As a full member of the Common Market, Britain would become involved in political consultations with the continental members. As a newcomer to the E.E.C., faced with a difficult period of adjustment to hard requirements and novel ideas, Britain may well have to adopt views on world affairs from its European allies and these may not prove attractive to some Commonwealth countries. The French Government, for example, is expressly contemptuous of the United Nations and the Germans do not belong to the U.N. Although the U.K. has reservations about the use to which the U.N. General Assembly is put and on the conduct of the Congo operation, any adjustment of attitude towards the U.N. within the E.E.C. would probably be in the direction of reducing British support for the United Nations. Such a development would be unpalatable to African and Asian members of the Commonwealth who relish the opportunities the U.N. seems to offer them for expression and influence. Moreover, suspicion by Afro-Asians of the "colonialist" attitudes of continental Europeans runs high and intimate association with the continent might blur the good reputation of Britain in this respect. Some African leaders, notably Dr. Nkrumah, have argued that the association of French-speaking African countries with the Common Market was a disguised form of European "neo-colonialism" and Britain, never entirely free of suspicion on this score, could suffer from the E.E.C. link in the eye of Commonwealth countries in Africa. However, there is a balancing factor which might have attraction for some Commonwealth countries; this is that there would have to be a reciprocal adjustment of views by European countries towards traditional British attitudes. This adjustment would presumably make the E.E.C. more outward-looking, more internationally conscious and less narrowly continental.

To some extent the disadvantages resulting from British membership in [the] E.E.C. would be offset by the advantage of having one member of the Commonwealth a member of a group which in all probability will have an increasingly important influence in world affairs. Not only could Commonwealth countries gain information of the intentions of the Community but there might be increased opportunity to bring the influence of Commonwealth countries to bear on Europe.

The above line of conjecture may lead to gloomy, if hesitant, conclusions about the long-term future of the Commonwealth as an institution if Britain joins the Common Market. But it does not take account of the fact that the Commonwealth relationship has always been subject to modification and, whether or not Britain becomes closely knitted into Europe, there may be some lessening of the closeness of the Commonwealth association. The prospective admission of a considerable number of new members also seems likely to lessen the intimacy and candour previously a feature of Meetings of Prime Ministers. Bearing in mind the present range of relationships within the Commonwealth, it seems possible that, though U.K. relations with some Commonwealth countries may become less close, and, as a result, the institution of the Commonwealth may suffer and be reduced in value, relations between other members will continue on much the same basis. Canada's relations with Australia, New Zealand and Britain would probably continue to be marked by friendly consultation and co-operation, even if the Commonwealth as an institution suffered impairment. Similarly, our relatively remoter and less intimate relations with, say, India or Ghana might not be markedly different if formal Commonwealth ties were loosened.

In any case the effects on the Commonwealth of British membership in the E.E.C. would probably be gradual and cover a considerable period of time. A major adjustment of this order in the pattern of economic and psychological relations between nations would be a real challenge to the Commonwealth resiliency and power of adaptation.

CONFIDENTIAL

Ottawa, January 8, 1962

Dear Donald [Fleming],

I need not tell you how pleasant I found the talks last week or how much we appreciated the warm and understanding approach of you and your colleagues. During the course of these talks, the Lord Privy Seal discussed arrangements for consultation between our two Governments on the day-to-day questions that will arise during the negotiations in Brussels with the European Economic Community. The tempo of these negotiations is likely to increase from now on, and with it the need for a speedy exchange of views between Britain and other Commonwealth countries on a wide range of topics. I thought it might be useful, therefore, if I summarised the main points which Edward Heath made about Commonwealth consultation in this context.

He said that he thought the arrangements so far employed for keeping Commonwealth Governments informed of the progress of negotiations in Brussels and for seeking their views on matters affecting their interests have on the whole worked fairly satisfactorily. But as the negotiations proceeded Britain would be more and more in the position of discussing with the Community specific solutions to problems involving major Commonwealth interests and we should often have to make up our minds at short notice how to handle the matters coming up at individual meetings and what proposals to put forward. The British Delegation would keep Commonwealth representatives in Brussels informed of each day's proceedings in the negotiations. They would also in their discussions with Commonwealth representatives give the best assessment they could of the proceedings of future meetings, although in the nature of things the Delegation would often be unable to determine their line of action until just before the meeting begins. In particular the Delegation would do their best to give the Commonwealth representatives concerned advance information about proposals that Britain would be putting to the Community which affected the interests of their countries. It would of course be most helpful if Commonwealth countries' representatives for their part were able to give advice on the ways in which their countries' interests might be affected.

The British Delegation would naturally do their best to ensure that each Commonwealth Government concerned had sufficient time to comment on important matters where it felt that the Delegation did not sufficiently know their views from previous consultations or where the British proposals were such that it would be desirable for interested Commonwealth Governments to have an opportunity for further comment. Edward Heath added that he hoped that Commonwealth Governments would be able to help our Delegation by doing their utmost to give speedy replies.

He went on to say that at the actual meetings with the Community new proposals or possible compromises might often emerge on which the Delegation would have to give at least a preliminary view. But he emphasised that while in the course of the discussions with the Community we might have to seize opportunities as they arose to advance the negotiations and narrow the differences between us and them by reaching tentative understandings on particular problems, such understandings could only be provisional until the final phase of the negotiations and subject to review in the light of conclusions reached on other matters.

May I add that we were very glad indeed to learn that, for your part, you and your Ministerial colleagues were able during the course of the discussions just concluded to agree with the Lord Privy Seal's approach to this important question of Commonwealth consultation and in particular that you propose to arrange senior representation to keep in day-to-day touch with our Delegation at Brussels for this purpose.

Yours sincerely,

AMORY

LETTER NO. 354

London, February 27, 1962

SECRET

REPORT OF MEETING OF HIGH COMMISSIONERS ON MONDAY, FEBRUARY 26, 1962, AT 10 A.M.

The High Commissioners met the Rt. Hon. Edward Heath this morning to receive a report of the discussions in Brussels last week. While the report followed very closely in detail the information given to Commonwealth Ambassadors in Brussels on February 23rd, I am giving a fairly complete report as Heath's statement today varied to some extent in emphasis if not in content.

2. Heath said that the purpose of having general discussions at this time was so that they would not get down to formal Ministerial negotiations until there had been a thorough examination of the points raised and some agreement in regard to the procedure to be followed by the deputies and their officials.

3. Having regard to the fact that we merely get information after the event, I thought there was some interest attached to his statement that one of the great difficulties is that the Six have their own meetings and have reached an agreed position before they hear what the British have to say. This, he said, undoubtedly created difficulties and resulted in discussions of a general nature going on for three to three and a half hours. As he put it: "They are shy about disclosing their intentions."

4. Heath said that in addition to the general discussion on agriculture there were three particular points raised:

(a) The Aide Mémoire prepared by the Australian Government requesting direct participation in the negotiations;

(b) Britain's announced decision to apply for membership in the European Coal and Steel Community and Euratom;

(c) The position of the EFTA Governments in the negotiations.

5. Heath explained that on Friday morning last he had raised the point about Commonwealth trade and its importance in reaching an ultimate decision. He said that in his own introductory remarks he had explained why they wanted a general discussion in which each of the Six would express their own views. He pointed out that in Paris the British had agreed that there should be a common agricultural policy. He explained that one of the difficulties in proceeding further with some of the discussion in detail is that a committee has been set up to translate the financial agreements, and their work will not be completed before the middle of March. In fact, he said, it is doubtful if it would be completed then. He did say that they had also agreed that there should be common prices for agricultural products.

6. He said they accepted the proposition that as much as possible of the structure for dealing with agricultural products as the Six wanted should be kept. He reminded them, however, that this would be affected by four particular considerations:

(i) With this larger economic community supply and demand in some cases would be completely changed; e.g. pigmeat and eggs in the case of Britain and Denmark;

(ii) The need to deal with the interests of the whole community in dealing with agricultural production;

(iii) The necessity for permitting the United Kingdom agricultural system to be harmonized smoothly and swiftly with the EEC requirements;

(iv) An annual review of the over-all situation and appropriate long-term assurances based on these reviews.

7. He had suggested that a practical way of dealing with these questions would be to accept the following principles:

(i) Before making decisions they should agree what changes will be necessary when the Community is enlarged;

(ii) The method of change-over should be as simple and straightforward as possible.

8. He said that the points which should be referred to the deputies were:

(a) The United Kingdom position and the need for adapting decisions to their requirements;

(b) The question of financial contributions to the budget required in this case for the equalization of agricultural prices;

(c) The Commonwealth should be given an opportunity for outlets comparable with those they now enjoy.

9. These considerations would be related to four governing conditions:

(i) An adequate transitional period;

(ii) At the end of the transitional period a review to see what changes should be made;

(iii) Long-term arrangements;

(iv) British agriculture should be assured protection in regard to particular products and the method of trading should be fair and equitable. With particular reference to British agriculture there should be (a) an adequate transitional period, (b) an annual review, and (c) a long-term assurance to British farmers. He said that these three points were then more extensively explained by the Minister of Agriculture.

10. Heath said that in view of the fact that a number of the problems they must face are not peculiar to Europe, particularly that of surpluses, people are arguing that there should be world-wide arrangements. This, he said, would be very desirable but is going to be very difficult to achieve, and that it is therefore essential that "we consider practical measures and not merely pleasant ideas." Couve de Murville replied that what the Community must assure is:

- (1) Free movement of commodities within the Community;
- (2) Protection from imports;
- (3) Agricultural levies and payments should be handled as a Community responsibility.

11. He thought that the agricultural problems of the Commonwealth should be studied product by product and the Committee of Deputies should have full information about those products requiring consideration.

12. Couve de Murville said that there should be a transitional period for the Commonwealth and then worldwide arrangements. Heath said that he talked rather vaguely about this.

13. Of United Kingdom agriculture, he said that they could not see any reason why the United Kingdom should have a longer transitional period than other members of the Community. It would raise problems if one member had different arrangements.

14. He also said that it would be necessary to have precise terms for the annual review.

15. Heath told us that in reply he had said that so far as the principles were concerned, there were no great difficulties. However, so far as a transitional period was concerned, there were strong arguments in support of the British claim for a longer period. British farmers were in a better position than the other members of the Community. As he put it: "Were we to tell all our farmers that their position was going to be weakened?" He also told them that the Commonwealth would want to have some more specific statement than a vague assurance of worldwide agreements following a transitional period.

16. Couve de Murville replied that he had not been visualizing any position after a transitional period, other than world-wide solutions.

17. The Minister of Agriculture, Mr. Soames, then dealt with some specific points and explained that if Denmark came in, some of the particular problems to be raised would result from the fact, for instance, that they are the largest producers of pigmeat, while the United Kingdom is the largest consumer. This is the type of situation which would require a particular, and not a general, solution.

18. Dr. Metholt then said that he did not think British horticulture required a longer transitional period, but that it should be reorganized.

19. Couve de Murville then said that "since you can't move commodity prices more than 2½% a year, this might raise problems for us in the way of subsidies."

20. Heath told them that there are five main subjects to consider in connection with agriculture:

- (1) General application to agriculture of problems raised by United Kingdom application to join the Community;
- (2) General assurance to be given to agriculture, including annual review;
- (3) Transitional period for United Kingdom agriculture. Heath did say that there are some products which do not require a longer transitional period;
- (4) The Commonwealth situation. This covers the general arrangements required for the whole Commonwealth;

(5) Financial arrangements for the Community. Heath said that those had not yet been received.

21. Heath told the meeting that it would not be possible to deal with Commonwealth problems until they got down to specific commodities. He did say, however, in reference to Couve de Murville's second intervention, that it was not sufficient to speak of a transitional period and then merely talk in general terms of world arrangements. He said that it was essential for the Commonwealth to know where it stood.

22. He said that was the conclusion of their general discussion on agriculture. He said there had then been a restricted session and he asked that we emphasize to our Governments that this was in fact restricted. (I think most of this has already been discussed in the press with reasonable accuracy.)

23. In referring to the Australian request, he said that this was a practical matter and not one of general application. He pointed out to them that there was a wealth of experience and knowledge that would be useful to the Ministers.

24. He reported that the majority of the Ministers saw considerable difficulty in this suggestion because it would mean that other members of the Commonwealth would also wish to be represented on a similar basis, and this would greatly increase the number of negotiating parties. It was then suggested that other nations as well might wish to take part in these discussions in the same way. Couve de Murville said that he thought it was best to refer this subject to the Deputies for consideration. The Deputies were then instructed to consider the Australian proposal not unsympathetically but with full regard to the practical problems raised.

25. Heath then said that as he had already stated in Paris that it was the British intention to make an application to join the Coal and Steel Community, they thought it best to proceed with their application now in view of the time it would take to have this dealt with. He also informed the Ministers that it was their intention to proceed with an application for membership in Euratom.

26. (As these were previously tied to the idea of membership in the Common Market, it does seem that in some measure the United Kingdom is burning its bridges by this movement.)

27. He also referred very briefly and in a most casual manner to the fact that they had raised the question of the EFTA countries. He informed us that Couve de Murville replied that they had not yet had time to consider the EFTA position. That concluded the restricted meeting.

28. We were then given a transcript of the opening statements by Heath and Soames. I am attaching them to this letter.

29. There were then some questions. Sir Eric Harrison said that as the timetable now presented itself, there apparently would not be the customary break for the summer. Heath indicated this to be so, and he said it would be difficult to say how far the Deputies will advance in their discussions and when they would be able to deal with particular commodities. He left me with the impression that he was in no doubt that these discussions would be going on for some considerable time. He did follow his earlier comment by saying "the arguments are now going to be very fierce and tough."

30. He then went on to say that perhaps five out of the six members of the Community are coming to the conclusion that "we will have to negotiate." He said he thought it was better that this suggestion should come from inside the Six than from the United Kingdom because he believes that if it comes from them the United Kingdom bargaining position will be better.

31. Macdonald of New Zealand then asked what long-term assurances he had in mind when he spoke of the protection of their own farmers. Heath said that as far as British farmers are concerned, they have assurances to the end of the present Parliament. He said that the farmers might be satisfied to rely on the present arrangements, but that from the long-term point of view the Community will insist that if something applies to British farmers, it must apply to the farmers of the Community as well.

32. He said that the situation in the United Kingdom and France is very different. He said that 4% of the United Kingdom population are farmers, while a much larger proportion in France are engaged in agriculture.

33. In answer to a question by Harrison he said that working parties to deal with each particular problem would probably be recommended.

34. Macdonald then asked how the levies would be handled. Heath explained that the levies would be paid into a Community Budget and handled as a Community responsibility.

35. Heath then went on to say that the demand for these levies in respect of agricultural imports would fall mainly on the British government. However, he did say that "whatever is fair for the Community is fair for us."

36. He pointed out that the Community themselves have fixed seven and a half years for a transitional period for the attainment of a common agricultural policy. That would in practice give members eight years for the internal rearrangement of agricultural production.

37. Heath went on to say that there are some interesting effects of a common agricultural policy not previously realized. The French, for instance, will have to disorganize some of their local organizations. Italy will have to change their horticulture policy.

38. When asked how the Commonwealth is going to change over during the transitional period and afterwards, he said that this has not yet been discussed.

39. Reference was made to the deadlock in the cereal conference at Geneva, and Heath was asked whether this had any effect on the discussions. He replied that one point did emerge in private conversation outside of the general meetings at Brussels. He said that it is recognized that there is a general fear that the Community is seeking to establish long-term arrangements which could be greatly affected by world arrangements and by a world-wide surplus of particular commodities.

TELEGRAM 847

London, March 9, 1962

SECRET. CANADIAN EYES ONLY. EMERGENCY.

Reference: Your Tel E-553 Mar 7† and my Tel 825 Mar 9.†

Repeat for Information: Brussels (OpImmediate).

The papers referred to in Sandys' message were delivered by hand at Canada House at 5.55 pm today, Friday. I need not repeat on the fact that they ask for Canadian comments to be delivered to them on so important a subject in so short a time. Texts of Sandys' letter and of accompanying papers follows:

2. Text of Sandys' letter is: "In my message of March 7 to Mr. Green, I said that we hoped to have ready by the end of this week some of the drafts of our papers containing broad proposals for safeguarding Commonwealth agriculture interests during the transitional period, as well as those of our own farmers.

Copies are attached of the papers concerned; you will see that they cover cereals, liquid milk and butter, pigmeat, horticulture, eggs and egg products, and poultry meat.

Since our delegate may find it necessary to put these papers to representatives of the Six in the middle of next week, we should be grateful to have the comments of your Government not repeat not later than Tuesday, March 13.

I am writing similarly to Harrison (Australia) and Macdonald (New Zealand)."

3. Text of accompanying papers follows.

UK's Observations on Cereals

1. The Community's objective is a liberally managed market, i.e. the maximum freedom of trade consistent with the maintenance of stable internal prices around reasonable target price levels. We are in full sympathy with this objective. Moreover we can go along with a system of target and intervention price for cereals with a variable levy on imports.

2. But we attach the utmost importance to the Community's view that a viable system will only be achieved if three conditions are satisfied, namely,

(i) the internal prices established, notably for wheat, must not repeat not be such as to over-stimulate production and give rise to surpluses;

(ii) the target prices for the different cereals, and so indirectly for cereal products, must be based on the relative commercial value of each, otherwise the production and usage of the different grains will be uneconomically distorted;

(iii) the necessary changes in price levels and marketing arrangements must be introduced gradually and operated with the maximum flexibility. An annual turnover of over 80 million tons of grain in the enlarged Community cannot repeat not be tightly regulated without strangling trade.

The third condition is of even greater importance to us than it is to the Six because of the more radical price and organisational changes which the Community's plan would involve for us.

3. The transitional period must be such as to permit a gradual phasing out of deficiency payments and phasing in of levy arrangements. We must be able to continue guaranteed prices to producers throughout the transitional period, so as to supplement as necessary our growers' returns from the market in the period when our market price level is stepping up by stages to that of the Community. This also applies for those growers of barley and oats who do not repeat not at present sell their grain and receive deficiency payments on an acreage basis.

4. The arrangements for cereals must ensure for Commonwealth countries the opportunity of outlets comparable to those they now enjoy. Details of these outlets are shown in the appendix. Commonwealth countries must continue to have the opportunity of selling traditional quantities to UK or Community, on conditions (as regards the levy system) which would assure comparably competitive conditions of access for such quantities. We accept that the means of giving effect to the principle of comparable outlets, as regards both quantity and price, must be consistent with the levy system. There are various possibilities such as assured right of access for traditional quantities, levy-preference quotas, long-term contracts, etc. We need further info about the levy system and its operation in order that we may determine with you which of these devices or combination of these devices, would be most appropriate, or indeed practicable, for the different cases.

5. The major problem is that of wheat. The trade in Canadian wheat is very large and is essential to Canada, and to the production of British type of bread, since hard wheat of Canadian type and quality is not repeat not grown in Europe. For hard wheat (blé de qualité)

we would wish to assure to Canada access to UK or Community market on fair competitive conditions, including levy arrangements which do not repeat not discriminate against hard wheat, to the extent necessary to provide her with outlets comparable to those she now enjoys.

6. For soft wheat the main Commonwealth concern is our trade with Australia. The intra-Community preference and the other arrangements in the transitional period should not repeat not be operated in such a way as to prejudice Australia's opportunity to sell traditional quantities on fair competitive terms, as outlined in paragraph 4. Since the Common Market state there would be no intra-Community preference both Australian and Community wheat would sell at the internal price. But even here, if a surplus of soft wheat arose in the Community, Australia might not repeat not be able to compete on fair terms if the Community price fell to the intervention level for a lengthy period, since the levy on Australian wheat would still be calculated on the relationship of the threshold price to the target price. This is a matter which we shall need to consider further.

7. Similar arrangements will be needed to safeguard Australians' and Canadians' interest in barley, oats, and cereal products. Whilst the problem is not repeat not so large as for wheat, there is the added complication that Commonwealth trade in these items enjoys a preference. It will be necessary to take account of this in considering how the principle of comparable outlets can best be applied.

8. For maize, the only Commonwealth interest substantial in quantity is in the supply of white maize from Rhodesia. We would hope this would be covered by some form of association between Rhodesia and the Community; failing this, by arrangements on the lines of whatever is agreed for barley. By far the biggest supplier of maize to Britain, as to the Community, is USA: this is referred to below.

9. There are a number of points on the operation of the levy system which are of importance under 2(iii) above and which we would wish to discuss at technical level. These relate mainly to the mechanism of the levies, the scale of seasonal prices, the arrangements for forward imports contracting and the techniques of support buying. Here again, we need further clarification of the operation of the levy system.

10. The foregoing sets out what seem prima facie to be the major problems that arise for UK on the Community's decisions. We believe, however, that a régime based on these decisions can be established and maintained in effective operation and that, consistently with it, solutions can be found to our problems.

11. There will be problems in respect of cereals supplies from third countries other than Commonwealth. In the longer term, we would hope to find an answer to these problems in a multilateral solution which did not repeat not impose an unacceptable burden on the balance of with [sic] as such after the immediate problems of countries with special and existing relationships have been dealt with.

APPENDIX

Existing Access Enjoyed by Commonwealth Countries in UK Markets

1. The undertaking and obligations referred to in paragraph 4 are as follows:

- (i) No repeat no restriction on quantities of cereals that Commonwealth countries may send to UK;
- (ii) Not repeat not to increase tariffs on Canadian goods where the full rate of tariff is bound to any country in GATT;
- (iii) To give all Canadian goods treatment not repeat not less favourable than that given to any other country for similar goods;

(iv) To admit to UK free of tariff all Australian goods which were duty free in February 1957 (all agriculture and food items were duty free on that date);

(v) Not repeat not to reduce the following Commonwealth margins of preference insofar as they apply to Australia:

Barley	-	10 percent ad valorem
Oats	-	3s.od. per cwt
Millet and sorghums	-	10 percent ad valorem
Wheat flour	-	10 percent ad valorem

Tariffs

2. The tariff position is as follows:

	COMMONWEALTH SUPPLIES	THIRD COUNTRIES
Wheat	Duty free	Duty free (bound to USA)
Flour	Duty free (bound to Cda)	10 percent ad valorem
Barley	Duty free	10 percent ad valorem (bound to USA and Chile)
Oats	Duty free	Specific duty of 3/- per cwt
Yellow maize	Duty free	Duty free (bound to USA)
Flat white maize	Duty free	10 percent ad valorem
Sorghums	Duty free	10 percent ad valorem (bound to USA)
Most miscellaneous cereal feeding stuffs	Duty free	10 percent ad valorem

Commonwealth Trade in Cereals

3. The main features of Commonwealth trade with UK in cereals are:

(a) Wheat. Canada and Australia are the largest suppliers of wheat to UK market accounting for over two-thirds of total UK imports. In 1960 Canada supplied about 2½ million metric tons, about half our total imports – nearly all of it hard spring wheat which is essential to provide the type of flour and bread acceptable to UK consumers. Australia supplies good quality soft wheat and Anglo-Australian trade agreement contemplates purchases by UK of about 756,000 metric tons per annum for Australia. Commonwealth exports of flour to the UK which is a traditional trade, are included in the above figures.

(b) Barley and Oats. Until recently Canada was by far largest supplier of barley to UK – over a million metric tons in 1958/9 but falling to just over 300,000 tons in 1960/61. Australia is also an important supplier though quantities fluctuate. Imports of oats from Commonwealth countries are relatively small.

(c) Maize and Sorghums. Imports of yellow maize from Commonwealth are small, the main supplies being from Canada, Kenya and Tanganyika. UK imports of flat white maize from Rhodesia/Nyasaland are relatively small in volume but important to the economies of these countries. Australia exports significant quantities of sorghums to UK but USA is overwhelmingly the most important supplier for both maize and sorghums.

6. Although the interest of the Commonwealth in the trade in eggs and egg products is not repeat not very large, it is significant to Australia and New Zealand also has an interest. This interest could be maintained by preserving their free entry into UK market; but in default of this, there are other possibilities, such as a quota free of levy.

...

Commonwealth Interests

7. Commonwealth has an Interest in Carcase Pigmeat. Canada was a major supplier, although she has not repeat not sent pigmeat to UK market for some years. New Zealand sends about 1500 tons of frozen pork annually and UK New Zealand trade agreement provides for entry without restriction of quantity up to 1967 as well as duty free entry. Kenya sends about 1000 tons of bacon annually.

8. New Zealand should therefore be given duty and levy free entry into UK without limitation of quantity until 1967. For the remainder of the transitional period New Zealand should be granted duty and levy free entry into UK, and in the Common Market period into the Community, for an agreed quantity of pigmeat, in [group corrupt] to satisfy the requirements of comparable outlets.

9. In addition UK imports about 6,000 tons of pigmeat offals a year, almost all of it, from Canada, Irish Republic and New Zealand, entering duty free. In order to provide comparable outlets, it will be necessary to make some similar arrangements for these Commonwealth supplies in both the transitional and single market stages.

8. Comparable Outlets for Commonwealth. The economy of New Zealand depends to a significant extent upon its butter exports to UK; such exports are also important for Australia and Kenya. The increase in world butter production in recent years – often encouraged by large government subsidies and not repeat not fully matched by increased consumption – has already made it necessary for UK to take steps to restrict imports, as explained above. We envisage that during the transitional period (as noted above) we may need to continue to allocate shares in UK market for butter, having regard to trade in a recent representative period. Any such quotas would be drawn up without discrimination against Commonwealth. Imports from Commonwealth would continue to be admitted free of duty, up to the amount of the quota, while the present duty on imports from member countries of the Community would be gradually eliminated.

9. In the Common Market stage, it is envisaged that there would be a common price for butter (or possibly a range of prices for different grades) throughout the enlarged Community. Steps would still be necessary in order to ensure for Commonwealth suppliers an adequate share of British market. Imports from non-EEC non-Commonwealth suppliers would of course have to surmount the levy as well as being subject to quota restrictions.

Commonwealth Interests

6. Commonwealth interest in temperate fruits and vegetables is largely (though not repeat not exclusively) limited to apples and pears from Canada, Australia and New Zealand. They lend themselves to different treatment because, while Canada is in Northern hemisphere, Australia and New Zealand are in Southern and the seasons are different. We propose the establishment of duty free entry for imports of apples and pears from Australia and New Zealand and the exemption from the operation of any minimum price scheme of imports of apples up to an agreed level from Canada.

UNITED KINGDOM PROPOSALS TO E.E.C. ON AGRICULTURE

21. The Prime Minister said that, when the United Kingdom had begun its negotiations with the European Economic Community, Prime Minister Macmillan had stated that care would be taken to protect Commonwealth markets, and particularly the agricultural markets. Now the U.K. government had presented to the Canadian government a series of proposals, which it was planning to place before the Six, on transitional arrangements for agriculture. In these, the British had failed in various respects to live up to their undertakings. The proposals were confined almost entirely to a transitional period, and seemed to disregard the importance of protecting interests for the long term.

