processes and re-asserted the right of the Alliance to protect the freedom of the people of West Berlin.

Rapport de la délégation à la réunion ministérielle

Report by Delegation to Ministerial Meeting

[Ottawa], May 31, 1961

NATO MINISTERIAL MEETING – OSLO – MAY 8-10

General

By common consent, the Oslo Ministerial meeting was a success. A friendly atmosphere prevailed throughout the meeting and the discussions were for the most part frank and businesslike. Credit for the success should be given to the Norwegian authorities for the excellent arrangements which were made, and to the new Secretary-General D.U. Stikker who conducted the proceedings most efficiently and in a general spirit of good humour.

In his first appearance before the Council, the United States Secretary of State impressed the Council with his lucidity of expression and competent grasp of the many problems on which he presented United States views. His performance contributed considerably to the overall success of the meeting and demonstrated that the new United States administration gives high priority to strengthening NATO cooperation and is prepared to give the kind of leadership and support which only the United States can provide.

The United Kingdom Foreign Secretary also played an active and constructive part in the discussions and reflected in a restrained yet forceful manner the renewed interest which the United Kingdom is taking in NATO affairs. The French Foreign Minister, Mr. Couve de Murville, as in the other recent NATO Ministerial meetings, made no substantial contribution to the discussions and with the exception of a fairly long intervention on the problems of Germany and Berlin, confined himself to a few academic comments on the wording employed in French versions of the drafts of the Communiqué and a general resolution on long-term planning.

From a Canadian standpoint one of the most welcome developments arising out of this meeting was the strong support given, especially by the U.S. and the U.K., to the oft-expressed Canadian view that there is no incompatibility between NATO interests and the broad interests and activities of the United Nations. Most speakers also endorsed the Canadian view that NATO should not act as a bloc at the U.N. and recognized the validity of our contention that the voting record of new U.N. members proved that it should by no means be assumed that they were committed or even inclined to support the Soviet position. (Full text of Mr. Green's statement contained at Annex "A".)†

The principal items on the agenda were the Review of the International Situation and Long-Term Planning which involved a continuation of the discussions begun at the 1960 December Ministerial Meeting on the problems of long-term planning in the non-military fields.

ITEM I – REVIEW OF THE INTERNATIONAL SITUATION

Germany and Berlin

All Ministers who spoke stressed the significance of recent evidence that the Soviet Union intends to provoke a crisis over Berlin later this year. A number expressed their belief that the timing of the expected Soviet initiative may be related to the German elections in September and the Soviet Communist Party Congress in October. It was expected that Soviet initiative would begin with an invitation to a peace conference on Germany and, in the event of a Western refusal to participate, the Communist states would get together and agree to sign a separate treaty with East Germany handing over Soviet rights and responsibilities to the East Germans.

The meeting reaffirmed that Western rights in Berlin and the freedom and security of the people in that city must be maintained. The substance of the 1958 NATO Declaration on Berlin was reaffirmed in the Communiqué¹ (copy at Annex "B")† in order to leave the Soviet Union in no doubt regarding the position of NATO members on this important issue. There was also general agreement that the Western position (as set forth at the 1959 Geneva Foreign Ministers' Conference) should be carefully examined and that this coupled with contingency planning should be a matter for continuing study by the countries most directly concerned and for consultation in the Council.

Although there was virtually no discussion of German reunification it was agreed, at the request of the German Delegation, to include in the communiqué a note of regret regarding the lack of progress on this question and a reaffirmation of the Western position that a peaceful and just solution for the problem of Germany including Berlin is to be found on the basis of self-determination.

Mr. Green remarked that the problem of Berlin posed a dilemma for both the West and Mr. Khrushchev; he observed that the latter is heavily committed to change the status quo in Berlin but there is some indication that he would like to avoid a dangerous crisis if he can do so without loss of face. After referring to the likely sequence of events surrounding any Soviet move on Berlin, Mr. Green stressed the need to examine again carefully the Western position in advance of any Soviet initiative.

Disarmament

The Council reaffirmed that disarmament by stages under effective international control remains one of the principal objectives of the Governments of NATO. Hope was expressed that the initiation by the United States of consultations with the USSR for the purpose of arriving at mutual acceptable procedures will permit the resumption of negotiations about the end of July. It was agreed that the position of the negotiating members would be developed in close consultation with the Council.

On nuclear tests, Mr. Rusk painted a bleak picture of recent developments in Geneva and reported that his government was deeply disturbed about the indefinite continuation of an "unrequited moratorium" e.g. "the suspension of tests without inspection and control and the gradual erosion of the position that effective disarmament must involve effective inspection and control."

The meeting noted with approval that the U.S.A. and the U.K. had tabled a comprehensive draft treaty, but expressed concern that the negative attitude of the Soviet Government (their introduction of the idea of a triumvirate in any control arrangements) had raised new difficulties.

After welcoming the decision of the U.S. and the USSR to consult together, which led to the unanimous adoption of the resolution on disarmament at the last session of the United Nations General Assembly, Mr. Green voiced his concern about the future and particularly the situation which may arise at the next session of the General Assembly if the West does not seize and hold the initiative on disarmament in the coming months. He said it would be necessary to develop as early as possible sound western positions on such difficult questions as the composition of the negotiating forum and the principles which should guide the resumed negotiations. The Canadian proposals for an impartial chairman and for improving the effectiveness of the disarmament commission were relevant to the first question. The principles set forth in the Commonwealth Prime Ministers communiqué should provide a useful basis for approaching the second question.

NATO and the U.N.

Considerable support was expressed for the Canadian position that there is no incompatibility between support for U.N. activities and participation in NATO. After referring to Soviet interest in exploiting or even creating conflicts of interests between the new nations and the Western countries, Mr. Green advocated, as the West's long-term aim, the bringing of the new states into the community of free nations. The immediate task particularly for the more prosperous and highly developed members of NATO should be to give as much assistance to the new emerging nations without political or other strings attached.

The United States and Norway gave strong backing to Mr. Green's contention that the voting record of new member states in the United Nations proved that it should by no means be assumed that they were committed to support the Soviet position; on the contrary they had repeatedly rejected extreme Soviet attitudes, and particularly the Soviet attack on the Secretary-General. Both the United Kingdom and the United States stressed that while the new U.N. members are often difficult and sensitive the situation presented a great opportunity for leadership; rather than allowing themselves to become disenchanted with the United Nations, NATO members should explore every opportunity to develop support for Western views.

Laos

The situation in Laos was touched on mainly by Mr. Rusk, Lord Home and Mr. Green. The former disclaimed strongly any U.S.A. interest in Laos as a base for military operations and stated that the U.S.A. was thinking only in terms of Laos as a neutral and buffer between those living in the north and those in the rest of South East Asia. At the same time they were becoming increasingly concerned about the possibility of the communization of Laos by an armed minority supported from the north. Not only was Laos covered by the protocol to the SEATO Treaty but the Laotian question could have an important impact on security arrangements in other parts of the world, and on the attitude of other countries in the long-term struggle between the Communist world and the free world. Lord Home observed that the West had a perfectly respectable policy of neutrality for Laos. The important thing was to hold the Russians to their proclaimed acceptance of neutrality and if they did not live up to their obligations in this regard, the West should make it clear to the world who can live with independence and with neutralism and who cannot.

Referring to the forthcoming meeting in Geneva Mr. Green advocated that the conference should seek to re-establish a position based on the 1954 Geneva Accords, i.e. a unified and peaceful Laos with neutral status, no foreign bases, no military formations on Laos territory, and foreign policy based on strict non-alignment. Neutrality should be supported by such agreements or declarations as would ensure recognition throughout the international community. He pointed to the problem of reconciling neutral status with economic and technical aid from outside powers and indicated that the control required in such a situation might be one of the responsibilities given to the International Supervisory Commission.

Congo

The main statement on the Congo was delivered by Mr. Spaak who made a relatively moderate plea for greater respect for international law by the United Nations and for not attempting to force a settlement on Katanga. He underlined his government's willingness to cooperate with the U.N. and urged that there be a thorough discussion of the Congo problem in NATO. He criticized the report of the Africa Committee especially in that it lacked any positive recommendations for action.

In the Canadian view, the main Western aims should be to preserve a neutral Congo in which legitimate Western interest may be maintained. Mr. Green contended that this objective can best be served by continuing to concentrate on action through the United Nations. He stressed the need for sustained and active support from the West; passive endorsement of the U.N. was not enough.

Peace-Keeping Activities

Using the Congo and Laos as illustrations, Mr. Green drew attention to the important contribution made by broadly based international peace-keeping activities to the broad objectives of the Alliance, the preservation of world peace and security. In particular such activities have usually been successful in insulating the major military powers from local conflicts or disturbances. Over the years, he said, Canada has taken it for granted that such activities have the full support of NATO members because they promote the peaceful aims of the Alliance. If members had any doubts about the value of these activities he said Canada would like to know about them. In the Canadian view, support for such activities should not be regarded as inconsistent with support for the Alliance. He emphasized that participation in such activities would not affect our agreed commitments to NATO and that taken together with our NATO commitments constitute what we would regard as Canada's contribution in global terms to the preservation of world peace and security.

Angola

The Portuguese Foreign Minister made a smooth but inflexible statement which was critical of the U.N. and which outlined Portuguese colonial policy in familiar terms; these views were rejected in a moderate manner by a number of representatives, especially Mr. Rusk, Lord Home and Mr. Lange.

The Turkish Foreign Minister was pretty well alone in expressing sympathy for Portuguese point of view. Surprisingly, Mr. Spaak took a rather defensive and fairly cooperative line on colonial issues. The French Foreign Minister did not intervene. The result of the discussion was that the Portuguese could not have been left in any doubt that they lack support for their policies from most members of the Alliance.

Cuba

As part of a general statement, Mr. Rusk spoke of United States concern about the situation in Cuba and of the need to apprise its partners of the situation. He made it clear that the United States would not intervene militarily with its own forces in Cuba but that the Castro régime had to be isolated politically, economically and, to the greatest extent possible, psychologically from the rest of the Western hemisphere. As the Foreign Minister of a country bordering on the Soviet Union and clearly concerned about the far-reaching implications of U.S. policy on Cuba, Mr. Lange "noted with satisfaction Secretary Rusk's assurance that there is no intention to intervene by force of arms against the Castro régime in Cuba, so close to the United States, even though that régime seems more and more firmly to align itself with the Sino-Soviet bloc.

Mr. Green said Canada shared the U.S. concern about the evidence of Castro's increasing orientation towards the Soviet bloc but that we were less certain that the use of "socialist" by Castro in his May Day speech was conclusive proof of complete adherence by Cuba to the Soviet bloc. There would still appear to be a strong nationalist element in the revolutionary movement and many of the social and economic changes could not and perhaps should not be reversed. In the Canadian view there was no practicable alternative to the principle that the Cuban people themselves should choose their own form of government. Outside interference might well do more harm than good. If there is to be international action it should at least carry the judgement of the other Latin American countries. Canada hoped that the possibility of negotiations would not be ruled out even if the prospect of concrete results were slight. Mr. Green added that it would seem desirable to try to make the attempt for the sake of relations with Latin America and for the sake of world opinion.

ITEM II – SECRETARY-GENERAL'S ANNUAL POLITICAL APPRAISAL

There was no discussion of the Secretary-General's report but the Danish Foreign Minister seized the opportunity to express concern about the detrimental effects on NATO political and military cooperation and European economic cooperation of a lasting split of Europe into two economic groups. He said Denmark would welcome a United Kingdom decision to negotiate towards its accession to the Treaty of Rome. If such a decision were taken, Denmark, because of its close ties with the U.K. and continental Europe, would wish to initiate similar negotiations. He concluded by suggesting that the final NATO communiqué should contain a reference to European economic integration and to the importance which NATO attaches to an early and equitable solution of the problem.

Mr. Spaak generally endorsed Mr. Krag's remarks and urged a substantive discussion of the problem in the NATO Council. Lord Home agreed with Mr. Krag on the importance of resolving the split in Europe and on the essentially political aspects of closer U.K. association with the Six. He said that in studying the problem, the United Kingdom would consult closely with her EFTA and Commonwealth partners. With respect to NATO consultation on this question, Lord Home shared the views of other speakers, including Mr. Green, that the OECD was better suited to discuss the problem fully and that it would not be advisable to refer to the question in the final communiqué.

ITEM III – LONG TERM PLANNING

Political Consultation

It was evident during the discussion of the international situation the previous day, that the scope and quality of political consultation had improved significantly. During the discussion of Item III most Ministers expressed general agreement with the report prepared by the Permanent Council which recommended that the objectives and political consultations should be:

- (a) to achieve a common policy on subjects of direct concern to the Alliance as a whole,
- (b) to coordinate or at least to harmonize policies to the maximum extent possible wherever complete agreement can be reached,
- (c) to avoid a situation in which the Alliance or any of its members would be seriously affected by the adoption of firm policies or the making of major political announcements without prior consultation.

Lord Home reflected the consensus when he said that what is really important is that each member of the Alliance should be conscious of the views of its partners on important international problems and that all should make a conscientious effort to harmonize their policies as far as possible. As stated by Mr. Rusk, coherence in NATO can be achieved “through seeking a consensus of our allies on major policy questions and this means consulting frankly about policies which are still in a formative stage and being willing to alter policies in the light of such discussions. At the optimum the consensus should be an agreement on common action in the best interest of the Alliance as a whole but at the minimum there should be an understanding on how to handle a disagreement so as to cause the minimum damage to the coalition.”

In effect, most speakers acknowledged that on certain issues, especially colonial questions, it was difficult to expect agreement and that we should not always attempt to achieve unanimity. Mr. Luns emphasized the need for frankness and said that silence can often be misunderstood especially if it is followed by disagreement in some other forum. Because of the friendly and informal atmosphere of the Council frankness should not lead to embarrassment or to friction; members should be willing to listen to criticism and to accept the fact that allies may have very valid reasons for disagreement.

On problems where the views of members obviously differ, Lord Home emphasized the need to keep our eyes open and to proceed with caution. He stressed that NATO should not lay itself open to accusations of interfering in the internal affairs of countries outside the Alliance, especially in Africa. He reminded the Council that the newly emerging states are very sensitive to any contacts within the military alliance.

On United Nations questions a number of speakers endorsed the Canadian view that members of the Alliance should not give the impression that we are acting as a bloc in the United Nations. Mr. Rusk mentioned that while the Council should be the primary forum for consulting, it is not as well suited to consultations on fast-moving situations which is usually the case at the United Nations or in respect of the pressing situation in Laos. The important thing is to have prior consultation in NATO on general policy objectives so that Governments are in a better position to deal closely with each other when critical moments of decision arise.

There was general agreement with the Canadian view that having completed its report the Council had gone as far as it could usefully go at this time in defining the objectives and principles of consultation. (Text of Mr. Green's statement at Annex C.)† What was now required was to ensure that these principles are fully and effectively applied. In the light of the attention being paid to issues outside the NATO area Mr. Green underlined the importance of not losing sight of the problems such as Germany and Berlin which were of direct concern to the Alliance as a whole.

New Consultative Machinery

Although there was no support for the United States proposal for an Atlantic Policy Advisory Committee it was agreed to give further study to a United Kingdom suggestion that meetings of planning experts be held once or twice a year. Ministers also approved in principle a United States proposal for special committees to deal with particular problems or areas on an ad hoc basis. As defined by Mr. Rusk, with Canadian support, it was agreed that such committees should be open-ended, secret in character, and should meet when there seems to be a valid reason for convening such discussions. Lord Home suggested that since Mr. Spaak seemed particularly concerned about the need for more intensive consultations on Africa, the Belgian Delegation might propose in the Permanent Council that a special committee be established to discuss African problems and particularly the Congo.

Economic Questions

The meeting had before it a report prepared by the Committee of Economic Advisers outlining the scope and objectives of the Alliance in the economic field. Ministers endorsed the view set out in the report that the OECD should be the principal body for implementing the policies of the member countries in the economic field. They also agreed that while the new organization provides opportunities for translating into concrete forms of cooperation many of the objectives embodied in Article II of the North Atlantic Treaty, NATO should continue to be responsible for assessing (a) the economic implication of the defence efforts of member countries, (b) the economic growth and policies of the Soviet bloc and (c) Soviet bloc activities in world trade and payments and in the field of aid. Most Ministers agreed that NATO is the appropriate forum for exchanges of views on such questions and that it would also be appropriate for NATO to consider any economic problem in cases where political or military considerations warrant such discussion.

Civil Emergency Planning

The meeting took note of a progress report prepared by the NATO Committee concerned with Civil Emergency Planning on which Canada was represented. The Council recognized that effective planning and preparations in this field constitute an important element in the overall NATO defensive effort.

Defence Questions

Contrary to the impression conveyed by some press reports there was no substantive discussion of military questions. Some Ministers did, however, refer to defence questions in general terms in the course of their statements.

In connection with the discussion of long-term planning, however, it was agreed that the Permanent Council should be asked to continue, in close cooperation with the Military Authorities, its studies of all aspects of the military posture of NATO with a view to improving its deterrent and defensive strength. The Permanent Council was requested to have a report ready for the Ministerial meeting in December at which the Ministers of Defence and Finance will also be present.

Resolution on Long-Term Planning

Following the conclusion of the discussion of Item III Ministers adopted a general resolution which records the approval given to the reports prepared on political consultation and economic questions, invites the Permanent Council to put into practice the conclusions contained in the reports; and invites the Council to implement the principles contained in the separate reports on Civil Emergency Planning and Psychological Action (there was however no discussion of this report). The resolution also recorded the Minister's request to the Permanent Council regarding defence questions as indicated above. (Text of Resolution at Annex "D").†

Special Economic Problems of Greece and Turkey

This item was considered by Ministers as a follow-up to the resolution adopted at the 1960 December meeting which recognized that the defensive strength of NATO is dependent upon the economic health and balanced economic growth of all its member countries and which instructed the Permanent Council to examine the ways and means for providing on an adequate basis the economic aid needed by the less-developed member countries. Following statements by the Greek and Turkish ministers on the economic problems of their respective countries most members, including Canada, expressed appreciation of the special problems faced by Turkey and Greece in their efforts to attain satisfactory levels of economic development. In view of the important contribution made by these countries to the common defence, Ministers agreed to the Working Group's report and to its main recommendation that a mission consisting of three highly qualified experts should be appointed by the Secretary-General, with Greek and Turkish approval, to study in detail the Greek and Turkish problems and to make a broad and realistic appreciation of the basic conditions for the balanced economic developments of the two countries.

Mr. Green expressed agreement with the Working Group's report and indicated that Canada would be prepared to consider these problems constructively with its NATO partners in the light of the report of the Group of Experts. (Text of Mr. Green's statement at Annex "E").†

NATO Heads of Government Meeting

Although this question was not formally on the Agenda Mr. Averoff and Mr. Green drew attention to the importance of convening, after proper preparation, a meeting of NATO Heads of Government. Mr. Green, after referring to the complaints which had been made by some speakers regarding the inadequacy of the NATO propaganda effort, expressed the view that nothing would attract greater attention to NATO and would inspire greater confidence and strength and validity of the Alliance than to have, after proper preparation, a meeting of the NATO Heads of Government at a fairly early date. He recommended that this proposal should remain under continuing consideration in the Permanent Council and expressed the hope that it would be possible to hold such a meeting before the year is out.

BERLIN: FRENCH POSITION

I had an audience late Friday with General de Gaulle who appeared tired and nervous, but he rose on his spurs when I mentioned Berlin.

2. In his mind the problem is clear and simple: the Soviets are using Berlin as a lever to move West Germany into neutrality "I recommended to Washington and London that the three nations should oppose a unanimous and emphatic no repeat no to Khrushchev's menace. Negotiations now can only lead either to failure which will put us in a worse position or to dangerous concessions, however cleverly they may be camouflaged that will weaken not repeat not only Western Germany but the rest of Europe and the Western world. When West Germany is neutralized the Scandinavian countries will soon follow, Holland and Belgium will have no repeat no other alternative and finally France will have to come to an agreement with the USSR. Washington and London will then be faced with a stronger and more ambitious Soviet dictatorship. Is that what they want?"

3. "I am afraid the lesson of Munich has been forgotten. There is nothing to be gained through appeasing a dictatorship. Munich did not repeat not prevent war nor repeat nor the Western reverses. I do not repeat not want France to be associated with a policy that is leading in the same direction and probably to the same results."

4. While the General was regaining his breath I asked him whether he was paying any attention to public opinion which was longing for peace. How could governments expect their people to give their maximum effort if they were not repeat not convinced that everything had been done to protect peace. "Nations are great not repeat not because of their wealth or the size of their population but because of their will to survive in case of danger." I felt he was quoting a phrase from his own memoirs.

5. I asked the President what counter-measures he would recommend if as a result of his policy the Soviets were to sign a treaty with the DDR leaving her free to block our access to Berlin. He replied that our possibilities of reaction in Berlin itself were rather limited since the city was in the midst of Soviet territory. He dismissed the authority of the DDR as being merely a tool in Moscow's control. But Western reaction could take place on the maritime or air lines used by the Soviets. The West could become even more a nuisance to Soviet movements in the world than the Kremlin could be to us in Germany.

6. I suggested that such a reaction might cause a more violent one on the part of the Soviets and thus, by degree, we might be engaged into a world conflagration. The General rejected this idea without hesitation. "The Soviets are not repeat not that stupid. They will stop at the risk of having their territory and more so their régime smashed to pieces."

7. I enquired whether Chancellor Adenauer had agreed to the above analysis. If so, how had he concluded in favour of negotiations. "For fifteen years the Chancellor has based his whole policy on American cooperation. Having harvested the advantages it is difficult for him to change at this stage his policy on the ground that USA are proving less helpful with regard to Berlin. But he fully realizes that the votes he lost at the recent elections were as much against America as against himself because of lack of USA reaction when the fence was built in August last between East and West Berlin."

8. Finally I wanted to know whether tactics had anything to do with the President's position in the present crisis. He hesitated for a moment before admitting that in his opinion it was preferable for the Western policy to include at the same time hard elements and more compromising ones. "However this is certainly not repeat not concerted between us."

9. It seems to me that General de Gaulle is making the mistake of reasoning more along military than political lines. Above all Berlin is a political problem and not repeat not only an outpost against which a Soviet commando is reconnoitering in strength. The Western objective now should precisely be to prevent this political problem from becoming a military one. This is the time for diplomacy, that is for contacts and negotiation if possible. Negotiation is not repeat not essentially defensive. It can develop as much counter-pressure as needed. It can be offensive also. General de Gaulle could agree on this point. Therefore his position which is a purely personal one boils down to a lack of confidence in the negotiating capabilities and will power of his USA and British partners. It is too easy for him to adopt the role of a Pilate if as he argues Western Europe is at stake. This is not repeat not statesmanlike. President Kennedy could usefully talk to him in that sense.

CONVERSATION OF GERMAN AMBASSADOR IN MOSCOW WITH KHRUSHCHEV

Messages from London and Bonn† have given us a fairly clear idea of the conversation between Mr. Kroll and Mr. Khrushchev on April 24. The following are the main points of interest:

(1) According to Mr. Kroll, Khrushchev is disillusioned about the prospects of negotiating with President Kennedy on any major issue, including disarmament and Berlin;

(2) Khrushchev has apparently taken a firm decision to sign a peace treaty with the DDR before the end of 1961. He does not expect West Germany or the Western powers to participate in the peace conference although they will be invited. This timetable is slightly later than the one we had anticipated. We had assumed that Khrushchev would want to report some progress on the Berlin question to the Twenty-second Congress of the CPSU in October. He apparently told Kroll however that before precipitating a new Berlin crisis he should perhaps "renew his mandate" at the Congress;

(3) There is a striking absence of any reference by Khrushchev to the desirability of a negotiated solution to the Berlin problem. When the crisis was first precipitated by Khrushchev in November, 1958, the Soviet government insisted that it was prepared to negotiate its proposals.

(4) In the conversation, Khrushchev revealed more than he has before of his thoughts about what will happen after the peace treaty is signed. Western rights in Berlin and on the access routes to Berlin will then have to be negotiated with the East German government. The Soviet government will not interfere. Khrushchev saw no reason why the surface access routes could not be kept open on mutually acceptable terms (except for military traffic) but he said that if he were Ulbricht he would close the air corridors and insist that Western aircraft enter Berlin under normal civil air agreements with the DDR. If the West resisted these arrangements, Khrushchev said he would put a ring of troops around Berlin and leave it to the West to fire the first shot.

Assessment of Conversation

2. The reports of the conversation should be read with two reservations.

(1) Mr. Kroll does not have a good reputation as a reporter. In the past he has coloured his accounts of conversations with Khrushchev, possibly unconsciously, or possibly because he wishes to influence Chancellor Adenauer in a particular way. We have learned from members of Kroll's staff that he is arrogant, convinced of his special ability to deal with the Russians, and unwilling to take advice from persons better informed than he.

(2) Khrushchev was aware that what he said to Kroll would play an important part in the formation of Western policy. There is no reason to suppose therefore that everything he said represented his real thoughts.

3. The most surprising thing about the conversation is the absence of any reference by Khrushchev to a negotiated settlement of the Berlin problem and, apparently, of any interest on his part in negotiation. He may have omitted reference to negotiations for tactical reasons, Kroll may have played down what he said about negotiations for his own tactical reasons, or Khrushchev may genuinely have decided that negotiations were impossible and abandoned efforts to bring them about. The last of these alternatives seems unlikely. What Khrushchev is threatening to do in Berlin is mainly for the benefit of the East German régime. For it, and for the stability of Eastern Europe generally, he is threatening to precipitate a crisis which could lead to nuclear war, but about which he will get no sympathy whatever in the under-developed world, or indeed anywhere except in Eastern Europe. It therefore seems reasonable to conclude that Khrushchev would still like if he could to avoid dangerous unilateral action, and that he therefore has not lost his interest in negotiating on Berlin. His failure to say so to Mr. Kroll was perhaps a tactic, designed to stimulate in the West the kind of thinking which it did in fact stimulate in the U.K. Ambassador in Moscow. Sir Frank Roberts recommended to his government that the West make "a reasonable attempt to offer some prospect of an eventual settlement by negotiation." We should not accept the Kroll-Khrushchev conversation as conclusive evidence that Khrushchev is no longer willing to look at a reasonable gesture from the West.

"Izvestia" Article of April 20

4. Khrushchev made a point of telling Kroll that he had personally directed the writing of the article on Germany and Berlin which appeared in Izvestia on April 20. I am attaching a copy of this article for your information. Most of the article restates familiar Soviet positions, but its main theme is that "all reasonable time limits have elapsed" on the questions of Berlin and a German peace treaty. Questioned by Mr. Kroll, Khrushchev admitted that he was thinking in terms of months rather than days or weeks, and that the end of 1961 was the final date for action.²

SOVIET AIDE-MÉMOIRE ON GERMANY AND BERLIN

The aide-mémoire which Mr. Khrushchev gave President Kennedy during their talk in Vienna³ does not alter in any substantial way the Soviet proposals for Germany and Berlin which were first put forward in November 1958. It does, however, contain elements which on a first reading appear to be new, and which are designed to make the Soviet proposals look more reasonable. I would like to draw these changes to your attention because it will be important for us to refute any suggestion that the substance of the Soviet position has altered, or that the West is in a less defensible position than before when it rejects the Soviet proposal in its present form. (Mr. Kennedy said in his broadcast that the proposal as it stands is not acceptable.)⁴ The apparently new elements are the following:

(1) Two Treaties

The aide-mémoire proposes that if the Western countries do not wish to sign a peace treaty with the GDR, they may sign one with the FRG only. All countries may sign with whichever Germany they prefer, or with both. However, it is stipulated that although the two treaties "need not be completely identical" ... "they must contain the same provisions on the most important points." The Russians have never before suggested more than a single treaty with both parts of Germany.

Obviously a peace treaty between the Western countries and the FRG alone would be a meaningless document, since the Brussels Treaty⁵ and other measures have ended the state of war between them and settled various other problems arising out of the war. The Russians have made their proposal for a treaty with the FRG parallel to their own treaty with the GDR, partly to give the latter an appearance of greater respectability and legality. They realize that a treaty whose principal provisions were acceptable to them and to the GDR government would not be acceptable to the FRG government. We can conclude therefore that they have added the "two treaty" concept mainly in order to make their proposals look more reasonable in the eyes of the world.

(2) Withdrawal of Germany from NATO

The Soviet draft peace treaty of January, 1959, required both parts of Germany to withdraw from their military alliances, NATO for the FRG and the Warsaw Pact for the GDR. The Vienna aide-mémoire departs from this in stating that the two Germanys could continue in their alliances for a limited time after the treaty was signed. There is little substance in this apparent concession. The original Soviet proposal called for the neutralization and demilitarization of both parts of Germany. Obviously the Russians do not expect to achieve anything like this in the next six months. It is therefore easy for them to offer such a concession (although they are careful to say that they would not sign a treaty which permitted Germany to remain permanently in NATO) in order to make their proposals seem more reasonable.

2. The sections of the aide-mémoire which deal with the timing of Soviet action on the German problem are ambiguously worded, but do not seem to imply much change from previous Soviet proposals, or to invalidate our conclusion that the Russians intend to take at least the first step by the end of 1961. The aide-mémoire calls upon the United States (and presumably the other two powers) to “take a decision” immediately on summoning a peace conference and, presumably at the same time, to issue an appeal to the two German governments to negotiate with one another on the problem of reunification and other “internal” problems. If the three Western powers are not ready at this time to “take a decision” on summoning a peace conference, the Soviet Union is prepared to agree to an “interim period” of fixed duration. The aide-mémoire seems to mean, although it does not explicitly state, that if, six months from now, the two Germanys have failed to negotiate or to agree, and the “interim period” (which will presumably not be longer than six months) has resulted in no progress, then the Soviet Union will immediately summon a conference at which they will sign a peace treaty with the GDR. Most of this is not explicit in the aide-mémoire, but it does seem reasonably clear that the end of 1961 remains Khrushchev’s deadline for setting these processes in motion.

3. We must now examine (and prepare to consult with our NATO allies) our attitude to the aide-mémoire, to an invitation to a peace conference (which we can anticipate) and to the Berlin problem as a whole. Dealing with the aide-mémoire and with a possible invitation are essentially propaganda problems; evolving a Canadian policy on the problem of Berlin is a question of substance. We are conscious of the need to have our position carefully prepared before we are called upon to take a public stand.

4. We are now preparing for your consideration instructions which our NATO Delegation will be able to use when the Soviet aide-mémoire and related problems are discussed in Council. We have tentatively concluded that one important Soviet reason for applying pressure on West Berlin is to obtain from the West recognition of the permanence of existing German frontiers, and of Soviet hegemony in Eastern Europe. (The Vienna aide-mémoire suggests that this could be done without formal recognition of the East German régime.) The Russians are probably sincere in their belief that the Germans would not hesitate to attempt to recover their lost territories in the East if they thought they could do so successfully. The Russians think also that German acquisition of nuclear weapons (they already have carriers) is inevitable. An important Soviet objective therefore is to remove the legal basis for German claims, and to obtain some form of commitment from the West that it would not support a German attempt to revise German frontiers. The exposed Western position in Berlin gives the Russians a means of applying pressure on the West to attain this objective. From this it may be possible to deduce the kind of settlement which would meet Soviet requirements. It would then remain to see whether such a settlement would bring serious disadvantage to the West. This is the line which we are taking in our current study of the Berlin problem.

DISCUSSION WITH MIKOYAN

As promised in my telegram No. 295 of May 26, † I am enclosing a memorandum on my conversation of May 8 with Deputy Premier Mikoyan. I apologize for not transmitting this in an earlier bag.

2. As you will see, most of the conversation dealt with Germany. In the absence of firm instructions about Canadian Government thinking on the German question, I naturally made it clear that I was expressing personal views. I trust, however, that under the circumstances the line I took, subject to this important qualification, was satisfactory to you, in an effort to have the beginning of some Canadian-Soviet conversations here on Soviet thinking about current East-West problems. While there is nothing new in what Mikoyan said, I myself found his remarks of interest as far as they went, as indicating something of the grounds for Soviet concern. Personally I think that the Soviet leaders are also, and perhaps chiefly, concerned about the stability and viability of the East German régime, but Mikoyan did not seem prepared at this stage to speak at all frankly about this.

3. Since my visit to his office I have had a few brief conversations with Mikoyan at receptions. He has been very friendly, but nothing further of importance has emerged on political questions. On trade I indicated that I had received a reply to his observations and that I thought his legal experts had misinterpreted the situation. I indicated briefly the points made in your telegram No. E-1036 of May 26. † Mr. Mikoyan suggested I discuss this further with the Trade Minister (who is at present away) on his return. I shall do this in due course.

[Moscow], June 14, 1961

DISCUSSION WITH MIKOYAN

1. I had a little over an hour's talk with Deputy Premier Mikoyan in his office in the Kremlin on May 8th. After preliminary courtesies, including a few questions by him about my time in Kuibishev and in Moscow during the war, the conversation turned to current affairs. I told Mr. Mikoyan that I wanted to keep my government objectively informed about Soviet government thinking on outstanding international problems, and would appreciate an outline of his views on what he considered the most important questions ahead of us in the next year or so.

2. Mikoyan said that while there were a number of peripheral questions, the two problems of major importance were certainly Germany and disarmament. Mikoyan said that the Soviet government was inevitably concerned about the growing rearmament and revisionist ideas of West Germany. The Soviet Union naturally need not be afraid of Germany, since it was strong enough to take care of its own security, but nevertheless West Germany's unwillingness to accept the status quo and to recognize the fact that there were now two German states was dangerous. The West Germans might some day find a pretext for using force against East Germany, and this would make it necessary for the Soviet Union to come to the assistance of the East Germans. NATO would then come to the help of West Germany and this could lead to a major war. This danger was real, and it was not good.

3. I said it was my impression that it was the East Germans and the USSR which seemed unwilling to accept the status quo, of which the freedom of West Berlin and its open communications to the West were a part. Mikoyan said that Berlin was obviously a part of Eastern Germany, and the present situation where East Germany was not recognized was an anomaly. But the freedom of Berlin was not threatened, this was merely Western propaganda: the Soviet Union and the Eastern Germans had said that its status as a free city could be guaranteed. The danger came from West Germany's rearmament, the support it got from NATO, and its ambitions to upset the post war settlement. I said that I had the impression that it was the Communist countries which were trying to apply pressure to upset the present situation. Though this situation was curious and in origin artificial, history showed a number of situations which had begun artificially but had jelled. I thought the present situation if left alone could continue for a good many years: Eastern pressure to upset it seemed to be the new and dangerous element in the situation. Though the status quo was not particularly satisfactory to either side, it had best be left alone.

4. Mikoyan indicated that the situation would have to be regularized. The USSR would like to have everyone concerned sign a peace treaty with both Germanies. It seemed clear that the West would reject the Soviet invitation to a conference for this purpose. So the USSR would itself proceed to sign a separate peace with East Germany. This would settle the two major problems of frontiers and of Berlin.

5. I said that in my personal opinion it would be salutary all around to recognize that the difficulties in the present situation resulted largely from Soviet mistakes. There had been for example a profound lack of frankness to the West, on the part of Stalin in 1944 and 1945. Personally I, who had spent several years of the war here in Russia, could well understand the concern by Russians and by other East Europeans about any revival of German militarism, and their desire to keep Germany divided: though this denial of self-determination to the Germans was contrary to the usual principles advocated by all governments. Emphasizing that I was speaking entirely for myself on this point, I said that in my own view if Stalin had indicated frankly during the latter part of the war and in the months immediately thereafter to his Western allies, that he wanted a divided Germany, the Western great powers would at that time have accepted this. In that case the lines of the occupation zones would no doubt have been drawn in a more logical way, and we would not have the present problem of Berlin being left as an island without immediate access to western zones. However Stalin had stated that he wanted a united Germany, and the Western Governments had gone along with this.

6. It seemed to me, I added, that another of Stalin's mistakes was his several years delay in disarming and his continued military pressure on Western and Mediterranean countries. It was this, and then the Communist attack on Korea in 1950, which had brought the West reluctantly to admit Germany to NATO. Since then it was Western fear of the continuing Soviet military pressure all along the periphery of the Communist world which had played the fundamental part in bringing Western countries to encourage and assist West German rearmament. Many people in the West had been reluctant to do this, but had felt that Soviet pressure, and the overwhelming land forces maintained by the USSR in Europe, left them no alternative.

7. I said that I personally was quite prepared to admit that we in the West had made a number of serious mistakes, in our relations with Russia and other areas, from the time of the Russian Revolution on. I thought it would be salutary if Russian leaders would recognize that they too had made some pretty serious blunders. I would like to do what I could to reduce tensions and dangers, and to improve international understanding. I could assure him that Canada, and the West as a whole, greatly desired just this. But it seemed to me personally that in the situation to which we had now got, further Russian military and diplomatic pressure on the West in general and on Germany and Berlin in particular was unwise: it seemed to me to be precisely a compounding of earlier blunders, and a further extension of the policy which has largely caused the present problems for both of us. To deliberately set out to build up tension and exerting pressure in the present situation could be dangerous. I personally thought that an opposite policy could on the other hand prove effective for both East and West. If steps were taken to develop a suitable international atmosphere of increasing confidence, many things, such as the recognition of present German frontiers, might well in due course be negotiable. But a threat to the freedom of the people of West Berlin seemed in the West like a threat to the freedom of Norway or Greece or other territories guaranteed by NATO. This certainly could be very unwise because it was not a matter on which the West could be expected to retreat. We must both learn to live and let live with the status quo until we could improve mutual confidence and secure agreed adjustments on points of differences.

8. Mikoyan did not seem to like this very much. I cannot tell how much impression my recital of Soviet strategic blunders made on him. It is always hard to tell whether points have really got home with Communist leaders. But of course sometimes they do, and I think one must persevere in the hope that frank discussions may eventually affect their thinking.

9. However this may be, Mikoyan said, perhaps in a rather patronizing way, but also I think in an effort to be objective and fair, that he recognized that Canada had shown objectivity, courage and some degree of independence as well as goodwill on various occasions. He cited our policy during the "Suez aggression" by Britain, our refusal to go along with the American boycott of Cuba last year and the recent "American aggression" there and our sale of wheat to China, as examples of this independence. Having ticked off summarily these three points of approbation he said he nevertheless wondered to what extent Canada could really expect to be independent and pursue a truly independent foreign policy in view of its membership in NATO.

10. I said that there were a certain number of Canadians who thought that Canada could have a more independent and constructive influence in international affairs if we were neutral and outside NATO. Mikoyan answered that he knew some Canadians thought this and had been delighted to find that there were such sensible elements in the Canadian public. I replied that the people who thought in that way were a small minority, and that most Canadians considered that their international influence, and their contribution to the maintenance of peace, was much greater as a member of the North Atlantic Community than it could be outside this natural co-operative grouping. I said that most Canadians were firmly behind NATO and felt that Canadian influence could be most useful in trying to ensure that NATO as a whole pursued realistic, moderate and intelligent policies. This did not by any means imply an automatic acceptance of U.S.A. or U.K. policies. On the contrary, the NATO countries consulted and debated policies together. Our influence in this regard was far greater than Mikoyan might realize since on the occasions when we disagreed with one or other of our larger allies a considerable section of officials and public inside the larger countries, in my experience, tended to share the Canadian assessment of the common interest, and we could thus have a real voice in influencing common policy. Since our geography meant that we would in any case be affected by any major crisis, we felt safer to have a voice in shaping policies which would in any case affect all our futures.

11. I went on to say that I thought that another profound mistake which the Soviet Union has tended to make in foreign policy was to try to disintegrate NATO. I could understand, personally, the concern of the many Russians and East Europeans about the danger of a possible revival of German militarism. But it seemed to me that West Germany, which was already a very dynamic and strong country, offered much less cause for valid concern by other Europeans, including particularly East Europeans, precisely because Germany was a member of a well integrated North Atlantic Community. If the Soviet Union should ever succeed in its attempts to disintegrate NATO (which I thought they could not do) and if Germany was then able to pursue a more unfettered foreign and military policy of its own, this would I thought not be a contribution to the security of East Europe.

12. I asked Mikoyan whether he personally really thought that the world would be a safer place if in North America Canada, and reciprocally if in Europe Poland, East Germany and say Hungary, should break away from their present associations with larger groupings, and had governments which pursued independent and neutralist policies of their own. Mikoyan seemed rather startled by this question, and I had the impression that he did not much like it. He said that the Warsaw Pact had been organized merely in response to NATO. I said that the Warsaw Pact seemed to me not of the essence: the essential grouping of Eastern Europe was inherent in the cohesion of the Communist Party regimes. I did not think it desirable to pursue this theme further, and Mikoyan for his part seemed anxious to change the subject. He said he wanted to speak to me about Canadian-Soviet trade, but first he wanted to say something very briefly about disarmament.

13. On disarmament Mikoyan said that the Soviet Union considered an agreement of fundamental importance to the whole future of humanity. Naturally the Soviet Government thought that its own approach, including the programme which they had proposed for complete disarmament in a few stages, was the best approach. However, if the West did not like that approach the Soviet Government would be quite prepared to consider alternative partial approaches. They were waiting for the United States Government to prepare its position and hoped that Washington would indicate its readiness, very soon now, to begin serious discussions.

14. I said that the problem of controls and an objective inspection system seemed to me pretty fundamental. Mikoyan said the Soviet Government was prepared to accept inspection, but he immediately indicated that he did not want to go into this question of Troikas and launched into his remarks about Soviet Canadian trade, and his view that Canada had been guilty of a breach of our trade agreement with the USSR, when the latter had tried to sell gasoline to Canada last autumn. I reported Mikoyan's remarks on this in a separate telegram (my telegram 258 of May 9, 1961).†

Dear Norman [Robertson],

I find international developments during the past few months even more than usually puzzling. I would like to know what you think.

Am I right in thinking that the public posture of the West over the Berlin affair is largely irrelevant to the problems which we are in fact likely to confront during the next twelve months or so? My feeling is that unless Khrushchev behaves more stupidly than we have reason to expect he is scarcely likely to confront the West with the issue of fighting for the freedom of West Berlin. The recurrent issue which the West is likely to face in 1962 is surely rather what to do each time Khrushchev cuts another paper thin slice off the Berlin salami. I do not find it credible that the West can make a world-shaking crisis over any one of these thin slices.

To recognize this is the beginning of wisdom.

I do not suggest that the public posture which the West has taken is wrong or that the propaganda line of the West is wrong. But I fear we may be in danger of misleading ourselves by our public posture and propaganda. Smoke screens can be useful provided the smoke does not get into one's own eyes.

This does not mean that I rule out the possibility of war arising out of the Berlin crisis. But if war comes it will come because mobilization leads to a pre-emptive strike.

The West has two cards to play in negotiations over Berlin – de jure recognition of the Oder-Neisse line, de facto recognition of the DDR. The longer we put off playing these cards the less the cards are worth. The time has, I suggest, come to launch a highly complicated and delicate series of prolonged secret diplomatic negotiations among the Western powers and with the Soviet Government to find out whether we can get a really free and independent city of Berlin in return for de jure recognition of the Oder-Neisse line and de facto recognition of the DDR. Later all three Germanies (East, West and Berlin) could be admitted to the United Nations.

Obviously this policy embodies risks and disadvantages. But I think that other possible policies are even riskier and on balance more disadvantageous.

There is one other aspect of the current discussion which has puzzled me. There seems to be a lingering belief in some quarters that the NATO powers can keep this issue out of the United Nations. I find this belief hard to comprehend.

As you know from our work on the Coordination Committee at San Francisco the true meaning of the Charter is not that the Security Council has the right to deal with threats to international peace but that it has the duty to deal with them. The more the NATO and Warsaw powers emphasize the danger of the Berlin crisis to world peace the stronger the argument that the Security Council should deal with it.

The uncommitted countries meet in Belgrade on September 1. Will not they put the Berlin crisis on the agendas of the Security Council and the General Assembly – and in so doing be acting in accordance with their obligations under the United Nations Charter?

I look forward to discussing these and other problems with you when I'm back on home leave. My present plans are to spend the week of August 21 on duty in the Department (commuting from the farm with Patrick [Reid]). I hope you will be in the Department that week. Then I promise I won't bother the Department until the two or three days before we sail back to Germany.

Ruth and I enjoyed having Jules and Gaby Léger with us last weekend. They have certainly been through purgatory during the last twelve months.

Affectionate regards to Jette [Robertson].⁶

Yours ever,

ESCOTT [REID]

GERMANY AND BERLIN

Following is text of summary of proposals in your S-268† as transmitted to State Department July 6. Begins: Berlin

As a contribution to the forthcoming NATO discussion on the problems of Berlin, Canadian authorities have it in mind to propose that consideration be given to the concept of a supplementary agreement on Berlin which might, at an appropriate stage, be put forward as a Western counter-proposal to the positions taken by USSR. Ideas as to the elements of such a supplementary agreement are indicated below. It should be understood that these suggestions do not repeat not represent final Canadian views on this problem. The cardinal feature of such an agreement, however, would be that it would maintain unimpaired and unrestricted the present measure of Western rights in Berlin. Once these rights were renounced in a new contractual arrangement, it would be difficult, or impossible, to revert to them. Thus, it would be important that any new agreement on Berlin be recognized, insofar as it concerned West Berlin, as clearly and specifically supplementary and without prejudice to the present status of the Western powers in Berlin.

A supplementary agreement on Berlin with such a reservation of existing Western rights might very well be unacceptable to USSR, but it could nevertheless be put forward at the appropriate time as clear evidence of the Western powers flexibility and willingness to negotiate. Its presentation would have some value in appealing to public opinion and to uncommitted countries. It would be necessary to avoid any commitment to reduce substantially the military forces of the Western powers in West Berlin, or to accept the establishment of Soviet forces there.

⁶ Note marginale :/Marginal note:

This is a very good letter. [Norman] R[obertson]

The following are suggested points, a number of which might be included in such a supplementary agreement:

- (1) The affirmation of the continuation of the present rights of the Four Powers, including their rights of access;
- (2) The establishment of an interim régime covering the whole of Berlin, which would not repeat not be a part of either East Germany or West Germany;
- (3) The régime would automatically terminate when Germany is reunited with Berlin as its capital;
- (4) A Four-Power Commission to discuss, and perhaps negotiate, problems affecting the whole of Berlin to fill the need for a continuing Four-Power forum in place of the now inoperative inter-allied authority for the "Greater Berlin" area. Representatives of governments of both the Federal German Republic and the German Democratic Republic might be associated with this Four-Power body, without according recognition to the GDR. (This idea would, to some extent, meet the suggestion in Soviet aide mémoire delivered at Vienna for direct negotiations between the two Germanys);
- (5) A UN presence with clearly defined responsibilities for investigation, and perhaps adjudication of complaints;
- (6) Guarantees to all German citizens of freedom of access to Berlin and access to both Germanys for all Berliners.
- (7) A "pilot" arrangement for a controlled ban of nuclear weapons in greater Berlin which could provide some experience in control and inspection techniques.

Care would, of course, have to be taken to present any proposals along the foregoing lines at the appropriate time in some sort of formula which would both serve to keep discussions going and, at the same time, would constitute a sound propaganda base if they were rejected and made public by USSR. It is also for consideration whether certain of the provisions mentioned above, such as the first and sixth, might not repeat not be adequately established by a unilateral declaration on the part of the Western powers which would not repeat not require the explicit public agreement of USSR. Ends.

BERLIN: CONTINGENCY PLANNING

Reactions to the Prime Minister's speech, including references to Berlin, to the Kiwanis International Convention at Toronto on July 3,⁷ and his subsequent statement in the House on July 4 have led to certain reactions which should be brought to your attention.

⁷ Voir/See Canada, Department of External Affairs, Statements and Speeches, 1961-62, 61/7.

2. The German Ambassador in a conversation with me on July 5 expressed enthusiastic satisfaction with the Prime Minister's statements and told me that he and his Secretary (Prince Bismarck) had carefully translated the Prime Minister's remarks on both occasions and sent them to Bonn including what he referred to as "the nuances of the Prime Minister's remarks."

3. The Italian Ambassador came to see me on July 6. He likewise expressed satisfaction with the Prime Minister's statements and said that on the face of it, the Canadian and Italian Governments seemed to be in agreement on the general approach to the Berlin problem. He questioned me, however, on the Canadian approach to the matter of negotiation. He said that in his view it was obvious that the Western Powers had to negotiate, since "a war over visas" was unthinkable. The Soviet Government had been very careful in limiting the risks of war by the way in which Khrushchev had put several alternatives and by emphasizing his willingness to negotiate. The Italian Ambassador emphasized the view however that the field of negotiations should be clearly defined in advance through consultation among the NATO powers so that the West, while using negotiations to prevent war, should not find themselves weakening the security of Europe or the freedom of the people of Berlin.

4. Basing myself on telegram S-287 of July 5 to NATO, Paris,† I told the Ambassador that at present Canadian comment was limited to the U.S. reply to the Soviet aide mémoire and that we would not wish to see substantive proposals included in the reply pending further consultation among allies. I also said that we were considering possible proposals at an official level but that detailed proposals had not yet been formulated.

5. The Italian Ambassador said in conclusion that since President Kennedy had re-stated the determination of the Western powers "to stand on their rights" in Berlin; rights obviously could not be re-negotiated but only restated. In the circumstances the Western aim should be to try to reach a modus vivendi with the Russians over Berlin which would give a minimum degree of de facto recognition to the East German authorities in the event that the Russians carry out their intention of concluding a peace treaty with East Germany, in order to maintain access to Berlin and the freedom of its inhabitants. Incidentally, the Italian Ambassador told me that in a talk with the Soviet Ambassador subsequent to the Prime Minister's speech of July 3, Aroutunian had appeared to be upset by the Prime Minister's references to the Soviet Union.

6. Mr. Bryce and the Chairman of Chiefs of Staff, in a conversation with me on July 6, both suggested that it would be desirable to have an inter-departmental meeting to discuss Canadian implications of Three Power contingency planning. I also think that it would be desirable that Mr. Bryce and the CCOs be consulted before any substantive proposals are put to other governments on the possible basis of negotiations with the Russians over Berlin.

7. Action Recommended. I recommend that you consider calling a meeting for next week to which Mr. Bryce, the Chairman of Chiefs of Staff and Mr. Elgin Armstrong be invited, as well as representatives from European and Economic Divisions and D.L. (1) Division to consider:

(a) the draft of a telegram being prepared in the Department suggesting a possible basis of negotiations on Berlin (being prepared by the European Division);

(b) the implications for Canada of contingency planning (paper being prepared by D.L. (1) Division);

(c) possible economic measures which may be adopted in connection with Berlin.

BERLIN

The U.S. Ambassador called on the Minister at 3.00 p.m. on instructions, to report that, in the light of the discussions in the NATO Council, the U.S. Government had decided to change the proposed timetable concerning the presentation of the U.S. reply to Mr. Khrushchev's note on Berlin. The United States now proposed that there should be another NATO Council discussion on Saturday, and if the Council felt that further consultation was needed, another one on Monday, but the United States hoped that it will be possible for them to present a reply on Tuesday, July 18. The Minister expressed satisfaction with this changed timetable indicating that he felt that this would allow more time for consultation.

2. The Minister then enquired as to Mr. Merchant's opinion concerning the Berlin situation. The U.S. Ambassador said that he considered it very serious, particularly because Khrushchev had now committed himself very clearly in public. I referred to a recent report from Mr. Roberts, the U.K. Ambassador in Moscow, and mentioned that, in that report, Khrushchev had indicated some flexibility. It was true that once a peace treaty was signed with Eastern Germany there would not be much scope for manoeuvring, but Khrushchev had mentioned the possibility of arrangements being worked out before the treaty was signed.

3. The Minister then enquired as to Mr. Merchant's opinion as to the reasons why Khrushchev seemed to be so rigid. Mr. Merchant said that it was possible that Khrushchev had to face internal opposition but all the evidence that was available suggested that he was in full control of the situation. It was difficult to understand his rigidity.

4. The Minister then expressed concern that both parties might now be taking up public positions from which it might be difficult to retreat later. He said that if the situation became more threatening, this would be particularly serious for the U.K. as they were facing annihilation. He also said that while public opinion at this stage welcomed indications of firmness, it was a question, when the chips were down, as to how far people might be prepared to face nuclear devastation in order to provide support for West Berlin.

5. The U.S. Ambassador said that he agreed with the Minister that it would be impossible to carry public opinion unless it was satisfied that every effort had been made to find a compromise solution. He added that he did not see how the United States could retreat from the positions outlined in their note. The Administration, he recalled, was in the process of reviewing all aspects of the situation and they would welcome views on the part of their allies. He mentioned in particular the recent suggestions we had made in Washington concerning Berlin. He went on to say, however, that in regard to essentials it was very difficult to envisage a compromise. If one were to establish distinctions between the people of West Berlin and the people of West Germany, this could lead to further distinctions between the people of West Germany and those of France and then those of the U.K. Solemn commitments had been made to two million freedom-loving people in West Berlin. This was a larger population than some of the free countries in the world and if it was not possible to honour our obligations to these people who had taken risks to demonstrate their attachment to freedom, there would not be much faith in the future in any solemn commitments.

6. I intervened at this point to mention that if there was to be some negotiation later on, it was possible that a presentation of our case in legal terms might make it less easy for us, at the appropriate stage, to envisage accommodation. If we referred, for instance, to the East German Government as a mere puppet, as a simple instrument of Soviet foreign policy, such legal arguments might be used against us later very effectively should it be necessary, at some stage, to have some dealings with the East Germans at the practical level.

7. The U.S. Ambassador said that, as far as he could recall, all the elements of the proposal that we had made concerning Berlin had been rejected by the U.S.S.R. in 1959. He felt, however, that there might be some practical arrangements which could be suggested that might yet be acceptable to the Soviet side. In the past, the Soviet Union had made contractual arrangements with Eastern Germany and they had reserved the rights of the Western powers in Berlin. The difficulty was that in his current discussions of the problem, Khrushchev did not seem to envisage the possibility of such reservation.

GERMANY AND BERLIN

In your recent public reference to Germany and Berlin, you called for the West to show the flexibility necessary to permit discussions with the USSR if these prove possible and, at the same time, the firmness necessary to maintain the freedom of the people of West Berlin and the rights of the three Western powers on which that freedom is based.⁸ We are considering in detail what steps are necessary to apply these principles.

1. Negotiations

Our NATO representative, upon instructions, has requested early consideration of the various aspects of the Berlin and German problems in the NATO Council. I hope that other NATO members, like ourselves, will be prepared to suggest positions which NATO might take that would serve as a basis for negotiation with the Soviet Union but which, at the same time, would in no way jeopardize the freedoms of the West Berlin citizens and would also serve as a good propaganda position. At an appropriate time and subject to Cabinet approval, I may decide to put forward some proposals which would call for a supplementary arrangement in Berlin which would both acknowledge present western rights and offer certain modifications which might prove attractive to the USSR but which would not endanger the freedom of the citizens of West Berlin.

The United States reply to the Soviet aide-mémoire on Germany and Berlin is being discussed in the NATO Council and will be sent to the Soviet Union today. This reply re-states at length the legal basis for the rights of the Western occupation powers in Berlin but confirms in its final paragraph United States willingness to consider practical arrangements which might improve the present situation in Berlin and to consider a freely negotiated settlement of the unresolved problems of Germany. This response should serve to keep the dialogue on Berlin going.⁹

2. Contingency Planning

At the same time as the possibilities of negotiations with the Soviet Union are being considered, concrete acts must be contemplated which will demonstrate to the USSR Western determination to remain in West Berlin. Many of these steps are also connected with the military problems which may arise if it ever becomes necessary to use force to maintain Western rights in the city. These problems, both civil and military and how they might affect Canada, are discussed in detail in the attached memorandum.

Consideration of all aspects of the Berlin problems, diplomatic, military and economic, are now being reviewed by the Departments concerned and at inter-Departmental meetings.

1. Mr. Robertson said that we were already in a worrying situation in respect of Berlin, and we should be giving some study to the implications that it might have for Canada. The circumstances of the Berlin problem were not new but a crisis situation had been built up recently from the Russian side and should be taken seriously. The present phase of the problem began with the memorandum given by Mr. Khrushchev to President Kennedy in Vienna which re-stated the Soviet demands on Berlin. Copies of the memorandum were subsequently sent to the UK and France. This week the three Western Powers were making their replies to the Soviet Union.¹⁰ These replies would take a firm stand on Western rights in Berlin, largely on legal grounds. The US answer in particular would make a cogent legal argument. All of the notes would contain some reference to a willingness to negotiate the problem but would not make specific suggestions about the nature of negotiations. Some observers believed that the Soviet Union would not move on the Berlin question before the German elections on September 17, or before the Communist party meeting in October. Mr. Khrushchev had said plainly, however, that he would take action on the problem before the end of the year. Discussion about Western policy had so far been carried on among the Western Big Three who had consulted with Germany and with other NATO countries in the NATO Council. These latter discussions were nearing a point where substantive issues would be raised and this country, among others, would be required to take big decisions on the subject. The problem had not so far been considered by the Cabinet.

2. Mr. Bryce said that Cabinet had discussed the Berlin question briefly and had agreed that there should be further study of it.

3. Mr. Robertson said the US appraisal, as it was stated publicly, was that there was a large element of bluff in the Soviet demands. To the extent that the US believed this, their policy was one of counter-bluff. They believed the Berlin situation had been working itself out satisfactorily (for example, there had been no serious East German disturbances for some years) and that the present crisis had been manufactured by the Soviet Union. There had been talk in the US press of US dependents being withdrawn from Europe and of higher levels of military readiness being declared later in the summer. There had also been a leakage, possibly deliberate, of some contingency plans. These reports might be circulated to impress the Soviet Union but if they were carried through into action, the Alliance would be put into some disarray. For example if the US withdrew military dependents from Europe and Canada did not, our inaction would tend to make the US action look like a bluff.

4. Air Marshal Miller said there did not appear to be anything in Berlin itself to require the degree of brinkmanship which the Soviet Union by its declarations appeared to be ready to undertake. Soviet complaints about the drain of refugees from East Germany and about West Berlin being a capitalist showplace and espionage centre were surely not great enough to justify the threat of major war. It must therefore be concluded that the Soviet objective was to break up the NATO Alliance by using Berlin as a lever. This might be too simple an analysis but it seemed that Berlin was essentially a pressure point the Soviets would use to exploit differences among the Western countries. Berlin was an impossible military problem from the Western point of view. It could not be sufficiently garrisoned for its defence nor could the access roads be opened by a reasonable amount of force once they were closed. From the Western viewpoint, any solution to the Berlin problem must surely be other than a military solution.

5. If this analysis was right, the important thing was that the Western coalition be united together under stress rather than fly apart. How far national views should be subordinated to reach common agreement on a position to be taken presented the difficult and complex part of the question.

6. Mr. Robertson said he thought a weakening of NATO was one objective of the Soviet Union but the present condition of Chinese-Soviet relations might explain why Russia was taking such a hard line about Berlin now. If this was true, it was a worrying interpretation because it would be difficult for Russia to back down.

7. Mr. Bryce said that the problem of brinkmanship was not so difficult for the Soviet Union as for the West. Russia could threaten actions which they thought would not cause war and would meet their requirements for prestige but would be divisive to the West. The Russians probably believed that the West would not start a war because they signed a peace treaty with East Germany, but threatening to do so was attractive to them because it would almost certainly cause a division between Germany and the US. Khrushchev probably considered that the West was bluffing when we said we would not accept the consequences of a Soviet peace treaty with East Germany, and he was therefore leading us on in the hope that we would make further statements of bluff which he could then call and thereby destroy the position of President Kennedy who was his main adversary.

8. Mr. Ritchie suggested that the Soviet objective might be to stop German re-armament at a crucial point in its development.

9. Air Marshal Miller said this would have made sense at the time Germany began the re-armament process. All the commitments about German re-armament had, however, already been made now, and it was difficult to see the prevention of further German re-armament as the objective of the Soviet Union in formenting the present crisis.

10. Mr. Ritchie said that if Mr. Khrushchev thought Western countries were bluffing in taking a firm stand he might wish to provoke a military encounter with West Germany, either to destroy the German forces or else to show Germany that the US would not honour its obligation to stand with them.

11. Air Marshal Miller suggested that the humiliation of the US would anger them, make future US policy tougher and, at the very least, result in much larger US defence budget.

12. Mr. Bryce agreed that Khrushchev's big risk might be not war but the likelihood of subsequently facing an aroused US.

13. Mr. Robertson said that the Western Alliance had been maintaining a very extended policy position. We had kept open the question of the Eastern frontiers of Germany, we had refused recognition of the East German government despite the fact that it had been organized and had had de facto control of the Soviet zone for nearly 15 years, and we had continued to claim the unification of Germany as our objective. Although some of these policies no longer seemed tenable or these objectives attainable, they had been maintained for so long that it was difficult to change them without appearing to be accepting a major political defeat. If the West was prepared to accept the eastern frontiers of Germany as fixed and final and could move towards a de facto recognition of the East German Government (this would at one time have been a major political concession although it was now a concession of diminished value), would Khrushchev accept this kind of settlement?

14. Air Marshal Miller said that the UK did not particularly want to see a unified Germany, France was somewhat fearful of it and it was even questionable whether the West German Government desired it. As for Khrushchev, it seemed clear that he would accept reunification of Germany only if it had a Communist Government and he had control of it.

15. Mr. Robertson said that with these sort of uncertainties in people's minds it was difficult to see how the NATO Alliance could be kept firm and united in the face of a crisis.

16. Air Marshal Miller said that the new US Administration had had a succession of setbacks to its prestige. It was likely that the explanation of the 'tough talk' that was now coming from Washington was that the Administration felt it could not afford to be less than firm any longer.

17. Mr. Bryce suggested that our objective should be to try to direct the developing situation in such a way that the withdrawals from positions that must be made eventually by both sides would not be too humiliating for them to accept.

18. Many people in the West would think that the Soviet demands for a peace treaty with East Germany sixteen years after the end of the war was quite reasonable and would not be willing to support a firm stand on the Oder-Neisse line; indeed, many might feel that in losing the eastern provinces Germany got what it deserved.

19. Mr. Robertson said one of the great questions we must face was whether we should or could at some time say this to the Germans.

20. Mr. Ritchie said that three of the people who would be involved in US policy-making during any Berlin crisis were the same people who had been through a Berlin crisis before. These were Dean Acheson and Generals Lemnitzer and Taylor. Lemnitzer and Taylor, at least, did not believe during the earlier crisis that an airlift was the right answer, but rather favoured a movement by force up the access highways.

21. Mr. Robertson noted that in the crisis of two years ago, both Mr. Merchant and Mr. Murphy in the State Department considered that an airlift would be the wrong answer.

22. Mr. Ritchie recalled that in 1959 Dean Acheson had written an article in which he proposed that if access to Berlin were denied our response should be conventional attack in strength but that no nuclear weapons should be used. Acheson had said that the conventional attack would be repulsed and the Allied forces would suffer a beating but that the incident would be worthwhile because it would save the Alliance.¹¹

23. Mr. Bryce said that the response of making an honourable attempt to save Berlin would be one possible solution. Canada would have to decide whether we should share in the action.

24. Mr. Robertson said that there was a vacuum of substantial discussion on major issues in the NATO Council. Indeed, the great issues were not even discussed elsewhere among the partners.

25. Air Marshal Miller said our basic objective should be to maintain the solidarity of the Western Alliance because its break-up was Khrushchev's main goal, though not his only one.

26. Mr. Robertson said if our objective was to defeat an effort to break up the Alliance we must consider how this should best be done. Should we continue to anchor the Alliance to a number of basic domestic German political tenets, or should we try to remove the Alliance from association with these extended policy positions? We had had a similar situation with Italy vis-à-vis Trieste and that position had eventually been negotiated, though with difficulty.

27. Air Marshal Miller suggested that the Alliance should not dispute these contentious issues in public during the period of the present crisis.

28. Mr. Robertson agreed with this position, but pointed out that member countries should also not continue to re-affirm positions that must be modified later if the dangerous situation in Europe was to be resolved. The Prime Minister had put the emphasis on our concern for the future of the Alliance, not on the defence of the outlying positions to which the Alliance was tied. In a war these extended positions would be the first things that would be written off. Was it possible that some of these essentially second-rate positions such as the non-acceptance of the Oder-Neisse Line and our non-recognition of East Germany would be negotiable in exchange for a satisfactory settlement on Berlin?

29. Air Marshal Miller said there would be no chance to reach agreement among the Western powers on what should be done with these issues before the time we faced the Berlin crisis. The most important point to keep in mind was that the more uncertain voice we spoke with as we moved towards the crisis, the more serious the crisis was likely to be. For the period of the emergency, we should cover over those problems on which we did not see eye-to-eye. We should have a position of unity that would carry us through the crisis and it should perhaps be affirmed by a Heads of Government meeting.

¹¹ Voir/See Dean Acheson, "Wishing Won't Hold Berlin," Saturday Evening Post, March 7, 1961, pp. 32-33, 85-86.

30. Mr. Plumptre said that such a position would mean for Canada withdrawal of our dependents from Europe, and the raising of the level of alertness of our forces if the US took these actions. It would also mean leaving until later the problem of finding agreement among the Western Powers on the issues Mr. Robertson had raised.

31. Mr. Bryce said he thought certain points had emerged during the discussion. First of all, if the Berlin crisis reached the point of fighting, the West should not use nuclear weapons; secondly, if we faced a humiliating situation over Berlin, we should have a limited conventional operation which would probably not be successful but would display our strength of purpose; thirdly, we should be prepared to go along with whatever steps the US felt should be taken to prepare for such conventional action; and fourthly, at some point we would have to accept a number of withdrawals from our present position (e.g., recognition of East Germany) and we should not in the next few months make statements which would make it more difficult for us to accept these withdrawals later on. If there was agreement on these points, the main difficulty was to decide where to draw the line between what we would accept as tolerable without fighting and what we could not accept without making some gesture of military response. Our best course was probably to talk directly and frankly to the US on these matters and at the same time to go along with whatever preparatory action the US considered necessary.

32. Air Marshal Miller suggested one of our objectives should be to try to postpone the crisis, particularly by avoiding statements or actions which would force the Soviet hand, and thereby to win time in which a united Western position could be worked out after the German elections in September. We should try to avoid having to formulate a united Western position quickly and under crisis conditions. The most important objective should be to display a united front to the Soviet Union and thereby avoid tempting them to take more drastic actions in the hope of breaking up the Western Alliance.

33. Mr. Bryce said we should not discuss in the NATO Council what we would accept as a price for a settlement over Berlin because differences of opinion would be displayed and they would almost certainly leak out. The best way for discussions to be held, it seemed, was for each country of importance in the Alliance to speak frankly to the US.

34. Mr. Robertson wondered whether the kind of contingency planning which was going on was very sensible. The UK, for instance, had always refused to approve a final contingency plan which would be used in response to certain stated provocations because they maintained that a plan could not be decided upon until the political circumstances surrounding the issue at the time were known.

35. Air Marshal Miller said that conditional contingency planning made sense but over-detailed pre-planning was not really possible because the circumstances at the time could not be known in advance.

36. Mr. Bryce said our greatest immediate problem was that at some point we would have to accept being stopped from using force to attain our objectives. Should we not try to settle at least in some rough way what point this would be? The only alternative to preparation of this kind was to try to devise some kind of package deal we could put up to the Russians in negotiations.

37. Mr. Robertson noted that all the Western notes admitted the possibility of negotiations. The question was how a package could be developed in time which could be presented in those negotiations.

38. Air Marshal Miller said that each Western country might have in mind a package which would be acceptable to it but it might be impossible in the time we had to formulate an agreed package. We probably must rely on the solidarity of the Alliance up to the point of actual fighting, which might enable us to impress the adversary sufficiently to convince him not to act in such a way that we would have to make a strong military response.

39. Mr. Barton asked whether, if we agreed to go along with whatever preparatory measures the US thought were necessary, Canada had the resources and plans to follow through with such action as the removal of dependents from Europe.

40. Air Marshal Miller said that if such action had to be taken in a non-crisis period, the plans could be developed fairly easily. In a crisis it would be much more difficult and such a movement then might in any case be dangerous to the political atmosphere.

41. Mr. Plumptre suggested that we could indicate our intention to take the same action the US was taking, but we might actually take the action later and more slowly.

42. Mr. Barton said that this approach would not satisfy the demands that would be made of the Government in Canada.

43. Mr. Robertson and Mr. Bryce suggested that a paper should be prepared immediately for Cabinet on the considerations which had been brought out in the discussion.

44. Mr. Plumptre said that such a paper could take one of two forms. It could recommend what should be done to meet the immediate problem, (for instance, undertaking discussions with the US), and perhaps evaluate some of the long term policy questions which might be taken up later; alternatively, it might recommend we take a firm united stand with our NATO partners but that we should ask the US for assurance that they would not be too inflexible in dealing with the modification of extended policy positions later on.

45. Mr. Bryce thought that our support for the US proposal should not be made conditional. We should be able to talk frankly to them but it was essential that we not take any position that would lessen our influence in Washington throughout the difficult period ahead.

46. Air Marshal Miller said that the united position of the Alliance was for the purpose of facing the Berlin crisis. During this crisis we should agree with our partners to take a position either of no negotiations or limited negotiations on Berlin only. We should not attempt now to work out any new approach to the difficult issues such as reunification and the frontiers because it would not be possible to get an agreed new approach in the time available.

47. Mr. Bryce thought that Khrushchev did not believe that the West would be willing to go as far as nuclear war over the Berlin issue and it seemed clear that further reiteration that we might do so would not convince him. Among the preparatory actions which might help convince him of our firmness of purpose might be the movement of dependents and possibly spending money on such other unpleasant and costly programmes as the building of shelters.

48. Air Marshal Miller considered that actions taken in the European theatre would be more likely to impress the Russians. There might also be some advantage in having a Western Heads of Government Meeting in the fall.

49. Mr. Bryce thought that a Head of Government Meeting might be somewhat dangerous even after the German elections because it might result in indications of disagreement or else in an unconvincing re-affirmation of previous positions. One action that might be useful would be for the Minister of National Defence or the Secretary of State for External Affairs to make trips to Washington, London or Paris and to refuse to divulge what the purpose of these trips was.

50. It was agreed that External Affairs would prepare a memorandum for Cabinet reflecting some of the above points, with a view to having Cabinet discussions on it at the beginning of next week.

BERLIN – UNITED STATES PREPAREDNESS MEASURES

The purpose of this memorandum is to summarize the information conveyed to you by Mr. Merchant during your meeting with him on Saturday, July 22, on the problem of Berlin and proposed United States preparedness measures.

2. Mr. Merchant began by explaining that the United States Secretary of State, Mr. Rusk, wanted him to deliver personally to you the main lines of United States thinking and, in particular, the points which would be made by the United States Permanent Representative in the NATO Council on Monday, July 24. He indicated that his message from Mr. Rusk and Mr. Finletter's statement to the NATO Council on Monday would provide a preview of the main elements which will be contained in President Kennedy's address to the nation on Tuesday, July 25¹² and which, in turn, will be followed by a special request to Congress on Wednesday, July 26.¹³ He thought it was likely, however, that President Kennedy's public statement would deal with these measures on more general terms and would not include some of the details which were being given to Canada and other NATO members.

3. The following is a summary of the main points made in Mr. Merchant's presentation:

(1) The present Berlin situation must be viewed against the wider background of a hardening Soviet attitude on Laos, disarmament and nuclear tests. Despite all the best United States efforts to meet the Soviet Union halfway, the latter for its own purposes appears to have decided to adopt an increasingly rigid position.

(2) While it is difficult to be certain about Soviet intentions, they appear to have decided that the balance of power is shifting to their advantage and that they should exploit the exposed Western position in Berlin to put the West "on the run." Their objectives appear to be:

- (i) to consolidate the Communist position in Europe;
- (ii) to achieve an early and significant weakening of the Western position in Berlin;
- (iii) to demonstrate Western impotence;
- (iv) to weaken and, if possible, divide NATO.

(3) The United States believes that action must be taken on a broad front to convince the Soviet Union and world opinion of the united purpose and determination of the peoples and governments of the Alliance.

(4) The United States considers that in view of the increasing gravity of the world situation, it is necessary and sensible for the members of the Alliance to consider measures to improve their own defences and to discuss together all possible means of protecting our mutual position without war.

¹³ Voir/See Congressional Record: Proceedings and Debates of the 87th Congress, First Session, vol. 107, Part 10, pp. 13460-13463, 13468, 13504-13508.

(5) The measures which the United States has in mind in the present situation include:

- (i) development of an agreed Western strategy;
- (ii) a significant build-up of Western military strength;
- (iii) possible counter-measures to be applied as a means of protecting the Western position in Berlin. These would include economic counter-measures relating to East Germany and possibly to the Soviet Union as well;
- (iv) development of concerted Western diplomatic positions;
- (v) efforts to marshal maximum world opinion.

(6) For its part, the United States Administration intends to ask Congress for an extra appropriation of $3.2 billion which would be in addition to the $6 billion increase already requested by President Kennedy over and above President Eisenhower's defence budget. Among other things this increase would enable the United States to:

- (i) have the capability to move to Europe six additional divisions by the end of this year if such should prove to be necessary;
- (ii) increase and improve its supply of tactical and transport aircraft;
- (iii) increase to 50 per cent (from approximately 25 per cent) the number of SAC bomber aircraft on ground alert.

(7) The United States believes that if the West is to convince the Russians of the credibility of its position and its willingness to accept risks, it would not be sufficient for the United States to act alone in this respect. The other members of NATO should be prepared to make comparable increases in their defensive strength.

(8) The United States is also considering substantial increases in the field of civil defence.

(9) The Alliance must also be agreed on contingency planning measures for Berlin and arrangements will have to be explored to obtain precise commitments from governments in this regard.

(10) All these measures must not however prejudice existing Western plans and programmes in other parts of the world (although not specific in this regard, Mr. Rusk's message appeared to be referring to aid programmes.)

(11) While bolstering up its defences, the West must, at the same time, leave no stone unturned in attempting to arrive through negotiations at an acceptable accommodation with the USSR on Berlin and other outstanding East-West issues. Although not specific in this regard, Mr. Rusk's message referred to:

- (i) East-West discussions through diplomatic channels;
- (ii) a possible Four-Power Foreign Ministers' meeting.

(12) In considering all those possibilities, the United States intends to lay the greatest stress on full consultation with its NATO allies. (In the course of his remarks later, Mr. Merchant indicated that the possibility of having a NATO Heads of Government meeting at some stage could not be excluded.)

Other points which emerged in the course of the conversation were:

(a) The United States regards its commitments in respect of Berlin to be absolutely vital and believes that any failure to discharge its responsibilities fully in this regard would be disastrous and would undermine completely the confidence of all its allies around the world.

(b) The Administration has not come to any decision on the question of evacuating dependents of United States military personnel from Europe. Mr. Merchant indicated that consideration had been given about two years ago to the possibility of evacuating the some 10,000 dependents of United States military personnel stationed in West Berlin. It was decided not to do so mainly because of the demoralizing effect such a move would likely have on the population of West Berlin.

(c) The Mayor of West Berlin, Mr. Brandt, will be given an outline of the same points which will be submitted to the NATO Council by the United States Permanent Representative on Monday, July 24.

BERLIN SITUATION; NUCLEAR WEAPONS POLICY
 (Previous reference July 24)

45. The Prime Minister said that he would commence the exposition of this important problem and would hope that the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Minister of National Defence would follow with their analyses and views of the situation.

After a few remarks about the origins of the Berlin situation at the end of the war, he recalled that when he had talked to Adenauer in 1958 the latter thought that a crisis was looming, and possibly war. Now it appeared there really was going to be a crisis this year. Judging from the conversations in May, the Prime Minister was convinced that President Kennedy would take a definite stand and not deviate. Mr. Khrushchev has taken him to be either weak or provocative. The position of the whole West would be endangered should the United States give way. Therefore, Berlin must be maintained and the United States had to be supported in this effort.