The U.K. government's request for a definite reply on this day was unreasonable and precipitate. Mr. Sandys' letter and the very substantial enclosed paper had not been delivered to Canada House until about 6 p.m. on Friday, March 9th. They had reached Mr. Green as he was leaving for Geneva for the Foreign Ministers' meeting, and had been delivered to the Prime Minister on his return to Ottawa at noon on Sunday, March 11th. The proposals bore directly and heavily on the interests of Canada, and there was a limit to the rapidity with which the government could reasonably be expected to comment on matters of such importance to the Canadian people.

He proposed to reply therefore, through the Canadian High Commissioner, that the Canadian government would be unable to make a definite reply until next week.

He went on to say that, on various occasions, he had had reason to doubt Mr. Sandys' good faith. He might telephone Prime Minister Macmillan to discuss the current unreasonable request. In any event, the reply of the Canadian government should be addressed to the U.K. Prime Minister and not to Mr. Sandys.

The U.K. government obviously had no intention of calling a meeting of Commonwealth Prime Ministers to discuss the possible effects upon the Commonwealth of the proposed association of the U.K. with the E.E.C. In his earlier statements in the U.K. House of Commons, Prime Minister Macmillan had seemed favourable to such a meeting, but his recent statements had been more indefinite and perhaps evasive. The British people appeared to believe that the Commonwealth would no longer exist by 1975.

The present request of the U.K. government showed that they were merely "pulling us along." They were not consulting, as they had undertaken to do, but were merely informing the Canadian government. Their public attitude to Australia and New Zealand was much the same, but he believed that those two countries were receiving somewhat better protection in the negotiations. He had reason to believe that Prime Minister Menzies had been approached by the U.K. government, and had stated that he would probably face another general election before July of this year and that a conference of Commonwealth Prime Ministers should not be held before that time.

It should be noted that the previous meeting of Prime Ministers had been discussing South Africa exactly a year ago today.

Earlier he had been given to understand that he would be accorded the freedom of the City of London during his next visit to the U.K., but more recently the British had been saying that they would have to bestow this honour on Commonwealth Prime Ministers in the order of their seniority in office. All these developments appeared to be related.

22. During the brief discussion some said that the U.K. request was almost outrageous. Their proposals gave Canada little protection, and made no allowance for a normal rate of growth of trade. It was important to insist upon adequate consultation, because the U.K. would be making further proposals from time to time as the negotiations with E.E.C. proceeded. The briefings of Canadian representatives in London and Brussels were useful, but the U.K. government was not justified in regarding these as consultations between the two governments.

23. The Cabinet approved the substance of a brief message to the United Kingdom government, stating that the Canadian government would be unable until next week to comment upon proposals which the U.K. government planned to make in Brussels to the European Economic Community concerning the transitional arrangements for agriculture.

Ottawa, March 19, 1962

My Dear Prime Minister,

I am writing to you separately today to let you have some information about the British Government's proposals for comparable outlets for Commonwealth temperate foodstuffs. I have also been asked to let you have the draft of a suggested agreement with the Community on industrial products from Canada, Australia and New Zealand.

You will remember that when Duncan Sandys came to Ottawa in July, 1961, he made it clear that much as we should like to do so we did not believe we should be able to retain indefinite unrestricted free entry for imports of industrial goods from Canada, Australia and New Zealand except in the relatively few cases where we could negotiate a reduction in the common tariff to nil.<sup>19</sup> Edward Heath also recognised this in paragraph 39 of his statement in Paris on 10th October, 1961.<sup>20</sup>

Early in the negotiations at Brussels, we pointed out that the value of this trade would be insignificant in relation to the total imports of an enlarged Common Market and we have argued that only negligible harm could be caused to the Community by the continuance of duty free access to the British market. The Six, however, have made clear their view that continuance of duty free access could lead to a gap of unlimited size in the common tariff and would be inconsistent with the principles of the Treaty of Rome. They have also refused to acknowledge that application of the common external tariff would necessarily damage this trade.

The subsequent discussions of this subject have related to a detailed analysis of the trade and have not yet reached matters of substantive negotiation. But it has become clear during these discussions that members of the Six, and especially the European Commission, are strongly opposed to the use of duty free quotas for industrial goods which, during our discussions in September, 1961, we had thought might be the best approach to the problem. It is clear that the Six would insist on limiting quotas to items which could be shown to be of great importance to Commonwealth countries and that far from providing for growth they would insist that the rate of duty rose by stages until the common tariff was applied in full and that the duty quotas should cover a declining volume of goods. In particular they would strongly oppose any kind of solution which did not result in application of the common tariff in full to this trade by the end of the transitional period (1st January, 1970).

So far, owing to lack of agreement between themselves, the Six have not put forward any positive proposals, but they have now established a working party to consider the problem and there is a serious danger that unless we put forward proposals of our own their ideas will crystallize on whatever is acceptable to those members least favourably inclined toward us.

<sup>20</sup> Voir/See The United Kingdom and the European Economic Community: Text of the Statement made by the Lord Privy Seal at the Meeting with Ministers of Member States of the European Economic Community at Paris on October 10, 1961. United Kingdom, Parliamentary Papers, Cmnd. 1565 (London: Her Majesty's Stationery Office, 1961).

In these circumstances we think it best to put forward proposals for what is referred to as “décalage” – that is delay in the stages by which the common tariff is applied to this trade. We believe we should do this in order to forestall much less favourable proposals by the Six and to encourage those members likely to give us support in the Six’s internal discussions of this subject.

Our negotiators will, of course, do their utmost to persuade the Six to accept proposals on the lines of the enclosed draft, but the Six may well not find such proposals acceptable as they stand. In particular they are likely

- (a) to insist that the first step towards the application of the common tariff should be taken when we join the Community and that the second step should be somewhat advanced,
- (b) to refuse any provision for possible special treatment after January 1st, 1970 and therefore to reject the proposed second review and
- (c) to seek to confine these arrangements to a short list of products.

We have no fixed deadline for making proposals on this subject in Brussels, but we believe it would be advantageous to do so soon. Edward Heath’s visit will give us all an opportunity to go through these proposals together and for you to let us have your comments on them.

Yours sincerely,

DEREK AMORY

DRAFT OF A SUGGESTED AGREEMENT WITH THE E.E.C.
ON INDUSTRIAL PRODUCTS FROM CANADA,
AUSTRALIA AND NEW ZEALAND

We should not take the first step (30%) towards the application of the common tariff to this trade until January 1st, 1965. (This means that industrial goods would continue to be imported free of duty until January 1st, 1965 and would then be charged a rate of duty equal to 30% of the common tariff.)

2. The Six would declare their readiness to participate in GATT tariff negotiations on manufactured goods of interest to Canada, Australia and New Zealand.

3. The enlarged Community would be committed to reviewing the trade during 1966 in consultation with the three Commonwealth countries in the light of the results of any tariff negotiations (qualified majority voting would certainly have to apply during the review).

4. Subject to any derogations agreed by the Community after the review we should take a second step (30%) towards applying the common tariff on January 1st, 1967.

5. The enlarged Community would be committed to a second review of the trade during 1969 again in consultation with the three Commonwealth countries to consider in the light of the circumstances whether special treatment should continue for a limited number of products after January 1st, 1970.

6. Subject to any derogations agreed during the second review we should apply the full common tariff to the whole of the trade on January 1st, 1970.

7. On the foregoing basis we might be able to avoid having to apply a system of origin controls, but we should probably have to agree that such a system should be applied if the Community found that the arrangements in practice resulted in significant deflections of trade.

Ottawa, March 19, 1962

My Dear Prime Minister,

During our discussion about the Common Market on 15th March I mentioned Edward Heath's statement in Brussels on 22nd February when he had spoken of the need for a general formula within which appropriate arrangements could be made to carry out the principle of comparable outlets for Commonwealth products in the ultimate period when the full Common Market arrangements had come into effect.

2. I have now been asked to let you have the enclosed draft formula on comparable outlets for Commonwealth temperate foodstuffs. Our intention is that this might take the form of a protocol to the Treaty of Rome. The British Government would be glad to have any comments which your Government wish to offer before they put the draft to the European Economic Community.

3. The British Government's idea is to preface it (and any other similar protocols which there may be dealing with other matters) with a general preamble which would include the following point: the parties recognise the importance of the Commonwealth as a force in the world for the promotion of the ideals of freedom and of human rights; they recognise the value as a factor in preserving the cohesion of the Commonwealth, of the great amount of trade carried on between the United Kingdom and the other Commonwealth countries and the special trading position which those countries enjoy in the British market including unrestricted duty free access for the greatest part of their exports; they also recognise the great importance to the economies of many of the Commonwealth countries of the export trade which has been developed in past years on the basis of those trading relationships; they note that the Treaty of Rome recognised the special relationships existing between member states and other countries outside the Community; and they therefore agree that having regard to the provisions made to allow these special relationships to continue the essential interests of Commonwealth countries should be protected.

4. You will notice that paragraph 2 of the draft formula refers to outlets in the enlarged Community. We thus envisage a "Community solution" because we think that this will be more acceptable to the Six than a purely "United Kingdom solution." This paragraph therefore covers present Commonwealth exports to the Six as well as to Britain. The Community may well object to this proposition on the two grounds that it would give the Commonwealth countries concerned a new assurance in the markets of the Six which they do not enjoy at present, and secondly, that it would be equivalent to a new preference in favour of the Commonwealth and therefore contrary to G.A.T.T. Our negotiators propose to put this particular concept forward for tactical reasons, but we have to recognise that it almost certainly represents more than the Six will be prepared to concede. If they do not accept the form of our proposal we hope to place on them the onus of suggesting an alternative.

5. The Six may well take the line that Commonwealth Governments other than Britain could not really expect more than an assurance of the opportunity of outlets comparable to those they had in Britain and the chance (without any specific assurance) of trying to hold or improve their position in the markets of the Six. If they do this we shall have to reconsider our formula and consult further.

6. I am sure we shall have a good opportunity to go into all this with Edward Heath when he is here himself next week.

Yours sincerely,

DEREK AMORY

DRAFT FORMULA ON COMPARABLE OUTLETS FOR COMMONWEALTH TEMPERATE FOODSTUFFS

It will be the policy of member countries of the enlarged Community to work where practicable towards international commodity agreements on the widest possible basis covering trade in temperate foodstuffs. Such agreements, which would have regard to the interests of both consumers and producers, would take time to negotiate. (The intention would be that they should embrace arrangements to safeguard Commonwealth interests made under the remainder of this protocol).

2. One of the objectives of the Community shall be to ensure, through appropriate arrangements, that the common agricultural policy shall be implemented in such a way as not to deprive Commonwealth countries supplying temperate foodstuffs of the opportunity of outlets in the enlarged Community as a whole, comparable with that which they enjoyed in the separate markets of the individual member states of the enlarged Community before the accession of the United Kingdom.

3. In respect of products dealt with in the appendices to this protocol the objective set out in the preceding paragraph will for agreed initial periods be implemented by the arrangements described in these appendices. (Note: Appendices cannot be drafted at this stage.)

4. At a suitable interval before the end of the periods covered by the appendices (and at such intervals thereafter as may be determined), the Community will review the working of the arrangements in the appendices. In the course of this review, the Community will consult the Commonwealth countries concerned. Thereafter the Community will decide in accordance with the terms of Article 114 of the Treaty and not less than twelve months before the expiry of any existing arrangements made under the provisions of this protocol what, if any, modifications are required in the existing arrangements in order to ensure in the circumstances existing at the time the continued implementation of the objective set out in paragraph 1 above.

5. If, before any such review, an International Commodity Agreement has been concluded in respect of a particular product or products then in respect of these products the special arrangements called for by this protocol may where appropriate be subsumed in the new International Agreement.

6. Any arrangements provided for in paragraph 2 shall continue in force until following a review a decision has been taken to amend them.

SECRET

London, March 20, 1962

My Dear Prime Minister:

Mr. Diefenbaker has asked me to convey to you the following message:

BEGINS:

There has as yet been time only for a preliminary examination of the important and complex proposals concerning transitional arrangements for agriculture outlined in the enclosure with Mr. Sandys' letter of March 9th. While recognizing your desire to get ahead quickly with negotiations in Brussels, you will appreciate that there is a limit to the rapidity with which we can provide considered comment on matters of such high importance. Although we had been informed of a number of these ideas as among the possibilities being considered, this is the first time that they have been placed before us as an integral set of proposals to be presented to the Six.

So far as products of interest to Canada are concerned, the proposals are not precise enough to permit definitive judgments. We cannot see how the various broad ideas put forward in the paper, designed to provide "outlets comparable to those now enjoyed," could in practice offer any equivalent alternative to the duty free and, in most cases, preferential access Canada now has to the British market. Accordingly, even under the most favourable interpretation and even if all the proposals were acceptable to the Six, important Canadian interests would, in our view, not be safeguarded.

More particularly, my colleagues and I have serious reservations and concerns about whether Canadian agricultural trade can be maintained and developed over a variable levy system. In face of variable levies we do not consider that what is referred to as "assured right of access" would ensure the continuation of such trade, even where the Canadian product has a recognized quality advantage as in the case of wheat.

The significance of preferences to our trade with Britain in many agricultural products does not seem to have been given adequate weight in the preparation of your proposals. These preferences have been important not only in relation to countries now members of EEC, but also in relation to third countries such as the United States and Argentina. Although in the paper it is said that it would be necessary to take account of preferences in considering how the principle of comparable outlets can best be applied, it is not clear how it is proposed to protect Commonwealth interests in this regard.

We are concerned about the fact that your various proposals refer only to "traditional quantities" and do not make allowance for the growth in trade which might, and in many cases would, occur if existing access to the United Kingdom market continued to be available. There is also the question of potential trade in new products and the need to allow for the expansion of Canadian trade which was artificially held down by quantitative restrictions for so many years since the war. The pattern of substantial and continuing mutual expansion of trade in many lines has been very apparent in recent years.

Although mainly concerned with the "transitional period," the March 9th paper touches on certain aspects of arrangements which might be made for the later Common Market stage. In this connection we should like to re-emphasize what was said in Mr. Green's message to Mr.

Sandys, that discussion of arrangements only for a transitional period has little or no meaning as a basis for assuring protection of Commonwealth trade. We should also like to point out that we have been informed that when Mr. Heath used the term "transitional period," in his report of the last meeting in Brussels to the Commonwealth High Commissioners in London, this expression referred only to the length of time that the members of the Common Market, or those seeking to join it, would regard as the minimum period of adjustment within which they could convert their agricultural economies to the closed economy which will be established under the Treaty of Rome. This has a very direct application to British agriculture and the agriculture of all the present members of the Common Market. It has no direct application to the members of the Commonwealth except in its incidental consequences which we do not think should be the basis of discussion of appropriate protection for our expanding Commonwealth trade. We should therefore like to urge most strongly that the long-term protection of Commonwealth trade should be given such a priority in discussion on this subject at Brussels that there will be no uncertainty on the part of any Commonwealth Government about long-term prospects and that there will be no risk of comments on "transitional" arrangements being misunderstood as implying a willingness on our part to accept as adequate anything less than safeguarding of our long-term interests. ENDS.

Yours very sincerely,

GEORGE DREW

My dear Lord Privy Seal,

I have been asked to transmit the following comments in regard to the papers which we were informed the British Government proposes to table at Brussels, so that you may place these comments in the hands of your officials who will be dealing with this subject.

MESSAGE BEGINS:

Please submit the following detailed comments on agricultural proposals contained in the papers enclosed with Mr. Sandys' letter of March 9th. In passing on these comments, it should be made clear that they are designed to assist the British negotiators to appreciate Canadian interests in the agricultural sector under discussion, and viewed against the background of basic Canadian concerns about fundamental policy issues involved in the negotiations.

2. Cereals and Cereal Products: Except for wheat, cereals and cereal products now enjoy preferences in the British market over non-Commonwealth suppliers. We are concerned about the effect of the variable levy system on our exports. We do not consider that Canadian trade will develop over a variable levy system even to the extent that our products may have a quality factor in their favour, as in the case of hard wheat. As regards ordinary wheat, coarse grains and cereal products, the variable levy system, even coupled with "assured right of access," seems likely to leave Canada in the position of residual supplier vis-à-vis production from within the Common Market area.

3. In Paragraph 3 of the Appendix to the March 9th paper, imports of wheat and flour from Commonwealth countries are lumped together. This ignores the importance of the 10 per cent preference on flour not only in relation to Canadian sales, but also in relation to the standards of flour competition in the British market. We consider it essential that satisfactory arrangements be made for flour as well as for wheat.

4. We note that differential treatment is apparently proposed for Australian wheat compared with Canadian wheat. Such differential treatment would destroy the normal relationships between these wheats. (Incidentally, Canada's exports of Ontario winter wheat are not mentioned in the British paper.)

5. We are concerned about the reference to comparable outlets in "the United Kingdom or the Community." This would seem to imply that our present or possible expanded trade with the Continental member countries of EEC under existing or planned arrangements could be regarded as an offset to losses in the British market. Reference to traditional quantities in the paper gives rise to concern, since this concept ignores growth prospects.

6. As regards barley, while Canada's present preferential position is noted, it is not clear how this position is to be dealt with in the British proposals. Barley continues to be an item of considerable importance to Canada. Recent levels of sales reflect a short supply situation in Canada and surpluses in Europe and should not be construed as indicating a declining Canadian export interest in the British market for barley.

7. With respect to other cereals and cereal products, Canada has significant sales in rye and miscellaneous feeding stuffs, and while mention is made of the tariff position on the latter items there are no specific proposals for safeguarding this trade.

8. Concerning horticultural products, the British proposals do not provide for duty free entry for Canadian apples as is proposed for Australia and New Zealand. We would be concerned to see the emergence of reverse preferences against Canadian apples and in favour of Community suppliers, and are not convinced that exemption from the operation of any minimum price scheme up to an agreed level of imports from Canada would safeguard our trading interest. With respect to the horticultural sector generally, there are a number of other tree fruits which it is considered have a growth potential in the British market.

9. As regards other products mentioned in the British papers, except for pig meat offals there appears to be no provision for safeguarding Canadian trading interests. Canada has present and/or prospective trade in egg products, pig meat and poultry meat. For these items, the effects of restrictions on the present trade position does not seem to be recognized in the paper.

MESSAGE ENDS.

Yours very sincerely,
GEORGE DREW

COMMON MARKET

We discussed this matter at length in an informal meeting of the members of the Cabinet. The attitude taken by Mr. Fleming was that when Mr. Heath arrives on Monday, he will simply say this:

- 1) This is what we propose.
- 2) We can't do any better than this.

Mr. Hees also spoke and said that, in effect, we should stand pat.

Mr. Churchill claimed that this was a matter in which we had been shown in a wrong light and similar views were expressed by Mr. Nowlan.

A discussion took place on apples and wheat.

The question was discussed as to whether I should be present and I stated that I would notify the U.K. that I would not be attending the conference as to do so would give a significance to the conference out of proportion to its importance as I had not been present at the Heath conference in January. At 4:00 p.m. I gave instructions to Robert Bryce to notify the High Commissioner accordingly.

MR. HEATH'S VISIT

The following may be of interest in view of your meeting with Mr. Heath on Monday morning.

Background to Mr. Heath's Visit

We now have the proposals the British Government intends to submit to the Six for safeguarding our trade interests in industrial products and agricultural commodities over the transitional period and during the definitive stage of Britain's membership in the Common Market. Some of these proposals regarding agriculture may already have been tabled in Brussels when you see Mr. Heath. Others are expected to be submitted to the Six very soon.

The attached briefs prepared for his talks with Canadian ministers† contain preliminary comments on these British papers. These briefs are:

Comments on suggested British Agreement with the EEC on Industrial Products from Canada, Australia and New Zealand (prepared by Finance Department).

Comments on British Draft Formula on "Comparable Outlets" for Commonwealth Temperate Foodstuffs (prepared by Finance Department).

Paper on United Kingdom Proposals for Safeguarding Canada's Essential Trade Interests in Industrial Products (prepared by Trade and Commerce).

Paper on United Kingdom Proposals for Safeguarding Canada's Essential Interests in Certain Temperate Agricultural Products (prepared by Trade and Commerce).

In brief, a settlement based on these proposals would, at best, ease the adjustment during the transitional period and provide for later consultations regarding long-term arrangements. While the prospects for the long term would depend in some degree on the amount of influence which the British will be able to exert after they become a full member of the Community, it cannot be assumed that they will be able to get acceptance of particularly favourable arrangements at that time. There is, also, no assurance that the Six will agree to what the British are proposing for the transitional period.

The British Government seems to have basically accepted the essential elements of the Six's position – namely, that accommodation for Commonwealth interests should be limited to the transitional period and that in the definitive stage all Common Market rules should uniformly apply to Britain in its trade with the Commonwealth. Thus, in the long run Canadian trade with Britain and the rest of the Common Market would be treated the same as the Common Market's trade with other outside countries such as Argentina and the United States – no better and no worse.

The British Government invited our comments at an earlier date on the transitional arrangements for agriculture. In your message of March 20 to Mr. Macmillan, relating to this request, you expressed concern over the extent to which they fall short of protecting our interests and you emphasized that transitional accommodation alone would not assure the protection of Commonwealth trade. No comments have yet been given to the British regarding their later papers.

The Purpose of Mr. Heath's Visit

This visit comes from a British initiative. The Brussels talks are now approaching the stage where substantive proposals will be discussed and the British Government is probably concerned at our initial reaction to its proposals. In addition to reviewing developments at this week's Ministerial meeting in Brussels, Mr. Heath will presumably seek Canadian comments on the latest British papers – i.e., long term agricultural proposals and proposals for industrial products.

He will probably stress that they represent the maximum that is negotiable in Brussels and that, despite adverse changes in our terms of access to the British market, our trade, except perhaps for a small range of particularly vulnerable products, will continue to move, and most likely increase. We may be pressed again by Mr. Heath for a list of priority items which we would want to have safeguarded.

What Could Be Achieved

Mr. Heath's visit is again bringing to the fore the issue of consultations and of what they could achieve.

It seems unlikely that given their assessment of the likely response of the Six the British Government could be persuaded to change the substance of its papers. On the other hand, some improvements may perhaps be obtained in the course of the discussions with Mr. Heath and through subsequent comments to Brussels.

We have so far avoided giving the British Government a list of priorities outlining essential Canadian interests for which a minimum settlement should provide protection. Mr. Heath may wish to obtain an indication that we would be prepared to do this. It is for Ministers to consider whether they wish to provide him with such a list during his stay in Ottawa.

The issue of Canadian involvement in the negotiations may also arise in another context. Some reports have been received suggesting that the Six had agreed to some Australian participation in the negotiations. Mr. Heath may wish to give you a full account of discussion of this issue at the last Ministerial meeting in Brussels. New Zealand has indicated that if the Australian request was successfully considered, pressure would develop for similar New Zealand participation. A decision by the Six to admit Australia and New Zealand might be regarded as raising important policy considerations for us.

The Future Timetable

Mr. Heath will be coming here from a meeting this week at Ministerial level with the Six in Brussels. The Deputies in the Brussels negotiations will probably renew their meetings next week and Ministers from Britain and the Six may convene again before Easter. They are anxious to make as much progress as possible before the summer break.

MR. HEATH'S VISIT

Mr. Heath was accompanied to Ottawa by Sir Eric Roll, Andrew of the Board of Trade and Bottomley of CRO. They met on March 26 and 27 with Canadian ministers and senior officials. Mr. Heath also called on the Prime Minister and met privately with Canadian ministers. The purpose of his visit was to bring up to date, in the light of developments in Brussels and British intentions to table proposals for safeguarding Commonwealth interests, the consultations initiated at his last visit to Ottawa. There was no press conference and no communiqué. Apart from private ministerial discussions following are highlights of the meetings which were all carried out in a good atmosphere.

2. Mr. Heath reviewed in detail the progress of negotiations since January in each of the main areas covered so far. He explained that the somewhat slow pace both at the ministerial and deputy levels had to a large extent been set by the need of the Six to coordinate positions. The British delegation for its part had endeavoured to ensure that progress in each area should keep in step with progress in others. The Six had been critical of this approach but there would otherwise be danger in focussing on any particular set of issues, e.g. those related to zero duties, lest the Six gather the impression that British concerns with other areas were less important.

3. Mr. Heath said that preliminary work on Commonwealth problems was virtually concluded. The Six were working at possible solutions and it seemed desirable that Britain should take the initiative and come forward with its own proposals. If the Six tabled theirs first, the onus would be on Britain to demonstrate that they were inadequate. So far discussions had been carried out without prejudice to the general principles stated at the opening of the negotiations. The British delegation considered it important that the general principle of preserving essential Commonwealth interest should constantly be before the Six. However, the time had come when arguments should become more specific.

4. According to Mr. Heath it was against this tactical background that papers relating to arrangements for Commonwealth interests in industrial products and agriculture had been drafted and submitted for comments to the Commonwealth countries concerned.

5. With respect to the timetable for the negotiations, Mr. Heath stressed that Britain would not wish to negotiate against a target date as its position would thereby be weakened. Every effort would however be made to break the back of the negotiations before the summer holidays. The Six had agreed to work on this basis, although there were some doubts among themselves that this deadline could be met. The pace of negotiations could therefore be expected to pick up. This brought to the fore the problem of consultations with Commonwealth countries and the need for early comments on the British papers and on any detailed proposals which might have to be tabled in Brussels over the coming months.

6. After reviewing other aspects of the negotiations and related developments including discussions in the Fouchet Committee and EFTA, Mr. Heath concluded that the atmosphere in Brussels was “extremely good.” The British delegation said that while the French would drive the hardest bargain they were now prepared to “negotiate reasonably.” There was concrete evidence to support this view in recent days.

7. In the course of discussion the British papers (transitional commodity arrangements, long term agricultural protocol, and proposal for industrial goods) came under close scrutiny. The extent to which they fell short of protecting Canadian interests and of providing long term assurances was stressed by the Canadian side.

8. On long term agricultural arrangements we pointed out in particular the inconsistency between the proposed objective of maintaining the same opportunity of outlets for Commonwealth in the enlarged community and other objectives of the Rome Treaty e.g. that of increasing agricultural productivity within the EEC. We emphasized the importance of EEC pricing policy and suggested a reference to it in the long term agricultural protocol.

9. With regard to suggested arrangements on industrial products we stressed that the proposed “décalage” during the transitional period would in no way protect our interests in the Common Market period and that in any future tariff negotiations we might have to pay for concessions in the Common Tariff which would not therefore compensate for our losses. Manufactures and semi-manufactures amounted to about 11% of our total exports to the U.K. but a great deal of importance was attached to this trade.

10. The British agreed to examine some of our suggestions. Among the main points they made in response to our comments were the following:

(1) The negotiability of British proposals had to be borne in mind. The extent to which they could be “loaded” was a delicate tactical matter. For instance the long term agricultural paper already aimed at an ambitious goal, i.e. to make the preservation of comparable outlets for Commonwealth food and feed stuffs an objective of the common agricultural policy.

(2) Long term arrangements looking beyond 1970 had necessarily to remain vague since it was impossible so far ahead to predict prevailing conditions at the Common Market stage.

(3) It should not be assumed that present British policy particularly with regard to agriculture (i.e. free market with deficiency payments) could indefinitely be maintained even if Britain did not join the Common Market. Could a greater degree of security for Commonwealth interests be written into the new arrangements than was provided for in present ones?

(4) The British proposals should be seen in the context of the effects British membership in the EEC would have (a) on USA tariff negotiating authority (the 80% provision of the proposed new legislation would only become operative with an enlarged Common Market); (b) on the level of the common external tariff, and (c) on the CAP pricing policy.

(5) In endeavouring to obtain special arrangements for Canadian industrial exports to Britain, the British delegation had to move on a broader and shallower front than if we had provided them with a narrow list of priority items for which they would seek special safeguards e.g. lower common tariff. At the same time they recognized the difficulty for us of establishing any priorities on this trade. They did not press on this point. However, they accepted that the broader approach need not exclude special arrangements to deal with a very few items.

MR. MACMILLAN'S VISIT – WEST INDIAN REACTION MEETING PRIME MINISTERS

The Federal Government has shown considerable apprehension concerning the British application to join the ECM. Their worries are principally concerned with the future marketing of the major West Indian products that are sold to a very large extent in the United Kingdom market, such as sugar, bananas and citrus. They were also vitally concerned with the position of Trinidad petroleum products, not only in the British market but also in the markets of the Six. In addition, they showed a lively interest in the direct effect on Jamaica's bauxite and alumina production of the level of tariffs proposed on primary aluminum and alumina by the Six.

2. However, you will appreciate that since the Federal Government is moribund and will be unceremoniously buried either by the end of this month or by the middle of May, their views are of very little consequence now.

3. The Trinidad Government's principal preoccupation is with exports of petroleum products, but of course they are not insensitive to the possibilities that the Commonwealth Sugar Agreement might be upset at some time in the foreseeable future.

4. At the present time the oil industry accounts for about 80% of the total export earnings of Trinidad and constitutes about one-third of the territory's gross national product. In addition, the industry is by all odds the largest source of new investment in the territory (now calculated to about one-half of the annual new investment in fixed assets).

5. At the present time about 35% of the 300,000 barrels of refined products now available for export daily moves to the United Kingdom and to the Common Market or FTA area. Trinidad's own crude production accounts for slightly more than 40% of the refinery throughput.

6. However, there are high hopes that new and profitable fields extending far out into the ocean on the East coast of Trinidad will considerably increase the amount of crude oil produced in Trinidad. Moreover, Texaco has embarked on a new facility for the production of lubricating oil products and it is anticipated that much of this new production will move to England and to the European countries incorporated in the ECM.

7. Trinidad is aware of the efforts by France to erect tariff barriers against refined products from outside the area in order to protect the Sahara crude oil production which will be largely refined in France.

8. At the present time the Netherlands West Indies has a quota arrangement for supplying a small quantity of petroleum products to the ECM on a quota basis. Not only is the quota so small as to be of no serious importance, but it is liable to reduction at any time if it is considered likely to "disturb the European markets." The fear is that pressure will be brought to bear on the British Government to enter into some similar arrangement for Trinidad as a means of acceding to France's desire to protect their own refined oil production.

9. Since under the ECM formulas now being considered crude oil would enter the area free of duty from all sources, Trinidad regards the efforts to establish a barrier on refined products as a perpetuation of the old Colonial pattern whereby the overseas territories supplied raw materials to be processed in the metropolitan countries. They also consider that [it] is hardly just that Russian crude, for example, could be shipped into European refineries free of all duties and restrictions whereas Trinidad would find its historic market in Britain (and to a lesser extent in the Continent) for refined products put to a disadvantage in order to benefit "other less respectable" suppliers. This would mean in effect that Trinidad is being penalized for having its own refining capacity and it would also seriously diminish the attraction for further exploration of its own oil fields. Trinidad industry does not seek preferred treatment, but they do hope for and expect that they will have free access, in equal competition with all other suppliers to Britain and the ECM countries in the future.

10. As far as sugar is concerned they have a comforting cushion in the Commonwealth Sugar Agreement that protects them for 9 years, but they are acutely sensitive that any interference with their markets in Britain, even if only at sometime in the foreseeable future, would have serious consequences in view of the continued importance of sugar to the economy by virtue of the number of people employed by the industry.

11. The Jamaican Government, of course, would be very seriously concerned over any interference with the preferred position of sugar, bananas, and citrus in the British market. In addition, any duties on metal or on alumina erected by the ECM would have an effect on the markets for the Aluminum Company of Canada's production in Jamaica or in Canada. While the numbers employed by the aluminum industry in Jamaica are not as great as in sugar and other agricultural industries, exports on bauxite and alumina are growing in importance and now represent about one-half the value of the total exports. Moreover, the bauxite and alumina industries are the high wage industries that offer a constant incitement towards higher wage standards in Jamaica.

12. You will appreciate that Barbados and St. Kitts are almost totally dependent on sugar for their export earnings and that the Windward Islands draw the major proportion of their export income from bananas. Thus the remaining territories of The West Indies are vitally concerned with Britain's negotiations with the Six.

13. As far as British Guiana is concerned its livelihood depends on sugar, bauxite and alumina and that Government has been watching these developments with equal anxiety.

14. I have no doubt that all governments concerned would fully support a meeting of Commonwealth Prime Ministers prior to a British decision to join. However, if the meeting is called before the autumn Jamaica, [which] will have its independence on the 6th of August, probably will be the only territory that could attend the meeting as of right. Assuming that Trinidad gets its independence in September it could only attend if invited. You will recall that the Federal Government was not invited to attend the last meeting of Commonwealth Prime Ministers and this gave rise to considerable agitation not only from the Federal Government but from the Unit Governments as well. You can anticipate that if Trinidad has not achieved its independence by the time the meeting is called Dr. Williams will be agitating most vociferously for an invitation to the meeting. Similarly it is almost certain that Dr. Jagan, and possibly Barrow of Barbados, will also press for an invitation.

MACMILLAN'S VISIT

As you know Ghana's attitude toward Britain's negotiations with the EEC is governed by concern about the political effects of African association with EEC. This is regarded as perpetuating a system of discrimination among African states. Discrimination itself is resisted not repeat not only on economic grounds but much more on the grounds that it contributes toward the political division of Africa. Ghana Government's basic objection therefore even to the act of negotiation by Britain with the Six is that in order for negotiations to begin Britain must have accepted the principles of the Rome Treaty. To Ghana this means that in a fundamental way Britain has accepted the idea of a political association with Europe, and will consequently be in no repeat no position to bring about a modification of the existing discriminatory system.

2. This is the core of Ghanaian position and very little consideration has been given to the purely economic implications of British membership in EEC. There is no repeat no likelihood whatsoever that Ghana would itself contemplate becoming associated with the Common Market. Ghana has no repeat no confidence in British ability to bring about a liberalization of European tariffs on behalf of other Commonwealth members. Ghanaians have concluded that Britain and European countries automatically assume that African states will indefinitely remain primary producers: looked at in this light concessions for African raw materials in European market which are offered as inducements to Africans to fall into line serve only to perpetuate African dependence on European manufactures.

3. I think it likely that President Nkrumah would welcome a meeting of Commonwealth Prime Ministers before any British decision to join EEC provided the timing did not repeat not conflict with any African undertaking. The latest word I have had from sources qualified to speak is that Ghana "would be represented" at such a meeting.

MACMILLAN'S VISIT

Secretary of New Zealand Department of External Affairs Alister McIntosh is not repeat not happy with direction EEC negotiations seem to be taking.

2. New Zealand's attitude and position remain unchanged namely free and unrestricted entry to United Kingdom market although New Zealand officials are becoming more and more doubtful of ability of United Kingdom to guarantee this condition. New Zealand Cabinet is also aware that it is unlikely New Zealand will be able to maintain this attitude. Government however is influenced by powerful farmer producer boards and government will say and do nothing that would indicate any retreat from this position. McIntosh feels that this is a mistake [and that] government should be preparing public for a smaller United Kingdom market in future. British High Commissioner in New Zealand (see our letters 75† and 109† February 22 and March 4 respectively) hinted strongly in speeches that some form of control might have to be placed on meat and butter going into Britain. These speeches were referred to by press and producer boards as first signs of trouble ahead mutually. New Zealand Prime Minister confidentially informed British High Commissioner that he also believed some form of restrictions would be inevitable.

3. One of first steps was taken shortly after these speeches when Britain last month put butter imports on a quota basis. New Zealand had no repeat no alternative but to agree to this quota. A generous one but they have made it plain they will refuse to consider it a precedent. Nevertheless McIntosh feels that a precedent has now been established and that it will be used again. General alarm experienced in New Zealand when Britain first mentioned joining EEC subsided somewhat with promises given by Britain that they would not repeat not join unless New Zealand's interests were fully protected and by this was meant free and unrestricted entry of her products.

4. New Zealand officials however are now again becoming concerned and are not repeat not at all confident of outcome. Alister McIntosh takes a dim view of future and thinks New Zealand in general and farmers in particular are in for a lower standard of living in years ahead. McIntosh told me that Cabinet would probably agree to a meeting of Prime Ministers on September 10 in hope that sufficient progress will have been made by that time to enable them to know just what terms are under which United Kingdom would be able to enter EEC and be able to value its effect on New Zealand trade.

5. Mr. Foss Shanahan Assistant Secretary of New Zealand Department of External Affairs and the officer primarily responsible for coordinating New Zealand views on EEC matters told me that they had sent a telegram to Mr. Sandys on March 30 expressing in fairly strong terms that they were not repeat not at all happy with attitude being adopted by United Kingdom in their negotiations on a number of New Zealand products. They particularly had in mind danger of losing their preference on general processed foodstuffs such as canned peas and canned vegetables generally, frozen vegetables and a number of other minor agricultural products which while small individually amounted to a substantial figure by New Zealand standards taken collectively. Shanahan felt that while progress at moment was slow that it would probably go forward in a rush and that by September terms of entry would be sufficiently known to justify a Prime Ministers' Conference.

6. Honourable J.R. Marshall Deputy Prime Minister does not repeat not appear to be so optimistic. His view [is] that Britain should be in a position to say to Prime Ministers' Conference – we have been offered admission to EEC on following terms and he is doubtful if terms for United Kingdom entry into EEC will have been completed by September.

7. Today while introducing Mr. James Stewart of Canadian Trade Mission to Honourable Keith Holyoake, latter remarked that without full and complete protection United Kingdom entry into EEC could mean complete and utter disaster to New Zealand economy in short run, although admitting that probably in long run it might be best for United Kingdom.

8. New Zealand's present attitude can be summed up even if unrealistic as being unchanged – mainly free and unrestricted entry for New Zealand products into United Kingdom with retention of present preferences.

BRITAIN AND THE SIX: AUSTRALIAN AND NEW ZEALAND VIEWS ON BRITISH PROPOSALS FOR SAFEGUARDING COMMONWEALTH INTERESTS

We were recently informed by Australia and New Zealand of their reactions to the British proposals for safeguarding industrial exports from Canada, New Zealand and Australia and Commonwealth exports of temperate foodstuffs. The following is a summary of the comments they intend to make to the British Government.

Industrial Products

2. The burden of the Australian reply to Britain's invitation for comments on its industrial proposals is that too much is being given up too quickly. The Australians are raising five main points:

(1) They are prepared to recognize that unrestricted duty-free entry for Commonwealth manufactured goods into the Common Market could not be maintained forever. On the other hand, they consider that to concede to the Six and third countries the complete abolition of preferences on these products, softened only by a phasing out period, would not "augur well" for the terms of an eventual settlement.

(2) Unless it can be shown that the continuation of preferences would harm the Six, it would seem unreasonable to oppose it; and until alternatives have been fully explored, it cannot be said that no arrangement can be found to protect the interests of Britain, the Commonwealth and the Six.

(3) The Commonwealth is not trying to improve its position but merely to prevent the disruption of industries which have been planned and built in accordance with the present preferential system. The Australians feel that the Brussels negotiations are being used as a pretext for eliminating Commonwealth preferences while this is not required either by the GATT or the Rome Treaty.

(4) As a minimum position, a preferred treatment for some items should at least be considered (e.g., basket quotas, rebates of duties, etc.); every effort should be made to get the Six to agree to it now, rather than postpone the issue to future reviews of this trade when Britain will be a member of the Common Market and less able to hold its ground.

(5) The Australians hope that Britain will continue to ensure that progress in each of the areas covered by the negotiations keeps in step with progress in others; thus, if concessions have to be made in one sector (e.g., industrial products), this can be used as a bargaining point to secure better terms in others (e.g., agriculture).

3. The Australians are asking that British proposals should not be tabled until their own representatives have had the opportunity of stating their case in Brussels before the Six.

4. New Zealand has less interest in industrial products than Australia and Canada. On tactics, however, they share the Australian view that it does not seem necessary for Britain to put forward the proposals it has in mind at this stage. The solution envisaged by Britain amounts to a considerable concession which might harden, rather than ease, the positions of the Six in other areas. New Zealand also shares in common with Australia the general view that future multilateral tariff negotiations would not offer much prospect for compensation for its losses.

Temperate Foodstuffs

5. The Australians are unwilling to commit themselves with respect to the British proposals until they learn the substance of the specific arrangements contemplated for particular products. In their view, further probing and progress should be made in Brussels on all products concerned before draft proposals are put to the Six. They have strong reservations about the "general but quite imprecise formula" for comparable outlets outlined in the British longterm proposals. They consider that this formula might exclude solutions which would be more appropriate for certain commodities. It might also come to be regarded during the negotiations as affording a firm assurance, thus reducing pressure for obtaining satisfactory specific guarantees. The Australians, in brief, are anxious to know from the beginning, what they can expect in terms of quantitative access, over what period and what is to be the basis for the determination of prices.

6. New Zealand is generally less critical of the British draft proposals. It points out that transitional arrangements should provide the Commonwealth countries with access to the enlarged Community at least comparable with that which they now enjoy in the individual markets of member states. The main New Zealand concern is, however, that the accommodation provided by transitional arrangements will be lost once these arrangements are replaced by broad international commodity agreements. It is accordingly suggesting that the provision of comparable outlets for Commonwealth countries should be made an explicit objective of these longterm agreements, and that any review of the transitional arrangements and of the longterm agreements should consider the extent to which they are achieving this objective. Subject to appropriate drafting amendments covering these points, New Zealand is prepared to accept the British proposals.

MR. MACMILLAN'S VISIT

Since the Prime Minister and ministers and senior officials concerned with economic matters are all in the Cameron Highlands attending the current ASA Conference I have discussed Malaysia's attitude towards Britain's negotiations with the Six, individually with the Governor and Deputy Governor of Malaya's Central Bank. Both have confirmed our earlier information from various sources that since rubber and tin are by far this country's most important exports and since neither have a tariff to hurdle in entering the Common Market now existing, the government has no repeat no significant worries about the outcome of Britain's efforts. Indeed, Malaysians mildly favour their success because even though this would mean the loss of British preference on say, pineapple, they would hope that with Britain a member the Common Market [it] would become more prosperous and more outward looking and therefore more likely to become a larger buyer of Malayan exports. British membership could also strengthen sterling to which this country is tied.

2. The Tunku is a courteous man, on friendly terms with both Britain and those members of the Commonwealth most concerned about the results likely to flow from British membership in the Common Market, and known to favour more frequent meetings of Commonwealth Prime Ministers. Therefore, notwithstanding the attitude of this country towards Britain's negotiations with the Six, and provided timing offered no repeat no great obstacle and most Prime Ministers agreed that a meeting was desirable I should be surprised if the Tunku did not repeat not accept an invitation to attend.

MR. MACMILLAN'S VISIT

As you know Indians have from time to time expressed concern at prospect of losing export facilities they now enjoy should Britain join the ECM. At present about 30% of India's exports and 26% of her total imports are with UK. Being a developing country, however, India is hopeful of being given an opportunity to develop in the long run even larger export facilities with member states of Community. Britain's entry in initial stages would undoubtedly upset India's actual trade pattern but after a period of adjustment it is hoped that it will turn to India's advantage. Officials seem confident their problems will be resolved because consortium members can understand lack of logic in policies which would prevent India from earning maximum foreign exchange.

2. India has declared her policy to keep aloof from associate status which might be offered to African members of the Commonwealth.

3. With regard to the proposed Prime Ministers' Conference the press has alleged that requests by Canada and Australia for meeting in June or early July are influenced by considerations and draws attention to dangers that could occur on premature meeting such as (1) decelerating the Brussels negotiations because the British negotiation team cannot repeat not be in two places at once or (2) leading to a majority of the Commonwealth countries insisting on terms for joining the ECM which might tie British negotiators' hands in Brussels. A presumed unwillingness of Britain to press its own Commonwealth issue before ECM has reached decision on how it proposes to link its African territories to Community has also been mentioned as being argument against early meeting.

4. We were talking to Secretary General R.K. Nehru the day Macmillan's letter arrived. R.K. Nehru said the Prime Minister had not repeat not been [sic] fully studied the matter but it was probable he would agree to Macmillan's suggestion. R.K. Nehru implied satisfaction with an agenda broader than the Common Market and indicated that conference in the second half of September fitted conveniently into the Indian parliamentary calendar.

BRITAIN AND THE SIX: BRITISH PROPOSALS FOR THE PROTECTION OF COMMONWEALTH AGRICULTURE

We now have the revised text of the British short-term proposals for protecting Commonwealth agricultural interests. You will recall that in a message of March 20 to Mr. Macmillan you gave your reaction to an earlier version of these proposals. Detailed comments were also transmitted to British officials in London and also Brussels, and given orally to Mr. Heath and the senior officials of the British negotiating team who accompanied him to Ottawa two weeks ago.

2. Some amendments have been made to the British paper on cereals which is of chief interest to us. You may be interested in the following summary of the new points: they clearly reflect some of our comments and the concerns expressed by Australia and New Zealand.

(1) The earlier British proposals stressed the importance of fixing prices within the European community at a level which would not over-stimulate production and give rise to surpluses.

These proposals, however, left room for a pricing policy which could encourage self-sufficiency in the Community and drive traditional suppliers, such as Canada, to a marginal position.

The revised British paper expresses the view that internal prices, notably for wheat, must be such as to maintain a balance between supply and demand having regard to the position of traditional suppliers. This is an important point since the preservation of the Commonwealth position would become a factor in the determination of internal prices.

(2) It was proposed initially that arrangements for cereals should ensure for Commonwealth countries outlets into the enlarged Common Market comparable to those they now enjoy. These 'comparable outlets' were broadly defined by reference to traditional quantities sold to the United Kingdom. Under this earlier formula, Commonwealth countries would continue to have a market in Britain or the Community for traditional quantities.

This formula ignored growth prospects; moreover, it suggested that any increase in our sales to the Six could be regarded as offsetting our losses in the British market, although this increase might well be accounted for by the natural expansion of demand in the Common Market.

The revised paper now refers to "comparable opportunity" instead of "comparable outlets," thus taking growth prospects into account. More emphasis is also placed on the Commonwealth basic assured right of access for at least the traditional quantities sold in Britain and the Six. This is a stronger assurance than that contained in the earlier draft.

BRITAIN AND THE SIX: PROBLEMS OF ASSOCIATION WITH THE EEC

You asked for our comments on London's telegram No. 1282 of April 9, 1962 (copy attached†) concerning a meeting in London of representatives of Nigeria, Ghana, Tanganyika and Sierra Leone with the British Government, where the question of association with the EEC is reportedly to be discussed. This telegram also referred to British newspaper reports suggesting that Britain is considering important contributions to the EEC programmes of aid.

2. It may be appropriate to begin with a brief review of some of the recent developments relating to the association of former independent territories with the EEC.

Association of Overseas Countries Under the Rome Treaty

3. Twenty-four overseas countries and territories having special relationship with the Six were associated with the EEC under the terms of the Treaty of Rome (Part IV) and of a special implementing convention annexed to the Treaty. Most of these territories are former French colonies, but they also include the Belgian Congo, Ruanda-Urundi, Somaliland and Netherlands New Guinea.

4. The association is characterized by four main features:

(a) The Six are removing tariffs and other restrictions on trade from the Associated Overseas Countries in the same way as among themselves. Thus, if a country remains associated during the whole transitional period its exports will enjoy free entry into the Common Market at the end of this period.

(b) In return, the Associated Countries take similar measures with respect to the trade of the Six. However, they retain the right to keep or impose revenue duties and such duties as may be required to protect developing industries. In addition, they are not required to move their external tariffs to the level of the common tariff of the Six.

(c) The same measures are taken by the Associated Countries among themselves.

(d) A development fund with resources of about $580 million was created by the Six to promote economic and social development in the Associated Countries.

5. The main effect of these provisions was to establish a framework for the creation of a free trade area between the Six and their associates. Both groups derived the following economic benefits from these arrangements:

(a) France shared with her EEC partners the burden of providing aid to her former African dependencies (their contribution amounted to $380 million over 5 years); the other five shared in France's privileged position in the markets of the French African states.

(b) The Associated Countries gained preferential access for their exports to the whole of the Common Market. They could also look to it as a major source of capital.

The association was also regarded by the Six as of considerable political significance since it could replace the loosening ties between France and Africa as the former colonies gained independence.

6. The terms of association also had the incidental effect of establishing the framework of a free trade area among the African countries themselves. This feature, however, has not been of any great practical significance since trade among these countries is of minimal value, they are generally in the process of revamping their monetary and trade systems and they have developed Customs Unions of their own (the West Africa Customs Union and the Equatorial Customs Union).

7. It was agreed that the implementing convention annexed to the Rome Treaty would have a duration of five years, expiring at the end of 1962. There would thus be an opportunity for reviewing the terms of association and re-negotiating a convention more in keeping with the new independent status of most associate countries.

8. These arrangements while never formally blessed in GATT received the tacit benediction of the contracting parties under a negotiated formula.

Renegotiation of Association with the EEC

9. Of all the countries now associated with the EEC Guinea alone has decided to break off association. The others have all indicated that they wish to renew it. The former French territories in particular are pressing for new terms that will give them benefits at least equal to those they now enjoy.

10. Over the past ten months or so extensive discussions have been carried out among the Six and the Associated Countries over the future form of association. Working from proposals drafted by the EEC Commission, the Six have now agreed on the following general points:

(a) The association should be renewed for a period of five to seven years and the steps already taken towards free trade under the initial convention should be maintained.

(b) The association should be renegotiated freely between the Six and the Associated Countries; the independent status of the latter should also be reflected in the creation of institutions responsible for the affairs of the association, where the Associated Countries would be fully represented.

(c) The benefits under the new trade arrangements should be equivalent to those now enjoyed by the Associated Countries.

(d) At least as much aid should be made available as under the initial convention.

11. The Associated Countries are also in broad agreement with these points; however, they object to one feature of the new trading arrangements proposed by the Commission: the Commission has proposed certain reductions in the Common Tariff on items of importance to the Associated Countries. On these items they would thus lose part of the preferences they enjoy against third countries and they would receive compensation through technical and financial assistance and market stabilization schemes. The Associated Countries are pressing for the maintenance of preferences as a minimum position. On this point their views are in direct conflict with those of the United States which, as a matter of general policy and out of concern for Latin America – against which the preferences would operate – have also been putting pressure on the Six and France, in particular, to eliminate these EEC preferences altogether and move on a global front towards free trade in tropical products. No decision has yet been taken by the Six but there is some evidence that agreement may be reached along the lines of the Commission's proposals – accelerated progress in the removal of tariff and QRs on the trade between the EEC and the Associated States, reduction of preferences, market stabilization arrangements and technical and financial aid.

12. Before its application for membership in the EEC, Britain was generally critical of the trade aspects of association because of the additional discrimination it introduced among African countries (with the Commonwealth territories enjoying Commonwealth preferences and the EEC territories preferences in the Common Market). Since its application has opened the possibility of merging the two systems for the benefit of Commonwealth countries prepared to apply for association with the EEC, Britain has had a more direct interest in the problems of association. Without participating in the renegotiation of the Association Convention, it expressed support for the EEC Commission's approach.

Brussels Discussions on the Problems of the Less Developed Commonwealth Countries

13. The Six requested from Britain a list of possible candidates for association so that their individual problems could be examined. Britain took the position that association with the EEC should be open to any Commonwealth country. This position has been stated on several occasions and, in principle, remains unchanged.

14. However, when, during the early stages of the negotiations, Britain and the Six agreed to focus their study of Commonwealth problems on several broad areas, there was a common understanding that association would not be relevant to the examination of the problems of developed Commonwealth members – Canada, Australia and New Zealand. Britain and the Six also seem to have recognized that general discussions on association would be futile without a detailed study of the trade problems of less developed Commonwealth members and a clearer view of the future régime of association with the EEC.

15. You will recall that at the EEC Commission's suggestion (the Deniau Proposals) Britain and the Six then agreed, without prejudice to any possible solution, on an attempt at classifying under-developed Commonwealth countries in accordance with the nature of their problems and as a means of developing a better understanding of the issues at stake. Britain made it clear that it did not regard this exercise as meant to develop a priority list of Commonwealth candidates for association.

16. As discussions progressed, and categories and sub-categories became more and more complex and cumbersome, the serious limitations of this approach had to be recognized. What this exercise seems, however, to have achieved, is to document the issues and bring to the fore the diversity of the problems Britain's entry into the Common Market would raise for the Commonwealth under-developed members. There would be commodity problems (e.g. sugar, oil, tea, bananas); India, Pakistan, Ceylon and Hong Kong would have difficulties in relation to some of their low cost manufactures (chiefly textiles). The problems of the African territories and of the West Indies are more akin to those of the associated territories of the Six.

17. The Six have given clear indications that they would not regard the Asian group with their vast populations, different cultures and low cost exports as suitable candidates for association. They advocate seeking solutions to the problem of their industrial exports along the lines of guaranteed markets and market disruption arrangements on a broad multilateral basis. There is no evidence that for their part any of these countries would seriously entertain association as a possible course.

18. Thus, this process of elimination, although resisted by Britain, seems to have narrowed down possible association to the Commonwealth African countries and the British West Indian and Pacific territories. On the other hand, the extent to which association would be a solution to the trade problems of these countries has not yet been properly examined. Which of them would be regarded as suitable candidates by the Six is not clear. (The Six indicated that in principle association should be limited to Africa and they are under pressure from the Associated Countries not to increase the coverage of association to the point where its benefits become diluted.) Apart from Ghana, which has expressed firm opposition to association, the other countries and territories concerned have not yet taken any definite position. The general issue, however, can be expected to be a very controversial one in African politics. The Commonwealth countries are reluctant to surrender preferences and Commonwealth assistance which they now enjoy until some new guaranteed benefits are assured. The whole debate will also become tinged with charges about neo-colonialism.