46. Mr. Diefenbaker spoke of some of the things that Mr. Khrushchev had been saying recently and mentioned that he had heard the latter was now starting to drink again and speak more freely. Khrushchev now seemed to think he had superiority over the United States in missiles and nuclear weapons. Even U.S. Generals thought two or three years ago that their superiority might end with 1961. NATO had not mobilized the forces that were decided upon at Lisbon, and was no match for Russia and Eastern Europe on the ground. Consequently, the question arose of what could now be done.

The U.S. would not back up. Eisenhower had told Mr. Diefenbaker that he had been held back in the past by the views of his Allies. Kennedy was unlikely to be restrained to the same degree. He was going to outline on Tuesday night some of the steps that he will propose to Congress or take under his own powers.¹⁴ These will include an increase in the call-up, a strengthening of the Navy as well as the Army, preparations to send six further divisions to Europe if necessary, and other measures. On the other hand, he was not going to repatriate the dependants of servicemen because of the effects on the Europeans.

The question arose as to what plans should be made for action when Russia turned over the administration of the access roads to Berlin to East Germany. Will East Germany prevent their use? If so, should the West push through on the ground, and what forces should it use for the purpose? If a conflict arose out of it, could it be limited by a refusal to use nuclear weapons? If they were not used, the Western Powers might quickly be pushed into the sea. If they did use nuclear weapons, there was apt to be a nuclear war because it was difficult to imagine the use of nuclear weapons being confined to the battlefield.

The government here must now consider its own stand on Berlin. He had spent some hours the previous day studying the analyses of the situation by officials and various suggestions for the attitude that should be taken. With some of these he did not agree. The Secretary of State for External Affairs would deal with these suggestions.

The government would also have to decide what policy should be taken under present circumstances with regard to nuclear weapons in Canada, in particular for the storage of nuclear weapons at Goose Bay and Harmon Field. Negotiations on agreements on nuclear weapons were likely to take about two months and it would probably be wise to go ahead with them now. Canada should not act provocatively but the danger could not be postponed.

47. Mr. Diefenbaker went on to say that the Prime Ministers and Presidents concerned in the NATO countries did not believe that Khrushchev was bluffing. He was being challenged at home and by China and must show progress in regard to Berlin and the German situation. He had left himself almost no escape hatches and had pointed out with definiteness what he intended to do in turning over control to East Germany. Ulbricht, for his part, said that East Germany intended to take over West Berlin. They are seriously disturbed over the flow of refugees and had become more defiant than they were before. The matter was now one causing deep concern. The alternative solutions had been tried on Khrushchev before but none of them had worked.

(At this point the meeting was adjourned and the Prime Minister suggested that when it was resumed Mr. Green might outline his views of the situation.)

48. The Secretary of State for External Affairs said that the present situation was precipitated by Khrushchev's statement that he was going to recognize East Germany and sign a peace treaty with it, together with indications that, if the West were to interfere, he would counter their moves. Should access to West Berlin be resisted by force, the West would not have enough strength in Europe on the ground to force its way through. Canada was involved as a member of NATO.

¹⁴ Voir/See "Radio and Television Report to the American People on the Berlin Crisis," Public Papers of the Presidents: John F. Kennedy, 1961 (Washington: United States Government Printing Office, 1962), document 302.

He felt Khrushchev's present tough attitude arose because he was now convinced of Russian superiority. He felt that Kennedy was immature and insecure. He feared that he himself would be under pressure and criticism in the Praesidium and must show the Chinese that he was tougher than they think. The Russians can be stupid as others can and their present course was not a wise one. President Kennedy was reacting strongly. The situation was like that of two locomotives headed toward each other on a single track.

The British were very worried because of their highly vulnerable position in a nuclear war. The Allies could not make any definite plans or proposals until after the German election. Khrushchev had not set specific deadlines for specific action but had said that, by the end of the year, he would sign a peace treaty with East Germany.

49. Mr. Green said that the U.S. Ambassador had called on him on Saturday and outlined American views on the situation and plans for dealing with it. They were to be taken up on Monday at NATO. Mr. Kennedy would be announcing the U.S. position on Tuesday evening.

He will propose that the Western Allies should have an agreed strategy on counter measures, including economic sanctions, diplomatic action and the martialling of public opinion, as well as on military measures to be taken in the event of trouble. They would hope that their Allies will be taking action parallel to their own, and Canada, for example, might be expected to send another brigade or even a division to Europe. Mr. Kennedy believed that a Four-Power Foreign Ministers meeting might be necessary, and East-West discussions through diplomatic channels. On the other hand, he was of the firm opinion that if the West gave in on the Berlin issue, it would lose its position in world affairs.

For itself, the United States, as President Kennedy would indicate, intended to ask Congress for a supplementary defence budget of some $3¼ billion, for an increased call-up of men, not only for the Army but also additional manpower for the Navy and Air Force. He would also ask to increase the supply of tactical and transport aircraft and the number of SAC bomber aircraft on ground alert. They were also proposing to make substantial increases in the civil defence programme. All this might well mean an increase in taxes. There would, however, be no declaration of a national emergency.

50. Mr. Green went on to say that the chief problem was what steps were to be taken if access to Berlin was cut off. There probably would be a withholding of decisions until after the election in Germany.

In the course of his remarks on these matters, he mentioned that a story was going about that Herr Strauss, the German Defence Minister, had said that Germany would defend Berlin to the last American and this was causing some apprehension. He also reported that Mr. Merchant had said that the United States had not the slightest intention of giving nuclear weapons to Germany.

51. Mr. Green felt there was scope for negotiations on the Berlin problem; for instance the settling of the eastern borders of Germany offered some opportunity for bargaining. The reunification of Germany remained an objective but no one believed it could be accomplished in the near future.

The United Nations would meet in about six weeks and there was bound to be a great upsurge of feeling among the uncommitted countries over this Berlin issue. Even Russia was influenced by the world opinion that was focused by the United Nations. On the other hand, Russia would be assisted by the drastic action taken by France over Bizerte and this was most regrettable because Tunisia was one of the best nations of Africa. Indeed, in the long run, this Tunisian situation might prove to be more serious than that in Berlin. On the whole, he thought there might be some softening of war talk once the United Nations met and the Americans and Russians were carrying on some negotiations.

In regard to nuclear weapons which the Prime Minister had mentioned, he thought it significant that the new U.S. plan for disarmament included the provision that there should be no further spread of nuclear weapons. He hoped that Cabinet would not rush in to approve Canada becoming a nuclear power. One must recognize how high the stakes were in nuclear war. It was an issue that might determine whether or not Montreal, Toronto, Hamilton, Ottawa, Vancouver and other Canadian cities might be blotted off the map. It was not just a question of losing some troops but rather one of the future of Canada and of civilization. If the present situation gave rise to a nuclear war, the United Kingdom might be blotted out entirely and most of Canada as well.

52. Discussion at this point arose over what was to be done if Russia and East Germany carried out the action they threatened. It was noted that the United States had a terrifying number of nuclear weapons and did not appear to need help from anyone else in nuclear deterrents. Some thought it would be tragic and serve no useful purpose if Canada was the first to break the line on the spread of nuclear weapons. Others, on the contrary, felt that the making of plans to acquire defensive weapons for defence purposes did not mean that Canada was becoming a nuclear power.

53. During the course of this discussion Mr. Green indicated that he did not have as much objection to the storage of nuclear weapons on leased bases as he did to the acquisition of weapons for the Canadian forces. He felt it was possible to defend permitting the United States to have such weapons on leased bases, as not implying that Canada was becoming a nuclear power. It was also noted that the storage of weapons at Argentinia could be further justified as being under a joint NATO control through SACLANT, although there were certain technical problems to be solved.

54. The Minister of National Defence then gave an appraisal of the situation. The extreme belligerency of Khrushchev at present suggested that he was after bigger stakes than simply Berlin. His main objective must be the breaking up of NATO. Berlin was the weakest point in the NATO Alliance. Very few members of NATO really wanted reunification of Germany, even though this was one of the nominal objectives of the Western nations, including Canada. If West Berlin came under the control of East Germany and the Communists, and if the other NATO countries did not assist in the reunification, Germany might then drop out of NATO and the Alliance might really disappear as a consequence.

He felt Western solidarity must be maintained on this issue and at some point there must be a meeting of the NATO Heads of Government to determine the course to be followed. From the point of view of world opinion, the West must appear ready to negotiate at any time and there might be some questions, for example the Oder-Neisse line, on which negotiations could take place and could take up a good deal of time. On the other hand, the field of real negotiation was very narrow and there was not much on which the West could make concessions. The essence of the Western position was to maintain the status quo in Berlin, to stand firm. He felt the United Nations could not have much effect; it had no relationship to reality.

55. Mr. Harkness went on, at the Prime Minister's suggestion, to speak about nuclear weapons for the Canadian forces and said that he felt there was all the difference in the world between the defensive weapons desired for the Canadian forces and hydrogen bombs which everyone had in mind in thinking of nuclear weapons. BOMARCS could not start a war – they had a range of only 400 or 500 miles and were purely defensive weapons. Already, European countries in NATO had nuclear weapons. The government should lose no time in starting negotiations for an agreement on nuclear weapons for the Canadian forces. The agreements should be completed first and then the government could decide later if and when they would actually have the weapons made available in Canada for the forces in accordance with the agreements.

56. The Prime Minister at this point mentioned that he felt it would not constitute any spread of the nuclear powers to have the weapons held in joint control of the United States and its Allies, including Canada.

57. Mr. Green, however, felt that in Europe this joint control amounted substantially to U.S. control.

58. The Prime Minister went on to say that he had asked around Christmas time that the agreement on storage of weapons at Goose Bay and Harmon Field be held up as a trading point but he indicated that this no longer needed to be done.

He had come away from the North with the impression that from time to time there were periods of a few days at times that could be predicted, that they did not know up there what was going on, as they were without communications. He thought the next such period of silence was apt to take place in October. This tended to make Canada's defences much more vulnerable.

(It was pointed out, however, that the Mid-Canada line could detect aircraft penetrating the Dew Line even though the latter was temporarily blanked out for the reasons mentioned.)

59. During the discussion which then ensued, the suggestion was made that there should be a meeting of the Canada-U.S. Ministerial Committee on Defence to deal with some of these questions relating to nuclear weapons and other matters of joint concern, but the Prime Minister reported that the U.S. President was not very anxious to have this Committee meet now. He prefers that conversations on defence be carried on a more limited basis and through other channels.

Other Ministers expressed their views and most were to the effect that the West should not retreat, or give any appearance of weakening, on the Berlin issue as it would undermine the whole Alliance and there was nothing in substance that could be given up in Berlin. There was some discussion as to whether this should be carried so far as to imply a willingness to accept nuclear war as well as limited action on the ground, but no conclusive opinions were expressed on this point.

There was also discussion as to the nature of a probe of the East German resistance to access on the ground that might be useful and the Minister of National Defence reported that the United States felt that nothing less than an armoured division would make a worthwhile test of the will to resist and it was a military absurdity to endeavour to hold open a corridor of 130 miles in length.

60. The Prime Minister noted that the U.S. authorities said that there was no way the West could defend itself on the ground in Europe without nuclear weapons.

61. One Minister expressed the view that it was vital to indicate a willingness to use nuclear weapons if necessary and to show no signs of weakening and, if that were done, the nuclear weapons would not in fact be used because the Russians would not run the risk of bringing about their use.

62. The Secretary of State for External Affairs at this point reported that he felt the United States was going farther than had been believed. He felt they were all prepared for a war now and were expecting it. Indeed Mr. Merchant had left him with the distinct impression that they were now set for a nuclear war.

63. Other Ministers said that in this case Canada must look seriously at the position it would be in should a nuclear war occur. Some felt Canada had no effective air defence and it would be necessary to give thought to shelters from fall-out at least.

64. The Minister of National Defence noted, however, that, while no air defence could be perfect, if there was none it simply invited attack on vital targets as well as others. The prime purpose of the air defence was to defend the SAC forces of retaliation and the second purpose was to defend the industrial cities. He did, however, express the view that the West must stand firm and show that it was ready for war, in order to avoid war.

65. There was brief discussion as to whether experience in the last war in respect of germs and gas was a guide as to whether nuclear weapons would not be used in this war.

66. The Prime Minister then brought the discussion to a close, saying that the government was now beginning to see what a serious problem it was up against. One could not negotiate successfully unless one was willing to give up something and on Berlin there was nothing that the West could give up. If the Western nations broke their pledges to West Berlin, it would disrupt the relations with all other Allies. Khrushchev now thought the United States was bluffing and had talked of Kennedy as a mere boy.

67. The Cabinet took note of the statements made by the Prime Minister, the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Minister of National Defence on the Berlin situation and its implications for NATO and for Canada, and the discussion that took place thereon.

NATO DISCUSSION ON GERMANY AND BERLIN

The attached telegram from our Ambassador to NATO in Paris reports discussions held by the Council on July 26. He describes this meeting as the very tentative first step toward real consultation by the Alliance on the problem of Germany and Berlin.

The Ambassador is convinced that if we wish to influence the Three Powers experts meetings and the Ministerial meetings to follow, we must submit views of substance in Washington and London within the next two weeks.

Representatives of the smaller powers carried most of the discussions. Emphasis was placed on the importance which the Governments of these powers attach to the development of positive proposals on the part of the Western team to be put to the Russians. Most speakers praised President Kennedy's address of July 25¹⁵ for its admirable balance between military measures and the willingness to embark upon any reasonable negotiations.

GERMANY AND BERLIN

Council met on July 26 in very restricted session in Secretary-General's office in a first real attempt to come to grips with current Berlin problem. Perhaps before giving an account of the views expressed it might be useful to let you have my impressions of the meeting. It was a very tentative first step towards real consultation on this problem of central importance to the Alliance. The meeting brought to mind the first few sessions last fall on long-term planning. On the whole I believe it was a good meeting in that a number of questions of substance were posed. I assume that the Three (and Four) Power Working Group will be seized with these questions and any others which may develop out of these consultations. However I am convinced that for the short term if we wish to influence the Three Power experts meetings and the Ministerial meetings to follow we must submit views of substance as soon as possible. By short term I mean the next ten days to two weeks. There is not repeat not much time or likelihood that before the Four Foreign Ministers meet in Paris in first week of August, a further Council meeting will be held. In the circumstances such views of substance as we wish to submit would probably have the greatest effect if made directly in Washington and London. Following a conversation with Finletter I believe that State Department is receptive to our views.

2. Yesterday's meeting featured questions by smaller powers and almost complete silence from representatives of four most interested powers. The Germans said nothing; the French and British little more. Finletter (USA), perhaps constrained by the silence of his most interested partners, confined himself to questions on questions which were posed by other members. His purpose as he told me afterwards was to give greater precision to the points made so that these points would have their maximum effect in the Three and Four-Power gatherings. Finletter at least was interested in points of view represented by the questions asked while the other three were not repeat not particularly anxious to participate at all.

3. The Norwegian representative led off the discussion defining what, in his government's view, constituted the "vital interests" of the West in the Berlin problem. For his government these vital interests were simple and straightforward. They were the freedom of West Berlin and its people, freedom of access to the city, and continuance of an Allied military presence in the city. He characterized (as did most other speakers) President Kennedy's address to the nation on July 25 as "admirable" in the balance which it established between military measures and the willingness to embark upon any reasonable negotiations. He then made use of the questioning technique which was to be followed by most members of Council who spoke. Did we envisage any basis for negotiating with the Russians? It was hardly conceivable that Western powers could negotiate from the position that present arrangements were perfect. Was it conceivable that we might seek by negotiations to give additional guarantees to Berlin? His government hoped that some such possibility would be looked at most carefully by Four Powers most concerned in their forthcoming Ministerial meetings. Wasn't timing of negotiations a tactical problem of the first order? Should we wait for Khrushchev to start a course of events with signature of a peace treaty or should we take an initiative before he begins that process? He hoped again that Four Foreign Ministers would consider this problem.

4. The Belgian representative said that he was heartened by Kennedy's speech in that it placed question of Berlin in "proper perspective" indicating that the views he was to express had been discussed with Spaak just last night. He made three points concerning the military measures forecast in Kennedy's report to nation: (a) in his government's view an error had been committed in taking and publicizing military measures in USA without prior discussions in Council of the fundamental political points involved in Berlin problem; (b) the announcement of military measures put very severe limits on possibility of diplomatic and economic measures which might serve to ease the problem; (c) while his government appreciated that USA decisions had a high psychological content, USA government should know that Belgian opinion was simply not repeat not prepared to contemplate military measures until it had been convinced that all conceivable political measures had been exhausted. He went further to give his personal opinion that European public opinion in general was not repeat not sufficiently prepared for need for military measures. In summary he believed that a full and frank discussion of political, economic and military aspects of the Berlin problem was required if we are to proceed as allies. If we did not repeat not proceed together the effect of the unilateral American actions would be much diminished. Psychological preparation might be needed in USA. Certainly it was needed in Europe.

5. Turning then to the more purely political elements of problem, the Belgian representative used technique of questions to suggest his government's point of view. Why had Khrushchev precipitated a Berlin crisis at this time? Surely this was a fundamental question to be answered if we were to choose the right counter action. If Khrushchev did what he said he was going to do, i.e. sign a separate peace treaty with East Germany, what were we planning to do about it? What were existing arrangements for access to Berlin and would they be changed substantially if a separate peace treaty were signed by the Russians? Was there any possibility of forestalling the implementation of Khrushchev's declared intention? What did it mean to say that the West intended to be "firm" on Berlin? Did it mean that this firmness applied to Berlin alone or was it a firmness rooted in the intention to accept only a reunified Germany? Was there no repeat no initiative we could take at the present time? Even the President had spoken mainly of proposals which "they" might make; was it not repeat not possible, however, for "us" to make proposals? Finally, de Staerke noted his complete agreement with the Norwegian definition of the vital interests of the West, i.e., liberty of access, continued allied military presence, and the freedom of Berliners. He ended his intervention with a brief reference to the procedural problem of establishing some relationship between the Four-Power working group whether at expert or ministerial level and the Council. Some "organic liaison" was indispensable and perhaps could best be established through the Secretary-General.

6. The Danish representative echoed much that had been said by the two previous speakers emphasizing the importance which his government attached to development of positive proposals on the part of the Western team to be put to the Russians. He too spoke well of the balance in Kennedy's address to the nation. The Greek representative concentrated on the desirability of exploring a role for the UN in the Berlin problem. One of the basic foundations of the Western case surely was the liberty of individuals. We publicly proclaimed ourselves to be artisans of the UN. Why then had we not repeat not brought the Berlin problem to the UN. Surely the right of individuals was an extremely valuable platform on which to stand in the UN. The majority of the members of the UN usually could be brought to understand a problem when posed in these terms. While somewhat dated, the Wilsonian principles of 1919 still commanded a degree of respect around the world. The Netherlands representative did not repeat not entirely agree with de Staerke that an error had been made in emphasizing military reinforcements first. Western firmness had to be given substance and this could best be achieved by the proposed military measures. The Soviet Union must be given no repeat no grounds for miscalculation as to the firmness of Western intentions. Nor was he fully convinced that new Western initiatives had to be taken at this stage. Certainly there should be no repeat no concessions of a substantial character. A crisis had been created by the Soviet Union and it was the Russians who should be forced to indicate how they proposed to reduce tension.

7. I said that I thought my authorities would welcome the balance of flexibility and firmness which had characterized President Kennedy's statement. Firmness on vital issues was required and it would therefore seem to be a good idea if we could agree on exactly what these vital issues were. I thought we could agree with the point made in Finletter's statement to the Council on July 24 that the Western response to Soviet action with respect to Germany and Berlin must not repeat not be allowed to affect negatively other constructive efforts around the world, particularly in the aid field. In this respect we had to bear in mind that Council discussions must continue to give priority to those problems where NATO had a direct responsibility. We would also agree, I thought, that it was essential to create a strong NATO military posture but it would be dangerous if the methods chosen to demonstrate NATO and USA military strength were to exacerbate rather than ease the present difficult situation. It would be dangerous, likewise, if undue haste to demonstrate this strength would reduce the possibility of satisfactory negotiations. Suggestions had been made both in the President's statement to the nation and in Finletter's statement to the Council that USA efforts would involve comparable efforts on the part of other NATO partners. The Canadian attitude on this point would become evident only after the examination of the Berlin problem which the Cabinet was currently embarked upon had been completed. This examination would be facilitated by further expressions of views from our NATO partners and from the NATO military authorities.

8. I added that the questions posed by de Staerke were important. A few more occurred to me. The Soviet timetable was of some importance and was known to us in general terms. Khrushchev was committed to negotiate with the West or to conclude a peace treaty with East Germany. Would the West be better off to negotiate before a peace treaty had been concluded – possibly in order to prevent its signature – or would it be better to wait until the peace treaty had been signed. It was my personal view that it would seem to be in the Western interest that negotiations with the Soviet Union should start before a peace treaty had actually been signed. This did not repeat not mean that the military build-up already taking place should be stopped. The question involved in this build-up was whether or not repeat not it would guarantee the maintenance of freedom of West Berliners. The USA government had evidently decided in the affirmative. I assumed that it was the USA view that this military build-up would enable us to negotiate from a position of greater the strength the more direct the willingness to negotiate should be. A second general question was whether it was possible to restrict an eventual negotiation with the Soviet Union to the question of Berlin or whether, as has been the case in the past, Berlin should be considered in the wider context of East-West relations. A discussion on this point appeared to me to be important. Military measures taken by USA could not repeat not be expected to ease relations between East and West. All issues under consideration were likely to become more difficult. We could not repeat not rule out the possibility that in this new atmosphere discussions of a general nature on East-West issues would become more difficult and that we might be limiting ourselves to restrict discussion to Berlin. After the meeting the German representative took me aside to repeat once more the line that the questions of Berlin and Germany were inseparable.

9. A third major question concerned the position to be adopted by the West about the role, if any, of the UN in this affair. The General Assembly would be meeting at the very moment when the Berlin issue was likely to be at the boiling point. Mr. Rusk had already suggested that in certain circumstances the USA might consider referring the problem to the UN. It seemed to me that any position taken at the UN would have to be based on a Western willingness to negotiate. We could not repeat not go to UN without being clear on this point. Reference of the issue to UN was not repeat not, of course, without hazards since a great number of members would be unfamiliar with the problem in its detail. If such reference to UN was to be avoided, would it not repeat not be essential that parties directly concerned indicate a positive desire to negotiate. I made brief reference to the point which the Norwegian representative had made concerning the possibility that some additional guarantees for Berlin might be a possible negotiating base.

10. I ended my intervention with some reference to the problem of future procedure and the relationship between the Working Group and Council. I wondered whether a representative of Secretary-General could attend the Working Group meetings and whether by this method a channel could be established between the Council and the Working Group. Perhaps, Secretary-General himself might attend some of the ministerial sessions. It was extremely important to ensure that the ministerial discussions should not repeat not lead to joint communiqués of substance which had not repeat not been cleared with Council. If it was the intention of ministers to issue a communiqué, should not repeat not the text be submitted to Council early enough to get governments' views on it; another satisfactory course would be for the communiqué to be delayed until after the visit of Mr. Rusk to Council. Even in this latter instance any statement of substance to be issued following his visit would have to be cleared by governments. If the foreign ministers were to decide to appoint a permanent working group, consideration should be given again to attaching a representative of Secretary-General to that group.

11. If these comments on procedures (paragraph 10) seem reasonable to you, you might wish to consider having me put them more formally to Council or conversely you might wish to have them taken up in bilateral discussions in Washington, London, Paris and Bonn. I think we should attach considerable importance to the matter of the inevitable communiqué which will develop out of the Four-Power ministerial discussions. It seems essential that every effort be made to ensure that it does not repeat not put individual governments in an awkward position.

12. The remainder of the meeting was taken up primarily with two points. The first was Finletter's apparent attempt by questions to get further elaboration particularly of de Staerke's views as represented by his questions. It was in the course of this dialogue that Finletter dropped the hint that questions of a general nature passed on to the Working Group were bound to be less effective than direct statements of government views. It was interesting that at this point the French and UK representatives intervened briefly with statements which tended, in opposition to Finletter's approach, to support the production of general questions for the Working Group's consideration. The second general point around which further discussion developed was that of the liaison to be established between Council and the Working Group. There was general support around the table that some such liaison should be established and Secretary-General took it upon himself to explore just how this could be done.

13. To make our report complete, I should add that the Norwegian representative once again asked that a purely factual description of how matters now stood with respect to access to Berlin be provided to the Council as quickly as possible. He told me privately that from 80 to 90 percent of all traffic, civilian and military, is already "seen" if not repeat not "controlled" by East Germans. The Belgian representative in somewhat frustrated annoyance asked whether the four most interested powers whose “dossiers must be bulging with papers” were going to speak. Their silence made it clear that they were not repeat not, at least at this stage, ready to reveal the contents of their brief cases.¹⁶ While no repeat no date was set for a further restricted meeting, Secretary-General made the assumption that there would be further such meetings.

RE: FURTHER THOUGHTS ON BERLIN

1. The recent speeches and events give more hope for success of negotiations but the danger in the situation remains grave unless both sides speak and act with care.

2. The NATO discussions have indicated an encouraging degree of unity and seriousness but have not endeavoured to reach the heart of the matter on negotiations or on contingency measures and when they would be used. I think it is best to avoid these in NATO. We must assume that the Russians intercept the reports of some of our NATO allies. I think Rusk's reports were intended to reach the Russians in this way.

3. The purposes of the defence build-up are not to win a conventional war around Berlin or to scare the Russians. The latter must know they can wipe the floor with the NATO forces in Europe unless large nuclear weapons are used. Rather the purposes are:

- (a) to show we are serious and united;
- (b) to suggest that if Khrushchev behaves badly there will be a continuing and general build-up in defence efforts and costs even if there is not a war over Berlin;
- (c) to strengthen the Western bargaining position by (a) and (b); and
- (d) to make clear to the Germans and other allies that we are willing to pay costs and take risks to meet our pledges, even if in the end we make a compromise settlement.

4. I still believe the Russians believe we will not fight a nuclear war over Berlin. That is what makes the situation dangerous. Merely “standing firm” cannot assure peace.

5. The United States are unlikely to show their hand on matters of substance concerning negotiations before the German elections in mid-September. They will probably want to have Kennedy-Adenauer talks very soon thereafter. We should not press them to inform us or others of their real intentions.

6. I believe there is room for an acceptable negotiated settlement, which would be consistent with our pledges to the people of Berlin, though it would disappoint some elements in Germany. I think Escott Reid's proposal is as good as any I have seen,¹⁷ and would be tolerable to Germany. It would probably be necessary to make some concession in it in regard to East Berlin. Such a settlement would open the way to eventual recognition of East Germany, which I think is acceptable to us, and probably desirable. It would involve some risks but so does the present situation.

¹⁶ Note marginale :/Marginal note:
Silence. [J.G. Diefenbaker]

7. It may be necessary and even desirable to add to Reid's proposal, in the negotiations, a limitation on the stationing of nuclear weapons in both East and West Germany (and some parts of Poland and Czechoslovakia) in order to meet the (legitimate) Russian worries over Germany having nuclear weapons. The United States would oppose this for military reasons but I think it would have real virtues for us, in helping to assure stability and less likelihood of war in the future.

8. I think Canada should join in some defence build-up along with the other members of NATO. This should include negotiation of the terms for acquiring nuclear weapons, which should be publicly announced, and the stationing of nuclear weapons for U.S. defence forces on leased bases in Canada. Some other measures of our own, costing money, should be included. These would be for the purposes noted in paragraph 3 above, and also, and most importantly in our case, to show Washington we are serious in order that they will give proper consideration to our views as to what should be done.

9. I think we should aim at strengthening the U.S. intention to negotiate seriously and contribute what we can in suggestions of substance. I think we should do this through Heeney in Washington, as Merchant here has such strong views of his own that it is better not to transmit our ideas through him. I think there might be value in having Escott Reid go to Washington to be with Heeney to see some of the Americans, if the Government decides to have some suggestions put forward.

R.B. B[RYCE]

P.S. I should call to your attention too the important economic counter-measures we are being asked to prepare [and] to take if necessary. You will see the implications for wheat to China. They are better than war, but serious to us. R.B. B[ryce]

BERLIN

The new DDR control measures introduced earlier this morning appeared to be in complete and effective operation at noon today although in some open spaces along sectors of border, now well guarded by heavily armed troops and police, work was still continuing on erection of barbed wire fences. I saw large East German forces including infantry, armoured cars units, tanks and (group corrupt) military factory groups concentrated at centre of city near main crossing points and around main railway station where all remaining rail connections to West Berlin are now subject to rigid control. There was no repeat no interference or control of our car and tourist traffic subject to close control was moving normally.

2. Atmosphere in East Berlin was depressing and city centre gives all appearances of state of siege. Attitude of people on streets was one of curiosity and apathy but situation clearly tense and difficult at this point to say how their mood will develop in course of next few days. West

Berliners are also upset and special police measures have been taken on this side to prevent incidents along border.

3. Effect of new DDR control measures which are intended to eliminate refugee traffic and border crossers problem completely is to stop all East Berliners, unless they have special police permits, from visiting West Berlin. East Germans living outside Berlin area are also requested not repeat not to visit Berlin. All other traffic e.g. on accessible routes and visiting West Germans, West Berliners and allied and Western diplomatic personnel to East Berlin is explicitly declared to be unaffected by new control and subject only to already existing practices.

4. Clever weekend timing of move, special deployment according to British source of two Soviet divisions including 400 tanks around city perimeter and concurrently publication of Warsaw Pact declaration supporting new East German measures suggest whole operation was worked out and coordinated in Moscow over past week or so. Special meeting of Volkskammer Friday gave DDR régime blank cheque to take measures of this kind and result to what undoubtedly led to example totalling over 3500 refugees in last 33 hours evidence so before barrier went down.

Ottawa, August 14, 1961

BERLIN

After several weeks of increasing numbers of refugees crossing from East Germany to West Germany through Berlin and mounting unrest in East Germany, the Soviet Union closed yesterday the zonal border in Berlin. By the use of soldiers, barbed wire, and the cancellation of certain subway services, Soviet and GDR authorities are preventing the movement of both refugees and approximately 53,000 East Berlin citizens who are employed in West Berlin. As you will have seen, newspaper reports state that the closure of the border was accompanied by unrest and demonstrations by West Berlin citizens. The border has not been closed to West Berliners working in East Berlin or to bona fides Western travellers.

Assessment

In 1953, in 1957, and again last year, East German and Soviet troops sealed the Berlin border for a few days. Specific reasons were given for these closures but it appears that this time no explanation has been offered by the East German authorities. It may well be that Khrushchev has decided to take this step at this time and make it permanent so that the question of the flow of refugees from East to West Berlin will not be a major point of discussion in any forthcoming negotiations with the three major Western Powers, especially if the USSR intends to guarantee freedom of access to West Berlin. Khrushchev may have decided to take the risk of closing the Berlin border at this time so that any emotions or difficulties stimulated by this move will have diminished by the end of this year (the date when he has said he will sign a separate peace treaty with East Germany, unless a "peaceful solution" has been reached with the West before that time).

During the past few weeks, various steps have been taken by the East German authorities to encourage the 53,000 East Berlin citizens who have been working in West Berlin to seek employment in East Germany where there is an acute labour shortage. Hence the prevention of these workers crossing into the Western sectors of the city has not come as a complete surprise. More sudden and unexpected has been the denial of all access to West Berlin of people travelling from East Berlin. However, even this step has been feared recently as a result of the fact that increasingly large numbers of East Germans have been crossing into West Berlin and making the labour shortage in East Germany even more serious. (Last week 12,448 East Germans sought asylum in West Berlin, the highest figure this year and believed to be the peak since 1953.)

The immediate danger in the present situation arises from the fact that the people of West Berlin in particular and of West Germany in general may attempt in some way to help their fellow Germans if the suppression of the refugee stream causes some sort of revolt in East Germany. A revolt and intervention by West Germans could, of course, produce a situation in which the USSR, the Federal Republic of Germany and the United States might be forced to make hasty decisions about military intervention.

It has been reported in past weeks that President Kennedy has ordered that nothing be done to encourage violence in East Germany and the Federal Republic has shown restraint in propaganda aimed at the east. Press reports state this morning that Dr. Adenauer broadcast yesterday to the East Germans, urging that nothing should be done to make the present situation worse. Dr. Adenauer also said that "counter-measures" are being considered. Presumably, what the Chancellor had in mind would be a termination of all commercial contacts between East and West Germany, a step which in the past has been sufficient to deter East Germans from hindering access to West Berlin. The United States has already officially denounced the closure of the border.

If, as seems likely, the Soviet Union has decided to close the border as part of a more long-term policy to stabilize the East German régime, it will probably be unlikely that economic countermeasures will induce the East German authorities to re-open the border. For a long time it has been open to the Soviet Union to seal the border between the two parts of the city, despite the fact that post-war agreements stipulated that the whole city should be under Four-Power control. The current Soviet move may be seen as one more step in Soviet plans to make the division of Germany more permanent.

CONTINGENCY MEASURES IN RESPECT TO BERLIN

1. At a NATO Council meeting held on 8 August 1961, immediately following the Four Power Conference on the Berlin crisis, Secretary of State Rusk made a comprehensive statement of US views of the essential elements of the problem and outlined, inter alia, the military steps which the US had taken, or intended to take, in the interests of strengthening the Western negotiating position and of indicating the determination of the West not to yield to threats in areas of vital interest. In stating this position Mr. Rusk stressed that unity of the Alliance was essential at this time and urged all nations of the Alliance to take similar measures.

2. In the discussion following Mr. Rusk's presentation the French, German and UK representatives approved the position taken by the USA and in turn outlined the specific military measures being considered by their governments. Several other representatives were in a position to indicate their intentions to institute similar measures. A summary of the measures taken or proposed by the US and other nations is at Annex "A". †

3. We are informed by the Canadian NATO Delegation that a Council meeting is tentatively scheduled for 21 August at which time it is expected that representatives will have substantial comments from their governments on the various views and proposals put forward at the 8 August meeting. These comments would cover proposals in the economic, political, psychological and military fields. In the interests of developing at least a preliminary Canadian view in regard to possible military measures consideration should be given now to a number of steps which might be taken by Canada to indicate our support of a firm and unified NATO attitude and to improve the effectiveness of our military forces.

4. While, as pointed out by our NATO representative at the 8 August meeting, Canada has met her NATO Force Goals and is continuing to strengthen the Canada-US region, there is a number of measures which might be taken to further strengthen our position both in the present crisis and on a continuing basis. These measures are listed by general category in Annex "B". Recommendations for specific action within these general categories will be made separately. While each measure is applicable to the present crisis, it is not possible to forecast the exact nature of developments or the duration of the crisis. Therefore wherever possible measures have been selected which it is believed are militarily and economically supportable on a long-term basis.

Annex B

MILITARY CONTINGENCY MEASURES

1. This Annex lists general categories of measures which might be taken to indicate Canadian support of a firm and united NATO position in the present Berlin crisis, and to improve our state of preparedness to meet an increased threat of hostilities.

2. Nuclear Weapons. Complete a CAN/US nuclear weapons agreement without further delay and hasten the procurement of the nuclear weapons systems needed by the Services in their current roles.

3. Civil Defence. Measures should be taken to increase the level of civil defence preparation such as:

- (a) initiate partial manning of emergency HQs at all appropriate levels on a full time basis by both governmental and military staffs.
- (b) stockpile rations, fuel and lubricants at camps, depots, etc.
- (c) consider additional civil defence measures as may be recommended by EMO.

4. Manpower

- (a) remove budgetary limitations on manpower ceilings;
- (b) increase manpower ceilings where necessary;
- (c) lift arbitrary service ceiling on forces in Europe;
- (d) increase the preparedness and effectiveness of the reserves.

5. Rotation. Adjust rotation of units or troops for the time being to the extent necessary to permit maximum operational efficiency during the period of tension.

6. Weapons, Equipment and Logistic Support Generally. Give consideration to selected programs and items which would be consistent with existing roles and supportable on a long-term basis.

7. Evacuation of Dependents. Canadian, US and UK policy on evacuation will be largely interdependent. The solution may range from no evacuation prior to an emergency through partial evacuation, to total evacuation during a period of tension.

Total Evacuation

Approximately 24,000 DND dependents are involved and on a "crash action" basis the period taken to evacuate them would depend upon the availability of air and surface transportation at the time the decision is taken. Transportation costs would amount to between $5M and $6M.

A progressive evacuation employing Service aircraft and commercial ships would require approximately three months.

Partial Evacuation

Partial evacuation could be carried out by halting the despatch of any more dependents to Europe until the crisis has been resolved and introducing a policy of allowing troops to elect evacuation of their dependents from Europe.

8. General Military Measures.

Make available to our allies all possible Canadian existing facilities to improve the defence posture of the West.

Increase the tempo of military exercises.

Concentrate troops and equipment so as to facilitate timely reinforcements of overseas formations.

The states of readiness of the forces can be increased instantly by stages at any time that such action is decided upon.

I have brought up to date in this memorandum the views I have been expressing in telegrams from Bonn.† In paragraph 11, I set forth the main provisions of the kind of agreement on Berlin which I think the West should try to secure in the forthcoming negotiations with the Soviet Union. The memorandum is followed by three annexes.‡ The first annex deals with the role which the U.N. might play in a reunited, independent free city state of Berlin. The second annex gives my reasons for believing that Western interests would be served by the substitution of an entirely new contractual agreement on Berlin for the present rights based on conquest. The third annex deals with the tactical problems of preparing for the negotiations with the Soviet Union.¹⁸

* * * * *

1. The task of working out some tolerable and honourable accommodation with the Soviet Union on Berlin will be extremely difficult. One cannot reasonably expect a sensible flexible Western negotiating position to take shape quickly. Time is necessary and patience and quiet, confidential, private exploratory talks at which tentative ideas are exchanged about the limits of possible concessions and counter-concessions and governments gradually move away from fixed positions. The negotiations with the Soviet Union must be tough but likewise unhurried and patient.

2. Our objective should be an arrangement under which Greater Berlin would be united under a freely elected government; the right to maintain Western military forces in Berlin would be preserved unimpaired; rights of access to Berlin for both military and civilian traffic would be better assured; and Berlin would be maintained as a place where people from East and West Germany can meet and talk.

3. The Soviet Union would find such an arrangement distasteful since it would involve the granting of freedom and self-government to over a million East Berliners and the removal of the capital of the DDR from East Berlin. The West is therefore unlikely to be able to persuade the Soviet Union to agree unless the West in its bargaining with the Soviet Union gets full value out of Western Bargaining counters.

4. The Western bargaining position has lately been strengthened by the obvious determination of the West to fight if necessary to defend the freedom of the West Berliners. The West must continue to do what it can to ensure that the Soviet Union is in no doubt about this. President Kennedy's recent public statements and actions have been extremely helpful. But from now on private, solemn warnings communicated through diplomatic channels from government to government are likely to carry more weight with the Soviet Government than the reiteration of public declarations. They are also less apt to have dangerous side effects.

5. The chief bargaining counters possessed by the West are de jure recognition of the Oder-Neisse line and the acceptance of arrangements which would imply a long step in the direction of de facto recognition of the DDR. The value of these counters tends to diminish the longer we put off using them since the Soviet Union believes, and with a good deal of justification, that de jure recognition of the Oder-Neisse line and de facto recognition of the DDR are virtually inevitably before many years have passed.

6. Because Khrushchev in his public statements for the last two and a half years has put so much emphasis on the necessity of abolishing the occupation status of Berlin, consent by the West to such a change constitutes another Western bargaining counter.

7. It would be folly to let the Soviet Union know at the outset of a long process of tough diplomatic bargaining that the West is prepared if necessary to use all these bargaining counters. But it is essential for the West to decide before entering into negotiations the price which it is if necessary prepared to pay for a tolerable and honourable accommodation on Berlin.

8. Any such accommodation would not be without risk to the West. No matter how good the accommodation is, the freedom of Berlin will continue for the foreseeable future to be in danger from Soviet aggression – but so will the freedom of the allied world as a whole and the uncommitted world. Moreover an accommodation on Berlin will not constitute a solution of the Berlin problem. The only solution of the Berlin problem is the unification of Germany and that is not likely to take place in the foreseeable future. All we can hope for now is an accommodation on Berlin which carries with it less risk to our interests than the present situation under which our interests are very vulnerable.

9. The main risk of the present situation, it seems to me, is not some open, dramatic assault on the Western position in Berlin or on the freedom of West Berliners to which the West could respond with a credible threat of war. It is rather that the Soviet Union will attempt to whittle away at the Western position, the so-called salami tactics. The threat of war against the use of such tactics is not a very effective weapon for the West to use since the Soviet Government will scarcely find it credible that the West would really be prepared to fight over a minor or symbolic issue.

10. Thus it must recently have become clear to the Soviet Government that the West is not prepared to run serious risks of war if the Soviet Government should conclude a separate peace treaty with the DDR or if DDR officials perform the functions now performed by Soviet officials with respect to military traffic on the access routes. Is it not likely that the Soviet Government may conclude that it can in time safely do such things as making unreasonably large increases in charges for the use of the access routes by road, rail and canal, authorizing the erection of high buildings in East Berlin which will increase the risks of using the West Berlin air port, closing roads and canals for repairs for unduly long periods? And so on.

11. The following are the main provisions of the kind of agreement on Berlin which I think we should try to secure. An independent, self-governing, neutralized, democratic free city of the whole of Berlin would be established by international statute. The city would be precluded from joining either East or West Germany or from becoming a member of any military alliance but it could make agreements on economic and cultural matters with foreign governments and international agencies. (Under this provision Berlin would presumably become de facto part of West Germany on all matters other than political and military.) The government of Berlin would be elected by free elections which might be organized or at least observed by the United Nations. The Four Power Commission could intervene in the affairs of Berlin only if it were unanimous. Each of the Four Powers would have the right to station troops in its own sector at their present levels. No nuclear arms or weapons capable of delivering nuclear arms would be permitted in Berlin. International servitudes would be created across East Germany to Berlin from West Germany and Poland by air, rail, canal and road which would permit unimpeded access for goods at reasonable charges. The citizens of West Germany and the DDR would have freedom of access to Berlin. The Security Council would appoint a United Nations High Commissioner for Berlin. United Nations observers in Berlin and on the access routes would confirm that the provisions of the international statute were being implemented. Token United Nations forces could be established in Berlin. The international statute would be signed and ratified by the Four Powers, Berlin, and East and West Germany and would be adopted by the Security Council and the General Assembly of the United Nations. The statute would terminate when Germany became united. It could not be terminated before then except by a decision of the Security Council approved by the General Assembly. The statute would end the occupation status of Berlin and terminate all rights and obligations flowing from that occupation status.

12. The statute should be so drafted that it would not constitute de facto recognition of the DDR. Khrushchev has not indeed asked for that. But the coming into force of the statute would constitute a long step in the direction of de facto recognition.

13. If it should become clear that the Soviet Union would not be prepared to see Berlin reunited under a democratic government, the West might propose that the status quo in East Berlin be preserved and that a régime be set up in West Berlin by international statute along the lines of that set forth above. There would, of course, be no right of intervention by the Four Power Commission in the affairs of West Berlin and Soviet troops would not be permitted in West Berlin.

14. The concessions to the Soviet Union in such an agreement would be the movement towards de facto recognition of the DDR and the abolition of the occupation status of Berlin. The Soviet Government might insist that in addition the West acquiesce in the absorption of East Berlin into the DDR. Here perhaps would be the basis for a bargain without bringing in recognition of the Oder-Neisse line. But it would be a bargain less favourable to the West than an agreement establishing a free city of the whole of Berlin.

BERLIN SITUATION

5. The Prime Minister said that he would make a few comments about the Berlin situation and then ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs to report on the latest developments. The Cabinet should then consider what defence measures should be taken in the light of the situation. In particular, it would be necessary to consider policy in respect of nuclear weapons. He had made it clear in 1959 that the Canadian forces with N.A.T.O. in Europe would be equipped with nuclear weapons if and when that action became necessary and the proper arrangements could be made. In regard to defensive nuclear weapons for use in Canada, he had stated in the House of Commons that a decision would be made if and when the United States agreed to the principle of joint control. There had been a great deal of interest in disarmament in Canada since these statements were made. A large part of public opinion tended toward the position that Canada should not have nuclear weapons even if there was joint control over them. He did not accept that position.

6. Mr. Diefenbaker read portions of the speech of Mr. Khrushchev on August 7th,¹⁹ and said it was a useful guide to the Soviet leaders' future intentions. Khrushchev had described the future plans of Russia and claimed that they were causing dejection to the enemies of what he referred to as the "socialist" system. He had claimed he was in favour of a free West Berlin but wanted to prevent it from becoming a second Sarajevo, and he had ridiculed Western concern for the principle of self-determination, asking how countries that had held colonies in subjection and had aggressed against new states could be concerned about the application of the principle of self-determination in Germany. Khrushchev had said that war against the "socialist" states could not be confined, and had warned that all members of N.A.T.O. were caught in the net of U.S. alliances. He said the danger of an attack on the "socialist" states by the "imperialist" states could not be disregarded, and had reaffirmed his intention to sign a peace treaty with East Germany. The speech was a brilliant piece of work and made clear again the need for the West to ensue a manifesto declaring what it stood for. The speech showed again that the West was threatened by economic means and that the Soviets might resort to stronger means if the West showed a degree of opposition that seemed to require them.

7. Mr. Diefenbaker said he had seen the Canadian Ambassador to Germany that morning, and that the Ambassador had a plan for a solution to the Berlin problem that involved the creation of a free city under the United Nations with its status ratified by the two parts of Berlin, the two Germanies and the four Great Powers. The plan also contemplated the location in Berlin of token forces of the Western powers as well as a U.N. force. Mr. Khrushchev had never given an indication that he would accept such an arrangement. The Ambassador had reported that Chancellor Adenauer was less rigid in his attitude than previously, and that he might be more flexible after the German elections, which Mr. Reid believed he would win. It seemed clear that there was no possibility of German reunification in the near future. Adenauer probably had only about another year in public life and his objective was to leave as his legacy a Germany as closely allied to the West as possible.

8. The Secretary of State for External Affairs said the most serious recent incident was the sealing by the East Germans of the border between East and West Berlin. This act was inconsistent with the agreement made among the Four Powers at the end of the war, under which there was to be freedom of movement in the four sectors of Berlin; the Soviets had claimed for some years, however, that this agreement was no longer in force. Canada was not directly involved in this latest act by the Eastern side, because the undertakings of N.A.T.O. did not extend to East Berlin or East Germany and there had been no interference with the access routes from West Germany to West Berlin.

9. Mr. Green pointed out that West Germany was involved in an election campaign in which the leader of the main opposition party was the mayor of West Berlin, and a large number of the voters had come from East Germany. There was unlikely to be any more flexibility in the German position until the election was over. Demands would increase from West Berlin and West Germany that the U.S. take firm counter-actions against the Communists; already university students and others in Germany had protested what they considered to be a weak response on the part of President Kennedy to the closure of the border between East and West Berlin.

The United States, United Kingdom, France and Germany were involved in consultations about the course they should follow. In these consultations, it appeared that Germany and France were asking for firm counter-measures, whereas the U.K. and U.S. were advocating a more restrained approach. One limiting factor on the U.K. in these consultations might be that she would not want to antagonize the Germans whom she hoped would assist her in gaining membership in the Common Market. The Berlin situation would almost certainly be discussed at the meeting of uncommitted countries in Belgrade on September 1st and at the U.N. General Assembly Session which began on September 19th just after the German elections.

President Kennedy had made it clear that the freedom of West Berlin and the Western Powers' rights to have access to the city and keep troops there were not negotiable. Some other aspects of the situation, however, might be negotiable. Among these was the question of settling the Eastern borders of Germany at the Oder-Neisse line; the French government had already spoken in favour of an agreement to accept the Oder-Neisse line. The details of the arrangements for West Berlin should also be negotiable. In this connection the plan proposed by Ambassador Reid was interesting and good but it probably would not be acceptable to all the countries involved. Recognition of East Germany would have to come about eventually, and it might [not] be to the benefit of Canada for this to happen, since the continuing division of Germany was probably in Canada's interest. Indeed this was a view widely held in a number of countries. Although it would not likely be possible for the major allies of Germany to discuss with her before the elections the possibility of recognition of East Germany, it was possible that Adenauer would be more flexible after the elections.

10. Mr. Green said that the job of Canada at the present time should be to persuade its friends to keep their positions flexible and not assume threatening attitudes. Canada should not just fall in line with the U.S. by taking actions which would tend to add to the atmosphere of threat. The objective should be to prevent the outbreak of war, and this could best be done by not threatening others.

11. There was some discussion at this point about the sequence of events that might be expected to follow the signature by the Soviet Union of a separate peace treaty with East Germany. It was explained that the effect of such a treaty would be that the East German government would be able to control the access to West Berlin from West Germany which was guaranteed to the Western occupying powers by the agreements made at the end of the war. These agreements did not guarantee freedom of movement for civilian traffic between West Germany and West Berlin, but only for military supplies for the occupying powers. Canada had not been informed of the plans that the Western occupying powers and Germany intended to implement if access to West Berlin was closed off, but it had been suggested publicly that the U.S., in that event, intended to force its way through to the city. The right of the Western Powers to do this was questionable, since the Four-Power agreements were loosely drawn. If access for civilian traffic only was denied, it seemed very doubtful if the Western Powers had a right to try to open the roads again.

12. Mr. Green said that on August 8th U.S. Secretary of State Rusk had made proposals to the N.A.T.O. Council on the actions that should be taken if the Berlin crisis grew worse. After outlining the military measures that the U.S. had taken and intended to take, and asking that other member countries should consider what similar actions they might take, Secretary Rusk had told the Council of the proposals emerging from the meeting of the Foreign Minister of the U.S., U.K., France and Germany on possible economic counter-measures. The Canadian Ambassador in Washington required instructions for discussions with the Secretary of State on these matters in a day or two and Canada's Permanent Representative to N.A.T.O. would also require instructions for the Council meeting on August 21st. On the military side, Canada was, next to the U.S., in the best position of any N.A.T.O. country in having met its commitments to provide forces for the Organization.

He was amazed at the proposals of Secretary Rusk for economic counter-measures, and the U.K. had also been surprised at them. It was proposed that, if military or civilian access, air or ground, to West Berlin was blocked, immediate economic counter-measures amounting to a total economic embargo against the Soviet Bloc should be imposed. This would include among other things the expulsion from N.A.T.O. countries of all Soviet Bloc technical experts and trade officials without diplomatic immunity, the termination of all trade agreements involving Soviet Bloc countries and the denial of all exports to and stoppage of all imports from Soviet Bloc countries by N.A.T.O. members. N.A.T.O. ports would also be closed to all Soviet Bloc shipping.

Such measures would not be taken now but only if access by the Western Powers to West Berlin was denied, if then. But Canada had been asked to agree now to take these measures if certain contingencies arose in the future and to initiate the necessary legislative and administrative actions. Taking these economic measures would mean war and would quite likely be interpreted as such by the Soviets. Ambassador Reid had warned of the danger that, if and when the Soviets decided the West had determined to fight, they might strike first.

He read the draft telegram of instructions to Mr. Heeney† which asked him to see Mr. Rusk at the earliest opportunity. In respect of military measures, he was to tell Mr. Rusk that public proclamations of military preparation would not be helpful because they would not impress the U.S.S.R. unless they were carried out, and Khrushchev could easily outbid the West in any such efforts. It was a prudent and necessary precaution, however, for the West to put its defences in as efficient a state as possible but to try to do so in such a way as not to contribute to an increase in tension. Canada had met its commitments to N.A.T.O., but consideration should be given to what further steps might be taken to indicate Canadian support of a united N.A.T.O. position and to improve the state of preparedness.

Mr. Heeney was also asked to say that economic retaliation should not be used to counter prevention of movement from East to West Berlin. East Germany had the ability to control the movement of its citizens, and some restraint on the refugee flow at some time was probably inevitable. It was more satisfactory from the West's point of view that this be done by dividing East from West Berlin rather than trying to interfere with movement between West Berlin and West Germany. It was not certain that economic counter-measures would be effective or that their long-term effects had been properly thought through by the Western planning group.

The draft instructions further asked Mr. Heeney to say that the sealing off of East Berlin gave the West a good tactical opportunity for now proposing negotiations. The U.S.S.R. had broken a Four Power agreement on Berlin but had not interfered with essential interests of the West or of West Berlin citizens; the move also seemed to be a move based on weakness rather than strength. For these reasons, it would be useful if it became known soon, preferably before the U.N. General Assembly, that negotiations were in the offing and that they might possibly begin with meetings of the four foreign ministers.

13. During the discussion of this draft message, the following main points were made,

(a) The economic counter-measures proposed by Mr. Rusk would not be appropriate as a response to the closure of the border between East and West Berlin, because they were tantamount to war and no one should intend to go to war because East Berlin had been sealed off; Canada should support those who were opposing the appeals from West Berlin for imposition of economic sanctions now. Economic measures might not be too strong a response, however, if Western access to West Berlin from West Germany should be denied. Some said that economic counter-measures would not be an effective response to denial of access because they would be slow in taking effect; an immediate reaction was necessary, and this would have to be by military means. Others said the West now had two responses to such a situation, the use of nuclear weapons and economic sanctions. The possible use of economic sanctions should not be dismissed because they might be the West's only alternative to nuclear war.

(b) It was suggested that Canada should not consider economic sanctions except as a last resort, because they had many serious implications, would be a disastrous blow to Canada's economy and might be applied for a year. Others said the effect on Canada's economy would be less severe but sanctions might have an adverse effect on the wheat deal with China. It was said that economic sanctions could never be effective against the Soviet Union and that it would be misleading to tell the people that Russia could be restrained by such measures. However, economic sanctions might be very effective against East Germany, which was a very important industrial area in the Communist Bloc.

(c) The position might be taken now that economic sanctions should be considered if military and civilian access to West Berlin was denied; should it then turn out that only civilian traffic was stopped the Canadian position on the matter would still be fluid.

(d) If access to West Berlin by road was cut off, it was questionable whether the initiation of an airlift would constitute "maintenance of access." In any case, West Berlin had grown industrially since 1948 to such an extent that its economy could not be sustained indefinitely by an airlift. There was some danger that if the Russians knew that the West was likely to respond to denial of access with an airlift only, they would welcome the challenge and wait for the economic strangulation of West Berlin. On the other hand, the city could survive for some time if an airlift were in effect, and this time could perhaps be used for the negotiation of a settlement of the crisis.

(e) Secretary Rusk had suggested that negotiations over Berlin might begin among the Big Four foreign ministers in October. Some Ministers thought that all the N.A.T.O. countries should be involved in the Western planning on Berlin, because all would be affected by the outcome of the crisis. Others said that only the occupying powers in West Berlin and West Germany were directly involved so far, since no N.A.T.O. interest had been interfered with. It was suggested that careful consideration should be given to the practical and propaganda implications of beginning negotiations with the Soviet Union while that country was still in breach of the Four-Power agreements on Berlin. Perhaps the West should make negotiations conditional on the Soviet Union restoring the situation in Berlin in accordance with those agreements. On the other hand, negotiations were too important to the West to make them conditional on an improvement of the situation in East Berlin. Negotiations were necessary if the Western Alliance was to be held together. The difficult problem was finding aspects of the problem that were negotiable.

(f) It was difficult to take a strong stand against the signing of a separate peace treaty between the Soviet Union and East Germany, particularly since the Western countries had signed a separate peace treaty with Japan. Nor would East German rather than Soviet processing of passes on the access routes be a reasonable cause of war; to the extent that acceptance of East German processing of passes involved de facto recognition, the West should probably be willing to grant it. What could not be accepted was the consequence that Soviet withdrawal from their responsibilities in Berlin and the access routes terminated the Western rights set out in the Four-Power agreements. The West could not afford to betray West Berlin because that would result in a loss of confidence in the West throughout the world.

14. The Prime Minister suggested that, in the section of the instructions to Mr. Heeneey dealing with economic sanctions, it should be said that the prevention of movement from East to West Berlin did not warrant the application of economic counter-measures but that, if military and civilian access to West Berlin from West Germany was denied, there should be consultation on the matter at that time.

15. The Cabinet took note of the statements by the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for External Affairs on the Berlin situation and approved the despatch of instructions to the Canadian Ambassador in Washington, as they had been agreed to during the discussion.

POSSIBLE DEFENCE MEASURES ARISING OUT OF BERLIN SITUATION
(Previous reference July 24)

16. The Minister of National Defence said that U.S. Secretary of State Rusk had informed the N.A.T.O. Council on August 8th of the military measures which the U.S. had taken or intended to take in the interests of strengthening the Western negotiating position on Berlin and of indicating the determination of the West not to yield to threats in areas of vital interest. Mr. Rusk stressed the need for unity of the Alliance and urged all member countries to take similar measures. The French, German and U.K. representatives had approved the position taken by the U.S. and had outlined the specific military measures being considered by their governments. Several other representatives had also indicated their governments' intentions to institute similar measures.

Another N.A.T.O. Council meeting would be held on August 21st, at which the comments of governments on the views and proposals put forward on August 8th would be expected. These comments would cover proposals in the economic, political, psychological and military fields. For the purpose of developing at least a preliminary Canadian view in regard to possible military measures, consideration should now be given to steps that might be taken to indicate support of a firm and unified N.A.T.O. attitude and to improve the effectiveness of Canada's military forces.

While Canada had met its N.A.T.O. Force Goals and was continuing to strengthen the Canada-U.S. region, there were a number of measures that might be taken to strengthen the Canadian position both in the present crisis and on a continuing basis. These measures included the completion of an agreement on nuclear weapons with the U.S. and the procurement of nuclear weapons systems, steps to increase civil defence preparedness, the raising of manpower ceilings, the adjustment of rotation plans, improvements in weapons, equipment and logistic support generally and consideration of plans to evacuate dependents from Europe. Canada might also consider making available to its allies all possible Canadian existing facilities to improve its collective defence posture, increasing the tempo of military exercises, concentrating troops and equipment to facilitate reinforcement of overseas formations and preparing to increase states of readiness of the forces if and when such action was decided upon. It was not possible to forecast the exact nature of developments or the duration of the crisis; wherever possible, therefore, measures had been selected that it was believed were militarily and economically supportable on a long-term basis.

An explanatory memorandum had been circulated, (Minister's memorandum, August 14 – Cab. Doc. 298-61).

17. Mr. Harkness said the view of the Chiefs of Staff, with which he agreed, was that the Russians were unlikely to push the present crisis to the point of war, but that war could occur nevertheless, particularly if there were a revolt in East Germany and if West German forces were tempted to move in to help the insurrectionists. Even if the present crisis were resolved in the next few months it seemed clear that a fairly intense cold war situation would continue. The build-up of Canada's forces was justified therefore not only by the present need to show a determination to stand with our allies but also by long-term requirements. It was necessary to strengthen conventional forces so that Canada could meet military threats in the future without recourse to nuclear war.

The Minister made a number of specific proposals and the discussion on them proceeded in the following terms,

(a) The partial manning of emergency headquarters would require about 500 servicemen, and they could be provided from within present manpower availabilities.

(b) Stocks of food could be dispersed from centralized military stores to depots outside target areas; the amount of dispersal would be limited by the capacity of the depots. Purchase of replenishment stocks from the centralized stores might amount to 100,000 rations.

(c) Dispersal of vehicles, blankets, clothing and medical stores could be made from centralized locations to depots at Valcartier, Shilo, Wainwright, Regina and Whitehorse. The capacity of these installations would be a limiting factor in the size of the movement. The only additional costs involved in moving these stores would be for transportation and some of the movement could be done by Army vehicles.

(d) A speed-up of purchases of such national survival requirements as radiaic instruments and equipment for decontamination, water purification and lighting could be accomplished by faster processing and approval of submissions by the Treasury Board. The $2,800,000 programme to provide fallout protection for fallout reporting posts for which funds existed in the 1961-62 Estimates, and the extended programme for procurement and installation of sirens, for which it was intended to include $2,100,000 in the 1962-63 Estimates, might both also be accelerated by Treasury Board action.

(e) The Nuclear Detonation and Fallout Reporting System was in the process of being formed, but delivery of equipment for it would not be completed until September 1962. If radiation monitoring equipment now available were re-distributed immediately, however, the system could be given a limited capability in about two weeks.

(f) A survey was under way to determine the availability of fallout protection in Army buildings, but it would take many months to complete unless more people were put to work on it. A survey of other federal buildings was also being done, and both surveys might be accelerated.

(g) The various Army Works Services projects could be expedited if greater authority were delegated to GOC's and other officials to do such things as award contracts, use local purchase to a greater degree, and approve overtime work. The matter of granting such authorities and the possibility of augmenting Army Works sub-staffs to expedite the various programmes should be considered by the Treasury Board.

(h) The Emergency Measures Organization should complete arrangements with the C.B.C. concerning operational procedures for warning broadcasts. Funds had been authorized for this purpose, no additional manpower was needed, and the arrangements could be completed in one month.

(j) The proposal to build fallout shelters in DND married quarters had been before the Cabinet Committee on Emergency Plans and the Treasury Board, but no decision had been taken. The programme would involve 23,868 shelters at a cost of about $12,900,000, and it could be completed by December 1st. It was suggested that such a programme would provide the Armed Services with protection not being given to civilians; on the other hand, the view was expressed that the government should take the lead in building shelters in housing units for which it was the landlord. This programme for married quarters would provide employment for some 5,000 persons for a period of 6 months, or a proportionately larger number if the period were shortened. The Treasury Board should be asked to reach a decision on the matter and to consider at the same time whether shelters should also be built in other government-owned housing units.

(k) Some thought that such measures as construction of shelters in DND married quarters would disturb the population; others thought however, that it would be helpful if people were made to realize the seriousness of the situation. Private citizens were unlikely to build their own shelters until the government provided them in its housing units.

(l) If another civil defence exercise were held in the fall, more provincial and municipal organizations would be ready to participate than at the time of the last exercise in May.

(m) The C.B.C. and the private television networks should perhaps be told that it was government policy that greater civil defence measures should be taken, and should be asked to broadcast a series of programmes encouraging the people to support the policy and take appropriate measures themselves.

(n) The Emergency Measures Organization would be asked to submit recommendations about additional civil defence measures that should be taken.

(o) The Brigade in Europe was below strength because it was subject to both budgetary limitation and a manpower ceiling of 5,500 men. Since the ceiling had been imposed, some men had had to be assigned to administrative or signal duties elsewhere, the squadron of armour had been increased to regiment size, and an air observation post for the artillery had been added. Moreover, the Honest John battery was to be added to the Brigade later this year. For all these reasons it might be necessary to remove the budgetary limitations and some manpower ceilings, particularly the arbitrary ceiling on the size of the Brigade, to allow for the addition to it of a little more than 1100 men.

(p) It was argued, on the other hand, that defence spending had been high for ten years, and that an Army force of 47,000 men had been developed for use in an emergency; now that the emergency had arisen, the extra requirements should be met from the large numbers of non-combatants in the Army. Canada's commitment to N.A.T.O. was three Brigades, which was some 16 or 17,000 men. There were in the Army about 30,000 additional men from which to draw in order to bring the Brigade up to strength. The Fourth Brigade, which was not required to meet N.A.T.O. commitments, should provide the additional men needed to bring the Brigade in Europe to strength. It was pointed out, however, that the Canadian commitment to N.A.T.O. was one Division, which comprised not just three Brigades, but also a divisional headquarters and a share of Corps Headquarters. The total Army commitment to Europe was probably more like 24 thousand men. Moreover, if the Fourth Brigade were disbanded, there would be no Army force in Canada for home defence after the forces committed to N.A.T.O. had left.

18. The Cabinet noted the report of the Minister of National Defence on preparedness measures that might be taken in view of the Berlin situation and agreed to the following actions,

(a) initiation of partial manning of emergency headquarters by military staffs;

(b) dispersal of stocks of food from centralized military stores to depots outside of target areas and replenishment of existing stocks;

(c) dispersal of existing stocks of vehicles, blankets, clothing and medical stores from centralized locations to installations outside target cities;

(d) redistribution of radiation monitoring equipment now on issue to Army units for re-entry operations to fallout reporting posts to give the Nuclear Detonation and Fallout Reporting System an interim capability;

(e) a speed-up of the survey of fallout protection in existing federal buildings; and,

(f) acceleration to completion of arrangements with the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation for warning broadcasts.

19. The Cabinet further agreed,

(a) that the Treasury Board should take all possible steps to accelerate processing and approval of pending and forthcoming submissions on:

(i) purchases of national survival equipment as provided for in the 1961-62 Estimates;

(ii) provision of fallout protection for fallout reporting posts; and,

(iii) a speed-up of the extended programme for the procurement and installation of sirens;

(b) that the Treasury Board should give further consideration to the proposal to expedite Army Works Service projects through the delegation of certain authorities to General Officers Commanding and other officials and the augmentation of Army Works sub-staffs;

(c) that the question of construction of fallout shelters in D.N.D. married quarters and other housing units owned by the government should be submitted to the Treasury Board for consideration and early decision; and,

(d) that a civil defence exercise similar to Exercise Tocsin 1961 should be held between October 15th and November 15th, 1961, at a date to be fixed later.

19. The Cabinet also agreed,

(a) to give further consideration at an early meeting to the means of bringing the Canadian Brigade in Europe to full strength; and,

(b) to consider additional civil defence measures as might be recommended by the Emergency Measures Organization.

GERMANY AND BERLIN: NEGOTIATIONS

We propose to deal in this telegram with the subject of possible negotiations on Berlin and Germany as raised by Mr. Rusk during his appearance before the North Atlantic Council on August 8. Our immediately following telegrams† will deal with military preparations, economic countermeasures, Soviet intentions, and publicity themes. You will already have seen some of our views on the first three of these subjects in my reference telegram.

2. In general, Mr. Rusk's speech and the reports he submitted are helpful. They reflect much careful thought and preparation. I welcome their flexibility and balance and, like the Norwegian representative, I am glad to see that a distinction has been made between vital interests and important interests (paragraph 8 your telegram 2038).†

3. I welcome the clear statement by Mr. Rusk that USA recognizes that negotiations "must and would take place." However, the questions remain of when these negotiations might be held and what the Western position at them might be. I believe, as I stated in paragraph 7 and 8 my reference telegram, that the recent Soviet action in preventing westward movement across the sector border in Berlin gives West a good tactical opportunity for now proposing negotiations. I do not repeat not mean by this that the West should negotiate now but rather than an attempt might now be made to reach agreement with USSR on forum of negotiations and that such an agreement be announced as a means of reducing tension and so that this step will have been taken before the opening of UNGA on September 19 (if not repeat not before the opening of the non-aligned conference in Belgrade on September 1). The current Soviet action in preventing Western movement across Berlin sector border seems a move based upon local weaknesses rather than strength. Both these appear to be reasons for seeking now agreement with USSR on a suitable forum for negotiations. I agree with Mr. Rusk that it might be best to begin negotiations with meetings of foreign ministers. Hence it would seem that in general, my views agree with those of Mr. Rusk as outlined in paragraph 10 your telegram 2031.

4. On the substance of negotiations, I should prefer that you do not repeat not attempt to give any views on this matter in the North Atlantic Council. We hope shortly to discuss further ideas about possible areas of negotiation in London, Washington, Brussels, Oslo, and Rome. At that time we shall instruct you to discuss our views privately with your British, USA, Belgian, Norwegian, and Italian colleagues.

BERLIN AND GERMANY: ECONOMIC COUNTERMEASURES

In the course of our long talk last evening with the Secretary of State and several other principal USA officials concerned in the current crisis (upon which we will be reporting separately at some length), Rusk raised with us again the question of economic countermeasures. The Canadian Government, he said, had been prompt in its response on various aspects of the situation (my reference telegram). This USA greatly appreciated. The Secretary hoped that we would soon be in a position to respond to the proposal for a NATO economic embargo if, as and when the Soviet authorities took action to prevent Allied access to Berlin; if it were necessary for governments to make any prior executive or legislative arrangements before such an embargo could be imposed, Rusk urged that this be done in advance in order that the NATO reaction could be prompt and united.

2. This, in effect, was a repetition, with added emphasis, of the proposal made by Rusk to the NATO Council on August 8 and referred to in my conversation with Kohler of August 18 (my reference telegram). It is now, as we know, being examined by a working group set up by the Council on August 21.

3. I was not repeat not, of course, in a position last evening to respond one way or another. However, I did intimate to Rusk that there were, I knew, difficulties in the way of our making a decision in advance of the event upon a policy which would involve very serious consequences. As he knew, there was no repeat no disposition in Ottawa to underrate the gravity of any interference with Western access to Berlin; the Prime Minister had made this clear on a number of occasions in recent weeks. On the other hand, to decide now upon such measures and to take steps which might involve reference to Parliament at this stage was another matter. All that I could do was report to the government the Secretary's repeated request for our urgent consideration and the importance which USA attached to all NATO governments being willing and ready to take such action if and when the Soviets sought to blockade West Berlin.

4. From what Rusk said last evening, it seems that USA are contemplating the possibility of such economic countermeasures applying beyond the Soviet bloc to the wider area of Sino-Soviet countries.

BERLIN AND GERMANY; CURRENT USA THINKING

Last evening the Secretary of State dined with Escott Reid and me. Bohlen, Senior Adviser on Soviet Affairs, Kohler, Assistant Secretary for European Affairs, Bundy of the White House and Farquharson and Nutt of the Embassy were also present. We had a long and very informal conversation which, over three and a half hours, rarely diverged from some aspect of the Berlin crisis.

2. Escott Reid is returning to Ottawa by air this afternoon and will be reporting in person to the Prime Minister and to you and the Under-Secretary. However, we both think it useful that I should set down in this telegram what seemed to me the principal features of USA thinking as reflected in what was expressed last evening by the Secretary and his colleagues. You will appreciate the fact that the conversation was not repeat not only very private but also personal and uninhibited. Nevertheless, both Reid and I believe that what emerged is of importance in enabling us to assess USA thinking at the top level.

3. In my own judgment, the three points of most immediate importance to us in the formulation of our own policies are these

(a) USA Government has already reached the decision to make public their wish and intention to arrange early talks with USSR on problems of Berlin and Germany. In this they still hope for French acquiescence but they are determined to go ahead in any event – with the British of course. Their suggestion will likely be for a meeting of the Four Foreign Ministers when the UNGA sits in September. Whether USA contemplates any discussion in substance, or only procedure, was not repeat not clear to me.

(b) Notwithstanding their intention to hold early conversations with USSR, USA has no repeat no real hope of negotiations having constructive results. The Secretary and his colleagues made the lowest possible estimate of the prospects of USSR agreeing to any accommodation which would be satisfactory to the West.

(c) USA authorities would genuinely welcome any suggestions which we might put forward, however tentative, on the substance of any negotiations; if any such suggestions are to be influential, they will have to be made very soon.

4. In the course of the conversation, which for the most part was general, although there were some individual exchanges, Rusk did not repeat not attempt to hide USA irritation with the French with whom they seemed to have differences on a growing list of issues (he mentioned French irresponsibility over Bizerte²¹ at a time when we were in such deep difficulties over Berlin). There was still a lingering hope that de Gaulle might withdraw actual opposition to any Western initiative with regard to negotiations. This would be known within the next few days. But USA would go ahead anyway. He fully appreciated the importance of doing so before the Belgrade meeting and of course before the UNGA Session.

5. Escott Reid had the opportunity of advancing some of the views which he had set out in the memorandum on Berlin which he had prepared and revised before he left Ottawa.²² He will be telling you of last night's reactions to its various suggestions. I will confine myself to my own impression that, on the three principal "negotiating" points, the attitude of our American friends is as follows:

²² Voir/See document 239.

(a) On the Oder-Neisse line, they would agree that the West might now concede its permanence: but they believe that at best this would be of little interest to Khrushchev.

(b) On recognition of the DDR, this is certainly not repeat not to be excluded in some form, though there are, of course, difficulties; but again it is doubtful that Khrushchev would pay much of value to our side for such a concession.

(c) On some revision of the occupation status of Berlin, they range between resolute opposition and serious misgivings; they argue that the West would be surrendering solid rights for a new contract with a party whose word had proved worthless.

6. Repeatedly Rusk and our other guests enquired what advantage the West could conceivably derive from any arrangement to which Khrushchev would conceivably consent. Rusk and Bohlen were almost totally pessimistic as to the possibility of USSR agreeing to improvements in existing Western rights and means of access to Berlin. Indeed, at one point, Rusk went as far as to suggest that the best we could get out of negotiation would be to buy a year's time. He and Bohlen (in part perhaps to draw us out – or so it seemed to me) described Khrushchev's attitude in the familiar way, "what's mine is mine; what's yours is negotiable."

7. Personally I find it difficult to square such a dark assessment of the possibilities of negotiation with firm USA insistence that talks should be initiated without delay. Reid concluded from our exchange on this aspect that the Secretary and those with him accepted as almost inevitable the breakdown of any negotiations that might take place; it was for this reason, he thought, that the USA felt that the NATO powers should agree at once that, if a collapse of talks were followed by blockade, a complete economic embargo should be imposed (see my telegram 2641 this date).† I would not repeat not myself judge Rusk's position to be of that inflexibility although, as I have said, he and Bohlen could hardly have been more pessimistic than they were last night on the possibility of an acceptable accommodation with the USSR.

8. In an aside to me before we broke up, Bundy (who is probably the President's Chief White House Adviser in these matters) said that I would be making a serious mistake if I were to conclude from the views which had been expressed that USA were not repeat not willing or did not repeat not intend to engage in serious negotiations not repeat not only on Berlin but also on the wider problems of a German settlement and European security.

9. We shall be preparing a longer account of last evening's conversation† and will send it to you by bag. Meantime you will have the opportunity of conferring with Reid and will no repeat no doubt wish to consider at once what further Canadian views may usefully be put to USA authorities.

GERMANY AND BERLIN

SOVIET NOTE TO THE UNITED STATES OF AUGUST 23

In a Note to the United States which was released to the press today,²³ the Soviet Union again accuses the Federal Republic of Germany of interfering illegally in the affairs of West Berlin. Specifically, the Soviet Union accuses the West German Government of sending to the city "all kinds of revanchists, extremists, saboteurs, and spies." These people are allegedly flown to West Berlin by aircraft of the three major Western powers. The Soviet Union asserts that this "represents a flagrant breach of the agreement reached in 1945 under which ... air corridors were set aside for the three Western powers, on a temporary basis, to ensure the needs of their military garrisons ..."

Comments

It has long been a Soviet policy to deny any legal relationship whatever between the Federal Republic of Germany and West Berlin. The Soviet Union contends that West Berlin is situated on the territory of the German Democratic Republic and that the three major Western powers themselves recognize that the Western sectors of the city cannot be regarded as part of the Federal Republic. The first of these allegations is groundless but the second contains some truth since the three Western occupying powers have refrained from giving complete control of West Berlin to the West German authorities so that they can maintain their legal stand that the responsibility for the whole city rests with the four occupying powers. The Soviet Union sees no inconsistency in contending that while East Berlin is part of East Germany, West Berlin is not a part of West Germany.

The allegation that the three air corridors into Berlin were established on a temporary basis to ensure the needs of the Western military garrisons is not supported by the actual agreement. There are no specific statements therein which decree that the purpose of the western flights will be or who, for that matter, the passengers will be.

Why the Soviet Union chose to raise the question of the use of Western air corridors at this time is open to at least three interpretations. It may simply be an attempt to distract attention from the prevention of westward movement across the Berlin sector border. It may be no more than an attempt to underline the interim nature of the wartime agreements and the necessity of making new arrangements after the signature of a separate GDR-USSR peace treaty. On the other hand, a more ominous reason might be a Soviet desire to see whether they could question with impunity the rights of Western access to Berlin and succeed in casting doubt upon the legality of the current use of the air corridors by the three Western allies. In other words, this Note might possibly portend an attempt to "cut another slice off the salami" in accordance with a long term policy to erode completely the Western position in the city. In any case, the move emphasizes the Soviet contention that as soon as a separate peace treaty is signed with the GDR, the three major Western powers will have to arrange for the continuance of their communications with the city with the GDR authorities.

The United States has made it clear, both publicly and privately, that it will not tolerate interference with the freedom of communications with West Berlin. Hence the present move may be essentially a propaganda one assumed by the Soviet Union prior to negotiations (which it now knows will in all probability take place) to strengthen its own hand in the discussions.

[Ottawa], August 25, 1961

I had a talk with the Prime Minister for about half an hour this morning from 8:45 to 9:15. He had already read Arnold Heeney's telegram. I therefore thought that the best thing to do was to concentrate on the impressions I had gained of senatorial opinion from Fulbright, Mansfield and Cooper, all of whom are in favour of the formation of a united, independent, free city of Berlin with a complete or considerable United Nations presence. Fulbright, I told the Prime Minister, is worried about the inflamed state of American opinion.

2. Before I had finished my report on the Senators, the Prime Minister asked me to let him know after lunch, when he wants to see me again, my own personal advice as to whether he might develop something along the following lines in his Canadian Bar Association speech on September 1.

"Canada is firm on the necessity of defending the vital Western interests in Berlin. Canada is equally firm that there must be negotiations on Berlin in an effort to reach an accommodation with the Soviet Union. We are not one of the negotiating powers. Nevertheless, we have earned the right to express our views because of our sacrifices in two World Wars. In the first War we lost in action X men compared with the United States Y and in the Second World War we lost Z men in action."

3. The Prime Minister said he knew the objection would be made that he should not give such a speech before the German election but that he was always being told not to give speeches for some such reason and that in the event the advice turned out not to have been well based. He gave as examples his Dartmouth Speech,²⁴ his speech at the United Nations last year with its reference to the captive nations and one other speech.²⁵

4. I said that it had been going through my mind to suggest to him the possibility of a public speech but that I had assumed that this would not be given until after the German election.

5. I did not have a chance to develop my reason for believing the speech should be postponed until after September 17 but I had already put these considerations to him. The main danger of course is that if there is an indication of the sacrifices necessary from West Germany, Adenauer and Brandt will have to state firmly in public that they will have nothing whatever to do with supporting such sacrifices. After the election, they would be more reasonable. The other danger, of course, is that we do not want to give our negotiating position away to the Russians.

²⁵ Voir/See Canada, Department of External Affairs, Statements and Speeches, 1959-60, 60/32.

6. Another consideration is that such a speech would anger Rusk. However, when Senator Fulbright had urged me that the Canadian Government should speak its mind in public, and I had mentioned then our objections that this would anger the State Department, Fulbright said that all that would happen would be that Arnold Heeney would be reprimanded and Heeney was expendable.

7. May I see you about this after your morning meeting.

SECRET GUARD

London, August 26, 1961

My dear Howard [Green]:

1. We have been keeping your Government informed through the usual channels of developments in the Berlin situation and what our assessment is of Soviet intentions, but I thought you would like to have personally some indication of what we here are thinking on the question of negotiations with the Russians and how the West should respond to any interference with Allied access to West Berlin. These matters were considered quadripartitely at the Western Foreign Ministers' meeting in Paris earlier this month.²⁶ You will of course know of Rusk's report to the NATO Council after that meeting. Apart from paragraph 2 below, all of what follows is, as you will appreciate, extremely delicate and I should be grateful if you would restrict knowledge of it to the smallest possible number of your senior officials. The NATO Council has not been told anything about these matters.

2. The four Ministers agreed generally with an American proposal that Western policy should consist of two principal elements:

(a) an increase in the conventional strength of the Alliance, in order to provide an alternative to either acquiescence in the Soviet proposals or the inevitability of all-out war, thereby making more credible to the Russians our declared determination to defend the Allied position in Berlin, at the risk of war if necessary; and

(b) an active diplomatic programme, including negotiations with the Soviet Union, designed to provide the Soviet leadership with an alternative course of action which does not endanger vital Western interests in Berlin.

3. The meeting marked a major and entirely favourable change in American views, as compared with those of the Eisenhower Administration, on the Western response to Soviet interference with Allied access to West Berlin. Rusk said that military action in respect of access to Berlin should be regarded as the last resort. The aim should be to get Khrushchev to desist from denying our access. In the place of land operations along the autobahn, the Americans now envisage, as a first response, the mounting of an air-lift, military preparations, economic counter-measures and a general diplomatic offensive. The idea is that this would provide the Russians with the opportunity to negotiate rather than risk war. All action would be designed to throw on the Russians the onus of being the first to take aggressive action and to bring home to them Western preparedness, at risk of war if need be, to defend vital Western interests, by which we mean the continued presence of Western forces in Berlin, and physical access from the Federal Republic and the world to West Berlin. This concept was generally accepted by all four Ministers; and we are particularly pleased that the Americans have now come to acknowledge the useful part which an air-lift could play.

4. We also welcome a second important change in American views, which recognizes that the West cannot give the impression of risking war over a rubber stamp. Rusk said that it would be impossible to go to war merely on a question of the substitution of East German officials for the Russians at the checkpoints. So, even if negotiations with the Russians were to fail, the crunch need not come unless the Russians and East Germans are looking for immediate trouble. The French and also the West Germans accepted this suggestion.

5. Unfortunately, no agreement was reached at the Paris meeting about the West taking the initiative in proposing negotiations with the Russians. Rusk said that, in order to demonstrate to our own and uncommitted opinion that we were sincere in our desire for negotiations, and are not merely preparing for war, we should suggest to the Russians early in September that there should be a Foreign Ministers' meeting in late October or early November. Rusk also argued that the West could retain better control over the situation by itself taking the initiative. This accords with our own thinking. The French, however, felt, as did the West Germans to a lesser extent, that this would weaken the effect of the American decision to build up its military strength. The French were thinking in terms of negotiation after Khrushchev has concluded a separate peace treaty with East Germany. The West Germans envisaged negotiations before then as a means of preventing the conclusion of such a treaty. In view of these differences, we suggested, in an endeavour to get agreement, that it might be possible to keep open the prospect of negotiations, without making too specific an offer to them, by announcing that there would be a further Western Foreign Ministers' meeting in September immediately after the West German elections at which a decision could be taken on what basis and when the West were prepared to negotiate. Since the Paris meeting, however, the situation has been complicated by the recent events in Berlin, which have increased the danger of disturbances in East Germany. These have reinforced French objections to a Western initiative, but further consideration is being given through diplomatic channels to the difficult problems of the basis and the timing of possible negotiations.

6. The Foreign Ministers also considered whether there would be advantage in early reference of the Berlin issue to the United Nations. While it was agreed that if the situation became critical it was inevitable that it should be brought to the United Nations, it was felt that it would be to our disadvantage to raise the issue now. This could only result in a demand for early negotiations, while the Western negotiating position cannot be finally prepared until after the German elections on September 17th. But it will be important that the West should take the initiative, before the Russians or some neutrals do, to ensure that we get United Nations intervention on the right lines. Otherwise, there would be grave risk of endorsement by the U.N. of a situation unacceptable to the West and condemnation of the West if it takes counter action. A fuller study of the U.N. aspect of the problem was prepared for the Foreign Ministers in Paris and will be made available to your Government through the usual channels.

7. What the Western negotiating position could be was only briefly touched on at Paris by Ministers, both because of the lack of time and because the West Germans, particularly at this stage before the German elections, are unwilling to commit themselves to new ideas. Our opening position would no doubt have to be much the same as in 1959; and we could offer some all-Berlin interim solution. But if we did engage in serious negotiations, as we must, it is clearly necessary to go further and in the talks at official level which preceded the Paris meeting the Americans made it clear that they have thought very seriously about what the Western fall back position might be. The general tenor of their thinking seems to be that the West should attempt to preserve the existing situation in West Berlin by acquiescing in some enhancement of the position of the East German régime in return for guarantees from the Soviet Government about our access to and position in West Berlin. The Americans also appear to be giving thought to recognition of the Oder-Neisse line. These ideas of the Americans, which were only tentatively and cautiously aired, fit in well with our own thinking on this subject. As regards the attitude of the West Germans towards these matters, it seems now to be less rigid but we cannot expect to get a clear line with them until after their elections.

With best wishes,

As ever,

DUNCAN [SANDYS]

SPEECH TO THE CANADIAN BAR ASSOCIATION

I enclose, at your request, a draft speech on the Berlin crisis.† I hope that you will find this useful. I am giving copies to the Minister and to Norman Robertson.

2. It seems to me that it is very important, as I said to you last Friday, that the full final text of what you are going to say on Berlin should be in the hands of the governments principally concerned twenty-four hours in advance of delivery. This would mean, I assume, that it would have to be sent out from here Wednesday afternoon, August 30.

3. I am, as you know, worried about treading on such delicate ground before the German elections. The danger of any ill effects would be diminished if Chancellor Adenauer and Mr. Brandt had the full text in advance. Otherwise they might, in the excitement of an election campaign, start sounding off on the basis of inaccurate news agency summaries and this would make the task of securing German concurrence after the elections in a settlement on Berlin that much more difficult.

4. It is not only, of course, a question of getting the advance text of the speech in the hands of Adenauer and Brandt. There is also the desirability of other governments receiving it in advance and of its being distributed in advance to news agencies and to editorial writers who would be likely to make favourable comments on it.

5. It seems to me that the missions principally concerned are those in the NATO countries and the Warsaw Pact countries and in the Commonwealth countries. In addition, our Ambassador in Belgrade could usefully be sent the text so that he could give it to such people as Mr. Nehru, Mr. Nkrumah and Mr. Nasser when they arrive in Belgrade for the conference which opens on September 1.

6. I suggest that the missions I have listed could be instructed to devote, if necessary, the whole resources of the mission to the task of securing the utmost possible publicity for the speech in all the mass media of information, especially television news, radio and newspapers. This, of course, means giving the text out in advance. In many cases, the only effective way of doing this, in my experience, would be for an officer of the mission to give the text personally to the key persons concerned.

7. I suggest that the head of mission should himself give the text in advance of delivery to the Foreign Minister and, if possible, to the Prime Minister. Officers of the mission should personally give copies in advance to senior officers of the Foreign Office.

8. In Washington it might be useful if it were also given in advance to such key Senators as Mansfield, Fulbright, Cooper and Humphrey, in expectation that one of them will have it printed in the Congressional Record.

9. Washington might also give it in advance to such influential and sympathetic writers as Lippman, Reston and Marquis Childs.

10. London could give it in advance to such papers as the Times, Guardian, Observer, Sunday Times and the Economist. Paris could give it to a corresponding group of publications.

11. Bonn might give it to the half dozen leading foreign correspondents in Bonn and the half dozen leading German correspondents in Bonn, as well as to the German press agencies.²⁷

BERLIN – THE PRIME MINISTER'S SPEECH TO THE CANADIAN BAR ASSOCIATION

On August 28 the Prime Minister gave me further directions on this speech. He made it clear that the contribution that he was expecting from the Department was quite separate from that for which he had asked Escott Reid. He wanted a draft by today so that he could work on it.

2. The Prime Minister asked for the following:

(b) The text of the reference to Berlin in Mr. Hammarskjöld's latest Annual Report;²⁹

(c) The text of Article 107 of the Charter;³⁰

(d) The 1945 Four Power Agreement on Berlin.³¹

3. The Prime Minister said that he was tired of being told that he should not speak out on Berlin. He had yet to hear a convincing argument against such a statement. He had spoken over the weekend with three leading newspaper editors and was all the more convinced as a result that Canadian views should be stated. He did not want to get into a situation in which, if things went badly, he could be criticized for not having put forward Canada's opinion as to what should be done in the Berlin crisis. After all, the New York Times was full of speeches by Senators and others giving their opinions and he was not prepared to sit in silence as if the Canadian Government had no views of its own. He was not prepared to be a tail on the United States kite.

4. The Prime Minister said that he was increasingly being asked why we should get into a war to preserve the Germans and he wanted to answer this question. He made it clear that while he would want to make clear the things that were not negotiable from the Western point of view, he also wished to discuss the points which would be open to negotiation even though in the process he might have to say something which would not be palatable to the Bonn Government. He mentioned the Oder-Neisse Line and Access Cards as illustrations but he obviously did not mean to stop at these.

5. In general, I had the impression that whereas a week ago he had placed most of the emphasis on why we should stand fast on Berlin, he now wished an approximately even balance between this and negotiation. He appears to have some interest in the relationship between the Berlin question and the United Nations and is also attracted by the idea, especially in view of the audience, of calling for a reference of the Berlin question to the International Court, presumably to demonstrate to world opinion the legal validity of the Western position.

BERLIN AND GERMANY: CURRENT U.S. THINKING

In this memorandum I shall summarize the impressions of United States thinking which I secured as a result of my visit to Washington last week and I shall make some recommendations on action that the Canadian Government might take.

President

2. The key to the situation is of course what the President is thinking. The only clues I got came in a statement to me by Senator Fulbright that the President had lost a great deal of his self-assurance because of his mistake over Cuba, that he was now listening to too many advisers and was finding great difficulty in making up his mind; and in a statement to me by Senator Cooper that the President had said to him on August 21 something to the effect that he realized that the time would come when he would have to stand up to public opinion on the Berlin question and move from the present fixed positions. Some confirmation of this was given to me by the usually well-informed columnist Marquis Childs who told me that his impression is that the President is prepared to negotiate but that he has not yet prepared the American people for negotiation.

The Secretary of State and Senior Officials

3. Mr. Heenev's telegram 2645† of August 24 summarizes the principal features of U.S. thinking as reflected in what was expressed after dinner on August 23 by Messrs. Rusk, Bohlen and Kohler of the State Department and Bundy of the White House. Mr. Heenev's main conclusion with which I entirely concur is that "notwithstanding their intention to hold early conversations with the U.S.S.R., the U.S. has no real hope of negotiations having constructive results. The Secretary and his colleagues make the lowest possible estimate of the prospects of the U.S.S.R. agreeing to any accommodation which would be satisfactory to the West ... Rusk and Bohlen could hardly have been more pessimistic than they were last night on the possibility of an acceptable accommodation with the U.S.S.R."

4. Messrs. Rusk, Bohlen and Bundy also virtually ruled out the possibility of informal exploratory talks with the Soviet Union either directly or through intermediaries. They seemed to envisage "negotiation" as consisting of a formal confrontation or a number of formal confrontations at formal conferences, when surely the essence of negotiation is that it is a long slow patient process of bargaining at which tentative ideas are exchanged in quiet exploratory talks.

5. Indeed, Mr. Rusk on two or three occasions said, using almost identical words each time, that the Soviet Union had presented proposals on Berlin which are unacceptable to us; we shall present counter-proposals which will be unacceptable to them; then we will be faced with the problem of what we shall do if the Soviet Union interferes with the access routes. No doubt seeing our concern because of this statement, Mr. Rusk the last time he used the formula qualified it by saying that this was the worst which might happen.

6. Mr. Rusk and the others showed no concern over the fact that there has so far been no negotiation among the four Western powers principally concerned over the substance of the Berlin and German problems. Hitherto the meetings of the three Western Ambassadors in Washington at the State Department have been concerned entirely with questions of tactics or of sanctions. Moreover, as the British Ambassador pointed out to us, the fact that there are a dozen or more people present at these meetings means that they cannot be used to discuss the delicate problems involved in establishing a Western negotiating position and Western fall-back positions.

Senatorial Opinion

7. In my memorandum of August 25,† I summarized the views expressed to me by Senators Cooper and Fulbright. They are about as "flexible" in their approach to negotiations as it would be possible to be. I gather that they in general support the suggestion of Senator Mansfield that the best way out of our difficulties might be the creation of a united city state of the whole of Berlin; that the sovereignty of this state might be transferred from the four occupying powers to an international agency, probably the U.N.; and that the access routes might be garrisoned by what Senator Mansfield calls "international peace teams." Senator Fulbright told me that he would be in favour of transferring the Headquarters of the United Nations to Berlin from New York. He is prepared to pay the Soviet Union the price of agreeing to the Oder-Neisse Line, to de facto recognition of East Germany and to the abolition of the occupation status of Berlin.

8. I assume that these Senators are in advance of the opinions of most of their colleagues. I gather that they intend judiciously to try to bring their colleagues along and that they also expect to influence the President's thinking.

Public Opinion

9. Mr. Heeney in his telegram 2646 of August 24[†] has summarized recent trends in the reaction of the United States public to the Berlin crisis. He concludes that "while the trend in the press and in Congress has been to give increased emphasis to the need for negotiation, there has been no clear exposition of what Western concessions might be offered in negotiations." Senator Cooper put part of this point to me when he said, presumably speaking both of Congress and of public opinion, that the word "negotiation" was no longer a dirty word as it had been up to about a month ago.

The Working Level of the State Department

10. In the Policy Planning Division of the State Department five or six officers have been engaged, for the past three months, in working out ideas on the substance of a possible accommodation on the Berlin problem. These officers are clearly considering all possible negotiating positions and fall-back positions. They have been consulting a number of persons with special expert knowledge on Germany and the Soviet Union such as George Kennan, David Bruce (former U.S. Ambassador in Bonn and now Ambassador to London) and McCloy. The general view of those who have been consulted is that Khrushchev's aim in precipitating a crisis over Berlin is to try to stabilize the Soviet Empire in Eastern Europe by securing de jure recognition for frontiers and by enhancing as much as possible the status of East Germany. The officer of the Policy Planning Division with whom I talked went on to say that as a result of this assessment of Khrushchev's motives a "lot of people" were thinking about what the U.S. might contribute to the stabilization of Eastern Europe since while it could not be stated publicly it was common sense that the stability of Eastern Europe was in the long-range interests of the West. He went on to say that the Policy Planning Division had been thinking about ideas similar to those which I had put forward to him as my personal views. He agreed that one could not rule out the possibility of the Soviet Union agreeing to a united Berlin and confirmed my recollection that there had been hints early in 1959 from the Soviet Union that it might accept an all-Berlin solution. He went on to say that they had also been thinking of the possibility of moving the U.N. Headquarters, or at least the European Office of the U.N., to Berlin. He thought that recognition of the Oder-Neisse Line should occasion little difficulty and would help stabilize Eastern Europe. Granting the substance of recognition to East Germany would be another stabilizing factor. It might also be desirable to agree to the establishment of an all-German Committee which would stimulate contact between East and West Germany. Finally the U.S. might, as part of a settlement on Berlin, or following a settlement on Berlin, give economic help to East Germany.

11. He expected that the Soviet Union in the forthcoming discussions would raise the question of European security and might propose some limitation on the possession by Germany of the means of delivery of nuclear weapons and perhaps a thinning out of forces. This would raise questions of zones and of inspection. He was interested in my comment that Germany already constituted a special zone of inspection because of the recognized quasi espionage activities of the Western and Soviet Military Missions. He said that at the moment the State Department's thinking was that questions of limitation of armaments and inspection zones should not be dealt with in the negotiations on Berlin but simultaneously in a separate form, such as the general disarmament negotiations.

Recommendations

12. It seems to me clear that no final decision has been made in Washington and that the President is being subjected to conflicting advice. In such circumstances it is possible for a country such as Canada to exercise considerable influence by strengthening the hands of those in Washington with whose views it is in general agreement. The possibility of our exercising influence is greater the sooner we present our views. I therefore recommend that we should, as soon as possible, give to the authorities in Washington a carefully reasoned exposition of our views on the questions of substance which will arise in negotiations with the Soviet Union. Perhaps these views could be put as the tentative and provisional views of the Canadian Government.

13. I suggest that this statement of our views should also be given to Mr. Macmillan and Lord Home, to Mr. Lange of Norway, Mr. Spaak of Belgium and possibly Mr. Fanfani of Italy.

14. I was told by a senior official in the German Foreign Office a month ago that Mr. Lange is about the only European statesman in whom Dr. Adenauer has confidence. Because of this and because of the reputation he has in Washington we might discreetly encourage Mr. Lange to make a visit to Washington as soon as possible for quiet informal exploratory talks with the President and the Secretary of State. It may be – though I am not certain about this – that a visit by Mr. Spaak to Washington would also be useful.

BERLIN AND GERMANY: THE WESTERN FOUR

From what Caccia told me this morning (my reference telegram) and from what I have learned from USA sources (my telegram 2645 August 24 refers), it has now as I have reported earlier, become painfully clear that the division in the Western camp on negotiating with USSR is both wide and deep. In fact USA, at the highest levels, have reached a stage of exasperation with President de Gaulle and his representatives which is in itself serious in terms of the whole alliance. The President and the Secretary of State, I judge feel that they have done all that they can in private and by their restrained but unambiguous public position to persuade the General of the necessity for negotiating, while at the same time standing firm on Western vital interests; despite their efforts however, there has been no repeat no essential change in the inflexible and, in USA view, dangerous position of de Gaulle.

2. The agreement reached yesterday afternoon, for the four Western foreign ministers to meet in Washington, for the North Atlantic Council meeting and with respect to any public statement on possible negotiations, is regarded here as marking very little progress even on procedure, in reconciling the French attitude with that of USA and Britain. The meeting of September 14 may range wider but USA and UK expect French to try to limit it severely to procedure (incidentally USA wanted to have it earlier, September 8, but French would not repeat not agree). At the North Atlantic Council meeting tomorrow USA representative will be making a pretty full report on the Four Power consultations but he will, I gather, go further and make it quite plain that USA intend (with UK support) to have negotiations with the USSR over Berlin whether or not repeat not there is French consent and participation with regard to the public statement on negotiations. If Gromyko is going to New York, USA intend to suggest that Rusk will discuss with him “outstanding questions,” i.e. going beyond Berlin and Germany and taking in other areas of tension, including the Nuclear Test Ban Conference. Of course, any such public statement will have to be attuned to the response in Moscow to USA approach there.

3. USA position, as Caccia described it to me this morning is that they “will negotiate period.” The position of President de Gaulle, on the other hand, is that he is quite opposed to any negotiations; if France’s allies decide to go ahead notwithstanding French opposition, he has made it clear that France will remain totally uncommitted (even on any procedure that may be agreed and that there must be no repeat no substantive talks with Soviet Foreign Minister until the Western three (or four) have agreed on the substance of a Western position. In such circumstances it has been quite impossible for the Americans and British to discuss with French the nature of any possible accommodation with USSR or even the elements of an allied negotiating position.

4. USA authorities are naturally pretty depressed about the French attitude. They are tending now to put together French policy regarding the UN and their coolness toward NATO and relate these examples of French intransigence to the current attitude of the French in meetings with the other three Western powers over Germany. Nevertheless USA continue to hope against hope that General de Gaulle may be persuaded to adopt a more reasonable position. In this connection it has occurred to me that our own attitude with regard to negotiations might be put to French Government to de Gaulle himself. UK Government’s position is well known (as indeed is ours on the public record and in NATO) but the British are somewhat inhibited by the present stage of their relations with the European Economic Community and the Americans have done all they can. Perhaps in these circumstances a Canadian initiative in Paris might be of some help; at any rate, I think it would be appreciated by USA and UK and by other like-minded members of the alliance.

5. This telegram is marked “Canadian Eyes Only.” It is being sent to my colleagues in the missions immediately involved. I very much hope that all will make a special effort to guard its contents in particular in conversation with USA officials.

Memorandum by Special Assistant, Office of Secretary of State for External Affairs

[Ottawa, September 1, 1961]

At [Norman Robertson’s] suggestion, Arnold Heeneey looked over this draft telegram (S-367 August 30).† His view was that it should not be sent at this time because it contained too detailed a negotiating position for a middle power such as Canada to put forward (since the main responsibility rests on the 3 Occupying Powers, and no other NATO power has proffered a detailed plan for a settlement). He also thought the timing was wrong in the light of

- (a) Khrushchev's latest moves on nuclear testing³² & renewed pressure on Berlin access
- (b) French refusal to agree to negotiations (USA, he says, is "fed up" with France).

Heeney believes any Canadian proposal now should confine itself to urging the early opening of negotiations on the basis of

- (a) recognition of the Oder-Neisse line
- (b) de facto recognition of East Germany
- (c) agreement to a completely new statute, registered with the UN, as the basis for Western presence in Berlin, in place of occupation rights.

Note du sous-secrétaire d'État adjoint aux Affaires extérieures

Memorandum by Assistant Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs

[Ottawa], September 1, 1961

CALL ON SECRETARY OF STATE FOR EXTERNAL AFFAIRS
BY U.S.A. AMBASSADOR, AUGUST 31

Mr. Livingston Merchant called on the Secretary of State for External Affairs on Thursday, August 31, on instructions from the Secretary of State, Mr. Dean Rusk. Although the main purpose of his visit was to express Mr. Rusk's hope that when the NATO Council met on September 4 the Canadian Government would be able to indicate what action they would be prepared to take under the terms of the Secretary-General's resolution to increase the military preparedness of the Canadian armed forces, the discussion also covered the Soviet announcement about resuming nuclear tests and the Berlin situation.

2. Mr. Merchant said that the reason for hoping that Canada would be able to meet the September 4 target date for reporting its state of military preparedness was not in any way due to doubts or reservations about the effectiveness of Canada's contribution to NATO. Norstad had in fact told U.S. representatives that in his judgment Canada had lived up to MC-70 goals more than any other member of the alliance except the United States. It was desirable, however, that there should be a show of solidarity by NATO members in the matter of military preparedness. It was particularly desirable that Canada should give an affirmative response to the Secretary-General's request for such a report in view of the modest recommendations, mainly of a logistic nature, put forward by Norstad in regard to Canada's contribution.

3. The Minister doubted whether it would be possible for any detailed statement to be put forward by the Canadian representative to the NATO Council on September 4 since Cabinet had not concluded its discussions of the matter and would not next be meeting until September 6. However, he could say in confidence that it was contemplated to bring Canada's forces committed to NATO up to war strength including the despatch of some 1100 men to the brigade. Mr. Robertson also recalled that arrangements had been made not to rotate the Italians in the brigade so that the brigade could be kept at maximum efficiency. The Minister said that this also was related to the desirability of not bringing more dependents over to Europe. It was agreed that the Minister would consult the Prime Minister as to what report could be made by the Canadian representative to the NATO Council on September 4.

Soviet Announcement about Resuming Tests

4. Merchant said that in his judgment the purpose of the announcement was intimidation, especially directed against the uncommitted countries whose leaders were meeting in Belgrade. The reaction of the United States was that Khrushchev probably made a great mistake and that the decision would backfire. There was a sense of relief that Khrushchev had assumed responsibility and therefore taken the blame for resuming tests. If the United States were to resume tests, it would be limited to underground tests. The U.S. Government was more likely to wait until the implications of the Soviet tests had an opportunity to sink in and, therefore, to reap the benefits of Moscow's bad judgment. Coupled with the sealing off of East Berlin with a wall in the centre of the city, this showed a distinct toughening of the Soviet attitude.

Belgrade Conference

5. The Minister asked Merchant whether, as a result of the Soviet announcement, Mr. Nehru might cancel his trip to Moscow. Merchant thought that, on the contrary, Mr. Nehru might be more anxious to go as he might be very upset by this development and the signs of toughening of Soviet policy.

Disarmament

6. The Minister said that the United States had shown great patience in exploring the possibilities of agreement on disarmament as well as on nuclear tests. He asked Mr. Merchant what effect he thought the Soviet announcement would have on the handling of disarmament matters as they had been agreed among the five Western powers and in NATO consultations. Merchant thought there would be no direct effect even though the Soviet announcement would not put an end to the efforts to conduct bilateral discussions with the Russians nor to putting the U.S.A. plan before the UNGA. He said that the plan was the best that had been put together in the post war world. Mr. Robertson said it was important that the Western powers maintain a readiness to negotiate on this as well as on other matters affecting the peace of the world. The Soviet statement about resuming the tests represented a threat to humanity as had been recognized in the President's statement released earlier that day. He observed that the French attitude towards negotiations with the Russians would strengthen the Russian position. Khrushchev had used the French nuclear tests as an excuse for resuming Soviet testing. Merchant was not hopeful about any change in the French attitude.

Chinese Representation

7. Merchant said that members of the U.S. Embassy staff had had useful talks on problems which would be coming up before the UNGA session with Mr. Glazebrook and Mr. Ignatieff. He expressed the hope that there would be agreement on the Chinese representation issue. The Minister said that Cabinet had not yet made a decision on the handling of the Chinese representation issue at the forthcoming session. He thought that the U.S. proposals about insisting on the matter being treated as a substantive issue requiring two-thirds majority and the setting up of a sub-committee was a good idea.

Berlin

8. The Minister asked Merchant's reaction to possible areas of negotiability in the Western position. For instance, he asked whether the West might not offer de facto recognition to East Germany. Merchant replied that it depended on how one defined "de facto". He thought there would be no objection on the U.S.A. side in dealings with East German officials insofar as the latter took over the functions previously performed by Soviet officials in the event that the Soviet Government signed the treaty with East Berlin. The U.S.A. would not agree to anything that might imply de jure recognition. He doubted, moreover, whether either Khrushchev or Ulbricht were really interested in only de facto dealings rather than de jure recognition.

9. The Minister asked whether it might not be desirable to offer recognition of the Oder-Neisse line as the French had done. Merchant said that it had been a matter of principle with the U.S.A. not to modify their stand on the Oder-Neisse line on moral as well as practical grounds unless such a modification were accepted and confirmed by a freely elected German Government. Mr. Robertson recalled that with the prospect of German reunification becoming increasingly remote, the matter might be considered more in terms of stiffening Polish resistance to Soviet pressures and in consolidating the position of the Church. After all, the recognition of the boundary would hardly be a gain for Russia. Leaving the Oder-Neisse line unsettled indefinitely seemed to be only adding a significant element of instability in the European scene. Merchant doubted whether the USA would regard the Oder-Neisse line as negotiable. He thought that the area of negotiation would in fact be limited to those narrow issues in the Western negotiation which had been incorporated earlier in East-West negotiations on Berlin at Geneva, such as the modification of military forces, reciprocal restraints on propaganda and covert activities that might endanger the peace, reduction of direct strength and the exclusion of nuclear weapons from Berlin. In explanation of these views, Merchant said that before the splitting of Berlin by a wall to stop the flow of refugees, it might be easier to consider widening the areas of negotiation. It must be realized that the Russians and East Germans have achieved at least part of what might have been negotiable the hard way by stopping the flow of refugees and splitting Berlin. It now seemed necessary to face the hard fact that the Soviets wanted the Western powers out of Berlin either in stages or directly. Such an objective is not negotiable.

Morale Effects in Berlin

10. The Minister asked what the effects of this Soviet pressure might be on West Berlin. Merchant said that the U.S.A. Government was concerned about it but so far there was no evidence of any significant impairment of morale. The U.S.A. authorities were watching such signs of declining morale as sales of real estate, transfer of accounts, running down of inventories, etc. So far, the chief measures taken to boost morale had been the reinforcement of the USA garrison, the Johnson mission³³ and the appointment of General Clay. Asked whether the USA would favour U.N. presence in Berlin, Merchant said this would not be any substitute for USA troops in present circumstances.

11. The talk ended with reference to the situation in Brazil, on which nothing particularly significant was said.

SECRET. GUARD.

Ottawa, September 2, 1961

My dear Duncan [Sandys],

Thank you indeed for your thoughtful and most stimulating letter of August [26]. As you suggested, circulation has been restricted to very few persons here on a need to know basis.

³³ Voir/See Foreign Relations of the United States, 1961-1963, Vol. XIV (Washington: United States Government Printing Bureau, 1993), documents 94-101.

We are in full agreement with what you have done so far and with your tentative views as to what remains to be undertaken.

I am particularly worried that the French have been dragging their feet so conspicuously as to negotiations. A few days ago I instructed our Ambassador in Paris to appeal to General de Gaulle for a measure of flexibility. My own impression is that Khrushchev is keen to engage in negotiations and that we would be wise to obtain something in return for the various steps which he is now taking unilaterally while we are hesitating. If we wait too long, there will not be very much left for us to offer; he will have taken most of what he wants in the interval, to induce us to come to the conference table. It is, therefore, our hope here that you will continue to press the other Western Foreign Ministers to arrive at early and positive decisions as to these urgently needed negotiations. There would be particular advantage in being in a position to announce now that they will be taking place sometime this fall.

On the substance of the Western negotiating position, our thoughts seem to have developed along parallel lines. I hope to let you have shortly some suggestions which we have developed here in the expectation that they might stimulate an exchange of views on possible solutions concerning Berlin. Like you, we think that there should be an initial bargaining position, possibly involving the whole of Berlin and then, a hard fall-back proposal for West Berlin alone. The real question here is how far the West Germans may be willing to go. I am inclined to think that after the elections and, as a result of recent developments in Berlin, they may be more flexible than heretofore. It will be important, however, in any settlement that may be worked out, to carry the Germans and perhaps to allow them to play a key role, particularly in regard to presentation, if the final solution is not to be presented in terms of a betrayal on the part of their partners.

The timetable is very short. Between now and the German elections it seems to us that it might be wise to make some tentative suggestions in Washington and to encourage progress in the shaping up of agreed proposals which could later be discussed with the Germans. The matter, as you pointed out, is most delicate and we could perhaps revert to it when you have had an opportunity to consider what we have in mind.

It may well be that ultimately the whole German problem will have to be discussed in the United Nations. I fear that we may not be able to retain the initiative unless we can persuade the neutral countries in particular that we are earnest in the matter of reaching some accommodation with the Soviet bloc.

In all this, I feel that your great experience and flexibility in approach can be of the utmost importance for the Western cause. I do hope that you will not let your preoccupations with other weighty problems unduly hinder your freedom of manoeuvre and that you will continue to press for early and serious discussions with the Soviet bloc. I am convinced that time is not working in our favour. The sooner we can deal with the situation, in specific terms, before Khrushchev makes many more moves, the more likely we may be to reduce tension and to find an acceptable solution.

Yours ever,

[HOWARD GREEN]

CABINET DOCUMENT NO. 344-61

Ottawa, September 6, 1961

BERLIN: PROPOSED ECONOMIC COUNTER-MEASURES

At the suggestion of the Foreign Ministers of the United States, United Kingdom, France and Germany, the NATO Council is now examining a proposal that member governments should take the necessary administrative and legislative action immediately to enable them to carry out without delay concerted economic counter-measures against the Soviet bloc in the event that access to West Berlin is blocked. These measures are designed to form part of a broad range of contingency planning and are regarded by the Four Powers as one feature of a comprehensive allied policy for meeting the threat to West Berlin. (The appendix to this Memorandum sets out in detail this proposal and analyzes the implications of economic sanctions for Canada and their probable effect on the Soviet bloc.) These measures are intended to apply to the Soviet bloc only and not to China or the Asian satellites, although according to reports from Washington, an extension to the latter group of countries might be considered at a later date.

2. The objective of the proposal now before NATO would appear to be two-fold: it would represent an act of determination by the West which would demonstrate the depth of Western resolution and might act as a deterrent to the Soviet bloc if it contemplated denying access to Berlin; it would also mean that all member governments in the Alliance would be in a position to act quickly to impose an immediate economic embargo on the Soviet Union if access to Berlin were blocked (and the threat of war were imminent).

3. If economic measures were to be considered as part of an effective deterrent they would probably have to be made public. In Canada, if enabling legislation were required, it certainly could not be enacted without a public debate. There is a risk that a public debate throughout the countries of the Alliance could to some extent undermine the sense of resolution and determination which the West is anxious to achieve. A judgment would have to be made about the possible reaction of the Canadian people if special enabling legislation were sought at this stage.

4. With respect to the second objective, i.e., of being prepared to take economic action immediately in the face of blocked access, it should be pointed out that while some of the measures could be carried out under existing authority others would require the invocation of the War Measures Act. This represents, however, a significant political act. It may be that it would be desirable to enact other enabling legislation which would permit the Government to take action without going as far as invoking the War Measures Act. This might be particularly true if the blockade of Berlin were paralleled by negotiations in the United Nations or elsewhere. Under such circumstances it might be inappropriate to invoke the War Measures Act, although it might be considered that our negotiating position would be strengthened through the imposition of an economic blockade, particularly if these sanctions had been announced earlier as one of the first steps in a Western response to a blockade. Open unwillingness within the North Atlantic Alliance to agree on a policy of developing economic counter-measures to Soviet pressure on Berlin as part of a range of Western reactions could leave some questions in Soviet minds about NATO's determination. Moreover, failure to take economic counter-measures in the event of the blockade of Berlin would leave direct military action as the only other effective response to Soviet moves.

5. From the attached analysis it is apparent that the effects on the Soviet bloc of a total economic embargo by NATO countries cannot be easily determined. Some of their economic activity and operations would clearly be disrupted; the effects of other measures may be limited and would have to be balanced against the economic price to be paid by the members of the Western Alliance.

6. A number of NATO countries would be hurt as much if not more than the countries in the Soviet bloc. This is particularly true of the peripheral states such as Greece, Turkey and Iceland which are not in a position to undergo economic hardship unless compensatory steps were taken by the bigger NATO powers.

7. There would be some economic hardship involved for Canada, particularly if the embargo were extended to China. However, this is a price that we should be prepared to pay if there is any expectation that economic sanctions together with other military and diplomatic moves would be effective or strengthen the West's position with respect to any future negotiations. This is not clear at this time. The imposition of a blockade short of war thus raises important domestic political implications for Canada.

8. The risk of a divisive effect within the Alliance arising from the unwillingness of some of the smaller countries to accept the implications of an economic embargo would have to be balanced against the divisive effect of the failure of NATO generally to respond to proposals put forward by the Big Four. On balance, it would seem that the smaller powers are likely to be on good ground in questioning a decision which hurts them far more than the major powers.

9. It should be noted that if economic counter-measures were to be effective, some arrangements would have to be made with respect to trade and transactions through neutral third countries. This could shift some of the damaging effect to the neutrals and weaken the standing of the West with those countries.³⁴

10. It is desirable, to avoid, if possible, an issue in NATO with the Big Four on this matter. It is in Canadian interests to work out procedures that will not give rise to a sense of frustration on the part of the Big Four, and the United States in particular, or which would throw into question Canada's willingness to play its full part in the Alliance.

11. In these circumstances it seems that the Canadian Government should give an undertaking in NATO that if the situation deteriorates to the point where access to Berlin is closed, we would join in a full economic blockade of the Soviet Bloc. There would, however, need to be a collective and agreed judgment by NATO that such a situation had been created. Whether Ministers wish to examine legislative action at this stage in anticipation, or whether reliance is to be placed on the immediate invocation of the War Measures Act is a judgment which might be better taken after a more careful study of the legal and constitutional implications.³⁵

12. While it would be desirable to agree to envisage economic counter-measures in a situation where the access to Berlin were blocked (and when the use of military force might appear to be the only other response open to the West) it would not be desirable at this time to agree to apply such sanctions gradually in advance of access actually being denied. The “escalated” application of economic sanctions prompted by acts of harassment by East Germany or the Soviet Bloc could lead to increasing retaliation by the Communists and precipitate a cut-off of access to Berlin before negotiations can be initiated, thus increasing the possibility of military conflict, which could lead to full-scale nuclear war.

13. Economic sanctions now would not be warranted. Their application by the Alliance on a graduated scale prior to the blockade of Berlin should be opposed. However, if the access to Berlin is blocked, then Canada should be prepared to join the rest of the NATO allies in considering economic sanctions as part of a series of measures against the Soviet Bloc, short of military force. The deterrent effect of seeking enabling legislation now and announcing the intention to use economic sanctions in certain circumstances must be measured against the possibility that public reaction throughout the Alliance might throw into question the ability of the West to take effective and determined action in the face of a crisis.

Recommendations:

14. It is recommended that instructions should be prepared for the use of our representatives at discussions in NATO, based on the considerations set out above; it should be emphasized that:

(i) we agree that a determined and resolute stand is required by NATO and that we are taking steps to contribute to the military build-up;

(ii) we feel that economic counter-measures should not be applied by NATO unless the corridor is closed by the Communists;

(iii) we have grave doubts about the use of sanctions on a graduated scale. This could force retaliation and precipitate a situation where the access to Berlin would be cut off;

(iv) we appreciate that the Big Four are requesting other NATO countries simply to take the necessary steps now to be in a position to enforce sanctions later if access is cut off. This in itself, however, would require public debate and considerable mobilization of public opinion. Such a debate involves risks in Canada and probably to a greater degree in some other NATO countries;

(v) our hesitation does not stem from narrowly interpreted commercial interest. But we would feel justified in paying the price and taking the risks involved only if we were satisfied that such measures could be an effective deterrent and would contribute to strengthening the overall position of the West;

(vi) economic sanctions will hurt the smaller powers more than the major ones. This could have a divisive effect in the Alliance unless some form of burden-sharing could be realistically envisaged;

(vii) if military or civil access is cut off the Canadian Government would give consideration to taking steps immediately to join in a total economic embargo of the Soviet Bloc, if such a step, or its threat, is helpful to our common cause;

(viii) Canada has serious legal and constitutional problems (with important political implications) that are being studied as a matter of urgency.

BERLIN: PROPOSED ECONOMIC COUNTER-MEASURES

Background

On August 8 United States Secretary of State Rusk reported to the NATO Council that the Foreign Ministers of the United States, United Kingdom, France and Germany had agreed that NATO governments should be asked to take, as part of a broad range of contingency planning in the military and non-military fields, the necessary steps to enable them to carry out, without delay, concerted economic counter-measures against the Soviet Bloc in the event that military and civilian access, air or ground, to West Berlin was blocked.

2. The following measures were proposed:

(a) The prohibition of the use of all the financial facilities of NATO countries to carry on current transactions with the USSR, the Soviet Zone of Germany, the other Soviet Bloc members and their nationals.

(b) The expulsion of all Soviet Bloc technical experts and foreign trade officials without diplomatic immunity from the NATO countries.

(c) The freezing of all assets of the members of the Soviet Bloc under jurisdiction of the NATO powers.

(d) Termination of trade agreements involving Soviet Bloc countries.

(e) The denial of all exports to Soviet Bloc countries.

(f) The stoppage of all imports from Soviet Bloc countries to NATO countries.

(g) The closure of NATO ports to Soviet Bloc shipping and planes and to craft under Soviet Bloc charter.

(h) The prevention of aircraft of Soviet Bloc countries from making transit overflight and technical stops.

(i) The prohibition of calling at Soviet Bloc ports of vessels and planes of the NATO countries.

3. On August 18 the Canadian Ambassador in Washington, on the instructions of Cabinet, expressed to the State Department the Canadian Government's view that retaliatory measures should not be taken to counter East German moves to restrict access from East Germany and East Berlin to West Germany and West Berlin. If military and civilian access between West Germany and West Berlin were to be cut off, economic sanctions would have to be considered, but they should not be used without adequate consultation and preparation.

4. Following a discussion in the NATO Council, where a number of countries raised several problems that required careful consideration before agreement could be reached on the Big Four proposals, a working group was established in Paris to consider the economic and political implications of a complete embargo against the Soviet Bloc and of specific counter-measures which might be appropriate to face various economic contingencies, bearing in mind the adverse effects of these measures on individual NATO countries. Canada is a member of this working group which is to report back within a month, at the latest.

5. The working group held its first meeting on August 25 and three main points emerged at this meeting. There was a consensus that for the time being economic sanctions should be contemplated against the USSR and its European satellites only and that there should be no new restrictions on trade with China and its Asian satellites. (However, the United States authorities are reported to consider that these sanctions might be applied at a later stage to the whole Sino-Soviet Bloc.) General doubts were expressed in the working group about the long-term effectiveness of the proposed economic counter-measures. The working group also generally recognized that a number of NATO countries would be seriously affected by a trade embargo and have difficulties in implementing the proposed counter-measures.

Implications for Canada

6. An examination of the significance of the proposed measures for Canada has indicated that considerable economic interests would be affected by some of them, in particular those relating to finance and trade.

7. We understand that several Canadian banks provide financial facilities to the Soviet Bloc. The order of magnitude of the transactions concerned is not known, but is probably quite significant. It should also be noted that outstanding Canadian credits to the Soviet Bloc amount to $113.7 million (Czechoslovakia $21.7 million, Poland $42 million and China $50 million). Service of these Soviet Bloc debts would most likely cease once a total embargo had been enforced, and they may possibly have to be written off.

8. The number of Soviet technical experts and foreign trade officials without diplomatic immunity in Canada which would be affected by measures of expulsion is not significant; apart from a few Czech trade officials in Montreal, most are not staying beyond a limited period of time (e.g. for trade fairs).

9. With regard to freezing Soviet Bloc assets in NATO countries, there is no readily available information on Soviet Bloc investment in Canada. Some may have been made through Swiss banks. They are, however, unlikely to be substantial.

10. Total Canadian exports to the Soviet Bloc (excluding China) were valued at $35.4 million in 1960. The value of imports from the Bloc was $13 million over the same period. Canada has Trade Agreements in force with Czechoslovakia and Poland, which can be terminated at three months' notice, and with the USSR, which expires in 1963. The latter contains a clause authorizing the suspension of its provisions on security grounds. However, the termination of these agreements or the suspension of the provisions of the agreement with the USSR would be a serious step. If the proposed trade embargo were extended to China, more substantial commercial interests would be at stake. Our exports to and imports from China were valued at $8.7 million and $5.6 million respectively in 1960; but our export trade is expected to increase considerably, mainly as the result of Canadian wheat sales to China. It is estimated that the value of these sales in 1961 will be of the order of $130 million. (A trade agreement with China was signed in 1946 and in principle continues to apply to the mainland.)

11. In a situation where a complete trade embargo were imposed on Soviet Bloc trade, watering and refuelling and repairs would be the main operations affected by the closure of Canadian ports to Soviet Bloc shipping and planes. These facilities are provided at East and West coast ports for Soviet trawlers and research vessels. In 1961 there have so far been 89 visits of this kind.

12. Canada has no bilateral air agreement with any Soviet Bloc country and special permission is now required for overflight and technical stops by all Soviet Bloc aircraft, except Czech and Polish aircraft. Czechoslovakia and Poland are members of ICAO and signatory to the Air Transit Agreement. By denying them transit overflights and technical stops Canada would probably be acting outside the scope of the Agreement.

13. While some of the proposed measures could be carried out by Canada through administrative action or on the authority of existing legislation, others would necessitate the enactment of new legislation or the proclamation of the War Measures Act.

Implications for other NATO Countries

14. Within NATO itself some countries may be hurt as much as the Soviet Bloc. This is particularly true of the peripheral states such as Greece, Iceland and Turkey, which have an important stake in trade with the Bloc and are not in a position to undergo economic hardship unless compensatory steps are taken by the bigger NATO powers.

Probable Impact on the Soviet Bloc

15. The impact on the Soviet Bloc of a total economic embargo by NATO countries cannot be easily ascertained, although it is almost certain to be short term. The effect would be felt most in East Germany, but would be unlikely to continue to be significant after a period of six months. Some of the Bloc's operations abroad would clearly be disrupted; the effects of other measures may be limited and would have to be balanced against the economic price to be paid by the members of the Western Alliance.

16. If financial facilities in the NATO countries were to be denied to the Bloc, the effect of this measure would be felt on Bloc relations not only with NATO countries but also with the rest of the world. Most Bloc trade with under-developed countries is bilaterally balanced and the difficulties created by this measure could probably be surmounted. However, some important commodities, such as rubber from Malaya, are paid for in sterling or other convertible currencies; the loss of financing facilities in the NATO area would be a serious blow to this trade. If the embargo were to be applied to Communist China, the value of Hong Kong as an entrepot for trade with the West and as China's main source of foreign exchange would be lost.

17. The expulsion of non-diplomatic experts and trade officials would be of significance mainly to East Germany, which has established a number of trade offices abroad largely as a substitute for diplomatic establishment.

18. The freezing of Soviet Bloc assets would no doubt affect funds of considerable magnitude. (Bloc trade with NATO countries averaged $330 million a month in 1960.) However, they should be balanced against outstanding credits granted by NATO countries to the Soviet Bloc excluding China, which stood at $468 million at the beginning of this year.

19. Generally speaking, foreign trade makes such a small contribution to Bloc national incomes that the loss of imports from NATO would not cause any major economic crisis in Communist countries. There would be delays, shortages and setbacks in some sectors, but the resources of the Bloc and its independence of non-communist supplies are such that these problems would at the most be a serious inconvenience; they could in part be offset by domestic readjustments and a greater dependence on sources outside NATO. However, the saving in research and development costs, which results from the purchase of advanced western capital equipment, would no longer be available and this would perhaps be one of the most important economic consequences of the embargo.

20. The prevention of transit overflight and technical stops would create serious problems for the Bloc in rerouting flights to Africa and the Western Hemisphere. Restrictions on shipping would have a serious effect on intra-Bloc (particularly Chinese) trade and on Bloc trade with countries such as Cuba, in view of the Bloc's dependence on western ocean shipping for about two-thirds of its foreign trade.

21. The effects of some of the proposed measures would not be limited to the Bloc's economic relations with NATO countries, but extend to its relations with under-developed or neutral countries. The reactions of these countries would have to be taken into account by members of the Alliance. Restrictions on economic relations with these countries or means of securing their cooperation may have to be considered in order to make an embargo against the Soviet Bloc fully effective.

22. None of the possible actions considered in this paper would have any effect on the type or number of weapons in the hands of Soviet Bloc forces or on the ability of Soviet Bloc defence industry to support them.

23. There are also a number of steps which the Soviet Bloc could take to offset at least in part the economic effects of the proposed measures, such as the reorganization and closer coordination of intra-Bloc trade, the readjustment of domestic economic plans, the expansion of arrangements for trading in roubles and the use of third-country agents to obtain essential commodities from NATO countries. These steps would not entirely eliminate the inconvenience to the Soviet Bloc of a NATO embargo, but they would substantially modify its effectiveness. They would, incidentally, lead to closer coordination of the economies of Bloc countries.

CANADIAN SUGGESTIONS AS TO A NEGOTIATED BERLIN SETTLEMENT

I had an opportunity to discuss this matter yesterday in Washington with the Ambassador and Mr. Rae.

2. Timing

Both feel that if we wish to make any suggestions, we should try to do so next week, before the meeting of the Western Foreign Ministers.

3. Presentation

Mr. Heeney felt that we should

(a) acknowledge that as a result of what Khrushchev has said and done recently, negotiations have become more difficult

(b) argue that they are now as urgently required as ever.

4. Substance

Mr. Heeney agrees with the essential features of our suggested deal:

(a) a new statute for West Berlin

(b) recognition of the Oder-Neisse line

(c) de facto recognition of East Germany.

5. Initial and Interim Proposals

I agreed with Mr. Heeney that any proposals involving the whole of Berlin were unlikely to succeed and to have more than propaganda value.

Mr. Heeney recognized these two points

(a) if we are asked to indicate what we have in mind we should be able to present detailed schemes for illustrative purposes: he felt that such detailed proposals might be more effective if annexed to rather than incorporated into our main suggestions;

(b) in the present circumstances, the United Kingdom may be hampered in taking any initiative in this field and there is a case for a Canadian attempt to stimulate a discussion on the basis of detailed rather than new general proposals. As long as our main points are set out separately from suggestions as to alternative detailed schemes, which could be tried out in the course of the negotiations.

6. Supplementary vs New Arrangement

Mr. Heeney felt very strongly that we should urge a new arrangement if this would make agreement easier. While, in pure legal theory, we agreed that an original (occupation) as against a derived (contractual) right might be preferable, in practice all depended on the willingness of the Soviet bloc to respect the right in question. The prospects of enforcement were not better in one case or in the other. If Khrushchev were committed to a new arrangement, as we now had little to offer we might as well accept a new statute.

7. Subsequently, I discussed this point with Mr. Chayes, the Legal Adviser of the State Department, and he fully agrees that if a new agreement will facilitate negotiations, the point is hardly worth arguing about. His only reservation was that public opinion might feel that this was a very substantial concession and that we had made a bad deal. He recognized that, on the other hand, this might make it easier to represent the concession to Khrushchev as an indication of our willingness to meet him on some of his requests. We might thus be saved more painful concessions in other areas.

8. Prospects

Mr. Heeney made repeatedly and with great emphasis the point that the United States administration are determined to negotiate with the USSR. They are determined to negotiate in good faith with every intention of reaching a settlement. Their fear, however, is that Khrushchev is not in a reasonable mood and that he may not be willing to accept a fair settlement. This does not mean that they will not do their utmost to achieve this objective.

TOP SECRET

VISIT OF THE SECRETARY-GENERAL OF NATO

Dr. Dirk U. Stikker, Secretary-General of NATO, called on the Minister, Monday at 9:30 a.m. and had a talk for an hour. The main subjects of discussion were:

- (a) Dr. Stikker's impressions of the attitude he found in Washington on the Berlin crisis;
- (b) the work of the State Department Task Force on contingency planning;
- (c) the work of the Four-Power Ambassadorial Committee in Washington;
- (d) possibility of commencement of negotiations on Berlin;
- (e) possible ministerial meeting;
- (f) prospects of negotiations on Berlin;
- (g) re-unification of Germany;

- (h) economic counter-measures;
- (i) long-term military planning.

(a) Dr. Stikker's Impressions of the Attitude He Found in Washington on the Berlin Crisis

The Secretary-General said that there was a marked difference of atmosphere in which the Berlin crisis was being discussed in private meetings of the Council in Paris and that which he had encountered in his meetings with State and Defence Department officials and with the "Four-Power Ambassadorial Steering Group" in Washington. The main reasons for this difference was that Washington officials took the attitude that "we were much nearer to war."

(b) The Work of the State Department Task Force on Contingency Planning

The State Department Task Force which met daily under Assistant Secretary Foy Kohler had close access to relevant information. At the daily discussions they took into account intelligence, strategic, economic, financial, as well as political aspects of the Berlin problem. There were about 30 members of this Group. The State Department seemed concerned about the lack of progress in the consultations in the Council. Dr. Stikker recalled that Secretary Rusk had spoken to the Council on August 8 about U.S. plans in the military field and of the need for parallel measures by other NATO countries. Two weeks later the Council had commenced discussion on military preparedness connected with the Berlin crisis and already appreciable results were evident from governments. Rusk was also disappointed about the delay in response to Four-Power proposals on economic counter-measures. All in all, Dr. Stikker pictured the Washington atmosphere as much closer to war, with consequent pressures for immediate action, especially in the field of contingency planning measures.

(c) The Work of the Four-Power Ambassadorial Committee

This pressure in Washington to get quick results and decisions on contingency planning had led to the setting up unofficially of an Ambassadorial Steering Group which met daily in Washington under Secretary Rusk. The other participants were: Sir Harold Caccia, United Kingdom Ambassador; M. Hervé Alphand of France; and Herr Wilhelm Grewe of the Federal Republic of Germany. Dr. Stikker said he made it crystal clear to this group that the other allies had a right to be kept fully informed through the Council of any plans that might be worked out. What the Secretary-General had in mind was that the Four-Power Group would, through their representatives in Paris, work out a report on the basis of rough drafts that Dr. Stikker had seen in Washington, and present it to the Council. The constitutional position of this self-constituted group raised some delicate problems. Dr. Stikker thought that consultations taking place could be justified under Article 4 of the Treaty which states: "The Parties will consult together when in the opinion of any of them, the territorial integrity, political independence or security of any of the Parties is threatened."

(d) Possibility of Commencement of Negotiations on Berlin

The Minister asked Dr. Stikker what he could say about progress in Washington in the definition of a Western position preparatory to negotiations with the USSR on Berlin. Dr. Stikker replied that there was no agreement on a basis of negotiations among the Four Powers, as France was still adamant against a decision on this matter. Dr. Stikker also found no agreed position among the United States Administration. For instance, Foy Kohler, Chairman of the Task Force, had expressed the view that the West should start with a tough position obviously unacceptable to the Russians. When the Secretary-General had argued against taking too inflexible a position in the beginning, he found that he was supported by Secretary Rusk. Nonetheless, the United Kingdom and United States had agreed to go ahead to prepare for negotiations regardless of French opposition. Views were being developed in the State Department and the Foreign Office in London. Initial probing had begun through Ambassador

Thompson in Moscow. Secretary Rusk was planning to meet with Mr. Gromyko when the latter comes to New York for the opening of the UNGA. The four Foreign Ministers are to have preparatory meetings in Washington on September 14.

(e) Possible Ministerial Meeting

Dr. Stikker said that as a reaction to the obvious by-passing of the NATO Council by the Four Powers, the Permanent Representatives of Belgium and Norway had suggested that the NATO Council should meet in ministerial session, perhaps in Washington, to ensure that the whole Council should be kept informed of the results of the contacts between the United States and the USSR. The Minister observed that the by-passing of the Council by the Four Powers had obviously gone much further than he had supposed and hoped that the situation would be remedied. Dr. Stikker said that as soon as he had definite evidence – which he obtained about a week ago – of the way in which the Council had been by-passed on contingency planning, he had taken steps in Washington, to ensure that the Council was given full information on contingency planning. He recognized his responsibility for safeguarding the institutions of NATO and for ensuring that proper consultations take place by which all members of the Alliance are kept fully informed in advance of decisions affecting them. The Minister asked Mr. Léger to comment on the idea of a ministerial meeting. Mr. Léger thought that as most of the Ministers of NATO countries concerned would be in New York in any case attending the UNGA, it would therefore be possible for Mr. Rusk to keep in touch with the NATO Foreign Ministers in New York. He doubted whether the Council should be brought into extraordinary ministerial session, particularly outside Paris, unless some further critical developments were to emerge. It would be interpreted as meaning that the permanent Council was unable to deal with the situation.

(f) Prospects of Negotiations on Berlin

The Minister asked whether the Group of Four were considering the various ideas on negotiations which had been ventilated or were they simply pre-occupied with contingency planning. Dr. Stikker said that owing to the position of the French, the Four had not been able to get down to the consideration of possible substantive positions preparatory to negotiations. Various possibilities, however, were being examined, both in the State Department and in the Foreign Office. The Minister asked what about the attitude of the Federal Republic of Germany. Dr. Stikker said that he had close personal relations with Dr. Adenauer from which he knew that Dr. Adenauer, while not wishing to prejudice the prospects of negotiations by premature disclosures of his hand – especially during the elections, was prepared to negotiate. At their last meeting some weeks ago, Dr. Adenauer had told Dr. Stikker, “There will be no war.” Dr. Adenauer had also said that as Germany had lost the last war, it should be prepared to pay (presumably by way of concessions). In answer to a question by Mr. Robertson, Dr. Stikker confirmed that it was his understanding that Dr. Adenauer would be prepared to embark on serious negotiations after the elections. Dr. Stikker also mentioned that he had tried to sound out the reaction of the Defence Minister, Herr Strauss, on this matter. He asked him recently whether the people of Frankfurt would be willing to go to war on the issue of Berlin. The Defence Minister had avoided a direct reply.

Turning to the discussions on substantive issues in the Council, Dr. Stikker thought that even if there were at present difficulties for the Germans and the French in defining a negotiating position, it was important that other members should express their views in the Council. Unlike his predecessor, the Secretary-General did not intend to impose his own views. He thought that the development of views in the Council could not go very much further until the results of contacts between the United States and USSR were known. In answer to a question from the Minister, Dr. Stikker expressed certain personal views on what the Soviet intentions over Berlin were. Their main purpose was, he thought, a clear demarcation of the present boundaries between the Eastern and Western Zones of Germany. Berlin, under this arrangement, should be made part of East Germany, but the Soviet Union was prepared, he thought, to move towards the incorporation of West Berlin with East Germany gradually, maintaining pressures over the access routes to West Berlin. These pressures on access routes to Berlin constituted the main danger in Berlin. The latest moves seem to be against air transport. If the flying of civil aircraft became too hazardous, it might be necessary to consider escorts and that might raise the risks of war. This brought Dr. Stikker back to the point of the importance he attached to the Council being kept informed and exercising more direct control over contingency plans. Even if the three Occupying Powers had special responsibility it was clear that their plans would affect all members – some more than others – and the other governments should be kept in constant touch through the Council.

In answer to a question from the Minister, Dr. Stikker said that he had not heard of any specific proposals in Washington for any United Nations presence in Berlin. He later added, however, that that did not mean that there was not some thinking about it in the State Department.

In answer to a further question from the Minister about whether there had been any discussion of the Oder-Neisse line, Dr. Stikker said that while this was not something that could be freely talked about in the Council at present, he thought, however, that everybody – including the Germans – agreed that recognition of this line would be inevitable.

(g) Re-unification of Germany

The Minister noted that in one of the reports from NATO, Paris, summarizing Council discussions, the Secretary-General was quoted as saying that, “the re-unification of Germany in freedom remains a fundamental aim of the West.” The Minister asked how this aim figured in relation to the definition of a possible casus belli over the crisis in Berlin. The public in Canada would not regard the re-unification of Germany as an aim for which the Alliance would be justified in going to war. Dr. Stikker explained that the re-unification of Germany would definitely not be regarded as a casus belli. All he had intended to point out was that in the East-West negotiations, which he expected would concentrate on the Berlin problem, the Western powers were committed to the principle of the political re-unification of Germany in freedom as an ultimate aim. It was understood, however, that this aim could only be pursued by peaceful means.

(h) Economic Counter-measures

Dr. Stikker mentioned the importance which the United States authorities attached in Washington to having the Allies prepare themselves in advance with the necessary legislative powers in order to apply economic counter-measures in the event of a blockade of Berlin. His understanding was that the United States authorities wanted these advance powers to be sought, without revealing allied plans to impose an economic blockade. The Minister pointed out that this was impossible under parliamentary procedures. There would have to be an explanation by the government of what was intended, and this would be followed by debate. If, on the other hand, economic counter-measures were being considered in order to deter the Russians from imposing a blockade of Berlin, surely all necessary information had to be divulged to the public.

Dr. Stikker said that the ad hoc committee considering the matter in Paris was not expected to conclude its study before September 23. Secretary Rusk had only raised the matter on behalf of the Four Powers in the Council on September 8. Economic blockade of the Soviet bloc gave rise to special difficulties, to Iceland, Greece and Turkey. Initially Secretary Rusk had talked of “appropriate measures.” Now the United States authorities seemed to be talking about a full economic blockade to be applied automatically in the event of the closing off of civil and military access to Berlin.

The Minister asked whether it was intended to include China in the blockade measures. Dr. Stikker replied that judging from a talk he had with the U.S. Secretary of Defence, Mr. MacNamara, this was the U.S.A. intention.

Dr. Stikker admitted there were some inconsistencies in the position adopted by the Four. For instance, the United Kingdom were anxious not to have any information divulged in advance for fear of the possible effect on sterling and upon trade with Hong Kong. On the other hand, he emphasized the Washington view "that nuclear war was very near." Against that background the United States authorities were urging that consideration be given to all kinds of measures which might be alternatives to nuclear war. The Minister pointed out that the announcement of an intention of the NATO Powers to impose a blockade which would have to be made if the necessary legislative measures were sought from Parliament, would surely contribute to the cumulative raising of the risks of nuclear war. They would certainly also reduce the chances of successfully initiating negotiations with the Soviet Union. Dr. Stikker recalled that the Council would have to come back to this issue when the special committee reported to the Council on September 23. At least the Four Powers seemed to be in agreement on this issue.

(i) Long-term Military Planning

As an example of the current pre-occupations in Washington with the immediate problems of contingency planning on Berlin, Dr. Stikker mentioned that he had been unable to get any response to his request for a further clarification of U.S. views on long-term strategic planning in NATO. Dr. Stikker recalled that the U.S. had initiated this discussion in connection with NATO long-term planning. They had suggested placing more emphasis on strengthening the conventional forces of NATO and the fulfillment of MC-70 goals. Mr. MacNamara had seemed impatient that the Secretary-General had pressed for further clarification of U.S.A. views on such long-term matters, at a time when all attention should be concentrated on the immediate problems of Berlin.³⁶

GERMANY AND BERLIN

I understand that you will be seeing Mr. Rusk on Wednesday morning. Bearing in mind that the meeting of the four Western Foreign Ministers will open the following day, this seems to be our only opportunity to put to Mr. Rusk and State Department officials certain points we have been considering about the Berlin problem.

2. I realize that as a result of Khrushchev's recent belligerent statements and actions in Berlin and, more important, the Soviet decision to resume nuclear testing, it is now more difficult for the United States to press for negotiations with the Soviet Union. Nevertheless, I believe that negotiations should take place in the near future and I hope that a decision to this effect will be taken by the four Western Foreign Ministers.

3. I think perhaps the most useful way to convey some of our thinking about the Berlin problem to the State Department would be to provide you with the texts of working papers which we have been considering in the Department. You should make it clear that the ideas contained in these working papers are preliminary and have not received governmental approval. You should emphasize that they are simply papers which have been prepared at the working level. You may leave copies or summaries of these papers at the State Department. The working papers which are given in my following telegrams are:

- (1) Negotiations;†
- (2) Possible statute for Berlin;†
- (3) Berlin and disarmament;†
- (4) Berlin and the United Nations;†
- (5) de facto recognition of the GDR

For London:

4. You should inform the Foreign Office that I have instructed our Ambassador in Washington to discuss with the State Department the ideas contained in the working papers. You may leave copies of them with the Foreign Office.

BERLIN: DE FACTO RECOGNITION OF EAST GERMANY

It seems to us there are a number of steps which might be taken which would not involve full de facto recognition of East Germany and yet might provide bargaining elements in developing an agreed settlement concerning Berlin.

2. Is there anything which has to be done in dealing with East Germany rather than with the USSR concerning access to and conditions in West Berlin which would involve de jure recognition? Surely no de jure recognition is involved in letting East German officials stamp papers, supervise traffic or in discussing with them the operation of safety regulations affecting the air corridors. We are inclined to think not, as long as it is made clear that there is no intention of recognizing East Germany de jure.

3. If the concern is over the attitude of East German authorities at some later date, the problem is one of spelling out the arrangement and providing for clear and detailed USSR guarantees rather than one of recognition.

4. If as we suspect, the USSR will attach importance to steps towards some recognition of East Germany, would it not be in the general interest of the West, apart from the practical benefits to be derived in negotiations over Berlin, to offer:

- (a) East German entry into some of the specialized international agencies;
- (b) East German signature of some UN technical conventions;
- (c) East Germans might be associated with some other non-official international organizations.

5. There may be other steps which will not involve more than limited recognition and which might also be considered.

GERMANY AND BERLIN

The Secretary of State received me at 6 p.m. last night. I told him that we were following up his suggestion that he would welcome any thoughts we might wish to put forward on the substance of the problem of Germany and Berlin to supplement earlier discussions with the State Department (for example our approach of July 6) and in particular our conversation with him and other senior USA officials during Escott Reid's visit to Washington.

2. I left with the Secretary a copy of the various departmental papers contained in your telegrams S-380 to S-384 inclusive, making it clear that our own exam of the problems relating to Germany and Berlin was still in progress. These papers on various aspects of the problem reflected working level views which had not repeat not received government approval. In view of the current Four Power meetings, we thought it would be useful to let the State Department have these working papers promptly. We were informing the Foreign Office in London and given them a copy of the working papers as well.

3. The Secretary assured me that our papers were welcome and would be given careful study by USA officials dealing with Germany and Berlin. In course of our talk, he made a number of comments on the prospects for negotiations. He drew attention first to the fact that at the conclusion of the visit of Sukarno and Keita, the President had issued yesterday a brief statement³⁷ (we are sending the text separately) in which he had stressed that “there is no repeat no need for resort to force if both sides in the Berlin crisis have peace for their purpose,” and that, while the position of the West Berliners would be defended, USA was ready to discuss world tensions with other governments, including the government of USSR, and to “search for the means to preserve an honourable peace.” The President had gone on to say that the forthcoming session of UNGA would provide an opportunity for serious talks on Germany and other problems, if Soviet side proves willing. Mr. Kennedy had added that the channels of diplomacy were open and other means were available “when they can serve a useful purpose.”

4. The White House statement had also said that “while efforts are made to reach solutions to issues that have divided the free and the Communist worlds, it is clearly of the utmost importance that there be no repeat no unilateral acts which will make peaceful progress impossible.”

5. In regard to the visit of the two emissaries from the Belgrade Conference, a separate message† gives you the text of a White House communication which will be made public in the course of Friday September 15.³⁸ This sets out the views of USA Government in reply to the message carried from the Conference.

6. As to Soviet attitude toward any meaningful discussion and negotiation, Rusk said that reports received through Ambassador Thompson in Moscow thus far did not repeat not indicate any significant move away from the rigid position taken by Khrushchev at Vienna. At the same time there were a few straws in the wind which might indicate some minor easing of the temperature. According to reports which the State Department had received, Nehru during his Moscow visit had urged on Khrushchev that, in any treaty signed by Soviets with the GDR, provision should be made for a continuing Soviet guarantee of Allied rights of access to Berlin. Another sign was that, if it were possible to get past the German elections without any overt act by Soviets in violation of existing agreements, there was a prospect of some easing of the West German position. Indeed there were already signs of this. There was greater willingness on the part of the Bonn Government to have increased direct contacts with the East Germans in such matters as trade, transit and the free movement of people. If this mood continued after September 17, it could contribute increased flexibility in the Western negotiating position.

7. I asked the Secretary to what extent he anticipated that substance would be covered in the Four Power meetings scheduled to begin today. He replied that for his part he hoped that some progress could be made, although the meeting would focus primarily on the problem and tactics of negotiation. He believed that it was important that the Western Powers should give some consideration to an opening declaration similar to that agreed by the Four Powers, including the Soviets, in the 1955 negotiations reaffirming the long-term goal of German reunification. (We believe he was referring to the Geneva directive to Heads of Post, July 23, 1955.) If this could be done, it would then be possible to hold out greater hope for some interim solution in connection with the problem of Berlin itself. In this context, Rusk stressed that in the various proposals for a new status for Berlin that were being reviewed (and he noted that we had given attention to a possible statute for Berlin), it was of the greatest importance that the interim aspect of such proposals should be stipulated by the Western side. In this context, we drew attention to the fact that in our own working drafts relating to a possible new status for Berlin, the expression “pending reunification of Germany” had been carefully preserved.

8. The Secretary was somewhat critical of the complexity of previous Western positions, including both the Western peace plan and the interim Berlin proposals as advanced at the 1959 negotiations. He thought these were unnecessarily complex and had not repeat not been clearly understood at the time. The Soviets had been able to come forward with proposals which had the merit of simplicity, i.e., “a peace treaty and a free city.” Rusk thought it important that any proposals which the Western Powers eventually put forward should be clarified and presented as directly and clearly as possible.

9. On the immediate steps ahead, the Secretary said that he would be attending the opening sessions of UNGA and that the first step in opening up prospects for negotiations would be direct bilateral talks with Gromyko. I asked whether he would be speaking for the Western Four in such discussions, to which he replied that, while he would, of course, be guided by the Four Power discussions which had taken place already, and which are to begin at foreign minister level today, he would feel it necessary and desirable not repeat not to be limited to speaking from a Four Power brief.

10. We asked the Secretary whether a decision had been taken as to the President’s attendance at UNGA. His reply was that no repeat no final decision had been reached and that the President would only decide when he has a clearer idea of what contribution he can make in the plenary sessions. Rusk is himself leaving for New York on Sunday.

BERLIN AND GERMANY: PRIME MINISTER’S STATEMENT ON DEFENCE MEASURES

Last evening I received a letter dated September 13 from the Secretary of State in the following terms:

“Dear Arnold:

Will you please express to your SSEA my sincere gratification for the statement made at Winnipeg on September 1 by Prime Minister Diefenbaker⁴⁰ on the general world situation and more specifically with regard to our rights in Berlin. It was a comprehensive review of a most complex question and, I thought, a telling presentation of the Western position on the whole subject.

I will also be most grateful if you would tell Mr. Green how much I appreciated his own statement before the House of Commons on September 7. His declaration on the resumption of nuclear testing showed great understanding and I would like him to know how highly we value this support.

Canada's stand on matters which bear so much on the future of all of us, in these difficult times, is a source of real comfort to us in Washington.

INTERNATIONALIZATION OF BERLIN

The German Ambassador called on Mr. Cadieux this afternoon by appointment to discuss the suggestion made by the Prime Minister that Berlin might be internationalized under the United Nations.

2. The Ambassador appreciated that this was only one of many possible roles which the Prime Minister envisaged that the United Nations might undertake and that the Prime Minister had made it clear in his remarks that this role could only be undertaken with four-power approval. The German Ambassador nevertheless made the point that the authorities in Bonn, as we might have learned from the newspapers, had reservations about such a project. Furthermore, the Ambassador did not think there was any likelihood that the U.S.S.R. would agree to such a scheme. He agreed, however, that it might have propaganda value and a useful effect on neutral or uncommitted nations at the U.N.

3. The Ambassador then went on to make two further points:

(a) Since his return to Canada he had noticed that the press here was discussing only the concessions which the West might make. There was no thought given apparently, or at least no concrete suggestions were being made, as to what the U.S.S.R. might be expected to give in return for any Western concessions. Mr. Cadieux said that the Government had been aware of this and that the recent speeches by the Prime Minister and by yourself had been made partly with a view to providing leadership on this issue and presenting the problem in perspective.

(b) The German Ambassador said that the Canadian case seemed to be based essentially on two arguments: respect for international agreements and U.N. principles. He thought that this left out the most important consideration, e.g. the loyalty of the Germans to the NATO alliance and to Western ideals. The prime objective of Khrushchev was not limited to Berlin. He had far more ambitious schemes and particularly that of disrupting the alliance. Mr. Cadieux said that the Prime Minister and yourself were fully aware of this particularly important aspect of the question; in making public remarks care had been given to selecting the arguments which seemed more likely to be accepted by the public and not to create controversy. In his speech to the Bar Association in particular, the Prime Minister had tried to answer the question which was raised in private letters and in editorials: "Why should we stand firm on Berlin?" It was a matter of record that the speeches made so far had been well received and had, it appeared, generally achieved the expected objective. The Ambassador said that he was very gratified to learn that these considerations were in the minds of the officials and of the Ministers concerned.⁴¹

Memorandum by United Nations Division

SECRET. CANADIAN EYES ONLY.

[Ottawa], September 16, 1961

ASSEMBLY INITIATIVE ON BERLIN: TECHNICAL PROBLEMS

The assumption is that the Berlin question will be discussed during the General Debate at the 16th session. This will give a full opportunity to restate in the Canadian speech the suggestions which the Prime Minister advanced in the House on September 11. A key paragraph reads as follows:

"There are some things the United Nations can do; there are others it cannot do. The United Nations is limited by the fact that Berlin is part of the peace settlement with Germany and is therefore, under the charter, reserved for consideration by the victorious powers. However, if the four powers decide they would like the United Nations to play a part, then there are roles the United Nations can play. There is the question of safeguarding the maintenance of peace; and where the peace is threatened, if the majority of the United Nations decide that this is being done by the U.S.S.R. or by any other nation, the matter could be brought before the United Nations. Mr. Khrushchev said in his interview with Mr. Sulzberger of the New York Times that he is not averse to United Nations discussions if the big four agree."

2. The Prime Minister dismissed the suggestions made by the Leader of the Opposition (a) that the whole city of Berlin could be placed under United Nations trusteeship with access guaranteed by United Nations force and (b) that the United Nations Headquarters should be moved from New York to Berlin.

3. The Prime Minister then went on to make his suggestion about internationalizing Berlin as follows:

"I think the time has come when consideration might be given – and the United Nations might give consideration thereto – to the internationalizing of the city of Berlin under the United Nations, with its status to continue under United Nations presence. I realize that this suggestion would not receive the support of Mr. Khrushchev. However, it at least would bring about a step forward in the assurance that if negotiation failed, the United Nations would have something to which it could give its attention. It would require uncontrolled access by the West. It would also require a willingness on the part of the four powers to agree."

⁴¹ Note marginale :/Marginal note:
Prime Minister to sec. R. C[ampbell] 16/9.

4. Later the Prime Minister recognized that there were a number of complicated factors, not the least of which was the question of timing of any United Nations involvement. He then said:

“The United Nations could, to begin with, exercise the function of promoter of an agreement on the Berlin problem by providing a focus for world opinion, which could have the effect of impelling the powers directly concerned to settle their differences by negotiation. Second, the United Nations could, if the powers concerned could be persuaded to agree, act in various roles as observer to verify that any new agreement reached was being fully implemented in accordance with its provision. Third, the United Nations could be assigned the more difficult task of operating an international régime in Berlin.