19. Slow progress is likely to be made in this area of the Brussels negotiations until the new terms of association emerge from discussions between the Six and their Associated Territories, and trade issues have come into sharper relief. The Six still insist that they should know which Commonwealth countries will want to become associated; Britain points out that until the terms of association are known Commonwealth countries cannot be expected to take a decision. Even after they should be given a reasonable period for doing so.

20. Against this background, the following points could be made in relation to London's telegram:

(a) Although it is by virtue of decisions of the Six – who were then responsible for the administration of the Associated Countries – that these countries were brought into close relationship with the EEC, it has now been agreed that, with the new independent status of these countries, the renegotiation of their association should be based on free negotiations among the countries concerned, on the basis of equal status, and that these countries should enjoy their full share of responsibility in the affairs of the Association. Discussions have progressed to a point where a return to colonial rule under the authority of the EEC Council and Commission would hardly seem feasible.

(b) Throughout the Brussels negotiations the British delegation has endeavoured to ensure that progress in all areas should move forward in step so that the problem of the Commonwealth as a whole should constantly remain before the Six. The British delegation seems to have been aware that different solutions would be proposed for the different problems of Commonwealth countries with a divisive effect. There is a good deal of evidence to suggest that with their tactics in Brussels the British delegation hoped to forestall the trend.

(c) The decision whether to seek association with the EEC is one which the Commonwealth countries concerned, not the British Government, will have to make. These countries might react sharply if we expressed a critical view of their bilateral discussions with the British Government at this stage on the problems raised for them by Britain's application when we, as well as Australia and New Zealand, have carried out similar talks with the British on matters of interest to us.

(d) If Britain joins the Six it will, as a senior partner, have to contribute to EEC aid. If, in addition, some Commonwealth countries decide to associate with the EEC these steps will have some implications for Commonwealth Aid Programmes, although the British contribution to these programmes should not necessarily be allowed to decline. You will recall that when Mr. Sandys was in Ottawa last year, he emphasized that if Britain could enjoy the benefits of the Common Market its ability to provide development and investment capital would be improved.

(e) The Six can be expected under French pressure to be very stubborn towards any proposal which might alter substantially their dominant role in the future of the Associated Countries; nor would they look with equanimity on a greater U.S.A. role in the development of these African states. This means that serious differences which could divide the West may lay ahead.

21. While the issue is not quite as clear-cut as London's telegram suggests, the fact remains that developments relating to association with the EEC reflect some of the stresses which Britain's application was expected to put on the Commonwealth relationship, and raises basic issues which, it seems to us, should appropriately be discussed by Commonwealth governments collectively at the proposed Commonwealth Prime Ministers' meeting in September.

MR. MACMILLAN'S VISIT

The following is a summary on current thinking on UK-EEC.

2. Australians see merit in stronger more integrated Europe through the association of UK with the Common Market. However, to Australia this association should not repeat not result in a disruption or weakening of the Commonwealth.

3. Australians feel that UK will associate with EEC but they will press very strongly for arrangements to protect Australian commercial interests. These have been built up through a long period of close trading relations and important sectors of Australian agricultural production are dependent upon this trade. Disruption of (groups missing) tariff quotas. For manufactures, Australia believes that the broad range of preferences may not repeat not be continuable and is therefore seeking special arrangements for individual products such as “basket quota system” whereby groups of manufactures would be importable under long term preferences based upon most trade and allowing for a growth factor.

4. Australians have not repeat not yet given intensive consideration to work of Commonwealth Prime Ministers’ Conference. However they assume UK will work towards the development of a package offer for presentation at the conference and that although this may be further negotiable the scope for obtaining major additional concessions from the Six may be limited. It appears to Australians that the work of the conference will be mainly to deal with a potential UK-EEC relationship which might not repeat not be subject to major alterations.

BRITAIN AND EEC – DEPUTIES’ REPORT TO MINISTERS

We received our copy of Deputies’ report at beginning of last week and were told that copies for Ottawa were given Canada House at same time.

2. The report does not repeat not add much to what we have already reported on progress of negotiations. It has however, the merit of summarising the positions of both parties on all the issues examined so far. Seven main areas are discussed: (1) general level of CET; (2) nil tariff requests; (3) manufactures from Australia, Canada and New Zealand; (4) India, Pakistan, Ceylon and Hong Kong; (5) association; (6) agriculture; (7) Economic Union matters. Following is full text of sections 1, 2 and 3.

3.I. GENERAL LEVEL OF COMMON CUSTOMS TARIFF

British delegation accept in principle, for the enlarged Community, Common Customs Tariff as it results from Dillon negotiations subject to exceptions concerning their requests for zero duties and the level of duties for agricultural and tropical products. They reserve however possibility of requesting, at the end of those negotiations, to examine with the Six whether the resulting level of tariff is appropriate for enlarged Community or whether further downwards adjustments within the limit of the 20% foreseen in these negotiations may not repeat not be necessary (but in any case no repeat no request for reincreases).

The Six took note of this British position, but pointed out that they considered the present Common Customs Tariff to be compatible with the provisions of GATT and that, given the higher general level of British tariff, British membership should not repeat not alter situation.

II. PRODUCTS FOR WHICH BRITISH DELEGATION HAVE REQUESTED A ZERO DUTY

(a) British Position

1. British delegation have proposed a zero duty in Common Customs Tariff for: (a) 27 industrial products (chiefly raw materials and manufactured products, including particularly aluminum, lead, zinc, newsprint and wood pulp), representing about 10% of British imports of industrial products from Commonwealth and indeed from all sources; (b) 11 processed and other miscellaneous foodstuffs.

2. In support of their request, British delegation have emphasized that entry of UK into Community will considerably alter balance of economic factors on the basis of which the Six decided upon the present duties for these products. UK is generally a large consumer but a small producer of the products and has been traditionally dependent on imports for her supplies.

The imposition of a duty would increase prices to consumers (particularly in the case of certain foodstuffs) or to the using industries in UK. The latter would thus be in danger of finding themselves at a competitive disadvantage compared with the industries of Community which would have (group corrupt) national sources of supply. Finally, for almost all the products there is a Commonwealth interest, often very important.

(b) The Position of the Six

During course of a first examination, the Six have indicated that, in general, Community is a large producer of these products and that duties in the Common Customs Tariff are intended to secure for existing industries conditions of production compatible with economic and social needs at same time as making possible continuity of investment. On other hand the level of duties does not repeat not seem to them such as to injure imports from other countries. For some products there are special reasons for protection – different for different products – and particularly arising from:

- The need to compensate for the higher costs of energy in Community than in the chief competing countries (Canada, USA) in the case of, for example, aluminum, ferro-alloys, corundum, silicon carbide and calcium carbide;
- The need to ensure to certain processing industries regular supplies of raw materials in competitive conditions similar to those existing in other countries where, as a result of tariff protection, the high prices of the processed products make it possible for the industries to pay high prices for their raw materials (e.g. zinc, and lead ores).

The Six also stated that they did not repeat not see why the using industries of UK should find themselves in an unfavourable competitive position in Common Market compared with industries of other member states. The removal of obstacles to trade within Common Market, the establishment of a Common Customs Tariff and the application of rules of competition have indeed among their objectives to ensure fairness in conditions of supply. Finally, it was emphasized that some of British requests for zero duties should be considered in connection with applications for membership or association which had been made or were likely to be made (Scandinavian countries: newsprint, wood pulp, aluminum, ferro-alloys), or with existing agreements (Greece: rosin, etc.).

(c) State of Negotiations

The study of the processed and other miscellaneous foodstuffs seemed difficult apart from that of agricultural problems. Their examination was therefore postponed.

For the industrial products, the Six proposed to the British delegation that a working group should undertake a first study of solutions to which there might be recourse in order to reconcile British interests and those of the Six, and that this should be done on the basis of the solutions existing in the framework of Treaty of Rome and by examining the possible solutions by products or groups of products.

British delegation have expressed the view that there should be more precise reactions from committee before the working group could usefully embark on new work. Committee of Deputies therefore decided to resume examination of questions involved at a subsequent meeting.

III. MANUFACTURED PRODUCTS IMPORTED FROM AUSTRALIA, CANADA AND NEW ZEALAND

(a) British Position

1. UK asks for the maintenance, wherever possible, of existing commercial arrangements for all industrial products from these three countries, as well as for most processed and other miscellaneous foodstuffs. Nevertheless UK recognizes that indefinite and unlimited continuation of free entry for all industrial products may not repeat not be regarded as compatible with the development of a Common Market and are willing to discuss ways of reconciling these two conflicting considerations. (See paragraph 39 of Mr. Heath's statements.)

2. In support of her request, UK has drawn attention to the political importance of maintaining Commonwealth links. The application of Common Customs Tariff to these products might give rise to difficulties in connection with the patterns of trade with possible repercussions on the industrial development of countries, and possibly giving rise to particular problems in certain regions. Moreover, total exports of the products in question are very small in comparison with the enlarged Community's total imports of same products. The latter would therefore be in a position to absorb these imports without insurmountable difficulties.

(b) The Position of the Six

The Six explained that, for reasons of principle and given the practical consequences (especially, diversions of trade, distortions of competition, origin problems, etc. . . .), it did not repeat not seem to them possible to contemplate a system which would be an exception to the application of Common Customs Tariff without limit as to time or quantity. Furthermore, they did not repeat not think that the progressive application of Common Customs Tariff would be likely to lead to a reduction in these countries' exports to enlarged Community. In this connection, the Six pointed out that a large proportion of the exports of the products in question in any case go to third countries, in spite of tariff protection higher than that of Common Customs Tariff.

(c) State of Negotiations

1. In view of the position of the Six, British delegation declared themselves ready to accept that a study be made of the problems which would arise on the hypothesis of the progressive application of Common Customs Tariff to products in question, and of the various ways and means of dealing with these difficulties, provided that:

- This procedure be considered as a working hypothesis without prejudice to the final decision whether or not repeat not Common Customs Tariff should be applied to the exports of manufactures from these countries;
- Not repeat not only the economic aspects of problem, but also the political and social aspects be taken into consideration in this study.

2. The study took the form in the first place, of an analysis of statistical and tariff data relating to products. The method of work used was to draw up, as an initial step, a list of products of which exports to UK are not repeat not less than 0.01% of the total exports of country in question and not repeat not less than 20% of their total exports of the product itself. The list does not repeat not take into account products for which Common Customs Tariff has a zero duty nor products covered by ECSC Treaty. This method of work was considered both by British Delegation and by the Six as a first approach. British delegation, on their side, considered that the method of selection did not repeat not take account of a number of important economic, social and political factors. In this connection they have already asked for certain products to be added to the list. Delegations of the Six on their side have reserved the possibility of re-examining lists of products established by the procedure explained above in order to satisfy themselves that the presumption of difficulties if Common Customs Tariff were applied pure and simple was sufficiently great to justify a special solution at the start. This method of work has led to the drawing up of a list of:

- 35 items out of 387 (the original list) for Canada, representing 53% of this country's exports to UK of the products on the original list;
- 16 items out of 266 (the original list) for Australia, representing 18% of this country's exports to UK of the products on original list;
- 6 items out of 30 (the original list) for New Zealand, representing 5.5% of this country's exports to UK of the products on the original list.

3. As regards study of possible solutions to meet difficulties which might face these countries' exports, the Six proposed to British delegation that a preliminary exploratory study should be made of the solutions existing within the framework of Treaty of Rome on the basis of an examination by products or groups of products. In this connection, the Six expounded to British delegation solutions theoretically possible within the framework of Treaty of Rome and also the order of preference which should be accorded to them. Possibility of having recourse, if necessary, to composite solutions combining elements of these various solutions was also mentioned.

As in the case of zero duties, British delegation have expressed the view that there should be more precise reactions from committee before working group could usefully embark on new work. Committee of Deputies therefore decided to resume examination of questions involved at a subsequent meeting.

4. Summary of rest of report follows in separate message.†

[Ottawa], April 24, 1962

BRITAIN AND THE EEC: A NEW CANADIAN APPROACH

The Objective

The Canadian interests will obviously be best served from a globally negotiated solution to compensate for any losses in the British market. If announcement of Britain's entry could coincide with some agreed proposals related to a new round of tariff negotiations, much of the uncertainty about the long-term arrangements for Canada covering industrial products and raw materials would be removed. It would not compensate for any change in our terms of access to the British market for agriculture but it is now apparent that any permanent solution on this will have to be worked out separately on a global basis.

This approach would offer a constructive alternative to the present and "deterrent" policy and avoid an impending collision in U.K.-Canadian relations and would hold out some hope for a fruitful "Commonwealth approach."

The Tactics

Action at an early date would be required and the cooperation of Britain and the United States in the first instance, and the Six eventually, would be necessary. It would mean that the British would have to change their timetable to some extent to relate the date of their actual entry to the conclusion of a successful new round of tariff negotiations. It would also mean that President Kennedy must obtain from Congress generally the type of authority he is requesting and that he uses it effectively.

It may, therefore, be important for an initiative of this nature to be undertaken at the earliest possible date before Congress takes a final decision on the President's trade proposals.<sup>21</sup> It might, therefore, be discussed by the Prime Minister during the Macmillan visit.

The advantages for Canada are clear. What would be the likely reaction of the main interested countries?

Britain

By offering some presentable and other safe-guards for Commonwealth interests, it should remove some of the domestic criticism of British entry. It would delay actual British entry (although they could sign an agreement and possibly a separate protocol concerning tariff negotiations at a reasonably early date). It would remove the possibility of a Commonwealth veto at the Conference in September. It would shift part of the onus for looking after Commonwealth interests (including the tropical producers) to the United States and the Six.

For these reasons the proposal on balance might be attractive to Britain.

United States

It would hold out for United States the prospect for British entry into the Six in an atmosphere of cooperation. On the other hand, they could not expect that Commonwealth preference would automatically fall into their lap. The United States would have to negotiate with the Six as though they were in fact the Seven, in order to meet the 80 per cent requirements, etc., in the Kennedy proposals. Although the United States have not fully taken this point on board, it could also avoid a deterioration of Canada-U.S.A. relations.

France

If France wanted to keep the British out, this plan is not attractive. While it holds out some of the benefits of the industrial free trade area discussed in recent messages from Paris,† it presumes British entry as a full entry into the common market. If France is generally opposed to British entry at all costs, this should be brought to the surface; they would not be free to play the Commonwealth off against Britain in the hopes of keeping Britain out. It could be argued in these circumstances that it would be more difficult for France to say no to British entry.

The Neutrals

The extent to which this solves the problem of the neutrals will depend on whether they attach importance to free entry into the Six. If they are satisfied with the benefits relating from the tariff negotiations it could provide a way out and certainly solve Britain's awkward dilemma with that group of countries.

The Commonwealth Conference

If the above proposal were saleable it could be endorsed at the Commonwealth Conference. It would provide a theme for the Conference and avoid the possibility of a further division within the Commonwealth. The close cooperation involved between Britain, United States and Canada should help to rebuild some of the bridges that are tottering.

MR. MACMILLAN'S VISIT: BRITAIN AND EEC

Pakistan Government's attitude to Britain's negotiations which has undergone no repeat no substantial change since Thorneycroft's visit (see our telegram 345 July 21†), is summarized in immediately following telegram.† Following are recent developments.

2. When Commercial Secretary Lancaster and I saw Commerce Secretary Osman Ali last week he confirmed our impression that there is somewhat increased concern at official level and among businessmen on grounds that as Ali said there does not repeat not now seem to be a prospect of any concessions to safeguard Pakistan's exports except in transitional period. He appeared to attribute this situation as much to lack of sufficient British pressure for concessions as to EEC's reluctance to grant them. He acknowledged there are difficulties in arguing for safeguards for Pakistan since main adverse effect of British decision to join EEC would be loss of potential markets in Britain for Pakistan's developing industry rather than loss of present markets.

3. Ali volunteered information he was preparing recommendations regarding reply to be sent to Mr. Macmillan's proposal of a September 10 meeting. While he said he was not repeat not sure what his recommendations would be he did seem to feel that proposed discussion in September would be anti-climactic since he believed Britain would know what they could and would do by some time in July or August (even though they would refrain from announcing any decision before meeting).

4. This fits with remark of an officer of British mission over the weekend that while he was confident President's reply would be favourable in view of his basic acceptance from the outset of the idea of Britain joining EEC he understood that Pakistani officials were recommending to President that September 10 would be too late since Britain would have made up its mind by then.

5. Local press reported April 18, and British Deputy High Commissioner has confirmed to Moore, that President replied April 16 to Macmillan accepting his proposal of meeting starting September 10 and his assurance that Britain would take account of Pakistan's interests in negotiations. He called reply "helpful" and satisfactory and said it contained no repeat no reservations or conditions of any kind. This again demonstrated gap in thinking on this question between President and his principal ministers on one hand and officials concerned on other.

6. A few days ago Pakistan made good its long standing plan to contribute directly to Brussels discussions by deciding to accredit the able Mohammad Ayub, who will continue as ambassador to Bonn, to EEC Secretariat. He will probably be assisted in Brussels by an experienced officer of High Commission in London.

INITIAL CALL ON ACTING SECRETARY OF STATE BALL

In the absence of Secretary Rusk who is attending a series of meetings in connection with CENTO, the NATO Ministerial Meetings, and ANZUS, I paid my initial call yesterday afternoon on the Acting Secretary, George Ball, and left with him copies of the letter of credence, Mr. Heeney's letter of recall and the text of the proposed remarks to be left with the President on presentation of the letter of credence.

2. Apart from these formalities and a brief reference to the recent exchanges on Berlin and Germany between the Secretary and the new Soviet Ambassador, on which we are receiving reports both local and through the NATO Council in Paris, it was clear that Ball's main preoccupation, particularly in the immediate wake of the visit of Prime Minister Macmillan, was with the problems arising out of UK negotiations on entry into the Common Market and their implications both for Canada and USA.

3. It was helpful to have received promptly the text of the communiqué issued after the Prime Minister's talks with Mr. Macmillan in Ottawa and I left copies of the text with Ball.<sup>22</sup> In doing so I emphasized in particular those portions of the communiqué which referred to the great importance which we attached to safeguarding Canadian and Commonwealth interests in these negotiations, and the assurances which had been given to this effect by the British Prime Minister.

4. Ball referred to Mr. Macmillan's talks in Washington and said that the British Prime Minister had spoken in the strongest terms in emphasizing the importance attached to Commonwealth interests by UK Government.<sup>23</sup>

5. Ball went on to discuss in rather general terms the substance of the USA position on the subject of Britain-EEC relationship. He stressed that the USA understood the special problems facing the Commonwealth and the need for transitional arrangements pending the development of world wide solution. Referring to the field of temperate agriculture he then made a point of saying that with the entry of UK into EEC an increased share of the British market for wheat and grains would probably be taken by suppliers within the EEC and that outside suppliers would be at some disadvantage. He thought the problems raised with respect to wheat should be treated on a global basis in a way which would take account of the interests of all countries affected rather than by creating new preferential arrangements. He made a distinction between certain other grains and wheat, pointing out that with respect to wheat there were no repeat no

Commonwealth preferences in UK market and that all suppliers were currently on an equal footing. From Ball's comments with regard to wheat exports, it seems clear that USA authorities are concerned about any possibility which would lead towards a preferential position for Commonwealth wheat in UK or in the EEC market as a whole. Ball indicated that UK membership in EEC would in any event put USA into the position of a residual supplier of wheat to that whole area and that if, in addition, new preferences were created USA would be left in an even worse position and USA trade interests would be seriously affected.

6. I took the opportunity in this preliminary talk to stress again the importance which we attach to the special trade links within the Commonwealth. I pointed out that while we understood that USA trade interests would also be affected by UK entry into EEC, Canada was in a far more vulnerable position because of the relatively greater importance of our trade with UK and of the special relationships that have been built up. I suggested that these trade and economic links would naturally take on added importance if the political and other relationships among Commonwealth countries were modified as a result of UK membership in EEC. I also indicated that there was a strong feeling in Canada that USA authorities did not repeat not fully appreciate the nature of our interest in exports of manufactured goods to UK. While our actual trade in this field was relatively small, there was great potential for expansion and development. The main issue was not repeat not only the present composition and the wide range of our trade but also the preferential terms and historic access we had long maintained in UK market. Ball said that he was aware of this situation, and had found the discussion at the Ministerial Committee Meeting in Ottawa in January<sup>24</sup> particularly useful in this regard. He looked forward to further exchanges with us in this important area as the pace of negotiations in Brussels is increased in the weeks ahead.

[Ottawa], May 15, 1962

BRITAIN AND THE SIX

The main event of the last two weeks in the Brussels negotiations was the meeting of Ministers of May 11 and 12. Britain was anxious to ensure that, after seven months of exploratory talks, this meeting should mark the beginning of effective negotiations. The attached telegram no. 276 of May 13† from Brussels contains the account Mr. Heath gave of the meeting to Commonwealth representatives in Brussels.

2. According to this account, the British objective seems to have been met. The Six agreed to work towards the outline of a settlement by the summer. This should put some urgency in the discussions of the Deputy Heads of Delegation, who will now be developing possible solutions. The next meeting of Ministers has been set for May 29 and 30 and four days have been reserved at the end of June for ministerial meetings in the expectation that the broad terms of a settlement will then be available for discussion by Ministers.

3. The British seem to have taken a much firmer line in Brussels than they had so far; the atmosphere of the meeting is also reported to have been better than was generally expected. Whether the Six will now make serious concessions to Britain over its requests for special arrangements for the Commonwealth, however, remains to be seen.

4. The French have not yet given any indication of what their attitude will be in the crucial phase of the negotiations; you may have seen press reference to a statement allegedly made recently by Chancellor Adenauer in Berlin to the effect that the Six could not accept the entry of Britain with its Commonwealth commitments into the Common Market. Although strong denials have been issued by the German Foreign Office such a statement by the Chancellor is somewhat puzzling. The Benelux countries, on the other hand, are clearly on the record in favour of British membership – so is Italy, though perhaps to a lesser degree.

5. Discussions at the most recent meeting of the Deputy Heads of Delegation, which dealt with manufactures from developed Commonwealth countries, are also of interest as evidence of the sharp questioning from the Six to which the British delegation in Brussels is subjected. The attached telegram no. 275 of May 11† from Brussels contains an account of these discussions. Britain has now tabled, in addition to its request for free entry into the Common Market for certain industrial materials, papers on transitional arrangements for specific agricultural commodities (including cereals), a draft formula for comparable outlets (longterm agricultural arrangements) and proposals for manufactures from Canada, Australia and New Zealand. So far, the response of the Six has been limited to tentative comments and requests for clarification.

6. Mr. McEwen, on his return from Europe, and more recently during a visit of Secretary Rusk to Australia, is reported to have made strong public statements taking issue with the U.S. view that Commonwealth preferences should not be perpetuated. Recalling Britain's assurance not to become a member of the Common Market on terms seriously harmful to the Commonwealth, he stressed that American opposition to Commonwealth preferences could make it virtually impossible for Britain to join.<sup>25</sup>

BRITISH-EEC NEGOTIATIONS: PROPOSALS RE NIL DUTIES
FOR INDUSTRIAL PRODUCTS

In view of the major importance of basic industrial materials in our sales to the British market, the new British approach regarding possible solutions for these products is considered sufficiently important for you to put our views with respect to this development to the British at ministerial level. In the circumstances, it would be appropriate for you to pass comments to the British in the form of a note along the following lines:

I refer to proposals with respect to the kind of possible solutions that the British negotiators are contemplating discussing with the EEC for the safeguarding of Commonwealth interests with respect to basic industrial materials.

The Canadian Government is seriously concerned at the implications of these developments for the access of important Canadian exports to the British market. I understand that for many years free entry for industrial raw materials, particularly from Commonwealth countries, has been an important element in Britain's industrial position. Equally, for Commonwealth countries the supplying of basic materials to meet the needs of Britain's industries has been a key feature of Commonwealth trade for many years. The Canadian Government is confident that as a matter of common interest the British Government would not be prepared to contemplate the imposition of tariff barriers against imports of industrial materials.

In this situation it would be a matter of serious regret to the Canadian Government were the British Government to contemplate yielding to protectionist pressures in Europe at the expense of the important trading interests of Commonwealth countries.

On the basis of these considerations Canada, and we assume the British Government, attaches major importance to the nil tariff proposals with respect to industrial materials. The alternative proposals listed in the British message could not be considered as effectively safeguarding essential Commonwealth interests. Further, it is a matter of serious concern to note that the British Government is prepared to consider interim arrangements which are clearly designed to find accommodation for additional European countries which may accede to or seek association status and leave arrangements for the trade of Commonwealth countries to be considered later as a residual problem.

BRITISH-EEC NEGOTIATIONS: NIL DUTIES

At seven o'clock this evening following letter was received from Sandys in response to my letter sent on May 22 to the Lord Privy Seal† in accordance with instructions your reference telegram: "I am replying to your letter May 22 to the Lord Privy Seal about the handling in Brussels negotiations of our 'nil duties' requests on aluminium and other industrial raw materials (CRO telegram No. 81 May 14).

We recognise the importance which Canadian Government attach to the trade in these products which has developed over the years to the mutual benefit of Canada and Britain, and there is no repeat no question of our regarding it as a subsidiary interest. But it is not repeat not practicable for us to refuse to discuss such suggestions as the Six may make as alternatives to our own proposals in this sector of the negotiations, or to refuse to consider any solution short of our full initial proposals. In forming a view on any such counter-proposals, and in framing instructions to our delegation, it would have been helpful to have your government's views on the alternatives in the reference telegram, with respect to each item which concerns Canada.

If, on further consideration, Canadian Government felt able to send us some comments of this nature, we should still find them valuable, while recognising your strong preference for nil duties.

The last sentence of your letter is, I think, based on a misunderstanding. To reduce Canada to being a residual supplier, after Norwegian and Swedish interests had been taken care of, is the last thing that we envisage, and I do not repeat not think that it is in the mind of the Six. But they take the view that until the position of these two countries vis-à-vis EEC is clearer, the Six will have difficulty in considering the most suitable form of tariff arrangement on products from Norway and Sweden.

Meanwhile, Heath has explained to you at our meeting on June 1 the position reached at the Ministerial Meeting in Brussels on May 29 and he explained it also to Mr. Pierce in Brussels before returning to London."

U.K./E.E.C. NEGOTIATIONS

I have prepared the attached draft paper for possible consideration at next Tuesday's meeting. It is an attempt to draw a few threads together and to suggest some elements of future direction. It is not a report on our recent discussions in London, Brussels, Paris and Washington, but is intended to take account of some of the impressions we gathered there.

I shall be out of town on Monday, but propose to revise this paper on Sunday. Any quick comments or reaction you can pass on to me before then will be very welcome.