“The problem is one of selecting the role which is most likely to contribute to the settlement of the Berlin problem in particular circumstances. This means essentially that the role of the United Nations must be related to developments in negotiations toward a settlement. The four powers have primary responsibility in Berlin, and must first enter into direct negotiations. There are some indications at the moment that there is a reasonable prospect of there being negotiations. When I speak of a reasonable prospect, I am not speaking in anticipation of possible success, in view of Mr. Khrushchev’s intrinsic position. If direct negotiations succeed might there be a possibility of providing a role for the United Nations, perhaps as guarantor of the agreement reached.

“It is important to remember that the effective introduction of the United Nations into Berlin could only be done by agreement of all the four powers. I need not say that this may not be easily achieved. Whatever the difficulty might be, I think the little powers and other nations to be affected by the outcome of the Berlin problem have a right to an opportunity to be heard and to place their views clearly before a forum of most of the nations on earth. Furthermore, I can think of the possibility of the United Nations role being that of an observer in the city, or a supervisor on the access routes. Consideration of this possibility might facilitate negotiations and, if the idea were implemented, it might provide a stabilizing element in what is bound to remain a sensitive area throughout the years.”

5. There would be no difficulty about including all these suggestions in the speech in the General Debate. They could be placed in the contest which the Prime Minister emphasized, that of agreement among the four powers as a result of negotiations. Already there is some indication that Mr. Rusk and Mr. Gromyko will be discussing the possibilities for negotiation.

6. If Canada wishes to make some concrete proposal, however, in form of a resolution containing substantive suggestions, it will be necessary to have an item inscribed on the agenda. At this late date, it would have to be an additional item “of an important and urgent character,” under rule 15. Such an item would be submitted to the General Committee and ultimately to the General Assembly for a decision on whether it should be included in the agenda. It would depend on circumstances whether the General Committee and the General Assembly would act favourably on a request for the inscription of an item on Berlin. For example, if the request were made at a time when negotiations would actually be in the offing, there would probably be no disposition to have a debate and the item would not be inscribed. On the other hand, if negotiations had been tried and had failed, member states might wish to have the whole matter aired thoroughly in the Assembly. Of course, if the Berlin situation had actually become a threat to the peace, it would probably be referred to the Security Council in the first instance. Developments like these are more likely to take place later in the session.

7. In the early part of the session, especially if arrangements for negotiations about Berlin appeared not to be materializing, there might be some sentiment in the Assembly in favour of a resolution urging that negotiations be commenced. The uncommitted members, for example, might introduce this kind of proposal, perhaps calling for a summit meeting. The Belgrade Conference has already expressed itself in favour of this. This possibility has been envisaged by the Prime Minister in his suggestion that the United Nations could promote an agreement on Berlin by focussing world opinion and by impelling the powers directly concerned to settle their differences by negotiation. Presumably, a resolution which did no more than call for negotiations could be introduced in the General Debate without any specific item on Berlin. This was the procedure followed last year when the neutral leaders sought to bring about a meeting between President Eisenhower and Mr. Khrushchev. It is doubtful, however, whether such a resolution could contain substantive suggestions as to the role which the United Nations might play in any Berlin settlement.

8. In any event, there have been indications that the Great Powers do not wish the United Nations to inject itself into the situation unless the four powers themselves agree that United Nations participation would facilitate a settlement. Probably the Soviet Union would argue strongly that the Charter precluded United Nations intervention unless the four powers were agreed on it. It seems most unlikely that the uncommitted members would support any proposal to have the United Nations intervene in the face of Soviet opposition. This would be all the more true if the Western great powers and Germany were similarly opposed. In present circumstances, therefore, there seems little likelihood that an initiative involving substantive suggestions could be mounted at the 16th session, especially in the early part. It would depend on the situation later on whether anything could be done.

GERMANY AND BERLIN: SOME REFLECTIONS ON JU-JITSU DATED SEPTEMBER 17

The announcement here that Gromyko will be meeting this week with Mr. Rusk has for the moment created some optimism among Soviet public and has also prompted suggestions by intermediate and lower-level Soviet officials to Western diplomats that the period of danger and difficulties is now past. This reaction of relief is of course excessive and at least very premature. It seems to me quite possible that the preliminary explorations may show that no repeat no real agreed basis for formal negotiations can be found. Alternatively there may be formal negotiations in which the two sides may not repeat not reach any agreement.

2. This may then at best lead to situation in which USSR and some other countries sign separate peace with East Germany, followed by period in which there is in practice little or no repeat no substantive interference with fundamental freedoms of West Berlin and its access routes. Presumably some such result is likely if (a) Soviet leaders become convinced as we hope they will be of firm Western determination to defend West Berlin's communications, and (b) there is nevertheless no repeat no general agreement on a new juridical basis or on settlement of "German" or "Berlin" problem. The resultant situation could go on for a long time, but dangers would remain.

3. In the meantime it is also possible that there will be some deterioration in morale of West Berliners and West Germans from mere fact that Soviet Government and some other countries have signed separate peace treaty with DDR.

4. Above situation may seem probable result if West merely stands firmly pat in present crisis. It would not repeat not be intolerable, but would be far from ideal. Meanwhile various elements in Western position (but perhaps also in DDR position) may gradually be eroded. New crisis may always seem around corner.

5. Above prognosis is based on assumption of Western firmness and on failure of agreement with USSR on any major new proposals, but also on Soviet recognition of danger points and appropriate prudence on vital question of our Berlin access routes.

6. I sometimes wonder whether the West might not repeat not gain more by adopting a jujitsu technique in face of present Soviet demands than from steadfast refusal to budge much from our traditional posture.

7. I was interested that in interview with Drew Pearson,⁴² published here on August 29, Khrushchev in describing his proposals for West Berlin stated "West Berlin government like any sovereign government must have right to maintain diplomatic, economic and cultural ties with any country of any continent." This gives higher status to West Berlin than many interpretations of usual rather vague Soviet references to free city conceived as special autonomous enclave within East German territory.

8. I was also interested that in his speech at Soviet-Indian friendship meeting during Nehru's visit last week Khrushchev appeared to be demanding or at least proposing that DDR as well as West Germany should enter UN. Some Western and neutral ambassadors here have interpreted this not repeat not as further Soviet demand, but as Khrushchev's idea of a compromise which would give DDR international recognition of status, while not repeat not necessitating Western de jure recognition. (Incidentally Pravda's leader of September 19 says UN admission of two German states would be "very beneficial for peace.")

9. Personally I can see considerable disadvantage for West if two Germanies become UN members, and I doubt whether West Germany or other Western powers will accept this.

10. Nevertheless it seems to me that UN membership for three repeat three Germanies (including sovereign city state of West Berlin) might have some real advantages. Much would depend on how this was presented, but it seems to me it could be successfully presented by West as an interim device pending German reunification. Meanwhile it would give vastly enhanced juridical status to West Berliners, and incidentally would under Charter involve tying even neutralists and UNGA itself legally to supporting and defending independence of West Berlin. Conceivably this newly enhanced status for Berlin could offset (and give some substance to Western publicity campaigns designed to reverse) the reported recent decline in morale of West Berlin's population. In UN there would be two German spokesmen to advocate progress towards implementing fundamental principles of self-determination for all Germany against one Communist spokesman, who would probably not repeat not show up very well, voting regularly with other satellites in Soviet Bloc.

11. Taking Khrushchev up on his published suggestion that sovereign West Berlin government would have right to keep diplomatic, economic and cultural ties with any country would make it difficult for him to object to the essential currency and economic union between West Berlin and West Germany, or indeed to any other ties or cooperation on which both sovereign parties agreed and which were not repeat not explicitly precluded in treaty.

12. I assume that a sovereign city state of West Berlin would seek and be granted continued presence of USA, UK and French troops, to guarantee its frontiers, in exchange for agreement that West Berlin itself would not repeat not maintain any military forces. This would be more convincing (because more honest) basis for presence of three power forces than continued reliance on occupation status.

13. I do not repeat not at all like idea of moving UN headquarters from New York to Germany; I am commenting on this in a separate message.† But moving European headquarters of UN, or headquarters of some specialized agencies, might be desirable.

14. I realize that above proposal for three sovereign Germanies, pending voluntary reunification, would stand or fall by reaction of leaders and public opinion of West Berlin and German Federal Republic: but solution along these lines would I think have some significant advantages from their point of view also. It need not repeat not in any way imply abandoning of goal of reunification on basis of self-determination. There have been precedents of sovereign states voluntarily uniting (e.g. Syria and Egypt). It would make easier beginning of Federal German diplomatic relations with Poland and other East European countries which should surely prove advantageous in long run to Germany, to East Europeans, and to West. And it might in practice offer a more promising and less unrealistic prospect of eventual reunification. Incidentally a three-Germanies solution could mean that it would be less ridiculous or inequitable from Western viewpoint to have an all-German committee or commission set up to study questions of contacts and eventual reunification. Representation of three German states on this committee could be equal (i.e. two to one against Communists) or proportional to population.

15. A Western proposal on these lines could be explored along with and if necessary made conditional on some liberalization of (or on undertakings gradually to liberalize) the régime in East Germany, e.g. to allow more freedom of movement across frontier and within sectors of greater Berlin. It might gradually focus pressure on Khrushchev to replace unpopular Stalinist régime of Ulbricht with more national Gromulka-type régime in East Germany. You will recall that German Ambassador Kroll, just after his return from discussions with Adenauer, spoke to me about importance of West seeking to persuade Khrushchev to replace Ulbricht and introduce more liberalized democratized régime in East Germany (my telegram 513 August 2).†

16. Though it would not repeat not be essential, I think such Western offer in formal negotiations could perhaps be coupled with proposal for similar solution of UN membership for two Chinas (that is, mainland China and Formosa) inside UN. I realize that this latter point would be painful for USA, Formosa, Russia and China. Nevertheless it would I think have some substantial advantages for reasons set out in my telegram 509 August 21.† And while it may be overambitious to try to make some progress on China question in the midst of current Berlin crisis which is complicated and worrying enough in itself, there are I think two factors, apart from element of logical analogy, which might favour tying these two questions together at this time. One is that presumably reasonable men in both Communist and Western nations are coming towards what one might call a moment of truth, having been forced (I hope only temporarily) to peer seriously into thermonuclear abyss. This situation may make drastic psychological readjustments for all of us on both sides of Iron Curtain less difficult this winter than is normally the case. Another factor is that the current grave internal difficulties in China may make it harder for Communist Chinese leaders to dissuade Soviet leaders from going along with some such solution. The danger of undermining the prospect of uniting Chinese of Singapore into a greater Malaya seems to me the most serious real objection to the two-China solution, and I do not repeat not want to underestimate it. But fact remains that Western policy in Asia is based on a dangerous fiction that will become increasingly untenable. After we have survived present Berlin crisis we may have to face another and equally dangerous off-shore island crisis (or UN crisis) unless we take steps soon to improve Western posture vis-à-vis mainland China.

17. As far as German question itself is concerned, I realize that the proposal here suggested might unless carefully handled create serious psychological disturbance among Germans. On the other hand it may, once the initial shock is over, strike Germans and others as a more mature and less flimsy solution for continuing peace, stability of Berlin, and progress toward eventual reunification, than some device for merely maintaining status quo at cost of some sort of de facto recognition of East Germany, which would still leave West Berlin in relatively dangerous position.

18. I cannot repeat not predict considered Soviet reactions to this three-Germanies with full UN membership idea. Clearly it would make it much more difficult for Khrushchev, at some stage following signature of separate peace treaty, to start nibbling away at Berlin – a long term plan which he as well as Ulbricht may well be working on in the event that they cannot repeat not get what they want now through negotiations with West. Yet it would give Khrushchev the essence of what he says he seeks, and indeed give it in full measure. It could of course be coupled with technical agreements on cessation of propaganda and espionage centres in West Berlin (and in East Berlin). It would allow Khrushchev to claim to his fellow Communists that he had obtained international recognition of DDR and end of occupation status of Berlin. If it also involved UN membership for China he could claim this as another victory which he had achieved after years in which Mao Tse Tung had failed.

19. Despite all this I think net result would prove more favourable in long run to West than to Communists. Meanwhile several dangerous problems would have been resolved and the two systems of democracy and communism could get on with “peaceful coexistence” and competition, I think we can accept Khrushchev’s challenge on this.

20. The three-Germanies proposal could for tactical purposes be put forward on basis of all Berlin, if desired. This would at least give us something to retreat from, though I do not repeat not expect USSR would buy it, nor personally do I like idea of any intimate administrative cooperation with Communists which seems to me to involve storing up serious trouble for future.

21. I do not repeat not know whether this ju-jitsu approach will commend itself to you – still less to USA, UK, Formosa and Germany. In any case it would seem very desirable that the three-Germanies idea should not repeat not leak prematurely and precipitate an unconsidered denunciation by e.g. any German politicians, particularly during next few weeks of probable intense political party manoeuvring in Bonn. For this reason I am marking this telegram for Canadian Eyes Only in first instance and restricting its circulation to a few posts. I leave question of circulation to other posts on standard Berlin addressee list to department.

UNITED NATIONS – BERLIN

Following comments have been prepared in light of Prime Minister's statement in House of Commons on September 11 in which he discussed possible relationships of UN to Berlin problem and of departmental working papers outlined in telegrams on this subject enumerated in your message S-379 September 11 to our Embassy in Washington. From viewpoint of this post arguments for a UN role in connection with an interim Berlin settlement are particularly cogent. As I have pointed out in previous messages prospect of convincing a really representative majority of UN (including more responsible Africans and Asians) of validity of our case in Berlin as it stands are not repeat not too encouraging. Undoubtedly idea of a new status for Berlin guaranteed by UN would have more appeal. This however is largely a matter of presentation. More significant would be acceptance of principle that in a dispute between great powers threatening peace, UN could play a role in bringing about a settlement. Such a view I am sure would find wide acceptance and would of course be in line with our own consistent support for UN.

2. It is perhaps almost too obvious to state that fundamental question arising at this point would be which Berlin? Our working papers on subject assume that we mean whole of Berlin although we speak in your S-381 September 12† of modifications which would be needed if it were necessary to define status of an independent West Berlin. It is of course highly improbable that Russians would ever accept such a new status for whole of Berlin and Western allies are still apparently a long way from accepting such a status restricted to West Berlin. Nevertheless our ideas as applicable to whole of Berlin do make up a consistent position far more coherent and presentable than status quo. If only from this point of view they would represent a step forward.

3. Assuming however that Russians would not repeat not accept merging of institutions of Communist Berlin with those of West Berlin and that Western powers are not repeat not prepared to sponsor such a régime for West Berlin alone, is there not repeat not possibility of a compromise which could at least be kept in mind as a fall back position if it proved worthy of further exploration? Could one envisage a link between two cities of Berlin which did not repeat not go so far at this stage as unification of their separate institutions and electoral systems but which brought whole unity of Berlin under some measure of UN surveillance? Would it be possible to envisage a statute for whole of Berlin guaranteed by Security Council with a commissioner for Berlin with responsibilities outlined in your working paper but without provision that electoral systems of two Berlins should be merged? In other words, could a UN High Commissioner preside over a divided city? Any such system would have to be based upon Four Power Agreement that this was merely an interim stage towards eventual unification of Berlin. Meanwhile UN High Commissioner might be given responsibility for confirming that freedom of transit exists between population on either side of the sector boundary and for confirming existence of certain minimal human rights and freedoms on both sides of boundary. A high commissioner in such a situation would have to take counsel with civic authorities of East and West Berlin. Perhaps a consultative group from each of two Berlins should be appointed to assist him in his functions.

4. Implementation of such an arrangement would obviously be faced with all kinds of difficulties. Advantage would be that neither East or West Berlin would be asked to merge their political and economic systems at this stage in one single entity.

5. From time to time suggestions have been put forward that some kind of confederal link perhaps a council on which two Germanies were represented could be first embryonic stage towards German reunification. A somewhat similar idea seems to underlie German mixed commissions proposed as part of latest "foreign ministers revision of Western peace plan" as reported in NATO telegram 2323 September 18.† Such ideas in one form or another may have some future significance in relation to problem of German reunification which in our opinion must be a gradual process coming about by stages, if ever. Could same principle but under UN auspices be established as a holding operation in Berlin?

6. I only venture to throw out these ideas because it is difficult to imagine an agreement reached on basis of either whole of Berlin or of West Berlin.

7. Turning to relationship of any statute for Berlin to UN there are a few general comments which occur to me. In first place as you point out such a statute would have to be based upon prior Four Power Agreement. It would have to be clear that it was an interim solution pending reunification of Germany. Thus it would have to be clear also that Four Powers had reached agreement and were calling in UN to see that agreement was implemented. Our working papers suggest UN would have a role of supervision which could come very close to control. It appears to me at first that only organ of UN which could be authorized to perform this role would be Security Council. It would be most undesirable that problems arising out of UN role in guaranteeing and observing a Berlin settlement should be subject to fluctuating majorities of UNGA especially now that Assembly comprises so many countries of Asia and Africa whose primary interests are not repeat not in European problems at all but in their own nationalism and economic development. Such nations might be influenced in their attitude over Berlin by Western (or Soviet) attitude towards their "anti-colonialist" activities and their demands for economic assistance. It would be wrong to place destiny of Berlin and our own NATO engagements at mercy of such a majority.

8. Prior to death of Secretary-General there might have been some hope that Mr. Hammarskjöld with his unique skills in this field could have been entrusted with a wide measure of executive responsibility for any "UN presence" in Berlin although his responsibility would always have had ultimately to be to Security Council. But in present state of affairs any proposal to suggest entrusting any Secretary-General with wide responsibilities in this field would probably be but another stumbling block to negotiations with Soviet Union.

9. There remains Security Council and with it veto but as whole settlement would in any case be dependent on Four Power consent – and in reality on continuing Four Power assent, this is perhaps no repeat no firm objection. If a detailed statute for Berlin could be negotiated you might indeed get a situation in Security Council in which Security Council could not repeat not propose intervention in affairs of Berlin unless there were an unanimous decision to do so (the so-called Vienna type veto).

GERMANY AND BERLIN: 4-POWER FOREIGN MINISTERS' MEETING REPORT

After studying the report to the North Atlantic Council from the 4-Power Meeting in Washington, September 14-16⁴³ contained in NATO telegrams 2321† and 2322† of September 18, I should like to make a few suggestions about points which seem to me might be usefully included in any comment prepared for the guidance of Mr. Léger.

2. In general, from the point of view of preparing a substantive position which might constitute the basis for negotiations with the Soviet Union, this report is disappointing. The revised plan considered by the Four admittedly is "a simple version of the plan established in 1959." As such it could be, I suppose, justified as establishing the maximum possible demands on the Western side for bargaining purposes. However, with the "probing talks" between Mr. Rusk and Mr. Gromyko beginning and the German elections over, the time has come to move from manoeuvring for position to the working out of a possible bargain with the Soviet Union.

3. The elements of such a bargain should be examined by the NATO Council in detail. It goes without saying that the manoeuvring for position will inevitably continue right up until some agreement is made with the Russians or a worse crisis develops through the absence of agreement. In the process of manoeuvring, the Council should watch, however, that the steps taken in this manoeuvring – including measures for contingency planning – should not spark off hostilities accidentally. It is particularly important for the Council to watch [the] disposition forces in Berlin, along the corridors – both air and on the ground – and to see that provocative actions are avoided.

4. M. Spaak's analysis contained in Mr. Léger's telegram 2309 of September 16† should be supported as to general approach, namely, that while it would be impossible for the West to accept a separate treaty and de jure recognition of East Germany, it is essential for the West to maintain the initiative and not merely to respond, as the 4-Power report suggests, by post facto declarations of non-recognition and denunciation to a Soviet separate treaty with East Germany.

5. Likewise M. Spaak's suggestion to concentrate on a provisional solution seems to me sensible. I am not sure however that it is realistic to say that such a provisional solution can be limited to Berlin. After all, Khrushchev has defined the aim of his proposals as being: "... To extinguish by the conclusion of a German peace treaty the smouldering embers left in the centre of Europe after World War Two, to record juridically the existing German frontiers, to bar the way to the dangerous gambles of militarists and revanchists who have again reared their heads in West Germany." Talks therefore with the Russians are bound automatically to broaden. Such a development, while enlarging the scope of what is negotiable, might improve the chances of a bargain, assuming that the Russians have a genuine interest in avoiding war and achieving stability in central Europe, and not merely imposing terms on the West, which they must know they are not in a position to do.

6. The elements of a temporary bargain with the Russians would seem to exclude:

- (a) the reunification of Germany at the present time;
- (b) the acceptance of a separate peace treaty on the terms suggested by the Russians;
- (c) the changing of the free institutions of West Berlin and the exclusion of Western rights including access of civil and military traffic between West Germany and Berlin.

7. What seem to be negotiable are guarantees from the Russian side:

- (a) for the freedom of the people of Berlin to choose their own institutions and forms of government;
- (b) free access for civil and military traffic to Berlin;
- (c) guarantees against unilateral interference with such rights involving the use of the UN, if possible, to observe the implementation of such guarantees both in Berlin and on the access routes.

8. The West should be in a position to offer guarantees in exchange which might include the following:

- (a) guarantees by the West not to change existing frontiers and arrangements for access to Berlin and within Berlin by force with a collateral undertaking among the Four Powers to which the two Germanies would be required to subscribe, that all disputes would have to be raised and settled through negotiations;
- (b) guarantees about keeping at least long-range nuclear weapons out of both parts of Germany, particularly MRBM's – postponement of decision in NATO provides an opportunity;
- (c) guarantees against provocative activities carried out by the West in Berlin, such as broadcasting and intelligence;
- (d) encouragement of de facto contacts between the two Germanies through mixed commissions to adjust day to day issues in dispute in the economic and political fields.

9. It might be possible, in this way while meeting the Russians on their legitimate concerns for security in Central Europe, to arrive at acceptable arrangements for Berlin without a separate treaty with East Germany having to be negotiated and denounced by the West.⁴⁴

In the Council discussions you will, of course, be guided in general by the Prime Minister's speech to the Bar Association on September 1⁴⁵ as well as his further statement about possible UN roles in the House on September 11. The reports given to the North Atlantic Council of the Foreign Ministers' meeting in Washington have been overtaken as a useful basis for detailed discussion in the NATO Council by Khrushchev's talk with Spaak giving certain Soviet suggestions about possible Berlin solutions and the President's speech in the UNGA.

2. Against this background the Four Power report defines the positions which the Four Powers no doubt felt obliged to adopt against the contingency that the Soviet Government signed a separate treaty without prior negotiations and may still be regarded as a tactical first position for bargaining purposes in the manoeuvring which may well go on until the basis of agreement is established.

3. However in view of the important fact that Khrushchev has taken an initiative through Spaak to elucidate a possible basis for a Berlin solution⁴⁶ and President Kennedy has focussed attention on specific and practical problems of access to Berlin and Western rights there, it would be important for the Council to proceed with a careful examination of what might be acceptable in the Khrushchev suggestions in order to help establish a basis of a Western position for negotiation.

4. In particular, careful consideration will have to be given to Khrushchev's idea of effecting a settlement by two peace treaties with elements in common, as well as to the idea of guarantees of the present free status of the citizens of West Berlin and unhindered access along clearly defined routes, which might be specified in both treaties and their implementation supervised by the UN. Obviously the indication that Khrushchev is prepared to discuss guarantees of West Berlin's status and access to that part of the city with the Three Powers, before concluding a separate peace treaty, is a development which should be welcomed and thoroughly explored even if aspects such as the presence of Soviet troops in West Berlin would not be acceptable.

5. Khrushchev's references to the UN in relation to West Berlin are also of interest and merit exploration. They may indicate that the USSR is becoming more receptive to the types of UN responsibility which the P.M. outlined at Winnipeg and in Parliament.

6. One aspect of the modified 1959 peace plan outlined in your telegram 2323† which could now be explored as possibly having a place in any provisional arrangements pending agreement on the re-unification of Germany, would be the setting up of all-German Commissions to deal with practical matters between the two Germanies. Likewise we would hope that attention is paid in any provisional arrangements to the limitation and control of arms in the area, particularly any long-range missiles. The postponement of a decision on MRBM's in NATO might provide an opportunity.

7. Finally, in the period of manoeuvring for position leading to the establishment of a basis for negotiations with the Soviet Union we would hope that the Council will bear in mind its important responsibilities to avoid any provocative action, especially in Berlin and the corridors while maintaining a firm attitude.

GERMANY AND BERLIN

Dated October 4. In my reference telegram I referred to word being put about in Moscow by various Soviet officials to effect that period of danger and difficulties over Berlin is now largely past. I said I regarded any such estimate as excessively optimistic and at least premature. The soothing Soviet line continues, has become more marked in public, but my comment still stands.

2. There has I think been some change in Soviet tactics. Since early September, and corresponding almost exactly I believe with Mr. Nehru's visit here, there has been a noticeable change in Soviet reference to Germany-Berlin problem and to Soviet press treatment of it. Instead of the hard and belligerent words which helped to build up the feeling of crisis during the summer, we have seen Mr. Khrushchev's reassuring words to Paul Reynaud and Spaak⁴⁷ and to some extent also in his interview with Sulzberger.⁴⁸ With the exception of the army paper Red Star, which has continued to print articles by Soviet military leaders on the necessity of preparedness and possibility of war, Soviet press in news reports and editorial comment has tended to emphasize the desirability and the good prospects of negotiations as the means of settling Berlin problem. In a public lecture a few days ago, Soviet official lecturer said categorically that Berlin problem would be settled through negotiation. This is typical of present party line here.

3. Despite these calming noises, I can find no repeat no firm evidence to suggest that there has been any significant change in the substance of Soviet proposals on Germany and Berlin which could lead West to believe that there is now a more reasonable and accommodating Soviet attitude likely to improve the prospects for negotiations if they take place. It still appears that Soviet leaders want and expect negotiation to lead to a solution on Soviet terms.

4. My American and UK colleagues, and most other well informed observers here, share my view that any Western optimism or relaxation at this stage would be premature and dangerous. USA Ambassador Thompson tells me that he thinks recent Western visitors to Moscow have been rather misled by Khrushchev's charm and "taken into camp." Thompson thinks Khrushchev will probably lead us to very brink of thermonuclear war within next few months. British Ambassador's assessment is not repeat not dissimilar.

5. Sir Frank Roberts tells me UK Foreign Office think Gromyko has been more successful in probing American thinking than Rusk has been in probing Soviet intentions. Moreover my impression from what Sir Frank Roberts tells me, confirmed by NATO telegram 2456 September 27, † is that in conversations with Lord Home Gromyko has if anything suggested an increase in Soviet price for guaranteeing freedom of Western communications with West Berlin. To suggest that West should force FGR to undertake new juridical obligation to USSR to limit its arms and engage not repeat not to have nuclear weapons (does this involve carriers?), in exchange merely for Soviet guarantee that West can continue its present communications facilities strikes me as bland effrontery. After recent month's thermonuclear threats by Khrushchev, and unilateral Soviet actions and his declared intentions in East Germany, this would seem amusing if the stakes were not repeat not so serious.

6. Nevertheless the development in Soviet tactics seems significant and worth analysis. It is scarcely disputable that Soviet leaders and Soviet press have during past few weeks been trying at least in public words to play down crisis aspect of Berlin. Perhaps this is merely part of standard Soviet technique of blowing hot and then cold in order to confuse opponents and get them off balance. Or softer public tactics may be designed to improve Soviet posture during general debate at UNGA. There could be other tactical considerations involved. Soviet leaders may have become concerned that Soviet public were on point of becoming genuinely alarmed at prospect of possible war, and that some reduction of internal tension atmosphere was desirable. I think there is some validity in all of these hypotheses, but that change in Soviet tactics may be understood chiefly in terms of the probing and feeling out of each others positions which Khrushchev so frankly described in conversation with Roberts and myself in early August (my telegram 489 August 11). †

7. It is I think possible that until recently Khrushchev seriously thought his thermonuclear threats to UK, France, Italy and various minor Western allies might show up weakness in Western cohesion and even disintegrate Western grouping. Conceivably he thought this might perhaps give him possibility of diplomatic victory to announce at Party Congress later this month. He must now have realized that no repeat no diplomatic victory can be obtained by then, and may also have concluded that public Soviet rocket rattling had been somewhat counter-productive and had tended to unify Western camp and steel Western determination to defend Berlin, and to rally American public opinion behind strong line by Kennedy. This I think would be belatedly realistic and well informed assessment by Khrushchev, who I think tends by nature to overestimate his strength, underestimate Western cohesion, and to gamble providing he has possible line of retreat always open. It seems that under circumstances the present ambiguous situation is about what Khrushchev considers most desirable of those now practically obtainable, as background atmosphere for Party Congress, in which I suspect his main emphasis will be placed on domestic problems and plans, and in which he will seek a free hand in foreign policy field for offering negotiations but determination to "draw line under results of World War II."

8. My impression is that while we are very far from out of the woods, Soviet tactics are relatively flexible. Soviet objectives are far-reaching but they are still probing to see how much they can obtain. They still seek one-sided concessions. But providing West keeps its nerve and realism, and providing miscalculations are avoided (which we cannot repeat not take for granted), we may get realistic, balanced and even useful negotiations. But I think we should not repeat not make one-sided concessions of substance merely in exchange for Soviet agreement not repeat not to interfere with physical status quo (i.e. access to Berlin). We must continue therefore to make it clear and credible that West will use force if this proves to be only way of defending existing freedoms of Berliners.

9. Meanwhile we may have a lull until Party Congress, but either soon thereafter, or if negotiations are prolonged then perhaps only after some months, a more dangerous and critical period seems likely. Incidentally the Warsaw Pact manoeuvres scheduled for October and November may be designed to improve Soviet military posture and step up possible military threat and tension in some weeks time.

10. But I think broad and far-ranging negotiations may conceivably become possible and worthwhile. A very interesting development, it seems to me, is the publication in yesterday's Pravda proposing a wide range of partial disarmament or disengagement agreements. Unless this is merely designed for propaganda appeal for General Assembly purposes, it suggests that Khrushchev may be contemplating possibility of negotiations during next few months on partial disarmament and disengagement topics as well as on German question itself. This would be in line with suggestions frequently made by German Ambassador Kroll, and quite contrary to position taken up earlier this year by Khrushchev of categorically rejecting Bonn's concept of merging consideration of German problem and disarmament. While some of suggestions in Soviet memorandum published in Pravda yesterday are old hat and obviously full of dangerous jokers, from Western viewpoint, some other ideas are I think worth serious consideration. I shall however be commenting on them in a separate message.†

TOP SECRET AND PERSONAL.

Paris, October 6, 1961

Dear Arnold,

I read your letter of September 18 and annexes† with great interest.

I do not disagree with your conclusions (paragraph 9 of your telegram No. 2882 of September 14)† that "Stikker's impression of United States assessment (and attitude) is seriously in error." I don't know enough about the situation in Washington to form a judgment nor am I disposed to participate in a discussion as to whether the expression "on the brink of atomic war" used in public by Mr. Green describes the present situation more accurately than Stikker's expression of "five minutes to twelve" said in private after his visit to Washington. I do however share Stikker's view that the atmosphere as reflected in Council appears to be very different from that in Washington and – for that matter in Ottawa, at least at budget time on the Hill.

I think it would be wise of us at this stage to realize that Western Europe will not face up to nuclear destruction for Berlin. I am even coming to the view that, generally, it will not fight for Berlin. We are faced with a complex situation where one of the leading members of NATO, France, is taking the toughest position in the Western alliance, not because of its strength but because of the glory of its leader. We should not be misled however in thinking that he can get the French off the ground. Such an adventure at this time would be worse than the catastrophe of 1940.

The British are more realistic and more representative of European public opinion. Notwithstanding the brave words of Lord Home, they will insist on negotiation over Berlin. Add to this that the Belgians have notified us that they will go a long way on the road of accommodation, that the Italians cannot even think in terms of mobilization because of their Communists, that the West German attitude is more puzzling than comforting, and it is easy to come to the conclusion that there is no general feeling in Western Europe leading to war over Berlin.

The real deterrent, the only military strength in Western Europe at the moment, is the presence of United States forces and a considerable amount of nuclear power at the disposal of those forces.

There are new factors at play in Western Europe: the "homo economicus," a relatively new species, wishes to protect what he has; there is a growing realization of the uselessness of it all if atomic power is to be used (Western Europe is not shelter conscious); the profound moral dislocation which the last war has created is still very much alive in the generation that normally would be called up to fight. de Gaulle is right when he says that the French Army would not be a good army if it were internationalized to serve under a NATO flag; he is wrong in thinking that it would fight better under a French flag for Berlin. He is not even sure of his generals.

This aloofness need not prevent the United States from taking a firm stand nor for that matter from seeking and indeed obtaining support for such a stand from Western leaders and governments. This is in the realm of words however. If the sequence of events is from forceful declarations by all Allies to the use by the United States of atomic weapons, then the present situation makes sense; if the forceful statements are to be followed in Europe by a very tense and fairly long period involving mobilization and serious sacrifice on the part of the population, we should be clear that we are in for a shock.

These comments give the impression that the Alliance is rather shaky. This is partly true. The Western Europeans are neither geared to a conventional war nor to atomic destruction. But the Americans have built up considerable power and this may be sufficient to keep the Soviets at bay and the Western Europeans in harness.

It would be good to discuss all this with you.

I am sending copy of this letter to Norman [Robertson].

Yours sincerely,

GERMANY AND BERLIN

The Prime Minister has approved the following paper on Germany and Berlin for your guidance while discussing the Berlin crisis with Foreign Minister and other ministers of West German Government upon your return. To assist you in these discussions, following points have been drawn up on basis of statements made by the Prime Minister and myself about the Berlin problem.

2. German Government officials will be aware from reports German Embassy here has submitted of the great interest Canadians are taking in Berlin problem. They will be aware that Canadian public has been asking, what are Canadian commitments in Berlin? What are possible peaceful solutions to problem of Berlin?

3. In public discussions in Canada there seems to have been little dissent from point made by Prime Minister that West is unreservedly committed to freedom and security of people of West Berlin, to unrestricted access to city, and to right of three Western powers to maintain troops in West Berlin.

4. On the other hand, public discussion seems to have revealed that there are various points which could be regarded as negotiable. It is, of course, difficult, as German ministers well know, to define public opinion with any hope of great accuracy. However, many Canadians clearly believe that well prepared Four Power negotiations can lead to a satisfactory settlement and that the sooner such negotiations begin, the more satisfactory to the West any settlement will be and the less will be the risk of war.

5. To obtain guarantees of essentials, it appears to be general Canadian view that the West should be ready to move away from traditional stands such as those which maintain that Western position in Berlin should continue to be based upon rights of conquest or that question of Germany's borders must await reunification.

6. The Prime Minister and I have outlined what Canadian Government considers to be non-negotiable elements in Berlin problem and some of the considerations which might be borne in mind when peaceful solutions are being reviewed.

7. To accept without guarantees the Soviet plan to turn over control of access to West Berlin to East Germans would place the West Berliners at mercy of the GDR. Moreover, retreat in Berlin would mean that pledged word of the West would be called in question everywhere in the world. The Berlin problem must not, therefore, be seen solely as a German problem but rather in the light of its implications for free world as a whole.

8. The Canadian Government believes that West should maintain a flexible negotiating position. Any final solution is bound to contain elements distasteful to NATO members, particularly Federal Republic of Germany, as well as features unpalatable to USSR. At the same time, the Canadian Government accepts need for a united and determined stand on the part of NATO, a stand which includes military preparations for all possible contingencies and which demonstrates Western determination to stand by its pledges.

9. Question of possible solutions to Berlin problem is, of course, extremely complex and needs constant review in light of changing circumstances. The Canadian Government is no more in a position to advance final solutions than any other NATO member is. However, it has attempted to explore various avenues leading to possible Four Power Agreement (which is, of course, a precondition of any satisfactory solution).

10. One such avenue is the UN, possibly arrangements for the whole of the city or, failing that, for West Berlin alone. It would, of course, be difficult to persuade the USSR to agree to any international arrangement covering East as well as West Berlin. However, there is value in putting forward a plan for the whole of the city as a negotiating position.

11. One such plan might call upon the Four Powers to transfer their sovereignty over Berlin to the U.N. pending unification of Germany when Berlin would again become the capital of Germany.

12. The transfer to U.N. of sovereignty over Berlin would of itself end occupation status of Berlin and terminate all rights and obligations flowing from that occupation status. Henceforth the rights and obligations of the Four Powers with respect to Berlin would be derived from new agreement between them.

13. The transfer to the U.N. of sovereignty over Berlin would also, of course, internationalize Berlin. In addition there might be a U.N. presence in Berlin. This might consist at least of a U.N. High Commissioner in Berlin, token U.N. forces, and U.N. observers on access routes and in Berlin to verify that the Four Power Agreement on Berlin was being implemented.

14. Western troops would remain in Berlin until either the people of Berlin requested their withdrawal or the Four Powers agreed to withdraw them. This might well mean that the USSR would also have right to maintain forces in Berlin.

15. The Four Power Agreement should set forth clearly rights of access to Berlin over GDR territory. Perhaps operation of access routes could be observed by U.N. representatives or a U.N. agency might at least be given right to establish fair and reasonable tolls for use of routes and to help settle disputes arising over their use.

16. The foregoing outline is a package plan which might not be acceptable as a whole. It is, however, possible to contemplate various more limited roles, should it not be practicable to secure transfer of Berlin's sovereignty to the U.N.

17. The Four Power Agreement should provide that all Germans should have right to visit Berlin. Soviet Government may not agree to this if it means that Berlin can once again become an escape hatch from East Germany to the West.

18. A free city state of Berlin could be declared neutral. This means it could not join any military or political alliance. But it should have power to enter into economic, social and cultural agreements with other countries. This might permit it to be associated with West German customs and monetary union.

19. The Four Power Agreement on Berlin could be embodied in a U.N. statute which would be adopted by Security Council and General Assembly of U.N. and be approved by people of Berlin. The statute should provide that it could neither be terminated before Germany is unified nor be amended except with approval of people of Berlin and of Security Council. This would mean that it could not be terminated or amended except with approval of all Four Powers.

20. It seems probable that Soviet Government would agree to such a settlement on Berlin only if it were part of a package deal, net effect of which would be to stabilize situation in Eastern Europe. If in the course of negotiations it became clear that USSR would not repeat not agree to such an arrangement for the whole of the city, some elements in it might apply to West Berlin alone.

21. The West, for instance, might explore possibility of a compromise providing for freedom of movement between East and West Berlin and a joint administration of such civic services as electricity, water, sewage, transportation, telephone, fire. A U.N. High Commissioner, responsible to the Security Council, could preside over a consultative council composed of representatives from the two Berlins. He would confirm that the provisions of the agreement on Berlin were being implemented. Under this compromise proposal Western troops would remain in West Berlin but no repeat no Soviet troops would, of course, be allowed there. Western access over GDR territory would be precisely defined and the UN might be of assistance in this respect.

22. The USSR has made much of allegations about nuclear armament of the Federal Republic and of West German "militarism and revanchism." At present NATO decisions on the positioning of MRBMs in Western Europe have been deferred. This circumstance, though not repeat not stemming from Berlin situation, might provide an opportunity for consideration whether, in any Four Power negotiations on Berlin, Russians might not repeat not yield something of substance in exchange for assurances that MRBMs would not repeat not be based in Western Europe, including the Federal Republic. If, as part of such a bargain, Russians were asked to agree to refrain from stationing MRBMs on their side, it would be essential that they accept suitable controls.

23. (For information addressees: This telegram was drafted when our Ambassador in Bonn was recently on leave in Ottawa. It is being sent to you for information and comments only. You should not repeat not discuss it with the Government to which you are accredited without my prior approval.)⁴⁹

After reading my telegram 2653 October 14† reporting on Council discussion yesterday I think you will agree that Canadian views as outlined in your reference telegram will have to be focussed differently if they are to have maximum impact on next round of deliberations here. I

⁴⁹ Note marginale :/Marginal note:

See memo dated Oct. 18/61† on this file & also tel. S-448 of Oct. 19/61. † In view of comments received from our NATO delegation, the Minister decided on Oct. 18/61 to instruct the Ambassador in Bonn (Mr. Reid) to defer any action on S-437 for the time being. [Auteur inconnu/Author unknown] very much hope therefore that no repeat no "piece of paper" will be left with Foreign Office in Bonn or any other capital at this stage. Even if all possible precaution is taken (paragraph 10 reference telegram) such a document will find its way to many capitals and be labelled as the "Canadian plan." In reviewing the situation following comments may be of assistance.

(a) Western Rights in Berlin

2. In paragraph 3 reference is made to the point made by Prime Minister that "West is unreservedly committed ... to right of Three Western Powers to maintain troops in West Berlin." Paragraph 5 partly reads "it appears to be general Canadian view that West should be ready to move away from traditional stands such as those which maintain that Western position in Berlin should continue to be based upon rights of conquest ..."

3. Rights of Three Western Powers to maintain troops in West Berlin derive from their rights of conquest. One will go with the other unless a new arrangement is negotiated. For the moment French refuse to consider alternative. West Germans support them. Until an alternative has been found that proves acceptable to the Alliance I suggest that West must hold to what it has, in other words to hold to position outlined by Prime Minister referred to earlier. Alternative arrangement is likely to prove acceptable to Washington and London earlier than to Paris and Bonn. USA and UK should be warned and preferably convinced first of wisdom of any course of action we intend to take if exercise is to be productive.

(b) Germany's Border

4. Only comment on this issue is in paragraph 5 where it is suggested that West should be ready to move away from "traditional stands such as ... that of question of Germany's border." In view of importance of this question Canadian position will have to be further developed.

(c) UN Role

5. Canadian views on the role of UN (paragraphs 10 to 21) will be very helpful in future discussions here. We would welcome clarification on following issue:

(i) It is taken for granted here that USSR will not repeat not agree to any arrangement either under UN control or otherwise for the whole Berlin and that realistically discussions should centre on West Berlin only. UN scheme for all Berlin, outlined in paragraph 5 under reference, is unrealistic when applied to West Berlin only. Indeed this is already foreseen in paragraph 16 reference telegram.

(ii) No repeat no reference is made to the transfer to West Berlin of UN agencies. Has proposal been overlooked or are we now opposed to it? It is likely that matter is to be mentioned very shortly in Council and it would be helpful to have your views.

(iii) Transfer of sovereignty over Berlin to UN, as outlined in paragraphs 11, 12, 13 and 14, is not repeat not acceptable to several members of Council. In any event major modifications will have to be made if arrangement is for West Berlin only. Some intermediary formula will have to be thought out. Too exclusive a role for UN at the expense of the Four Powers may not repeat not necessarily create a healthier situation in Europe. I am not repeat not making a case for maintenance of occupation rights but I think it would be going too far too fast to press that such rights be immediately and completely transferred to UN. This is not repeat not necessarily in the interest of the West. Further, UN may not repeat not be equipped nor ready to assume such responsibility. Even if we do not repeat not like it we cannot repeat not ignore that one of the main parties to the problem, France, has no repeat no use for UN and that another one, Germany, is not repeat not even a member of the UN. In circumstances intermediary formula will have to be devised.

(d) Military Dispositions

6. Your paragraph 22 concerns NATO's military dispositions. It is somewhat misleading to suggest that "NATO decisions on the positioning of MRBMs in Western Europe have been deferred." MRBMs are already in position in Western Europe e.g. in Italy, Greece, Turkey and UK. It is not repeat not these MRBMs but the MRBMs proposed in General Norstad's force goals for the end [19]66 period which are under discussion. There has been a suggestion from USA that decision on these particular MRBMs be deferred. You will note from our recent reports however that German delegation has opposed this deferral. Other delegations, while not repeat not taking such a direct stand as Germans, have gone on record that their support of deferral of a decision is not repeat not to be taken as an indication that their governments would eventually decide against the provision of these MRBMs. USA delegation has indicated that a similar view prevails in Washington. All that can be said at the moment therefore is that the provision of additional MRBMs for Western Europe remains under consideration.

7. Later in the paragraph mention is made of "assurances that MRBMs would not repeat not be based in Western Europe." Whatever may be the eventual decision with respect to the additional MRBMs request by SACEUR there will still exist the problem as to whether or not repeat not those countries in which MRBMs are now stationed would or should give them up. It should be borne in mind as well that USA, already had assigned a sea based MRBM, the Polaris, to duty off Western European shores and plans to assign further such Polaris to this general area. These MRBMs will eventually pose the same threat to USSR as would be posed by land based MRBMs in Europe. We think it highly unlikely that USA would agree to bargain away these MRBMs at least until its long range missiles can take over the same functions.

8. If then there is any likelihood of an exchange of agreements with respect to MRBMs it would at least in initial stage only be possible to consider the additional MRBMs requested in SACEUR's most recent force proposals. MRBMs already positioned in Europe and Polaris would be excluded. We do not repeat not see much likelihood of a European agreement even with this limitation. In this context the phrase "on their side" used in your telegram with respect to Russian restraints presents real difficulties. USSR by reason of its geographical position can from Russian heartland reach Europe with short range missiles. On the other hand USSR cannot repeat not be reached with the same type of missiles from USA, the main base of Western missile strength. Hence the requirement for the strengthening of SAC forces, speed up of USA long range missile programme, the development of Polaris and finally stationing of MRBMs in Europe. It would be our preliminary view that any bargain along lines of that suggested in paragraph 22 of your telegram would have to include restraints on Russian positioning of MRBMs well into Soviet heartland. This would bring us far on the road of disarmament but the road has yet to be built.

9. In summary then it appears to us that there is no repeat no reasonable basis for assuming that a bargain involving a prohibition on the stationing of MRBMs on both sides of the Iron Curtain can be struck at this time. In this general context it seems to us that one of the bases for negotiations and on which we think should be discussed very soon would be along the lines of

General Norstad's proposals for an inspection and control scheme to reduce the danger of surprise attack in Europe made originally in 1957 and brought up to date in January 1960.⁵⁰

GERMANY AND BERLIN: INTERVIEW WITH BRENTANO

In my half hour interview with Brentano yesterday afternoon, October 18, I spoke along the same general lines as I had to Carstens, emphasizing UN aspects. In the light of Carstens' reaction I left out reference to the idea about all Germans having free access to Berlin. I took special care when mentioning moving away from traditional stands on rights of conquest in Berlin and on the Oder-Neisse line, to emphasize that I was talking about an assessment of Canadian public opinion not repeat not of government thinking. When I went on to talk about the approach of the Prime Minister and yourself to an accommodation on Berlin I emphasized that I was not repeat not talking about government policy but about ideas the government considered worth exploring. When I came to the role UN might play I said I had been most interested to learn that Berg had the day before publicly urged the internationalization of the access routes to Berlin which would involve UN participation. (Fritz Berg is the influential Head of the German Federation of Industry.)

2. Brentano said he was very happy to have this elucidation from me. He had read with great interest the speeches by the Prime Minister and yourself and was in fundamental agreement with the line which had been taken. These speeches had been very helpful. He then went on to express his own views on three main issues, in each case emphasizing that he was expressing his personal views but adding that he thought that these would also be the views of the German Government.

3. He also made clear that what he was talking about was a fall back position and that Germany could accept the three concessions he mentioned only if they formed part of an agreement in which each side had made equal concessions.

4. The three points were

(1) Possible New Legal Basis for Berlin. He was prepared to have the West negotiate on a new legal basis for Berlin under which the original occupation rights for Berlin would be replaced by a multilateral agreement.

(2) Oder-Neisse Line. Germany recognized that there could be no repeat no change in the Oder-Neisse line until a free Germany is a neighbour of a free Poland. Moreover he believed that Khrushchev would not repeat not pay one cent for German recognition of the Oder-Neisse line. Nevertheless he was prepared if necessary to agree that Germany would renounce the right to any change in the Oder-Neisse line unless this change was the result of a freely negotiated understanding between a free Germany and a free Poland which to be effective would have to be approved by the Allies and UN and would be guaranteed by the Allies and UN. He said that by making such a renunciation Germany would be going even further than if it were to recognize the Oder-Neisse line de jure.

(3) UN. He picked up the point I had made about the responsibilities which a UN High Commissioner might have over the whole of Berlin even though the city remained divided (paragraph 21 of your telegram S-437 of October 11). He said that theoretically a solution was conceivable under which a UN High Commissioner for the whole of Berlin would initially supervise the two separate parts of Berlin and that gradually, as time went on, lines of communications would be established between these two parts.

5. He agreed that it had been a great mistake of many Western spokesmen to refer publicly to a settlement of the problem of West Berlin. They should most certainly refer to the problem of Berlin. Brentano, like Carstens, appeared to be prepared, as part of a price for a free united Berlin, to have the sovereignty of Berlin vested in UN pending the unification of Germany.

6. At the end of our talk Brentano made clear that what he was expressing was his approach to a fall back position and it was essential that the other side not repeat not learn of Western ideas on fall back positions. He ended his exposition by saying that if negotiations were opened with USSR with these objectives in mind Germany would not repeat not oppose; it was the results which would be decisive. There was not repeat not time for me to seek an elucidation of this caveat.

7. I said that I knew the Prime Minister and you would be most grateful to him for his frankness in speaking to me and that we would consider that the views he had expressed were, for the time being, between ourselves.

8. I shall later be sending you my views on the significance of the reaction of Brentano and Carstens to the probing inherent in my exposition of Canadian thinking.

9. It would, I suggest, not repeat not be helpful, for the present at least, to pass on to other governments what Brentano and Carstens have said.

BERLIN; POLICY CONCERNING ECONOMIC COUNTER MEASURES
 (Previous reference Oct. 12)

14. The Secretary of State for External Affairs referred to a proposal being examined by the N.A.T.O. Council that member governments should take the necessary action immediately to enable them to carry out concerted economic counter-measures against the Soviet bloc should access to West Berlin be stopped.

He felt the proposed counter-measures would have a more disadvantageous effect on Canada than on most other N.A.T.O. countries from the point of view of trade and credit arrangements. Only Turkey, Greece and Iceland would stand to lose more in these respects.

The Canadian government had been asked,

- (a) its views concerning the usefulness of economic sanctions;
- (b) whether Canada would participate if such sanctions were to be concerted;
- (c) whether it felt the situation would warrant a total automatic embargo against the Soviet Union;
- (d) whether it had the power to apply these measures or would take action to obtain such power;
- (e) whether it considered that a threat to apply economic sanctions should be announced in advance;
- (f) whether it was agreeable to provide economic assistance to those countries adversely affected by the imposition of economic counter-measures.

He added that Canada had also been asked whether it would agree to certain economic measures in case of a partial interference with access to Berlin.

An explanatory memorandum had been circulated, (Minister's memorandum, Sept. 6—Cab. Doc. 344-61).

15. During the discussion the following points were made,

- (a) Some said the government could [not] invoke the War Measures Act unless it was felt at least that a state of war was apprehended.
- (b) Others said that they did not think economic counter-measures would be effective.
- (c) It was said that, the N.A.T.O. Council was not being given much information by Great Britain, France and the United States about the military steps they proposed to take if access routes were closed.
- (d) It was revealed that there was a plan to send in aircraft escorted by fighters and to probe the corridor in battalion strength until opposition was encountered.

16. The Cabinet decided that the government should make no commitment to participate in economic counter-measures in respect of the Berlin situation until access to Berlin was denied. This would include any advance commitment in respect of the denial of air traffic rights to aircraft from Soviet bloc countries.

GERMANY AND BERLIN

As you know, USA Ambassador Thompson returned to Moscow last Wednesday. I had dinner with him that night and further talk two days later. Contrary to press reports he did not repeat not bring back instructions to undertake further exploratory talks at this time with Russians on possible basis for an agreement on Berlin. His government decided that he should begin these talks only after they had sent him new instructions which would be based on discussions Americans hoped to have with Germans in the near future. I understand USA Government considered it essential to make a further effort to get a concerted position agreed not repeat not only with UK but with Adenauer and if possible with de Gaulle. Americans were of course exasperated by de Gaulle's obduracy on procedure "which might make sense if we were all dictatorships but not repeat not otherwise," but they believed that the key to bringing around de Gaulle would lie in first getting American agreement with Adenauer. Meanwhile this has of course been delayed by the difficulties in getting formation of a new German Government.

2. Thompson told me that his government was not repeat not now disposed to put too much pressure on FGR, or to force them to accept concessions which in their judgment might not repeat not be wise. The one exception to this was that Americans are prepared, providing suitable agreement on other points can be found, to offer recognition for Oder-Niesse line, even if Germans refuse this point. On the question of status of Berlin Americans foresaw great difficulty in getting Germans to agree to forego the position, enshrined in FGR constitution, that West Berlin has representation within FGR political structure, which would be difficult to get around if the occupation status should lapse. But Thompson thought USA would press Germans hard on this, which he thought they had a right to do so long as it was Americans who had to bear the brunt of local defence in West Berlin. Thompson was interested in the possibility of some UN status for West Berlin but as I say doubtful that Germans would accept it.

3. Thompson said Americans intended to insist that an agreed solution should include provision for a controlled autobahn for Western access rights to West Berlin.

4. Thompson said Americans did not repeat not now intend to accept discriminatory limitation on West German armaments. Some safeguards against surprise attack might be possible. So might an agreement with USSR that Western nuclear powers would not repeat not give nuclear weapons (i.e. warheads) to Germans. This latter would have to be balanced by a corresponding undertaking by Russians not repeat not to give nuclear weapons to China. Thompson was doubtful that China would be willing to go along with a self-denying undertaking not repeat not to produce or acquire nuclear weapons. But he thought that unilateral declarations by USA, UK, France and USSR not repeat not to pass nuclear warheads to non-nuclear powers might suffice.

5. At various times in past few months Thompson has mentioned to me that he thinks a non-aggression pact between NATO and Warsaw Pact might in last analysis prove acceptable to USA and other Western governments and might be very welcome to USSR and make it possible for Khrushchev to accept a reasonable compromise agreement.

6. But on the whole Thompson was not repeat not very optimistic that FGR would accept terms that would make any formal agreement with Russians possible. We might therefore come down to what he called "Solution C," a declaration by DDR after separate peace treaty with USSR that they would allow Western access to West Berlin to continue as hitherto, and a declaration by USA and other Western powers that they would allow East German personnel to carry out those control or checking practices hitherto carried out by Russians.

7. Last Friday Sir Frank Roberts, UK Ambassador, returned from consultations in London with instructions completely inconsistent on timetable and procedure to the instructions given to Thompson. Roberts had detailed instructions to conduct discussions with Gromyko in support of discussions which UK Government erroneously understood or assumed Thompson would be undertaking forthwith with Gromyko. UK Government had not repeat not expected Thompson to wait for German and French acquiescence. Roberts has therefore had to wire his government that his instructions will have to be reconsidered in view of USA position.

8. I had a long talk also with French Ambassador de Jean, who makes it clear that he personally, and I gather also Laloy and Couve de Murville, are unhappy at de Gaulle's refusal to participate in discussions on this whole question with USA and UK. De Jean too hopes de Gaulle will be brought around after the projected Adenauer-Kennedy talks.

9. Meanwhile, as you know, last weekend the whole situation was complicated by increased tension in Berlin caused by DDR demands that American and French civilian officials show their passes. Thompson called on Gromyko to protest this, but tells me he had a very rough time indeed. Gromyko put in a counter protest, and I understand based his case on insistence that Americans would have to recognize East German sovereignty on this question. In Thompson's view this Soviet position, if persisted in, would make an agreement on the bigger question of the status of West Berlin and its access much more difficult, and indeed may well make agreement impossible. Thompson tells me American Government is not repeat not now at all disposed to give anything in the way of very substantial de facto recognition to DDR.⁵¹

BERLIN: ECONOMIC COUNTER-MEASURES

The sense of the Cabinet's decision on October 23 to make no commitment to participate in economic counter-measures in respect of the Berlin situation, including any advance commitment to deny air traffic rights to Soviet bloc aircraft, was conveyed by Mr. Léger to Mr. Stikker, the Secretary-General, prior to the Council Meeting on October 31. You are already aware that Mr. Stikker was very disturbed about the Canadian decision and asked that you be informed of his concern.

2. I now wish to report on subsequent developments.

3. Among other things, the Council considered the following three special civil aviation counter-measures:

- (1) Closure of NATO airports to Soviet bloc aircraft,
- (2) Prevention of transit overflights and technical stops by Soviet bloc aircraft in NATO countries,
- (3) Prohibition against NATO country aircraft calling at Soviet bloc airports, and all member countries except Canada agreed to accept these for planning purposes. In the discussion of Canada's position, Mr. Léger pointed out "that there were two political decisions to be taken. The first had to be taken now in subscribing to the draft decision and the second at the moment of a crisis. I considered that there was an important difference between the Canadian position and the position of the other governments of the alliance in that Canadian authorities were not prepared to take the first decision at this time. I went on to say that I did not believe Canadian authorities would wish this to be considered as a veto and that I hoped Canadian authorities would also be prepared to continue to cooperate in planning within the alliance. On this last point I told Council I would have to seek further instructions."⁵²

4. I should be grateful for your guidance on what instructions should be sent to Mr. Léger on this point.

5. The present situation is that Council has adopted the decision on the three civil aviation counter-measures and has agreed to leave the further study of the implications of the Canadian reservation to private conversations between the Secretary-General and Mr. Léger.

6. The Council also considered the interim report of the Working Group on partial economic counter-measures. Except for the Canadian and Portuguese, all delegations were able to reply, and it now seems clear that most governments are prepared to agree in principle to the imposition of partial counter-measures in the event of a blockade of West Berlin, and the majority of governments either have or are in the presence of acquiring the legal powers to do so.

7. Meanwhile, this Working Group is under a two-week deadline to assemble from member countries written replies to a list of questions about partial economic counter-measures, and

⁵² Note marginale :/Marginal note:
OK. [Howard Green]

Mr. Léger has enquired whether, in the light of your wish not to make a written response to the list of basic questions, he should or should not submit a written statement of the factual situation, quite divorced from the questions of policy or intention. To assist you in considering this I have annexed the list of basic questions together with draft replies,† should you decide to authorize Mr. Léger to submit them; I see some advantage in following this course.⁵³

8. I would also report that Mr. Stikker has already held some discussions with Mr. Léger on the broad implications of the Canadian position. You have seen telegram No. 2859 of November 1 (attached)† indicating that he is working on the text of a draft decision on the question of a total blockade under which Council would agree “to meet to decide, as appropriate, and acting with the guidance of governments, what action would be taken.” Mr. Stikker thought that this text should go a considerable way towards meeting the Canadian Government’s preoccupations, and he is seeking to clear it with the British and American Delegations. I should appreciate your comments on this suggestion.⁵⁴

9. Mr. Stikker also thought that his suggested formula could apply to civil aviation partial counter-measures if this would facilitate acceptance by the Canadian Government of Council’s decision. This point would naturally have to be cleared at a later stage and approved by Council since it would require the amendment of the decision already agreed upon by all countries except Canada.⁵⁵

10. Little progress is being made in the study in the Committee of Economic Advisers on mitigation of the economic impact of an embargo. Discussion will be resumed on November 9, and Mr. Léger has also asked for instructions on the extent to which the Delegation can continue to cooperate in the detailed work on economic counter-measures, within the terms of the Cabinet’s decision. I should welcome your views on what guidance should be given to Mr. Léger on participation in the study on mitigation of economic consequences for countries like Greece and Turkey.

11. You may also wish to bear in mind that the subject of economic counter-measures will almost certainly be raised and discussed by the NATO Ministers in the course of the December meeting.⁵⁶

Dear Mr. President,

It has been with interest and pleasure that I have learned of the visit to Washington of Dr. Adenauer on November 20-21. I am sure that during your talks with him, you will be discussing the Berlin problem and in particular, whether to negotiate at this time with the USSR and, if so, what the Western position should be. During your conversations, you will probably have in mind the message which the North Atlantic Council has decided to send to the Ambassadorial steering group in Washington.

You will recall that the message from the North Atlantic Council urges that negotiating positions be developed as soon as possible and that they be aimed at an understanding with the Russians about access rights to Berlin and the status of the city. The Council also agreed that negotiations begin as soon as possible and that, to this end, contacts with the Russians should be resumed.

I am in full agreement with this decision of the North Atlantic Council. It seems to me that opposition to negotiations with the Soviet Union over the Berlin problem is both untenable and even dangerous in the long run. Time appears to me to be against us. The policy of attrition of Western rights in Berlin which the East German régime has already embarked upon will likely continue until negotiations begin or until a truly dangerous situation occurs between Western and Soviet troops in Berlin.

Naturally we are concerned about the implications for West Germany of approaches to the Soviet Union which may involve the fate of Berlin and of Germany itself. Similarly, we recognize that a distinction must be made between essential Western interests which are not negotiable and initial tactical positions. Nevertheless, it seems to me that German and Western interests generally should be at one in ensuring that there is sufficient flexibility in the Western position to allow reasonable prospects of success in negotiating improvements in the Berlin situation. I hope that, as we approach negotiations, this flexibility will not disappear and that we do not become increasingly inhibited in our concepts of what is negotiable and what is not.

NATO PLANNING FOR BERLIN

The Prime Minister has approved the following comments in relation to the Secretary-General's paper PO/61/809 which we understand will be up for discussion in the Council in the near future. These comments are based on the assumption which appears to be made in the Secretary-General's paper (paragraph 6) – that, in regard to any decisions to be taken in respect of NATO plans which are drawn up, the “rule of unanimity for NATO action is the present position.”

2. It is clear from Mr. Stikker's paper, as far as NATO planning for Berlin contingencies is concerned, that the reference to “political authorities” in paragraph 6 of Annex B should be interpreted as referring to the NATO Council as an instrument for conveying the decisions of governments. In addition, the “specific political decision” referred to in paragraph 6(d)(3) and the approval and implementation procedures in paragraphs 7 and 8 are interpreted by Canada as meaning that all plans before implementation have to be approved by governments and that the execution of approved plans will be “the subject of decisions by governments at the time.”

3. For the purpose of dealing with military planning in connection with the Berlin situation, it is important that it is clearly understood that the final responsibility both for approval of plans and for decisions to implement them should rest with governments who will express their views through their permanent representatives in the NATO Council and that no delegation of governmental authority in such crucial matters can be contemplated. Provided this is understood, Canada can accept the interpretation placed on these paragraphs by the Secretary-General.

4. Bearing in mind the conclusion in the Secretary-General's paper that "it is in the Council that the will of governments will be expressed by the permanent representatives," we believe that the Council should consider what measures are required to enable it to deal effectively and expeditiously with such important questions in the event of an emergency.

Washington, November 22, 1961

Dear Jules [Léger],

I never did answer your very interesting – and sobering – letter of October 6 which was stimulated by Stikker's reports of the Washington atmosphere when he was here.

It seems to me that, despite the active diplomacy in many places since your letter was written, the situation has really changed remarkably little since you wrote. While it would seem from this vantage point that the NATO countries are inclined somewhat to take the imminence of danger more seriously, there remain unhappily the major elements of disarray as between Bonn-Paris, on the one side, and London-Washington on the other. Then too, Washington's current guest, the old Chancellor, is in a much weaker position and your local great man seems, on this his 71st birthday, to have lost a good deal of his support among the intellectuals and France seems almost more divided than ever.

I wish that we could have a talk but I see no immediate prospect of it. I read your messages with great interest and realize how heavy and responsible your present task is. The week before last, I was at the United Nations when Tommy Burns recorded our abstention on the resolution for prohibition of nuclear weapons. Finletter's tough words in the Council described pretty accurately what I have learned to be the reaction in top U.S. circles. Our American friends simply cannot understand why we voted as we did – or failed to – and I now see that it has been decided that we should maintain the same attitude in the plenary.

It is certainly a difficult task to hold this Alliance together. Sometimes I think the Americans will "weary in well-doing." If we can't do it when we are frightened, how can we manage when Khrushchev smiles again? It is all very difficult.

Yours ever,

A.D.P. HEENEY

BERLIN: ECONOMIC COUNTERMEASURES

The British Deputy High Commissioner, Mr. Fowler, called on Mr. Ritchie yesterday and informed him that the Four Powers intend to submit to the NATO Council the following resolution:

“The Council has decided that in the event military and civilian access, air or ground, to West Berlin is blocked, the immediate imposition of significant countermeasures amounting to a total economic embargo against the Soviet bloc would be an appropriate response. The NATO countries are planning their concerted participation in such an effort. In the event that blockage appears to be substantially complete, the Council will meet and as appropriate, acting under guidance of governments, will consider whether in fact such blockage has taken place and what the timing of the total embargo should be, in the light of all the circumstances of the moment and in support of military, political and psychological action being undertaken.”

It is not clear whether this new resolution will be discussed prior to the NATO Ministerial Meeting, but it seems likely to become the focal point of discussion on this subject at the Meeting.

2. The new resolution is said to have been accepted by Britain, the United States and France (– the Germans are expected to accept within the next few days –) apparently as a compromise following upon the NATO Council’s failure to agree on the first two “basic issues” of a total economic embargo. You will recall that when these issues were discussed in the Council a number of countries expressed reservations particularly concerning the proposal that “a total economic embargo should be applied automatically.” The British representative said that his Government would have to be consulted after the NATO Council had decided on the facts of the blocking of access to West Berlin. The Norwegian representative concurred and said that his Government would not agree in advance to suspend political judgment. The Secretary-General was instructed to search for a compromise formula and he subsequently informed Mr. Léger in confidence that he hoped to secure acceptance of a wording whereby, in the event of access being blocked, the NATO Council would agree “to meet to decide, as appropriate, and acting with the guidance of governments, what action should be taken.” You will recall that we instructed Mr. Léger to inform the Secretary-General that we could accept this formula provided that the word “guidance” was replaced by “approval” or “instructions” in order to remove any possible doubt that the Council decision could only be taken with the full approval of all member governments.

3. The resolution now proposed goes considerably beyond the Secretary-General’s formula. It involves agreement in principle that a total embargo would be an “appropriate response” to the blocking of access to West Berlin and it commits governments to that response, leaving the NATO Council to decide subsequently only on the question of whether or not the appearance of a complete blockade is in fact the situation and when the total embargo should be imposed.

4. Mr. Fowler said that his Government, which considered its basic attitude to be very similar to that of the Canadian Government, would be most interested to receive our comments on the proposed resolution. He said that his Government had come to accept the draft resolution in the realization that the United States might otherwise turn toward an undesirable emphasis on military measures alone. British representatives had made clear that their Government would not agree to a full embargo unless war appeared to be actually imminent. They stressed that the embargo should be used as a final political warning which might serve as a deterrent to the Soviet bloc countries by persuading them that the West intended to stand firm. Britain did not consider that the resolution created any binding or automatic commitment to impose a total embargo.

5. The United States was reported to have shown little enthusiasm for the resolution but to have accepted it as a compromise in the expectation that other related questions would be settled satisfactorily. In particular the United States expected all NATO members to adhere to the resolution on air traffic countermeasures. The United States had noted that the question of the degree of blockage "air or ground" described in the resolution was somewhat obscure and that the resolution contained no provision for automatic application; however, it did avoid leaving the whole problem for discussion at the time of access being blocked. (The British were interpreting the words "substantially complete" in the resolution as meaning virtually complete.)

6. The French were said to have agreed to accept the resolution if the NATO Council as a whole were prepared to accept it. The German Ambassador in Washington had not yet received instructions.

7. Mr. Fowler was informed that authoritative Canadian comments would have to wait on consultation of Ministers. However, Mr. Ritchie noted that preparatory discussions appeared to have been progressing satisfactorily in Paris and he wondered why it was considered necessary to raise again the general issues contained in the draft resolution. Commenting in a preliminary way on the text of the resolution he noted that there was some vagueness concerning the extent to which the Council would be acting under "guidance" of governments rather than under "instructions" or with "approval" of governments.⁵⁸ He also noted that the resolution was confined to a total embargo and that it appeared to confine Council discretion to the question of fact regarding blocking of access and the timing of the commencement of a total embargo. Mr. Ritchie said that his judgment generally was that we would have serious doubts and difficulties over the proposed resolution.

8. In order that we may inform our British colleagues concerning the Canadian attitude and that we may provide guidance concerning the attitude which our NATO Delegation should adopt if the new draft resolution is raised prior to the Ministerial Meeting, I should be grateful for any comments you wish to make. In particular, I would appreciate it if you would indicate whether you wish to make any further recommendations to the Cabinet on this question.⁵⁹

The Minister briefly considered the memorandum under reference on Saturday last in the light of Mr. Ritchie's explanation that if we stood pat on the instructions already sent to Léger we might find ourselves completely isolated in the Council. Mr. Ritchie pointed out in addition that the USA/U.K. draft revision of the proposed Resolution on Economic Counter Measures was not on the face of it wholly incompatible with the Canadian position and with minor adjustments might be rendered acceptable.

2. The Minister agreed that a Memorandum to Cabinet might be prepared which in essence would authorize Mr. Léger to go along with a redrafting exercise in NATO, perhaps based on the USA/U.K. draft, provided Mr. Léger's instructions made it clear that

(a) Canada would not enter into a commitment to agree to a total economic embargo, although we might be able to agree to something less or something different as an appropriate response to a blockade of Berlin;

(b) final decisions on counter measures were to be the responsibility of Governments, not of the Permanent Council acting under some prior authority;

(c) whatever compromise wording might be generally acceptable, Canada has no intention of introducing prior to a blockade enabling legislation to impose economic counter measures.

3. Just prior to his departure for the West, the Minister telephoned me to say that a draft memorandum to Cabinet taking account of the foregoing points should be submitted in his absence and as soon as possible to the Prime Minister; and that the Memorandum to Cabinet embodying the instructions for the Delegation to the NATO Ministerial Meeting should be adjusted to take account of the Prime Minister's reaction to the separate memorandum on economic counter measures.

BERLIN: ECONOMIC COUNTERMEASURES

During the last three months the NATO Council has been discussing economic countermeasures as "one of a series of responses" available to the West in the event that access to West Berlin should be blocked or impeded following the failure of negotiations on Berlin or refusal by the Soviet Union to negotiate.

2. On October 23, 1961 the Cabinet decided "that the Government should make no commitment to participate in economic countermeasures in respect of the Berlin situation until access to Berlin was denied. This would include any advance commitment in respect of the denial of air traffic rights to aircraft from the Soviet bloc countries."

3. This decision was communicated to the NATO Council on October 31 by the Canadian Representative who informed the Council that the decision applied not only to the proposal concerning a total embargo but also to the proposed partial economic countermeasures and to the proposed measures in the event of an interdiction of NATO air traffic. Our Representative reserved the Canadian position on all of these questions and explained that he did not believe the Canadian authorities would wish their decision to be considered as a veto on further planning in this field.

4. The Council discussions have revealed substantial differences of opinion between the United States, France and West Germany on the one hand, who favour a total economic embargo going into force automatically as soon as the Council decides on the facts of a blockage of access to West Berlin, and on the other hand Britain, Norway, Denmark, Canada and some other members who are not prepared to see decisions taken in advance of access to West Berlin actually being blocked.

5. While there seems to be no differences in basic views among the latter group, all except Canada have been prepared to accept the Council's decision on air traffic countermeasures, have been prepared to go along with planning for other partial countermeasures and generally have gone to some lengths to maintain an appearance of Council solidarity.

6. There is a possibility that failure to reach agreement on an approach to economic countermeasures may lead the United States and some others to overemphasize military preparations. In addition, evidence of inability to work towards a compromise solution might increase the tendency of the three Occupying Powers and Germany to act without consultation with the Council.

7. We have now been informed by the Deputy British High Commissioner that Britain together with the United States, France and West Germany have agreed to present to the NATO Council the attached compromise resolution. It seems likely to become the focal point for any discussion of this question before and during the Ministerial Meeting, December 13-15, 1961.

8. Most members of NATO seem ready to search for a compromise text and the Canadian Delegation would have difficulty in abstaining from participation.

9. In light of the previous Cabinet memorandum, the present resolution would require modification to meet the following requirements:

(a) makes clear that member governments are not committing themselves in advance to a total economic embargo, since some different measures might be more effective or suitable in some circumstances;

(b) recognizes that while there would be continuous consultation in the NATO Council, actual decisions concerning the nature and timing of any action can be taken only by Governments;

(c) avoids any implication that new legislation or substantial new regulations will be introduced in Canada until the need for countermeasures arises;

(d) ensures that the conditions set out in paragraphs (a), (b) and (c) above should extend to any application of the resolution with respect to partial countermeasures, including those prepared in the field of civil aviation.

10. Cabinet may therefore wish to consider whether Canadian Representatives should be authorized to seek revision of the resolution along the above lines. If they are successful it might then prove possible for Canada to accept the resolution.

BERLIN; ECONOMIC COUNTERMEASURES
 (Previous reference Oct. 23)

11. The Prime Minister said that discussion had been going on for weeks in the N.A.T.O. Council on the subject of denial of access to West Berlin. East Germany has been creating more and more interference. France had stubbornly refused to consider negotiations to ease or settle the problem.

The only area of agreement among the N.A.T.O. countries had been with respect to economic countermeasures. Canada had been an exception. There was a possibility that France would use Canada's stand to justify its own position. The United States had stated that it would be impossible to service West Berlin by an air-lift this time. West Berlin now had more population than 25 per cent and greater production than 50 per cent of the nations in the United Nations. There had been general agreement in N.A.T.O. that immediate economic countermeasures should be applied against the Soviet Bloc in the event that military and civilian access to West Berlin be denied. The Cabinet, however, had decided Canada would not make any advance commitments in this regard and this had been communicated to N.A.T.O. There had been all kinds of economic countermeasures proposed and substantial differences of opinion on these. The United States, France and West Germany favoured a total embargo to go into effect automatically. Britain, Norway, Denmark and Canada and others were not prepared to see decisions made in advance of the event. However, in order to maintain a semblance of solidarity, these countries have been prepared to go along with planning partial countermeasures, including the Council's decision on air-traffic countermeasures. Canada had been an exception in this and had not accepted the decision on air-traffic.

Britain, the United States, France, and West Germany had now agreed to present to the N.A.T.O. Council a compromise resolution which was likely to be the focal point for any discussion before and during the Ministerial meeting. It was suggested that a revision of this resolution along lines set out in the memorandum might make acceptance by Canada possible.

An explanatory memorandum had been circulated, (External Affairs memorandum, Dec. 6 – Cab. Doc. 452-61).

12. The Prime Minister did not agree with the view that there was a possibility that failure to reach agreement on an approach to economic countermeasures might lead the U.S. and others to overemphasize military preparations.

13. The Secretary of State for External Affairs agreed with the Prime Minister's comment and said that he had not been satisfied with the memorandum drafted for Cabinet and had therefore not signed it. Canada had taken the stand that it could not take a position with regard to economic countermeasures beforehand and had pointed out that Canada's War Measures Act would have to be amended first. He felt that this stand should not be changed.

14. The Minister of National Defence said that the countermeasures to be applied to flights of civil aircraft over Canada involved only administrative action and there would be very little called for because of the small extent to which these routes were used by members of the Russian bloc.

15. The Cabinet,

(a) noted the information submitted in a memorandum from the Department of External Affairs dated December 6th (Cabinet Document 452-61) concerning proposed economic countermeasures to deal with the Berlin crisis;

(b) decided that the Canadian position on this subject should not be changed, except in regard to the air traffic measures to be taken in response to partial interdiction of N.A.T.O. aircraft (civil or military) to or from West Berlin; and,

(c) agreed in regard to these air traffic measures that the Canadian reservation on the decision of the N.A.T.O. Council dated October 31st should now be withdrawn, on the understanding that the Canadian representative on the Council would act only subject to instructions from his Government on these measures.

(Note: The measures referred to in (c) include:

(i) closure of N.A.T.O. airports to Soviet bloc aircraft;

(ii) prevention of transit overflights and technical stops by Soviet bloc aircraft in N.A.T.O. countries; and,

(iii) prohibition against N.A.T.O. country aircraft calling at Soviet bloc airports.)