MEMORANDUM FOR MINISTERS ON BRITISH/EEC NEGOTIATIONS

Background

In July of last year, after discussions with Mr. Duncan Sandys which revealed deep differences of opinion concerning the potential advantages and disadvantages of British membership in the European Economic Community, Canadian Ministers expressed grave concern about possible U.K. negotiations with the EEC and about the political and economic effects of British membership on Canada and the Commonwealth as a whole. Following the British decision to negotiate, Commonwealth countries collectively registered their apprehensions at the Accra Conference. In September, Canadian officials, after discussions in London, reported that the measures being contemplated by the United Kingdom to safeguard essential Commonwealth interests, even in the unlikely event they proved fully acceptable to the EEC, would fail to protect, or provide acceptable alternatives to, Canada's present position in the United Kingdom market.

Since their inception, Britain has kept Canada closely informed of the course of the negotiations. The general position as well as certain particular problems have been discussed at Ministerial level, notably during the visits to Ottawa of Prime Minister Macmillan and Mr. Heath. Following the January meeting with the Lord Privy Seal, additional Canadian officials were sent to Brussels for the period of the negotiations. Through our officers in Brussels and London, the British authorities have been given complete information on aspects of Canadian trade interest relevant to the negotiations. In the course of cooperation with the British negotiators no commitments have been entered into and the establishment of priorities within Canadian trade interest in the U.K. market has been avoided. The technical information and comment provided have, however, permitted the British negotiators to form an intelligent appreciation of the nature and character and importance of the different elements in our trade. As various proposals have come forward, officials have indicated where such solutions would fall short of safeguarding Canada's present position in the British market. The British have been encouraged to seek or stand firm on arrangements which would do so.

The Current Situation

A separate paper† describes in detail the state of the negotiations with respect to main products of interest to Canada. In summary, a provisional agreement has been reached for manufactured goods which, while providing for some delay in the application of the common tariffs against any goods entering the U.K. market, would involve the full application of the common tariffs by 1970 and thus the extinction of Canadian preferences and free entry. For industrial raw materials not already free in the common tariff, including aluminum, lead and zinc, pulp and newsprint, the Six have not agreed to the British request for the elimination of duty except for two relatively minor items. For pulp it seems likely, however, that an unlimited duty free quota will be offered. For newsprint restrictive quota solutions are being considered. For aluminum some slight reduction may eventually be offered in the common tariff; for lead and zinc an offer may be made to suspend the duty when prices are firm and protection of domestic industry is not really required. Apart from pulp, solutions along these lines would fall far short of being equivalent to duty free access and would be regarded as highly unsatisfactory by the large Canadian industries concerned. Up to now they have had free and, in some cases, preferential entry to the U.K. market.

For cereals, including wheat where there is no preference, the British have asked for "comparable opportunities of outlets" in the enlarged Community to safeguard sales up to traditional volumes. This would be accomplished by avoidance of restrictions, a preference on the variable levy, or sharing of the intra-Community preference, depending on the cereal involved. In theory, this system would go on past the transitional period and until subsumed in any world-wide commodity arrangements that might be made in due course. This proposal was unacceptable to the Six who however have not yet agreed to a counter-proposal. They are considering suggesting transitional arrangements whereby any preferences in this sector would be progressively narrowed, and combined with an offer to negotiate world-wide non-discriminatory commodity arrangements at an early date. The British are showing some interest in this kind of approach which would of course leave the eventual position of our grain in considerable uncertainty.

For apples, the British have proposed that present U.K. global quota arrangements be continued for five years. Thereafter the common tariff and EEC quality standard would apply to Canadian apples. They would be exempted, however, from any minimum price scheme or quantitative restrictions up to a specified amount related to previous sales. For processed and miscellaneous food and agricultural products, the United Kingdom has requested the removal of EEC duties on canned fresh and frozen salmon, canned lobster and flour and fish meals. For certain other items of interest, reductions have been proposed in the Common Tariff. For such items and all others in this sector, free or preferential quotas have been proposed for Commonwealth suppliers without specific terminal date. While the Six have not yet given detailed reactions to these proposals, they are not prepared to agree to special arrangements going beyond the transitional period.

Outlook

It is clear that the outlook for the maintenance of our terms of entry to the United Kingdom market or outlets comparable thereto is most discouraging. Few of the proposals for duty free entry seem likely to survive the negotiations. It appears that otherwise the most that will prove negotiable will be some slight reductions in the C.T., a few unlimited quotas, some restricted quotas and for the rest transitional arrangements only, and for grains the uncertain prospect of successful negotiation of new world-wide arrangements. In short, free entry, except where already provided in the common tariff, and Canada's preferences in the U.K. market would all have disappeared by the end of the transitional period in 1970. The prospect is even less encouraging when it is remembered that the Six are unlikely to make concessions of importance to the Americans without being assured of payment in the U.S. tariff and that the Six are nervous about the further demands which may be made on them by Third Countries in the course of Article XXIV:6 negotiations after U.K. accession. A factor which further complicates the situation is the probable demand of the Six that by the end of the transitional period the U.K. either has relinquished or made arrangements to share its preferential access to the markets of other Commonwealth countries.

Given this outlook, can the negotiations succeed? The answer seems to be more political than economic. Germany, Italy and at least The Netherlands element in Benelux are generally in favour of British membership. But Germany has proven unwilling under Adenauer to split with France on really important issues. Thus France, and the enigmatic de Gaulle, hold the key to the puzzle. Although certain elements in France now favour Britain's entry (Monnet and even the modern Patronal), it seems that the French leadership would have preferred that the U.K. had not applied, or at least had delayed its application, until the Community was more securely established and France had further entrenched its intellectual command over Community thinking. However, the French Government is apparently not prepared politically to veto the British application or to accept blame for failure of the negotiations. The position therefore appears to be that the negotiations in Brussels can succeed if the British are prepared to bring their proposals for special treatment within the framework of the Treaty of Rome or to put it more simply if France and the Community are required to move only slightly from the continental position expressed in the Treaty and the British do the compromising. The British Government's desire to secure membership, which appears to be more political than economic in the sense of hoping to secure or share the leadership of Europe in world affairs and the domestic impossibility for Macmillan of reporting failure, makes steady erosion of the British position more or less inevitable and the eventual success of the negotiations, in the sense of an agreement which the two sides could report back to their respective countries.

Whether or not Britain will become a member of the Community is another and different question.

Assuming that a deal can be struck in Brussels because the British must have a deal, membership will turn on whether or not the terms are acceptable to the British Parliament. This will no doubt depend a good deal on party prospects and the state of public opinion. In this connection, the treatment of Commonwealth problems could be an important, and in certain circumstances a decisive, factor.

At present the Labour Party is uncommitted but divided; the Conservative Party is also divided but the overwhelming majority stands with Macmillan in favour of joining; the Liberal Party favours membership. Considering the historic nature of the decision Britain faces and the possibility that Labour could make it a prime domestic political issue, the meeting of Prime Ministers scheduled for September 10 assumes considerable importance.

At that Conference irrational and ill-considered opposition by the Commonwealth might well have the effect of consolidating British public and political opinion behind the Government's desire to join the Community. On the other hand, a sober and critical reaction to the effect that the arrangements which the British had been able to secure fell far short of safeguarding essential Commonwealth interests and that United Kingdom membership on such terms would so weaken the Commonwealth as to threaten the continuation of the association could conceivably be a critical factor in changing the balance of British opinion against the Government. Before taking public positions which could lead to this result, Commonwealth Governments, particularly leading members such as Australia, Canada and India would have to consider whether they are prepared to have the onus of failure of the United Kingdom to join Europe laid at their door by the pro-Europeans and how they would respond to the inevitable British requests that the Commonwealth should provide an economic alternative to Common Market membership by further opening its markets to British goods. The fact that there are good answers to such a request, in a multilateral attack on both European and U.S. trade barriers in course of which preferences could be negotiated away rather than thrown away, would ease but not remove the embarrassment of the situation.

The sort of situation described above assumes that the outline of a settlement and its main components will be known in advance of the Prime Ministers' meeting and so permit informed judgments to be made. There is an increasing possibility that this will not be the case, or at least that important elements in the package will still be obscure in early September. This may be especially so where important Canadian trade interests are concerned. Thus it is conceivable that final settlement of the question of zero rates of duty for aluminum, newsprint and lead and zinc will not have been reached by that time either because of items of concern to Scandinavia which will be negotiated later or because final positions on tariff questions of this importance tend to be deferred until the final hour of negotiations. In the case of wheat, it could easily be that the situation will be quite unclear, either because the British are still holding out for fairly firm undertakings about market access which the Six have not met or because the United Kingdom concedes that the problems could best be dealt with through international commodity arrangements, the content of which could not, of course, be known by September.

If this were the shape of events the tactical issues would be different and it might prove desirable to use the Prime Ministers' Conference to strengthen British determination and to build up a climate of international opinion which would help bring about greater willingness to meet Commonwealth difficulties on the part of the Six. United States influence could be of particular importance in a situation of this kind.

The balance of this paper considers various measures and possible courses of Canadian action for the near future, on the assumption that the Brussels negotiations will result in sacrifice of Canadian interests in the British market by the end of the transitional period and that future policy must be planned on the basis of United Kingdom membership in an enlarged European Community. An important implication of this conclusion is that during the transitional period and at its end, Canada would be free to terminate or substantially diminish United Kingdom preferences in this market and through negotiation use such adjustment (together with appropriate reduction in M.F.N. rates) to secure alternative trade outlets in the United States, the enlarged European Community, Japan and in the markets of other trading partners throughout the world.

POSSIBLE COURSES OF ACTION

(a) Representations in London and European Capitals

It is not recommended that Canadian Ministers be asked to visit London and European Capitals to emphasize Canadian concerns or to attempt to safeguard Canadian interests by introducing separate proposals in the negotiations. To do so would involve our Ministers in the stream of Brussels discussions at a time when compromises are being made many of which will involve prejudice to Canadian interests in the U.K. market. Moreover, judged by Australian experience, including visits by Mr. McKeown [sic] and Prime Minister Menzies, it is doubtful whether personal intervention by Canadian Ministers at this time would substantially influence the outcome of the discussions. A Ministerial visit could give rise to publicity and would make the Canadian case better known. However the publicity might not be all that favourable and in Canada might create expectations which in the event could not be fulfilled. In all the circumstances it would seem better for Ministers to reserve their intervention until the time of the Prime Ministers' meeting. In the meantime, the Canadian policy position could be conveyed through written communications delivered in London and officials could continue to work with the British negotiators in Brussels on the presently authorized basis. In this way pressure would be maintained on the British but public positions would not be taken which could limit Canadian freedom of manoeuvre at the Prime Ministers' meeting.

(b) Co-operation with the Americans

For a little while longer, it would seem tactically unwise to invite Ministers to consult their American colleagues. To do so could probably be regarded by the British as resignation to the inevitability of a "sell out" in Brussels<sup>26</sup> and of our need to find alternatives to our present trading arrangements. This could further weaken their already flabby position in the negotiations. When, however, the thinness of the maximum results obtainable in Brussels can be clearly seen (but when such results have been more or less secured), the Government will have to decide whether it wishes to carry its disappointment to the stage of outright opposition at the September meeting with a view to keeping the U.K. out and maintaining the preferential system with as little change as possible. If the Government decides that such a position would be historically incorrect or politically untenable then the moment will have come for quick repairing of our fences with the Americans.

? lessen the likelihood of a sell out [A.E. Ritchie?]

Vis-à-vis the Americans there are several points which in such circumstances could and should be made. First, the Americans must be brought to realize that our preferential position in the United Kingdom market is of genuine importance to us. They should be made to appreciate that because of the evolution of preferential trade, because of our greater dependence on exports, and because of the patterns of trade and economic activity which have grown up North of the Border, Canada has problems in relation to an enlarged EEC which are different in kind and more severe than those facing the United States. Thus, in addition to working together to achieve solutions to common problems, the United States should recognize and perhaps help to deal with difficulties, including loss of preference in the U.K. market, which we do not share with them. In particular the following objectives might be considered:

- (1) creation of a genuine awareness of Canada's special situation;
- (2) an American statement of willingness to help resolve residual problems faced by Canada as a result of the Brussels negotiations, including the intention to pay a fair price, as in the past, for any narrowing of British preferences in the Canadian market, as well as for reductions in the Canadian M.F.N. tariff;
- (3) recognition that Canada's interests as an economic producer of grain, whose farmers rely not on supported prices, but on the returns which can be earned in world markets, should not be prejudiced in any world-wide commodity arrangements which may be contemplated;
- (4) recognition that Commonwealth countries other than the U.K. may wish to maintain preferential arrangements between them even if U.K. preferences disappear;
- (5) agreement to work closely together to secure improved access to the enlarged EEC market for competitive agricultural exports.

At the same time or at a very early date, the Canadian Government should emphasize its support for and willingness to participate in the next "Kennedy" round of tariff negotiations, subject to procedures and coverage being worked out which would permit a balanced negotiation from the Canadian point of view. In this regard, it would seem that once the "Kennedy" authority is secured, interdepartmental machinery, and possibly special liaison with industry, should be set up to examine and identify the areas of the Canadian tariff which should be regarded as candidates for negotiations, given the need for greater efficiency in some sectors of Canadian industry and the various possibilities for expansion opened up by the new U.S. legislation, including progressive movement to free trade amongst most industrialized countries for certain industrial sectors. In this general context, it would be desirable to consider ways and means whereby areas which may have been excluded from negotiations under authority obtained from Congress, for example raw materials, could be brought within the framework of negotiations through administrative interpretation or through additional legislation at the next session of Congress.

Co-operation with Commonwealth Countries other than the United Kingdom

Studies should be put in hand or completed concerning the value to Canada of continued exchange of preferences with Commonwealth countries other than the United Kingdom. We should be ready to indicate a position on this subject at the Prime Ministers' meeting in September.

Commodity Co-operation

During the summer, we should re-examine the areas in which proposals are current for new or intensified commodity co-operation (wheat, other cereals, lead and zinc). We should examine the fundamental nature of our commercial interests in such products or materials in the changing world environment. If it is found that world trade and Canadian interests would be better served by new or amended commodity agreements, we should urgently frame a Canadian position and thereafter take an active part in the formulation of thinking about the content of any agreements in respect of which we would have an important supplier or consumer interest.

COMMON MARKET NEGOTIATIONS: REVISED BRITISH PROPOSALS ON WHEAT AND FLOUR

The British Delegation have strongly advised that we cannot hope to obtain assured rights of access for Commonwealth wheat in excess of quantities related to imports into Britain as distinct from the enlarged Community as a whole. The same applies to coarse grains and other cereal products. The Delegation's advice accordingly is that we should not press our earlier proposal for assured access into the whole Community for quantities traditionally imported into the enlarged Community as a whole – we put this forward in the belief that our proposal would thus appear more “Community-minded.”

2. British Ministers have considered this advice and have concluded that in fact assured rights of access to Britain alone for the transitional period together with the ability to compete in Britain on terms that are fair in comparison with those for Community suppliers would provide for Canadian wheat a safeguard as good as that now enjoyed in Britain.

3. Canadian longer term interests will of course have to be protected as part of the arrangements we are seeking for the post-transitional period for temperate foodstuffs in general.

4. We therefore have it in mind to put to the Six a proposal that for the transitional period Canadian wheat should have assured rights of entry into the British market for 2.25 million metric tons of wheat and flour (in terms of wheat equivalent) i.e. the average quantity for the three years 1958/59 to 1960/61.

5. We shall of course maintain our proposal for the retention of the benefit of the Commonwealth preference on flour.

6. We originally proposed to the Six that the benefit of the intra-Community preference should be extended both to Canada and to Australia in respect of wheat. The Six have however, emphasised that they are not prepared to consider any arrangements in this field which would introduce any elements of “new preference” for Commonwealth suppliers. It is probable too that our original proposals, if maintained, would come under attack by other third country suppliers such as the U.S.A. and the Argentine. If we could secure the Six's agreement to eliminating the intra-Community preference altogether in the British market, no difficulty would arise. But if we cannot secure this, we consider that we cannot continue to ask for the benefit of the intra-Community preference for Canadian wheat but must rather concentrate on reaching agreement about “access.” Since Canadian wheat is of a kind not produced in the Community and commands a substantial quality differential above European soft wheat, we do not believe that Canadian interests will be adversely affected to any significant extent by this change in our proposals.

7. An additional element in our proposals will be an attempt to secure a general undertaking in respect of remedial action in event of proven damage to Commonwealth exports of wheat to the enlarged Community as a result of the application of the common agricultural policy on similar lines to that recently given to the U.S.A. in the GATT tariff negotiations.

BRITAIN-EEC NEGOTIATIONS: WHEAT AND FLOUR

In view of major importance of wheat and flour in our sales to British market please convey our views with respect to new British approach regarding possible solutions for these products to Britain at ministerial level. It would be appropriate for you to pass comments in form of a note along the following lines:

2. On the instructions of my Government I am writing about the new proposals that our Government is contemplating discussing with EEC for the safeguarding of Commonwealth interests with respect to wheat and flour.

3. Canadian Government is seriously concerned at the implications of these proposals for sale of important traditional Canadian wheat exports to UK market. For many years, imports of wheat into UK from all sources have been free from duty and from quantitative limitations. In this situation it would be a matter of serious regret to Canadian Government were British Government to agree to introduction of measures which would endanger important trading interests of Commonwealth countries.

4. Although nothing short of free and unrestricted entry into UK market could fully safeguard Commonwealth interests the earlier British proposals for Commonwealth countries would have assured right of entry into enlarged Community for traditional quantities of Commonwealth cereals annually. This assurance took the form of an undertaking that no quantitative restrictions would be imposed for quantities specified and that no discrimination levy would be applied against hard wheat as compared with soft wheat. There were also safeguards which broadly ensured that Canada would have opportunity to sell wheat in enlarged Community market on terms which did not repeat not involve a reduction in Canadian sales or in prices realized compared with what Canada might reasonably have expected if Britain remained outside Community. UK also proposed that levy on Canadian wheat be abated by amount of intra-Community preference in respect of imports into UK and for coarse grains by the amount of Commonwealth preference.

5. With regard to the latest British proposal which is limited to UK market foregoing assurances have been largely omitted. Accordingly current British proposal would result in still further erosion of Canada's position even in UK market.

6. While need for some longer term arrangements is recognized there is no assurance as to kind of arrangement which might be worked out. As indicated in a message from Mr. Green to Mr. Sandys on March 9, † before arrangements are set for transitional period there should be a clear indication of content of longer term arrangements. This has become all the more important as proposals for transitional period have become progressively weakened.

7. Canadian Government presses British Government to demand proposals which would safeguard Canadian interests.

CONFIDENTIAL

London, July 18, 1962

My dear Lord Privy Seal,

I am writing about the most recent proposals that the British Government has formulated for safeguarding Commonwealth interests in the United Kingdom market with respect to processed and other miscellaneous food and agricultural products.

I have been instructed by the Canadian Government to convey to you their comments, as follows:

Canadian exports of goods in this sector to the United Kingdom, which were in the vicinity of $20,000,000 in 1960, for the most part enter the United Kingdom free of duty and under preferential conditions. Earlier British proposals, although falling considerably short of fully safeguarding our position in the British market, nevertheless called for nil common external tariffs for items totalling $13,000,000 of this trade, and for duty reductions and preferential tariff quotas for the remaining items in this sector. Even in the event that the Community had accepted these earlier proposals in full, many Canadian exports to the United Kingdom in this sector would have been confronted not only with the loss of their preferential position, but with high tariffs and reduced opportunities for growth. Your Government's most recent proposals would result in an even greater erosion of our position for they would, at best, safeguard free entry for exports totalling only $8,000,000. For the remainder of the items our preferential and tariff-free position would largely disappear even before the end of the transitional period in 1970.

We are concerned over the way in which your proposals for these products have been progressively moving away from the safeguarding of our interests in the British market. In this sector the nil tariff list has now been reduced from the original ten to three items of interest to Canada, and even on these items your Government is apparently contemplating an alternative to duty-free entry.

The Canadian Government would hope that the British Government would even yet find it possible to press for proposals which would safeguard Canadian interests in these products.

Yours sincerely,

GEORGE DREW

CONFIDENTIAL

London, July 20, 1962

My dear Lord Privy Seal,

I understand that the British Government expects agreement to be reached by the Ministers in Brussels at the end of this month on arrangements for imports into Britain of several industrial materials for which a zero tariff has been requested. You will recall that on May 22nd, on instructions from the Canadian Government, I expressed serious concern at the implications of the alternative arrangements for the access of these important and traditional Canadian exports to the British market. You are also aware of our views on the unsatisfactory nature of developments in other sectors.

The Canadian Government has instructed me to say that while it appreciates the pressures on the British Government to consider alternative arrangements as indicated in Mr. Sandys' letter to me on June 12th, it does not see how anything short of continued unrestricted free entry for basic industrial materials into the British market could safeguard the important interests both of the Canadian Government and of the British Government with respect to trade in this sector. The Canadian Government hopes and expects, therefore, that the British Government will remain firm in the position which it has taken with the European Economic Community for nil tariffs in the sector of industrial materials.

Yours sincerely,

GEORGE DREW

[London], July 24, 1962

As Lord Amory told Mr. Diefenbaker on July 3rd, despite further forceful and repeated efforts at all levels, including meetings of both Deputies and Ministers, as well as by personal conversations in capitals, we have not been able to persuade the Six to accept our "comparable opportunity" formula as a basis for discussion. We have therefore been considering the best way of proceeding.

2. Signor Colombo, as Chairman of the conference, put forward counter proposals on May 28th and Commonwealth authorities were informed of these proposals. Since then, they have slightly improved on them in a further text which was tabled and given to your representatives in Brussels on July 20th.

3. In our view the best way of making progress will be to explore the possibility of building on the formula now presented by the Six and to try and improve it so as to enable us to achieve in a different form the real substance of our original proposals. We shall keep the latter on the table unless it becomes clear that an acceptable solution based on the proposals of the Six is within sight.

4. The approach of the Six recognizes and attempts to deal with three problems:

- (a) The approach to world-wide commodity agreements.
- (b) The problem of price and production policies within the E.E.C.
- (c) Transitional arrangements up to 1970.

5. As regards the first two of these, there is already considerable common ground. We have already accepted the desirability of working towards world-wide agreements over as wide a field as possible and as quickly as possible. The main point of disagreement is over the proper treatment of the question of "access" and we shall continue to press them to include a suitable reference to this aspect. The Six have also said that if worldwide agreements prove to be impracticable they would be prepared to consult with Commonwealth countries who were prepared to conclude such agreements.

6. If we are to secure our objective of outlets for Commonwealth temperate foodstuffs a great deal will depend on the price and production policies pursued by the Community. The Six are prepared to make fairly forthcoming statements about these policies particularly as regards cereals. This is all to the good. If we can ensure that the Community adopt the right price and production policies this will provide better assurances for the Commonwealth than any precise quantitative arrangements we may be able to negotiate and which may well break down if the Community's price and production policies are wrong. Further the undertakings about price and production policy would not be limited in time while any quantitative arrangements we could obtain certainly would be. Our objective therefore will be to secure that the undertaking will be as specific as possible and that it should be linked to the question of "access" as well as to other considerations. We also hope to persuade them to accept a formula which commits them to consultation with the Commonwealth if there is marked impairment of trade and also to taking appropriate remedial measures.

7. If we can reach a satisfactory agreement on these two general subjects then we have a sound foundation for protecting Commonwealth interests in the longer term. There remains the question of transitional arrangements on which the proposals of the Six are manifestly inadequate. As regards "access" our aim will continue to be to seek an understanding that we shall not be required to apply quantitative restrictions on Commonwealth exports of temperate foodstuffs until imports in any year have reached traditional levels.

8. As regards conditions of competition we have to recognize that it is the aim of the Community to be non-discriminatory as between third countries. We are being reluctantly forced to the conclusion that this means that there is virtually no prospect of retaining the existing Commonwealth preferences after the transitional period and that we shall probably have to accept that they should be phased out by 1970. During the transitional period however our aim is to retain as much of the preferences as possible. We shall aim also at securing as much of the benefit of the intra-Community preference as possible for Commonwealth countries against other third country suppliers. We shall also do our best to ensure that the intra-Community preference arrangements during the transitional period are not such as put Commonwealth exporters at a serious competitive disadvantage in the British market as compared with Community suppliers.

9. I am giving you the above outline so that you may know our present thinking about the prospects and possibilities. But we cannot determine now the precise terms of a possible solution. We propose therefore to keep in the closest touch with Commonwealth representatives in Brussels as the discussions develop.

U.K. NEGOTIATIONS FOR ENTRY INTO EUROPEAN COMMON MARKET;
COMMONWEALTH PRIME MINISTERS' CONFERENCE

20. The Prime Minister said he had received a personal letter from the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom commenting on the status of negotiations between the U.K. and the Six. The letter clearly implied that Mr. Macmillan was determined to lead the U.K. into membership in the Common Market, which he described as part of "a grand design for the unity of the free world."

He asked Ministers to send him statements of their views on the position Canada should take at the forthcoming Prime Ministers' Conference. How far should he go? Should he accept the invitation of the Prime Ministers of Australia and New Zealand to meet them before the Conference? Preliminary meetings between Prime Ministers to exchange opinions had been held in the past, and therefore should not be interpreted as implying any effort to combine against the U.K.

21. During the brief discussion some said that a Cabinet Committee under the chairmanship of Mr. Green was preparing a report on the proposed Canadian policy on this subject. Statements of view of individual Ministers would nevertheless be useful supplementary material for the consideration of the Prime Minister.

22. The Cabinet noted,

(a) that a report was being prepared by a Cabinet Committee on the policy that Canada should follow on the U.K. negotiations for possible entry into the European Common Market; and,

(b) the request of the Prime Minister that Ministers also send him individual statements of their views on the position he should take on the various aspects of this subject at the forthcoming conference of Commonwealth Prime Ministers, including the desirability or otherwise of preliminary meetings with Prime Ministers of other countries.

BRITAIN AND EEC

We reviewed most recent phase of Brussels negotiations with Jackling (Foreign Office) yesterday, with particular reference to French attitude and prospects of future developments.

2. Jackling seemed inclined to play down part played by French in bringing about adjournment of negotiations.<sup>27</sup> He also did not repeat not think that there was anything new or surprising in attitude French delegation had taken in Brussels. It was true that the present French Government probably would feel more comfortable in a Europe "à Six." This was not repeat not necessarily a feeling shared by all segments of French opinion nor, of course, was it shared by France's partners in EEC. In any case it was doubtful if French were really thinking of blocking British entry into EEC. Nor was it, strictly speaking, to the point to suggest that French were seeking to exact highest possible price for British accession which is line widely taken in British press. It was no repeat no secret that what French really would have liked was for Britain to have accepted Rome Treaty "as is." As it is, they are trying to make sure that terms of British accession will come as close as possible to letter of Rome Treaty, although negotiations have shown that there are limits beyond which French obviously cannot repeat not go and still hope to carry support of their partners.