BERLIN: ECONOMIC COUNTERMEASURES

For comparative purposes copies† are attached of the draft decision on a total economic embargo which the NATO Council considered on December 7, and of the draft compromise resolution which the British Deputy High Commissioner passed to us earlier this week and which was attached to the Memorandum to the Cabinet on this subject.

2. You will notice that only the last part of the last sentence of the earlier resolution has been altered. The words "will consider whether, in fact, such blockage has taken place and what the timing of the total embargo should be, in the light of all the circumstances of the moment and in support of military, political and psychological action being undertaken" have been deleted and the following wording has been substituted:

"will consider whether such an embargo should be put into effect."

3. The earlier text did not represent much of a compromise with those member governments who objected to the four-power proposal that a total embargo should come into force almost automatically when access to West Berlin was blocked. The earlier resolution left to the subsequent discretion of governments only the determination of the existence of a complete blockage of access and the question of timing of the embargo.

4. The new text now before the NATO Council does not contain the objectionable automatic element. It specifically states that when blockage of access to West Berlin appears to be substantially complete, the Council, acting under the guidance of governments, will decide whether or not to impose an embargo. The final decision is thus left to governments to make at the time that access to West Berlin is actually blocked. However, as the Secretary-General explained in presenting the new resolution, it contains "a moral obligation" to agree to a total embargo in response to a total blockage. It also contains an obligation to participate in preliminary planning.

5. The Cabinet decision of October 23, 1961, which was reaffirmed today, stated in part "that the Government should make no commitment to participate in economic countermeasures in respect of the Berlin situation until access to Berlin was denied ...". The moot question is whether acceptance of the new resolution acknowledging a total embargo as an "appropriate response" to a blockade of West Berlin, would constitute a "commitment to participate in economic countermeasures." If it does, we obviously cannot accept the new resolution. If it does not, we could accept the resolution with a reservation to the effect that in the opinion of the Canadian authorities the question of whether a total embargo would be an appropriate response to blockage of access to West Berlin would have to be decided in the light of the circumstances prevailing at the time access was actually blocked. In my opinion, the first two sentences of the new resolution involve "a commitment to participate in economic countermeasures" and in the light of the Cabinet decision they could not be accepted.

6. There is a paradoxical element in Cabinet's decision to allow our Delegation to remove the Canadian reservation on the NATO Council decision concerning air traffic countermeasures. Although the air traffic countermeasures operate in a much narrower field than the proposed total economic embargo, they go farther in one sense than the proposed decision on a total embargo; the decision on air traffic countermeasures involves a commitment "to make without delay the necessary plans to enable them to implement these measures ...", whereas the proposed decision on a total embargo contains only a passing reference to "planning their concerted participation."⁶⁰

[Ottawa], January 13, 1961

NATO – NUCLEAR ARMAMENT OR DISARMAMENT?

This memorandum is drawn up in accordance with your instruction to put down on paper the considerations I drew to your attention during our conversation on 12 December.

2. The request that you have received from the Minister of National Defence to open negotiations with the United States with a view to determining the conditions under which nuclear warheads will be made available under joint control for the “Honest John” artillery and F-104G aircraft with which the Canadian forces in Europe will shortly be equipped has brought to attention the question of a re-examination of the strategy and policies on which the original decision to equip NATO forces with tactical nuclear weapons was based.

3. The original decision to equip NATO forces with tactical nuclear arms was taken in 1954. In 1956 the North Atlantic Council directed the NATO military authorities that land, sea and air forces available to NATO must (inter alia) meet the requirement that they should be able to deal with armed aggression other than minor incursions, in accordance with the concept of “forward strategy,” counting on the use of nuclear weapons at the outset. The shield forces were to have the capability to respond quickly with nuclear weapons to any type of aggression.

4. In 1957, the communiqué issued after the meeting of the heads of government stated that “NATO has decided to establish stocks of nuclear warheads which will be readily available for the defence of the alliance in case of need. In view of the present Soviet policy in the field of new weapons, the Council has also decided that intermediate range ballistic missiles will have to be put at the disposal of the Supreme Allied Commander, Europe.

“The deployment of these stocks of missiles and arrangements for their use will accordingly be decided in conformity with NATO defence plans and in agreement with the states directly concerned.”

5. What was decided in 1957 and which seemed to be sound at that time may no longer be sound in 1961. Since the date of the decision, many experts have come to doubt whether tactical nuclear arms would really be effective in the defence of Europe. The belief is quite general that if these tactical nuclear arms were used they would make it inevitable that any war in Europe would be a nuclear war, and probably would quickly develop into an all-out war between the two great nuclear powers.

6. In 1956, President Eisenhower proposed that NATO should set up an organization to study disarmament policy as it related to the defence of the NATO area. In 1957, Mr. Diefenbaker said at the beginning of his statement at the meeting of NATO heads of government on December 16, "We meet here today to strengthen our military position and ensure that until the day that the negotiation of disarmament is possible, we shall have the strength necessary to preserve our security and maintain a strong position from which to negotiate at any and at all times."

7. However, no organization has been set up in NATO for the study of disarmament. The Germans have recently called attention to the present need for such an organization. You will recall that the situation during the 1960 negotiations on disarmament was very unsatisfactory in that there was no effective consultation with NATO on the disarmament measures proposed. This was due to the haste with which the Western disarmament plan had to be developed. Although Canada suggested at various times that the NATO military authorities should be brought into the study of disarmament proposals, nothing was done in this respect.

8. Reverting to the problem of the defence of NATO Europe, there would seem to be three possibilities:

(a) To go through with the present plans for widespread use of tactical nuclear arms, together with the provision of a NATO nuclear deterrent. This course seems likely to intensify the arms race and the danger of nuclear war;

(b) Strengthening NATO in conventional arms and forces. While this could be done if the NATO nations were sufficiently persuaded of its necessity, and would do much to eliminate the threat of nuclear war developing in Europe, it would necessitate sacrifices and create many political difficulties for the nations concerned;

(c) Acquire security through balanced disarmament of both the Warsaw Pact and NATO powers.

9. I understand that a reply dealing with the specific questions which the Minister of National Defence raises in his letter is being prepared by another division of the Department. However, I believe that it is widely held that there is need for an intensive re-examination of NATO strategy including the proposal for a NATO deterrent and it would seem that the above three possible courses of action should be carefully examined. It is therefore suggested that, if you feel the above arguments are valid, the Minister of National Defence should have these views placed before him with the recommendation that the Canadian Government should urge in the strongest terms that a re-examination of NATO strategy on the lines suggested above should be undertaken, and endeavour to gain the support of other NATO nations for this action.

10. May I receive your instructions, in due course, as to what further action, if any, is to be taken in this matter.

Note for Communications: This message required for NATO meeting a.m. January 19.

I welcome the arrangements which are being made to have SACEUR provide the Permanent Representatives with a complete and up-to-date picture of the present nuclear position of the Alliance. At the same time I assume that the main purpose of the meeting will be to hear his report and that it is not intended that there should be any substantive discussion at this stage and particularly until governments have had a full opportunity to consider the present situation in the light of the information made available by General Norstad. In the circumstances I expect that your role and that of your colleagues at the meeting will be mainly to ask questions on any aspects of Norstad's presentation which appear to require clarification. To assist you in that regard we are setting down below for your general guidance some of the more important points relating to NATO atomic policy which may require clarification:

(1) What is proposed role of tactical nuclear weapons in NATO shield forces in relation to need to deal with limited and cold war situations, as distinct from their general deterrent role against major war.

(2) Norstad in describing NATO strategy has frequently referred to need to force a "pause" in aggression to make aggressor appreciate carefully full consequences of proceeding with attack. Recognizing the likely "escalatory" effect of use of tactical nuclear weapons is it reasonable to assume that they would not be used to force a "pause," or if they were used could West reasonably expect any "pause" to occur?

(3) Assuming control in peacetime on the means of delivery for tactical weapons rests with national governments whose forces possess them, and the warheads remain in U.S.A. custody until released by the President, at what stage in peacetime can SACEUR take direct charge of deployment and preparation of such weapons for immediate use assuming there is increasing risk of aggression.

(4) To what extent must SACEUR consult governments whose forces have means of delivery at their disposal before taking action under (3).

(5) Is it correct to assume that Council will be consulted by SACEUR regarding the use of tactical nuclear weapons where there is sufficient time to do so?

(6) What is relationship of NATO alert agreements to any action taken by SACEUR under (3) and (4) above?

(7) With regard to the IRBM's already set up in Italy it is our understanding that SACEUR retains operational control over these weapons, subject to agreement of U.S. and Italian governments before they can be used. Does this same arrangement apply to other IRBM's e.g. in Turkey?

(8) The U.S.A. suggestions regarding MRBM's speak of a "truly multilateral" missile force. What authority if any has Council with respect to use of present IRBM's?

2. As you will observe the above questions relate only to the present nuclear position of the Alliance which, we understand, is all that is up for consideration at the present time. We shall have other questions to raise when an opportunity is given to obtain clarification of the U.S.A. MRBM concept.

NATO NUCLEAR POLICY

General Norstad himself briefed the Council on January 26 at SHAPE Headquarters on the atomic forces available at present to the Alliance and the controls which exist over them.

2. The briefing which was admirably done extended with questioning over 2½ hrs. A very large percentage of the time was taken up with a factual explanation of the types and numbers of atomic weapons. The Council was informed of the types of aircraft available to Allied Command Europe for the delivery of atomic weapons, the types of missiles, the numbers of special ammunition storage sites which were available, and comparative charts on the force levels within the Alliance were shown. As much of this factual information as we could record will be included in separate numbered letters to Ottawa only. † Norstad also took some time to suggest a new land-based MRBM weapon system which will also be the subject of a separate report. †

3. The nature of the meeting was not repeat not such as to provide the best opportunity for introduction of all of the questions contained in your reference telegram. There was a fairly extended discussion of the problem of control and your questions on that issue or ones very similar in intent were answered. It was agreed that the Council would have further meetings with Norstad as it progressed in its study of this whole question so that we will have further opportunities to raise those of your questions which were not repeat not answered at this meeting and such others as may occur to you. In other words, the briefing and the discussion which it generated tended to concentrate more on what atomic forces were available at present and what controls existed over them than on the question of how and under what circumstances atomic weapons might be used at the moment. This latter question is one that I know is much in the minds of Council members but I suspect that the tabling of UK paper (our telegram 168 January 25) † with its very specific questions in this area had its effect on the course of the questioning at this first meeting with Norstad. The Council is fully aware that these questions, having been asked, will have to be dealt with in future discussions.

4. Norstad opened his presentation with a brief historical background. He indicated that as early as April 1952 he had been charged personally by the then Supreme Commander with the planning for use of nuclear weapons in the NATO area and for co-ordinating operations with external forces, i.e., USA Strategic Air Command. The first conference of senior allied military personnel to deal with atomic weapons for NATO was convened in May 1952 at Fontainebleau. In June of 1952 the 49th USA Air Division moved to UK. Its 150 aircraft constituted the most highly-trained atomic delivery unit available at that time and its purpose was to contribute to the defence of the NATO area. In somewhat different form, Norstad said, highly-trained atomic delivery units continued to exist today in UK to fulfill the same purposes. As an indication of developments in this field at this early date, Norstad indicated that in the May 1952 Conference the planning figure discussed was 20 atomic weapons. By July 1954 the planning figure was 125. He emphasized that this early planning involved atomic weapons for specifically NATO requirements as estimated by Allied staff officers. The first specific mention of atomic weapons in formal NATO plans came in MC48 which was considered and approved by the Council in the fall of 1954. He quoted paragraph 22(a) of MC48, as follows: "Our studies have indicated that without their immediate use (i.e., atomic weapons), we could not repeat not successfully defend Europe within the resources available. Any delay in their use – even measured in hours – could be fatal. Therefore, in the event of a war involving NATO, it is militarily essential that NATO forces should be able to use atomic and thermonuclear weapons in their defence from the outset."

5. Norstad said that his only purpose in this brief review of NATO's nuclear policy was to set in perspective present military requirements. The need for nuclear weapons was not repeat not something which had emerged only in the last few years. The need for these weapons and the approval of planning for their use had been a constant feature of the Alliance from 1954 onward. The Herter proposals⁶¹ were only the most recent development in a recognized pattern. They were designed to meet NATO military requirements which existed and did not repeat not involve the extension of those requirements. Nor did the proposals for the introduction of additional MRBMs change NATO's basic strategy. They simply would provide the means to allow SACEUR to carry out the responsibilities given him for the defence of the NATO area. He could not repeat not meet his responsibilities without them.

6. When speaking specifically of the Herter proposals, Norstad said that MRBMs would take over some of the functions already performed by available aircraft. He said there were some 700 targets vital to his command which lay more than 300 miles beyond the Iron Curtain. Eighty percent of these targets lay in the area 300-700 miles beyond the Iron Curtain. To engage these targets successfully he required the force of MRBMs which he had repeatedly asked for, to work with the aircraft which he had available and the improved version of those aircraft which he would have available in the years ahead. He made it clear that while, in his opinion, the Polaris submarine with its missiles offered specific advantages for dealing with his military task, he also believed it essential to have a highly-mobile land-based system of missiles which would be complementary to the sea-based force. As indicated above, his suggestion with respect to the land-based MRBM system will be dealt with in separate correspondence.

7. In answering questions in connection with the atomic delivery systems which presently existed in the NATO area, Norstad made it clear that in his mind there was no repeat no reasonable distinction to be made any longer between so-called tactical and strategic nuclear weapons. There was no repeat no yardstick by which such a distinction could be judged. It was true that the ranges of nuclear weapons available to him varied considerably but there was a great deal of flexibility in the use of a particular weapon, depending on whether the situation faced at a particular time required the application of force by that weapon at minimum, middle or maximum ranges of its capability. There was similar flexibility possible in the yield of warheads which could be used on particular weapon carriers. The implication of his statements in this context was that insofar as there was a control problem, it applied to all nuclear weapons regardless of whether they were described loosely as tactical or strategic. The size of the modern "battlefield" was such as to make analogies with past experience difficult, if not repeat not misleading.

8. The discussion of controls and questions on this subject was interspersed throughout the presentation which I should indicate was not repeat not made from a formal brief but by Norstad without notes and with a minimum of charts. For purposes of this report therefore I think it would be best to start with the summary made by Spaak and Norstad at the end of the discussion. In the course of a number of answers to questions asked, Norstad had made it clear that action by the President of USA simply made nuclear weapons available for use but did not repeat not direct what specific use would be made of them. Spaak said it seemed clear that the question which remained unanswered was who decided how the weapons would be used when they were made available to NATO. He asked Norstad directly how he would envisage his actions after the release of the warheads by the President. Norstad said that if the situation arose today where the use of atomic weapons seemed required, he would ask immediately to meet the Council and to state the facts. There was no repeat no question on the matter of who had the right to control the use of atomic weapons. When asked, as he was on numerous occasions, his response was "the political authority." He said however that to speak frankly he did not repeat not believe that the Council had the ability to carry out its responsibilities. He believed that some machinery must be found which would enable the Council to fulfil its responsibilities. From the description which he had given of his ability as a supreme commander to control his forces and therefore their use of weapons, he was satisfied that he could exercise that control. He therefore felt forced to answer Spaak's question by a question itself along the lines of the following: I can carry out my responsibilities to control the military use of these weapons but can you, the Council, carry out your responsibility in such a way that the battle could not repeat not be lost before it began? He made it clear that he believed that individual governments of the Alliance had to solve the problem, which was a political problem and not repeat not a military one, of that machinery they could develop, satisfactory to them, which would enable immediate political direction to be given to the Supreme Commander when he asked for that direction. He said it would be his personal desire, and he was sure the desire of anyone who might succeed him as SACEUR, to pass as much responsibility as possible for decisions in this area to the political authority. The crisis of conscience would develop, both for SACEUR and for the Council members, when they were faced with a situation requiring immediate decision if the machinery did not repeat not exist on the political side for ensuring that that decision was acceptable to governments.

9. Spaak accepted this explanation as reasonable and said that it seemed to him that there were two situations that could be distinguished. One was that of a direct atomic attack by the enemy. It seemed to him that the Council would automatically decide that NATO's atomic weapons should be used immediately, although he was not repeat not aware that such written direction existed in any NATO text. He believed it was something which should be put in textual form for ministerial approval in the not repeat not too distant future. The second situation was that of a conventional attack launched by the enemy. General Norstad's description of the situation was absolutely correct. There was no repeat no firm procedure for Council decision on the possible use of atomic weapons in the circumstances. Indeed there was the "utmost vagueness" even about expressions of government views in this area. It seemed to him essential that if governments were thinking of taking the responsibility for a multilateral NATO atomic force, they could not repeat not much longer avoid a decision on this question of control.

10. Norstad agreed that the idea of multilateral force highlighted the absence of confirmed political direction with respect to the use of atomic weapons. The multilateral force concept did not repeat not however create the problem. The problem existed today and had existed ever since the first atomic weapon was integrated into NATO forces. He believed that a very heavy burden of responsibility rested on SACEUR which should properly be borne by the Council. Governments had been willing to leave the method of exercise of responsibility indefinite and undefined. Perhaps even after detailed examination of the problem which the Council was now embarking upon, governments would prefer to retain present arrangements. If they did so however, they should be conscious of the burden which would rest primarily with the Supreme Commander. He emphasized again that there was no repeat no question of principle. The problem was one of the assumption of political responsibility by the governments and the agreement of the governments to a suitable means by which that responsibility could be exercised. He said that if governments wished to embark upon a search for some acceptable method, he had one procedural suggestion to make. He believed it would be useful if the Council would undertake to write what might be called "rules of engagement," attempting to set out general political guidance as to the kind of situations in which it would seem appropriate that NATO atomic weapons be used. He said he himself could think of half a dozen situations in which the use of atomic weapons by NATO forces would be the only possible action in terms of commonsense.

11. This summation of the problem had been preceded by a fairly extensive description by Norstad of his own direct control of atomic weapons within the military chain of command and the methods by which that control would be exercised. We shall make this the subject of a separate report as well. †

12. Members of the Council expressed satisfaction that Norstad's briefing was most complete on the subject of NATO's nuclear capacity that had ever been given to the Council. This telegram is confined to the more general aspects of the briefing. You will receiving a considerable amount of additional factual material in subsequent messages. † We believe it will take some time for individual governments to digest the information which SACEUR has provided. When that has been done however we believe that the Council will be in a better position perhaps than it has ever been before to conduct an informed discussion of NATO's nuclear policy and of the specific USA suggestions concerning a multilateral MRBM force.

NATO AND NUCLEAR ARMAMENTS

Attached is a memorandum by General Burns setting down some views he has formed about the problem of NATO and nuclear armaments. I believe you will find it interesting.

2. For your information I have also sent copies of the paper to the Chairman, Chiefs of Staff and to Mr. Bryce. I hope to have a meeting with them in the near future at which time we will discuss the NATO nuclear problem generally with particular reference to the United Kingdom paper concerning a comprehensive review of NATO strategy.⁶² I have suggested that we might also discuss General Burns' paper at that time.

NATO AND NUCLEAR ARMAMENTS

Can a war in which nuclear weapons are used be a limited war? Can anyone demonstrate that, if tactical nuclear weapons were used in Europe, it would be possible to limit the war in geographical extent and in the kind of nuclear weapons used? For the first time in history, hostile nations have the power to strike vital objectives in each others' territory with overwhelming force, from the first hours of war. This fact makes it almost impossible to deduce from the history of past wars what the form of a future war might be.

The expression "escalation" has been used to convey the idea that, if two nations having "spectrum" of nuclear weapons and means for their delivery, once begin to fight with the smaller nuclear weapons, they will inevitably use ever larger weapons to secure victory, or avoid defeat, until the largest and most destructive weapons are brought into the struggle. The escalation period would probably be very brief; perhaps days, perhaps only hours.

"Escalation" might work as follows: The use of tactical nuclear weapons of short range by forward troops would be replied to by weapons of greater power and longer range, sited farther back. Nuclear strikes intended to interdict the movement of enemy reserves would hit far into enemy territory, and so would attempts to neutralize air bases and missile launching sites. Retaliation would progressively come from aircraft based at, or missiles launched from, greater distances, and attempts to forestall such retaliation would inevitably extend the area of operations until it included the heartland of both sides.

It is difficult to imagine any agreement between the two sides which could effectively limit the size or range of nuclear weapons once they were used at all. Rather than that such an agreement would be made and kept, it is surely far easier to conceive of an agreement not to use the weapons at all, to reduce and finally eliminate them from national armaments.

If escalation is inevitable following any use of nuclear arms, it is clear that the defence of Europe by nuclear weapons is really "built-in brinkmanship." It would seek to deter war by ensuring that any hostilities would immediately result in all-out nuclear war. And the lower down in the scale of units that nuclear arms were distributed, the greater would be the possibility of nuclear war breaking out through a fault of judgement, or accident.

⁶² Une copie du document « NATO Strategy and Nuclear Weapons » élaboré par le Royaume-Uni peut être consultée dans le dossier MAE/50219-AL-2-40.

A copy of the United Kingdom paper, "NATO Strategy and Nuclear Weapons," can be found on DEA/50219-AL-2-40.

It has been suggested that it would be possible by the use of the smaller nuclear weapons to impose a "pause" on the USSR if an attack were made on European territory. It is not clear how it is expected to bring this about. It is said that a first, limited use of nuclear weapons by NATO troops would demonstrate the alliance's determination to use every weapon rather than yield to aggression, even if of limited extent. But as the Russians are as well provided with tactical nuclear weapons as are the NATO allies, what would be most likely to happen would be that they would reply in kind; and the Allies would either have to continue in the escalation or else stop and suffer the aggression to succeed. So the pause-enforcing function or "shot across the bows" does not seem to be an effective element in a NATO defence policy.

There is a difficult problem involved in the control of nuclear weapons, which at present is exercised by the USA, sometimes jointly with the allied host country. It is understood that the President of the United States has to authorize the release of nuclear warheads. If he does this, it will be with the realization that he will very probably be exposing the continental United States to a devastating nuclear war which could be initiated by some relatively junior officer using the tactical nuclear weapons with which his unit is equipped and trained to fight. If on the other hand the President does not release the nuclear weapons, the NATO forces which depend on them will be practically powerless to resist attack, since they will not have the numbers of men nor the conventional armaments to match those which can be brought against them.

So there is a dilemma confronting the USA and the European NATO allies. If, in equipping the NATO forces with tactical nuclear weapons the USA gives up its veto on their use, it may be exposing itself to all-out nuclear war initiated without its specific consent. But if it retains the veto, the Europeans will fear that at a critical juncture the USA might refuse to release the warheads, leaving the NATO forces largely defenceless. It is hard to believe that the American determination to defend Europe is so great that they would be ready to engage in all-out nuclear war, with all that would entail, to resist any and every kind of attack.

If we come to the conclusion that nuclear war is not a rational way of defending the freedom of Europe, what is to be done? Should we not now decide to and set about making the West strong enough, relative to our opponents, in conventional forces and armaments so that we can be reasonably certain that the nuclear arm need never be used except in retaliation for its use by the other side? And if this is so, would it not be more sensible to achieve equality of strength by making a disarmament agreement which would reduce Russian strength in conventional forces and armaments to parity with ours, rather than greatly increasing ours?

It would also seem that in the first stages of any disarmament agreement it would be necessary to retain nuclear weapons and the means for their delivery on both sides, but with the understanding that they would be only used in retaliation for the initiation of nuclear warfare.

NATO NUCLEAR POLICY

A number of the questions raised in your reference telegram were dealt with in the course of General Norstad's briefing of the Council on January 26 (our telegram 196 January 27). It is clear that similar questions will be dealt with in the further discussions which will arise with respect to the longer UK list of questions on NATO nuclear strategy which has been circulated to the Council (our telegram 168 January 25).† We thought it might be useful however to attempt to deal more specifically in this message with the questions you have posed. Our purpose is to find out if the answers set out below are satisfactory for your requirements and to ensure that we have a clear understanding of the problems you had in mind in posing some of the questions. For purposes of clarity we shall repeat the text of the eight questions.

2. Question 1: What is proposed role of tactical nuclear weapons in NATO shield forces in relation to need to deal with limited and cold war situations, as distinct from their general deterrent role against major war?

Answer: As indicated in our telegram 196, SACEUR believes it misleading to think of nuclear weapons in terms of tactical or strategic insofar as they form part of the necessary armoury of NATO forces to meet the responsibility placed on SACEUR to defend the European area for a certain period. All nuclear weapons serve a dual purpose in contributing to the successful implementation of the task of the shield forces which, in General Norstad's own words to the last NATO Parliamentarians Conference (our telegram 3048 November 22) were identified as "First, to contribute to the deterrent. To do this, we must be in a position to prevent if possible an act of aggression, large or small, intentional or unintentional, by the presence of effective defending strength ... a second mission is to defend the people and territory of the NATO countries ... a third and most important product, if not repeat not purpose, of the shield force is the contribution it makes towards establishing the credibility of the great strategic retaliatory forces. Without effective NATO forces deployed in the forward areas and properly equipped, we would, in the event of aggression, have no repeat no option, no repeat no choice of response, between ICB or nothing."

3. Question 2: Norstad in describing NATO strategy has frequently referred to need to force a "pause" in aggression to make aggressor appreciate carefully full consequences of proceeding with attack. Recognizing the likely "escalatory" effect of use of tactical nuclear weapons is it reasonable to assume that they would not repeat not be used to force a "pause," or if they were used could West reasonably expect any "pause" to occur?

Answer: We think it likely that General Norstad's response to this question would be an assurance that insofar as it was his responsibility, he would apply only the required degree of force necessary to force a pause in order that the aggressor would be required to make a conscious decision as to whether or not repeat not he would extend an incident so that it would constitute an act of major war. We doubt that he would commit himself in advance, as a military commander, to a distinction between the use of conventional and nuclear weapons in this context. The analysis put forwarding the letter of August 22, 1960 from the CCOS to the USSEA and in paragraph 9 of that letter in particular seems relevant to us. SACEUR has however on a number of occasions emphasized the importance of adequate conventional forces in his command. Most recently in speaking to the Assembly of the WEU on December 1, 1960 he made the following comments which seem to us relevant to your question. "A substantial conventional capability is essential to the defence of Europe and is certainly essential to our making an effective contribution to the deterrent." The basic combat elements of NATO forces "should be so organized and so equipped that their normal response to an incident would be of necessity with conventional weapons ... the threshold at which atomic weapons are introduced into the battle should be as high as possible ... we must continue to pay the greatest attention to the development of conventional weapons because if we do all these things, we then raise the threshold at which atomic weapons would have to be introduced into the battle."

4. Question 3: Assuming control in peacetime on the means of delivery for tactical weapons rests with national governments whose forces possess them, and the warheads remain in USA custody until released by the President, at what stage in peacetime can SACEUR take direct charge of deployment and preparation of such weapons for immediate use assuming there is increasing risk of aggression?

Answer: This is one question which we are not repeat not too certain that we fully understand. It is our understanding, perhaps wrongly so, that SACEUR, for example, has operational command of Canadian forces since they are "assigned" forces (see CCOS message JS-3305 to SHAPE January 24)† and can direct their operational deployment, including the deployment of the weapon system available to them and in support of them. Insofar therefore as the means of delivery for nuclear weapons is concerned, we are not repeat not clear as to the intent of your question unless it be with respect to "earmarked" forces in contrast to "assigned" forces. Insofar as the supply of the necessary warheads is concerned, i.e. the "preparation of such weapons for immediate use," we believe that SACEUR would think that he could take such action once release of the warheads from USA custody had been authorized by the President of USA. Thereafter the use of such weapons would be governed by political decisions taken on behalf of NATO and by any such national decisions as were required on the use to be made of these weapons. As reported in our telegram 196, General Norstad indicated what his views were on the exercise of political authority over the use of nuclear weapons. On other occasions as, for example, in speaking both to the parliamentarians in November 1960 and to the Assembly of WEU in December 1960 he said in part "I believe that atomic weapons should be introduced into the battle only as the result of a deliberate decision, a decision which is the product of an established decision-making process, a process which is in turn directed by the political authority of the Alliance ... the use of these weapons should be the result of a specific deliberate decision made at a level consistent with the policies and plans of NATO." (You will no repeat no doubt wish to check with the CCOS on our interpretation of SACEUR's responsibilities and likely course of action.)

5. Question 4: To what extent must SACEUR consult governments whose forces have means of delivery at their disposal before taking action under question (3)?

Answer: I am inclined to believe that SACEUR would not repeat not consider himself bound to consult governments whose forces are assigned to him (except USA Government insofar as the preparation of such weapons for immediate use is concerned) before taking the actions contemplated under question 3 although he would keep them informed of developments as time and communications permitted. I believe he would regard such action as a necessary preparation for possible eventual use of weapons which would be mandatory upon him as a military commander charged with the responsibility for being in a position to carry out the defence of an area. His consultation with respect to "earmarked" forces would presumably be governed by the exact conditions imposed by individual governments concerned. The final decision as to use of the weapons however, he seems clearly to be aware, is to be reserved for the appropriate political authority.

6. Question 5: Is it correct to assume that Council will be consulted by SACEUR regarding the use of tactical nuclear weapons where there is sufficient time to do so?

Answer: General Norstad gave a simple answer to this question in the course of his briefing on January 26 when he assured the Council that he would consult it where there was sufficient time regarding the use of any nuclear weapons.

7. Question 6: What is Relationship of NATO alert agreements to any action taken by SACEUR under questions (3) and (4) above?

Answer: This question involves a detailed interpretation of the NATO alerts agreements which are by no repeat no means crystal clear. Countries have made individual reservations with respect to the operation of the agreements. It is our understanding that Canada has accepted the agreements as they stand. It is clear that there are two parallel sets of regulations, one of which defines states of emergency as approved by the political and the other which describes states of military readiness as prescribed by the military authorities. While we do not repeat not profess to be experts on the interpretation of these parallel sets of regulations, it would be our understanding that military commander could bring his forces to a high degree of readiness (including probably the steps covered in question 3) without trespassing on the responsibilities and authority of governments to take the political decisions as to the eventual use to be made in specific conditions of the forces and weapons available, or decisions on alerting the civil populations.

8. Question 7: With regard to the IRBMs already set up in Italy, it is our understanding that SACEUR retains operational control over these weapons subject to agreement of USA and Italian Governments before they can be used. Does this same arrangement apply to other IRBMs, e.g. in Turkey?

Answer: From what General Norstad said at his briefing on January 26, we think that the simple answer to this question would be yes.

9. Question 8: USA suggestions regarding IRBMs speak of a "truly multilateral" missile force, what authority if any has Council with respect to use of present IRBMs?

Answer: We have General Norstad's assurance as given on January 26 that he would come to the Council for direction if time permitted concerning the use of any nuclear weapons. He has on numerous occasions as well emphasized that all NATO weapons will be used only in accordance with NATO plans as approved by the governments of the Alliance. The "truly multilateral" qualification used by Mr. Herter must be read in context. It is true that it has significance insofar as control features are concerned. Mr. Herter said that his concept of a multilateral MRBM force "does not repeat not preclude exploration of the concept of increasing the authority of the Alliance over the atomic stockpile" which would serve this force. We cannot forget however that he was talking as well about multilateral ownership, multilateral financing and multilateral manning of the MRBM force. There are at present, as you will realize, few if any weapon systems which would qualify as "truly multilateral" with respect to ownership, financing and manning. Mr. Herter gave it as his opinion as well that the concept of a multilateral force "would have immense political significance for the cohesion of the Alliance." He suggested that the multilateral approach would prevent the "creation of additional national nuclear weapons capabilities" which themselves "would mean duplication of effort and diversion of resources and would tend to stimulate competition within the Alliance in the nuclear weapons field.” The Herter proposals cannot therefore be thought of in terms of the control problem alone.

10. If the foregoing material does not repeat not satisfactorily answer the questions you have in mind, we shall be grateful for your further comments. Further opportunities will be given to us in the course of Council’s examination of the questions put by UK authorities to put forward questions of more specifically Canadian concern.

Air Marshal F.R. Miller, Chairman, Chiefs of Staff,
Mr. G. Ignatieff, Assistant Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs,

Brigadier D.A.G. Waldock, Chief, Joint Ballistic Missile Defence Staff,

Commander I.A. McPhee, Department of National Defence,
Mr. D.B. Dewar, Privy Council Office, (Secretary).

NATO NUCLEAR POLICY

1. Mr. Bryce said that there had been an exchange of comments between External Affairs and National Defence on the subject of the United Kingdom paper that had been tabled in NATO on the subject of NATO nuclear strategy. It would be useful now to discuss the procedures that should be adopted, both in Paris and in Ottawa, for considering the subject of NATO strategy and to discuss the substance of the United Kingdom paper.

2. Mr. Ignatieff said he believed the two Departments were agreed on the need for an orderly approach to determine whether the present nuclear policy should be changed. They also agreed that the study should begin with a review of the Political Directive of December, 1956,⁶³ and should proceed from there towards the necessary military studies. It was also agreed that work should go forward both in Ottawa and in Paris, and that there might be value in having joint Council-military study groups. The private discussions so far held among Permanent Representatives had been desultory.

3. At the most recent meeting of Permanent Representatives, the Secretary-General had proposed that the Council should for the time being suspend its study of NATO nuclear policy, mainly because the United States would not be able to present firm views on the subject for some months. A number of countries were opposed to the Secretary-General’s suggestion on the grounds that the views of European members of NATO should be clarified and made available to the United States for the purposes of its own study of NATO strategy.

4. One question that might be considered was whether the problem of revision of the Political Directive could be tackled directly or whether, as the United Kingdom seemed to think necessary, a number of questions had to be discussed and answered first. In any case it seemed that revision of the Political Directive would require a study by a body comprising both political and military elements.

5. Air Marshal Miller said that the present Political Directive was a formulation of policies that were already being followed at the time of its adoption. The problem of revising it now would be more difficult than was its original formulation. For this reason, it would probably be best to approach the problem by having a study of the questions involved. The difficulty was that the Council was not an appropriate strategic planning group to carry out such a study, and would not produce answers in a reasonable period of time. What was needed was a smaller planning group which should be appointed by the Council to do the study.

6. Mr. Ignatieff said he agreed that this approach would be more likely to produce quick results, but all member countries would probably have to be represented on the planning group. Such planning groups had not been set up in the past mainly because the International Staff was too occupied with other work. The present examination had now been precipitated by the United Kingdom paper which in turn reflected a study asked for by Prime Minister Macmillan of whether limited wars would be fought according to the current NATO strategy even though the condition of nuclear equipoise had changed the strategic situation.

7. Mr. Bryce said it was a real question whether the member countries of NATO would or could undertake a searching examination of NATO strategy. The answers to some of the basic questions in this area might undermine the basic concept of the Alliance, because the situation of nuclear equipoise which the United Kingdom gave as the major new factor affecting the strategic situation was the opposite of the situation when NATO was established and the West had all the nuclear strength. It might be that the United Kingdom had tabled its paper in NATO in the hope that its discussion would be an educative process that would make it easier for the Alliance to face difficult decisions later on.

8. Mr. Ignatieff said there had been no real discussion of NATO strategy for years because the strategic deterrent was in the hands of the United States and every one realized that the decisions about the use of the strategic forces of the Alliance would ultimately be taken by the United States President. But now the United States was deterred in a situation of nuclear equipoise and the other countries felt a greater need to examine their strategic problems. The United Kingdom Prime Minister, faced with a Great Debate about the consequences of a nuclear war for Great Britain, had ordered his Chiefs of Staff to study whether in any limited war involving NATO, the decision would have to be made between total disaster for the United Kingdom, and surrender. The Labour Party of Norway was also divided on the subject of nuclear weapons. The time had perhaps arrived when it would be less dangerous to face the strategic problem and try to resolve it than to continue to live with the old plan.

9. Mr. Bryce suggested that since the questions to be dealt with were so serious and troublesome, it might be better to have them discussed outside the NATO Council before the Council took them up. There might be some advantage in having a few senior Canadian military and External Affairs officials visit London and perhaps other capitals to discuss the problem informally at an early stage.

10. Mr. Robertson said that it would be advisable to have a full examination of the problem in Ottawa before discussing it with our allies. The Political Directive was a fundamental doctrine of NATO and we could not discuss with others how it should be revised until we had thought out the matter ourselves.

11. Mr. Bryce said if the United States deterrent was now counter-deterred and if the dangers of "escalation" were so great that we would be prevented from using tactical nuclear weapons in a limited war, then there was a new and difficult military problem to be solved.

12. Brigadier Waldock said from what had become known about it, the Bowie Report⁶⁴ in the United States seemed to have recommended an increase in conventional forces and a drawing back of tactical nuclear weapons in Europe, and giving to the Europeans more control over the means of strategic deterrence. A new study by Dean Acheson was now underway and recent statements by Secretary of State Rusk suggested that the new study was reaching the same sort of conclusion.

13. Mr. Bryce said the military problem of defending Europe without recourse to tactical nuclear weapons would be very difficult and it would not be easy to contemplate giving to the Europeans a deterrent over which the United States had no control.

14. Mr. Robertson said that the consequences of the new situation for East-West relations were serious. It would not continue to be good enough to re-affirm each year, for instance, that an attack on the freedom of Berlin would be regarded as an attack on the whole Alliance. We were increasingly in danger of having to assume unreal positions which lacked credibility. In 1956 the task of drafting the Political Directive was not too difficult, because the problem could be solved partly by rhetoric; we said then that we would respond with all our strength if we were attacked. Any realistic study now would indicate that we must contemplate different degrees of response in different situations. We should have to consider what sort of compromises would be tolerable to us that we did not have to accept five years ago. We might find, for example, that we could accept an arrangement about Berlin that was more of a compromise than we had previously considered we could accept. This examination of areas where we might accept more limited objectives would be difficult, because it would appear to be a weakening of our position and some countries more directly affected would be disturbed by it. But we probably must attempt it and at the same time do our best to keep the Alliance together.

15. Brigadier Waldock said one possible approach might be an examination of the various courses of action open to the Soviet Union, and what response we would make to each one. This would be a sort of war-games exercise, but involving both military and political planners.

16. Air Marshal Miller said the real question was whether NATO (or any international body) could carry out such a study. Would the big powers be prepared to have the study done by the whole group of fifteen and would the whole group be able to reach agreement?

17. Mr. Robertson said a pilot study might be done in Ottawa. We would then decide whether we could discuss it with all fourteen of our allies or with some of them. If the problem were discussed in the Council to begin with, roadblocks might be set up to prevent a real examination.

18. Mr. Bryce said it seemed clear that the Political Directive must be revised not by the Council but by a smaller working group composed of both military and political authorities. But before this was done, there must be a discussion in the Council or elsewhere of whether a thorough study of strategy should be done and of what the issues were. The examination of the United Kingdom paper in the Council might serve this purpose.

19. Mr. Robertson and Air Marshal Miller agreed with this view. Air Marshal Miller commented, however, that it would be possible for Canada to continue to take part in the NATO discussions without taking any initiative in launching a study of strategy, if such a course were decided on.

⁶⁴ Voir/See Robert R. Bowie, The North Atlantic Nations: Tasks for the 1960's. A Report to the Secretary of State, August 1960. College Park, MD: Center for International Security Studies at Maryland (Nuclear History Program Occasional Paper 7), 1991.

20. Mr. Bryce suggested that in the meantime thought should be given in Ottawa to what attitude Canada would take if and when a study in NATO were undertaken. We should consider the problem from the Canadian viewpoint, but also take into consideration the position of other countries. Admiral Mountbatten would soon be visiting Ottawa, and it would be useful to discuss with him the intentions of the United Kingdom in putting their paper before the NATO Council. Subsequently, a few Canadian officials might go to London for discussion. It was possible that the NATO discussions would not move much farther until the United States had presented the results of their review of NATO strategy. In the meantime, we could prepare our own thoughts on the matter.

Paris, March 17, 1961

Dear Bill [Barton],

I have read with a good deal of interest the material with which you have been providing me under a number of private letters. I am thinking in particular of papers forwarded under your letters of February 15[†] and March 3.[†] I hope you will continue the practice of providing papers of this sort which, while not actually instructions for action, give a most essential indication of the development of the thinking of interested officials in Ottawa.

This kind of material is particularly useful even if never used in a formal meeting for it can be used as one's own in personal conversations without in any way committing the Government. If it is any comfort to you, I have the impression that a number of other Representatives are working on the same type of direction from their capitals, i.e., something less than official instructions but something more than mere generalities. It is, it seems to me, a symptom of the difficulties of the issues involved that even the major powers are not prepared to commit themselves too precisely on policies in the nuclear field.

I shall not attempt in this letter to comment at any length on the many interesting ideas contained in the papers which you have sent us but will confine myself to a few comments on the general direction of Ottawa thinking, as revealed by the papers, in the matter of procedure. I agree that the orderly and logical approach to decisions with respect to the continued validity of the present NATO strategy suggested by Frank Miller is one possible procedure. You are aware, however, that just the opposite procedure is favoured by the United Kingdom; or, to put it another way, the United Kingdom approach of questions and answers could be said to precede the steps suggested in Para. 18 Annex "A" to CSC 1788/1.[†] The U.K. Representative could argue that exploration of the ground by the question-and-answer technique is essential before we can "agree in Council that the political directive needs revision or amplification." Because this view is received with a certain sympathy by some other members of the Council, I am inclined, at this stage at least, to favour your formula as set out in numbered sub-paragraph (1) on page 2 of your letter of March 3. Ipso facto, I am therefore led as well to see a good deal of merit in the point made in numbered sub-paragraph (3) on the same page. There is no doubt that the most orderly approach is that the political purpose which a strategy is to serve should be defined before one considers the desirability of changes in the strategy as it exists. On the other hand, orderliness and logic are not always the hallmark of governmental or Council approaches to problems of this sensitivity. It may require, as is often the case with important governmental decisions, a general churning-up of ideas and "diffuse discussion" before anyone, including the Great Powers, puts himself in the mental state of deciding that this or that orderly approach to the problem must be made. This is a rather roundabout way of saying that procedures will immediately suggest themselves when policies have become clearer. It seems to me that, when even such a country as the United Kingdom can only come to Council with questions concerning nuclear strategy and not with a suggested course of policy, it is pretty apparent that we have not yet reached the stage of sufficient clarity of policy among member governments to be able to move to the next stage of co-ordinating policy. To put it even more simply, it is not possible to coordinate policies that do not exist.

The other procedural suggestion concerning a "small political-military working group" is affected, it seems to me, by the same general arguments. In addition, however, it has other difficulties. How small is the group to be and who is to be left out? I have some doubts as well as to whether certain individual Permanent Representatives, (and I think particularly of those of Belgium, the Netherlands and Norway), are prepared at this stage at least to agree that other of their own nationals can represent their government's views on a topic of this significance any better than they themselves can. A number of Permanent Representatives have pointed out in the discussions which we have already had on this subject (and I did introduce the idea tentatively, you will recall) that members of the working group will be getting instructions from national capitals which will be exactly the same as those received by Permanent Representatives. The analogy which may come to mind of the value of study groups in national capitals cannot without some caution be applied to study groups set up by a multilateral organization. In the case of national study groups, individual and professional opinions can be expressed rather freely because only the personal reputation of individuals is involved. The situation is not exactly similar in international study groups where, no matter what is said to the contrary, national representatives are what they are called, representatives of national viewpoints. I do not wish to suggest that at some point there may not be a role for a special study group. I am inclined to believe, however, that if we were to press this view at the moment, we would not get a particularly sympathetic response.

This letter will not, I realize, be particularly helpful to you in clarifying the problem. I think, however, it is simply too early to commit ourselves firmly on matters of procedure. Perhaps the most useful contribution we can make to the discussion will stem from an attempt to clarify our own minds on NATO strategy and Canada's role therein. The "pilot study" suggested by Mr. Robertson in the course of your meeting on February 28 may be the most desirable Canadian approach at this time. I think as well that the idea of Mr. Bryce of a number of bilateral discussions in other capitals may be worth further exploration. It would seem only sensible that those bilateral discussions take place at least with U.K. and U.S. officials. I hope that, as time goes on, we will be able to make contributions to your thinking from here. I would repeat, however, my hope that you will continue to provide us with your tentative views as they develop without waiting until they have gone through the process of becoming instructions. I do not believe that Canada is in the position to take too much initiative in these discussions but I do believe it essential that we explore the ground as thoroughly as possible from a Canadian viewpoint in order that, when the appropriate time comes, we can make a solid Canadian contribution to the general discussion.

Yours sincerely,

NATO DEFENCE POLICY

While the meeting of NATO Foreign Ministers in Oslo will be principally concerned with political problems of the Alliance it is almost certain that the efforts of the President of the United States to find a sensible solution for the military problems of the Alliance as set out in his Defence Budget message of March 28⁶⁵ will also impinge on these discussions. Indeed the U.S. Permanent Representative in NATO has officially asked that the problem of NATO's nuclear future be discussed in the NATO Council before the Oslo meeting, following up his interim report on the new Administration's views on NATO defence policy made in the Council on March 29. This memorandum is a first attempt at an analysis of the implications of the United States' views on NATO military questions.

2. As summarized in the brief given to the NATO Ministers in Washington after the talks between Prime Minister Macmillan and President Kennedy on April 8, the United States' views are:

(a) That the basic NATO doctrine contained in the 1956 political directive and in subsequent major military committee papers did not require change but possibly its interpretation should be re-examined;

(b) That NATO was lagging in the provision of conventional forces and should make a determined effort to reach presently planned goals in order that it would have the capacity to force a significant pause following an attack and thereby raise the threshold of the use of nuclear weapons. First priority should be given to this effort to raise effectiveness of conventional forces;

(c) NATO has a substantial nuclear power and this nuclear power and this nuclear deterrent must be maintained;

(d) The United States intended to continue to maintain nuclear weapons in Europe for NATO purposes;

(e) It "could be expected," according to Finletter, that Polaris submarines would be committed to NATO in the future.

3. In essence what the President of the United States has been saying is that for the time being the principal protection against nuclear attack by Russia against NATO will continue to be provided by the United States retaliatory forces; on the other hand, NATO forces in Europe must be at the same time prepared to defend themselves against attack by Soviet conventional forces without relying unduly on tactical nuclear weapons in the NATO shield. This is to be accomplished by meeting current force goals and particularly by improving the quality and effectiveness of national contributions especially in the field of conventional weapons. For its part the United States is prepared to make substantial contributions in the form of strong, highly mobile forces trained in conventional warfare.

⁶⁵ Voir/See 'Text of President Kennedy's Special Message to Congress on Defense Spending,' New York Times, March 29, 1961, p. 16.

4. The main reason for this change of emphasis reflected in the review conducted by Mr. Acheson, is undoubtedly that it is becoming increasingly unconvincing for the United States to say that it will devastate Russia (and get devastated in return) in the event of any Russian military move in the NATO area, in the light of the amazing demonstrations of Soviet capability in long-range missiles underlined only yesterday by the flight in space of a Soviet cosmonaut terminating apparently in a "soft" landing. President Kennedy is concerned to reduce the risks, especially for the U.S.A. of extreme reliance on nuclear weapons in the NATO shield forces, although he has been careful to retain an element of doubt in Russian minds about how the United States might respond to an attack in order to preserve the validity of the Deterrent Policy. Thus the President in his Defence message said: "in the event of a major aggression that could not be repulsed by conventional forces, we must be prepared to take whatever action with whatever weapons are appropriate."

5. But the trend of United States defence policy is plainly to reserve the use of nuclear weapons for extreme cases. To deal with the possibility of Soviet conventional attack in Europe the United States has proposed a strengthening of conventional forces in order to enable NATO to check the Soviet onslaught without resorting in the first instance to nuclear arms against non-nuclear attacks which would inevitably risk escalation to full nuclear war. To reduce to the minimum the risks of escalation or miscalculation, the President has also emphasized civilian control over all weapons, particularly nuclear weapons. This point was made with emphasis in his message of March 28 as follows:

"The basic decisions on our participation in any conflict and our response to any threat – including all decisions relating to the use of nuclear weapons, or the escalation of a small war into a large one – will be made by the regularly constituted civilian authorities. This requires effective and protected organization, procedures, facilities and communication in the event of attack directed toward this objective, as well as defensive measures designed to insure thoughtful and selective decisions by the civilian authorities."

6. These changes in United States policy the President indicated in his Defence message involve, on the one hand, strengthening the United States missile deterrent by emphasis on the more mobile and invulnerable missile carriers such as Polaris and Minuteman squadrons as well as Skybolts for the United Kingdom deterrent force. On the other hand, as the President indicated, this involves:

- (a) strengthening the United States capacity to meet limited guerrilla warfare;
- (b) extended research on non-nuclear weapons;
- (c) increased flexibility of conventional forces;
- (d) increased non-nuclear capacities of fighter aircraft;
- (e) increased personnel training and readiness for conventional forces.

IMPLICATIONS

1. Canada is in a strong position to give general support to the United States' views on NATO nuclear policy because the Canadian record of fulfilment of existing MC/70 goals quantitatively and qualitatively has been good.

2. The main emphasis in the United States presentation in NATO has been the fulfilment of MC/70 goals and an improvement in the quality of the contributions by the NATO European allies.

3. In NATO nuclear policy the implications of the United States views is clearly centralized control of nuclear weapons which if extended to long range weapons could run counter to the United Kingdom and French independent nuclear deterrents.

4. There is an evident reluctance on the part of the new Administration to equip NATO with a force of Polaris submarines operating under joint allied control as envisaged in the Herter proposals. This no doubt stems from a recognition that the hopes of the previous administration of "buying off" the creation of separate nuclear deterrents by the United Kingdom, France (and perhaps later Germany) were unrealistic and would impose impossible financial demands on the Alliance at the expense of meeting existing force goals.

5. One possible corollary to the argument that NATO should increase its ability to confine our response to non-nuclear weapons, would be to put tactical atomic weapons in reserve under centralized control.

6. For the European members of NATO the main implication of the new United States policy will be increased pressure to raise both the quantity and quality of all NATO forces and particularly the conventional forces to bring them to a level approximating the requirements of MC/70. It will also, no doubt, cause them to seek clarification of the policy of the United States regarding the employment of nuclear weapons in specific situations, because, in General de Gaulle's words, "the continental European states, which are much more exposed, must know exactly with what weapons and in what conditions their overseas allies would participate in the same battle with them."

7. U.S. policy as applied to the other members of NATO, and in particular the European countries, does not apparently mean the abandonment of the requirement for them to develop a tactical nuclear capability as called for in MC/70 but rather the adoption of a schedule of priorities which would call for increased efforts to meet the shortfall of conventional forces in the first instance, both in quantity and quality; therefore, it could involve increased defence expenditures under existing planned force goals unless these goals were modified.

8. For Canada the implications would mainly lie in:

(a) consideration whether any nuclear capability to be supplied by Canada to NATO ground forces should be organized in centrally controlled units rather than assigned in support of the Brigade;

(b) increasing the mobility of Canadian conventionally trained forces by increasing their airlift capacity with Canadian-built aircraft, thus using available Canadian defence production resources more fully. It will be appreciated however, that unless existing Canadian force goals and commitments were modified, the attainment of such increased mobility would involve an increase in the Canadian defence budget.

In the light of the foregoing, after consultation with the Chairman, Chiefs of Staff, on his return from Washington, I suggest that:

(a) our NATO Delegation be instructed next Tuesday to give general support to the United States approach in the review of NATO military matters;

(b) that you consider giving favourable support in any discussions on these matters which may take place in Oslo;

(c) that the implications of the United States views be studied interdepartmentally urgently;

(d) that when this study is complete, consultation take place with the United States authorities through our mission in Washington and with SACEUR;

(e) that a Canadian position on NATO military policy be clarified by approval in Cabinet before the annual Ministerial Meeting next December.

Since this matter will be discussed by the NATO Permanent Representatives next Tuesday I attach for your signature, if you approve, a draft telegram of instructions for Mr. Léger.† Because the Chairman, Chiefs of Staff has been away in Washington all this week it has not yet been possible to obtain his approval. We are, however, sending him this draft today and we will ensure that any comments of substance which we may receive from him on Monday are brought to your attention for your approval before the message is despatched to Mr. Léger.

If you approve the attached message we would be grateful if it could be returned to Defence Liaison (I) Division to await any comments from the Chairman, Chiefs of Staff.⁶⁶

LONG-TERM PLANNING – NATO NUCLEAR POLICY

I saw General Norstad on April 14 with a view to getting his comments on the present welter of statements from high authorities with respect to NATO's military future. I sought as well to get his views on the points raised in your reference telegram. While the conversation ranged over a variety of topics I shall attempt to group under a few headings what I regard as the most important expressions of Norstad's views.

2. Revision of NATO Strategy. While being careful not repeat not to criticize in any way the recent statements made by his government at the highest level, General Norstad went to some length to point out that he as the Supreme Commander knew of no repeat no new strategic concept which was being planned or even suggested by USA Government for NATO. The emphasis given in a number of recent public statements to the requirements for increasing the conventional capabilities of NATO shield forces was one which he (Norstad) had been urging for four years; so too was the pause concept. He referred to the briefing which he had given last week to the Military Committee in Chiefs of Staff session in Washington and indicated very briefly the outline which he had given the Military Committee of future military requirements of the Alliance as he saw them. We presume that you will be receiving a more detailed account of this briefing from National Defence. In brief he said that he had indicated to the Military Committee that the conventional forces available to him were sufficient in quantity. He had urged however that their equipment be improved, that their operational capability be increased, and that above all they be given tactical mobility. He said that what he meant by tactical mobility was the provision of simple "wheels and tracks" and not repeat not anything elaborate in the way of major airlift capabilities. He said quite bluntly that he neither needed nor wanted more paper divisions. If the members of the Alliance could bring their presently assigned units to something like 95 percent manning and could provide them with equipment which was presently on sale he would have an adequate fighting force. One other important feature so far as he was concerned was that the forces should be given a greater ability to survive hostile actions.

3. Nuclear Weapons. Turning then to NATO's nuclear capability he said again that the emphasis in recent public statements was an emphasis which he himself had developed over the last few years. He said he thought that President Kennedy's mention of his (Norstad) name in his address to the Military Committee had been deliberate in order to indicate the Administration's general support of the requirements which Norstad had put forward. Norstad said that he believed USA should and would commit Polaris submarines to the needs of the Alliance (perhaps five to ten submarines). In his view there should be "no repeat no others in the world." In other words he did not repeat not personally support the idea that Polaris submarines should be sold or given to other individual members of the Alliance. He said the first bid for such submarines had already been made by the Germans who had not repeat not only offered to pay for them but to pay in advance and to pay a price which would give a good profit to the sellers. He did not repeat not think it politically wise that there should be a proliferation of Polaris submarines. They raised problems of control of the most sophisticated sort to which his own government was devoting the maximum of attention.

4. In his own view the essential nuclear capability of NATO should be made up of a balance of USA Polaris submarines and mobile land-based MRBMs. These latter MRBMs should have built-in control features. General Norstad was obviously referring to the truck-mounted weapons system on which we reported after our interview with him on January 26. He added that in his estimation MRBMs were "essentially a European animal." They could not repeat not be forced upon the European members of the Alliance but those members had to reach decision to have MRBMs and to suggest control procedures. He said as well he was convinced that USA would offer the Polaris submarines to NATO on the same basis as the assignment of the Sixth Fleet. He reminded us that paragraph 12 of MC38/3 assigned the Sixth Fleet to him as SACEUR.

5. Speaking in more general terms about the nuclear problem he repeated briefly another element of his briefing to the Military Committee last week in which he had repeated his often stated view that atomic and nuclear weapons must be used by NATO forces whenever necessary but that the threshold of their introduction into the battle should be as high as possible. He believed as well that they could be introduced only as the result of a particular decision at a high level, the conditions for which must be predetermined to the greatest degree possible. It was his own strong view that the selective use of atomic weapons would not repeat not result in total war. Their use could even serve as a warning "shot across the bow," i.e. selected targets could be engaged with low yield atomic weapons of great accuracy to warn against future aggression by an attacker. Closer cooperation was required between the political and military authorities of national governments under this concept than was true for implementation of the concept of massive retaliation. If the die were cast for the use of major strategic forces a process was set in operation which required little political control. Essentially under such a concept one threw all one's power as quickly as one could into a do or die effort. On the contrary the selective use of atomic weapons to make the deterrent fully effective and to prevent the move to mutual suicide required much greater integration between civilian and military authorities.

6. General Norstad spoke briefly and in terms which would be familiar to you from our earlier reports about his understanding of the control problem. He emphasized once again that public statements gave the impression that a new control problem was raised because of some new idea of a NATO nuclear force. This was simply not repeat not true. There were atomic weapons in NATO at this moment and there would always be atomic weapons; the control problem therefore was not related to any new force requirement which he (Norstad) might put forward, but existed today. We were as he put in a “power game whether we like it or not repeat not.” NATO must have the power to offset that of the potential aggressor, but having it we must be able to control it. It did not repeat not make sense to him that we could allow the relative power of the potential aggressor to increase vis-à-vis our own. He went on to say that in all his many soundings in Europe he could say quite flatly that no repeat no governmental opposition existed to the provision of nuclear weapons for NATO forces in Europe. He said as well that he had been approached by a number of senior French civilian and military authorities who urged him to find a method of integration which would permit France at an appropriate time to cease production of their own atomic weapons. He had been urged to do all he could to develop NATO control of its atomic forces so that when political situation permitted France could adhere to the system.

7. Force Goals. General Norstad reviewed very briefly the method which he proposed to follow in briefing countries on the new force goals for the 1966 period. We were not repeat not able to follow all his detailed comments in this context but understand that they were outlined to the chiefs of staff when he spoke to the Military Committee recently. We did understand that he will invite representatives of Department of Defence to come to SHAPE for briefings beginning early in May. These briefings will cover the broad strategic concept, overall NATO force requirements for 1966, individual country breakdowns for 1966, and the detailed, country force programmes for 1962 to 1964. While speaking on this subject he rapidly outlined the figures involved in his new requests which certainly gave the impression that his new force requirements are more of a development or a modernization of present weapons than a striking increase in the nuclear capability of existing forces.

8. Oslo Meeting. Finally and almost as an aside to our conversation General Norstad left an impression that Mr. Rusk might at Oslo reaffirm most of the Herter proposals of last December. He suggested that he would probably indicate that USA forces will be left in Europe, that Polaris submarines will be made available for NATO defence, that USA stockpiles will remain in Europe, and that USA would be willing to explore the concept of increasing the authority of the Alliance over the atomic stockpile as a whole. He suggested that Mr. Rusk would express USA interest as well in the creation of a multilateral NATO MRBM force but would give clear indication that USA thought this was essentially a European decision to take. I would suggest that we should perhaps make an attempt to find out more certainly in Washington of Mr. Rusk’s plans in this regard.

LONG-TERM PLANNING – NATO NUCLEAR POLICY

As we indicated in our telegram No. DL-548 of April 7† we are in favour of continuing these exchanges between the Permanent Representatives. For the purpose of the discussion on Tuesday we suggest that you should continue to be guided by the considerations set forth in our message under reference as well as by the following points which reflect Canadian preliminary views:

(1) We are generally in accord with the trend of thinking on NATO strategy evident in Mr. Finletter's statement and in the report of the Kennedy-Macmillan talks and you should express support for the general line being followed by the USA delegation. In particular we believe that it is highly important to improve NATO's capability to check a Soviet conventional attack without resorting in the first instance to the use of nuclear weapons by NATO shield forces.

(2) We would agree with the main emphasis in the USA presentation on the fulfilment of MC/70 goals as a means of achieving this aim, with priority being given to shortfalls in the quantity and quality of conventional forces.

(3) It may be worth bearing in mind that Canadian Representatives have consistently emphasized the need to meet currently agreed forces goals and have stressed the importance of ensuring that the forces contributed are of a high quality and equipped with the most up-to-date equipment. Moreover, we have drawn attention to the fact that the results of the annual review have indicated a wide degree of variance in the progress which individual countries of the Alliance have made in respect of achieving the overall force goals based on MC/70.

(4) We also share the view that it is of the utmost importance to reduce to the minimum the risks of accident, miscalculation and escalation. In this connection the question of ensuring effective controls over the use of nuclear weapons in the NATO shield forces is of the utmost importance. These controls must be (i) military, to eliminate as far as possible the risk of war by accident and (ii) political, to ensure that such weapons are only used on the basis of decisions taken at the highest level of political authority.

(5) It remains a matter for careful analysis and study what arrangements can be made for introducing a workable and acceptable system of political controls over the use of nuclear weapons by NATO forces.

LONG TERM PLANNING – NUCLEAR POLICY

Our report on Council meeting of April 26 (our telegram 1061 April 26)† had gone forward before receipt of your reference telegram. You will note from that report that a Secretariat document (PO(61) 448) summing up the important considerations concerning NATO strategy and nuclear weapons which have been touched on in various meetings of the Council will be going forward by bag on April 28. We believe that it will meet your request for a background paper insofar as the main elements of the discussions to date are concerned. It does not repeat not however deal with the positions adopted by various members of the Council. We shall therefore in this telegram give our impressions on this score. Before doing that we would suggest that the most useful documents for the delegation's brief on this subject would be the following: The new Secretariat paper PO(61) 448; the UK paper TYP/UK(61)1; Finletter's most recent statement (our telegram 1054 April 26);† General Norstad's address to the NATO parliamentarians on November 21/60; and President Kennedy's address to the Military Committee earlier, this month (Washington telegram 1134 April 11).† The general accounts of Acheson's views provided in Washington telegram 1098 April 6† and our telegram 1024 April 21† might also be useful as general background in the delegation brief. We would hope it would be possible that the delegation could bring from Ottawa one or two copies of MC48/2, MC14/2 and the political directive CM56/138. All of these documents are in very short supply and it would be very useful for us if one copy of each could be brought over to be left with us in Paris.

2. The USA and UK delegations have taken fairly well-defined positions as indicated in the UK paper and in a number of statements by Finletter particularly his most recent statement on April 26. Both delegations have indicated that their authorities would be reluctant to support the idea of a redrafting of the political directive and of the strategic papers which have flowed from it. USA in particular has taken a strong line that these documents are flexible enough to allow the necessary interpretations required to meet NATO military needs in the foreseeable future. I think it is safe to say that this view is shared by most delegations who have spoken in the course of the discussions. We believe this view is also shared by the Secretary-General.

3. While there is then a general reluctance evident in the Council to contemplate the redrafting of basic papers in this field there is nonetheless a general recognition that NATO strategy must be discussed seriously and at length in the Council because (a) the nature of the weapons is changing and nuclear weapons are becoming more readily available; (b) the cost of the weapons is increasing; (c) the nature of the Soviet military threat may be changing somewhat; and (d) there is need for greater clarity and understanding on the means of joint control over the use of NATO's nuclear weapons. Aside from these points there are other problems of a more national character which suggest the necessity of Council consideration of the problem. Most important of these are the determination of General de Gaulle to develop a national nuclear force and to limit his cooperation with NATO in this field; the restrictive USA approach whereby nuclear warheads remain in USA custody and the UK possession of warheads. There is concern as well to find a framework which will continue to contain a growing German military power within the Alliance, especially in the days after Adenauer. Finally I believe that although there has been some temporary soft-peddling of the USA views which characterized the last days of the Eisenhower administration that Europe could afford to devote greater resources to its own defences, this view will come to the fore again.

4. The views of General Norstad cannot be neglected in any general approach on this subject and while we have reported them in some detail over the past few months we think we should highlight in this message one of his general themes. Norstad has gone to some length to argue both privately and publicly that, contrary to many reports, the force requirements which he has put forward for the period ahead are not repeat not revolutionary. He regards those force requirements as evolutionary and essential for him to have if he is to carry out the responsibilities given to him as Supreme Commander. Following on from the general position he emphasizes the following: (a) the necessity for member governments to meet MC70 standards; (b) the requirement for effective foolproof communications to enable military control of nuclear weapons; (c) the need to give ground forces mobility; (d) the need to enhance the survivability of present weapons systems and particularly of aircraft; and (e) the increased importance of modernizing conventional weapons available to the Alliance.

5. When it comes to details there is little common agreement. The European members of the Alliance, particularly the less powerful ones such as the Benelux countries, Greece and Turkey, have registered strong opposition to the concept of a limited war in Europe which is given attention in the UK paper. Representatives of these governments have taken a strong line in the discussions that any substantial Soviet attack should be met with the full strength of the Alliance from the outset. There should be no repeat no question of sacrificing territory in an initial phase against the possibility of winning it back at some later stage. This point of view has perhaps been put most clearly in the Italian paper submitted early in the new year. It is safe to assume that these members of the Council will continue to regard with great caution the idea of a limited war and even the idea of the pause.

6. Again there is division of opinion, although in our estimation not repeat not so fundamental as in the case of the limited war concept, on the emphasis given in recent USA contributions to the discussion on giving priority to the building up of the conventional forces and equipment of the Alliance. I think there is general agreement that the idea of raising the threshold of the use of atomic weapons is both desirable and necessary. If however this presupposes a much enlarged expenditure by the European members of the Alliance on conventional equipment doubts have been expressed as to where the money will come from. A number of European representatives, including those of Germany, Belgium and the Netherlands, have said that it will simply not repeat not be possible to build up two types of forces, one for conventional war and another for atomic war. The question here then is more a matter of financial problems than of anything else. The UK on the other hand makes little mystery of the fact that they cannot meet MC70 manpower requirements on the continent.

7. Insofar as the question of control of nuclear weapons and indeed of all NATO weapons is concerned there are even more varied opinions. Really no repeat no delegation has committed itself very far in this field beyond a general indication that the matter must be studied. The suggestion made by General Norstad that attention should be given first to attempting to work out some rules of engagement for the nuclear weapons of the Alliance may gain favour although it is looked on with a great deal of scepticism for the moment by some, particularly the Norwegian representative. It is likely to be supported by the USA representative, less so by the UK representative and fairly strongly by the new Secretary-General. There is a measure of agreement that any control system which may be developed must be secure, capable of rapid implementation, serviced by reliable communications and subject to political authority. The Secretary-General before he left the Netherlands chair suggested that an examination might be made of the delegation of control responsibilities to a restricted group of countries or that a system of reaching decisions in the Council by a simple majority and weighted votes might be looked at. This has not repeat not yet been picked up by any other member of the Council but we can expect to hear more of it from Stikker as Secretary-General.

8. The financing of new weapons requirements for NATO while recognized as a problem has been given scarcely any serious attention to date in the Council. Indeed the first concrete suggestion to be made on this score was made only on April 26 in Finletter's statement. That was to the effect that Council should develop a five year projection of increased resources that might be made available to NATO defence programmes. The idea of the multilateral financing of weapons may gain strength as the discussion continues. There may at some stage be some suggestion that the principles and procedures which have worked fairly successfully in the field of infrastructure could be applied to weapons systems themselves. The problem is real and will have to be faced. USA has indicated that it will be prepared to explore with members of the Alliance who clearly need help in achieving their foregoals what might be provided most effectively in the form of military assistance.

9. The problem of how the military authorities of the Alliance are to be associated with these discussions of military strategy and weapons has been mentioned but has not repeat not been given serious study. It will come to the fore as the discussions continue. There is a recognition in the Council that the liaison between the Council, the Standing Group and the Military Committee has not repeat not been rapid or effective. One major change has occurred with the assumption of the office of Secretary-General by Stikker. His relations with Norstad in particular and with the military authorities in SHAPE in general will certainly be much closer than those of Spaak. This is bound to have some effect on the Council discussions. It will not repeat not necessarily however aid in the solution of better liaison with the Military Committee.

10. There has been some renewed discussion of the problem of balanced forces and integration. The Germans as you are aware under the personal initiative of Mr. Strauss have put forward very specific views on the integration of logistic support. We can expect this German emphasis to be continued. We are aware as well from Acheson's comments that his study group were impressed with the need to make some progress on the integration of forces within the Alliance, a matter which has been accepted in principle from the earliest days of the Alliance but which has been given little practical effect. The military authorities have been assigned the tasks by the Council to continue their studies on this score. On the other hand only as recently as this week the Netherlands representative pointed out that even such a seemingly natural group as the Benelux countries would find it difficult to give concrete form to principles of integration unless they could receive direct and unmistakable assurances from the more powerful members of the Alliance that their national interests would be guarded.

11. These are in summary form our impressions of the attitudes of some members of the Alliance towards the principal elements which emerge so far from the Council's study of NATO strategy. Our impressions cannot repeat not be too specific or too strong since there has not repeat not been a great deal of searching discussion as yet. We are inclined to believe that with the publicly expressed determination of the USA to make improvements in this field and with the personality of the new USA representative, Finletter, we are likely to see more substantive discussion in the forthcoming weeks. Stikker as well will keep steady but moderate pressure on the Council in this field. On the other hand we have been given no repeat no indication as yet that USA, UK and France are working towards a better coordination or cooperation in their national endeavours. Unless this is done the atomic policy of the Alliance will not repeat not be satisfactorily integrated.

12. Four our own part we have not repeat not taken a prominent role in the discussions. We have made use of your instructions as circumstances permitted. We have emphasised in particular that the greater the military power of the organization becomes the more essential it will be to develop real and effective consultation. We have pointed out as well that the political purpose of NATO strength must not repeat not be forgotten i.e. that we have built this military strength in order to be in a better position to negotiate with the other side. Some of the immediate problems are perhaps more clearly European but the problem of control will affect the North American members equally as well as the European members of the Alliance. Our experience in working out joint defence arrangements with the USA may at some time be useful in the discussions which lie ahead. From now on we shall have to pay close attention to developments in this area.

NATO LONG TERM PLANNING – DEFENCE STRATEGY

1. As requested in your letter dated 28 April 1961,[†] the following comments are submitted concerning the recent discussions in NAC on NATO strategy and, in particular, the US position as stated to NAC on 26 April by the US Permanent Representative.

US Position

2. The review of NATO affairs by the new US Administration has served to focus attention on NATO's problems and, in the field of military strategy, to suggest remedies which have been apparent for some time. It represents a clearer statement of US strategic doctrine and a determination to face up to the implications of this doctrine, but it does not represent any significant change in strategic policy. The theme of Mr. Finletter's statement to Council indicates that:

(a) The US is concerned regarding neglect of the conventional forces of the alliance. The US reaffirms its intention to retain its forces in Europe and improve their conventional capability. At the same time, they expect European nations to give high priority to meeting their MC 70 commitments both in quantity and quality.

(b) The nuclear capability of the shield forces, while not meeting the full requirement of NATO Commanders, is formidable. The US intends to keep it that way. The US offer of an independent NATO nuclear deterrent force made by Mr. Herter last December still stands, and if nations, having met their conventional force requirement, wish to take the matter up, they are welcome to do so.⁶⁷

(c) The US obviously sees no early solution to the problem of NATO political control of the decision to use nuclear weapons. While agreeing that such control is desirable, they throw the ball firmly back to the European members to find a solution. Whatever this solution may be, they will not allow themselves to be placed in a position of being forced into or being prevented from using nuclear weapons, by European nations.

(d) The military requirements are clear. Their fulfilment is impeded by political and economic factors. The way ahead lies in closer co-operation or integration of effort.

Nuclear Strategy and Control

3. If Canadian policy on NATO strategy can be regarded as upholding NATO objectives while:

(a) ensuring that nuclear weapons are only used on the basis of decision taken at the highest level of political authority,

(b) not endangering the chances of negotiating a universal and comprehensive disarmament treaty by letting nuclear weapons get out of hand,

⁶⁷ Note marginale :/Marginal note:
Does not stand. [Auteur inconnu/Author unknown]

(c) preventing the unnecessary build-up of autonomous national atomic forces in order not to prejudice stability or disarmament, and

(d) not detracting from the main purpose of nuclear weapons as a deterrent to war, Canada can find little to differ with in the US position as outlined to the NATO council.

4. Because NATO nuclear weapons are largely in the hands of US forces, the decision to invoke the use of nuclear weapons effectively rests with one person, the President of the United States. From the military viewpoint this solution is probably the most practical one. Any measure of political compromise in this regard can only weaken the decision making process.

5. Furthermore, US custodianship of the West's nuclear arsenal tends to prevent the spread of nuclear weapons.

6. It is true that in the absence of a nuclear force which NATO "can call its own," the temptation of members, as in the case of France and Britain to build autonomous national nuclear forces is great. This desire is a direct result of the questionable credibility of the US deterrent, the wish to play a greater part in the councils of the alliance and the political cross currents which have beset Western Europe for many decades.

7. The problem of resolving the military need for prompt action in the decision making process with the political requirements of individual members of the alliance should continue on the agenda of discussion. In the absence of complete political integration in Europe, a situation which would automatically resolve the outstanding issues, US custody and control of the means of waging nuclear war is the best solution.

Conventional Capability

8. When faced with the possibility that the USSR, with its superior conventional capability, may be tempted to engage in limited conventional war under the umbrella of their growing missile capability, Canada cannot but support a balance of forces which would ensure deterrence to any form of Soviet attack in the NATO area.

9. The establishment of a better balance of forces within NATO by strengthening the conventional capability could play an important part in future disarmament deliberations. In the absence of any unilateral move on the part of the Warsaw Pact powers to reduce their conventional forces to near equality with NATO, the alternative is for NATO to increase her strength so that a common point of departure towards balanced reductions may be established.

10. A strong NATO conventional capability which is designed to raise the threshold at which nuclear weapons need to be introduced in to the battle, and thus increase time for decision making, is in line with Canada's view that the decision to use nuclear weapons should be taken at the highest level of political authority.

11. From a military point of view, NATO is not in bad shape and, if nations would fulfill their MC 70 commitments, it would be in good shape. This means only that nations should do what they have solemnly promised to do. Since Canada has by and large fulfilled her commitments, she is in a good position to press for other member countries to do so.

NATO AND NUCLEAR WEAPONS

As a matter of special confidence, Dr. Stikker told me that he had discussed with the Prime Minister his ideas about NATO control over nuclear weapons. The ideas he had expressed were based on views which he had put forward in the SHAPE "X" exercise. He had discussed these ideas with SACEUR and with Dr. Adenauer.

2. These ideas were that the circumstances under which nuclear weapons might be used might be divided into three categories:

- (a) surprise attack;
- (b) massive conventional attack;
- (c) various limited forms of aggression which would have to be considered case by case.

3. As to "a" and "b", Dr. Stikker thought that there should be an understanding arrived at in the Alliance that in the event of surprise attack with nuclear weapons or with a massive conventional attack NATO would retaliate with all forces available.

4. As regards category "c", he thought that arrangements could be worked out to enable the Council to decide whether to authorize the use of nuclear weapons and what particular types of nuclear weapons by some form of weighted voting.

5. The Prime Minister, Dr. Stikker said, made careful notes and checked his understanding of Dr. Stikker's ideas. We should therefore at once look up any relevant information in the files of the Department, to be prepared to answer any queries from the Prime Minister.

NATO – BILATERAL AND MULTILATERAL CONTROL OVER THE USE OF NUCLEAR WEAPONS

When Mr. Stikker was in Ottawa recently he raised, in the course of his talks here, the problem of control of nuclear weapons in NATO in relation to the present crisis in Berlin in two ways:

- (a) the problem of multilateral political control over nuclear weapons in NATO; and
- (b) the problem of authorization of possible use of nuclear weapons in the event that the present emergency over Berlin gives rise to hostilities.

The Secretary-General also mentioned his ideas for political control by the Council and, in particular, his suggestion for a weighted voting system.

2. The attached paper† examines some of the more important implications of this problem. Part I of the paper deals with the question of control over the use of nuclear weapons in NATO. Its main recommendation is that, if a decision is taken to acquire nuclear weapons for Canadian forces, it would seem to be in the Canadian interest to work for a multilateral arrangement for the political control over the use of nuclear weapons by NATO forces under SACEUR in addition to any bilateral arrangements which may be entered into between Canada and the U.S.A. regarding the control of nuclear warheads to be used by Canadian forces or U.S.A. forces on or over Canadian territory.