3. If French were concerned not repeat not to have British accession upset balance reflected in Rome Treaty, they were even more concerned not repeat not to re-open provisions of CAP which were part – and from French point of view essential part – of that balance. This applied particularly to concept of quantitative assurances which French regard as, in a sense, obverse of quantitative restrictions and which had been main issue of contention with Germans. Jackling thought that French probably did not repeat not expect to make heavy inroads in British market, but they did want to be sure of being able to expand their agricultural exports in markets of present EEC members and, above all, they were opposed to any dilution of CAP as it stands. Jackling added that from a purely practical point of view French also had to bear in mind that treaty of UK accession would in due course have to be submitted to French Parliament for ratification, and that this meant that they could not repeat not afford to antagonize or alarm their own agricultural lobby.

4. Whatever may have happened at Brussels, Jackling did not repeat not accept judgement that adjournment of negotiations was likely to result in loss of valuable momentum or that next phase of negotiations might now “drag on inconclusively” as Guardian has surmised.<sup>28</sup> Although he conceded that adherence to a timetable had helped to carry negotiations forward – which is point Heath made to Commonwealth High Commissioners at their last meeting (see our telegram 2848 August 8†) – fact was that remaining outstanding issues (processed foods, nil tariffs, etc) were relatively simple and should not repeat not take too much time. In any case, British Government were committed to delay final action on their accession until it was possible to make judgment as to extent to which interests of their EFTA partners had been met, and some of these had not repeat not even begun to enter into formal negotiations with EEC. Moreover, it was reasonable to assume that both here and in EEC countries parliaments would want to look at treaties covering British accession to EEC, EURATOM and ECSC together, and there again negotiations with the other two communities had only just begun. All in all, therefore, Jackling was inclined to doubt if time was really going to be lost.

5. As far as French are concerned, we assume that Foreign Office’s tendency to play down allegations of French ill-will is designed as much as anything to avoid possible exacerbation of relations with French at this stage. As far as timetable is concerned, it stands to reason that British Government do not repeat not want to create impression that there is no repeat no longer any urgency in subsequent stages of their negotiations with EEC and in their consultations with Commonwealth Prime Ministers.

BRITISH – EEC NEGOTIATIONS

We called yesterday afternoon on Clappier (Economic Affairs Ministry) to review developments at the last Ministerial Meeting in Brussels at which he was present.

2. He was surprised, not repeat not that the meeting was unable to complete the “vue d’ensemble” that had been its objectives but that it had accomplished so much in a relatively short time. The progress made was substantial (agreement on associated territories and on arrangements for India, Pakistan and Ceylon and the broad outline of an agreement on temperate foodstuffs) particularly in comparison with what had been done up till then (agreement on the relatively minor issues of manufactures and the annual review for agriculture). It was now possible to see fairly clearly the sort of settlement that was negotiable and the negotiating limits on the issues still outstanding. On the most difficult problem of the negotiations (temperate foodstuffs) agreement had in fact been reached on all but one point (terms of access for third countries). If agreement could be reached on this point no repeat no great difficulties were foreseen for the other issues still to be tackled (the nil tariff list, British agriculture and the broad range of non-trade items covered under the Rome Treaty).

3. With respect to discussion of temperate foodstuffs during “la nuit blanche” of August 4-5,<sup>29</sup> which has been the subject of differing versions on both sides of the channel (our telegram 1062 August 10†) Clappier explained at some length his understanding of what took place. According to him a temporary impasse had already been reached on the question of terms of access before the proposal on financial regulations had come up for discussion. Heath had not repeat not been able to accept the draft on terms of access proposed by the Six; he had instead “taken note” of that draft and had proposed amendments to it which he considered essential to safeguard Commonwealth interests. The Six for their part had been unable to accept Heath’s amendments and had urged him to agree to their original draft. There the matter was left.

4. The ministers then took up the French proposal on financial regulations which according to Clappier had been formally agreed by the Six and submitted in writing three hours earlier. At this point Heath reserved his position, saying that the proposal required further study, and German and Dutch delegations, to the surprise of French, did the same.

5. Clappier argued that their financial proposal was a logical and necessary follow-up to the negotiations on agriculture, was clearly within the terms of Rome Treaty and should not repeat not have given rise to special difficulty. He claimed that it was the whole problem of temperate foodstuffs rather than this particular proposal that was too difficult to settle in the time remaining, and he emphasized that French delegation had not repeat not played an obstructionist role. He admitted that he was puzzled on one point however: his understanding in Brussels was that the paper on temperate foodstuffs remained to be agreed, whereas the British White Paper seemed to put that question in the same category as other questions that had been agreed.

6. Clappier did not repeat not feel on balance that the momentum of Brussels negotiations would be lost by the present adjournment provided British negotiators returned in September and October ready to conclude an agreement within the presently indicated negotiating limits. He believed that the period of adjournment would enable the participating countries to assess coolly and objectively the very real progress that had been made so far. This progress, achieved as a result of great efforts, would itself encourage the negotiators to bring their enterprise to a successful conclusion.

7. As for the future Clappier clearly implied that the ultimate fate of the negotiations depended more on Britain than on the Six. French saw little or no repeat no room for further concessions on their side except in minor matters of wording that would not repeat not involve substance. Clappier regarded the forthcoming Commonwealth Prime Ministers’ Conference and the future trend of British public opinion as the main (and inter-related) determining factors on British side. In view of the uncertainty surrounding these two factors he personally did not repeat not put the chances of final agreement at any more than 50-50. He was uncertain about the present state of British opinion but rather thought that support for British entry had declined and would be further reduced by the sort of public controversy that was now going on about responsibility for the outcome of the last Ministerial Meeting. As for Commonwealth opinion he foresaw three main possibilities depending on the way the Prime Ministers' Conference went in September:

(a) If the Prime Ministers accepted the outlined agreement negotiations could probably be concluded on all outstanding points before the end of 1962. Ratification, enabling legislation and technical arrangements might then take another year to be worked out, permitting formal British entry by January 1, 1964.

(b) If the Prime Ministers' Conference came out strongly against the outlined agreement, it would presumably mean the break-up of the negotiations.

(c) The Prime Ministers' Conference might result in new instructions to the British delegation to seek more favourable terms and in particular more specific guarantees for Commonwealth exporters.

8. If in the last named case the resumed negotiation proceeded along the same lines as previously, Clappier thought they would lead to a fruitless search for a general and meaningless formula, in which the Six would insist on matching every specific reference to Commonwealth exporters with an offsetting reference to precedence for EEC producers. He saw greater hope in a proposal which had been put to the Six last week by Couve de Murville but not repeat not accepted. It had also been communicated informally to Britain. This proposal was that Britain and the Six should agree specifically on the price level for cereals within the enlarged Community, that this level should approximate the current French price (which, Clappier said, was the lowest among the Six) and that it should be linked with a formula providing for increasing prices in the enlarged Community, thus assuring comparable revenues if not repeat not comparable outlets to exporters in the Commonwealth and third countries. Such an arrangement would of course have to be discussed in the same context as the proposed world commodity agreements.

9. Clappier admitted that this proposal would meet serious objections within the Common Market from Germans and Dutch in particular. He thought however that it would enjoy the support of others, including Italians, and that Germans could be brought around by the prospect of British agreement. Depressive arrangements could be envisaged for high cost European producers and a similar approach might provide a solution for the high cost sectors in British agriculture.

10. It is our conclusion from this interview that when the British negotiators return to Brussels they are likely to face a very hard time unless they are prepared to accept the terms of the Six. If Clappier, who takes a positive attitude toward British entry, sees little room for manoeuvre in French position, it is easy to imagine what difficulties may be created by others with a less constructive approach. It would be interesting to know what the British think of the latest French agricultural proposals outlined above. If British view them with favour they might open a new avenue of exploration which however could hardly but lengthen the negotiations further.

Memorandum by Chairman, Interdepartmental Committee

[Ottawa], August 13, 1962

MEMORANDUM FOR MINISTERS ON U.K. – E.E.C. PROBLEM

Officials concerned with the U.K. negotiations with the European Common Market and the related Commonwealth problems have reviewed the results of the Brussels negotiations and the prospects for the Commonwealth Prime Ministers' meeting. They would like to present the following summary of their conclusions for consideration by the Cabinet Committee dealing with this subject.

1. Unless there is a further substantial swing in British public opinion, which we think is unlikely, the British Government will decide to enter the E.E.C. after the Commonwealth meeting and the final negotiations with the E.E.C.

2. All important nations and leaders concerned seem very anxious to avoid positions in which they could be blamed for a final breakdown of the negotiations. This appears to include Gaitskell, de Gaulle, Menzies, apparently Holyoake, and the Germans and Italians.

3. We think Canada should not get into the position of leading any open opposition to British entry or being blamed as a principal cause of failure of British efforts to enter.

4. While there are to be further negotiations at Brussels and some opportunity to improve the final package, in general one cannot expect Britain to gain substantially better terms of access for Commonwealth exports to the U.K. or E.E.C. by these final stages of negotiation.

5. We must expect that all the tariff preferences for Canadian exports in the British market will have been gradually eliminated by 1970 and also that free entry for Canadian products to Britain will have been lost well before then except where free entry is provided for all GATT countries under the common external tariff.

6. The logic of the situation would imply that the reciprocal tariff preferences which British exports enjoy in the Canadian market would come to an end by 1970. We shall be free to dispose of them if and as we wish between now and 1970. Based on past experience we should be able to use reductions or eliminations of these preferences as valuable bargaining counters in coming trade negotiations with other countries, especially the United States and the E.E.C. Meanwhile, at the Commonwealth discussions in London as well as elsewhere, care should be taken not to prejudice this potential bargaining power of ours.

7. We think the U.S. Trade Bill<sup>30</sup> will likely be passed by the time the Conference meets and almost certainly by the time our Parliament meets. This will afford very substantial opportunities for a new round of negotiations between the United States and the E.E.C. and others, including the Commonwealth countries adversely affected by U.K. entry. The United States have indicated their willingness to take into account in these further trade negotiations the benefits they receive as a by-product of the negotiations in Brussels between the United Kingdom and the E.E.C. They have also indicated their willingness to support the United Kingdom and Australia and ourselves in the final stages of the Brussels negotiations in securing additional concessions of mutual benefit in order to smooth the way for British entry to which they attach great importance in the general interest.

8. We think Canada should seek to gain such further improvements in the U.K.-E.E.C. arrangements as will still be possible after the Commonwealth meeting within the limited scope remaining for negotiations. We will have detailed suggestions to put forward in this regard and we think that at this late stage the Government can be specific because within the narrow margin for additional concessions it is no longer a question of choice over a wide range of Canadian interests but rather of securing what can still be got.

9. We think Canada should take advantage of the present U.S. offer to cooperate with us in seeking E.E.C. concessions to the United Kingdom that would benefit the United States as well as Commonwealth countries. We feel, however, that we should not ask for assistance on specific items in such a way that we might be expected to pay for these later in Canadian trade negotiations with the United States. We should also see what we can do in working out with the United States some concerted approach to the major problem of safeguarding the markets in the E.E.C. for cereals from overseas, particularly wheat.

10. Looking further ahead, we believe that the U.K.-E.E.C. negotiations should now be regarded, not as an isolated event, but as a first stage in a series of world-wide trade negotiations. The U.S. Trade Bill was designed to take over where the Brussels negotiations leave off, and by reductions in the U.S. tariff to secure substantial reduction in the E.E.C. common tariff. The U.S. Administration is now deliberately offering to take account of the benefits they obtain in the Brussels negotiation during the course of the later "Kennedy round" of negotiations. Moreover, the United States are actively interested in the possibility of new international commodity arrangements which might begin in 1963 – a subject also featuring importantly in the Brussels negotiations. These developments will affect not only Europe and North America, but Asia, Africa and Latin America as well. These developments also mean that we in Canada do not need to concentrate all our attention on the probable damage to our trade that may flow from Brussels; we can take a more optimistic view based on the continuing and subsequent negotiations in which we will be at the conference table and in which we can reasonably hope for important commercial benefits. At this later stage, there will be opportunities to renegotiate our own preference margins, now granted to U.K. exports, and generally by tariff bargaining to improve our trading position in Europe, the United States and with other members of GATT.

11. Earlier, officials here had suggested Canada might consider proposing to the British that they delay final decision or action on entry to E.E.C. pending the results of this "Kennedy round" of trade negotiations. It now seems likely, however, that the British would not agree to delay for domestic reasons, and moreover the United States are now willing to take into account and pay for trade benefits they obtain as a result of the final rounds of the Brussels negotiations.

12. If the position outlined in this memorandum is generally acceptable to Ministers, we suggest that, in response to U.S. offers to discuss this general situation with us and to cooperate with us if we wish, officials be authorized to have quiet discussions with American officials. This would be done to secure before the London discussions an up-to-date first-hand appraisal of U.S. policy and the possibilities of our benefiting from U.S. action vis-à-vis the E.E.C. Officials should explore probable areas of common interest with the United States and possible areas of difficulty which may arise. The areas of common interest would probably include identification of items for possible tariff reduction by the E.E.C. and ideas for commodity agreements and arrangements, for example for wheat, in the light of the E.E.C. arrangements. Officials should be authorized to say that the Canadian Government welcomes U.S. willingness to take into account benefits they will receive as a by-product of the Brussels negotiations, is prepared to cooperate on matters of common interest and hopes that the United States now and later will do what it can to bring about E.E.C. action that will benefit Canada as well as the United States.

13. We think it desirable to continue discussion of our attitudes and plans with Australia and New Zealand, especially in regard to the difficult problem of temperate foodstuffs. Firm, specific Australian proposals are already being put forward in London and Brussels with U.S. support. We do not consider that a common approach need be worked out on all aspects of the current negotiations but so far as possible we should reinforce individual efforts to secure specific improvements in the settlement. We think some discussions in London in advance of the Commonwealth meeting as Holyoake suggests are desirable. The Canadian party might plan to arrive in London on Friday the 7th. We should, however, avoid any appearance of ganging up on the United Kingdom or of holding a "white caucus."

14. The question of whether or not the British Government has lived up to the promises given Canada and other Commonwealth countries leaves room for wide differences of opinion depending on whether the reference is to "essential trade interests in the British market" or "essential interests" more broadly defined. In answer to the inevitable question in Parliament as to whether Britain has protected Canada's vital or essential interests in the British market, we think the reply should be that the British have been doing their best within the limits of their bargaining power, that there is still some room for modest adjustments in the final stages and these should be obtained, that inevitably some of Canada's trade interests will be harmed, but that, on the whole, this injury will not be intolerable in the light of the benefits to be obtained in further negotiations. One should go on to say that Canada will have opportunities to improve its trade position in coming negotiations with the United States, the enlarged E.E.C. and others, and that the Government is already turning its attention to these opportunities.

NEGOTIATIONS BETWEEN BRITAIN AND THE EEC

In accordance with your instructions arrangements have been made for a meeting of the Cabinet Committee to take place at 9:00 a.m. on Wednesday, August 15.

2. In preparation for this meeting of Ministers officials have met under Mr. Bryce's chairmanship and have agreed on a number of conclusions and recommendations for the period between now and the opening of the Commonwealth Prime Ministers' Conference on September 10. These conclusions and recommendations are set out in the attached Memorandum to Ministers<sup>31</sup> prepared by Mr. Bryce on behalf of the officials concerned.

3. A most significant development that has taken place in this field recently is the change in the attitude of the Australian Government who now appear to accept British accession to the EEC as inevitable. It is now clear that the Australians are not prepared to attempt to frustrate the Brussels negotiations and are ready to work closely with the United States to secure better terms for their exports and more satisfactory assurances concerning world-wide agreements. Dr. Allan Westerman, Secretary of the Australian Trade Department, held extensive discussions in Washington between July 23 and 25 and met Canadian officials in Ottawa on August 2 and 3. The attached memorandum† prepared in the Department of Trade and Commerce sets out in summary form the information received from Dr. Westerman concerning the development of the Australian position. We understand that the Australians are wasting no time in implementing their new approach and are engaged in active discussions in London and Brussels with British and EEC representatives.

4. As part of the background for Wednesday's meeting we have prepared a "situation report"† on the state of the negotiations in each of the principal sectors of trade as of the time of adjournment on August 4. Since this is inevitably a somewhat detailed paper we have also prepared a more concise cover note with a brief description of the position in each sector. A copy of this cover note† is attached for your information.

5. Finally, I am attaching for your convenience copies of some of the more important telegrams which have come in during the past few days assessing the results of the last Brussels Ministerial Meeting and the reasons for its adjournment. In general observers discount the notion that the French manoeuvre was an attempt to rather slow them down and to squeeze out further British concessions on temperate agriculture. The Six seem to have been agreed among themselves that there was no point in reaching agreement on agriculture until after the Commonwealth Prime Ministers' Conference. The French themselves (Paris telegram 1066 of August 10) are inclined to emphasize the extent of progress achieved rather than the difficulties which led to the adjournment and suggest that if the British return to Brussels ready to conclude an agreement within the presently indicated negotiating limits little may have been lost. From the British point of view it is quite clear that they feel they will be in a position to present to Commonwealth Prime Ministers what is negotiable and what is not. They will be able to argue that they stood their ground on key Commonwealth issues in relation to temperate agriculture until they have consulted Commonwealth Prime Ministers and they will be in a position to seek the advice of Commonwealth Prime Ministers on those issues for which no tentative solutions have yet emerged, e.g. treatment of processed foodstuffs and industrial raw materials. The British are also inclined to play down the notion that French tactics at the last Brussels meeting had been directed toward blocking British accession; they suggest rather that the French were still trying to limit derogations from the strict letter of the Rome Treaty so as to avoid re-opening difficult issues in the agricultural field (London telegram 2886 of August 10). The British have suggested through Canada House that it might be advisable to have a round of discussions with senior officials from Commonwealth countries prior to the Commonwealth meeting: these would apparently take the form of bilateral meetings with each Commonwealth country concerned on the pattern of those which took place last September and would not be limited to Canada, Australia or New Zealand (London telegram 2885 of August 10).†

PERSONAL AND CONFIDENTIAL.

Ottawa, August 27, 1962

My dear Prime Minister:

Since my return to Ottawa two weeks ago, I have been trying to get my thinking on the European Common Market into a coherent pattern. I must confess that I fail to see a clear-cut course that we can follow that answers all the difficulties. However, it might be helpful if I did put down on paper some of my thoughts and apologize in advance for any incoherency that might develop during the statement of my views.

In the first place, my concern is over the picture that the people have of the government in relation to Britain going into the European Common Market. To that end, I would think that several things might be done which would improve our public image.

1. Some place along the line we have to let it be known publicly that we are aware of the tremendous battle that the United Kingdom representatives have put up with the group of Six on behalf of the temperate countries of the Commonwealth. I think there is ample evidence that they have put up a sturdy fight and [it would] do a good deal to help our relations with U.K. government and the people at home, if it is known that we appreciate that this fight has gone on.

2. It's about time that we make the public more conscious of what the costs of Great Britain going into the Commonwealth are going to mean to Canada. I am perfectly aware that the facts that we have been discussing are confidential facts, but somewhere along the line, without divulging things which are completely confidential, we should start to set the heather afire in those groups that are going to suffer to let them know that we have been fighting their battle. If you will recall, you asked me in the period just after the Conference at Accra to go on the National Radio and to make a speech on trade. At that time, I took a strong pro-Commonwealth stand and listed the various tariffs that we might be faced with if we went into the European Common Market. I wonder if it isn't time now for a series of similar statements to point out who is the champion for these groups that will be hurt. We already know that the settlement has been made on certain classes of goods. Without divulging that the settlement has been made, we should let them know what the costs will be to brace them for the bad news. I wish this point could be considered very seriously and after having discussions with Trade and Commerce as to how much could be divulged with safety, I think that type of public relations should be started before you go to the Prime Ministers' Conference.

3. Insofar as Canada's actual stand is concerned, I do not believe that it would pay us to take Australia's position and try to buy off by getting the best deal from the United States, nor do I believe that it would be in our best interests to just take a completely negative attitude at the Prime Ministers' Conference. Rather, I would think that we must work on the assumption that our stand at the Conference should be to encourage Great Britain to press as hard as it can for the maximum entry of temperate goods into the European Common Market. As you have probably read from Drew's memorandum from London, there are two points of view. One is that the French ask for the adjournment simply to give themselves bargaining room in case the Commonwealth Nations put up a continued fight. The other point of view, also from the French, is that the French offer is final. With what limited knowledge I have of the French, I would assume that the French Ambassador's statement to George Drew is probably the more correct. This gives weight to what I said above about protecting our political position by making known the price that we will have to pay if Europe goes in. However, as I have said before, we will have to continue to fight for the best terms that we can get.

4. Another course of positive posture that we are overlooking is the fact that we can point as a Government to several things that we have done in the last two or three years that indicate we were preparing for this new trade position. For example, the aggressive sales program carried out in the last two years by Trade and Commerce. Another example, is the forming of an international company called "FAVEX," which means Fruit and Vegetable Export Company. This was formed under the Amendment of the Combines Investigation Act that we made. It was done with full co-operation by the Departments of Trade and Commerce and Agriculture with these fruit and vegetable companies. Along the same line, we have other groups that we hope to form in the near future. Also on this story of aggressive sales by the Government, we have the story of the grain sales to China, Czechoslovakia, Poland and Russia, plus whatever new countries we can round up in the next few months.

5. Finally, I think we should start preparing in our own minds for concessions that we can throw onto the bargaining table with [the] enlarged European Common Market. I know that this will cause serious repercussions among our colleagues, but I would certainly think that we should take a hard look at the automobile industry. You will recall that in 1935, Bennett in his reciprocity proposals to the United States suggested not only farm machinery, but automobiles. When King got in he was so desperate to get an agreement quickly that he settled just for the farm machinery. Farm machinery has been on a free basis ever since. Speaking for the industry as a whole, the farm machinery industry in Canada has not suffered, although some of us wonder at times about the division of manufacturing between the two countries, United States and Canada. I think on my part that if we could get the Americans and our own manufacturers to agree along the lines of the Royal Commission suggestion that there should be a division of production in the two countries, then we both could hit the European Common Market with a positive program of having free trade in automobiles. This would be a tremendous advantage to the ninety-five percent of Canadians and Americans who do not produce automobiles, but just consume them and at the same time would cause, I believe, a tremendous increase in trade between the two large areas of North America and the European Common Market.

6. Insofar as agriculture is concerned, I think that we could possibly consider the freer movement of lamb and wool into this country, as well as sugar. These things are not very successful industries in Canada, particularly in the East, and [it] would be no serious problem for us to make the adjustment. It would mean trouble in two or three of the constituencies, but, at the moment, insofar as each in Canada is concerned, those seats have gone against us in any case. The reason for advancing these types of concessions is to let you know that I think that the shelf is not completely bare insofar as either the manufacturing or the agricultural segments are concerned.

7. In conclusion, in our public relations I think that we have to bring out in the open that the possibility of having a North Atlantic trading community is simply not possible at the present time. This has been done once or twice, but I think that fact has to be pounded home. Along this line, a Commonwealth economic community is equally impossible at the present time. Therefore, the only two courses that lie open for us are the multi-lateral course that Donald Fleming announced on behalf of the Government at the beginning of the talks, or joining more closely with the United States. I will not discuss the latter point because if your feelings are the same as I think they are, it's completely academic here in Canada. I happen to agree with you very strongly. But we should begin to outline the advantages of the multi-lateral approach, not only for the long run, but even for the immediate.

I think this gives, in general, the viewpoints that I have on the European Common Market and I hope they may be of some help to you.

Yours sincerely,

ALVIN HAMILTON

PROGRESS REPORT ON DISCUSSIONS CONCERNING POSSIBLE U.K. ENTRY INTO THE COMMON MARKET AND POSITION AT LONDON COMMONWEALTH MEETING
 (Previous reference August 17†)

8. The Secretary of State for External Affairs recalled that the Cabinet had rejected an Australian suggestion that that country and Canada seek to make an arrangement to obtain U.S. assistance in negotiations to improve the terms of U.K. entry into the Common Market. Instead, the Cabinet had decided that Canadian officials should proceed to Washington to ask questions regarding the U.S. position on this subject.

The Washington meeting had been very successful. The officials had ascertained that the Australian officials who had recently visited Ottawa had been excessively sanguine in their belief that the United States might be prepared to enter into such a deal. The U.S. was adhering carefully to a neutral position on the whole subject, although it was known that their President favoured U.K. entry into the Common Market. Australia had received less support in Washington than they had expected. On particular commodities, however, where there was an identity of interest between the U.S. on the one hand and Australia or Canada on the other, they would be prepared to "lend a hand." The U.S. position was completely straightforward, and their principal negotiations would take place in their tariff discussions with the Common Market if the United Kingdom had meanwhile agreed to join it. They appeared to be taking it for granted that the U.K. would enter the Common Market.

Canadian officials were scheduled to leave for London on September 4th, and should be given instructions on the position they should take in the meetings that would precede the Prime Ministers' Conference. They should probably be instructed to seek full information and to avoid any attempt to make tentative agreements.

A merging of the U.K.-E.E.C. negotiations with broader negotiations involving the U.S. and other third countries (the "Kennedy Round" of tariff negotiations) would have important advantages for Canada. It had been suggested that Canada's main objective in London should be to have these two sets of negotiations timed to coincide. The combined negotiating weight of the U.S., the U.K. and other interested countries should be able to win substantial reductions in the Common Market tariff, and with Britain's entry hanging in the balance the U.S. might be prepared to make greater concessions than otherwise. Secondly, the Six might be more disposed to make concessions in the safeguarding of Commonwealth interests if the U.S. were able to pay immediately for benefits received. Thirdly, there would be a better chance of getting full recognition of the value for the U.S. of the loss of Commonwealth preferences in the U.K. market, and of the value for the U.S. and the Six of the removal of preferences enjoyed by Britain in the Canadian market. Fourthly, the benefits for Canada from a negotiated solution that would more than offset Canada's losses in the British market would be demonstrably clear. Fifthly, Canada would be able to move along the lines of the kind of multilateral solutions that this country had been advocating.

A formal proposal in London to stretch out the E.E.C. negotiations might be interpreted as blocking tactics, and would not be likely to command wide support. If the Six responded favourably to the U.S. offer to give them credit for concessions made before the multilateral tariff conference, or if some firm commitment were obtained from the Six that they would react favourably, some of the advantages of merging negotiations might be obtained without need for a formal stretch-out proposal. If the British could be persuaded to give a firm commitment that they would not raise either preferential rates or M.F.N. rates by more than a token amount until after the Kennedy negotiations, Canada would achieve important benefits.

9. The Secretary to the Cabinet reported that officials were of different opinions on whether it would in fact be feasible to synchronize the two sets of negotiations.

10. The Prime Minister said that first consideration should be given, not to the steps to be taken if Britain joined the Six, but to the position he should take on behalf of Canada at the Prime Ministers' Conference. The Cabinet had concluded that the U.K. would probably enter the Common Market, but this should not be taken for granted. The purpose of the Commonwealth Conference was to help the U.K. to decide whether the consensus of opinion among other Commonwealth countries was in favour of or opposed to British entry. The next step would then be for the U.K. to determine. Nine out of every eleven letters he received from the Canadian public were opposed to British entry. Opinion polls in the U.K. showed that only 28 per cent of the population there favoured U.K. entry, and only about 18 per cent were undecided.

11. The Secretary of State for External Affairs went on to say that officials had explored the various alternative trade patterns, but that none of the alternatives was particularly attractive. Canada would derive little benefit from a Commonwealth Free Trade Area, because this country would then be exposed to the entry of various manufactured goods from the U.K. and from Commonwealth countries in Asia. Canadian agriculture would then also face increased imports of produce from Australia and New Zealand. Canada already enjoyed free entry of many products to the U.K.

A North Atlantic Free Trade Area would also be unattractive for Canada because it would cause severe dislocation of industry, and whole sectors of Canadian secondary industry might disappear unless special safeguards could be introduced. The uncertainties might constitute an unacceptable risk. Such an Area might yield some advantages to Canadian trade in agricultural products.

A Pacific Free Trade Area and a Latin American Free Trade Area would each have certain advantages, but would not be of major significance to Canada's overall trade picture.

12. The Prime Minister said that he understood that the Leader of the Opposition had changed his mind on this subject, and was now opposed to British entry. Clarence Streit, the "Union Now" proponent, had recently written to the Deputy Leader of the U.K. Labour Party stating that, if Britain should join E.E.C., there would no longer be any possibility of forming an Atlantic Community. Perhaps he should speak to Mr. Pearson on September 4th to obtain his views informally before proceeding to London. Mr. Pearson would then not be in a position to claim subsequently that the Prime Minister had not sought his views.

The Cabinet should meet on August 31st to discuss this whole matter again. A summary of the views of Ministers should be prepared before his return to Ottawa on September 4th. The Cabinet had given him a free hand to use his own discretion at the London Conference, but he wished to know how far Ministers thought he should go. He would be expected to speak immediately after the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom and his opening statement was likely to influence the position taken by some of the new members of the Commonwealth. He also wished to have the opinion of the Cabinet on the content of the public statement he would make during his mission to London.

At the Conference he might begin for example by outlining the political consequences of British entry into the Common Market. Some Commonwealth countries were members of international groupings such as N.A.T.O. or S.E.A.T.O., and this had not interfered with their continuing membership.

He might then proceed to outline the economic consequences to Canada, pointing out that certain sectors of Canadian industry would suffer. Canada's trade with the Commonwealth had increased considerably since 1957; did the U.K. intend to throw this away? If so, what steps did they intend to take with regard to certain specific commodities?

Ministers should indicate whether this outline appeared to be suitable for the occasion.

Prime Minister Macmillan appeared to expect defeat in the next general election, but was apparently convinced that his position on the Common Market question would in the long run prove right and be advantageous to his party. In the U.K., unlike Canada, the political parties appeared to expect alternate periods of a few years in and out of power and took this into account.

13. Mr. Diefenbaker said that he expected to meet the Prime Ministers of Australia and New Zealand on September 7th. At a later stage of the Commonwealth Conference he might ask other Ministers to come to London, but the immediate problem was his opening statement.

British entry into the E.E.C. would be the occasion, if not the cause, of the dissolution of the Commonwealth by about 1970. The U.K. had apparently decided that the Commonwealth Prime Ministers' Conference was no longer an efficacious body, but merely a pocket edition of [the] U.N. During World War I, Mr. Borden had taken a strong view in favour of Canadian self-determination when he had insisted that Canadians must have their own Commander in Chief. In 1921, Mr. Meighen had made a major contribution when he had opposed the Anglo-Japanese agreement and had helped to bring a recognition of the worldwide responsibilities of the U.S. This had in the long run proved to be a major contribution toward the winning of World War II. In 1960, the Conference had decided that Commonwealth membership was not automatic for countries deciding to become republics or for colonies achieving independence.

As part of the preparation for the meeting, he should be given a careful summary of the development of the Commonwealth concept.

On his return to Ottawa on September 4th the Cabinet would have a final series of meetings on this subject.

14. During the discussion various points were explored, and it was generally agreed that the Prime Minister should speak informally with the Leader of the Opposition as proposed.

15. The Cabinet agreed to give further consideration at its next meeting to the position Canada should take on the British negotiations for possible entry into the Common Market.

Note du chef de la Direction économique pour le secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures Memorandum from Head, Economic Division, to Secretary of State for External Affairs

[Ottawa], September 6, 1962

As instructed by Cabinet, Canadian officials met with senior British officials concerned with the Brussels negotiations. They also had talks with Australian and New Zealand officials present in London in connection with the Conference of Commonwealth Prime Ministers.

UK-EEC Negotiations

The main points emerging from the meetings with British officials may be summarized as follows:

(1) The British do not regard the adjournment at the beginning of August as in any sense a break in the continuity of negotiations. No change whatever was apparent as regards the intention of the British Government with respect to entry.

(2) The British do not see much, if any, scope for significant new concessions from the Six when the negotiations are resumed.

(3) While the British intend to press their proposals in sectors where provisional agreement has not yet been reached, they do not wish to re-open sectors where it has. They argue that the results achieved to date are substantial and that to re-open matters might well endanger what has been accomplished.

(4) Canadian officials canvassed the possibilities contained in the paper entitled "Specific Trade Objectives." The British showed no disposition to re-open any but the most minor matters.

In the discussion about securing more favourable "décalage" than has so far been offered, the possibility of maintaining existing access or of making only a token movement towards the common tariff pending multilateral tariff negotiations was raised. Canadian officials were not led to expect favourable consideration of such an approach. However, interest was shown in it.

(5) As regards the UK-EEC paper on temperate foodstuffs, British officials emphasized the importance of the declared readiness of the Six to pursue price and production policies which would take account not only of domestic agricultural objectives but would also contribute to "a satisfactory level of trade between the Community and third countries, including Commonwealth countries." When it was pointed out that the paper was couched in imprecise terms and provided no meaningful assurance for Canadian trade, the British pointed to the cumulative effect of the declarations contained in the paper taken together, and stated that in any event this was the best that could be obtained in the negotiations.

(6) With respect to the British requests for nil duties on industrial raw materials and their proposals for processed foodstuffs, British officials will maintain their requests but are not optimistic about the outcome.

Talks With Australian Officials

Australian officials are far from satisfied with the results of the negotiations to date. Their assessment of the paper on temperate foodstuffs is similar to our own. Like ourselves, the Australians have not been encouraged to expect major new concessions from the Six. Australian officials gave the impression that Mr. Menzies, in referring in his press statement to the possibility of a further meeting, did not necessarily have in mind that it should be at Prime Ministers' level or that all Commonwealth countries need be included.

While the Australians may be expected to press hard for improvements in the course of the Conference, there is no indication that they will lead any opposition movement to British entry.

Discussions With New Zealand Officials

New Zealand is unable to assess fully the results of the negotiations to date because specific arrangements for meat and dairy products remain to be discussed. Moreover, they do not know what significance to attach to the stated willingness of the Six to contemplate special arrangements for them. In fact, they see considerable difficulty in reconciling New Zealand's interests in these products with the Common Agricultural Policy of the EEC. New Zealand does not propose to take any lead in opposing British entry into the EEC.

The Attitude of Nigeria

Officials of the Commonwealth Relations Office appear to have been surprised and are concerned by the statement made by the Prime Minister of Nigeria on arrival here that he found it difficult to see how Nigeria could become an associate member of the EEC. British officials fear that other African Commonwealth countries, taking their cue from Nigeria, may be tempted on political grounds to reject associate status despite the very attractive economic terms which this would entail and which the British regard as a major concession on the part of the Six.

BRITISH-EEC NEGOTIATIONS: CANADIAN TRADE INTERESTS
POSSIBLE COURSES OF ACTION

Prospects

1. The British Government remains determined to proceed quickly to the completion of negotiations in Brussels. If at all possible, the British wish to accede to the European Economic Community by the end of 1963.

2. There is little reason to believe that in the present circumstances of negotiations the British will be successful in obtaining many significant concessions from the Six for the safeguarding of Commonwealth trade interests. There has been no improvement in the negotiating situation since September and the difficulties are more manifest. The British do not have a strong bargaining position and the Six are reluctant at this stage to make available concessions which might be used in subsequent negotiations with European countries seeking some form of association (e.g. Norway and Sweden) or in major tariff negotiations with the United States, Canada and other countries.

3. A Situation Report on the progress of the negotiations is attached.†

Canadian Approach

Canada's approach to the Brussels negotiations has been to urge on the British the need to safeguard Canadian trade interests as a matter of real importance to us and in the light of the repeated British assurances given in this regard. Canada has not intervened directly in the negotiations. To assist the British we have, however, provided all relevant information regarding Canadian trade interests in the British market. While information passed to the British has put them in a position to identify the more important items in Canada's exports to the British market, we have avoided specifically identifying priority items.

Possible Courses of Action

It is timely to examine what, if anything, further needs to be done to minimize the damage to our trade in the event of British membership in the EEC, having in mind the terms likely to prove negotiable. Canada's capacity to influence the terms on which Canadian goods might enter an enlarged Common Market is based on three factors:

1. The British undertaking to safeguard essential Commonwealth interests;
2. Canada's contractual rights under GATT to free entry in the British tariff which entitles us to compensation if they are impaired. These rights are principally free entry for aluminum, ferro silicon, woodpulp, newsprint, wheat and wheat flour.
3. The scope at a later stage for securing concessions in the Common Tariff in exchange for concessions in the Canadian Tariff, including adjustments in the preferences accorded to Britain. Canada would of course in addition benefit from any reductions in the Common Tariff which the U.S. or other countries may negotiate in the "Kennedy round."

In order to facilitate British efforts in the negotiations, the United States recently made known its interest in and willingness to pay at a later stage for concessions in the Common Tariff of interest to the U.S. which might flow from any Brussels settlement. This U.S. offer has had little practical effect on the course of the negotiations. It was necessarily imprecise, pending completion of the public procedures which would identify the specific items on which the U.S. could make concessions. Further, the EEC are getting closer and closer to the maximum which they are prepared to concede in a negotiation with the British, having in mind the demands which can be expected in the context of subsequent negotiations and pressure for protection from domestic producers in the Community.

There is no reason to believe that comparable action by Canada would serve any useful purpose at this stage, either in terms of general representations in EEC capitals and Brussels or by an offer to pay for benefits received in the negotiations going beyond those to which we could consider ourselves entitled as a result of the change in our contractual GATT position in the United Kingdom.

It is considered, however, that it would be timely

(a) to remind the British in a general way of the position taken by the Canadian Prime Minister in discussions in London and of our expectation that the British will do everything within their power to safeguard Canadian trade interests;

(b) to indicate to the British that to the extent it might prove helpful in securing a satisfactory settlement on items still outstanding of interest to Canada, we would be prepared to indicate whether or not a particular settlement would be regarded as discharging our rights under Article XXIV:6 of GATT (compensation for changes in rates bound to Canada in the U.K. tariff);

(c) to convey to the British negotiators in Brussels the following specific points on items where we have clear GATT rights at appropriate times in relation to developments there:

(i) Wheat (Exports 1961 – $140 million)

In return for an undertaking that should Canada's exports of wheat to Britain fall below traditional quantities as a result of Britain's adoption of the common agricultural arrangements for grains, remedial action would be taken to restore the level of imports, Canada would be prepared temporarily not to assert its GATT rights in respect of free entry in the British tariff. This interim arrangement would be maintained until a long term settlement was reached.

(In the meantime, and apart from the Brussels negotiations, we are working in concert with the United States and other exporters to secure improved access to the Common Market for wheat and other grains.)

(ii) Wheat Flour (Exports $22 million)

Canada would not press its contractual rights in respect of free entry in the British tariff for wheat flour in return for an opportunity to compete in the British market on equal terms with European producers for traditional quantities sold to Britain.

(iii) Aluminum (Exports $72 million)

A reduction in the level of the Common Market Tariff from 9% to, say, 5% (to be confirmed in the light of consultations with industry). In addition the possibility should be explored of securing an undertaking that the Community would be prepared to negotiate further reductions in the Tariff in negotiations with the U.S. and other countries in the Kennedy round in return for similar or equivalent concessions by such countries. Such a settlement would be regarded as discharging Canada's rights under GATT in respect of free entry in the British tariff. (The principal Canadian producer has indicated that a tariff of 9% would make it worthwhile to establish smelter production in Europe.)

(iv) Newsprint (Exports $60 million)

A reduction to free in the Common Tariff on newsprint would be regarded as fully discharging Canada's rights on this item under GATT and as partial compensation for losses in other items, e.g. woodpulp.

(d) With respect to other particular commodities on which there are no clear GATT rights and without prejudice to comments which would be appropriate to other items of Canadian trade interest where agreement has not yet been reached, the following specific safeguards might also be sought:

1. Sized Lumber (Exports about $15 million)

Firm assurances that imports of sized lumber into Britain will be classified under the free entry item of the Common Market Tariff. There is serious danger that a tariff classification involving a rate of 10% could result from Britain's adoption of the Common Market Tariff.

2. Softwood-Plywood (Exports $11 million)

A maximum reduction in the Common Market Tariff for fir plywood of the type and grade which competes directly with lumber and for which free entry is provided in the Common Tariff.

3. Canned Salmon (Exports $8 million)

Subject to further consultations with industry and provided it is clear the British will not succeed in getting substantial reduction in the level of the Common Market Tariff, free or preferential entry under tariff quota based on traditional quantities should be sought.

4. Cheddar Cheese (Exports $6 million)

Canada should be assured as favourable access to the British market for cheese as might be accorded to any other supplier, including New Zealand, either in terms of rates of duty to be applied or any form of quantitative access that may be accorded.

*Le haut-commissaire par intérim au Royaume-Uni
au Lord Privy Seal du Royaume-Uni
Acting High Commissioner in United Kingdom to Lord Privy Seal of United Kingdom*

London, December 6, 1962

My dear Lord Privy Seal,

In discussions which have taken place recently in Brussels between British and Canadian officials, it appeared that the British Government would welcome an indication of the views of the Canadian Government on whether a reduced tariff on aluminium would be preferable to the present 9 per cent Common Market tariff, plus a tariff quota, from the point of view of minimizing damage to Canadian trade interests. I have now been asked to place on record with you the views of the Canadian Government on this matter.

It is the understanding of the Canadian Government that the British Government may now be giving consideration to possible alternatives to the proposal for free entry for aluminium in the common tariff which they have put forward in the Brussels negotiations.

The British Government will be aware of the importance the Canadian Government attaches to the efforts being made to obtain unrestricted free entry for imports of aluminium in the event of Britain's accession to the Common Market. It is understood that the British proposal for a nil duty has been put forward not only from the point of view of safeguarding this important Canadian trade interest but also from the point of view of Britain's own interest in obtaining import requirements of aluminium from dependable sources of supply at the best possible price and without the additional costs which a protective tariff would involve.

Anything short of unrestricted free entry will not fully meet these needs. For this reason the Canadian Government would strongly urge that the British Government maintain its efforts to secure agreement to a nil duty or, if this should in the end prove not to be negotiable, to obtain the maximum possible reduction in the level of the Common Market tariff.

Any alternative arrangement such as a system of tariff quotas which would leave the effective level of protection in Europe at 9 per cent would be most undesirable from the Canadian point of view and could well be prejudicial to the United Kingdom's long-term interest in securing adequate supplies of aluminium on the most economic basis. A tariff quota would fail to provide for the prospective growth of import requirements for aluminium in Britain and other European countries. A quota solution would divert attention from the central issue of the undue level of protection provided by the Common Tariff. It would also encourage a tendency towards substantial increases in European smelter capacity on a basis which would be less than fully competitive with other world producers who already have economic capacity well in excess of demand. Such an artificial development of production of a basic industrial raw material would have serious effects on current trade patterns and adversely affect Canada's interests. It would also prejudice future possibilities of obtaining a more rational pattern for primary aluminium production and trade in the Western trading community as a whole.

On the basis of these considerations the Canadian Government wishes to re-emphasize its expectation that the British Government will continue to press for a nil duty for aluminium in the Common Tariff and that, in the final analysis, if this should not prove possible of achievement the alternative sought should be the maximum reduction in the duty itself and not a compromise involving the undesirable introduction of quota concepts into the trade in this basic industrial material.

Yours sincerely,

BENJAMIN ROGERS

CONFIDENTIAL

[Ottawa], January 17, 1963

POSSIBLE BREAKDOWN OF THE BRUSSELS NEGOTIATIONS

President de Gaulle's press conference on January 14,<sup>32</sup> revealing his unbending attitude toward any significant concessions designed to facilitate British entry into the Common Market, clearly raises the possibility of a final breakdown in the negotiations. So far there has been no public reaction from British Ministers to the President's remarks but the British press probably reflects public opinion in suggesting that the end of the negotiations may now be in sight. Mr. Heath as well as British officials both in London and Brussels have stressed the fact that the British Government has no intention of abandoning the negotiations and have emphasized the continued goodwill of members of the EEC other than France. In spite of this goodwill, however, there is very little evidence up to this morning to suggest that any of the "friendly five" is prepared seriously to challenge President de Gaulle on the question of British membership. The only opposition with real prospect of success would have to come from Germany and there is no sign that they are prepared to challenge the French on this or any other question, particularly since growing economic problems have caused German industry to lose some of its former enthusiasm for expanding the EEC. However, the reports from Brussels this morning suggest that more substantial opposition is gathering momentum among the other five as a result of the rumour that the French Foreign Minister may propose breaking off negotiations.

<sup>32</sup> Voir/See "President De Gaulle's Press Conference, 14 January 1963," in D.C. Watt, ed., Documents on International Affairs 1962 (London: Oxford University Press, 1971), pp. 487-500.

2. It is, therefore, important to consider some of the possible implications for Canada of a final breakdown at Brussels. The effect on Britain itself of a collapse of the Brussels negotiations would probably be severe. The angry reaction to Mr. Acheson's recent speech at West Point<sup>33</sup> is an indication of current sensitivity to Britain's failure to find a definitive role in world affairs and the failure of the Government's European policy would certainly heighten this feeling of frustration. Although British resentment would probably be focussed on France and General de Gaulle, this would almost certainly lead to coolness between Britain and other members of the Six. It could lead to an attempt to establish closer co-operation with other countries such as the United States, members of the Commonwealth such as Australia, New Zealand and Canada, and members of EFTA or it could lead Britain to adopt standoffish and restrictive policies in a general mood of xenophobia.

3. The efforts by de Gaulle to assume actual leadership of the Community could of course also create serious rifts among the Six and even lead under certain circumstances to a break up of the EEC. The resulting economic confusion could have devastating effects on the West generally. It would also create a situation in general which the USSR would exploit politically.

4. The British economy has in recent months become increasingly geared to the prospect of membership of the Common Market. While the overall balance of payments has not been very favourable (and exports to Canada have been particularly disappointing), British trade with the Six has grown steadily, in spite of the increasing incidence of the EEC common tariff. This growth has resulted largely from a sustained drive by British industry with Government support to establish themselves in Europe, and a readiness to forego profits to surmount EEC tariffs pending Britain's accession to the Community. These extraordinary efforts can certainly be expected to cease if British industry is to be faced indefinitely with tariffs in EEC markets. A falling off of exports to Europe would probably lead to further investment by British firms in branch plants on the continent. This tendency was quite pronounced eighteen months ago but many investment decisions of this kind have been postponed until the fate of the Brussels negotiations was known.

5. The British balance of payments has not been very strong in recent months and a decline in exports to Europe and a general lack of faith in Britain's future as a major industrial power could easily lead to a new sterling crisis. The extent of such a possible crisis is of course impossible to estimate but at worst it could force the devaluation of sterling. Even if this eventuality could be avoided a major sterling crisis involving the need for assistance from the IMF and other Western countries would put a further serious strain on the financial system of the Free World. (It would also have serious implications for Canada in respect of the sterling earned by our wheat sales to China.) Moreover a payments crisis would oblige Britain to impose trade restrictions which would hit us very hard.

6. It is far from clear what policies the British Government would seek to adopt to replace entry to Europe. In the trade field they could be expected to seek improved access to European and other markets through meaningful negotiations under the Kennedy round (though the Trade Expansion Act would require amendment in the event of a failure to enlarge the EEC). It is less certain, however, that the Six will be prepared to adopt a particularly forthcoming attitude in these negotiations – President de Gaulle made it clear that for him the future of the EEC lay in a status "separate but equal" to that of the United States, rather than in forming part of any broad Atlantic community. More specifically there has been considerable resentment among all the Six at recent United States criticism of EEC agricultural policies<sup>34</sup> and doubts have been expressed by the French and others that the United States is really prepared to grant meaningful concessions, particularly on non-tariff barriers, as the price of improved access to EEC markets.

7. In recent months there have been indications that some French officials, opposed to British membership of the Common Market, were inclined to look with favour on the idea of an industrial free trade area of Britain and the Six. This would solve the problem of access to the EEC for most British exports and would avoid the difficult problem of British and Commonwealth agriculture; it would also preclude Britain from any voice in shaping the institutions of the Community. There is as yet no indication that the French will advance proposals along these lines if the negotiations break down. General de Gaulle spoke vaguely of the possibility of some sort of "association" between Britain and the Community but neither of these solutions takes any account of the major political objectives which the British have been seeking at Brussels. It is even questionable whether political sentiment in Britain would permit acceptance of such a solution.

8. Another possibility which cannot entirely be excluded is that Britain might seek closer co-operation with countries outside the Six, particularly in the Commonwealth. Thus Canada might be faced with a renewal of the 1957 proposal for a free trade area with Britain,<sup>35</sup> possibly broadened to include Australia, New Zealand and members of EFTA. Any proposal for freer trade in the Commonwealth still contains from Canada's point of view the inherent drawback which led to rejection of the more limited 1957 plan (see the attached note, prepared as briefing for last September's meeting of Commonwealth Prime Ministers†).

9. The foregoing lines of thought are necessarily entirely speculative in that no decision has yet been taken to suspend Britain's negotiations with the Six. Recent reports from Brussels (telegram No. 50 of January 16, 1963)† quotes Mr. Heath to the effect that the British intend to carry on and hope to persuade the other Five to stand up to the French. The British are also ready to make further concessions on agriculture and elsewhere in the hope of reaching a settlement. The French delegation have taken no active part in the proceedings since General de Gaulle's statement and as suggested by Couve, the French Foreign Minister, may seek at today's meeting of EEC Ministers to break off negotiations with Britain.

10. In the event that you wish to send a copy of this Memorandum to the Prime Minister and Senator McCutcheon I am attaching for your signature covering memoranda† for this purpose.

Record of Meeting between Prime Minister of United Kingdom and Prime Minister

[Ottawa], April 30, 1962

Prime Minister Macmillan
 Lord Amory
 Sir Norman Brook
 Mr. P.F. de Zulueta

Prime Minister Diefenbaker
 Mr. Green
 Mr. Fleming
 Mr. Hees
 Mr. A. Hamilton
 Mr. R.B. Bryce
 Mr. H.B. Robinson

Mr. Diefenbaker invited Mr. Macmillan to discuss various aspects of the possible entry of the United Kingdom into membership of the European Economic Community and its effects upon the Commonwealth.

Mr. Macmillan said that Mr. Heath had discussed the negotiations in detail with the Canadian Ministers and there was no need to go over that ground again. One matter that had engaged his own attention had been the timing of the Commonwealth Prime Ministers' Conference. It should not occur too soon for then it could not have before it a clear idea of what terms of entry were possible. On the other hand, it should be soon enough that the United Kingdom Government would have an opportunity to reach its own decision afterwards in the light of the discussion. It was difficult now to find any date that is convenient to Commonwealth Governments all around the world. That chosen, September 10, seemed about the best all things considered. It may be difficult for Australia. It is hoped that Mr. Menzies will be able to get there for it; if not, he plans to come for discussions beforehand.

Mr. Macmillan said that consideration should be given to procedures for the conduct of the Meeting of Commonwealth Prime Ministers in September. Consultations on the Common Market question would require careful planning. He thought it would be necessary to find a combination of plenary meetings and bilateral consultations. All Prime Ministers would naturally wish to participate in the discussion of the broad considerations relating to the United Kingdom's application for Common Market membership but opportunities would have to be found for him to have more detailed discussions on specific practical problems with other Prime Ministers as necessary. Mr. Diefenbaker emphasized the need for the fullest collective consultation and said that detailed bilateral discussions should not be allowed to prejudice plenary consultation on the broad subject of possible British entry. Mr. Fleming noted that, by the time of the Meeting in September, preparatory exchanges would have taken place which would to some extent limit the time required for bilateral discussion. Mr. Macmillan did not dissent but emphasized that the plenary meetings should not be complicated by too much detail of interest only to particular Commonwealth Governments.

Mr. Diefenbaker said that the two broad subjects which should be discussed in plenary meetings were the political and the economic implications of British entry into the Common Market. Would British entry obliterate the Commonwealth as we know it and what would happen to the economic benefits now enjoyed by Commonwealth countries? Mr. Macmillan agreed that these were subjects for discussion in plenary meetings. He thought that the United Kingdom Government should be able to make an intelligible estimate of the likely terms of entry by the end of July or the beginning of August. This would be the basis of consultation at the Prime Ministers' Meeting. If, in the light of that Meeting, it were decided to continue the negotiations, the United Kingdom would go back to the Six, perhaps in October, and ask for "this, that or the other point" and after that would reach a final decision.

Speaking of the present state of the negotiations, Mr. Macmillan said that nothing really significant had occurred since Mr. Heath was in Ottawa a month ago. The United Kingdom did not yet have a very clear picture of the prospects of entry. He thought this was because the broad issues had not really reached the point of seriously concerning the Heads of Government in the Common Market countries and it was impossible to know whether the Heads of Government would conduct the remaining negotiations so as to bring about success or failure. The outcome would not be decided purely on an economic basis. He was certain that, if the Governments of the Six all decided that they wanted Britain's application to succeed, acceptable terms of entry could be formulated. On the other hand, if one or more of the European countries, for political reasons, wanted to resist United Kingdom entry, economic conditions could be posed to render such entry impracticable. An inkling of the intentions of the Common Market countries might be forthcoming at the two meetings of Ministers in May but it was not likely that a reliable pointer to their attitudes would be discernible until perhaps the end of June.