3. Part II of the paper discusses some of the risks of escalation involved in using nuclear weapons in Europe. Its main recommendations are that:

(a) we seek clarification of precisely what instructions have been given to SACEUR and by SACEUR to subordinate commanders on the issue of and possible use of nuclear warheads;

(b) Mr. Léger be instructed to discuss with the Secretary-General and the other delegations the development of adequate and effective control by NATO Governments through the NATO Council in order to ensure that any use of nuclear weapons results from a political decision and not as a military response to any foreseen or unforeseen contingency or provocation;

(c) Mr. Léger be instructed to stress the risks of escalation during any discussion in the Council of contingency planning in relation to Berlin.

4. If you agree with the general line taken in these papers, I would recommend:

(1) that a copy might be sent to the Prime Minister for his information;

(2) that a copy be sent to the Department of National Defence for comments;

(3) that a copy be sent to Mr. Léger for comments;

(4) that after consultation with the Department of National Defence, instructions be sent to the Canadian Delegation on the basis of these papers.⁶⁸

INTERIM REVIEW – CANADIAN EXAMINATION

Canadian examination was held on November 20. By reason of the requirement for a special meeting of Council on same afternoon, our examination was considerably shorter than in previous years. In addition, the extremely useful material which you provided us with in a series of recent messages put us in a position to deal most expeditiously with questions asked by military authorities and the international staff. We shall not repeat not, in this message, go over details of our answers since they were based directly on material which you provided. We will send you by bag copies of prepared material which was used in the course of examination.

2. Gregh commented briefly on our opening statement (your telegram DL-1489 November 15)† picking up the emphasis in that statement on Canadian efforts in the Canada-USA region. He said that it was perhaps unfortunate that by reason of the structure of the command details of the military effort made in the Canada-USA region were outside the scope of the Annual Review Committee. He emphasised however that the international staff appreciated the importance of the efforts expended by Canadian and USA Governments in that area of such great importance to the Alliance as a whole. He said the international staff had been particularly grateful for opportunity provided them this year to visit Canada and to get a clearer understanding of what we were doing in the Canada-USA region.

3. Military items as listed in subparagraphs (a) and (b) of agenda (document AC19-A/292) were taken up next and use was made of information which you provided in a number of telegrams including DL-1493 November 16.† In the course of discussion we were questioned on following points: replacement of ships and naval aircraft nearing obsolescence, problem of air defence of the aircraft carrier and escorts, mechanization of the Canadian brigade group, the possibility of pre-stocking of heavy equipment and supplies in connection with the possible deployment of the M-Day infantry division to Europe, survival capability of First Canadian Air Division, air crew-aircraft ratio of the Air Division, and possible plans for the transport of the M-Day Division to Europe.

4. While we will not repeat not attempt to cover this discussion in any detail since you are fully familiar with the answers which we gave, we think it would be useful to summarize a few of the points made by our questioners. The Standing Group representative before any military comments were made said that it was the overall judgment of the NATO military authorities that Canadian effort was an extremely satisfying one. He expressed the hope therefore that the “marginal comments” which would be made concerning Canada’s military effort would be thought of and accepted within the framework of this overall judgment. SACLANT’s representative in dealing with naval questions expressed SACLANT’s hope that an early decision would be taken with respect to the ASW helicopter for the McKenzie class destroyers. He pointed out that experience proved that there was considerable time lag between the taking of the decision and the procurement of the hardware; the earlier the decision therefore the earlier the hardware would be provided. As far as air defense of the escorts was concerned, he said that SACLANT was fully aware of Canadian problems but must continue to express his concern at lack of progress made in meeting the military requirement in this context. In dealing with the submarine, SACLANT’s representative used the formula reported in our telegram 3067 November 15† which was in effect a request from SACLANT for the provision of substantive information with respect to Canadian attitude as soon as possible.

5. Our comments with respect to mechanization of the Brigade Group were noted. Standing Group representative did express disappointment that the provision of the Bobcat would be delayed until 1964-65. He expressed the hope that the problems connected with the procurement of this equipment could be solved more quickly than was now contemplated so that the Bobcat could come into service much earlier. The Standing Group’s comments on our answer with respect to survivability was simply to emphasise once again SACEUR's conviction that this was a serious and continuing problem.

6. Gregh, in the course of discussion of military items, made two points of substance. He recognized that a real Canadian effort was being made to bring naval equipment up to date but he had as well to accept the expression of concern by SACLANC on a number of points. Canada seemed to be in same position as a number of other countries in making a choice between the better and the best. He had been struck in the course of this interim review by the recurrence of this common problem that governments faced of attempting to make decisions to acquire "almost perfect" equipment. This approach was of course rational and reasonable. If however it led to undue delay in getting any new equipment, perfection might have to be reconsidered. He hoped Canadian authorities would establish a proper balance between perfection and improvement in equipment. Similarly he commented in general terms on survival question. Survival capability of almost all air forces in central Europe had been raised in the course of the interim review. The "fragmentary replies" from many countries suggested that perhaps a "horizontal" study of problem should be made by military and civilian authorities together. The various factors of dispersal, hardening and VTOL aircraft had been mentioned as possible solutions yet there seemed to be no repeat no common denominator of views. He believed Secretary-General would probably propose some such horizontal study of question in his overall summary appraisal of this years interim review.

7. Under Item C of Agenda, i.e. "plans of action," we made two statements based largely on the paper which you indicated in your telegram 1492 November 16[†] had been approved by Panel. The Standing Group representative commented simply that Canadian response in military terms had been extremely satisfying. USA representative addressed himself to the indication we had given that a supplementary estimate would have to be sought to cover the financial implications. He said it was extremely encouraging to find a member of the Alliance who was willing to provide more money to meet emergencies than had been forecast.

8. Under Item D of Agenda, i.e. "finance and economy" we made two statements, one which was a slightly revised version of the material which we had already given the staff on the basis of your telegram DL-1473 November 10.[†] The other was statement on mutual assistance, the text of which was that contained in your telegram DL-1501 November 16.[†] We had on November 18 been able to arrange a meeting between Mr. Plumtre, Mr. MacNeill and ourselves on the one hand and the International Staff, with Gregh as Chairman, on the other. In the course of that discussion we had a full opportunity to develop the points made in your DL-1473 and to reach tentative agreement with the staff on the kind of amendments which might be made in the draft chapter. In that sense therefore the handling of Item D on the Agenda had been fairly well stage managed in advance. We made the same points and Gregh responded to a degree as if he was hearing them for the first time. We will follow up question with the staff in the next day or two and provide you with an indication of the kind of amendments on which we can get agreement. We were extremely grateful that Mr. Plumtre could find time to meet with the staff in advance of the examination.

9. In the course of the examination Gregh, speaking in response to our statement, did express the hope that Canadian authorities would see their way clear to making even a greater military contribution. He admitted that in almost every respect Canadian military effort met the standards set by military authorities. He recognized that Canada was facing certain real economic difficulties. However it was true that in the 1953-54 period Canada had spent a proportionately higher percentage of her GNP on defence and he could only hope that with the increased pressures on the Alliance Canadian authorities would at some time see their way clear to getting back to the levels of expenditures of these earlier years. Turning then to our statement with respect to mutual aid, he pleaded for perhaps greater flexibility in our thinking.

He emphasised that the staff did not repeat not misunderstand what we meant by ad hoc mutual aid and had not repeat not intended their references in this respect to be taken as criticism. Staff did hope that Canada would actively seek other opportunities to implement its policy. He then developed an argument which we had developed more directly in speaking to us privately on November 18. The International Staff did believe that many European countries were now in a position to help the less favoured nations of the Alliance. At the same time it continued to be of crucial importance that Canadian aid be continued. There were certain members of the Alliance who were underdeveloped. The more members of the Alliance who could help to bring these countries along the easier the task would be for all. There was a continued role for Canada to play in this cooperative venture. In the course of the long statement which he made under this item he prepared the way for the acceptance of amendments which we had already discussed with him.

10. In our closing statement we said simply that the international staff seemed to think that Canada was better off than we did ourselves. If we were right we would have to continue to deal with major economic problems. If the staff was right it might be possible to look at "marginal comments." Canadian approach to these problems was pragmatic and in the end we had produced the hardware and the manpower which was needed. Indeed we had exceeded our commitments in response to the Berlin emergency. We referred again to the Prime Minister's comments which were included in the opening statement pointing out that the Atlantic community was imbedded within our own borders and that the Alliance could continue to count on our cooperation to meet the military threat to that community.

NATO ANNUAL REVIEW – CANADIAN EXAMINATION
OPENING STATEMENT BY THE CANADIAN DELEGATION

Mr. Chairman and Members of the Annual Review Committee:

We welcome this opportunity once again to review the Canadian defence programme which, as in previous years, is mainly devoted to providing our share of the collective effort necessary to maintain the deterrent capacity and defensive strength of NATO forces in the NATO area, including the Canada-United States Region. The Prime Minister of Canada made clear earlier this year that support for the NATO alliance continues to be one of the major elements of Canadian foreign and defence policy when he stated: "Canadian defence and foreign policy are based on the realization that an equilibrium of power is essential to the preservation of peace. Commitments under NATO have become a measure of our stake in the defence of the whole Atlantic community and a part of the effort to achieve a balance in the world ... We are part of the Atlantic community. Our past and future make us that. When the Atlantic community is threatened, so is Canada." In this opening statement I propose only to touch on the main developments during the past year. I shall not attempt to go over the programme as a whole or to comment on the Draft Chapter which will, I feel certain, be covered adequately during the course of the examination. Since last year's Annual Review examination, there have been two important developments relating first to the defence of the Canada-United States Region of the Alliance and second to preparedness measures in the light of Soviet policy in respect of Germany and Berlin.

2. For some time representatives of the Canadian and United States Governments had been exploring the possibility of an arrangement which would ensure more effective use of the productive capacities, skills and resources of each country and at the same time demonstrate our mutual determination to improve the defensive strength of NATO and particularly of the air defence arrangements in the Canada-United States Region.

3. An agreement to attain these important objectives was concluded with the United States in June of this year. Under the terms of this agreement, Canada has assumed responsibility for the manning, operation and maintenance of eleven Pinetree System radar stations and financial responsibility for five Pinetree System radar stations which have hitherto been the responsibility of the United States.

4. The second main element in this agreement with the United States provided for the re-equipment of Canadian air defence squadrons in the Canada-United States Region with sixty-six F-101 interceptor aircraft and appropriate support equipment which will replace CF-100 aircraft heretofore operating with Canadian squadrons under NORAD.

5. In the third place, Canada and the United States have agreed to contribute 200 million dollars, of which the Canadian share will be 50 million dollars and the United States share 150 million dollars, for the procurement in Canada of a number of F-104G aircraft, associated support equipment and initial spares. The aircraft procured will enable Canada and the United States to make a significant contribution to the collective strength of the Alliance under our respective mutual aid and defence assistance programmes.

6. The other main development relates to Canada's preparedness measures. Last September, in the light of the deteriorating international situation, and in particular because of Soviet policy with respect to Germany and Berlin, the Government decided to take several steps to bring existing Canadian forces to a higher state of preparedness and to make more effective contribution of the armed forces to civil defence arrangements in Canada.

7. In the terms of our NATO contribution, these steps involve:

- (1) an increase in ship complements of the Royal Canadian Navy amounting to approximately 1750 officers and men;
- (2) an increase in the strength of the Fourth Canadian Infantry Brigade by a total of approximately 1100 all ranks. In addition, some 1500 all ranks will be made readily available in Canada as reinforcements;
- (3) an increase of 250 in the First Canadian Air Division.

8. In addition, in order to improve the general military effectiveness of our forces at home and particularly those earmarked for the strategic reserve, the Government decided to increase Army formations by 8950 personnel and Air Force units by approximately 1000 men. These measures, which are being taken to increase Canadian defence preparedness, will involve a total increase of approximately 15,000 in the Canadian regular forces, raising the present ceiling from 120,000 to 135,000 officers and men.

9. Coupled with the measures I have just mentioned, the Government is accelerating and improving its survival and civil emergency planning. The Canadian militia forces amounting to some 42,000 men will be employed for survival operations and steps are being taken to increase the number of men trained to take part in survival and rescue operations should the need arise. Approximately 100,000 men will be trained in special courses across the country. Such measures are considered by the Canadian Government as complementary to the effort being made in light of the international situation to strengthen Canadian forces in the Canada-United States Region and in NATO Europe.

10. With respect to the agreed Canadian contribution to NATO, the Canadian authorities have noted with satisfaction the favourable comments of the Major NATO Commanders and of the Standing Group concerning the capabilities of the Canadian Brigade Group in Europe, of the Royal Canadian Navy and of the First Canadian Air Division to carry out their assigned missions. As we indicated during our Annual Review examination last year, these commitments along with agreed commitments in respect of the Canada-United States Region involve a high level of defence expenditures. The two important developments I mentioned – the agreement with the United States and the special measures being taken in light of the Berlin emergency – will, of course, involve additional expenditures. However, it is indicative of the measure of our continuing support for the Alliance that in spite of the additional financial burden imposed by these two developments the Canadian Government is prepared not only to maintain forces which it has assigned to NATO but to increase them in the light of the Berlin emergency.

11. In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I would like to take this opportunity to thank you and the members of your staff and the NATO military authorities for the excellent cooperation and helpful assistance which has been extended to the Canadian Delegation and to the Canadian authorities in preparation for this examination and throughout the year. My authorities were particularly pleased to have had an opportunity to welcome members of the International Staff to Ottawa during the summer and to have been able to discuss informally with them various aspects of the Canadian defence programme and your procedures. Members of the Delegation and I will be glad to try to answer any questions you may have.

INTERIM REVIEW – CANADIAN EXAMINATION
STATEMENT BY THE CANADIAN DELEGATION WITH RESPECT TO MUTUAL ASSISTANCE

During the examination of Canada in the course of the last two Annual Reviews, full statements were made of the position of the Canadian Government regarding the continuation of Canadian mutual aid. I should like to review the main points made in these statements and to outline our present position.

2. It was made clear during the last two examinations that Canada would continue air crew training on the present basis, the provision of spares support for equipment already transferred, and contributions to NATO military budgets and common infrastructure. Technological and economic developments both in Canada and in Europe, however, made it no longer possible in future for Canada to programme equipment for mutual aid, on an annual basis, either from stocks or from direct production. It was stated that such materiel as might become available would be offered as mutual aid on an “ad hoc” basis. It was pointed out further that the Canadian Government considered that the economic and financial position of most European member countries was such that it was no longer appropriate for Canada to provide mutual aid for economic reasons.

3. From the references to Canadian mutual aid made in this year’s Draft Country Chapter and particularly from the International Staff’s conclusion in paragraph 23C, it would appear that what Canada has meant in expressing an intention to offer equipment for mutual aid on an “ad hoc” basis is not yet clearly understood. Briefly, it means that Canada will be prepared to offer as mutual aid, equipment which may become in future surplus to the requirements of the Canadian forces and which may have continuing value to other members of the Alliance, or to undertake production of new equipment in Canada for mutual aid purposes where an opportunity offers to do so with mutual advantage both to Canada and to other members of the Alliance. The recently announced agreement with the United States to produce F-104G aircraft in Canada for purposes both of the Canadian mutual aid and the United States mutual defence assistance programmes provides an illustration of the latter kind of ad hoc mutual aid.

4. The size and constituent elements of our mutual aid programme must continue to depend on our assessment of Canada's overall situation and requirements in relation to those of our NATO partners.

Question:

Navy.

Decisions have yet to be taken concerning, in particular, the replacement of ships and naval aircraft nearing obsolescence. Also air defence of aircraft carriers and escorts.

Reply:

Aircraft and Air Defence

The Canadian authorities are continuing to study the complex factors inherent in adapting an air defence missile system to our escort vessels. While these studies are being actively pursued they have not yet reached the stage where a decision can be made.

With regard to air defence aircraft for the fleet we would like to draw to your attention a letter forwarded by the Canadian Chief of the Naval Staff to SACLANT in May of this year. This letter pointed out to SACLANT that our "Banshee" aircraft would be retired in 1962, that a SAM system would not be available in the RCN at that time, and SACLANT was requested to consider the possibility of providing area air defence in the EASTLANT area under the principles of collective balance of forces. A reply has not yet been received.

Ships

A replacement programme for ships nearing obsolescence is under active consideration, but no decisions have been taken as yet. In the meantime, we would like to draw to your attention paragraphs 9 and 10 of the General Statement of the Canadian Reply to the Interim Review. There we pointed out that the construction of six new Mackenzie class destroyer escorts was continuing at the major shipyards. These are the improved Restigouche class and will bring to twenty the number of Canada's new A/S ships. The last two and eventually all ships in this class will be equipped with the Canadian developed variable depth sonar and also a helicopter platform and hangar for the operation of an A/S helicopter.

Extensive modernization of the seven ships of the St. Laurent class and the Crusader, an early type of destroyer escort, has been approved. These vessels will be fitted with the new variable depth sonar and will carry A/S helicopters to extend their detection and destruction capability against submarines.

A decision as to the type of helicopter to be used by the RCN has not yet been made.

A tanker supply ship is also under construction.

Submarines

Canada has not accepted the requirement to provide one submarine by end-1962 as indicated by the Major NATO Commanders country programme for 1962. Further, this is a new requirement for Canada and clearly would be very difficult to meet in 1962, even if the requirement were accepted.

Question:

The planned mechanization of the Canadian Brigade Group in Germany should be expedited.

Reply:

SACEUR requests that this Brigade be mechanized by the end of 1962. This entails providing armoured personnel carriers to carry all the infantry, self-propelled mounts for the artillery, armoured command and communications vehicles and some armoured transport vehicles.

It is planned to do this by providing the Brigade Group with the Canadian BOBCAT, a tracked amphibious and armoured carrier which has been developed and which will permit the various configurations mentioned above to be built on a common chassis.

Present plans envisage first introduction of BOBCATS in the Brigade Group in 1964 with 500 vehicles being delivered by 1965. Acceleration of this programme could be costly and would entail some risk of introducing incompletely developed carriers with consequent reduction of operational effectiveness.

In the meanwhile, the Brigade Group has already been issued with sufficient extra wheeled transport to make it completely mobile and permit it to train for all types of operations.

Question:

SHAPE recommends that consideration be given to the pre-stocking of heavy equipment and supplies in Europe in connection with the possible deployment of M-Day infantry Division to Europe.

Reply:

The question of pre-stocking heavy equipment and supplies in Europe is recognized as one factor bearing on the availability of the strategic reserve component. As indicated previously, this general problem is being studied, but it is too early to give a firm reply on any one aspect.

Question:Air Force – Survivability of 1st Canadian Air DivisionReply:

Canadian authorities have applied their research facilities to the overall problem of survival and in particular to the problem of ensuring survival of a portion of 1 Air Division's forces in the face of nuclear attack. This problem is complicated by the planned change in role for this Air Division from air defence to that of strike reconnaissance. This change-over is planned to commence late next year and be completed during 1963. There is some question in our minds as to whether the dispersal facilities required for air defence would be a requirement with the change of role. Further study will be made of the problem of dispersal sites when concepts of use of deployment airfields by strike squadrons and of deployment and release of weapons for strike aircraft are developed. In general, solutions to problem of aircraft survival are being actively sought.

Aircrew-Aircraft Ratio

It should be noted that the recent augmentation of 1 Air Division personnel has increased the aircrew/aircraft ratio on the CF-100 and Sabre squadrons to 1.25 to 1. The problem of increasing the number of aircrew to that required also exists in the squadrons in Canada. The RCAF is and will continue to be involved for some time in a large training programme associated with the conversion of its Canadian based all-weather squadrons to the CF-101 aircraft and the conversion of 1 Air Division Sabre squadrons to CF-104 aircraft. It is planned that the CF-104 squadrons will be established at a 1.5 to 1 ratio. However, there are no plans to increase the aircrew/aircraft ratio of the Sabre and CF-100 squadrons.

Question:Plan of ActionPresent state of implementation of the measures taken in response to Commanders' requests.Reply:

1. The Ambassador has already outlined the measures which the Canadian government has authorized in response to the situation arising out of the Berlin crisis.

2. Of these measures, the following will be implemented by 1 Jan 62.

3. Army. The Brigade was strengthened by the dispatch to Europe in September of 765 officers and men. This brings units up to an increased war establishment greater than the figures indicated in our previous replies.

(a) SSM missile unit of 4 launchers arrives in Europe in December of this year.

(b) Plans exist to lift a further 1515 reinforcements by RCAF transport to Europe. Arrangements have been made for the reception of these aircraft at airfields in Europe and for the transport of these reinforcements from terminal airfields to Canadian reception units. By end of this year it will be possible to move these 1515 reinforcements to Europe within 48 hours. These reinforcements will arrive with personal weapons. They will be provided with other equipments from reserve stocks now held in Europe.

4. Navy. The manning of ships in the fleet assigned to SACLANT has now been raised to 86%. This has been achieved by temporarily reducing certain shore establishments. It is not intended at this time to increase the percentage of manning of ships at the expense of other shore establishments as this would seriously affect ground training programmes.

5. Air Force. Of the increase of 250 personnel for the Air Division in Europe, all are in position which now gives the Air Division a ratio of aircrew to aircraft of 1.25 to 1. These additions have also increased squadron maintenance capability and improved the operational status of 61 Aircraft Control and Warning Squadron.

Further Implementation from 1 Jan 62

6. Army. The armoured reconnaissance unit with the 4 CIBG will be strengthened by the addition of nine light helicopters which it is planned will arrive in Europe by the end of February 1962.

In addition to the increase to the Brigade strength outlined, it is anticipated that the Canadian Army will increase its strength in Canada by approximately 3,600 by 1 Apr 62.

Navy. It is anticipated that the Royal Canadian Navy will meet its increased manning figure by April 1963 and it is estimated that 1,000 of the projected increase of approximately 1,800 will be enrolled by April 1962.

Air Force. As from 1 Jan 62, the additional increase of personnel strength in Canada will permit the RCAF an increased air transport capability by retaining in service a North Star Squadron which was to have been phased out as the Yukon heavy transport squadrons become operational.

In addition to the increases and plans which have just been outlined, the Canadian government has approved certain other measures in response to the Berlin crisis which affect particularly the Canadian forces stationed in Canada.

Army. The strength of the Canadian Army in Canada will be increased by a total of 10,600 all ranks in order to provide first reinforcements for the Brigade Group in Europe, to bring units in Canada up to full war establishment and to permit the formation of a divisional headquarters and immediate support units. These reinforcements will improve the combat effectiveness of the balance of 1st Canadian Infantry Division stationed in Canada and earmarked for assignment to SACEUR as part of the strategic reserve.

Navy. A total increase of approximately 1,790 men will bring existing ships, the majority of which are earmarked to SACLANT, and certain other operational facilities up to the strength required for a prolonged emergency.

Air Force. An increase of 950 will not only provide for the increased air transport capability mentioned before but will also permit the manning of certain radar stations.

National Survival. At the same time, the Canadian government authorized certain expenditures connected with communications, training, and procurement of special equipments to be used by the services in their operations to support national survival plans.

Mr. Chairman, in conclusion, I would like to draw your attention to the fact that all Canadian Armed Forces, including the reinforcements mentioned above are Regulars on long service contracts.

INTERIM REVIEW – CANADIAN EXAMINATION
 AGENDA ITEM C (ii)
 “FINANCIAL IMPLICATIONS OF MEASURES WITH RESPECT TO BERLIN PLAN OF ACTION”

The degree of implementation of the measures taken in response to commanders' requests as outlined by General Kitching, and the national survival measures which have been outlined earlier, will require additional expenditures during 1961-62.

The estimated additional expenditures amount to:

Navy	$ 1.4 millions
Army	39.6 millions
Air Force	3.0 millions
	$44.0 millions

2. In addition to these estimated expenditures which are superimposed on the 1961-62 defence budget, there will be a deficiency in the RCAF capital appropriation of approximately $45 millions. This is due chiefly to the rate of expenditure on CF-104 aircraft which has been in excess of the provision for that expenditure in the budget. These two figures taken together would indicate an overall deficiency in existing appropriations of the order of $89 millions. There are, however, under-expenditures and savings in other elements of the defence appropriations for 1961-62 which will lead to a net deficiency of an estimated $36 millions. It will be necessary to seek a supplementary appropriation from Parliament.

3. You will recall, Mr. Chairman, that in previous Annual Reviews we have often indicated that Canada's contributions to NATO have always been expressed and conceived in physical terms and not on the basis of simple defence expenditures. I believe that the situation I have just described is a concrete example of what we have tried to explain, i.e. when a physical programme requires more money, we take steps to provide that money.

[Ottawa], December 6, 1961

NATO MINISTERIAL MEETING, PARIS, DECEMBER 13-15 – CANADIAN POSITION

This is the annual meeting of the Foreign, Defence and Finance Ministers of NATO, which is held each December to discuss the main issues of international concern and to take stock of the overall defensive strength of the Alliance on the basis of the results of the Annual Review Examinations of the national defence efforts of member countries.

The agenda (copy of which is attached)† provides a general guide to the sequence in which the main items will be discussed. These are:

- I Review of the International Situation
- II Military Questions
- III Any Other Business
- IV Date and Place of Next Meeting
- V Communiqué

It does not, however, reflect adequately the extent to which Berlin will be the central problem for discussion under Agenda Item I and is likely to permeate discussion throughout the meeting. It seems probable that at least all of the first day of the meeting will be devoted to this question, although there may also be some discussion of other important international developments, e.g. in Laos, the Congo and Vietnam.

On the military side, it is not expected that the agenda will give rise to the discussion of any controversial questions. These matters are traditionally dealt with on the second day of the meeting and involve mainly statements by the NATO Military Commanders (covering the present estimates of the Soviet military threat and overall strength of the NATO forces) and by individual Defence Ministers on the problems raised during the Annual Review process with particular reference to their respective national defence efforts. In addition, there may be some discussion this year of the special efforts which are being made by the NATO member countries to increase their defence contributions in the light of the Berlin emergency.

The other questions on which there may be some discussion are:

- (1) Cooperation in research development and production and
- (2) NATO civil emergency planning.

In the light of the broad outline set forth above, we have prepared the attached paper which sets out proposed guide lines on the central issues facing the forthcoming Ministerial meeting.

I recommend that the attached paper be authorized as guidance for the Canadian Delegation at the December Ministerial meeting.

SECRET

[Ottawa], December 6, 1961

NATO MINISTERIAL MEETING, PARIS, DECEMBER 1961
GUIDE LINES FOR CANADIAN DELEGATION

I. EAST-WEST RELATIONS AND BERLIN

East-West Relations

1. The NATO Ministerial Meeting will be taking place against a background of some slight indications of a relaxation of international tensions, particularly arising from the removal of the December 31 deadline on Berlin,⁶⁹ and the publication of President Kennedy's interview in the Soviet press.⁷⁰ The pressures in the city of Berlin are, however, still being maintained.

2. These slight improvements in the international climate come after a period of intensification of pressures against the West and obvious disregard for public opinion which were notably at their peak during the recent Party Congress: for example, by resumption of nuclear tests – particularly the explosion of the 50 megaton bomb and the threatening attitude towards the independence of Finland.

3. Seen against long-term Soviet policies it is unlikely that this relaxation is more than temporary but it may on the other hand be motivated, at least to some extent, by a desire to correct what has undoubtedly been a deterioration in the image of the Soviet Union among the non-committed nations resulting from the tough Soviet tactics referred to above and culminating in the explosion of the 50 megaton bomb.

4. While this apparent change in Soviet attitude has its dangers for the West, it also provides an opportunity for progress in exploring a basis for negotiations with the Soviet Union when tensions have been eased and the West would not seem to be undertaking negotiations under threat.

Berlin – Negotiations

1. In order to be able to take advantage of the present situation, it is of the utmost importance that the Alliance should reach an early agreement on a Western negotiating position.

2. In the absence of such agreement, NATO members risk finding themselves faced with another crisis if Mr. Khrushchev chooses to resume pressures on Berlin with the West thereby losing the opportunity of undertaking negotiations on a reasonable basis.

⁶⁹ Le délai, fixé par Khrouchtchev dans l'aide-mémoire donné au président Kennedy le 4 juin, a été annulé le 17 octobre. Voir « Condensed Version of Khrushchev's Speech to the Soviet Communist Party Congress, » New York Times, October 18, 1961, p. 16.

The deadline, set by Khrushchev in the aide-mémoire given to President Kennedy on June 4, was removed on October 17. See "Condensed Version of Khrushchev's Speech to the Soviet Communist Party Congress," New York Times, October 18, 1961, p. 16.

⁷⁰ L'entrevue a été publiée dans le journal Izvestia le 29 novembre 1961. Voir Current Digest of the Soviet Press.

The interview was published in Izvestia on November 29, 1961. See Current Digest of the Soviet Press.

3. Canada believes that East-West negotiations on the Berlin problem should begin without further delay. If we delay opening negotiations, we run the risk of

(a) the Soviet Union signing a separate peace treaty with the East German régime, thereby (i) losing the opportunity of having the substance of a new four-power agreement incorporated in a Soviet-GDR treaty and (ii) being compelled to deal directly with the East German régime on Western rights of access;

(b) leaving ourselves vulnerable to gradual erosion of the Western position in Berlin and step-by-step encroachment on Western rights;

(c) allowing circumstances to continue until an even more dangerous situation could arise in Berlin.

4. To get negotiations started, Canada agrees to the formula of the "narrow approach" (i.e. negotiations restricted to access to and the status of Berlin) as an initial negotiating position.

5. Canada believes, however, that some of the broader aspects of the Berlin problem, to which the "narrow approach" in any event may well lead, will have to be examined as well. One broader consideration, which the Canadian Government consistently advocated as a means of obtaining a Berlin settlement of greater durability, would be to provide a role for the United Nations as part of any East-West agreements.

6. NATO should also examine the problem of the public positions the West should adopt in respect to Berlin. While it may be sufficient to employ the "narrow approach" in the initial stages of negotiations, something more must be provided to explain the Western stand on Berlin to the public, both in the West and in the uncommitted nations.

Berlin – Military Contingency Planning

1. Canada recognizes that the association of all NATO members with the 1954 Three Power Declaration on Berlin⁷¹ and various agreements reached in NATO since that time, particularly the 1958 NATO Declaration on Berlin,⁷² constitute the specific commitments of the Alliance in respect of Berlin.

2. The responsibilities of the Alliance as a whole in respect to Berlin bring with them a corresponding responsibility on the part of the three occupying powers to consult the Council regularly in respect of their contingency planning on Berlin. This responsibility stems not only from the NATO agreements referred to but from the simple fact that three-power action or response in Berlin could directly involve the Alliance as a whole.

3. This wider responsibility of the Alliance was reflected in the discussions which were held in the Permanent Council last month to provide guide lines for the NATO military authorities to enable them to draw up plans which might be necessary in certain circumstances to complement the three-power contingency plans.

4. Canada notes with satisfaction that the Council directive concerning NATO military planning for the Berlin crisis, as contained in PO 61/808, clearly specifies that "the execution of approved plans will be the subject of decisions by governments at the time."

⁷¹ Voir/See United Kingdom, Parliamentary Papers, Cmd. 1552, Selected Documents on Germany and the Question of Berlin, 1944-1961 (London: Her Majesty's Stationery Office, 1961), p. 192.

⁷² Voir/See "Communiqué of the North Atlantic Council Regarding Berlin, 16 December 1958," Documents on International Affairs, 1958 (London: Oxford University Press/Royal Institute of International Affairs, 1962), pp. 373-74.

5. We believe that while plans may be drawn up and submitted to governments for approval, government decisions at the time are essential to ensure that implementation of such plans is subordinated to the political objectives of the Alliance and in order to avoid the danger of escalation through retaliation. (This position is in conformity with Article V of the North Atlantic Treaty which reserves to each government the right to take "such action as it deems necessary" in the event of an attack on any member of the Alliance.)

NOTE: The question of economic countermeasures will be dealt with in a separate memorandum to Cabinet.⁷³

II. MILITARY QUESTIONS

NATO Annual Review and Military Preparedness in Relation to Berlin

1. While devoting our efforts on the political front to the initiation of early negotiations with the Soviet Union on Berlin, we must continue to maintain strong defences.

2. The Canadian Government has consistently met its agreed military commitments to NATO and is gratified by the favourable response with which our efforts were received during this year's annual review examination.

3. In the light of the deteriorating international situation last summer, brought on by Soviet threats to encroach on the freedom of West Berlin and to deprive the West of its rights in that city, the Canadian Government took steps to increase the military preparedness of Canadian forces assigned to NATO, as well as forces which are required for the defence of the Canada-U.S. region. These measures, which were announced by the Prime Minister in the House of Commons on September 7, involved a total increase of approximately 15 thousand in the Canadian regular forces raising the present ceiling from 120,000 to 135,000 officers and men.

4. Canada endorsed the directive agreed on at the 1961 Spring meeting in Oslo requesting the Council to continue its examination of defence questions and to develop for submission to the 1961 December meeting policy guidelines for NATO defence plans and programmes within the framework of agreed political and strategic guidance. In the event, however, it became clear that priority would have to be given in the Council discussions to developments relating to the Berlin crisis and to the improvement of the conventional strength of the forces of the Alliance. In the circumstances, Canada agreed with the United States proposal that further detailed study of long-term military planning should be deferred, because of the Berlin crisis, until after the 1961 Ministerial meeting.

5. Canada intends to continue to maintain its agreed military contribution to NATO in its present high state of readiness and effectiveness.

Cooperation in Research Development and Production

1. Canada continues to support the NATO objectives for Cooperation in Research Development and Production and has participated actively in the Armament Committee's "20 Projects Programme."

2. Sufficient experience has now been acquired to justify careful analysis of the present programme to determine whether it should be continued, expanded or redirected.

3. If there is a meeting of NATO Defence Ministers in the Spring of 1962, this would provide a convenient forum for reviewing the programme.

⁷³ Voir/See document 290.

III. ANY OTHER BUSINESS

NATO Civil Emergency Planning

1. Canada supports the thesis that civil emergency planning is an essential complement to the military defences of the Western alliance and considers that both national and NATO authorities have responsibilities in this field.

2. In accordance with recommendations made in the course of the Ministerial meeting in Oslo, we recently proposed in the Senior Committee that, as a further step in speeding up progress on the NATO aspects of civil emergency planning, the NATO international staff dealing with emergency planning should be strengthened. We would urge that when the detailed proposals that we are now preparing on this matter are submitted to the responsible NATO Committee, they will be given serious consideration.

IV. DATE AND PLACE OF NEXT MEETING

1. Foreign Ministers

The Greek Government has given notice that they will propose at the December Ministerial meeting that the normal Spring meeting of NATO Foreign Ministers be held in Athens in May 1962.

It is recommended that Canadian Ministers be authorized to express Canadian concurrence.

2. Defence Ministers

There are indications that some Ministers may raise the question of holding a meeting of NATO Defence Ministers in the Spring.

As reports from our NATO Permanent Delegation indicate a difference of views between governments on this question, it is recommended that the Canadian Delegation be authorized to explore during the December Ministerial meeting the need for holding such a meeting of Defence Ministers.

N.A.T.O. MINISTERIAL MEETING; POLICY TO BE FOLLOWED BY CANADIAN DELEGATION
 (Previous reference December 5)

16. The Secretary of State for External Affairs said that it was desirable to review the proposed agenda for the N.A.T.O. Ministerial meeting to be held in Paris on December 13th-15th, and to establish the guide lines for the Canadian delegation.

An explanatory memorandum had been circulated, (Minister's memorandum, Dec. 6 – Cab. Doc. 451-61).

Report of Expert Group on Africa

It was noted that the agenda contained an item calling for a Report of the Expert Group on Africa. The U.N. force in Africa had gone too far in attempting to force the Congolese into one federated nation, disregarding the tribal background and the varying degrees of development in the different sectors.

17. The Secretary of State for External Affairs said that the first public reaction had been in favour of the Katangese but there was a good deal of information now reaching the outside to indicate that back of them were mercenaries employed by wealthy mining companies. If the U.N. had not gone in, the internecine struggle would have resulted in widespread slaughter. Canada sat on the Congo Committee in the U.N., and had been very influential in preventing extreme measures being taken. Canada had troops in Katanga and must either back the U.N. or let it down. Britain's reaction against the military action of the U.N. force has been influenced by her other African interests, particular in Rhodesia. At the moment, the British were in an uncomfortable position.

18. The Minister of National Defence said that the taking over of Katanga by military force was not practical. Only a few centres could be successfully captured. The rest of the country would continue tribal warfare in the jungles. The further military action was carried, the greater the difficulties will be.

19. During the discussion the following points were raised:

(a) Some felt that Canada would be embarrassed were the U.N. to ask for more white troops. Others said that this was unlikely as there would be little use in sending more white troops into Africa. More African and Asian nations had recently been added to the U.N. force. At the moment, Canada was not likely to get any requests for additional troops. The Canadian personnel in Africa were dispersed in small groups attached to various unit headquarters.

(b) Some said that this would be a good time for Canada to withdraw her troops. On the other hand, this would leave the U.N. force in Africa in a hopeless state, as it depended almost entirely on Canadian signal units to maintain its communications.

(c) Some said that Canada should not take a public stand against the U.N.'s use of force, but that it might be pointed out, personally, to the Secretary-General of the U.N. how public feeling was against this latest move.

East-West Relations and Berlin

20. During the discussion the following emerged

(a) Some said that pressure might be exerted at the Ministerial meeting in favour of early negotiations over Berlin. This raised the question as to whether Canada should add its weight to such a demand. Considerable differences of view still existed between France and the United States with West Germany caught in the middle.

(b) It was said that the Americans were in favour of early negotiations, and in this they had the backing of the British. France would not even consider talking to Russia under present circumstances.

(c) Some said that Canada should not get involved in these differences. It appeared that de Gaulle had a reasonable argument based on the premise that there was nothing to be gained by negotiating with Russia, and therefore the longer negotiations were delayed the longer the status quo was likely to be maintained.

(d) There was no need for Canada to become involved in any argument regarding negotiations, as the government's position had been stated by the Prime Minister as being in favour of negotiations.

21. The Cabinet noted the agenda and the guide lines for the Canadian delegation to the N.A.T.O. Ministerial meeting to be held in Paris on December 13th-15[th, 1961.]

NATO MINISTERIAL MEETING – ITEM 1(A)
EAST-WEST RELATIONS AND BERLIN

As foreseen, discussion on the first item of agenda "International Situation" was focused on problem of Berlin and whether and on what basis negotiations should be undertaken with USSR. This discussion took place in restricted session with two advisers for each delegation only present in addition to ministers and permanent representatives.

2. Secretary Rusk opening discussion, analysed Berlin problem against a background of a NATO strengthened militarily, economically and politically confronted by the program of world revolution backed by the large resources of the Sino-Soviet bloc. Soviet pressures on Berlin had not repeat not abated, although there had been, what he called, some procedural improvement such as the removal of the year end deadline and recognition by USSR that it could not repeat not merely abandon its occupation rights or transfer its responsibility to the GDR. These Soviet offensive tactics were to some extent at least, the result of Communist failures in GDR, as evidenced by the outflow of refugees. Berlin no repeat no doubt, was a real thorn in Soviet flesh and Khrushchev is trying to pass it on to the West. On the other hand, Berlin was subject to continued pressure and must be sustained against Communist erosion of the freedom of movement in and out of West Berlin. Proposals put forward by Khrushchev so far carried dangers not repeat not only to Berlin but to NATO. To meet these dangers a policy of firmness and determination was required as well as unity. It was also important in a dangerous situation that Khrushchev should not repeat not be under any illusions regarding Western firmness so that he should not repeat not fall into the errors of other dictators of miscalculating the risks of war and taking chances with a dangerous gamble.

3. Rusk stresses the need for continuing consultation among allies on Berlin to ensure unity and the need for search for a peaceful solution. If essential interests of the West were threatened by the Russians, the Alliance would be faced with a casus belli and it was therefore essential to have tried to reach agreement. He said that a tolerable modus vivendi was possible.

4. By way of reply to French reluctance to open negotiations, Rusk said there was no repeat no need to fear talks with the Russians. The West certainly would not repeat not give away what it was prepared to fight for and essential positions could therefore be maintained. The negotiators could always say no repeat no.

5. In all the recent talks with Gromyko, no repeat no solutions had emerged but opportunities for further talks were left open. There was a degree of vagueness in Soviet position which offered some possibilities.

6. Rusk cautioned against the premature convoking of a formal negotiation, which would have to be conducted in the glare of publicity and would engage the positions of leaders on both sides. In his view, it was preferable to continue probing through diplomatic channels on a basis agreed to by the Western Four. In that way we would know how and when a basis for a peaceful settlement had been reached.

7. On the question of timing of resuming probing, Rusk said it should take place sooner rather than later. He was not repeat not ready to leave the initiative to the other side.

8. In private conversation later, Rusk indicated that while he had reached a reasonably satisfactory understanding with French Government about further contacts with the Russians, which would amount, in his view, to the opening of negotiations, it was still difficult to commit de Gaulle to any public acknowledgment of such an understanding as for instance in a communiqué.

9. Schroeder (Germany) spoke second emphasizing known German positions. Germany was not repeat not alone in facing the supreme challenge of Berlin. It did not repeat not fear being isolated because they felt they could count on the Alliance. In fact, NATO had been strengthened as a result of the artificial crisis fomented by Khrushchev over Berlin.

10. German Government would be prepared to work towards a modus vivendi on Berlin issue provided it did not repeat not prejudice in any way a settlement of German problem on the whole nor impair communications between Berlin and the Federal Republic. He also stressed that not repeat not only the economic viability of Berlin be maintained but also its psychological facilities, otherwise through exodus of Berlin citizens and withdrawal of investment, Berlin risked becoming an empty shell.

11. Schroeder was particularly emphatic about non-recognition of the GDR de jure or de facto. The most that could be accepted would be contacts between West and East German officials at the technical level to facilitate access, but this would be without prejudice to Western rights. Germany Government was also willing to reiterate its renunciation of force in solving Berlin problem and enter into a unilateral non-aggression discussion with regard to the Warsaw Pact countries.

12. Schroeder emphasized that any modus vivendi on Berlin would not repeat not mean abandonment of the ultimate aim of reunification. He urged that the unnatural division of the people in the heart of [Europe?] could not repeat not be lived with indefinitely. The main emphasis now should be on the solidarity of the Alliance. Before concluding Schroeder gave a summarized report on conditions in East Germany. Although thousands had left the East zone, no repeat no uprisings could be expected because of the known capacity of the Ulbricht régime to suppress any effort at liberation. Indeed the policy of repression was being stepped up and any proposed deStalinization was superficial. There was no repeat no sign of relaxation of the totalitarian dictatorship in the East zone. It was therefore important not repeat not to give the impression to East Germany that they were forgotten and this made it all the more important that NATO arise to give their support in assuring the freedom of the people of West Berlin in maintaining the policy of non-recognition of the Pankow authorities.

13. Segni (Italy) and Krag (Denmark) both advocated continued efforts to establish a basis of negotiations with USSR. Krag also gave assurance of Denmark's staunchness in the face of Soviet pressures over Baltic command and Finland. He also informed Council of the warning note delivered today to Denmark by USSR, which reiterates the old Soviet charge that the "Baltic command converts the Baltic sea into a concentration area for aggression against USSR."

14. Spaak (Belgium) followed with the most direct attack on French position and the most powerful appeal for negotiation. NATO was faced, he said, with the choice of either to continue a peaceful foreign policy allowing nature to take its course or to take more positive action to deal with the threatening situation. He urged that NATO take the initiative away from the Russians, who could always be counted upon to use threats to gain their ends and to face NATO with fait accompli. Situation in Berlin was deteriorating and no repeat no time should be lost to establish a basis of negotiation. While endorsing the "narrow approach," he warned against public discussion of negotiating position. Western essential requirements should be stated clearly and precisely. As to the refinements mentioned by Rusk about further probing and diplomatic contacts as against formal negotiation, Spaak asked who or what was left to probe. Soviets were probing the West while not repeat not divulging any of their own fallback or final position. It was no repeat no sign of weakness in negotiating, the only weakness is to be weak in negotiation.

15. Luns (Netherlands) gave strong support to German thesis, emphasizing that there should be no repeat no recognition of GDR or negotiation on European security issues involving disengagement or demilitarization or even denuclearization of Germany beyond the limitations that country has already accepted. Indeed Germany needed to be drawn more closely into NATO through the integrated force including the furnishing of nuclear weapons. He took direct issue with French position on negotiations, emphasizing that time was not repeat not on our side.

16. Couve de Murville (France) made an unconvincing and rather half-hearted restatement of the well known French thesis against negotiations. The issue was not repeat not Berlin. The manufactured crisis involved, in fact, the future and fate of Germany and therefore of Europe and of NATO and finally of France itself. Soviet objective was the neutralization of West Germany and dissolution of NATO through the detachment from it of Germany and, if possible, Scandinavian countries. It was for this reason France was seeking a new equilibrium in Europe to shield itself from Soviets. Presumably an oblique reference to the EEC.

17. NATO was involved in a trial of strength against Soviet pressures and intimidation with the possible risk of atomic war. Main reaction from the military side had been USA military contribution, but France had done what it could. Crisis should be faced with firmness and dignity and maximum resolution should be displayed in protecting essential Western interests.

18. As regard negotiations, France had never resisted negotiations in principle. Question was essentially under what conditions should negotiations take place. There were two essential prior conditions: (a) not repeat not to negotiate under threat of blackmail, (b) that West should know what to negotiate about. Neither condition obtained now. Khrushchev had renewed his threats and Soviet had merely reiterated its unacceptable proposals. He said that he had spoken to Mayor Brandt, who urged negotiations because of increased anxieties in Berlin, but in Couve's view, anxiety of Berliners would increase if negotiations, as probably would be the case, resulted in a compromise between the present status and the demands of the Soviets. He indicated that no repeat no agreement would be better than a bad agreement.

19. Rusk had said that no repeat no agreed basis of negotiation had existed with USSR but further probes would be necessary to try to establish whether such a basis exists. Couve said that French Government was not repeat not opposed to that position. He concluded, however, by emphasizing that it would be unrealistic to expect that out of such negotiations settlements would be reached amounting to a détente and that unity and firmness among allies was essential.

20. I followed speaking from a text which has been sent to you by separate telegram.†

21. Lange (Norway) supported my contention that it was essential to get negotiations going without delay, drawing on his recent talks with Khrushchev. He was particularly concerned about the evident hardening of public conditions on both sides. French argument against negotiations seemed to be related mainly to the long term Soviet threat but was not repeat not a valid argument in dealing with immediate threat of erosion of Western position in Berlin. The present exodus from Berlin gave real cause for concern and made Khrushchev feel that the time is on his side. He was in favour of agreeing on the “narrow approach” for opening negotiations and supported our case about a UN presence being helpful in giving Berliners a sense of security and viability. He also supported Krag in assuring Council that the Scandinavians would resist blackmail from USSR over Baltic command and Finland. Lange warned that latest Soviet note to Denmark with its ominous tone and oblique references to Finland might indicate that Kekonen’s understanding with Khrushchev might be short lived.

22. Home (UK) in general supported Rusk’s approach. Berlin crisis had to be considered against a background of what he called the “militant intervention in international affairs by the Sino-Soviet Bloc.” This required two responses (a) military preparedness including nuclear threat and assurance against any vacuum into which Communist forces might infiltrate and (b) find a degree of agreement or at least tolerance with USSR. Policies of force and negotiation were essentially complementary. People faced with the prospect of being blown into atomic dust had to have the assurance that everything possible had been done to reach agreement. He did not repeat not quarrel with French thesis that the question had to be seen in the German and European setting, but this did not repeat not constitute an effective argument against negotiating now. Our requirements were clearly established and the Russians could be expected to make counter proposals. Concessions should not repeat not be made without extraction of matching concessions. His conversations with Gromyko, he claimed, had persuaded Russians of the dangers inherent in turning Soviet rights of controlled access over to the GDR which could lead collision with Western rights into a conflict. This might have been responsible for the removal of Soviet ultimatum and the date on which USSR would sign an agreement with East Germany. While the Russians may have also suffered some defeat by having to erect a wall to keep East Germans in, the erosion of the Western position through sustained pressures were working against the West. On balance, therefore, time was not repeat not on our side. If we waited longer, the West might be faced with an even more dangerous crisis and the pressures for concessions on the West would be correspondingly greater.

23. Sarper (Turkey) and Averoff (Greece) both advocated early negotiations. Turkey emphasized, however, that negotiations should not repeat not be at any price. Averoff recalled that Khrushchev was regarded as a bold reformer in Communist world with many enemies, was looking for a quick diplomatic success and the West should be on the lookout against his wiles in trying to attain it.

24. Greece’s only hope of keeping out of war arising from neighbouring Communist pressures rested on the Alliance.

25. Secretary-General, in summing up, justifiably described this as an interesting and rewarding discussion, conducted with the seriousness and fullness which the subject warranted. He would not repeat not attempt a summation because, although there was large measure of agreement, one government was definitely opposed to negotiation, although not repeat not opposed to diplomatic contact with USSR. He indicated that further private discussions would be carried on in the hope of reflecting the greatest possible measure of unity in the communiqué.

26. A Communiqué Drafting Committee was set up by Secretary-General consisting of Belgium, France, Germany, Italy, Norway, Turkey, UK and USA, other delegations being welcomed to participate, which we are doing.

N.A.T.O. MINISTERIAL MEETING; ORAL REPORT
 (Previous reference December 7)

5. The Secretary of State for External Affairs said that the main discussion at the recent N.A.T.O. Ministerial Meeting had been aimed at determining the attitude of the member countries towards negotiation with the Soviet Union on the Berlin question. All fourteen countries in the alliance, except France, were in favour of negotiation. General de Gaulle, however, had taken the attitude that the time was not opportune for any negotiation on Berlin as long as the U.S.S.R. was making threats. Canada's position, which was shared by all other countries except France, was that the Western Alliance should maintain a position of military strength and be ready at any time to negotiate.

France, Germany, Britain and the United States had met the previous day on the Berlin situation and had discussed what might be said of it in the communiqué.⁷⁴ Because of the attitude of France, the communiqué did not reflect the views of the other members of the Alliance. In essence, the communiqué said that the diplomats of the countries more concerned should explore with Russia whether there was a basis for negotiation, rather than saying that there should be negotiation.

When the communiqué was presented M. Spaak of Belgium had taken a strong line that this was not good enough and that there should be a direct statement of intention to negotiate. Canada and Norway supported M. Spaak. The U.S., having agreed with France said nothing.

An attempt had been made by the U.K. to include a reference in the communiqué to the desirability of the U.K. joining the Common Market, but this had been eliminated by the Canadian representatives.

The key paragraph part of the communiqué was as follows:

“The Council heard statements on Berlin by the foreign ministers of the countries most directly concerned, and was informed of the intention to resume diplomatic contacts with the U.S.S.R., in accordance with the aims which the West is pursuing for the maintenance of world peace and in the hope that these contacts might serve to determine whether a basis for negotiation could be found. Their colleagues approved the resumption of diplomatic contacts and expressed the hope that a negotiated settlement could be achieved. After full discussion of the situation, the Council agreed that the Alliance must continue on its resolute course, combining strength and firmness of purpose with a readiness to seek solutions by peaceful means.”

6. Mr. Green, in answer to questions as to what there was to negotiate between the Western Alliance and the U.S.S.R. over Berlin, replied that there was,

- (a) the form of control over Berlin;
- (b) a treaty replacing the present occupation rights;
- (c) the possible presence of the U.N. in West Berlin;
- (d) the terms of access to West Berlin;
- (e) the boundaries of Germany.

He went on to say that the second major item discussed was the problem of U.N. intervention in Katanga. M. Spaak of Belgium was critical of the U.N. operations against Katanga. He was supported by Britain and France. Britain appealed for the help of the others in bringing about an immediate cease-fire. The U.S. supported U.N. action in Katanga.

The press had said, on the day following the meeting, that all fourteen countries were against U.N. intervention in Katanga, so the Canadian delegation and some others had felt obliged to tell the press that they supported the U.N. action.

7. The Prime Minister said he had received many telegrams criticizing the Canadian attitude in not supporting an immediate cease-fire.

8. Mr. Green pointed out that the U.N. force in Katanga was opposed by mercenary troops paid for by private mining companies and that, if Katanga were successful in its bid for secession, Leopoldville would follow and Communist influence in the area would increase.

9. Mr. Green said further that he had been re-assured to hear from the U.S., in great detail an indication of the state of their nuclear striking power in ballistic missiles and aircraft. They now believed they had marked superiority over the U.S.S.R. in these weapons. The U.S. also was sincerely trying to make the alliance work and consistently supported the U.N. as well. He was well satisfied with their behaviour. Mr. Rush had stated explicitly that, if there was an attack on any of their allies, the U.S. would be in at once. He spoke as strongly as Dulles had in 1957.

He went on to say that Canada's position in N.A.T.O. was becoming more difficult. West Germany was doing all it could to secure a nuclear striking force by N.A.T.O. and nuclear weapons for West Germany. Europe would become stronger in a military sense as well as economically as time went on, and with the formation of a United States of Europe they would become more aggressive. This would probably lead to their going to war with Russia eventually.

At the moment, he said, France was unsettled politically and there might be danger of civil war as a result of the intervention of the Army in the political situation.

Britain would say nothing to disturb France at the present time because of her desire to enter the Common Market. This would undoubtedly have an effect on Britain's relations with the Commonwealth.

10. Mr. Fleming confirmed that this was also his conclusion.

11. Mr. Green said that Canada now amounted to very little in the N.A.T.O. picture.

12. The Cabinet noted the report of the Secretary of State for External Affairs on the North Atlantic Council Ministerial Meeting held in Paris on December 13th-15th, 1961.

NATO MINISTERIAL MEETING – DECEMBER 13-15

It was hoped that the NATO Ministerial Meeting just concluded would demonstrate allied unity in the face of Soviet pressures over Berlin. Instead it revealed some specific differences, and even more serious potential differences in the making – serious enough to require some careful thought and analysis of their implications, as they may affect Canadian interests and the future of the Alliance.

2. Some consolation can be derived from the communiqué which, by keeping to generalities, was able to reflect agreement in general terms among the allies in their approach to world-wide problems. Thus the declaratory first part of the communiqué reaffirmed that the aims of the Alliance are a stable order and the seeking of peace and disarmament. The members of the Alliance agreed to reaffirm the pledges with regard to Berlin they had taken in 1954 and repeated in 1958 to defend the Western rights and freedom of the people of Berlin. They also agreed to tighten the military, political and economic links between them in the face of the Soviet threats. But even agreement on these basic goals is susceptible to serious strains on closer scrutiny.

3. Some of the more important implications for Canada of current and potential differences within the Alliance are examined in the attached memorandum. Since these differences relate to policy questions on which important decisions may have to be taken in the coming months, I would welcome your comments and the comments of the other Heads of Mission to whom this despatch and enclosure are being sent.

NATO MINISTERIAL MEETING – DECEMBER 13-15

I. Berlin

The meeting, which focussed on Berlin almost to the exclusion of all other issues, revealed that United States leadership and policy-making for the Alliance are being effectively challenged by France.

The important point at issue was what should be the appropriate diplomatic move to be made towards the Soviet Union over Berlin. The U.S.A. and Britain evidently wanted to proceed to something approaching negotiations – at least renewed diplomatic probing as a prelude to negotiations – without further delay. General de Gaulle, on the other hand – with or without the tacit consent of Bonn – took the position that it was wrong to enter into negotiations because this would mean concessions which the Anglo-Saxon powers might be willing to make at the expense of not only Berlin, but of the entire security position in Central Europe.

Despite support for the U.K.-U.S. position from virtually all members, and a vigorous counter-attack on the French position led by M. Spaak, the French would not budge beyond reluctant agreement that contact should be established through diplomatic channels to see whether a basis for negotiations could be found. In particular, M. Couve de Murville refused to permit any language in the communiqué which would reflect any allied desire for a settlement by negotiations. Because of the over-riding American preoccupation with the need for Western solidarity in the face of a grave Soviet challenge, Mr. Rusk decided to yield to French intransigence and to accept the compromise wording suggested by Mr. Stikker and eventually incorporated in paragraph 8 of the communiqué.

The West German Government whose interest naturally is focussed almost to the exclusion of any other consideration on the Berlin and German issues, was able to shelter at this meeting under the self-appointed guardianship of General de Gaulle. Despite the apparent agreement reached between Chancellor Adenauer and President Kennedy at the Washington meeting on the desirability of negotiations, the German Foreign Minister seemed content to allow the argument to proceed without his intervention, on the basis of the French Government against the rest of the Alliance. The argument was resolved in an unsatisfactory compromise reflecting an obvious allied difference, only when Secretary Rusk threatened to part company with his French and German colleagues in support of M. Spaak's demand that the communiqué should register an allied desire to enter into negotiations.

Since the German problem (of which Berlin is only a symptom or a symbol) is the only East-West problem which seriously affects central Soviet security interests (as it does Western security interests) and is therefore the only issue capable of leading directly to world war, Canada's interest in the outcome of this inter-allied difference is of fundamental importance. Pressure has been and will continue to be exerted on Canada to maintain the solidarity of the Alliance in the face of Soviet pressures on Berlin. Canada may be faced with the dilemma that it may only be possible to maintain solidarity on terms which may heighten the risk of war and in circumstances where Canada may have a minimal voice, as compared with the influence of the Bonn-Paris partnership, in controlling the situation through the North Atlantic Council.

In summary, it was evident at the meeting that Europe, currently under French-German leadership, is becoming increasingly unwilling to entrust the security of Europe entirely to American hands; that Europe now feels strong enough to insist on having a dominant voice in determining the fate and destiny of Europe; that France used the NATO Council for a political demonstration of Europe's ability to challenge USA leadership of the Western Alliance. In all this the normally influential voice of the U.K. was scarcely heard – presumably because of imminent membership in the EEC. The big question still remaining unanswered however is who will eventually dominate the European grouping – France and Germany or the U.K.

II. The Atlantic Concept vs the Third Force

The meeting also revealed that the movement towards European economic and political unity through the EEC, now in a somewhat incomplete form, shows signs of having achieved a momentum towards completion by the possible inclusion of the U.K. and of taking on the shape of a third force capable of exercising influence as an independent world power grouping.

Since power in dealing with both the Soviet Union and the U.S. must be measured in terms of nuclear capability, it is a notable fact that France and Germany – each in a different way – are now embarked on policies aimed at obtaining control over nuclear weapons. France, having failed to secure nuclear weapons on equal terms from the U.S., is going ahead with the development of a nuclear weapons programme and its own force de frappe which the foreign editor of Le Monde, André Fontaine, has described as "... the central point of Gaullist doctrine in foreign and defence policy," Le Monde, December 16. This nuclear force would be nationally controlled and is expected to be operative in accordance with President de Gaulle's plans within three years. The Germans, on the other hand, realizing that they are committed under their agreement with the allies of 1954 to renunciation of nationally produced or developed nuclear arms, are working towards a NATO-controlled nuclear force with the weapons supplied by the U.S.A. Defence Minister Strauss called for progress in the studies on the problems relating to the establishment of a multilateral MRBM NATO force and asked that the matter be treated as one of urgency.

The control of this nuclear force under NATO would give rise to crucial problems for Canada, as it would dilute the U.S.A.'s exclusive control over the issues of war or peace. In order to overcome the alleged disadvantages of having "fifteen fingers on the trigger," proposals under consideration by the Secretary-General and likely to emerge when discussions on this question take place in the Council may have the effect of giving a select group of countries the power of decision on the use of nuclear weapons committed to NATO. This group might well consist of the Six of EEC plus the U.S. and U.K., with a high degree of regional control over use in emergency situations.

The position of all European NATO members on this question is still not clear but those members in favour justify their plea for a NATO nuclear force mainly as a reassurance that European interests would not be sacrificed by the U.S.A. when faced with a Soviet threat directed against a European target alone. The solution of putting nuclear weapons under the control of a select group, however, raises in another form the Gaullist concept of a directoire which in fact could decide the issue of war and peace on behalf of the Alliance and involve Canada in nuclear devastation without proper consultation. Moreover, giving Germany control over nuclear weapons in any form may result in a violent Soviet reaction as it may be regarded by them as a "last straw" in NATO capitulation to German militarism.

The Administration in Washington seems to be fully aware of these problems and also of the need to improve NATO's conventional forces. It appears to be willing but in no hurry to share its control over nuclear weapons with its European partners, quite apart from the constitutional impediments to shared control. The United States position was set forth in President Kennedy's Ottawa speech when he said the U.S.A. was willing to "commit to the NATO command area five – and subsequently still more – Polaris atomic missile submarines subject to any agreed NATO guidelines on their control and use and responsive to the needs of all members but still credible in an emergency. Beyond this we look to the possibility of eventually establishing a NATO sea-borne missile force which would be truly multilateral in ownership and control, if this should be desired and found feasible by our allies once NATO's non-nuclear goals have been achieved."⁷⁵

III. Relations with the United Nations

The discussion on the Katanga issue at the Ministerial meeting demonstrated more than ever how France and the U.K. particularly will resist subordinating their national interests to those of the U.N. Over Katanga, the British, French, Belgians, with the support of the other former colonial powers including the Netherlands and Portugal, took the view that the U.N. appeared to be acting well beyond its functions under the U.N. Charter, and challenged U.S. support for the U.N. Only Canada and Norway voiced support for Secretary Rusk, arguing that the world organization had a primary obligation to protect its personnel from the harassment of the Katangan authorities. Denmark, Iceland, Luxembourg, Italy, Greece and Turkey remained silent, but it can be assumed that most of them would support the U.N. NATO is therefore divided on this issue on colonial lines.

But the attitude of scepticism and even hostility went far beyond the expression of mere doubt about the propriety of the current U.N. operation in Katanga. France, in particular, poured scorn on the U.N. and the Secretary-General showed bias against the U.N. in his summing up of the Ministerial discussion. He also reiterated the call for NATO examination of the voting positions adopted by members in the U.N. with a view to establishing a unified approach.

This attitude of hostility shows signs of increasing as the Alliance falls increasingly under the influence of the Bonn-Paris partnership. After all, West Germany, not being a member of the U.N., can afford to be indifferent to its influence and fate. France, in its approach to its colonial problems, has directly rejected U.N. intervention and regards the enlarged membership of the Assembly as an undesirable challenge to French national interests.

This development exposes NATO not only to isolation as a group in the U.N. but of presenting a public image of an organization dedicated to the protection of the higher standard of life of the privileged few enjoying the benefits of a highly industrialized civilization, in a world where the "have-nots" predominate.

The course of increasing self-sufficiency which the Western Europeans seem to wish to chart for themselves may also tend to confront the world with a group which under the EEC practices economic discrimination and in the U.N. practises political non-cooperation with the newly emerging countries of Africa and Asia, which may therefore tend to turn increasingly to Soviet leadership.

⁷⁵ Voir/See "Address Before the Canadian Parliament in Ottawa," Public Papers of the Presidents of the United States: John F. Kennedy, 1961 (United States Government Printing Office, 1962), document 192.

In such circumstances, Canadians would find it increasingly difficult in making a choice between supporting NATO and the U.N. The NATO which they joined was one in which the necessity of finding a means of exercising the right of self-defence under Article 51 of the U.N. Charter was clearly subordinated to the pursuit of the kind of world approach set out in the preamble of the Charter. In fact the preamble to the North Atlantic Treaty and the non-military Article 2 were among the justifications used in explaining Canadian membership in the Alliance to the Canadian public. If the European component of the Alliance were now to show itself increasingly out of sympathy with the approach to world-wide problems required of members of the U.N. under the Charter, support for the NATO in Canada might substantially suffer.

IV. Conclusion

The tendencies examined above which may lead the European group in NATO to ever greater self-sufficiency – economically, militarily and politically on discriminatory terms – pose serious problems for Canada. Because of its geographical location Canada, of necessity, does not belong to this group. Also because this whole tendency leads towards further divisions in the world through the creation of artificial barriers, Canada, as a member of the Commonwealth, as well as of the U.N., might find it increasingly difficult to accommodate its national interests in NATO if the Alliance were to go further in this direction. Urgent thought is therefore required in the analysis of these trends.

NATO MINISTERIAL MEETING – PARIS – DECEMBER 13-15

General

Although the intended theme of the meeting was to be NATO unity in the face of Soviet pressures over Berlin, the discussions revealed important differences on the central issue of what should be the appropriate diplomatic move to be made to the Soviet Union over Berlin. Views also differed sharply on the role and responsibilities of the U.N. in the Congo. Defence questions did not figure prominently in the discussion; but the more important statements by Mr. Strauss, the German Defence Minister, and Mr. McNamara, the United States Secretary of Defence, revealed some basic differences of approach to major defence issues.

In contrast with the meeting of Foreign Ministers in Oslo earlier in the year, the December meeting was marked by an absence of cordiality, a lack of organization and frequent leakages to the press.

ITEM I – REVIEW OF THE INTERNATIONAL SITUATION

East-West Relations and Berlin

The meeting, which focussed on Berlin almost to the exclusion of all other issues, revealed that United States leadership and policy making for the Alliance are being effectively challenged by France.

U.S. Secretary of State, Dean Rusk, opened the discussion with an analysis of the Berlin problem against a background of an alliance, strengthened militarily, economically and politically, but confronted with the problem of world revolution espoused by the Sino-Soviet bloc and backed by its significant and growing resources. Soviet pressures on Berlin had not abated although there had been what he called "some procedural improvements" such as the removal of the December 31 deadline and an acknowledgement by the Soviet Union that any responsible discussion on Berlin must occur between the Soviet Union and the Western powers and not between the Western powers and the so-called "German Democratic Republic."

These Soviet offensive tactics were to some extent, at least, the result of Communist failures in the G.D.R., as evidenced by the outflow of refugees. West Berlin has indeed been a thorn in Soviet flesh; Communist failures have put pressures on Mr. Khrushchev who is trying to pass those pressures on to the West for a far-reaching new solution of the Berlin problem. On the other hand, Berlin was subject to continued pressure and must be sustained against Communist erosion. The minimum elements of "a tolerable modus vivendi" are that "the West Berliners be protected against engulfment, that they be supported against erosion ... that they enjoy free access to the rest of the world, including uncensored access, in order that the East Germans will not be in a position to determine who shall move back and forth ... We believe that they must continue to be in a position to exercise their own free choice with respect to their institutions, their laws, their protection and their relations with others and that close relations with the Federal Republic should be sustained."

The proposals put forward so far by Mr. Khrushchev carried dangers not only to Berlin but to NATO. To meet these dangers a policy of firmness and determination was required as well as unity. It was also important in a dangerous situation that Mr. Khrushchev should not be under any illusions regarding Western firmness so that he should not fall into the errors of other dictators of miscalculating the risks of war and taking chances with a dangerous gamble. The United States attached great importance to the measures of a military nature which have been discussed in NATO "because we think those military measures are themselves eloquent. Indeed I think that one has found in this autumn period a certain degree of caution in Mr. Khrushchev which was missing in the summer." Mr. Rusk stressed the need for continuing Allied consultation on Berlin to ensure unity and the need to search for a peaceful solution. With a policy of firmness must go a readiness, through responsible contacts with the Soviet Union, to search for peaceful solutions. If West Berlin engages the vital interests of the West and "if attack upon those vital interests is a causus belli, then it would seem to us that it is of great importance that we establish effective contact with the other side in order that a crisis should not move too far, too fast and on an uninformed basis."

The United States did not know "whether it is possible to find a basis for negotiation in the classic sense," but given the issues and the dangers it was wise and prudent to maintain effective contact in order to find out what possibilities exist for a peaceful settlement. There was no need to fear a negotiation in which we would give away that which we would be prepared to fight for. The negotiators could always say no. In all the recent talks with Mr. Gromyko, no basis of negotiation had emerged but certain questions were left open; a degree of vagueness was present which left the way for further exploration.

Mr. Rusk cautioned against the premature convoking of a formal negotiation which would have to be conducted in the formal glare of publicity and would engage the positions of leaders on both sides. In his view, it was preferable to continue probing through diplomatic channels on a basis agreed to by the Western Four. In that way "we may discover how, whether and when the possibilities for a peaceful settlement can be found." On the question of timing of resumed probings, Mr. Rusk said it should take place sooner rather than later. He was not ready to leave the initiative to the other side.

The new German Foreign Minister, Mr. Schroeder, following Mr. Rusk, outlined well-known German positions. Germany was not alone in facing the supreme challenge of Berlin. They did not fear being isolated because they felt they could count on the Alliance. In fact NATO had been strengthened as a result of the artificial crisis fomented by Mr. Khrushchev over Berlin.

The West should envisage negotiating either about the comprehensive problem involving German reunification and European security, or about a very restricted subject such as some aspects of the Berlin problem. While it was probable that the restricted subject would be the best point of departure, negotiations of this nature will not lead to a final solution of the Berlin problem which was only conceivable in terms of reunification with Berlin as the capital.

Germany would be prepared to work towards a modus vivendi provided it did not prejudice in any way the settlement of the Berlin problem as a whole. The "main hope of these negotiations would be to improve access." He also stressed the importance of preserving the "psychological viability of West Berlin" which depended on the maintenance of economic, financial and political links with the Federal Republic. Otherwise through the exodus of citizens and the withdrawal of investment Berlin risked becoming an empty shell whose defence would be pointless.

Mr. Schroeder was particularly emphatic about non-recognition of the East German régime either de jure or de facto. If recognition were granted to the régime, this would only encourage the Soviets to attempt further expansionist moves in Europe. It would also give the people of East Germany the impression that they were being forgotten by the West. On the other hand, within the framework of this policy the Federal Republic was prepared "to establish contacts with the Soviet zone at the technical level in order to ensure that the practical problems of access to Berlin are handled as smoothly as possible." But this would be without prejudice to Western rights.

The problem of the German frontiers and European security should not form part of the settlement of individual aspects of the Berlin question. However, Germany was prepared to declare again its renunciation of the use of force and to agree to unilateral non-aggression declarations by NATO and the Warsaw Pact countries. Any modus vivendi on Berlin would not mean, however, the abandonment of the ultimate aim of reunification. The unnatural division of a people in the heart of Europe could not be lived with indefinitely. The main emphasis should be the solidarity of the Alliance on this matter. (Before concluding, Mr. Schroeder gave a summarized report on conditions in East Germany which underlined the fact that there was no sign of relaxation of the totalitarian dictatorship in the eastern zone.)

Mr. Segni and Mr. Krag, the Italian and Danish Foreign Ministers, both advocated continued efforts to establish a basis of negotiations with the U.S.S.R. Mr. Krag also gave assurances of Denmark's staunchness in the face of Soviet pressures over the Baltic Command and Finland. He reported on the approval given to the Baltic Command by the Danish Parliament and on the warning note delivered by the Soviet Union reiterating the old charge that the Baltic Command converts the Baltic Sea into a concentration area for aggression against the Soviet Union.

Mr. Spaak of Belgium then launched the most direct attack on the French position and the most powerful appeal for negotiation. NATO was faced, he said, with the choice of either continuing a peaceful foreign policy, allowing nature to take its course or to take more positive action to deal with a threatening situation. He urged that NATO take the initiative away from the Russians who could always be counted on to use threats to gain their ends and to face NATO with a fait accompli. The situation in Berlin was deteriorating and no time should be lost in establishing a basis for negotiations. While endorsing "the narrow approach," he warned against public discussion of the negotiating position. As to the refinements mentioned by Mr.

Rusk concerning further probing and diplomatic contacts as against formal negotiations, Mr. Spaak asked who or what was left to probe. The Soviet Union was in fact probing the West while not divulging any of their own fall-back or final positions. It was no sign of weakness in negotiating. The only weakness is to be weak in negotiation.

Strong support for the German thesis was given by Mr. Luns of the Netherlands emphasizing that there should be no recognition of the GDR or negotiation on European security issues involving disengagement or demilitarization or even denuclearization of Germany beyond the limitations which it has already accepted. Germany needed to be drawn more closely into NATO through the integrated force including the introduction of nuclear armament. Along with Mr. Sarper of Turkey and Mr. Averoff of Greece, Mr. Luns took issue with the French position on negotiations emphasizing that time was not on our side.

M. Couve de Murville made an unconvincing and somewhat half-hearted exposition of the familiar French thesis against negotiations. The issue was not Berlin. The manufactured crisis involved, in fact, the future and fate of Germany and therefore of Europe and of NATO and finally of France itself. The Soviet objective was the neutralization of West Germany and the dissolution of NATO through the detachment of Germany and, if possible, the Scandinavian countries. In what presumably was an oblique reference to the EEC, M. Couve said it was for this reason that France was seeking a new equilibrium in Europe to shield itself from the Soviet Union. NATO was involved in a trial of strength against Soviet pressures and intimidation with the possible risk of atomic war. The main reaction from the military side had been the U.S.A. military contribution but France had done what it could. The crisis should be faced with firmness and dignity and maximum resolution should be displayed in protecting essential western interests.

France had never resisted negotiations in principle; the question was under what conditions should negotiations take place. The two essential prior conditions were: (i) no threats or ultimatums; (ii) the West should know what to negotiate about. Neither condition obtained now. Mr. Khrushchev had renewed his threats and the Soviet Union had merely reiterated its unacceptable proposals. He disagreed with Mayor Brandt who urged negotiations because of increased anxieties in Berlin; in the French view the anxiety of Berliners would increase if negotiations, as probably would be the case, resulted in a compromise between the present status and Soviet demands. No agreement would be better than a bad agreement. He said the French Government was not opposed to further probing to establish whether a basis for negotiations existed. It was unrealistic, however, to expect that out of such negotiations would emerge a settlement amounting to a détente.

Following M. Couve, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, Mr. Green, said the essence of the Canadian position was to keep the Alliance strong but to be prepared to negotiate. He questioned whether it was realistic to expect the Soviet threat to disappear or even to diminish. The timing of negotiations should not be determined solely by the degree of Soviet harshness and moderation currently in vogue; otherwise the West would forfeit any power of initiative or control over developing events. The four simple and constant factors in the present situation are (i) experience of the past few months shows that time is not on our side; the process of ever increasing pressure and of steady erosion of Western rights will likely continue; (ii) since the Soviet Union has it on its power at any time of their own choosing to sign a peace treaty with the GDR the West would then have either to deal directly with the East German régime or to resort to force, neither of which is likely to enhance the freedom or the security of the people of West Berlin; (iii) the removal of the December 31 deadline at least took away the element of an ultimatum from the Soviet position and enables the Western powers to explore the various possibilities of arriving at a basis for negotiation; (iv) if the deadline were reimposed or if Soviet pressures over Berlin were increased governments would be faced with serious decisions involving the risk of war. Before such happens it is essential for each Western government to be able to indicate to its people that they have endeavoured to improve the situation through negotiation.

In the hope of facilitating agreement on the Western negotiating position Canada agreed with the NATO statement recently sent to the Ambassadorial working group in Washington recommending that they attempt to reach accord without delay on an initial negotiating position which should be restricted if necessary to consideration of the status of Berlin and access to it. Canada also believed the West should not overlook the need to explore some of the broader questions which the Soviet Union may raise in the context of discussions on Berlin or to which the agreed so-called narrow approach itself may lead. Even in the context of a settlement confined to Berlin alone every means should be explored of finding ways to give Berlin secure and durable guarantees. One way might be a possible provision for a role for the United Nations. The very presence of the U.N., such as the holding of regular or periodic meetings or of moving the European office of the U.N. to Berlin would give a measure of stability and an international stake in the preservation of a free Berlin.

In conclusion Mr. Green emphasized that the worst step NATO could take in the interests of world peace would be if word went abroad that the West had no intention of negotiating on the problem of Berlin. On the other hand if NATO could announce a willingness to negotiate it would give hope to mankind and "will give a great fillip to the working out of some method in which the nations of the world can live together in peace" (Full text of Minister's statement contained in Annex "A").†

Mr. Lange of Norway, drawing on his recent talks with Mr. Khrushchev, strongly supported Mr. Green's contention that it was essential to get negotiations going without delay. The French argument against negotiations seemed to be related mainly to the long-term Soviet threat but was not a valid argument in dealing with the immediate threat of the erosion of the Western position in Berlin. He was in favour of "the narrow approach" and supported the Canadian suggestion of a U.N. presence being helpful in giving Berliners a sense of security and viability. He also supported Mr. Krag in assuring the Council that the Scandinavians would resist blackmail from the USSR over the Baltic Command and Finland.

The U.K. position outlined by Lord Home supported in general the approach set forward earlier by Mr. Rusk. The Berlin crisis had to be considered against a background of "militant intervention in international affairs by the Soviet bloc" and required (i) Western military preparedness including the nuclear threat and assurance against any vacuum into which communist forces might infiltrate and (ii) the finding of a degree of agreement or at least tolerance with the USSR. Policies of force and negotiation were essentially complementary; people faced with the prospect of being blown into atomic dust had to have the assurance that everything possible had been done to reach agreement. While not quarrelling with the French thesis that the Berlin problem had to be seen in the German and European setting, this did not constitute an obstacle against negotiating now. Our requirements were clearly established and the Russians could be expected to make counter proposals. Concessions should not be made without extracting matching concessions. His conversations with Mr. Gromyko had, he thought, persuaded the Russians of the dangers inherent in turning Soviet rights of controlled access over to the GDR which could lead from a collision with Western rights into a conflict. While the Russians may have also suffered some defeat by having to erect a wall to keep East Germans in, the erosion of the Western position through sustained pressures was working against the West. On balance, therefore, time was not on our side. If we waited longer the West might be faced with an even more dangerous crisis and the pressures on the West for concessions would be correspondingly greater.

In summing up, the Secretary-General justifiably described the discussion as interesting and rewarding. He was not prepared to attempt a summation however, because although there was a large measure of agreement, one government was definitely opposed to negotiation although not opposed to diplomatic contact with the USSR. This difference of view was, if anything, sharpened during the discussion of paragraph 8 of the communiqué. Despite support for the UK-USA position from virtually all members, and a vigorous renewed counter-attack on the French position led by Mr. Spaak, the French Foreign Minister would not budge beyond reluctant agreement that contact should be continued through diplomatic channels to see whether a basis for negotiations could be found. In particular, Mr. Couve de Murville refused to accept any language in the communiqué which would reflect any allied desire for a settlement by negotiation. Because of the apparently over-riding U.S.A. preoccupation with the need for Western solidarity in the face of a grave Soviet challenge Mr. Rusk decided to yield to French intransigence and the argument was resolved after some three hours debate in an unsatisfactory compromise wording reflecting an obvious allied difference. ITEM I(B) – REVIEW OF THE REPORTS BY GEOGRAPHICAL AREAS

Discussion under Item I-B of the Agenda was devoted largely to developments in the Congo and the role of U.N. There were also short statements by Mr. Luns concerning the situation in Netherlands New Guinea, by Mr. Rusk regarding developments in Laos, South Vietnam and the Caribbean, by Mr. Nogueira concerning Goa and by Mr. Sarper and Lord Home concerning developments in the Middle East.

The Congo and the United Nations

Mr. Spaak opened with a lengthy statement reflecting the difficulties which the situation in Katanga were causing in the Belgian Parliament and in Brussels. His concern arose not only in terms of the Congo but also in terms of the criticism in Brussels of Belgium's allies. The Belgian Government believed the secession of Katanga would be a serious development; a federal solution for the Congo was desirable. On the other hand, he did not believe it had been the intention of the supporters of the U.N. action that the U.N. should attempt to impose a political settlement in the Congo. In his view the U.N. operation was no longer a police action but a full scale war. He had found it extremely difficult to get clarification from the Secretary-General as to what the real objectives of the current U.N. military operations were. It was true that the Congo could not live without Katanga, but a destroyed Katanga would be of little value to the Congo. He was equally worried about the effect of what was happening on the solidarity of the Alliance. It was the task of the Alliance to examine the situation as a matter of urgency and to attempt to find some common basis for action. He hoped this common accord could be reached on a policy directed towards conciliation in the Congo and not military action.

Lord Home expressed his government's concern at what he termed the chaotic situation in the Congo which might extend right across the centre of Africa if we were not able to work towards a better solution. The only hope would be if the U.N. could enlist cadres of people who knew the African continent to help in the transition towards independence of the states in Central Africa. The original U.N. action had been designed to prevent the involvement of the Congo in the cold war. That role for the U.N. was still valid. However, it now seemed that the U.N. forces on the ground had got themselves into the position where instead of the U.N. being the conciliator it was now appealing to find a conciliator who could conciliate between the U.N. and the local Africans. (N.B. it is not known on what basis Lord Home made this assertion.) It seemed obvious to the U.K. that the U.N. was not equipped to undertake anything except the smallest police action.

In a short intervention, Mr. Rusk expressed his government's concern that the position of the central government be sustained and that Katanga should not succeed in seceding from the Congo. Efforts to bring Mr. Adoula and Mr. Tshombe together had so far been unsuccessful. It was his personal view that the U.N. effort last September had been a mistake. On the other hand the present fighting had been precipitated by the action taken against the U.N. forces by the Katangese. The United States did not believe that the U.N. could have as its political objective the bringing about of a political solution in Katanga. The U.N. could do no more than ensure its own security in its communications and protect U.N. forces from continual harassment by the Katangese. It was the hope of the U.S.A. that the fighting could be stopped and the process of conciliation resumed. The U.S.A. was not supporting any unlimited military mission for the U.N. in the Congo, but unless the problem of the Katanga secession could be resolved along with the problem of a possible secession by Mr. Gizenga's province, we were in deep trouble in the Congo.

Mr. Lange and Mr. Green, speaking later in the debate, gave strong support to the U.N. and to the U.S.A. position (copy of Mr. Green's speech attached as Annex C).† Of the four or five other speakers who entered the discussion, most were critical of the U.N. operation and supported the view that there should be an immediate cease-fire in Katanga and that the U.N. should concentrate its efforts in bringing about reconciliation between the central government in Leopoldville and Mr. Tshombe. There was no disagreement, however, on the main objective of obtaining a solution which would permit the establishment of a United Congo Republic including Katanga, especially since that province was, for economic and financial reasons, indispensable to the establishment of a viable Congo state.

During the discussion there was also a good deal of criticism of the U.N. by the United Kingdom, France and Portugal, and others, which went beyond its particular operations in the Congo. Lord Home in particular made a plea that the NATO Governments should give their serious attention to the present state of the U.N. He described the recent U.N. resolution calling for immediate independence for all colonial areas as complete and absolute nonsense and said that if it were carried out there would be country after country which would be brought to a chaotic condition within a few months. He asked how long the Western countries were prepared to continue observing the convention in the U.N. where "we all subscribe to or abstain on resolutions which we know are not only nonsense but, if they were carried out, extremely dangerous." In summing up, Mr. Stikker drew attention to this point of view and asked that serious thought should be given to the attitude NATO countries should take in the U.N. when "unrealistic" resolutions are being proposed. He also pointed to the plea made by Mr. Nogueira for NATO solidarity on world wide questions and added that to limit solidarity to the Treaty area was a disadvantage. Any progress which could be made in extending solidarity to world-wide issues would, in Mr. Stikker's view, strengthen the cohesion of NATO.

The Far East

The Netherlands Foreign Minister, Mr. Luns, referred briefly to recent sabre-rattling pronouncements by President Sukarno and to the number of military measures which were being taken by the Indonesian Government threatening an attack on Netherlands New Guinea. He therefore urged the allies of the Netherlands to exert as strongly as possible in Djakarta diplomatic pressure and warnings to the Indonesian Government against launching aggression against Netherlands New Guinea. He expressed gratitude that the U.S.A. had already taken such action and confidence that it had achieved the desired effect. He expressed concern that if India were allowed to overwhelm Goa by military might this would constitute a dangerous precedent and might encourage Indonesia to take similar action.

The following day the Portuguese Foreign Minister expressed his full support for Mr. Luns' appreciation of the implications of any Indian seizure of Goa. India, he said, did not want to negotiate "except on how we should let them grab Goa." They wanted no investigation of so-called incidents and were not prepared to abide by the judgment of the International Court which had clearly established the Portuguese claim to Goa. He concluded by saying that his latest information was that India would start military operations either December 14 or 15. At this point, both the U.S. and U.K. Ministers intervened to underline the seriousness of the situation and to indicate that their governments had already made strong representations to India.

On Laos, Mr. Rusk merely reported that the three Princes had had a meeting in Xen-Khouang and planned a second at the end of December. The conference in Geneva had gone relatively well but the possibility of further progress depended upon the formation of a coalition government which would have a reasonable chance of being a neutral government.

On South Vietnam, Mr. Rusk described U.S.A. efforts to provide support and assistance to the South Vietnamese in their fight against the guerrillas. He indicated the U.S.A. would be supplying military means which would permit the Vietnamese a higher degree of mobility both on the ground and in the air. He expressed hope that the allies of the U.S.A. would take advantage of any opportunities to give the governor of South Vietnam at least some political support and "if called upon, perhaps some other kinds of assistance and support."

Latin America

Mr. Rusk described briefly the situation in the Dominican Republic and the U.S.A. efforts "to get these people to set aside some thirty years of bitterness, fear, hatred, violence and to gather themselves together in a moderate coalition government ... (and return to) ... full cooperation with the Organization of American States."

On Cuba, Mr. Rusk outlined the preparations for and the problems relating to the January meeting of the O.A.S. He said the shape of the meeting was likely to be based upon the initiatives taken by Colombia having in mind the conditions under which Cuba might withdraw from its present ties with the Sino-Soviet bloc and return to full co-operation with the OAS. Failing that, the OAS would consider what measures it ought to take to protect the hemisphere from the kinds of harassments, infiltrations and threats which are coming out of the Cuban régime at the present time. He concluded by suggesting that the NATO members in shaping their own policies with respect to Cuba might wish to consider the extent to which they could take into account the attitude of the OAS as it evolves over the next several weeks.

Middle East

Mr. Sarper (Turkey) gave the Council a lengthy analysis of developments in the area. Lord Home followed with a short statement. The more significant points made were (a) the danger is now much less that Arab unity would only be achieved at the price of its being directed by the racial and extreme nationalist policies of President Nasser; (b) with the dissolution of the Union of Syria and Egypt, the present Syrian régime is much more inclined towards the West; (c) Iraq has alienated Kuwait and with it a portion of the Arab League; (d) although under great pressure from President Nasser, Jordan's independence is still intact; (e) with the exception of Saudi Arabia, the sheikdoms of the Gulf maintain friendly relations with the U.K.; (f) the Russians are on the whole becoming more and more unpopular in Iraq; (g) in general it is probably fair to say that Communism has had a setback in the area.

ITEM II – MILITARY QUESTIONS

Status of NATO Military Effort

Following a briefing by the Chairman of the Standing Group on Soviet capabilities, the substantive discussion was opened with a statement by Mr. Stikker, who informed Ministers that the Permanent Council's examination of defence questions and the development of agreed guidelines had not been completed largely because of the priority which had had to be given to developments relating to the Berlin crisis. He mentioned that, broadly speaking, two broad categories of problems had been examined: (i) the role and organization of the shield forces, and (ii) the utilization and political control of nuclear weapons. There was, he said, general agreement on the need for a truly balanced force capable of meeting any type of enemy threat but, he pointed out, some concern had been expressed about the high cost of providing such a force. He also referred to the general guidance approved by the Council instructing the Military Committee to ensure that the end-1966 force requirements took into account the necessary increases in conventional forces without prejudicing the development and maintenance of the nuclear capability essential to NATO forces. The military authorities were also reminded by the Council that, although action on requirements for MRBM's had to be deferred at this time, the subject would be considered by the Council at an early date. He concluded by emphasizing the importance of clarifying ideas in respect of NATO strategy and pointed out that the NATO military authorities recognize that the end-1966 force requirements will have to be revised in the light of the conclusions of the current study of NATO strategy.

The main substantive statement was made by the German Defence Minister, Mr. Strauss, who, after outlining German efforts to meet agreed force goals and the current emphasis on the build-up of conventional forces, made a strong plea regarding the absolute necessity of a strong nuclear component for NATO forces. He argued that too much emphasis on NATO's conventional strength would mean trading loss of territory for time and political manoeuvrability. "Germany, in its exposed military-geographic position like some other countries along the front line, must be freed from the fear that large parts of its territory might be overrun by the enemy either in accordance with the present emergency defence plan or due to the conventional superiority of the enemy." In such a situation an alliance with unbalanced forces would be faced with the dangerous alternative either of risking general war at the time or of accepting a loss of territory. A balanced deterrent containing both nuclear and conventional elements was thus necessary not only to have a certain margin for selecting military countermeasures but also to keep the deterrent credible for the European allies as well as for the potential or presumptive aggressor.

On MRBM's, Mr. Strauss pointed to the intelligence reports of growing Soviet capabilities in this field and the increasing vulnerability of the entire European area. This created a whole series of military, political, technical and psychological problems which would require serious study before nuclear parity is reached some years from now. While this situation is partially outweighed by U.S.A. and U.K. strategic capability to attack these targets, it does not solve the problem. He added that "the most dangerous weapon which an aggressor might use against Europe can be less and less covered in the future by the capabilities available to the NATO Commanders and more and more only by strategic capabilities remaining under national control." Germany, he said, had always advocated increased integration in the military field but if progress in this concept were impeded or further delayed "anti-integration trends might well become even stronger."

In conclusion, Mr. Strauss indicated that the Federal Republic supported SACEUR's requirements for MRBM's and strongly recommended that urgent attention be given to study of the political, military, technical and financial questions and to the particularly important problem of control. He expressed particular gratitude for the U.S.A. offer concerning the establishment of a multilateral MRBM force and for “the guarantee of a NATO influence on the nuclear weapons.” He agreed with SACEUR that in the framework of the modernization of armed forces and under the concept of balanced forces, MRBM’s are indispensable for the defence of Europe. He proposed that members should submit their ideas within a given date and that a combined political-military working group should be set up to study the control of nuclear weapons within NATO and the introduction of an MRBM system into Allied Command Europe and should work out recommendations for possible solutions to the problem.

Mr. Visser of the Netherlands spoke of his country’s defence efforts and expressed hope that the measures now being taken in order to strengthen NATO defence for the immediate future should, as far as possible, be designed to promote the achievement of the military posture which will have to be maintained in the coming years. He also expressed hope it would be possible to hold the Triennial Review in 1962, although agreement on NATO’s longer term force goals still had to be achieved.

On MRBM’s he mentioned that SACEUR had made many appearances before Council to justify this requirement which is supported in the end-1966 force goals. Without the MRBM element, that plan would no longer constitute a balanced force. In order to maintain confidence in our defence planning, it was essential that we determine soon how the MRBM requirement is going to be fulfilled.

On control over nuclear weapons, he mentioned that this is related not only to MRBM’s but to other nuclear weapons as well. He mentioned that one of the main conclusions of the Military Committee’s report was the requirement to be able to initiate, if necessary, a nuclear reaction within two - fifteen minutes. This pointed up the difficulty of working out an arrangement which would satisfy both the military requirements and the need for political control. The control problem was one which best illustrates the basic problem with which the Alliance is faced, i.e., the need to integrate the defence policies and efforts of fifteen sovereign nations for the defence of the NATO area.

Support in principle for the concept of establishing a multilateral MRBM force was expressed by the Italian Defence Minister, Mr. Andreotti, who devoted most of his statement to Italian efforts to increase the size and efficiency of their forces, measures which would necessitate an increase of 6% in the defence budget for the current fiscal year and of more than 10% for 1962-63. Mr. Sarper of Turkey spoke mainly about NATO strategy and strongly opposed any suggestion that the present strategic concept and political guidance should be revised. He was prepared to accept the idea of new interpretations of existing documents but was against any interpretation or revision which amounted to the acceptance of the notion of local or limited wars. He gave support to the Greek Defence Minister’s suggestion that a common defence fund be established to enable countries with economic development problems to fulfill more adequately their defence obligations. Like Greece, Turkey’s forces were heavily dependent on external aid and the government would have to place an additional heavy strain on the country’s resources if it was to meet its 1962 force goals and SACEUR’s recommendations in relation to the Berlin build-up. The Danish Defence Minister’s intervention consisted of a report on Danish Parliamentary approval of the NATO Baltic Command and on the problems relating to the present state of the Danish Armed Forces.

In the French view the main problem was one of establishing priorities particularly when, as the Italian Defence Minister had pointed out, even current demands were making heavy demands on national financial resources. These priorities would have to be considered, according to Mr. Messmer, not only in linear terms but also in depth and would have to take into account requirements for social progress at home as well as aid to underdeveloped countries which, after all, constituted a basic element in the West’s fight against communism.

Moreover, priorities would have to vary from nation to nation and in France's case account would have to be taken of its responsibilities in Algeria and Africa. He expressed worry about waiting for the build-up of the West's conventional forces if we have decided to develop our nuclear forces. He also indicated it would be equally dangerous to believe that, in the event of a Soviet conventional attack, Western conventional forces alone would be able to force a pause sufficient to enable consultations to be held to decide on the employment of nuclear weapons. A limited but rapid nuclear response would be indispensable in the face of widespread Soviet conventional attack.

Commenting on Mr. Strauss' remarks, the United Kingdom Defence Minister, Mr. Watkinson, said he did not see how it would be possible to make any final and definitive judgments on MRBM's until similar judgments were reached with respect to NATO strategy. Supported by Mr. Rusk he suggested that the German proposal, including the idea of a joint political-military group, should be referred for early consideration by the Council in Permanent Session. General agreement was reached on this basis.

Special Restricted Session on Defence

It will be noted that the United States did not participate actively in the general discussion of defence questions summarized above. Instead, at a special restricted meeting of the Council held following the general defence debate Mr. McNamara gave Ministers a comprehensive and revealing account of U.S.A. estimates of relative East-West strengths and of U.S.A. views on the more important aspects of NATO defence policy.

Since it was largely at the suggestion of the U.S.A. that the Permanent Council had deferred discussion of nuclear strategy last fall and had agreed to postpone any decision regarding the MRBM elements in the end-1966 force goals, Mr. Strauss' remarks could be interpreted as a challenge to the U.S.A. position. Moreover his references to a stronger nuclear component in the shield forces and to the need to avoid losing territory along the front line were clearly aimed at the present U.S.A. emphasis on giving priority to increasing the conventional strength of NATO shield forces in order to raise "the threshold" at which nuclear weapons might have to be used.

Mr. McNamara's statement began with a comparative analysis of nuclear strengths which showed that NATO has a decided advantage in terms of both delivery systems and nuclear weapons of practically every category and in terms of surviving strategic nuclear forces following a full-scale nuclear exchange, regardless of which side initiated it. However, since the threat of general nuclear war had not been sufficient thus far to deter the Soviet Union from pressures and other actions to erode vital Western interests, the present relative strengths in the conventional field were particularly important.

While the U.S.S.R. has superiority in conventional forces at the present time, this superiority, Mr. McNamara said, is not overwhelming. NATO has the capability during the course of the present tensions to provide a non-nuclear defence of the NATO area adequate at least to hold a Soviet conventional attack for a period sufficient to cause the Soviet Union to realize the gravity of the course upon which it has embarked. From this the Secretary of Defence drew the following conclusions: (i) general war superiority is and must remain a fundamental strength of NATO. However, because its effects would be so grave, it should only be resorted to after exhausting all feasible political, economic and other lesser military actions; (ii) the relative non-nuclear balance leaves the West vulnerable to the continued aggressive policy of the Soviet Union employing minor aggressions or limited conventional actions. A NATO capability to defeat Soviet aggression at whatever level it occurred would make such Soviet actions clearly futile; (iii) the West should make certain that it is better prepared for future crises than it has been for the present one. In the course of his remarks Mr. McNamara outlined the grave weaknesses revealed by a survey undertaken in connection with the Berlin crisis. (iv) We must recognize the dangers of exclusive reliance on general nuclear war as an instrument of policy and make the effort required to build a strong non-nuclear capability as well.

On control over nuclear weapons Mr. McNamara reiterated the U.S.A. view that “nuclear weapons must be subject at all times to responsible political control that meets the needs of all NATO countries.” The U.S.A. recognized the need for timely political decisions and the legitimate desire of all NATO members for participation in determining the policy, the strategy and the circumstances for the use of nuclear weapons.

On MRBM’s the Secretary of Defence referred to the extent to which a significant portion of the U.S.A. strategic effort is devoted and will continue to be devoted to targets which threaten Europe but which do not directly threaten the U.S.A. In military terms, the issue is essentially how to make the best use of our resources; political views differ however. The U.S.A. remained willing to discuss any steps which the Alliance might wish to take in this direction. To meet the demands of the mid-1960’s the U.S.A. had recently undertaken the design phase of an MRBM but this design project was without commitment as to future production or as to method of deployment. Although President Kennedy’s Ottawa offer⁷⁶ still remained open, the U.S.A. would not be prepared to facilitate procurement of MRBM’s for a NATO force which was not “truly multilateral in ownership and control” as described by President Kennedy in his Ottawa speech.

Concluding, Mr. McNamara listed the main future requirements of NATO defence policy:

(a) The Allies must continue to have nuclear superiority, delivery forces capable of defeating Soviet forces and, if necessary, capable of destroying the U.S.S.R. Geographic and military reasons dictate that the bulk of those forces should be based outside of Europe. The major portion of these forces has been and will continue to be provided by the U.S.A.

(b) Although maintaining a preponderance of tactical nuclear weapons in Europe, “we cannot – nor should we attempt to assign a general war mission to forces based in Europe which does not take account of the role of the nuclear forces based outside the continent.”

(c) Although NATO’s nuclear strength must continue to grow there is a continuing requirement for non-nuclear forces adequate to deter or to defeat Soviet non-nuclear aggression at various levels of intensity.

(d) Collectively NATO has much greater resources than the U.S.S.R. and its satellites and those countries which are economically able to do so should assume their full share of the overall requirements.

Resolution on Defence

At the conclusion of the general discussion, the draft resolution on defence (document C-M(61)143) was approved without comment. It takes note of the assessment of the NATO military authorities that “until the remaining deficiencies are overcome the capability of the NATO forces to carry out their assigned missions ... will continue in jeopardy ...” and underlined that despite the recent improvements necessitated by the Berlin crisis “national goals still too often fall short quantitatively as well as qualitatively of the requirements of the NATO military authorities.” Copy of resolution attached as Annex D.)†

Co-operation in Research Development and Production

The Secretary-General pointed out that the Armaments Committee was still engaged in preparing its report which would cover the results achieved in the specific twenty projects; he suggested the report might be dealt with at the next meeting of Defence Ministers if one were held. Mr. Watkinson expressed general satisfaction with the results achieved to date and expressed the view that the Committee was on the point of moving from its preliminary work to actual decisions where difficulties would probably arise. He urged that governments make a real effort to co-operate and to share the increasing cost and complexity of arms even if it does mean giving up occasionally individual national ideas and projects.

Speaking for Canada, Mr. Harkness underlined the continuing need for real co-operation in this field and reviewed briefly the wide measure of Canadian participation in the various projects. He said that the time had arrived to review the activities to date, to determine whether they should be continued, expanded or redirected. If a NATO Defence Ministers' meeting were convened in the spring of 1962, Canada supported the idea that the meeting should review the research, development and production programme.

ITEM III — OTHER BUSINESS

Economic Problems of Turkey and Greece

Mr. Inan of Turkey emphasized the importance which his government attached to the special NATO report which was being prepared on the economic situation in the two countries. He then spoke of the Turkish Government's long-term development programme and of the special problems involved in attempting to foster economic growth by diverting resources from consumption to capital formation or investment. This was particularly difficult when the people expect from the new government immediate and effective improvement in living conditions. Turkey's challenge, which was also a challenge for NATO, was to give its peoples an adequate standard of living while retaining intact the framework of democracy and justice.

Civil Emergency Planning

Short statements emphasizing the importance of NATO civil emergency planning were made by the Minister of National Defence, Mr. Harkness, and by the German and Netherlands Foreign Ministers. Mr. Harkness stressed that extensive civilian preparations are necessary in order to reduce casualties and chaos in a nuclear war and to lend more credibility to the deterrent posture of the Alliance as a whole. The international preparations in NATO were moving in the right direction but not fast enough; only in the field of shipping was any international agency ready to function. He suggested one way to achieve more progress would be to increase beyond the small increase now contemplated the number of full-time officers on the NATO international staff working on this programme. (Copy of Mr. Harkness' statement attached as Annex E.)† Dr. Schroeder spoke of German national efforts in this field and urged that more should be done at the NATO level. He felt these problems should be dealt with in increased measure at Ministerial meetings and proposed that the subject should be placed on the agenda of the next ministerial meeting. Mr. Luns noted that while some progress has been made in recent months the primary necessity was for countries to increase their national activities in this field. Ministerial meetings should also give more time and attention to the subject than they have in the past. Summing up, the Secretary-General acknowledged that much remained to be done and that certain nations were sadly lagging in their civilian preparations for war. However, with greater Council interest in the problem and the increases in the NATO international staff which he had been authorized to make following the Oslo meeting, he felt it would be possible to make new progress.

ITEM IV – DATE AND PLACE OF NEXT MEETING

It was agreed to accept the Greek Government's invitation to hold the annual spring meeting of NATO Foreign Ministers in Athens from May 3 to 5.

Although several delegations expressed themselves in favour of a Defence Ministers meeting in the spring, no final decision was taken. Mr. Rusk suggested there might be some advantage in having the Defence Ministers meet with the Foreign Ministers in Athens but Mr. Stikker pointed out this raised enormous problems of accommodation. The question was left open.

CONVERSATION OF PRIME MINISTER WITH PRESIDENT EISENHOWER

1. The Prime Minister said that during his visit to Washington, where he had been the day before to sign the Canada-U.S. Columbia River treaty, he had been able to speak at some length with the retiring President of the United States. Mr. Eisenhower had told him in megatons the number of atomic bombs in the possession of the United States. This figure would indicate that no one else need ever have any. The views which the President now held on Khrushchev had greatly changed from those he held in June and in September 1960. He now thought that Khrushchev would be the only person who could preserve the peace. Khrushchev had to talk tough because of China. Mr. Eisenhower had said that, during his eight years in office, the Communists had made great progress and that by 1975, unless the West adopted more resolute policies, communism would spread throughout the world. He thought that the day was not too far off when the Russians would have to side with the West against China. He further believed that the U.S. policy should be not to withhold the control of atomic bombs but to make it available to all nations. After all, the French had the bomb now, the Chinese would probably have it within a year. He thought the new U.S. President, might have views along this line as well.

With respect to assistance to underdeveloped countries, Mr. Eisenhower had said that he had come to the conclusion that such assistance really paid no dividend. The recipient countries were playing the neutralist game of opposing the principal donors one against the other. Previously, he had been opposed to hand-outs of surpluses but he appeared to favour them now. Countries like West Germany, France and the United Kingdom should be invited to do much more to help needy countries.

He had said he would probably write columns in newspapers as well as a book, and would travel. He would like to bring the United States, Canada and Mexico closer together. No one had been able to work out the reasons for unemployment, and public works were no cure unless one could see ahead two years.

2. The Prime Minister said he had discussed the sale of CL-44 aircraft with the President who had told him that it would be impossible at this time and it would most likely remain impossible for the United States to purchase this aircraft from Canada. The purchase might have been acceptable the previous June but there was now great deterioration in the American aircraft industry. Soon there would only be one large company, Boeing, left. Douglas would soon be out of business.

3. The Cabinet noted the report of the Prime Minister on his conversation with President Eisenhower.

PERSONAL AND CONFIDENTIAL.

Washington, January 9, 1961

Dear Howard [Green],

At noon today, I had quite a long talk – about forty-five minutes – with Dean Rusk. He had invited me over to his temporary office in the State Department and, of course, I accepted at once. He is a personal friend of many years' standing.

Rusk began by referring to your message to him of congratulations and good wishes and explained once more how it was, in the confusion between his two offices in New York and here, he had not made an earlier acknowledgement. I sent you by telegram today his personal message of appreciation and thanks.

Rusk said that he welcomed the opportunity of a private talk with me on Canadian-American affairs. I would, of course, understand that nothing that passed between us could be in any sense official; nor could we expect him at this stage to speak for the incoming Administration. These reservations I readily accepted.

Rusk then went on to speak of “the special relationship between Ottawa and Washington.” He wondered whether this could be maintained without arousing suspicion or resentment on the part of other close allies of the United States. It seemed to me that, while he personally accepted and favoured this relationship, he was raising the question of how it could best be maintained and developed without giving offence elsewhere.

In response, I referred Rusk to the long and respectable lineage of the Canada-U.S. partnership in, for example, joint defence and economic matters of mutual interest. I said that I had not myself encountered any difficulties with other allied representatives because of the informality and intimacy which was characteristic of our dealings with one another. Over the years a great deal of joint “machinery” had been built up for the conduct of our mutual affairs on many subjects and at various levels. This had not, in the past, attracted too much attention in other countries nor did I think that it was resented. Rather it was accepted, I thought, as a natural consequence of our continental and historic association.

In reply to Rusk’s next question as to the more important current matters of Canadian-American concern, I replied that these were in two main areas, defence and “economics.” Generally speaking, he would, in my judgment, be correct in assuming that our relations were fundamentally sound and friendly. The ties between our two countries were so numerous and so strong that any really serious divergence in major objectives was improbable. Each of our governments would certainly strive to prevent such an event. Nevertheless, within this generally satisfactory and, indeed, unique framework of friendship, there had developed, particularly in recent years, points of difference which had caused difficulty and which had given rise to misunderstandings and criticisms on both sides of the border.

Referring, first of all, to our economic relations, I went on, Rusk would be aware of some of the problems which presently confronted the Government and people of Canada in their dealings with their own internal situation and in their dealings with the United States. Our heavy recurrent trading deficits and the extent of U.S. acquisition of Canadian industry in recent years continued to be causes of serious concern in Canada.¹ In the face of an economic situation of some difficulty, the Government, as he might know, had recently adopted measures which affected American investors. Further measures were in contemplation, as U.S. officials were aware. From these policies, as well as in the normal course of trans-border trade, we were bound to encounter problems in which the points of view of the United States and Canada would differ. Fortunately, in this area of trade and payments, the objectives of policy in Ottawa and Washington were, in general, the same. Furthermore, there was active and continuing consultation between our two governments and these arrangements were, I thought, efficient and effective. In that connection, I described the joint Cabinet Committee on Economic Affairs; a relatively early meeting of this group would, I thought, be advisable as well as practicable, for he would find, I thought, that what the soldiers called the “staffing” of our problems in this area was good and up-to-date.

Action in USA on balance of pay[men]ts [J.G. Diefenbaker]

In the defence field, I continued, the situation was different and, it seemed to me, a good deal more difficult and complex. While it was true that the relations between our armed services remained uniquely close, I would be less than frank if I did not tell him that there existed on our side misgivings as to some elements, or perhaps more accurately some manifestations, in U.S. policy. It was also probably true to say that, on the U.S. side, there were reservations and worries as to the Canadian attitude and perhaps some growing doubt of the wholeheartedness of our support. Basically, I thought that these difficulties between us had to do with the exceptionally complicated and critical questions of the control and use of nuclear weapons. Here, as Rusk would recognize, our problem was, in many ways, the same or similar to that of other allies of the United States. This was not the time or occasion to go into the matter further but I felt that he should know that there was difficulties in this area.

I then referred briefly to two or three current problems in which we were involved with the United States, the Laos crisis and U.S. policy on Cuba concerning which we continued to have serious reservations.

Last, but of the first importance in your list of priorities, was the problem of disarmament. Here I hoped that we could cooperate actively in pushing forward toward effective negotiations and without undue delay. In that connection, I expected to arrange for Burns to come down to Washington before long and meet those who would be bearing the principal U.S.A. responsibility in the months ahead. We would respond with a will to the constructive leadership for which we hoped from the U.S. and which only the U.S. could provide.

Taking up my reference to disarmament, Rusk said that he sometimes thought that it would be more effective if we were to expend greater effort on particular aspects or areas (he cited prevention of an arms race in Africa) and the solution of the political problems which gave rise to distrust rather than to concentrate wholly, and to the neglect of practical solutions, on the "main highway" toward general and complete disarmament. (I did not take this to be in any way an evidence of coolness toward disarmament negotiations – the early emphasis by the Democratic leadership on disarmament organization and the senior appointments connected with it now forecast belie any such conclusion – but rather a disposition on Rusk's part toward a pragmatic and practical working philosophy in this area.)

With reference to our mutual defence problems, I mentioned to Rusk the "meetings of consultation" which, over a number of years, had proved beneficial and expressed the hope that before too long such a gathering could be again convened. These meetings had the advantage of informality and frankness and provided opportunities for an exchange of views and a valuable basis for later consideration at the Cabinet level. I went on to refer to the joint Cabinet Committee on Defence which was another important mechanism for facilitating agreed solutions of our mutual affairs in this area.

Rusk observed that, apart from normal diplomatic contacts and those through the joint bodies I had mentioned, the fact that he and his son customarily went to Canada to fish might provide occasions for informal conversations with Canadian officials. I agreed that such opportunities would be suitable and welcome on our side. I added that, while it was obviously premature to propose any meeting in the immediate future between the Prime Minister and the President-elect, such informal meetings from time to time were in the tradition and very valuable. At some later stage, when the initial pressure of events was over, I felt sure that Mr. Diefenbaker would welcome an opportunity to talk privately with Mr. Kennedy.

Rusk then spoke of the careful consideration which was being given by the President-elect to his forthcoming diplomatic appointments. On this score, he pointed out that, whatever the rumours, they would remain entirely speculative and unconfirmed until after January 20th. Mr. Kennedy was quite firm on this. Further, we need not expect that important posts (such as Ottawa, he inferred) would be filled by "political hacks." No doubt I would have (rightly) drawn the conclusion that the President-elect intended to play an active part in such appointments and in the conduct of U.S. foreign policy. We could look for strong leadership from the White House in this respect.

In our own case, Rusk reflected on the kind of person who would best fill the important responsibilities of Ambassador to Canada. I got no inkling as to who they may have in mind but believe that we may expect either a first-rate senior career officer of proven capacity, as was Livingston Merchant, or someone from outside the Service of standing and ability in whom the President has confidence.

I shall be able to tell you more of my talk when I see you in Ottawa later this month. All that I will add to this already long letter is that, in all he had to say to me today and in the manner of its saying, Rusk confirmed the opinion I already had of him as a man of unusual calibre and capacity as well as of strong personality and high character.

Yours sincerely,

ARNOLD HEENEY

PERSONAL AND CONFIDENTIAL.

Washington, November 3, 1961

Dear Prime Minister,

Yesterday my Military Attaché, Colonel H.W. Sterne, came to see me to report confidentially on a conversation he had had last Monday evening, October 30 (when I was in Ottawa), with the Military Aide to the President. The confidential memorandum which Sterne prepared as the basis of his report to me reads as follows:

“At a reception last evening, I had a conversation with Major General C.V. Clifton, Military Aide to the President. General Clifton spoke to me at some length on the desires of the President to maintain close personal links with the heads of other governments. He pointed out that the President is in frequent contact, either by telephone or personal letters, with Mr. Macmillan, Dr. Adenauer and General de Gaulle. He went on to say that until June of this year a similar relationship existed with Mr. Diefenbaker.

“Since that time the President has mentioned to General Clifton that for some reason this close personal contact with Mr. Diefenbaker has been allowed to slip. Gen. Clifton remarked that it may be that there is a tendency to take good relationships for granted but that he knows very well that the President is somewhat disturbed that Mr. Diefenbaker has not contacted him either by telephone or personal letter for some time. It was apparent that the President desires such contact, whether it be merely to say “hello” or to comment informally on points of mutual interest. In any event, he would like to re-establish their relationship because this is the way that he likes to work. Indeed, the President not only likes to have personal contacts with the heads of middle and great powers but also has a good deal of correspondence with the heads of the smaller countries.

“I asked Gen. Clifton if Mr. Kennedy had taken the initiative to resume personal contact and if it was now a case of the Prime Minister responding to him. General Clifton said that he did not know who had initiated the last conversation or private correspondence but that he does know that the President feels the rapport which existed until last June should be re-established.

“In speaking to me of this matter it was quite clear that Gen. Clifton was fully aware that I would inform you of the gist of his remarks and I can only assume that this is also the wish of the President. I might add that Gen. Clifton was born in Canada and has a very warm feeling for the country of his birth. Accordingly, I know that he is extremely anxious to help to maintain the best possible relationships at all levels between our two countries.”

This was a curious incident and I am not sure how much weight should be attached to what Clifton said. Sterne, as you will note, assumes that the President intended or, at any rate, expected that what he had said to Clifton would be passed to me and by me, presumably, to you. In this, Sterne may be mistaken or Clifton may have misunderstood the President’s intention.

On the other hand, Clifton has a good reputation and is, I understand, a personal friend as well as a close official companion of the President. As you will note, he is Canadian-born and is proud of it. I have little doubt that his own wish would be to see the closest and most friendly of relations between the countries of his birth and adoption. And, this being so, it may have been that, in speaking as he did to Sterne, he went further than Mr. Kennedy intended.

In any event, I think you may take it confidently that the President did express himself to Clifton as wanting to continue and develop the informal and friendly association with you that began soon after Mr. Kennedy’s inauguration. Whether, in saying that there had been no personal communication between you in recent months, the President had in mind the embarrassment caused you in September by the unfortunate and clumsy “leak” (by the White House staff) of your private exchange at that time,² I cannot, of course, judge. But I would not think it unlikely. If so, it might be, I suppose, that Mr. Kennedy was taking this roundabout way to reassure you of his desire for the continuance of a personal relationship to which I feel sure he does attach a great importance.

Whatever the explanation of this curious incident, I felt you should be informed of it at once. While I would suppose that there would be no question of any response on your part, it does occur to me that you would wish to have it in mind when the next occasion arises for you to have personal communication with the President.

You may count wholly upon Sterne’s discretion in this matter. He is an excellent officer.

Yours sincerely,

A.D.P. HEENEY

REPORT ON DISCUSSIONS WITH PRESIDENT KENNEDY; BUNKER FUEL NEEDED TO SHIP WHEAT TO CHINA;
CANADIAN SUBSIDIARIES OF U.S. COMPANIES

1. The Prime Minister said that he and Mr. Green would report more fully at another meeting of the Cabinet on the discussions held on the previous day in Washington with President Kennedy. The meeting had begun with a feeling of strangeness but had become most cordial. He had told the President, informally, that difficulties between the two countries would never arise if Mr. Kennedy followed the views he had expressed in a speech at the University of New Brunswick in 1957.³

³ Voir/See John F. Kennedy, Good Fences Make Good Neighbours: Convocation, Tuesday, October 8th, 1957 (Fredericton: University of New Brunswick, 1960).

The shipping companies concerned with the movement of Canadian wheat to Red China had placed orders for bunker fuel with the Imperial Oil Company in Vancouver. That company had consulted its head office in the United States, and an application had been made to the Foreign Assets Control. During his visit to Washington he had learned that the F.A.C. was proposing to veto the supply of the fuel on the ground that such a transaction by a company with any directors from the U.S. would be contrary to U.S. law. He had informed President Kennedy that such a ruling would be unacceptable to Canada, and that the matter of Canadian sovereignty in questions of this kind had been resolved with President Eisenhower in 1958. Announcement of such a ruling would be certain to provoke a storm of protest in Canada.

The President had not at first appeared to realize the implications of the proposed ruling from the Canadian viewpoint. He had stated that the ruling would be entirely proper and that it was designed to contribute to the security of the U.S. He had stated that the U.S. directors of the oil company would be prosecuted if they approved the transaction. Subsequently, he had suggested that the shipping companies should obtain their oil from another company, but Mr. Diefenbaker had stated that the Canadian government would not interfere with contractual rights by designating companies that might supply the oil. Mr. Kennedy had then suggested that the Canadian government, or the Wheat Board, might apply for special exemption, but the Prime Minister had replied that Canada could not seek exemption from the application of a law which should not apply to Canadian companies in Canada. The President had stated that he would study the question further and would reply to the Prime Minister.

2. The Minister of Agriculture said later that the ships in Vancouver were still unable to obtain bunker fuel from the Imperial Oil Company for the transport of the grain to Red China. The problem applied to other aspects of trade with China, for example The Robin Hood Flour Mills Ltd. had been unable to sell flour to China.

3. The Cabinet,

(a) noted the statement of the Prime Minister on his discussion with President Kennedy on the previous day on the proposed sale of bunker fuel, by a Canadian subsidiary of a U.S. company, to shipping companies concerned with the movement of Canadian wheat to Red China; and,

(b) agreed that the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Minister of Agriculture would discuss steps that should be taken to ensure that Canadian sovereignty was not infringed in the making of arrangements for the sale of grain to Red China.⁴

CONVERSATIONS BETWEEN THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES AND THE PRIME MINISTER OF CANADA, THE WHITE HOUSE,
WASHINGTON, FEBRUARY 20, 1961

The meeting today between President Kennedy and Prime Minister Diefenbaker began at twelve noon in the President's office in the West Wing. The talks continued through lunch in the Family Dining Room until about 2:45 p.m., when Mr. Kennedy accompanied Mr. Diefenbaker to the President's office and farewells were made.

The participants were:

United States

- The President
- The Secretary of State (Mr. Rusk)
- The United States Ambassador to Canada (Mr. Merchant)

Canada

- The Prime Minister
- The Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Green)
- The Canadian Ambassador to the United States (Mr. Heeneey).

There was no agenda and from time to time the principals reverted to matters previously raised. The following notes mention the main subjects raised in topical rather than strict chronological sequence.

Canada-United States Relations: General

The President opened the conversation by referring to the importance of close and continuing contact between United States' and Canadian authorities and to the great value he attached to relations of mutual confidence between the two countries which had so many common interests. He welcomed this early opportunity of informal conversations and exchange of views with Mr. Diefenbaker.

The Prime Minister expressed full agreement with the sentiments expressed by Mr. Kennedy. Good relations between the two countries were absolutely essential. This was why he had come down to Washington and why he too welcomed the opportunity of informal friendly discussion over the wide range of Canada-U.S. interests.

Such general expressions of view on both sides were reaffirmed later in the course of the conversations as particular questions came up in discussion. In fact, there was full agreement that geographical proximity, mutual economic involvement, joint defence interests and similar external aims rendered essential the closest of relationships between the two governments.

Africa: the Congo; South Africa

The Prime Minister enquired concerning the current United States' appreciation of the situation in the Congo. Canada had a particular concern because of her military contribution (and her membership in the United Nations Advisory Committee). Further, within a fortnight, he would have to take a position at the meeting of Commonwealth in its new constitutional guise of republic of the Union of South Africa. In this connection, it was to be borne in mind that the non-white members around the table now numbered six. Developments in the Congo had exacerbated the problem of South Africa and the Canadian stand would be of importance to the Commonwealth's future and to the relations of the West with African countries. How did the United States see the present crisis in the Congo developing?

The Secretary of State described the two phases of the Congo crisis – first, the internal situation, where the first problem was to restore order and establish a satisfactory basis for settled government and, second, the external political and parliamentary situation in the United Nations. Events within the Congo tended to upset negotiations between governments and in the United Nations. For example, the now reported killing of seven Lumumbist prisoners, just when it was hoped to agree upon an amended resolution in the Security Council where the United States were supporting the U.N. and the Secretariat, could well upset these delicate negotiations. The situation was very anxious and it was difficult to foresee the outcome.

Mr. Kennedy, at a later stage, wondered whether it would not be possible to have the African nations themselves take on more responsibility for African affairs, possibly through "an African O.A.S." In present circumstances, the United States was involved in every difficult situation and tended to be blamed by all sides.

There was no conclusion reached or sought on these aspects of the African situation which was recognized as being one of great difficulty and danger.

Laos

The Secretary of State, at the Prime Minister's request, described the current position as appreciated by the United States, in particular concerning the proposals for a neutral nations' commission and for the return of the International Supervisory Commission. It remained to be seen which of these courses would afford the best avenue for achieving a genuinely neutral zone in Laos which was the objective of present United States policy. Perhaps the two proposals would tend to merge. The United States did not feel that an international conference would be helpful, at any rate at this stage. On the whole, the State Department was inclined to think that the neutral nations' commission would be more likely to be productive, having in mind the unhappy Canadian experience with the I.C.C. in Laos and currently in Vietnam.

Here again, there was no attempt to reach any conclusion but there seemed to be general agreement as to the objectives of policy in respect to the neutralization of Laos. All agreed that a good deal would depend upon the attitude of India and, of course, upon the genuineness of the Soviet desire to eliminate Laos from the area of conflict.

Communist China: Recognition and U.N. Membership; Trade

The Prime Minister enquired whether there had been any recent change in the U.S. attitude toward Communist China.

The President replied that his Administration had been hoping that, through the exchange of journalists, possibly by the easing of some trade restrictions and other means (he referred to the association of Communist China with nuclear test negotiations), tensions might gradually be lessened and a tolerable relationship brought about between the United States and mainland China. But Peking had shown no disposition to move toward any easing of the present situation. Indeed the Chinese Communists continued their propagandistic attacks, persisted in their rejection of any suggestion of a two-China solution and gave no encouragement to an improvement of relations.

The Secretary of State noted that thirty U.S. journalists had been given permission to visit mainland China but Peking had granted only one visa. The Chinese authorities had also brusquely rejected an offer by the U.S. Society of Friends to provide food for the Chinese population.

Mr. Kennedy said that he himself had been “anxious to do better” with Communist China but the Peking government persisted in their “deep belligerency.” This was a very obstinate problem, one particularly difficult feature of which was the future of Formosa.

Mr. Diefenbaker agreed about the difficulties of recognition and upon the intransigence of the Chinese Communist authorities. In that connection, he mentioned the opening in Peking of a bureau of a Canadian paper (which had actively campaigned for Canadian recognition) and its abrupt closing down by Communist authorities.

With respect to trade, Canadian policy was to do business with Communist nations but not in strategic goods.

Shipment of Canadian Wheat to China; Bunker Oil at Vancouver

The Prime Minister said the President would be aware of a recent substantial sale of Canadian wheat. Here, a serious difficulty had come to his attention concerning provision of oil bunkers at Vancouver for the vessels in which the wheat was to be shipped. A request for supply had been made of Imperial Oil which was a Canadian company controlled in the United States. The U.S. parent company (Standard Oil of New Jersey) had then enquired of the U.S. Foreign Assets Control authorities whether in such circumstances provision of fuel, by Imperial, would contravene U.S. law. The President would understand that, if there were any attempt by U.S. authorities to interfere with such a transaction which, irrespective of U.S. equity ownership or control, involved a Canadian company and a Canadian product, there would be a great outcry in Canada. A similar situation had developed some years ago when the Ford Company had intervened with Ford of Canada to prevent the possibility of any sale of trucks to the Communist Chinese.⁵

The President said that he had recently gone into this problem. Mr. Diefenbaker would appreciate the fact that there was great sensitivity on the subject in the United States – as well as in Canada. Nevertheless, there should be some means of avoiding embarrassment on both sides.

⁵ Voir/See Volume 25, documents 463, 464.

Would the Canadian government request an exemption from the U.S. authorities, in which event it would be granted? Alternatively, was there some Canadian-owned supplier which could provide the bunkers? Mr. Diefenbaker said that neither of these expedients would meet the case as they would imply acceptance of the U.S. right to interfere with a purely Canadian transaction.

Mr. Kennedy responded that he would have the matter looked into further during the lunch period to see what procedure might be worked out. After lunch the President received a memorandum (through Mr. Dutton, Special Assistant to the President) from the Treasury.

After further discussion with the Prime Minister, Mr. Kennedy then suggested that Mr. Diefenbaker consider having Canadian authorities intimate to the Canadian company that they hoped and expected that the company would fill the order on the understanding that the White House would ensure that U.S. authorities would not seek to impose sanctions under U.S. law against U.S. owners or officers of the company.

Mr. Diefenbaker said that he would wish to consider this proposal further for he was uncertain as to the propriety of the Canadian government making such a request to the company. He made it quite clear once more that any intervention by U.S. agencies to prevent the sale of a Canadian product by a Canadian company would provoke very serious public reactions in Canada.

It was agreed that officials of the two governments would follow the matter up with a view to working out a solution and enabling the provision of the required bunker oil to be made.

Canadian Trade with Cuba

The Prime Minister said that he was glad of the opportunity to explain Canadian policy with regard to trade with Cuba. While Canada had not embargoed exports as had the United States, strategic goods were not permitted. Further, U.S. goods were not allowed to be transhipped to Cuba through Canada. Canadian policy (which he had explained fully to President Eisenhower) had not in fact resulted in any important expansion of Canadian exports; indeed, recent figures showed them to be substantially below the levels of permitted U.S. exports under the embargo. This situation was not well understood in the United States.

Canada-U.S. Balance of Payments; U.S. Investment in Canada

The Prime Minister referred to Canada's consistently large adverse balance of trade with the United States in recent years. The Canadian government had had to take certain measures to help in reversing this situation and to move current payments toward greater equilibrium. The U.S. government should understand and appreciate the Canadian difficulty, in view particularly of the current position of the United States. The measures taken by Canada were in no sense anti-American but necessary for the protection of Canadian interests and Canadian independence of action. U.S. investment had been welcomed in Canada but it was unsatisfactory for Canada to rely upon a large inflow of U.S. capital funds to balance the national accounts. Indeed the extent to which Canadian industry was owned in the United States, particularly in key undertakings such as oil, gas, minerals and manufacturing, was causing a great deal of concern among Canadians.

Mr. Diefenbaker said that he had been much impressed by the emphasis which the President had given in his messages to the Congress to the expansion of trade, to the OECD and to liberal commercial policies.⁶ The Canadian Government, like the United States Government, were subject to great protectionist pressures. Low-priced imports, in particular from Japan and ⁶ Voir/See Public Papers of the Presidents of the United States: John F. Kennedy, Containing the Public Messages, Speeches, and Statements of the President, January 20-December 31, 1961 (Washington: United States Government Printing Office, 1962), documents 17, 23.

Hong Kong, were causing great difficulties for domestic producers and, with persistent and rising unemployment, these pressures were difficult to resist. It was, however, the Government's hope that Canada would be able to effect increases in industrial production and alleviate the anxious unemployment situation without resort to measures contrary to its obligation under the GATT.

Mr. Kennedy expressed appreciation of the Canadian balance of payments position as outlined by the Prime Minister and expressed the opinion that, apart from particular cases, the whole problem of U.S. subsidiaries in Canada should be looked into carefully. He was fully sympathetic with what Mr. Diefenbaker had said about protectionist pressures, of which he had a good deal of experience himself. He had recently set up a Cabinet Committee to look into the question of low-price textile imports into the United States.

Canada-United States Defence Production

The Prime Minister said that the United States could be of material assistance in the current Canadian situation and add to the general strength of the two countries by allocating larger defence production to Canadian manufacturers. In that connection, he greatly appreciated the current effort being made by the Department of Defense as evidenced by the suggestion which had been put forward (within the last few days) for the production in a Canadian plant of fighters for allied countries (F104Gs). The figures in the joint defence production programme had been running in the last two years about three to two in favour of the United States. The Canadian Government wished to cooperate in every way with the United States in joint defence matters and a more equitable sharing of defence manufactures would facilitate such cooperation.

The President expressed satisfaction that the suggestion by the Defense Department with regard to sharing the F104G programme was favourably regarded by Canadian authorities.

Invitation to the President to Visit Canada

The Prime Minister said that he wished to extend a warm invitation to the President to visit Canada and, if that were possible, for him to address a joint session of the two Houses before Parliament rose, probably by the end of June. Such an occasion would do a great deal to strengthen Canada-United States relations. The President would be seen on Canadian television and heard on Canadian radio throughout the country as well as, of course, in the United States. Nothing could give greater assurance of the friendship between the two nations as a visit by Mr. Kennedy in the early months of his Administration. If the Prime Minister could announce in the House of Commons that evening the President's acceptance (without, of course, mentioning any date), this would be very helpful.

The President expressed appreciation of Mr. Diefenbaker's invitation and said at once that he would like to accept and go to Canada at a time which would be mutually convenient. He thought it should be possible for him to do so sometime in June. He would, in any case, be agreeable to Mr. Diefenbaker announcing his acceptance in Parliament.

It was agreed, accordingly, that the Prime Minister should state in the House of Commons that evening that the President had accepted an invitation to visit Canada and to address a joint session of Parliament if a mutually convenient date could be arranged before the conclusion of the current session.

Canada-U.S. Defence Relationships

The Prime Minister mentioned reports of a speech which he had made in Port Arthur (on February 18) touching upon Canadian defence policy. What he had said had been wrongly reported in the Canadian press. This morning's Washington Post, however, had carried an accurate account making reference to his emphasis upon the importance of the Canada-United States partnership. He had criticized those in Canada who would reduce Canadian participation in continental defence to mere “bird-watching.” Such a role would not mean more independence for Canada but subservience and reliance upon the United States.

“We will not,” Mr. Diefenbaker continued, “accept a policy which will lay upon the United States a responsibility which we should carry ourselves.” He wanted the President to understand the Canadian Government’s position in this which in turn was dependent upon the actions of the United States in cooperating with Canada in, for example, the sharing of defence production.

The President expressed appreciation of the position as outlined by the Prime Minister in this very important area of relationship between the two countries.

Canadian Policy with Respect to Nuclear Weapons

The Prime Minister explained the Canadian Government’s position with regard to nuclear weapons. As yet, no decision had been taken upon the equipping of Canadian forces nor concerning storage at Canadian bases (Goose, Harmon and Argentia). As the President would be aware, the Canadian Government had laid great emphasis upon disarmament and Canadian representatives had been active in efforts to move forward in negotiations. Decisions with respect to nuclear weapons would depend upon what progress were made. Canadian authorities were conscious of the danger involved in further dissemination of nuclear capacity and would not wish to encourage or accelerate this process. Nevertheless, the Canadian Government wished to be ready to take action promptly when the need arose.

For these reasons, Mr. Diefenbaker continued, he proposed that detailed arrangements between the two governments on all aspects of our relations in this field should be worked out and embodied in an agreement (or agreements) ready for immediate execution when conditions made it necessary. Such an agreement (or agreements) would have to be based on joint Canada-U.S. control over custody and use, that was to say the Canadian Government would have to insist upon its right to decide (with the United States) how and when such weapons would be employed.

The President expressed appreciation of the position of the Canadian Government in this matter as explained by Mr. Diefenbaker. Possibly the formula employed in arrangements with the United Kingdom (the “double key”) would provide a useful pattern.

It was agreed that officials on the two sides would work out together a draft detailed agreement (or agreements) for storage, use and control of nuclear weapons in Canada on the basis described by the Prime Minister; such agreement(s) to be submitted to the two governments and to be ready to be put into effect if and when decision were taken by the Canadian Government.

Disarmament

The Prime Minister mentioned the importance which the Canadian Government attached to pressing forward with disarmament discussions in spite of the very difficult problems in the way of satisfactory agreement. The Secretary of State for External Affairs had been especially active in this field in the United Nations and elsewhere. Canadians continued to hope that realistic progress could be made.

The President then spoke of his own interest in disarmament and the action being taken by his Administration to strengthen the U.S.A. effort – first of all, in its own organization. It was expected that within the next day or two the appointment of an official to head U.S. organization on general disarmament (as Mr. Arthur Dean did on the nuclear tests negotiations) would be announced; both to operate under the general supervision of Mr. McCloy. The U.S. Administration had decided to give first priority to the nuclear test negotiations but also to intensify their examination of problems of general disarmament as well. In what area did Mr. Green think that some progress might be made?

The Secretary of State for External Affairs then described the course which had been followed by the Canadian Delegation at the United Nations after the collapse of the Ten-Nation negotiations. The objective of the Canadian resolution had been to get negotiations started again and to provide a mechanism for bringing to bear the views and ideas of other powers. It remained to be seen what course would be best when the Assembly resumed.

As to particular areas where some progress might be made – and the Canadian Government favoured a stage-by-stage approach – Mr. Green thought that there were a number where the Western and Soviet bloc views were not far apart – possibly the limitation of conventional arms was one department in which something positive might be done.

Meeting of NATO Heads of Government

The Prime Minister enquired what the President thought of the wisdom of convening a meeting of the Heads of NATO Governments. In his own view, such a meeting was desirable though the timing was important. It was understood that it could not be managed at the spring meeting of Foreign Ministers at Oslo but he thought that attention should be given to the possibility later on.

The President did not feel that an early meeting of Heads of Government would be productive. It would be necessary to prepare well in advance so that when the Heads of Government came together they would be in a position to have profitable discussions and reach decisions. At such a stage, a meeting would, in his judgment, be valuable.

Economic Situation; Canada and the United States

The Prime Minister made reference to the part played by farm organizations in the development of the ground work for Government agricultural policies. He had been interested to learn of the President's interest and activity in the development of the Food for Peace programme. He had himself been long interested in the idea of a NATO food bank. Our arrangements for consultation on disposal of wheat surpluses were proving helpful.

Mr. Diefenbaker, in answer to an enquiry from the President, described the current and prospective situation in Canada, making reference to the increased unemployment which was causing grave concern and to measures which the Government were taking. In that connection, he had noted with interest the eight-point programme sent to Congress by Mr. Kennedy; action along six of these lines had been taken in Canada but the problem was stubborn and could not be solved solely by Government action. His economic advisers were by no means agreed in the advice which they gave concerning the policies best calculated to meet the situation.

The President referred to programmes proposed to Congress by his Administration and to the division of opinion in the United States as to the right line of action. For example, a tax-cut was recommended by some economists but Congressional opposition would prevent such a course. In his judgment, U.S. opinion in such matters was no longer emphatically either liberal or conservative; the public temper was one of moderation and it was within this framework that Government policies had to be designed.

Canada-U.S. Committee on Trade and Economic Affairs; Next Meeting

The President and the Prime Minister noted with satisfaction that a meeting of this joint Cabinet committee had been arranged for March 13 in Washington.

Canadian Legislation Requiring "Disclosure" by Foreign Entities

The Prime Minister made reference to legislation which the Government had just introduced in Parliament to require disclosure of the affairs of business corporations and labour unions whose headquarters were outside Canada. This would be resented in a number of quarters but was necessary in order to reassure public opinion concerning "foreign operations."

Communiqué

The President and the Prime Minister approved for release at once a draft communiqué which had been prepared by officials.⁷

VISIT OF PRESIDENT KENNEDY; MEETINGS WITH PRIME MINISTER

In attempting any outline of the subjects which the Prime Minister and the President may wish to discuss (and any "briefing" for Mr. Diefenbaker), it seems to me important, particularly as the time available is not repeat not long, that we should focus on the subjects of primary importance to the two countries. This would no repeat no doubt include certain bilateral questions of current concern but I would hope that the papers prepared for the two principals would deal chiefly with the larger multilateral problems.

2. Presumably the first part of their talk would have to do with various aspects of the current world situation. The Prime Minister and the President would no repeat no doubt wish to exchange views on Soviet intentions and East-West relations in various sectors and on particular issues. They might then progress naturally, I suppose, to consider particular areas or situations where Canada and USA are both involved or concerned and which present or could present a threat to peace and security. After such a wider ranging discussion, they might go on to deal with any bilateral issues of especial importance or urgency.

3. This approach would seem to me to suggest, after reference to the general exchange referred to above, some such outline as follows:

(a) Southeast Asia, Particularly Laos and also Vietnam. On present plans the Geneva Conference on Laos will have just begun. It would therefore seem to be valuable at that stage to have the two Heads of Government consider together the short and long term prospects for the area and the respective roles of Canada as a member of the ICSC, and USA as a member of SEATO and policies which might conduce to stability and independence. In this context there would naturally be some discussion of relations with Communist China.

(b) Latin America, Including Developments in Cuba. While the continuing Cuban crisis focuses attention on this one country and views would no repeat no doubt be exchanged on this problem, I would hope and expect that this would lead to a comprehensive exchange of views on the more general and positive aspects of relations in the whole western hemisphere, economic as well as political. The President can surely be counted upon to develop his ideas on the "Alliance for Progress" and an exchange of views in this area to which both governments are giving new and emphatic attention could, I think, be very valuable. The OAS could be discussed in this context.

(c) Europe, Including the Problem of Berlin and Germany. I feel reasonably sure that these problems will be very much in the President's mind. The meeting could therefore provide a timely occasion for exploring the prospects and means for dealing with them. Our interest in being kept abreast of contingency planning arrangements might be stressed. Such a discussion would, as I see it, involve the future of NATO, including the defence position and means of strengthening the political and economic life of the Atlantic community.

(d) Africa, Including the Congo. Here the role of the UN could be examined and the Prime Minister would no repeat no doubt refer to the Commonwealth.

4. Each of these subjects would lead logically into consideration of existing regional or international peace keeping machinery and the various organizations in which the two governments share membership and responsibility.

5. Such a general review would also provide opportunity and occasion for discussion of outstanding UN problems, e.g. the prospects for disarmament negotiations, the future of UN and the role of the Secretary-General.

6. As to Canada-USA bilateral questions, I should expect that our current and planned defence arrangements might profitably be discussed. Here the so-called "swap" deal might usefully be given a push (depending on how far negotiations have proceeded in Ottawa in advance of the visit). Much more complex and delicate, of course, is our relationship in respect of nuclear weapons and the various aspects of this problem which have been under discussion between the two governments for some time.

7. Finally it is to be anticipated that the President and the Prime Minister will wish to discuss major bilateral and multilateral economic and trade matters. Your message lists a number of particular topics of current interest. My own view is that this portion of the discussion will be fruitful to the extent to which care is taken to limit the items to matters of primary importance and that the temptation to have current bilateral questions dealt with at the summit is resisted.

8. In addition to the important economic aspects of subjects referred to in earlier paragraphs of this message (e.g. paragraph 3), the following seem to us to be the most important headings in economic and trade policy:

(a) Economic Development. This ranks very high in the current thinking of USA Administration. In terms of external economic aid, the India and Pakistan consortia are of immediate and particular interest. The new USA initiative for an international solution of the textile problem might also be raised in this context. Again, closely related is the general problem of commodity trade and, in particular, the possibility of the USA joining with other industrialized countries in moving towards the freeing of trade in tropical products and basic materials. The food bank proposal and its relationship to USA Food for Peace programme might also be discussed against this background.

(b) European Integration. USA has now made it clear that it would favour the full integration of UK into the European Economic Community. But it has also indicated it would not repeat not support all substantial derogations from the Rome Treaty to facilitate such a move. It seems to us that it would be most desirable to impress on the President the fundamental importance of the policy issues that are here involved for Canada (and other Commonwealth countries).

(c) USA Trade Agreements Legislation. The President will in coming months have to address himself to the renewal next year of USA Trade Agreements Legislation, which will set the pattern and direction of USA commercial policy. The Administration will be under increasing pressure from protectionist interests. I feel it is not repeat not too early to emphasize the great importance to the whole free world of the Administration obtaining broad and unhampered authority in the trade field.

9. As to bilateral questions, these might perhaps be limited to the following two:

(a) Oil Bunkering Problem. I would hope that this could be put in the context of the more general issue of the extraterritorial effects of USA legislation.

(b) USA Barter Proposals. The immediate issue provides a further opportunity for a general discussion of USA surplus disposal policies. The Administration is currently reviewing its policy and it would, therefore, be timely to reiterate the seriousness of Canadian concerns.

10. I have not repeat not attempted to recast the items in the form of a revised agenda. This can be done much better in Ottawa and you will no repeat no doubt wish to do it in consultation with Bryce and Robinson.

11. If anything further of relevance develops in our talks with USA officials who are involved in advising the President on discussions in Ottawa, we will, of course, let you know.

USA FOREIGN POLICY

In view of President Kennedy's visit to Ottawa you may wish to have a tentative assessment of the Administration record to date in office viewed from this perspective. Four months in office scarcely provide a fair test of the capacity of the new Administration for the long term pull, but some trends are already evident.

2. The present Administration moved into office on the basis of a narrow majority after a campaign which centred on USA world position and on whether the Republicans or the Democrats could best provide the necessary leadership to maintain and strengthen it. Domestic issues were assessed largely in this wider context. (President Kennedy's performance in the domestic† and foreign economic fields will be the subject of separate telegrams.)

3. The basis of any assessment at this stage must, of course, be directed mainly to the kind of leadership the President has sought to provide. There can be little doubt that the President's accomplishments so far have surpassed expectations which, because of campaign criticisms of his youth and inexperience, were probably set lower by many people than might have been the case with an older and more established personality. Despite setbacks in both the foreign and domestic fields, including the recent Cuban fiasco, the President's personal position remains strong and commands wide support.

4. There are several factors in this initially successful approach to the problem of leadership: the impact of the President's personality and conduct of policy; the stature of and sense of conviction imparted by the President's principal foreign affairs and defence advisers; the confidence and enthusiasm which the top echelon has induced in the lower ranks of the Administration, the press, and the public; and finally, the impression of USA created abroad.

5. On the whole, the President has been praised for the selection of his Cabinet and other principal foreign affairs and defence advisers. There has been a good deal of public amusement at the number of them chosen from academic life (and, in particular, from the President's own university). But the retention of important figures from the previous Administration (Douglas Dillon and Allen Dulles), recourse to reputable figures in the democratic pantheon (Adlai Stevenson, Chester Bowles, Averill Harriman and Dean Acheson) and resort to former officials of known merit (Dean Rusk and Alexis Johnson, John McCloy, A. Berle) have done much to inspire confidence in the seriousness of the President's intentions. Apart from one or two "family appointments," many of the leading figures selected were generally believed not to have had more than casual previous contact with the President, and their appointments have been accepted as evidence of the President's concern to base his choice on merit.

Public Service

6. While there are some misgivings on the part of the "old hands" at certain changes at the Assistant Secretary level in the State Department, on the whole the effect of the new Administration on the ranks of the professional public service in the foreign policy and defence fields has been stimulating. No repeat no doubt the foreign affairs experts (and others, no repeat no doubt) have been critical of the number of "task forces" – on Latin America, on NATO, Defence etc. – appointed by the White House, and the Pentagon has presumably found irksome the Presidential strictures on their public utterances on defence and other questions. But there is ample evidence that they find gratifying and inspiring the close and detailed interest being displayed by the new leadership in their endeavours. Of particular importance perhaps are the emphasis on initiative and originality in the public service, and the President's desire to keep in close touch with all sectors of his Administration. Though some of the increased activity may hinge on the mere fact of a change in Administration rather than its character, enthusiasm in the departments concerned is general and not repeat not restricted along partisan lines. The relationship between the State Department and the White House advisers has not repeat not yet fully evolved.

Public Impact

7. In the Congress, and in the Foreign Relations and Defence Committees particularly, there remains a strong concern for the prerogatives of the Legislative Branch. In principle, however, the temper of Congress seems to have been to let the President have full rein until he has had time to look at the problems. The Presidential nominations in the foreign and defence fields have been largely approved without serious reservations, although Senator Fulbright has continued to assert his independence. Reaffirmation by the Administration of traditional tenets of USA foreign policy has had a reassuring effect, and there has been relatively little criticism voiced over specific policy issues that have arisen (Laos, anti-colonialism, Congo, etc.). Even the recent Cuba operation seems to have drawn mostly proforma complaints so far except from the extreme right wing who believe the Administration should adopt even stronger measures. It is probably safe to say, therefore, that Congress, and, especially the Senate, has formed a good initial impression of the new order.

8. In contrast, the press has virtually, except for die-hard partisan publications, embraced the new Administration – and this despite the early announcement by Secretary Rusk that the provision of inside information on foreign and defence questions would be strictly balanced against the requirement of “quiet diplomacy.” (In practice, it is doubtful whether there has been any great reduction in the scale of information made available and presidential and Administration news conferences are almost bewilderingly frequent.) The President has, of course, benefited considerably from the self-imposed moratorium on a host of foreign and defence policy issues: the decisions on many crucial issues are not repeat not yet available for comment. On the other hand, a hard-boiled and energetic press corps could have long since chosen not repeat not to accord a respite if it had wished. Also, it is only fair to add that the reporters by and large favoured the Kennedy ticket in last autumn’s campaign, and have not repeat not yet, apparently, seen any reason to change their views. On most foreign policy issues, they have been distinctly more explicit than even the Administration could have been expected to be, in drawing attention to the enormity of the problems facing it.

9. The public at large, like their more experienced compatriots in Congress and the newspaper world, gives the President strong support. The election campaign had conditioned them to expect a diet of reverses and a continued slump in prestige in any event, so that for USA to avoid any significant defeats throughout the Fifteenth UNGA and to get a man into space, even though after the Russians, have appeared as fair accomplishments. Cuba is a critical problem, and may prove to be even more so as the current post-mortem on the “invasion” proceeds, but the President seems to have kept his mind on the central problems of East-West relations, and to have done a reasonable job of putting the Cuban issue and other problem areas like Laos into perspective.

Impressions Abroad

10. Concurrently with Administration efforts to enlighten the public on these thorny issues, there has been an impressive flow of distinguished foreign visitors which enhances the general impression that the Administration is pursuing an active foreign policy. Particularly at this early stage and from this observation post, it is difficult to draw any definitive conclusions as to how effectively the new Administration has projected abroad a new and better “image” of USA. However, the reactions to President Kennedy of some of the distinguished foreign visitors mentioned above provide some indication that the initial impressions formed of the new President have been generally good and, in some important cases, even enthusiastic. Of the latter, it would seem, for instance, that Prime Minister Macmillan and Chancellor Adenauer, despite the disparity in the President’s age and theirs, were impressed with his grasp of affairs and his judgment. Even such potential critics as the Presidents of Ghana and Indonesia have, according to USA official sources at any rate, formed the same impressions. It is almost impossible to say what the Soviet Foreign Minister thought of the President at their March 28 meeting, although the indications are, particularly after Cuba, that Soviet authorities now realize that the change in Administration did not repeat not mean a radical shift in the direction of USA policy.

11. Personal impressions are no repeat no doubt particularly important in an age of direct diplomacy. The new President seems to be keeping his average up, not repeat not only in personally receiving visitors from abroad, but in sending USA special emissaries to foreign parts. Secretary Rusk's visit to New Delhi (as well as to SEATO, CENTO, and NATO) Dean Acheson's European tour, Ambassador Harriman's tours of Western European and Asian countries, Assistant Secretary Williams' African and Ambassador Berle's South American trips, and Vice-President Johnson's Asian tour leave no repeat no doubt as to the Administration's determination to set a fast pace.

Attitudes of Administration in Foreign Policy

12. In the end, however, it is going to be substantive positions on foreign policy and defence issues that determine the reaction abroad to President Kennedy's stewardship. So far – and we would stress the necessarily tentative nature of any assessment at this stage – the new Administration seems to be in the process of attempting to reconcile a number of conflicting objectives in these fields.

(a) Perhaps most obvious is the contrast between the Administration's espousal of a neutralist solution to the Laotian problem and its concerted efforts to extract commitments from the Latin American states to support USA opposition to Castro's Cuba and to re-establish the Monroe doctrine.

(b) A conflict of interest also appears in USA relations with its North Atlantic Allies and with the Afro-Asian uncommitted countries, especially those in Africa. The Administration on the one hand has strongly re-affirmed support for NATO; for European economic and political integration; and for greater NATO consultation, especially in relation to non-NATO areas. It has offered significant USA strategic forces to NATO as an earnest of USA steadfast concern for European security. On the other hand, and particularly at the UN under Ambassador Stevenson's imprint, there has been an intense effort to renew the historical identification of USA with the spirit of freedom, independence and nationalism. The conflict here is perhaps less in the minds of USA leaders and more in those of European Allies, especially Portugal over the Angola issue, and Belgium and the Netherlands over the Congo and West New Guinea respectively. Nevertheless it is clear that the impatient idealism of the New World, as expounded by the present Administration, will continue to pose a problem for the harmony of the Alliance.

(c) To some extent associated with the foregoing, involving a strong USA antipathy towards colonial economics, is the pressure of USA on its allies to expand their contribution to the task of extending aid to the less-developed areas of the world.

(d) Relations with the Communist World and the USSR in particular also exhibit an unresolved dichotomy of approach. On the one hand the initial emphasis of the Administration in its approach to the Communists was on quiet peaceful negotiation and the avoidance of cold-war terms of exchange. The persistent plea was for orderly discussion of outstanding issues, in accordance with the norms of international conduct. Verbally at least there has been no repeat no slackening in the expression of USA desire for such developments. Latterly, however, the attention of Administration spokesmen, including the President himself, has been increasingly directed to the fact that behind a façade of international legality the Communist World is continuing and increasing its subversive and violent means of encroachment on the Free World. The problem is most clearly posed, for the Administration, in the situations in Laos and Vietnam, and perhaps also in Iran. The current negotiations in Geneva on Laos are accordingly being approached by the Administration with considerable suspicion and scepticism, but there has been no repeat no alternative yet expounded. Nevertheless there is increasing discussion of the need to fashion new methods to cope with Communist infiltration and subversion.

(e) In the realm of defence and disarmament also, two principles seem to have been at work, although their reconciliation is fortunately fairly well advanced. Internally the Administration has increased its efforts in the direction of a better balance between conventional and nuclear military strength. In NATO the Allies have been urged to meet at least agreed quantitative levels of conventional forces, and to devote increased resources to achieving high qualitative standards, in order to enforce a pause on aggressors and to raise the threshold of nuclear engagement. There is also continuing concern to prevent the spread of nuclear weapons under the autonomous control of nth countries, e.g. France, Germany, China. On the other hand, internally the Administration has increased the pace of the missile programme and has re-question this year $1,800,000,000 more to the development and defense of the nuclear deterrent.

In relation to disarmament there has been agreement to reopen negotiations on general disarmament at the end of July and to discuss bilaterally with USSR in June and July certain procedural questions; there has also been the remarkably restrained USA response to the evidence of Soviet intransigence in the Geneva test ban talks notwithstanding its own willingness to make important concessions. At the same time there are growing indications that the Administration is becoming disillusioned with the processes of negotiation as exploited by the Soviet representatives. Where these seemingly divergent channels may lead ultimately is unclear, but for the moment, as was made specific for instance in the Laotian context, the Administration seems prepared to follow parallel courses of military preparedness and negotiated settlements. At least there has been no repeat no abandonment of political methods in favour of a pure "positions of strength" policy.

13. In other fields the Administration has had less difficult problems to face and, in preliminary fashion at least, has continued to make useful progress. This has been particularly the case in relations with the less-developed countries, and the continuity reflected by the appointment of Mr. Dillon has been important in this field and elsewhere. A reaffirmation and intensification of USA concern to assist these areas has been evident in the approach to Indian development programmes, the "Alliance for Progress" with Latin America (which has already achieved the material support of Congress to the extent of $500,000,000), and the recent encouragement by USA of action towards opening up commodity markets in the West likely to assist the primary producers in the less-developed area.

14. Although no repeat no significant achievements have yet emerged, the new Administration has made clear its flexibility in the approach to a number of problems on which USA policy in the past has tended to be static. There has been a tentative reassessment of USA-China policy, especially in relation to UN, although short, of course, of any foreseeable move towards recognition. In relation to the Korean problem, the new Administration has conceded the validity of a somewhat less doctrinaire approach to the responsibilities of the UN in connection with the problem of reunification. There have also been indications of increased emphasis, even by the President himself, on the need for the Governments of Asian Allies to take thought for the need of popular support, if USA material assistance is to achieve its desired ends. To avoid acting under the pressure of crisis conditions, reconsideration of Berlin contingency planning and of possible negotiating positions on Germany and Berlin is being undertaken.

15. It must be remembered that many of the positions and attitudes described above are opening positions which may well be modified. The new Administration has had very little respite from urgent and compelling problems. The coordination of policy, especially as between continuing regard for old friends and the desire to cultivate new ones, and even the regulation of the vast governmental machinery to avoid a debacle such as that over the Cuban invasion, has not repeat not unnaturally proved extremely difficult. The flexible pragmatic approach of the President and his principal advisers, however, seems on the whole likely to produce answers to match the magnitude of the problems. Finally, I believe that the President, as his Ottawa visit signifies, will, in seeking these answers, continue to welcome the expression of direct and frank Canadian views on the many problems confronting the two countries.

THE KENNEDY ADMINISTRATION'S FIRST 100 DAYS – FOREIGN ECONOMIC POLICY

The Kennedy Administration has placed great emphasis on questions of foreign economic policy. This is in part due to the balance of payments problem inherited from the previous Administration and in part to a greater awareness of the facts of international economic interdependence and a determination to strengthen international cooperation in this field.

2. This general attitude is exemplified by the new and vigorous approach to the problem of economic development. The objectives have, of course, not repeat not been merely economic since the social and political problems created by the growing inequality of wealth between industrialized and less developed countries are very much in the minds of key figures of the Kennedy Administration. In consequence, the new emphasis on foreign aid is not repeat not limited to financial assistance but includes a fresh approach to commodity export problems of the developing nations and their export earnings and it looks to parallel action by these nations by way of self-help and domestic social and economic reforms.

3. Another factor is the great importance which the Administration attaches to the concept of economic growth; this has spurred new initiative in the field of economic cooperation among Western countries and a keen interest in fostering growth not repeat not only through trade but also through greater cooperation in all fields of economic activity.

4. Despite the problems posed by the current GATT tariff negotiations much less attention has so far been given to international trade policy. This is in large measure due to priorities imposed by legislative requirements; the new departure in the field of economic aid must first be established through the passage of this year's foreign aid legislation while trade legislation is not repeat not due for renewal until next year. Such evidence as there is suggests, however, that the new Administration will continue to press for a non restrictive and outward looking USA foreign trade policy; indeed the whole area of USA trade policy is being reviewed and new and comprehensive proposals may be anticipated.

5. Following is a brief review of the major developments during the last three months:

(a) Balance of Payments. USA balance of payments situation has improved substantially due to a continued increase in USA exports, a reduction in short term capital outflow and corrective measures undertaken by USA Government and other countries. The deficit of $4 billion at an annual rate during the last quarter of 1960 has been reduced to $300 million or slightly over $1 billion at a seasonally adjusted annual rate during the first quarter of 1961. The present Administration has maintained most of the balance of payments measures adopted by the Eisenhower Administration (including the tying of USA foreign aid and the order forbidding the holding of gold abroad by USA citizens). In addition, the following measures have been taken by the new Administration:

- (i) continued export drive and encouragement of foreign travel to USA;
- (ii) proposed legislation to remove special tax incentives for USA investment in foreign industrialized countries;
- (iii) continued pressure to remove remaining import restriction abroad;
- (iv) reduction of customs exemptions for returning USA travellers;
- (v) of particular importance, a major USA drive for more equitable sharing among Western countries of foreign aid and common defence; and
- (vi) proposals for close continuing consultations among Western countries on domestic monetary policy.

(b) International Economic Cooperation. The Kennedy Administration has seized upon the creation of the OECD and taken various initiatives designed to develop this body into a key instrument of economic policy and coordination. It has taken a number of initiatives in DAG and the OEEC Economic Policy Committee to ensure that the new organization develops in an effective and vigorous manner.

(c) Foreign Aid

(i) On March 22 President Kennedy announced proposals to recast USA aid policy through greater centralization (including Food for Peace programme) and emphasis on multi-year commitments and on increased economic aid. Increased emphasis was also placed on self help, long range planning and domestic reforms in recipient countries. Detailed legislative proposals are expected shortly.

(ii) Latin America – Alliance for Progress: A ten year programme for social and economic development for Latin America was announced by President Kennedy on March 15. The first step in the programme will be the $500 million committed at Bogotá in 1960 and soon to be appropriated by Congress. Assistance under this programme will be made conditional on vigorous self help measures and internal reforms.

(iii) India/Pakistan: At the recent India consortium meeting, USA indicated a willingness to commit $1 billion toward foreign exchange requirements of the first two years of the Indian third five-year plan. This commitment is conditional on congressional approval and on aggregate contributions of roughly the same magnitude on the part of other consortium members. Present indications are that USA is also prepared to announce a correspondingly increased contribution to the development of Pakistan.

(iv) As indicated above the new Administration has further developed the multilateral approach through DAG as a means to increase the total level of contributions by member countries and in seeking to develop the concept of burden-sharing in connection with foreign aid.

(d) Foreign Trade Policy. Although, as indicated above, the Kennedy Administration has not repeat not yet taken extensive action on questions of international trade, two noteworthy developments have occurred.

(i) In the face of strong pressures for protectionist measures on textiles, the Administration has instead decided to seek a broad international solution for this problem.

(ii) EEC. USA attitude to EEC remains basically unchanged although USA authorities have been led by recent developments to define their position on the possible accession of UK to the Common Market. Provided UK accepted the full obligations of the Rome Treaty, USA would favour UK accession; USA remains, however, opposed to any commercial accommodation between the Six and Seven which might water down the political content of EEC and increase the area of discrimination against USA.

6. We assume this message, and our telegram 1552 May 13 and 1543 May 12† will be brought to attention of Prime Minister.

PRIME MINISTER'S TALKS WITH PRESIDENT KENNEDY

For Léger. Following for your personal information is a rough preliminary summary of main points known to us of Prime Minister's conversations May 16 and 17 with President.

2. President said that he would be meeting Khrushchev in Vienna after his visit to Paris. Subjects uppermost in his mind for discussion with Khrushchev were: nuclear testing, Berlin and Cuba.

Latin America

3. This seemed to have priority among subjects raised by President. He pressed Prime Minister to give serious consideration to joining OAS and to sending an observer to Inter American ECOSOC Meeting in July. Prime Minister gave no repeat no commitment.

4. President said that USA Government did not repeat not at present intend to volunteer further economic measures against Cuba although it was prepared to act promptly in response to provocation. President also made it clear that except in certain extreme circumstances USA did not repeat not contemplate military intervention in Cuba.

Southeast Asia

5. President expressed hope that International Commission in Vietnam could be made more effective as a means of controlling guerrilla infiltration into the South. He invited Canadian comments as to how procedures of Commission could be improved and said that after receiving our comments he would propose to communicate USA views to Mr. Nehru with a view to enlisting Indian cooperation. Prime Minister agreed to provide Canadian comments or suggestions.

6. Re Chinese representation in UN. President had nothing new to offer. Prime Minister emphasized importance of avoiding a division of opinion among NATO nations at next Assembly.

Berlin

7. The President said conclusion of a peace treaty with East Berlin by USSR would not repeat not be cause for alarm and he would not repeat not be concerned if East Germans assumed responsibility for control of access. He would make clear to Khrushchev that the West could not repeat not afford to give away its rights.

UK and Common Market

8. President said main attraction for USA in UK association with Common Market was political. USA would want to avoid a limited form of relationship involving merely a tariff agreement.

Foreign Aid

9. President reviewed global requirements for aid with emphasis on India, Pakistan and Latin America. He expressed hope that Canada would help. Prime Minister said that he could not repeat not justify any increase at present time in Canadian aid commitments.

Nuclear Testing and Disarmament

10. President closely linked these subjects and made it clear that USA regarded Nuclear Testing Conference as an important criterion of Soviet intentions. He told Prime Minister privately that unless Khrushchev agreed to renew serious negotiations USA Delegation would be withdrawn from Geneva. He could not repeat not see how there could be any progress on disarmament unless a forward move was possible on a nuclear test ban. Prime Minister expressed agreement and indicated his concern that emphasis on unilateral disarmament in various Western countries was contributing to a weakening of Western unity and strength vis-à-vis USSR.

Oil Bunkering

11. Prime Minister expressed appreciation of USA attitude.

12. With reference to Council Meeting mentioned in your telegram 1197 May 17† we suggest that you should base your comments on joint communiqué, press briefing and President's speech,⁸ which together reflect accurately main emphasis of conversations. In addition Prime Minister will be reporting tomorrow morning to House of Commons and may indicate at that time in general terms the position which he took with President Kennedy on some of main issues. Text will be forwarded promptly.⁹

MEETING OF THE PERMANENT JOINT BOARD ON DEFENCE

The next meeting of the Permanent Joint Board on Defence takes place on January 24 and one of the continuing items on the agenda is "The Storage of Defensive Nuclear Weapons at Goose Bay and Harmon Air Force Base."

2. You will recall that on December 6 Cabinet decided that discussions (or "negotiations") with the United States Government concerning arrangements for the essential acquisition of nuclear weapons or warheads for use by the Canadian forces, in the manner already decided, may proceed as soon as they can usefully be undertaken but the acceptance of joint control is to be a basic principle; and that the agreement with the United States concerning the storage of defensive nuclear weapons at Goose Bay and Harmon Air Force Base for the United States air defence forces should not be concluded until after discussions with the United States on other matters had been concluded.

3. The question now facing us is what Mr. Wilgress should say at the forthcoming PJBD Meeting, bearing in mind that the United States Section on its return to Washington will be reporting to the new Administration. I am of the opinion that if Mr. Wilgress were to make a forthright statement, perhaps along the following lines, it would be more useful than if he were simply to say that he was in no position to report on this matter:

"The Canadian Government will not be able to come to a final decision on the Goose-Harmon agreement until its position with respect to the establishment of nuclear weapons stockpiles for Canadian forces has been resolved and until the situation regarding certain defence procurement negotiations, now being carried on, is clearer. In this connection, I may say that it is the intention of the Canadian Government to initiate discussions with the United States Government concerning arrangements for the establishment of stockpiles of nuclear warheads for the Canadian forces as soon as such discussions can be usefully undertaken this spring."

4. You might wish to discuss this matter with Mr. Wilgress prior to his departure for the Board meeting.¹⁰

NUCLEAR WEAPONS; POLICY STATEMENT

I have been thinking of the substance and tactics on this subject before getting down to wording and would like your direction on several points.

On substance, I believe you have now reached the conclusion that we should make the necessary arrangements with the United States to have nuclear weapons available for the Canadian forces, under joint control, and in accordance with the basic policies outlined in your statement of February 20th, 1959.¹¹ I hope this is the case, for I feel these defensive weapons are needed now in Canada for anti-bomber and anti-submarine defence. I think the real need for our forces in Europe having them is less urgent, but we have made clear-cut commitments to NATO on the matter and there would be serious trouble here and in Europe in cancelling or frustrating the huge F104 programme to re-equip our air division there. Moreover, I think there is another type of danger in serious delay; should you decide after an election to have these weapons available for the defence of Canada, many people would say or think that you had knowingly risked the security of Canada and the Alliance for election purposes.

Therefore I assume that what you want is a statement announcing that we are negotiating now with the United States the arrangements by which nuclear warheads can be kept available in Canada under joint control for the use of Canadian and U.S. forces if and when they are required in defensive anti-aircraft and anti-submarine weapons. The statement would recognize the arguments for not having such weapons, disarmament and the desire not to enlarge the nuclear club, and would justify our delays on those grounds, but say why we feel the defence arguments now outweigh these considerations.

On tactics, I would suggest you consider asking the House of Commons to approve by suitable resolution the Government taking these necessary steps to be ready to protect the country and the Alliance. There has been so much said and written outside of Parliament by well meaning but ill-informed people on this subject, that I feel the air should be cleared and the Government given a chance to explain the real situation so far as security permits (which is pretty far) by a proper debate in the House early in the session. Moreover, it will I think strengthen your position on balance to have such a debate and make it necessary for the Liberals to declare themselves in a responsible way in advance of the campaign. The CCF (NDP) will no doubt oppose, but will have more difficulty in doing so in debate than on the hustings I think most of those who will oppose you on this issue, after a good debate, will likely be voting NDP anyway, or for Pearson as winner of the Nobel peace prize.

The chief difficulty is, of course, Mr. Green and this causes me serious concern for I have much respect and affection for him, even when I cannot agree with him. I should be glad to help in any way I can in preparing memoranda for you to give him or in talking to those of his officials, chiefly Norman Robertson, who encourage him in this last ditch opposition to our having these warheads available.

Perhaps I should add that I do not think we need to be in this nuclear business indefinitely. Our role in Europe should be, within a few years, as part of the non-nuclear force there on which the United States now puts such emphasis, if indeed we need to remain in Europe at all for more than five years or so. In North America, the importance of the ICBM and Polaris-type missiles will grow so rapidly in the next five years that defensive nuclear weapons of the nature we are planning to have within Canada will become much less important than now, and we could leave them to the United States and perhaps turn our efforts to special non-nuclear forces to use in some sort of international set up. But it is clearly far too early for that now and we should have ready as soon as possible the defensive weapons that would be important during the next five years or so.

NUCLEAR WEAPONS POLICY

I understand that Mr. Harkness has sent you a letter to which was attached a draft agreement on general principles governing the stockpiling of nuclear weapons in Canada and Europe for possible Canadian use.¹² You may find the following comments useful in your consideration of this matter.

2. This draft is but a slightly revised version of the one prepared some time ago by officials of the Department of National Defence and this Department. It would, of course, be desirable for officials to go over it again as certain changes may be desirable before it is considered by Ministers. For example, the language of paragraph 3 might be strengthened by adding the words "and inter-governmental consultation" at the end of the paragraph to give emphasis to the point and to state more clearly the need for inter-governmental consultation as a means for exercising control over the possible use of nuclear weapons.

3. The proposed agreement would be an agreement on general principles only, but it will take some time and prove difficult to negotiate, even though some of the principles already agreed to in connection with the proposed storage of defensive air-to-air weapons at Goose and Harmon have been worked into it. Even if it were completed and signed, as you will appreciate, it would not commit Canada to the acquisition of nuclear weapons since, before this could come about, it would be necessary to work out supplementary agreements covering each type of weapon. These, too, would take a good deal of time to negotiate.

¹² Voir/See Volume 27, document 277.

4. The principle of joint control, which the Cabinet has agreed should be basic to any agreement on the subject, has been incorporated in the draft and applied in various ways. Joint control over use, over release from storage and for the physical security of the sites are all provided for. In Canada, joint responsibility for physical security would be carried out by United States personnel being responsible for safeguarding and maintaining the warheads and Canadian forces being responsible for the external security of the sites (paragraph 2). Joint responsibility for release from storage would be stated as a principle (paragraph 3), with the details to be spelled out in supplementary agreements. The sole responsibility of the Canadian Government for the use of the weapons once released from storage would be stipulated (paragraph 4). In Europe, in the event Canada is to be the sole user of a storage facility, security of the site, subject to agreement with the host government, would be provided as if the site were in Canada, i.e., Canada would provide the external security for the site (paragraph 2). If Canada is to be a joint user, the external security of the site or sites would be as agreed between the governments concerned (paragraph 15). Controls over the release from storage would vary from weapon to weapon but based always on the principle of joint responsibility (paragraph 3). Authorization for the use of the weapons by Canadian forces, once released, would be the responsibility of Canada (paragraph 4).

5. The problem of controls is, of course, extremely complex. We have made a first attempt to examine the implications in a paper which is attached. If you agree, it could be used as a basis for further consultation between this Department and the Department of National Defence.

NUCLEAR WEAPONS POLICY – CONTROLS

I. POLICY CONSIDERATIONS

When Cabinet considered the above subject on December 6 last, one of the decisions taken was that in any discussions or negotiations with the United States concerning the stockpiling of nuclear weapons or warheads for Canadian forces, the “acceptance of joint controls (is) to be a basic principle.” This paper examines the meaning and implications of this principle.

2. The problem of controls is, of course, fundamental to any consideration of the terms under which Canada might acquire nuclear weapons and the United States might stockpile such weapons in Canada for its forces. Essentially, the technical problem is to reconcile the requirements of the United States Atomic Energy Act with the need for the responsible military commander to respond to an emergency situation. There is also the all-important political problem, to reconcile the responsibility of the Canadian and United States Governments to exercise control through consultation in situations likely to give rise to the use of nuclear weapons. As stated by the Prime Minister in the House on July 14, 1960, the United States Act requires that ownership of the U.S. warheads must remain with the United States and that the warheads cannot be used by non-American forces unless released for the purpose by the President. On the other hand, if and when nuclear weapons are acquired by Canadian forces, they will be used only in the manner approved by the Canadian Government, and arrangements for safeguarding the stockpiles will be subject to Canadian approval and consent. These two elements taken together create a situation requiring certain responsibilities to be shared by both Governments. The controls so exercised jointly would vary depending upon the weapons and their location. In the same way, these controls would not necessarily be exercised simultaneously in point of time.

3. The United States is, of course, bound by the restrictions imposed by its legislation when making arrangements with other governments. In no case can it abdicate responsibility for custody of warheads, i.e., control of access to the weapons, or their ownership, and cannot grant more favourable treatment to one ally than to another. Finally, it does not wish to see any expansion of the nuclear club. Canada shares this latter wish and has publicly declared so on many occasions. Like the United States, Canada regards the decision on the use of nuclear weapons of any sort as a matter of high policy and therefore appropriate to the maximum degree of Government control, consistent with the requirements of national security. Canada's policy to seek extensive joint controls is not only based on a desire to give expression to this view but is also a political requirement in keeping with its position as a sovereign nation.

4. There are three areas in which the principle of joint control can be established:

- (a) Controls over the physical security of the sites;
- (b) Controls over the release of the warheads from storage;
- (c) Control over the use of the weapons.

5. Physical Security

The degree of control which can effectively be shared varies greatly depending upon the location of the warheads. For example, in connection with the storage of nuclear air-to-air missiles at Goose Bay and Ernest Harmon A.F.B., it will be recalled that the Cabinet agreed to the concept of a Canadian representative rather than joint responsibility for physical security. By this means, the importance the Canadian Government would attach to strict adherence to the terms of the proposed agreement would be demonstrated and the same objective achieved. To provide for Canadian troops physically sharing guardianship of the storage sites on these bases with United States forces in a United States enclave not accessible to the general public would be a waste of manpower, would raise difficult questions of military jurisdiction, and might give rise to differences of interpretation of the rights and duties of each Government under the governing lease.

6. With respect to storage in Canada outside leased areas, however, the concept is both feasible and desirable. It could take the form of a division of the responsibility with United States custodial personnel being responsible for "internal" security and Canadian forces being responsible for "external" security. The United States position would be safeguarded and any contact the public might have would be with Canadian forces. Such a system is envisaged for stockpiling of warheads for the two BOMARC Squadrons, anti-submarine weapons for the RCAF Maritime Command, and possibly eventually for the air-to-air missiles for the RCAF Air Defence Command. It would also be appropriate for any storage outside any United States leased territory of anti-submarine weapons for the R.C.N. Inside U.S. leased territory such as Argentia, the concept of a Canadian representative would seem more appropriate for the same reason that this concept was found most suitable in the case of Goose and Harmon.

7. [In this paper no attempt has been made to examine the problem of controls for MRBMs. References to control in the NATO context are solely to those for tactical weapons proposed for Canadian use, i.e., warheads for the Honest John and air-to-surface missiles for the CF-104s.] In Europe, the "inner" and "external" security concept could be applied without difficulty to stockpiles of warheads earmarked solely for Canadian forces. A variation of this concept might be required for joint user sites, with Canadian forces on the "outer" ring sharing guardianship with troops of the other country or countries concerned. To date, Germany, where the stockpiles for the use of Canadian forces will be located, has not indicated any desire to share responsibility for this or indeed any other phase of the controls over stockpiles on its soil, but should it do so then a procedure agreeable to all parties would have to be worked out. Because of President de Gaulle's stand with regard to the storage of warheads in France, the United States has had no opportunity to explore what arrangements might be arrived at in that country. Unless the United States comes to some understanding or modus operandi with the French Government, it seems unlikely that there will be any possibility of making stockpile arrangements to supply that portion of the Air Division based in France. Thus the degree of control Canada might be able to exercise over weapons stored in France for the Air Division cannot be estimated at this time.

8. Release from Storage

The main purpose in seeking joint control over the release of warheads from storage would be to ensure that adequate Canadian political control is exercised when circumstances arise which would make preparations necessary for the employment of nuclear weapons by United States forces or Canadian armed forces in or over Canadian territory or in Europe. A Canadian control is required at this stage of the process whether removal is conducted for logistic or for operational reasons. How this could be applied in practice would vary according to location and from weapon to weapon. In the case of BOMARCS, for example, we would be faced with somewhat the same problem as the United Kingdom in connection with establishment on RAF bases of Thor missiles, namely that in order to be ready for use with minimum delay the warhead must be in position, or "stored," on the carrier. To overcome this problem, the "double key" formula has been developed. Something similar might be required for the BOMARCS.

9. A different procedure would be required for anti-submarine weapons allocated to the RCAF Maritime Command and the R.C.N. whether stored in Canada or at Argentina. Perhaps all that would be necessary would be a simple provision in the governing agreements that removal, whether for logistic or operational reasons, requires the consent of the Canadian Government (the requirement of the consent of the United States Government to removal from storage would be assumed to have been given).

10. In Europe, for the reasons explained in paragraph 14 below, the extent to which Canada could exercise control over release from storage could only be specified in terms of the Canadian Government authority required by the Canadian commander before he is authorized to take delivery. As in the case of physical control, it could be provided for in general terms as a statement of fact without stating in precise terms how it might be carried out. Much would depend upon the exact location of the site and the type of weapon.

11. Joint Control Over Use

It might appear from the foregoing that separate consultations would have to be arranged to cover each stage of the process. This might be feasible in certain circumstances as, for example, in a period of mounting tension, but provision would also have to be made to cover an emergency situation in order to ensure that the military commander concerned is not so restricted as to be unable to react quickly in the event of a surprise attack. To this end, it could always be understood that Canadian approval for one stage would also constitute approval for any earlier stage. Thus approval for the use of the weapons would constitute authority for their removal from the storage site or from the base as the case may be. In all circumstances, however, it will be necessary to provide for a rapid and secure means of communication in order to ensure that governmental approval can be obtained, perhaps at very short notice.

12. Joint control over use is, therefore, the most important and meaningful of all the different aspects of joint controls. As applied to the air defence of North America, the position is reasonably clear. Canada exercises with the United States joint responsibility for the operations of NORAD including the weapons placed at NORAD's disposal. In the event that defensive nuclear weapons are made available to NORAD forces in Canada, they could only be used in accordance with agreed procedures governing NORAD's operations which, in turn, are approved by both governments. Thus, in Canada, such weapons could only be used in Canadian territory or air space under conditions agreed to by Canada. The United States is able to exercise joint control over use by withholding Presidential authority for the release of these weapons to Canada and presumably would only permit their release if satisfied that the particular situation requires their use. Canada can only exercise its share of responsibility once the weapons have been released but, even so, the weapons could not be used even though released by United States if the Canadian Government does not see fit to permit their use. Thus, irrespective of the action the United States may take, the control of the Canadian Government amounts virtually to a power of veto.

13. Insofar as anti-submarine weapons are concerned, the situation is less clear. It will be recalled that, at the Montebello meeting of the Canada-United States Committee on Joint Defence, it was agreed that joint control over storage and control over release from storage at Argentia presented no particular problem as the same general principles embodied in the proposed Goose-Harmon agreement could be applied.¹³ A special problem over the use of such weapons would arise, however, with respect to the extent to which Canadian control could or should be applied once a naval vessel had left Canadian territorial waters. This is purely a matter of government policy, and quite similar to that faced by the United Kingdom in connection with the degree of control it will have over Polaris-equipped submarines based on the Clyde once such a submarine has left United Kingdom territorial waters. According to Mr. Macmillan, there is "general agreement" that there will be "the fullest possible previous consultation with the United States and our Allies" although he recognized that such consultation might not be possible in the event of an emergency. Both Mr. Macmillan and Mr. Watkinson, the Minister of Defence, said that in all events "we shall continue to rely on the close co-operation and understanding that we have of the United States on all defence matters."

14. In the case of Canadian forces committed to NATO, the application of the concept of joint control has additional implications. There is a general understanding among governments that, where time permits, the Council will be consulted before nuclear weapons are employed by NATO forces. It is also understood that, in the event of a sudden large-scale attack, SACEUR is authorized to use all the means at his disposal, including nuclear weapons, necessary to repel the attack. In effect, members will be able to exercise a measure of control through the Council where there is time.

15. The absence of any clear cut definition of the degree of control to be exercised by the Council, however, does not preclude Canada and other countries with forces to be equipped with nuclear weapons from ensuring that they are able to share responsibility with the United States (and, if necessary, with SACEUR) regarding the use of the weapons. The practice so far has been to conclude bilateral stockpile agreements between the United States and the user countries concerned. No problem has, as yet, arisen with "host" governments as Germany, up to the present the only host country, has not yet sought to participate in these agreements. It may, of course, decide to do so in the future in which event a new element will be injected into the picture. However, in view of the fact that Canadian forces will be in physical control of the means of delivery, it should be possible to ensure, through the terms of the stockpile agreement, that joint control over physical security, over release, and over use are applied.

¹³ Voir/See Volume 27, document 302.

II. APPLICATION OF POLICY CONSIDERATIONS

16. The three phases of joint control outlined above have been covered in various ways in the "MB-1 Overflight" agreement, the proposed agreement on storage at Goose Bay and Ernest Harmon A.F.B., and in the working draft which has been prepared governing stockpiling of warheads for Canadian forces in Canada and in Europe.

(a) MB-1 Overflight Agreement

17. This agreement, which is renewed annually, permits USAF interceptors under CINCNORAD's operational control to overfly Canada with nuclear air-to-air weapons under certain conditions, as described below. At the moment, this agreement applies only to interceptors based on the United States but it would automatically apply to such interceptors based at Goose and Harmon when the agreement for their storage there is concluded. Since the weapons are stored in the United States, the questions of joint control over physical storage and for release from storage do not arise.

18. The Canadian Government, however, does have joint control over the use of the weapons in Canada. Interceptors armed with these weapons may only enter Canadian air space whenever a condition of Air Defence Readiness or Air Defence Emergency is declared by CINCNORAD. These are NORAD's two highest states of readiness and would only be declared in a state of grave emergency when an attack on North America is deemed either to be imminent or in actual progress. As this agreement is renewed annually, the Canadian Government may alter its terms if it decides to do so when the agreement comes up for renewal.

19. In addition to this control, under the terms of an Exchange of Letters of September/October, 1959, except in a grave emergency, there must be consultation between the two Governments in both the diplomatic and military channels before CINCNORAD may increase his state of readiness (at the time this agreement was being negotiated, it was clearly recognized that it would be unrealistic to make consultation mandatory in a situation of grave emergency should a surprise attack be launched on North America without any prior build-up of international tension). Moreover, the weapons in question may only be used in accordance with NORAD's Rules of Engagement which have to be approved by the Chiefs of Staff of both countries.

20. The arrangements already agreed to with the United States embodied in this agreement provide the necessary safeguards to ensure Canadian control over the use of the weapons in question in Canadian air space consistent with the need for CINCNORAD to react quickly in an emergency. Should the Canadian Government feel it necessary to go further in order to ensure control for their use in an emergency situation, the only method by which this could be done would be to devise some system whereby an appropriate Minister, and possibly the Prime Minister as well, could be reached at a moment's notice at any time of the day or night to give the necessary authorization.

(b) The Proposed Agreement for Storage at Goose and Harmon

21. The weapons to be stored at these two locations would be for United States' use and a number of controls have been written into the draft as it now stands. Joint responsibility for arrangements for the storage of the weapons is provided for by the United States assuming responsibility for the security of the storage sites in accordance with the terms of the governing leases and Canada providing a "representative" at each location in order to ensure that the United States carries out its obligations under the agreement. Procedures for the handling of the weapons would be subject to Canadian approval. The weapons would be transported in accordance with Canadian law and agreed procedures. Joint control over use would be covered by the automatic application of the provisions of the MB-1 Overflight Agreement and the NORAD States of Readiness Agreement. Specific Canadian approval is required for the removal of the weapons from the area of the base.

(c) The Proposed Stockpiling Agreement

22. The draft on this subject which has been prepared by officials but not yet formally considered by Ministers covers both stockpiles in Canada and in Europe for Canadian forces. It envisages a set of general principles applicable to both areas and other principles applicable to one area only. This proposed agreement would not, in itself, permit any stockpiling. Once concluded, it would serve only as a context within which there can be negotiated a series of inter-governmental agreements setting out the detailed arrangements for the provision of specific weapons, the controls to be applied, and the logistic considerations surrounding their storage.

23. With regard to stockpiling of warheads for use by Canadian forces in Canada, the proposed agreement provides for joint responsibility for physical security, with United States personnel being responsible for safeguarding and maintaining the warheads and Canada responsible for the external security of the sites. It would establish the principle of joint responsibility for the procedures under which the warheads would be released from the storage sites but would not attempt to spell them out. The sole responsibility of the Canadian Government for the use of the weapons once they have been released from storage would be stipulated. As in the case of the proposed Goose-Harmon Agreement, the procedures for handling the warheads would be subject to Canadian approval and the transport of the warheads would be subject to Canadian laws and regulations.

24. With regard to stockpiles in Europe for Canadian forces, the draft envisages controls to be exercised as follows. In the event Canada is to be the sole user of a storage facility, security of the site, subject to agreement with the host government, would be provided as if the site were in Canada, i.e., Canada would provide the external security for the site. If Canada is to be a joint user, the external security of the site or sites would be as agreed between the governments concerned. As would be the case of stockpiles located in Canada, controls over the release from storage sites would vary from weapon to weapon but based always on the principle of joint responsibility. Similarly, authorization for the use of the weapons by Canadian forces, once released from storage, would be the responsibility of Canada.

NUCLEAR WEAPONS POLICY

The Chairman of the Canadian Section will make the following statement on this item:

“The Canadian Government will not be able to come to a final decision on the Goose-Harmon agreement until the position with respect to the acquisition of nuclear warheads for the use of Canadian forces has been resolved. In the meantime, preparations are continuing to enable the Canadian forces to have the vehicles, missiles, bases, training and other requirements to enable them to use nuclear weapons if and when the adoption of these weapons is considered necessary. I may say that it is the intention of the Canadian Government to initiate discussions concerning arrangements for the acquisition of nuclear warheads for Canadian forces as soon as such discussions can usefully be undertaken.”

NUCLEAR WEAPONS POLICY

Following our conversation, I am setting down the following notes on the points in the draft paper on the above-mentioned subject, which you allowed me to see, which struck me as raising some difficulties.

2. The first point relates to the covering memo, page 2, line 29. It seems to me that there is a contradiction in the statement that “authorization for the use of the weapons by Canadian forces, once released, would be the responsibility of Canada.” SACEUR is to have operational command of the Canadian forces. While Canada would undoubtedly be able to exercise judgement as to whether the weapons were to be released or not, provided events did not move too rapidly, it would seem extremely difficult to maintain Canadian commanders are to obtain Mr. Diefenbaker’s authority, and SACEUR is to obtain the President’s authority before nuclear weapons could be used, in view of the very high speed at which a serious situation might be expected to develop, and in view of the confused situation likely to obtain because of uncertainty of information, it would seem that, unless we are to risk the Canadian forces being overwhelmed before they could use their weapons, they would have to use them in accordance with SACEUR’s orders once the decision had been taken to release them.

3. In para. 7 of the main paper, the point is made that the warheads for the use of the airforce F-104G’s could not be stored in France while President de Gaulle’s position remains as at present. This might mean that, in order to use these weapons on this aircraft, our bases will have to be moved, which would doubtless raise grave problems.

4. Paras. 14 and 15: The “understanding” that where time permits the Council will be consulted before nuclear weapons are employed would seem to have little value, as probably time would hardly ever permit and as, in the case of a sudden large scale attack, SACEUR is authorized to order the use of nuclear weapons. The final sentence in para. 15 does not appear to be consistent with statements in para. 14.

5. Para. 21: The object of maintaining joint control over these stocks for the use of US aircraft is not very clear. Their mere presence on Canadian soil, whether they were partially under Canadian control or not, would probably be enough to enable Russia in a war situation to claim justification for any nuclear attack on the facilities – whether in fact Canada authorized the US armed forces to use these stocks or not.

My dear Colleague,

I am sorry that I have not been able to reply to your letter of December 30 before this date.

To your letter you attached a draft agreement on general principles governing the provision of stockpiles of nuclear weapons for Canadian forces.

I am asking the officials of my Department, who are concerned with this question, to examine this draft and let me have their comments. When these have been received, I shall be in a position to reply more fully to your communication.

DISARMAMENT – CANADIAN POLICY 1961; NUCLEAR WEAPONS; MEETING WITH PRESIDENT OF U.S.
 (Previous reference June 23, 1960)

31. The Secretary of State for External Affairs said that on June 23rd, 1960, the Cabinet had approved a Canadian view on Soviet proposals then current, as guidance for the Canadian Representative to the Conference of the Ten Nation Committee on Disarmament. Subsequently, the United States, with the support of other Western members of the Committee, had submitted new proposals, and the U.S.S.R. had put forward revised proposals. It was therefore desirable to review Canadian disarmament policy for the guidance of the Canadian representatives in forthcoming discussions.

An explanatory memorandum was circulated, (Memorandum, Secretary of State for External Affairs, concurred in by the Minister of National Defence, Feb. 13 – Cab. Doc. 67-61).†

32. The Prime Minister said that, while in Washington on February 20th, he would try to discover how far President Kennedy would go in the direction of joint control over the use of nuclear arms if located in Canada. To prevent public misunderstandings or inconsistencies in public statements, future announcements of the government's policy on nuclear weapons should be made by the Prime Minister only. The policy at this time should be that announced by him two years previously, on February 20th, 1959¹⁴ and any changes in policy would be determined by the Cabinet.

As President Kennedy had decided to have the U.S. Secretary of State and the U.S. Ambassador to Canada in attendance at the meeting on February 20th, he was asking Mr. Green instead of Mr. Walker to accompany him. Changes had also been made in the programme for the Commonwealth Prime Ministers' Conference, and this might affect the composition of the Canadian group that would proceed to London.

33. During the discussion the following points were raised:

(a) New paragraphs had been inserted in the memorandum dealing with the inclusion, in the first stage of disarmament, of measures for restricting the spread of nuclear weapons to other countries. These paragraphs would not prevent the government of Canada from obtaining nuclear weapons from the United States at this time.

 See Canada, House of Commons, Debates, 1959, Volume II, pp. 1221-24.

(b) A recent public opinion poll indicated that 46 per cent of Canadians favoured acceptance of nuclear weapons by Canada, 20 per cent were opposed and the remainder were undecided.

(c) The obstacle to the recognition of Red China by Canada was not the possibility of objections from the U.S., but the fact that Red China would not accept recognition unless their right to Formosa was also recognized, and the fact that such recognition would discourage the anti-communist states of Southeast Asia. Formosa was an inherent part of the North American defence system. Other nations bordering on the Pacific, such as Australia, New Zealand and Japan, had withheld recognition from Red China. The recent statement by Lord Home on recognition had probably not been authorized by the U.K. government. The question would not arise again at the United Nations until the autumn of 1961.

34. The Cabinet approved the memorandum of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, dated February 13th, 1961, concurred in by the Minister of National Defence, (Cab. Doc. 67-61), as a statement of the Canadian position on disarmament, for the guidance of Canadian representatives at future disarmament negotiations, and took note of the Prime Minister's view that the policy regarding nuclear weapons stated to Parliament on February 20th, 1959, should be regarded as continuing to be government policy except insofar as the Cabinet decides otherwise.

NUCLEAR WEAPONS – POSITION FOR DISCUSSION WITH PRESIDENT KENNEDY

After re-studying your main statements on the subject and reviewing the discussions and papers about it, I would make the following comments and suggestions for you:

1. I do not believe that much is to be gained, either internationally or domestically, by keeping the Canadian position undefined or fluid. In fact the Canadian position is reasonably well-determined now and needs only some re-affirmation on your part and some defence by your Ministers to clear up the confusion in the press and public mind, which I feel is doing harm to the Government. Therefore I suggest that you tell Kennedy the main points of Canadian policy, and later make a statement to the House, setting forth the Government's position as clearly as possible.

2. On matters of principle, there is very little difference between the Government's position on this subject and what the United States is willing to do (except in respect of SAC weapons at Goose Bay). Your basic statement of February 20th, 1959 was accepted by the U.S. members of the Joint Defence Committee in advance. The addition to it of "joint control," which was not referred to as such, does not pose serious problems, as long as the United States retains the authority to release the warheads for our use, in accordance with their law and with the principle you endorsed in February 1959.

3. There are some practical problems of procedures and presentation. We have solved most of these in respect of the warheads to be at Goose Bay and Harmon Field for the U.S. air defence squadrons there, in the agreement that has been worked out but not yet signed. There are some other problems of detail in connection with defensive nuclear naval weapons at Argentia, relating to their being put on U.S. naval ships leaving that base for duty at sea, but these should be soluble. The problems of detail relating to the BOMARCS seem to be soluble by a "two-key" arrangement such as the United Kingdom has with the United States. The weapons for our NATO forces do not present serious problems vis-à-vis the United States, though there are complications about relations with NATO and the host country, and in arrangements for obtaining prompt approval by the Canadian Government in an emergency.

4. These matters of detail about procedures and the wording of announcements are not suitable for discussion between the President and yourself at this time, even if we were ready, and I doubt if they will ever require such high level discussions. They can be settled, I think, by the regular diplomatic machinery and the Canada-U.S. Committee of Ministers.

5. Consequently I think there is little that you have to ask Kennedy for at this stage in this field, and your real objective should be to use the opportunity to make clear what our policy is. Put briefly, it is, I suggest, the following:

(a) In general it is that set out in your February 1959 statement, plus joint control.

(b) We wish to proceed now with the negotiation via diplomatic channels of agreements under which we can get U.S. nuclear warheads and weapons for the Canadian forces when and if we need them in accordance with the principles already stated.

(c) We are prepared to enter into the agreement concerning the U.S. air defence squadrons at Goose and Harmon as soon as we can enter into an agreement re the Canadian forces requirements.¹⁵

(d) We would proceed now to work out a separate agreement for naval weapons at Argentia, which will have to take account of the special problems of naval use aboard ships.

(e) We prefer to leave in abeyance for the present any arrangement to place SAC attack weapons at Goose Bay, as this will cause us serious political problems in Canada which may be less when the arrangements over defensive weapons have been worked out and announced.¹⁶

(f) We do not wish to have the nuclear warheads for the Canadian forces placed in Canada until our forces are equipped and trained to use them, and therefore we will continue to say we are making arrangements to get them only if and when they are needed.¹⁷

(g) At present we would not plan to hold nuclear warheads in Canada for use on any F-101 interceptors that we might obtain from the United States, but plan to obtain them quickly from nearby U.S. bases in an emergency.¹⁸

(h) We do not foresee any special difficulties about arrangements for nuclear weapons for the Canadian forces in NATO but we would stipulate that they can be used only with the approval at the time of the Canadian Government and we will make arrangements so that approval can be given promptly.¹⁹

REPORT ON DISCUSSIONS WITH PRESIDENT KENNEDY;
 CANADIAN POSITION ON STORAGE OF NUCLEAR WEAPONS

Canada would insist upon joint custody and control, and joint authority over use. The President had seemed to raise no objection. Regarding the submarine base at Argentia, Mr. Diefenbaker said he had stated that Canada would require joint custody, but that use should be determined by N.A.T.O. He had further stated that, so long as serious disarmament negotiations continued, Canada did not propose to determine whether or not to accept nuclear weapons for the Bomarc bases or for the Canadian interceptors; but that, if such weapons were accepted by Canada, this country would require joint custody and joint control, and use would be determined in the same manner as on U.S. bases. Negotiations for the necessary agreements should now continue on the basis of a "package deal," no one agreement being signed before the others had been worked out. There would be no hold up if war should occur. The President had asked whether the same sort of "two key" arrangement as the United Kingdom had would be satisfactory and Mr. Diefenbaker had said it would.

5. The Secretary of State for External Affairs said that President Kennedy had indicated that the new U.S. government hoped to determine its basic policy on disarmament before participating in international discussions on the subject.

Dear Mr. Green:

When the Prime Minister returned from Washington last week he outlined in Cabinet the following day, Tuesday, February 21st, the substance of his talks with President Kennedy. Part of these dealt with the Canadian position on storage of nuclear weapons, and I thought you should have a note on what I propose to record on this matter.

Mr. Diefenbaker said he had stated that negotiations should continue regarding such storage Harmon Field and Goose Bay, but that Canada would insist upon joint custody and control, and joint authority over use. The President had seemed to raise no objection. Regarding the submarine base at Argentia, Mr. Diefenbaker said he had stated that Canada would require joint custody, but that use should be determined by N.A.T.O. He had further stated that, so long as serious disarmament negotiations continued, Canada did not propose to determine whether or not to accept nuclear weapons for the Bomarc bases or for the Canadian interceptors; but that, if such weapons were accepted by Canada, this country would require joint custody and joint control, and use would be determined in the same manner as on U.S. bases. There would be no hold up if war should occur. The President had asked whether the same sort of "two key" arrangement as the United Kingdom had would be satisfactory and Mr. Diefenbaker had said it would.

You will remember that you pointed out that President Kennedy had indicated that the new U.S. government hoped to determine its basic policy on disarmament before participating in international discussions on the subject.

The Cabinet noted with approval the statement of the Prime Minister on his discussions with President Kennedy in Washington on the previous day on the storage of nuclear weapons in Canada.

It is my understanding that negotiations on the basis outlined above were to proceed forthwith.

I have written a similar letter to Mr. Harkness.

NUCLEAR WEAPONS NEGOTIATIONS WITH THE U.S.A.

Last December Cabinet decided that negotiations might proceed with the U.S. Government on the acquisition of nuclear warheads for Canadian forces as soon as they could usefully be undertaken, and that the agreement on storage of air-to-air weapons at Goose Bay and Harmon should not be concluded until after discussions with the United States on other matters had been concluded.

2. In a brief conversation with me last week the Minister said that the Prime Minister now wished the various nuclear negotiations to be undertaken on the basis of a "package deal." The agreements would be negotiated but would not be put into effect until such time as the Government decided that such action was required. I assume that the elements of the "package" would be:

- (a) a general agreement or agreements regarding the establishment of stockpiles of nuclear warheads for Canadian forces in Canada and in Europe;
- (b) the Goose-Harmon agreement;
- (c) an agreement for the storage of naval nuclear weapons at Argentina.

I also assume that the United States request for permission to store SAC weapons at Goose Bay for "reflex strike" missions would be excluded from the package.

3. In my opinion the "package" should consist of a collection of separate agreements rather than melded into an omnibus agreement, because of the basic differences in the arrangements which would govern each situation.

4. It would be possible to carry out the three negotiations simultaneously but in my view it would be simpler to deal first with the stockpile agreement or agreements for Canadian forces, then revert to the Goose-Harmon agreement, and finally tackle the Argentina agreement. Such a procedure might take longer but perhaps this is not undesirable. Maybe it would be desirable, when the negotiations were completed, to have the "Package" reviewed by the Ministerial Committee on Joint Defence.

5. The following are points which should be considered in connection with the individual agreements:

Stockpiling of Nuclear Warheads for Use by Canadian Forces in Canada and Europe

6. At present the draft of this agreement is set up as an omnibus document covering requirements both in Canada and in Europe. There might be some advantage in splitting it so that if the Government wished to follow a different timetable at home and abroad it could do so.

7. The procedure which it is suggested should be followed in connection with negotiation of this agreement is as follows:

- (a) discussion of draft text between SSEA and MND;
- (b) submission of the agreed draft to Cabinet for approval as a basis for opening negotiations with the United States;

(c) Transmittal of the draft through the Canadian Embassy in Washington to the United States authorities for consideration, following which the regular process of negotiation would take place.

Storage for Air-to-Air Weapons at Goose Bay

8. Last July at Montebello the United States accepted the Canadian draft of a proposed agreement provided two points could be met:

(1) that provision be made to ensure that the weapons could be returned to the United States at any time at the request of the United States Government;

(2) that more formal status be given to the informal explanatory notes provided to the State Department by the Canadian Embassy regarding those paragraphs of the draft agreement dealing with joint responsibility for storage, release from storage, use of the weapons and their movement within Canada.

9. These points were set out in a draft memorandum to Cabinet after the Montebello meeting²¹ but so far as we are aware the memorandum was never submitted to Cabinet by SSEA. We were given to understand recently that the Minister had discussed the matter with the Prime Minister, who objected to point (2) above. If this is the position of the Government and if it is desired to re-open negotiations on this matter, presumably the next step would be to convey the position of the Government to the State Department so that it can decide whether or not it is prepared to conclude an agreement on terms acceptable to Canada. As a matter of timing and bearing in mind the fact that the State Department knows we have no intention of concluding the agreement for the present in any case, it would seem better to defer renewal of these negotiations for the time being.

Storage of Naval Nuclear Weapons at Argentina

10. There have been no formal negotiations on this matter, but it was discussed at Camp David and at Montebello. It should be possible to deal with this project by means of an agreement similar to that for Goose and Harmon, but there is the additional problem of what control, if any, Canada would wish to exercise on weapons transferred from the storage site at Argentina to U.S. ships which then leave Canadian territorial waters. In essence this is the same problem faced by the United Kingdom in connection with Polaris submarines based on the Clyde. Perhaps it might be possible to evolve a formula whereby operational responsibility would pass to SACLANT when ships left Canadian territorial waters.

principles governing the stockpiling of nuclear weapons for Canadian forces in Canada and in Europe.†

2. During your absence in Washington the Minister called in Mr. Ignatieff and Mr. Tovell to discuss the matter. Mr. Green was of the opinion that the draft agreement as it stood was not sufficiently detailed, particularly on the various aspects of joint control and wished these to be amplified. He was also of the view that since the Prime Minister envisaged a “package deal” we should aim at an omnibus agreement rather than proceed along the lines we have been following, namely an agreement on general principles followed by separate intergovernmental agreements for each type of warhead and/or weapons system.

3. The upshot of the discussion was that before the Minister accepts Mr. Harkness’ invitation to discuss the agreement on general principles together, this division should, without consultation with National Defence:

(a) revise the present draft of the general agreement, particularly those paragraphs dealing with joint responsibility for storage, joint control over release from storage and joint control over use in order to make them as detailed as possible with regard to each type of warhead;

(b) work up a draft of the separate agreement to cover warheads for the BOMARC;

(c) work up a draft agreement on storage at Argentina.

We are currently engaged in these three tasks on a priority basis.

4. During the course of the meeting the Minister suggested that the Goose-Harmon draft should also be incorporated in the omnibus agreement. Mr. Ignatieff, however, expressed the view that storage at Goose and Harmon like storage at Argentina are readily separable from any omnibus agreement or agreements dealing with stockpiling for Canadian forces. The Minister agreed that this matter should be left in abeyance until at least such time as he has had a chance to see the further drafts which we are preparing for him.

NUCLEAR NEGOTIATIONS WITH THE U.S.A.

Pursuant to your discussion with Messrs. Ignatieff and Tovell last week we have prepared and attach under Tab. A for your consideration a draft of an “all-embracing” form of agreement to cover the establishment of stockpiles of nuclear weapons for Canadian forces in Canada and Europe.† It consists of the following:

(a) a covering diplomatic note;

(b) an annex setting out the general conditions which would apply (this is based on the draft “general agreement” proposed by the Department of National Defence but incorporates some drafting changes);

(c) a series of schedules to accompany the annex setting out the detailed control arrangements to govern the storage, release from storage, and employment of weapons by Canadian forces in Canada and Europe. Schedules have been prepared for the BOMARC, naval weapons for the RCAF and RCN, Honest John, and weapons for the Air Division in Europe. It should be emphasized that these draft schedules are intended to be illustrative only, as they represent only External Affairs ideas on what should be in them, and have not been discussed with National Defence, which no doubt would argue that insufficient technical information is available at this time to discuss this aspect of the negotiations.

2. Also attached under Tab. B, in accordance with your request, is a draft agreement regarding the storage of naval nuclear weapons at Argentia to meet U.S. requirements.† It is modelled on the draft agreement regarding storage of air-to-air nuclear weapons at Goose and Harmon, but with some important differences, as follows:

(a) paragraph 6 of the draft agreement provides that the weapons would only be used in situations of grave emergency in accordance with the plans and procedures governing the operations of ACLANT (this means that NATO alert procedures, and the obligation to consult the NATO Council if time permitted, would apply), but limits specific Canadian approval of use to Canadian territory;

(b) paragraph 7 requires specific Canadian approval of the release of the weapons from storage, but also, in conjunction with paragraph 8, imposes the consequent obligation on Canada to provide the means of communication necessary to ensure that such approval can be obtained very rapidly.

3. There are two main points on which we anticipate difficulties with the U.S.A. in the negotiations on the various nuclear agreements:

(a) Description of Arrangements for Storage

We do not anticipate that the U.S.A. will quarrel with the substance of the arrangements we have suggested on storage, but we anticipate that they will once again seek to describe their part of the arrangements in terms of U.S. “custody” of the warheads. We have been successful in gaining acceptance of our view by U.S. officials in connection with the negotiations to date of the proposed agreement on Goose and Harmon, but in that case the warheads are intended for use by U.S. forces. They may be less willing to accept our formula in its application to warheads intended for use by Canadian forces, especially for those in Europe;

(b) Arrangements for Release of Warheads for Use in Event of Emergency

The U.S.A. is not expected to challenge the Canadian right to have an equal voice in the decision to release the warheads for use when there is sufficient time to carry out the necessary consultations, but they will also press us to agree that in event of emergency, when decisions would be required in a matter of minutes, the authority should be delegated to the appropriate commander, i.e. CINCNORAD, SACEUR or SACLANT. It would seem to us that we have two choices in this connection, – either we agree to delegate such authority, or alternatively we establish a rapid communications system similar to that used by the United States to ensure that key ministers and officials can be contacted at once, at any time of the day or night, wherever they may be. Such a system is expensive and onerous for those involved, but it can be set up. The various schedules to the stockpile agreement, and also the Argentia agreement, have been drafted on the assumption that you would prefer to have such a system rather than agree to any delegation of authority, but the implications of this course of action should be fully appreciated. It would mean accessibility of the responsible Ministers at all times.

4. Although we have drafted the stockpile agreement in an “all-embracing” form so that the totality of what is involved can more easily be appreciated, it is suggested that further consideration should be given to the form in which we take it up with the United States. One question, for example, is whether it would be more advantageous to the Canadian Government to have two agreements – one dealing solely with requirements of our forces in Canada and the other with requirements in Europe, either one of which could be implemented or terminated without reference to the other. A second point relates to the schedules setting out the detailed arrangements applying to different weapons systems. We believe that we should not be the first to “show our hand” on what we think should be in the schedules, but rather that we should try to get the U.S.A. to produce drafts for us to comment on. This will give us information which we do not now have on the technical considerations involved, and make it possible for us to propose revisions incorporating the features which we consider to be essential in a form corresponding to technical requirements.

5. If it is decided to open negotiations along the lines set out above it is suggested that action might be taken concurrently to initiate technical studies on the establishment of a rapid communications system.

6. There is a further point of some importance which will require classification. Basing ourselves on the views you expressed in your discussion with Mr. Ignatieff on March 11, we have prepared in the attached draft a “package” made up entirely of Canadian requirements, both in Canada and Europe. It can, however, be expected that if we introduce the notion of a “package” in future discussions with the U.S.A., they will in turn wish to have the package broadened to include all U.S.A. requirements in Canada. The U.S.A. portion of the package would almost certainly include agreements on the storage of air-to-air defensive nuclear weapons at Goose and Harmon, and the storage of naval weapons at Argentia – requirements which they have repeatedly attempted to negotiate separately with the Canadian authorities. In addition to these agreements, we must expect the U.S.A. to ask to have included in the package an agreement for the storage of SAC weapons at Goose Bay for what they call “reflex strikes” i.e. for picking up a second load of bombs after the first SAC strike has been delivered. It is therefore important that on the Canadian side there be a clear idea of how far we are prepared to carry the “package” concept and to what extent we are ready to entertain an American content in the package.

[Ottawa], March 30, 1961

My dear Colleague,

Further to my letter of February 15, I have had an opportunity to study the proposed agreement with the United States Government governing the provision of stockpiles of nuclear warheads for Canadian forces, a draft of which you forwarded under cover of your letter of December 30.

The feature of this draft which in my opinion calls for particular consideration is contained in paragraph 3 of the Annex, which reads:

“The procedures under which the nuclear warheads will be released from the storage sites to meet logistic or operational requirements will vary depending on the types of weapons and the operational theatres in which they are to be employed. These procedures will be the subject of separate inter-governmental agreements and will be based on the principles of joint responsibility.”

Since the conclusion of this agreement might be regarded as constituting an undertaking in principle on the part of Canada to acquire nuclear weapons, I think it is essential that we know in advance all the implications and obligations involved. This, in my view, will not be possible if we leave the important question of control over the release of weapons to be dealt with subsequently by means of supplementary agreements. It is my understanding that this is what the Prime Minister had in mind when he indicated to President Kennedy that he would wish to proceed on the basis of a package.

Following this approach, I think that the first step should be to prepare a revision of the draft agreement in such a way that it would deal with this problem as a whole by providing that the detailed procedures governing storage, release from storage, and authorization of use of the various weapons systems should be set out in a series of schedules, one for each type of warhead to be made available, which would form an integral part of a comprehensive agreement. I realize that we may not at this time have all the information necessary to prepare such schedules, but I think it would be useful if the officials of our two Departments could now meet to work out the preliminary outline of a comprehensive agreement so that we can be clear in our own minds as to which features would be essential from the Canadian point of view. In this connection, my officials have already done a certain amount of preliminary drafting.

Perhaps the Chairman, Chiefs of Staff would be good enough to get in touch with the Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs with a view to arranging a meeting.

Yours sincerely,

NUCLEAR WEAPONS POLICY

You will recall that you wrote to the Minister of National Defence under date of March 30 suggesting that officials of the two Departments meet to work out the preliminary outline of a comprehensive agreement which would deal with all the facets of storage, release from storage and use of the various types of nuclear warheads which might be made available to the Canadian forces. Your letter also suggested that the Chairman, Chiefs of Staff might get in touch with the Under-Secretary with a view to arranging a meeting.

You would wish to know that this morning Mr. Ignatieff, Mr. Barton and Mr. Tovell met with Air Marshal Miller and other senior officers of the Department of National Defence to discuss in a general way the approach which you suggested in your letter to Mr. Harkness. Air Marshal Miller readily agreed that it was essential that Ministers should be fully aware of all the implications of any proposed agreement. In order to determine how best this could be done with the limited information available on the weapons concerned, officials of the two Departments will meet again next week with a view to preparing some material which could form a basis for consideration by you and Mr. Harkness.

ACQUISITION OF NUCLEAR WEAPONS FOR CANADIAN FORCES

You will recall that you wrote to the Minister of National Defence on March 30 suggesting that officials of the two departments meet to work out the preliminary outline of a comprehensive agreement, which would deal not only with the general arrangements governing the supply of nuclear weapons but would also include a series of schedules setting out the detailed control arrangements for each weapons system.

2. We have now held two meetings with Air Marshal Miller and officers of his staff. At the first meeting, on April 7, we explained in detail the approach suggested in your letter to Mr. Harkness. At the second meeting, on April 24, Air Marshal Miller commented on the proposals we had put forward earlier and made some counter-suggestions as to the procedure which might be followed.

3. Air Marshall Miller said that the basis of his position was that while Ministers should be made fully aware of all the implications of whatever arrangements are proposed for the supply of nuclear weapons and while the Government should approve and maintain control over any operations by Canadian forces involving nuclear weapons, he did not believe that it was either appropriate or desirable to spell out in diplomatic agreements with the United States the details of control procedures which were purely a Canadian concern.

4. It was on these grounds that he criticized the draft schedules which we had prepared. He said that once the United States authorized release of the weapons the question of what our forces did with them thereafter was purely one for decision by the Canadian Government. He felt that our draft schedules included procedures which were of concern only to Canada.

5. Air Marshal Miller then said that he had checked with the United States military authorities on the forms of agreements which the United States requires. These are:

(a) a government-to-government agreement setting out the general principles which would govern the provision of the warheads (a “general agreement”);

(b) a series of supplementary technical agreements setting out the detailed arrangements for storage, maintenance, custody and control of individual weapons systems, to be concluded between the designated Canadian authority and the United States field commander concerned, i.e., SACEUR (in his capacity as Commander of United States forces in Europe), SACLANT (acting as commander of the United States Atlantic Fleet), and CINCNORAD (in his capacity as head of United States air defence forces). A copy of a typical technical agreement has been obtained from the United States authorities by the Chairman, Chiefs of Staff and is attached.†

6. Air Marshal Miller pointed out that since the substance of the technical agreements is dependent on the general agreement, and since we have no assurance at the present moment that our draft of the general agreement is acceptable to the United States, it would be difficult to negotiate the technical agreements with the Commanders concerned until some understanding has been reached with the United States on the form and substance of the general agreement. Nevertheless he felt that it would be possible for us to conform to the pattern of agreements established by the United States and at the same time follow a procedure which would ensure that the Canadian Government would not have to commit itself to part of the “package” without having considered and approved the whole.

7. The procedure which Air Marshal Miller suggests should be followed is as follows:

(a) The “general agreement” would be negotiated with the United States authorities on the clear understanding that any language agreed upon is dependent upon the satisfactory subsequent negotiation of the various supplementary technical agreements. The general agreement would not be signed at this stage, but merely worked out to the point which would make it possible to proceed to the negotiation of the technical agreements.

(b) Although the United States Government delegates to commanders such as SACEUR, SACLANT and CINCNORAD (acting in their U.S.A. capacity) the responsibility for negotiating technical agreements, Air Marshal Miller recognizes that so far as the Canadian Government is concerned it would no doubt wish to maintain direct supervision over its negotiating representatives, and that any agreement would have to be approved specifically by the Government.

(c) When the drafts of the general agreement with the United States Government and the supplementary technical agreements with United States field commanders have all been worked out the Canadian Government can look at them as a “package” and decide at the time whether it wishes to sign them, or to wait until in its judgment the circumstances make such a decision necessary.

8. Finally, Air Marshal Miller proposed that we jointly prepare a draft memorandum for Cabinet seeking authority to proceed with negotiations in accordance with the procedure outlined above. The memorandum would be accompanied by an explanation of the way in which the Department of National Defence envisages the control of nuclear weapons by the Canadian Government would be exercised. In addition, the draft general agreement and sample technical agreement would be appended.

9. We made it clear that while we were prepared to put to you the reasons why National Defence favoured supplementary agreements rather than schedules forming an integral part of the main agreement, we could give no assurance that such an approach would be acceptable. We also specified that if supplementary agreements were to be negotiated they would have to be on a Government-to-Government basis. If the U.S. Government wished to designate a military commander as its negotiating agent that was its business, but so far as we were concerned, the Canadian negotiating authority would be that which customarily deals with policy matters of this importance.

10. With respect to Air Marshal Miller's proposal as described in paragraph 8 above we agreed to assist in preparing the necessary documentation as a means of facilitating further consideration of the matter by you and Mr. Harkness. However, we emphasized that this did not mean that the proposal was acceptable to you or that you would be prepared to go further with it.

11. This memorandum is intended only as an interim report pending preparation of the draft submission to Cabinet referred to above. When it is completed and you have had an opportunity to study it you may wish to give us further instructions.

[PIÈCE JOINTE/ENCLOSURE]

Projet d'un aide-mémoireDraft Aide-Mémoire

TOP SECRET

PROPOSED AGREEMENT WITH THE UNITED STATES GOVERNING THE PROVISION OF STOCKPILES OF NUCLEAR WARHEADS FOR CANADIAN FORCES

1. On December 6, 1960, the Cabinet agreed "that discussions (or negotiations) with the U.S. Government concerning arrangements for the essential acquisition of nuclear weapons or warheads for use by the Canadian Forces, in the manners already decided, may proceed as soon as they can be usefully undertaken but the acceptance of joint controls to be a basic principle.”

2. On December 30, the Minister of National Defence wrote to the Secretary of State for External Affairs recommending that, in keeping with the above Cabinet decision, action be taken in the latter part of January 1961 to initiate negotiations along the lines of the attached draft agreement (Appendix “A”)† which incorporates the features, including joint control, agreed upon in December 1959 by the Panel on the Economic Aspects of Defence Questions.

3. On March 30, 1961, the Secretary of State for External Affairs replied to the Minister of National Defence proposing that any overall agreement with the U.S. should include the detailed procedures governing storage, release from storage and authorization of use of the various weapons systems. This was desired to ensure that the full implications and obligations of the general agreement would be known in advance of it being signed. To give effect to this proposal a new draft agreement was prepared containing schedules (detailed procedures) for each type of nuclear warhead or weapon system contemplated.

4. The steps required to provide the Canadian Armed Forces with the capability of employing nuclear weapons, as indicated by the U.S. Joint Chiefs of Staff (copy of memorandum of 1 May 59 from the Chairman, Joint Chiefs of Staff is attached as Appendix “B”),† were as follows:

(a) Step one was described as a government-to-government exchange of notes covering general principles relative to provision of US atomic weapons to Canada. This exchange would cover such things as the broad requirements for US custody and control, Canadian responsibilities for provision of storage facilities, security and broad system safety requirements. Insofar as the exchange of notes may apply to forces committed to NATO, it should be consistent with the NATO Atomic Stockpile Concept. In addition, these general principles should be sufficiently broad to apply to any atomic weapons system contemplated for use by Canadian forces.

(b) Step two was the conclusion of detailed technical agreements pertaining to custody and control accomplished on a bilateral basis with the US Commanders concerned, i.e., CINCLANT, USCINCEUR, and CINCONAD. In the US view, these detailed technical arrangements would normally be developed between the Canadian Field Commander concerned and the US Commander concerned, e.g. AOC 1 Air Div and USCINCEUR.

5. If agreement with a third country is required, it is understood that this would be provided by an annex to the intergovernmental agreement covering general principles i.e., step one above.

6. It was anticipated that step one, the main agreement, would set forth the principles which would guide preparation of the Supplementary Technical Arrangements for particular weapons and weapons systems. To incorporate in the main agreement details regarding specific weapons systems would be undesirable on at least two counts:

(a) The whole agreement would need to be amended each time there was any change in weapons to be employed or in the manner of their deployment and employment, and

(b) Detailed discussions would be required at the outset with third parties who, individually, would have a legitimate interest in only one aspect of the whole agreement. Furthermore, these detailed discussions would be taking place before there was any agreement in principle between the two main parties to the agreement.

7. Attached as Appendix “C”† is an example of the possible content of the supplementary technical arrangements which will need to be negotiated with specified US Theatre Commanders. Though the US has indicated that the US Theatre Commanders concerned will be responsible for making such detailed arrangements, the Canadian Government can, of course, make such agreements at any Canadian level of authority desired. This might for instance, result in agreements between the Canadian Government on the one hand and specified US Commanders (e.g. US CINCEUR) on the other.

8. It is appreciated that the Government will wish to understand thoroughly all of the implications in any undertaking on the part of Canada to acquire nuclear weapons, particularly those relating to control. Attached as Appendix "D"† is a description of the procedures which it is understood would be involved in releasing nuclear weapons from custody and exercising control over them. It will be noted that these procedures are fundamentally the same for each weapon and weapon system but there will of course be some differences in detail in respect to the precise points at which control will be exercised.

9. In summary, the present position is as follows:

(a) Negotiations with US officials regarding the acquisition and storage of defensive nuclear weapons and warheads for the use of Canadian Forces were first approved by Cabinet in October, 1958, and began in November, 1958. Conduct of these negotiations was again approved by Cabinet in December, 1960.

(b) In December, 1959, the Panel on Economic Aspects of Defence Questions forwarded a draft agreement for Ministers' consideration. In later consultation with officials of the Department of External Affairs, this draft was slightly revised and put in the form forwarded by the Minister of National Defence to the Secretary of State for External Affairs on December 30, 1960. This draft agreement prescribes the general principles and conditions which would govern the provision of stockpiles of nuclear weapons for the Canadian Forces but does not cover all of the detailed arrangements. It could be made clear to the US authorities, however, that Canadian acceptance of the terms of such a general agreement would be contingent upon the completion of negotiation of satisfactory supplementary arrangements or agreements.

(b) Since the contents of any supplementary agreements covering particular weapons would be dependent on the terms of the general agreement, drafts of the supplementary agreements should not be prepared until some understanding is reached with the US on the acceptable content of the main agreement. As indicated above, formal conclusion of the main agreement can be deferred, if desired, until the supplementary arrangements have been worked out.

(d) Timing is already critical if nuclear warheads are to be available, if required, in the same time period in which their carriers will be deployed with the Canadian Forces. Further discussion with the U.S., as approved by Cabinet on December 6, 1960, is, therefore urgently needed.

Conclusions

10. Negotiations should now be initiated with the US authorities on the following basis:

(a) The first step should be to reach an understanding with the US authorities on the text of a general agreement along the lines indicated in the draft attached as Appendix "A" to this Aide Mémoire. This understanding would be preliminary only and conditional upon satisfactory completion of the later phases of the negotiations.

(b) When an understanding has been reached on the text of a general agreement, preliminary negotiations would begin on the texts of supplementary technical agreements to cover the various weapons systems, (i.e., Bomarc, Honest John, air-to-ground weapons for No. 1 Air Division RCAF, and maritime nuclear weapons for RCN and RCAF) required by the Canadian Forces. These negotiations would be conducted by appropriate Canadian representatives with the US Theatre Commanders concerned, i.e., CINCONAD, US CINCEUR and CINCLANT.

(c) The final phase of negotiations would consist of ministerial consideration of the overall arrangements (i.e., the draft general agreement and the supplementaries) as an entity.

ACQUISITION OF NUCLEAR WEAPONS FOR CANADIAN FORCES

We have studied the documents which Mr. Harkness has sent to you under cover of his letter of May 2. The following notes on the main points of difference between the Department of National Defence's position and that of External Affairs are supplementary to the comments in my memorandum to you of April 25.

2. Form of the Agreement

External Affairs

There should be an all-embracing agreement consisting of a general statement of terms or conditions to which would be annexed a series of schedules setting out the detailed procedures governing storage, release from storage and authorization of use of the various weapon systems to be acquired from the United States. This would ensure that all elements of the agreement are considered in relation to each other and concluded at the same time, on an inter-governmental basis.

Department of National Defence

We should first negotiate with the United States Government on a preliminary basis the text of a General agreement and carry these negotiations to the point at which sufficient agreement is reached to make it possible to proceed with some assurance with the negotiation of supplementary technical agreements with the appropriate U.S. military commanders.

Comment

3. The aide mémoire accompanying Mr. Harkness' letter advances two reasons against the procedure suggested by External Affairs (see paragraph 8):

- (a) The whole agreement would need to be amended each time there was any change in weapons to be employed or in the manner of their deployment and employment; and
- (b) Detailed discussions would be required at the outset with third parties who, individually, would have a legitimate interest in only one aspect of the whole agreement. Furthermore, these detailed discussions would be taking place before there was any agreement in principle between the two main parties to the agreement.

4. We do not think there is any substance to either of these objections. Changes of the type referred to in (a) above would not necessitate amendment of the whole agreement but only of the particular schedule involved. In any case deployment and employment of nuclear weapons are matters of policy and changes should require inter-governmental consideration rather than being dealt with merely as administrative measures. There is no reason why either of the criticisms advanced in (b) above need apply, but even if they did we don't see that they are of sufficient importance to weigh very heavily.

Basis of Negotiation

5. We suggest that in order that there should also be an understanding between the two Departments before any negotiations are undertaken there should be agreement on the following points which should govern our approach to the Americans:

(a) The U.S. authorities should be informed at the commencement of the negotiations that the decision of the Canadian Government to enter into discussions should not be interpreted to mean that it has decided to acquire nuclear warheads but rather that it wishes to put itself in a position to be able to do so rapidly if at any time in the future such action should be deemed necessary.

(b) Only after the master agreement and its schedules (or supplementary agreements) have been negotiated will the Government consider the question of acquiring nuclear warheads, taking into consideration not only progress on the control problem but also on disarmament.

(c) The U.S. authorities should also be informed that the Canadian Government considers that the subject matter which it is understood is customarily covered by supplementary service-to-service agreements negotiated between the U.S. commander concerned and the military representative of the receiving country is of such importance that the Canadian Government wishes it to be dealt with and concluded at an intergovernmental level.

Comment

6. The Department of National Defence has not agreed specifically with the points set out in (a), (b) and (c) above but does agree (in paragraph 8b of its aide mémoire) that it could be made clear to the U.S. authorities that Canadian acceptance of the terms of a general agreement would be contingent upon the completion of negotiation of satisfactory supplementary arrangements or agreements.

7. We are inclined to think that if the Canadian position is based on paragraph 4 above, the question of whether the detailed arrangements are incorporated as schedules to the general agreement or take the form of separate supplementary intergovernmental agreements would be a matter of form rather than of substance.

Master or General Agreement

8. Attached to Mr. Harkness' letter as Appendix "A" is a draft of the general agreement. This is the same draft as that which he forwarded to you under cover of his letter of December 30.²² This draft, you will recall, was revised in this Department and a new version was forwarded to Mr. Harkness under cover of your letter to him of March 30. A copy of this version was attached to our memorandum to you of March 23 (the original of which is enclosed) and will be found at tab "A". The most important changes, apart from the difference of approach reflected in the covering note, will be found in paragraphs 2, 4, 5, 6 and 7 of the proposed annex of the draft dated March 23. Mr. Harkness has not commented on these suggested changes, nor did Air Marshal Miller in our discussions with him.

Draft Memorandum to Cabinet

9. Also included in the documentation which Mr. Harkness has forwarded is a draft memorandum to the Cabinet seeking authority to proceed with the negotiations with the United States on the basis of the procedure favoured by the Department of National Defence. You will note that this memorandum would be submitted by you as well as Mr. Harkness. Apart from the fact that this procedure proposed in the memorandum would not appear to reflect your views, it seems to us that it is open to one objection in particular: it is concerned with procedure only and does not attempt, as it should, to deal with any of the substantive aspects of the question, especially the basis upon which the negotiations should take place as set out in paragraph 4 above, and the question of controls, to which the Government attaches importance. No doubt the Department of National Defence intends that this last point would be taken care of by the paper attached as Appendix "D" and entitled "Procedures Involved in the Exercise of Control, Responsibilities for Nuclear Weapons Allocated to Canadian Forces." However, we doubt that it meets the requirement you specified, namely that Ministers should know in advance the implications and obligations involved for Canada. The following are examples:

(a) The paper states that the Canadian commanders concerned, in communication with the Canadian Government on an established channel, will require its approval to employ nuclear weapons. However, no attempt is made to spell out how this would work in practice. We think that Ministers would wish to have pretty specific information on this point, particularly with respect to the Air Division in Europe because of the strike-reconnaissance role of the CF104. The Department of National Defence will no doubt argue that it would be premature to outline detailed procedures at this time because not enough information is currently available, but even so we think it should be possible to give a more complete explanation of how the system might be expected to work in practice.

(b) On page 2 of the paper there is a reference to the need for instantaneous communications channels between the President or Commander-in-Chief concerned, the Canadian Government and the Canadian military authority most directly concerned with the employment of the weapon system. This is a most important point, with serious implications for those members of the Government who would have to be immediately available at any time of the day or night. Moreover the cost of such a system will be high. Perhaps now is the time to indicate more fully to Cabinet what is involved in the establishment of such a system.

Sample Supplementary Technical Arrangement

10. Attached as Appendix "C" to the aide mémoire from the Department of National Defence is a sample of the type of supplementary technical agreement negotiated between U.S. theatre commanders and the military representatives of other NATO governments. In paragraph 7 of the aide mémoire the Department of National Defence indicates that this sample agreement is an example of the supplementary arrangements which will need to be negotiated with specified U.S. theatre commanders. It goes on to suggest that although the U.S. has indicated that the U.S. theatre commanders concerned will be responsible for making such detailed arrangements, the Canadian Government can make such arrangements at any level of authority desired, so that the end result might be agreements between the Canadian Government on the one hand and specified U.S. commanders on the other. Our position, of course, as set out in paragraph 4 above, is that we should make it clear at the outset that all negotiations must be on a government-to-government basis.

Heads of Government Discussion

Finally, you may wish to discuss with Mr. Harkness the question of what the Prime Minister might wish to say to President Kennedy when the latter visits Ottawa. The line which has been followed with your approval at the last two meetings of the PJB is that consultations are in progress between the Canadian departments concerned with a view to initiating discussions with the United States authorities as soon as they can usefully be undertaken.

My dear Colleague:

As a result of our discussion yesterday my understanding is that the following procedure is agreed:

(a) You will have prepared a memorandum to Cabinet summarizing the present status of the proposed agreement with the United States governing the Provision of Stockpiles of Nuclear Warheads for Canadian Forces. This memorandum to Cabinet will indicate the basis on which negotiations with the United States should be resumed.

(b) The draft of the proposed agreement with the United States forwarded with your letter of March 30th, but less the attached schedules, will be proposed as the basis of the Canadian position in further negotiations and will be appended to the memorandum to Cabinet.

(c) Also accompanying the memorandum to Cabinet will be examples of the kinds of supplementary agreements which will be required in respect of particular weapon systems in the theatres concerned illustrating the present Canadian understanding as to the kinds, etc. These, however, will be examples only for the purpose of informing Cabinet of the sort of content we believe will need to be included in supplementary detailed agreements. It will be understood that our own knowledge in this respect is limited and that the actual content can only be developed in further negotiations.

(d) Officials of our two departments will cooperate in the preparation of the illustrative examples referred to above.

It is also my understanding that it is intended that the memorandum to Cabinet will be accompanied by a draft of the proposed agreement relating to the storage of defensive nuclear weapons at Goose Bay and Harmon Air Force Base for use of U.S. Air Defence Squadrons.

Yours sincerely,

D.S. HARKNESS

ACQUISITION OF NUCLEAR WEAPONS
FOR CANADIAN FORCES

On May 3 I met with the Minister of National Defence and officials of the two Departments regarding the question of an agreement with the United States on the acquisition of nuclear weapons.

It has been the understanding of the Department of External Affairs that we should negotiate with the United States Government on a package deal basis, involving an agreement with schedules or annexes dealing with different features, such as the warheads for the Bomarc, weapons for the Air Division and the warheads for Honest John, the latter two being for our NATO forces in Europe. A document was prepared by the Department of External Affairs with this in mind.

The Department of National Defence, on the other hand, thought there should be an understanding with the United States on a general agreement, leaving the agreements on particular weapons to be negotiated subsequently between the Canadian authorities and the appropriate United States Commander in accordance with the letter of May 1, 1959, from General Twining to the Chairman of the Canadian Chiefs of Staff, which is attached,† and also based on the standard United States NATO agreement, likewise attached.†

Eventually the two Departments agreed to draw up a basic agreement with annexes, realizing, however, that there might have to be considerable variation in the course of the negotiations with the Americans because Canada does not have all the detailed information necessary.

The officials of the two Departments are now busy working out the first draft and I hope to have a look at it on my return on May 16.²³

My dear Colleague:

Just before leaving for Oslo, I received your letter of today's date regarding our meeting of May 3 when we discussed the procedures for further consideration by our two Departments of drafts of proposed agreements dealing with the provision of stockpiles of nuclear warheads for Canadian forces.

My recollection of what was agreed does not entirely accord with yours. As the next step I thought we agreed that we should bring the Prime Minister up-to-date on the preparatory work which has been done on this matter by our two Departments. With that in view, we would submit to him the agreed draft of the general agreement with schedules attached to it and not, as you suggest, "less the attached schedules."

It was also my understanding that the officials of the two Departments would cooperate in the preparation of the draft schedules based on the original drafts prepared in this Department together with the information obtained from the standard United States draft for NATO arrangements in Europe. These drafts would contain the points which, from the Canadian point of view, should be included, and these would constitute an integral part of the Canadian negotiating position to be submitted to Cabinet in due course. It would be made plain that these schedules might have to undergo considerable change in the course of negotiations because of our present lack of full technical information.

Finally, it was my understanding that we would not, at this stage, attempt to include in this first draft of a package proposal, any draft agreement relating to the storage of defensive nuclear weapons at Goose Bay and Harmon.