Lord Amory referred to the pre-occupation in Ottawa with the political effects of European political integration should Britain join such a grouping. Mr. Macmillan said that so far as the Common Market was concerned, the obligations of members were of an economic and social character and he thought they were unlikely to have an adverse effect on Britain's part in the Commonwealth. Mr. Diefenbaker and Mr. Green both referred to the possibility of a conflict of foreign policy arising between the United Kingdom as a member of a European political union on the one hand and of the Commonwealth on the other. Mr. Macmillan said in reply that in the Commonwealth itself one sees a great diversity that makes differences in policy possible. Secondly, he felt that while there was some movement in Europe toward a federal system, it was basically an intellectual and unreal proposal. It was based on a fallacy. The strength and spirit of Europe arise from its history and there is no future in a new system based on a political and spiritual Esperanto. The Government of France in recent years had shown none of that sloppy amorphous quality that was often attributed to it and so long as de Gaulle was in power, Europe would not enter into any federal system. He did not feel conflict between obligations the United Kingdom might acquire in Europe and those it would have within the Commonwealth. The United Kingdom had repeatedly been brought into war in Europe by forces on the continent and by secret agreements such as that which Asquith had negotiated in 1909 with France. That sort of thing is not involved in the Treaty of Rome.

Mr. Fleming asked whether the United Kingdom would be able to withstand continental pressures towards closer political federalism should such pressures develop after Britain's entry into the E.E.C. Mr. Macmillan answered that the United Kingdom would have to withdraw if any such pressures got too strong. He did not believe that the trend toward federalism would grow to an unacceptable degree. While the Dutch and Belgians were favouring a supra-national solution, their primary objective was to bring the United Kingdom into Europe because they were afraid of being crushed between French and German rivalries.

Mr. Diefenbaker stressed the importance of Commonwealth preferences to Canada as a means of staving off United States domination. He asked why the United States was so anxious to do away with the preferences. Mr. Macmillan replied that the United States was prepared to accept the additional degree of discrimination against United States exports to the E.E.C. in its present or later expanded form because they valued the political advantages of having Europe more secure and more able to look after itself in the field of defence. The United States was opposed to the inclusion of the European neutrals, and particularly Sweden, on the ground that they would make no contribution to the political cohesion and defence of Europe. The United States was conscious of the Treaty position of Austria as well as the traditional neutrality of Sweden. Mr. Macmillan made it clear that he strongly dissented from United States views in this regard.

Mr. Diefenbaker asked why it was that the United States did not wish to enter into an association with the E.E.C. Mr. Macmillan replied that it was presumably because of a fear that United States prices were too high to compete in the Common Market, like Canada when the United Kingdom proposed a Free Trade area.

Mr. Macmillan said that he could not see in the long run any alternative to a closer alignment of the non-Communist countries. There were difficulties inherent in having uncommitted countries in the Commonwealth but these, he thought, had to be accepted. The Commonwealth had a value as a grouping within which relations with the African and Asian Nations could be developed and some influence exerted on them.

Mr. Diefenbaker said that trade was a very important factor in maintaining the cohesion of the Commonwealth. Mr. Macmillan agreed but said that this argument applied more to the older Commonwealth countries. Mr. Hees pointed out that, for an increasing number of Canadians, the United Kingdom was not the mother country. Trade thus was of continuing importance in cementing the relationship. Lord Amory thought that to the new members, the Commonwealth was more important as a source of capital than for day-to-day trade. Mr. Fleming recalled that at the Accra Conference African and Asian spokesmen had expressed strong concern at the prospective loss of preferences. He referred in particular to the importance of the United Kingdom as a market for manufactured goods from developing countries. Mr. Macmillan replied that the United Kingdom could not continue indefinitely as an important "free" market for manufactured goods from these countries. Mr. Diefenbaker agreed that Canada had its problems in this connection with Japan.

Mr. Fleming referred again to the United States attitude on Commonwealth preferences. From the Canadian point of view it appeared that United States support for United Kingdom entry into Europe was for the United States a means of doing away with the preferences. For Canada, the maintenance of preferences had been a factor of very great significance in our relations with the United States. Mr. Diefenbaker said that the United States attitude appeared to Canadians a new attempt to determine Canada's destiny.

Mr. Diefenbaker said that the most disturbing part of the present situation is that, as Mr. Fleming said, the present Canadian Government is one of the most Commonwealth-minded governments that there has ever been in Canada. While there was no need to go into the personal aspects of the situation, which he and Mr. Macmillan had discussed between themselves that morning, he thought it was necessary to recognize some of the general political problems. In 1911, the Conservatives had been greatly helped by the remarks by Champ Clark, in an exuberant moment, saying that the Stars and Stripes were going to fly over North America right to the North Pole.<sup>36</sup> Now there is some feeling arising in Canada that the United States is starting out to determine Canadian destinies and this would create interesting possibilities in the next few weeks. Mr. Kennedy was believed to be opposed to the continuation of the Commonwealth preferences and Mr. Ball was making various declarations which were contrary to Canada's best interests.

Mr. Diefenbaker then went on to ask what alternatives there would be should the Brussels negotiations fail, or what would happen if the general feeling at the Commonwealth Conference, at least among the older member countries – Australia, New Zealand and Canada – was that the terms of access would be detrimental to their interests and take a strong stand against the U.K. entry. Then we would really have arrived at a point of danger to the Commonwealth.

Mr. Macmillan then said that at the Prime Ministers' Meeting there should be first a discussion on the general concept of whether British entry into the E.E.C. would be advisable in the long run from the broadest point of view. The United Kingdom could not continue as the only free market in the world for manufactured and agricultural goods. (People like those in the United States can set up factories in Hong Kong and flood the United Kingdom.) In the light of the decision on the general question, it would then be necessary to consider whether, assuming British entry was agreed in principle, the available terms of entry would or would not be adequate from the viewpoint of the Commonwealth or of British agriculture.

Mr. Green said that on the general question referred to by Mr. Macmillan, he wondered whether the United Kingdom Government realized the special standing which its position in the Commonwealth gave to the United Kingdom's role in the world. If the United Kingdom were to move into Europe, its position as leader of the Commonwealth would be endangered. Already he had seen signs, e.g. at recent NATO Ministerial Meetings, that the United Kingdom was following policies designed not to antagonize France and other European countries. This trend would require modifications of United Kingdom policy which would be unpalatable to Canada and other Commonwealth countries. Asked by Mr. Macmillan to identify the policy problems he had in mind, Mr. Green referred to French policy in the United Nations and to certain aspects of German policy, as areas which might give rise to difficulty. Mr. Macmillan said that he preferred to think that the United Kingdom could have an influence on the European countries – he agreed that President de Gaulle was not easy to influence but there was a danger he might be followed by an extreme left-wing government. He went on to say that the absence of an agreed Commonwealth policy on such matters as defence and relations with the U.S.S.R. reduced the likelihood of conflict between the United Kingdom's European and Commonwealth obligations. He added that the British can have an influence on Europe, if in it, while if one looks 20 years ahead the United Kingdom outside of Europe would be in a much weaker economic position.

Mr. Hamilton said that the future of the world depended on the identity of those who controlled the resources of the world, which lay mainly in North America, Africa and South America. He thought that the emphasis should be on building a new strength and leadership in commodity agreements and in promoting the expansion of markets in the new countries. He thought that there was room for great development along these lines among Commonwealth countries and that the United Kingdom might consider this avenue of advance rather than associating itself with a grouping of European countries which did not control the major natural resources and which was bound to require tariff walls for its future economic growth.

Mr. Macmillan said that, while he did not agree that high tariff walls would characterize the Europe of the future if the United Kingdom were in it, Mr. Hamilton's point could be met from a European base. Lord Amory agreed that world-wide commodity agreements were desirable but warned that it was difficult to secure such agreements quickly or to make them universal. Mr. Macmillan went on to stress the importance of the movement of labour from the farms in Europe into industry, as being the essential means of increasing industrial production and of solving the farm problem.

Mr. Macmillan said the big problem confronting civilized people today is not trade but the vast arrival of the Communists which had created a totally new situation in the world. Mr. Green asked whether one did not make that worse by building up Europe against Russia, as the United States was doing. Mr. Macmillan said he disagreed on that point.

Mr. Fleming, referring again to the possibility of alternative solutions, wondered whether the United Kingdom had considered the conclusion of a comprehensive trade agreement with the E.E.C. as the United States was proposing, instead of membership. Mr. Macmillan said that this idea had been tried in the past effort for a free trade association but had failed. He thought it would have been much better but that it was too late now to revive it. Mr. Diefenbaker wondered how the United States could hope for a trading arrangement with the E.E.C. when the United Kingdom's attempt had failed. Mr. Macmillan said that President Kennedy was thinking of an arrangement with Europe that would include Britain. Mr. Fleming did not think that the United States plan was firmly linked to the United Kingdom entry into Europe. He thought the Americans saw the entry of the United Kingdom into the E.E.C. as clinching a final settlement to Franco-German rivalry and at the same time as dealing a death blow to Commonwealth preferences. He stressed the difficulty of persuading the United States of the connection between the preferential system and the continuing strength of the Commonwealth as a force for stability.

Mr. Macmillan said that, if the United Kingdom were not to join the E.E.C., one of two things might happen. Europe might become stronger – or it might break up, with consequences impossible to calculate. He thought the latter possibility was the more probable. He saw Germany as being then in a new Weimar period and France not far from a régime parallel to that of Léon Blum. Germany might be drawn then to Russia – or to another Hitler. Europe would have been Balkanized. He did not believe that the United Kingdom could afford, facing these possibilities, to remain apart from Europe. Twice in his lifetime, the United Kingdom had been drawn into European wars in spite of itself. If the United Kingdom were in Europe, it is much more likely to hold together.

Mr. Fleming said that he hoped Mr. Macmillan understood that there was no antagonism on Canada's part towards the Common Market as such. It was rather the likelihood that it would be inward-looking which caused Canada's concern. Mr. Macmillan said that all nations had their restrictive policies, e.g. Canadian shipping. Lord Amory asked whether the Common Market was really likely to intensify restrictionism. He thought there had been some hopeful signs to the contrary. Mr. Fleming was not sure that such signs would be borne out. Mr. Macmillan repeated that in any case the United Kingdom would have to determine some alternative to its present position as a free market. There will have to be an agonizing reappraisal whether the United Kingdom is in or out.

In conclusion, Mr. Diefenbaker summed up the Canadian position by saying that the Government was keenly concerned with the preservation of the Commonwealth and feared that its future would be endangered by the political implications of United Kingdom entry. The Government also felt strongly about the United States pressure on the United Kingdom which had an effect contrary to Canadian interests. Mr. Diefenbaker went on to say that he knew President Kennedy was concerned about the position of the Canadian Government on such matters as mining and oil exploration and on magazines. The purpose of the Government's stands on these issues was to preserve the Canadian identity. The Government of Canada could not be unconcerned that, if the United Kingdom should join the E.E.C., the basic buttress of the Commonwealth might go. He thought that the position Canada had taken on the Common Market problem might help to strengthen the United Kingdom's bargaining power in the negotiations. He noted Mr. Macmillan's reference in his recent New York speech<sup>37</sup> to the effect that, if it came to a final choice, the United Kingdom would remain within the Commonwealth rather than accept membership in the E.E.C.

Mr. Macmillan thanked Mr. Diefenbaker and acknowledged that there were great difficulties in any course. He asked that the matter be looked at in the light of the world as a whole. Somehow or other, the forces of the free world must be mobilized if we were to survive. It was necessary to adjust our minds to changing world conditions.

In a brief reference to nuclear testing, Mr. Green expressed regret that the United States had decided to resume tests in the atmosphere. Mr. Macmillan said that the decision had been taken in the strong belief that the Soviet Government intended in any case to conduct another series of tests. Mr. Green asked why the United States had not waited until after the Soviet Union had resumed tests. Mr. Macmillan appeared to agree that this might have been wise.

SUMMARY OF CONVERSATION BETWEEN PRIME MINISTER MACMILLAN AND PRIME MINISTER DIEFENBAKER, EAST BLOCK, OTTAWA, MAY 1

The meeting began at 11.00 a.m. and lasted for 50 minutes. Sir Norman Brook and Lord Amory were with Mr. Macmillan; Mr. Fleming, Mr. Harkness and Mr. Bryce were present on the Canadian side.

Communiqué

2. Formal agreement was given to the communiqué, which had already been approved separately by the Prime Ministers.<sup>38</sup>

Southeast Asia

3. Referring to Laos, Mr. Macmillan expressed satisfaction with the present state of Anglo-American understanding. Largely as a result of Harriman's influence, the United States was now fully persuaded of the importance of achieving the formation of a government under Souvanna Phouma. The disquieting question, however, was whether the situation in Laos had deteriorated beyond the point where a neutral government could be established, an outcome which six months ago would certainly have been possible. Mr. Macmillan did not think that the Russians had behaved improperly in the Laos negotiations; the Russians were probably motivated by a desire to prevent Communist Chinese gains in that area.

4. The situation in South Vietnam had become much worse in recent months. The United States had found it necessary to increase the scope of its assistance in order to deal with spreading guerrilla activity. This situation did hold dangers, but Mr. Macmillan implied that the United States could hardly be blamed for exceeding the levels of military assistance laid down in the Geneva Agreements since the communist side had themselves violated these Agreements in various ways.

5. In reply to Mr. Diefenbaker's question about Greater Malaysia, Mr. Macmillan expressed United Kingdom support for the proposed merger of Malaya, Singapore, Brunei and Sarawak. It had two major advantages. From the United Kingdom standpoint, it would ease the security position in Singapore and relieve the United Kingdom of anxieties regarding the future of the Base. From the Malayan point of view, it would give the Tunku a broader framework within which the dominance of the Chinese element could be forestalled. The United Kingdom was now awaiting the report of the Cobbold Commission<sup>39</sup> which was expected at the end of May. It would then be necessary for the United Kingdom to satisfy itself that public opinion in the various regions was not hostile to the merger. Mr. Macmillan said that the Tunku felt that one consequence of the success of the plan would be to strengthen his hand vis-à-vis Indonesia.

Cuba

6. The Prime Ministers reviewed the United Kingdom and Canadian experiences in dealing with Cuba. Mr. Macmillan thought that Canada's trade and financial interests had suffered less than those of any other Western country. The United Kingdom was continuing to do ordinary trade with Cuba but the volume had dropped off particularly because of Cuba's shortage of foreign exchange and because credit terms were not extended.

7. Mr. Diefenbaker thought that Canadian limitations on the export to Cuba of military and strategic goods were more restrictive than those of other NATO countries. There was agreement that the United States was at present virtually powerless to affect developments in Cuba and that United States efforts to promote a trade embargo were of limited effectiveness.

8. Mr. Macmillan said that he was afraid that Castro's influence was spreading. Mr. Diefenbaker agreed and said that there were at least five countries in Latin America seriously vulnerable to Castro's influence.

Soviet Colonialism

9. Mr. Diefenbaker recalled his speech in the United Nations in 1960<sup>40</sup> and emphasized how sensitive the Soviet Union and Soviet bloc countries were to Western attacks on Soviet colonialism. He underlined the strength of feeling among groups of Eastern European origin in Canada. He expressed the hope that Canada would be able to secure support for a resolution condemning Soviet colonialism at the General Assembly and asked that the United Kingdom give "the fullest consideration" to supporting a propaganda offensive against the U.S.S.R. Mr. Macmillan expressed sympathy with the general concept of Mr. Diefenbaker's suggestion. He thought that the Canadian Government was in a particularly good position to follow it up. He hoped that the Canadian Government would continue its canvass of the opinions of other countries. It was necessary to face the fact that the African and Asian countries had a double standard in their judgment of "colonialism." They did not accept that the Soviet form was analogous to the Western. It would be a mistake to proceed with a resolution unless there was prior assurance that it would be successful. A failure at an early stage, e.g., if only a handful of votes were obtained for a Western resolution, would be most unfortunate. He thought that a concerted programme of speeches by friendly countries would have a useful effect in itself and would demonstrate whether it would be wise to proceed at a later stage to the submission of a resolution.

Neutralist Nations

10. Mr. Macmillan said that he sensed a certain improvement in the viewpoint of African and Asian countries on international questions. Mr. Diefenbaker agreed. Mr. Macmillan said that he thought that the Soviet record on assistance to the new countries had fallen short of Soviet promises and that this was affecting the outlook of these countries.

Congo

11. In reply to questions from Mr. Harkness, Mr. Macmillan said that the objective in the Congo should be to "try and get the United Nations to disengage." He had found that this was U Thant's approach and that U Thant was not trying to build a United Nations empire in the Congo, or indeed in other regions. When Mr. Macmillan remarked that there had been an improvement in Belgian relations with the Central Government of the Congo, Mr. Harkness expressed the view that the objective should be to pave the way for Belgian technical and professional people progressively to replace United Nations personnel. Mr. Harkness gave it as his understanding that the Indians in particular had caused trouble in the Congo. Mr. Macmillan commented that Indians generally did not get along with Africans.

United Nations Finances

12. There was a brief discussion of the finances of the United Nations about which Mr. Macmillan had spoken to U Thant last week. The Acting Secretary General had spoken of the need to scale down special operations, such as the Congo, in view of the difficulty of securing financial support on a broad basis.

International Monetary Fund

13. Mr. Fleming asked whether the United Kingdom had taken action on the plan for stand-by credits to supplement the reserves of the IMF. Mr. Macmillan indicated that, although the necessary action had not yet been taken, he saw no reason to anticipate difficulty. He agreed when Mr. Fleming stressed the value of the new plan as a means of forestalling potential runs on national currencies.

SECRET. OPIMMEDIATE.

INDIAN REQUEST FOR CANADIAN MILITARY EQUIPMENT

Krishna Menon requested me to call this morning and made following "urgent" request for specific military equipment. He would appreciate early information as to quantity which could be made available from present Canadian stocks.

(a) Dakotas and Transport Aircraft. He renewed request for such aircraft and hopes they might be available at "knock-down prices."

(b) Fairchild Jackets. While these are not repeat not manufactured in Canada, he wonders how many Canada can spare for immediate use.

(c) Helicopters. Wants information about what type are available of either Canadian made or imported helicopters and if so information regarding altitude and loads.

(d) Long Range Mortars. India must have long range mortars – 10 thousand yards. Can Canadian army make 50 or 100 available immediately? (It was lack of these said Menon which defeated Indian troops as mortars purchased from Britain have only range of one thousand to four thousand.)

(e) Mountain Artillery. Probably 75mm.

2. Menon said India has purchased two Caribou in Canada which will be flown here immediately and hopes six more will be available each month if USA agrees to release of aircraft which have been ordered. He hopes Canadian authorities will use influence on USA to do so. Menon said commercial transaction involves "cash over counter" but due to urgency of India's requirements there was no repeat no other alternative. India still plans to manufacture certain parts and assemble Caribou here. This will require he said approximately six months.

3. Indian High Commissioner in Ottawa has telegraphed that Canada is sympathetic and will assist if India will specify requirements. Menon fears Indian High Commissioner may have been too optimistic and has therefore asked me to impress you with "India's desperate need in this crisis" to obtain immediate information and supply of these specific requirements.

4. Menon is most anxious to keep request secret as India is trying to obtain military aid from other Western sources and does not repeat not want USSR to know that India is requesting such aid.

High Commissioner of India to Prime Minister

Ottawa, October 27, 1962

My dear Prime Minister,

I have been asked by my Prime Minister to convey the following message to you:

“Your Excellency,

I am taking the liberty of addressing you in regard to a very serious situation that has arisen on our frontiers because of the armed aggression of Chinese forces on our territory. The consequences of this large scale aggression are not only serious for India but also for the rest of the world.

Conditioned as we are by our historical background, and traditions of tolerance, understanding and peace, we have ever since India became independent consistently followed a policy of peace and friendly relations with all countries. Abhorrence of war and violence is part of our national tradition.

We understand the horrors of war and all our efforts have been directed to the prevention of war and the preservation of peace. We have endeavoured to follow the same policy of peace in our differences with our neighbours. That is why, when the Chinese aggression first started in Ladakh five years ago, we showed patience and restraint. Even though 12,000 square miles of Indian territory was occupied by the Chinese forces we did not force a crisis, but continued to explore avenues of a peaceful and honourable settlement. In 1960, the Chinese Prime Minister expressed a desire to meet me, and I met him readily, in order to find some way of resolving the differences between us peacefully. The differences were not resolved, and we agreed that officials of both the Governments should examine all the facts. The report produced by our officials fully supported our position in regard to the traditional and customary boundary between India and Tibet, which had been repeatedly confirmed by agreements and treaties. It was my hope that these facts would be considered by the Chinese Government, and a further effort would be made to resolve the differences peacefully. However, the Chinese aggression continued and was even intensified. We were obliged therefore to take limited defensive measures to halt this aggressive advance. While taking these measures, however, we continued to make peaceful approaches with a view to easing tensions, so that a proper climate might be created for further talks to resolve the differences.

While these approaches were being made, and we were hoping that they would lead to results, the Chinese forces suddenly on the 8th September, 1962, made a fresh incursion into our territory. They crossed the international boundary in the Eastern sector, which they had respected for twelve years since they came into Tibet. Our frontier in that sector, traditionally and by treaty, is the high ridge of the Himalaya Mountains, which forms the watershed. We could have taken immediate action to resist this further aggression. However, being wedded to the ways of peace, we continued our effort to persuade the Chinese to end this aggression by withdrawing from our territory, more particularly in the Eastern sector, which had been invaded for the first time for ages past on the 8th of September. We pointed out the correct facts to them about the location of the border, which was the high ridge of the Himalaya Mountains. We also took some steps for the defence of that border.

While an exchange of notes on this subject was going on the Chinese, after a number of probing attacks, made a massive attack on our defence forces on the morning of the 20th October, all along the India-China border in the Eastern sector as well as the Western sector. An attack on this scale could only have been made after careful preparation. Our defence forces have put up a stiff resistance, but they have been pushed back by greatly superior numbers and massive weapons. In spite of these set-backs our resistance will continue, for we are determined to defend our country and to put an end to aggression.

It is a matter of deep regret that the Chinese in their relations with India have paid back evil for good. Friendly and peaceful relations with China have been our basic policy ever since India became independent. We have consistently followed this policy and gone out of our way to support China's case in the councils of the world. We regret that, in their relations with India, China has not merely shown a hostile attitude but has also resorted to dissimulation. Even the pre-meditated and massive attack on our defence forces on the 20th October has been represented by China as an attack by Indian forces on China's border guards. That this assertion is completely false is clear from the weight and intensity of the Chinese attack, which is not confined to the Eastern sector but includes other sectors of the India-China border. No self-respecting country, and certainly not India with her love of freedom, can submit to such aggression, whatever may be the consequences. Nor can India allow China's occupation of Indian territory to be used as a bargaining counter, for dictating to India a settlement of the differences regarding the boundary, on China's terms.

This is not a mere boundary dispute, or a question of small territorial frontier adjustments. Apart from the vast and fantastic claims that China has made, China had already occupied 12,000 square miles of Indian territory during the last five years. While notes were being exchanged for arranging talks and discussions to ease tensions, and even dates and places were being suggested, further aggression by China started on 8th September, and further areas of Indian territory were occupied in a new sector. The issue involved is not one of small territorial gains one way or the other, but of standards of international behaviour between neighbouring countries, and whether the world will allow the principle of "might is right" to prevail in international relations. Bearing this in mind, India will continue to resist aggression, both to preserve her honour and integrity, and to prevent international standards from deteriorating into the jungle law of "might is right." When aggression is continuously taking place, and vast Chinese armies are moving further into our territory, how can we discuss or talk about a peaceful settlement? The first essential is that the Chinese forces along the India-China border should go back at least to where they were prior to the 8th September, 1962.

I have ventured to give you this short account of the crisis that has arisen on the Indian frontier with China. The story of aggression is a long one, going back several years. The most recent aggression in our Eastern sector, which began on September 8 and has, since the Chinese massive attack along the entire India-China frontier, which started on 20th October, resulted in serious conflicts, has brought matters to a crisis. This crisis is not only of India but of the world, and will have far-reaching consequences on the standards of international behaviour and on the peace of the world. We cannot submit to this law of the jungle which affects our integrity and the honour of our motherland.

In the hour of crisis, when we are engaged in resisting this aggression, we are confident that we shall have your sympathy and support, as well as the sympathy and support of all countries, not only because of their friendly relations with us, but also because our struggle is in the interests of world peace, and is directed to the elimination of deceit, dissimulation and force in international relations.

With kind regards,

Yours sincerely,

JAWAHARLAL NEHRU.”

Ottawa, October 29, 1962

My dear High Commissioner,

I wish to thank you for your letter of October 27, 1962, conveying to me a message from Prime Minister Nehru.

In return, I would be grateful if you could transmit to your Prime Minister the following message. I assume also that there will be no objection on the part of the Government of India that both messages be made public:

“My dear Prime Minister,

I wish to thank you for the message which your High Commissioner transmitted to me on October 27. I much appreciated your courtesy in providing me with background information on the dispute with China concerning your northern border and the policy of your Government in the face of armed attack by the Chinese People's Republic.

As I have already stated in the House of Commons,<sup>41</sup> Canada deplores the unprovoked attack by China on India and I can assure you of the sympathy and support of the Canadian people for your determination to defend and protect your national territory and heritage. The Canadian Government stands ready to do what it can to be of help at this time.

I had occasion yesterday in the House of Commons to refer to this matter and I spoke in the following terms:

“I should now say a word with regard to another problem which faces the world. The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) has referred to the Berlin situation and there is of course the problem which is being faced in India by the people of that nation.

Last Monday I informed the House that if the Indian Government should approach Canada for assistance, such a request would receive the fullest consideration. I now wish to report to the House that a request has been received from the Indian Government and that we are taking immediate steps to respond. On Friday we gave the Indian authorities a preliminary report on the kinds of military equipment available in Canada. These include Caribou transport planes. In a day or so I hope to be able to inform the House of the details of the supply of equipment to India.

Speaking for the Canadian Government, and I hope for all members of the House, we are deeply disturbed at the attacks which are being made at this time against India, a fellow member of the Commonwealth. India can rest assured that the Canadian Government will cooperate to the fullest in helping that nation acquire those items which it needs to defend itself in this critical hour."

With kind regards,

Yours sincerely,

SINO-INDIAN DISPUTE

When he was in New York on October 29, the Minister discussed this subject with the Indian Permanent Representative Mr. B.N. Chakravarty. The Minister expressed Canada's sympathy with India's very difficult position and said that we were anxious to assist India in a way that would be practical and helpful. He added that he was sure that this general wish to help reflected the opinions of Canadians from one end of Canada to the other.

2. Mr. Chakravarty said that he would communicate this expression of sympathy to New Delhi where it would be very much appreciated. He said that India would probably need small arms and ammunition as well as aircraft but he was not sure whether the former would be requested from the United States, the United Kingdom, or Canada. The Minister said that some technical liaison channel would have to be established, and the Indian Representative said that perhaps one of the Indian attachés who was conversant with these questions should come to Ottawa.

3. Mr. Chakravarty said that India would wish to obtain what it could from Commonwealth sources, however, in the short term, the intention appeared to be to get weapons and equipment quickly from United States stores in nearby Thailand. This might be done before the end of the week. In addition, Britain was airlifting small arms to India within the next few days. Because of the distances involved, Canada might be a long-term supplier.

4. Mr. Chakravarty said that India anticipated the struggle with Communist China would continue throughout the winter. There were some indications that the Chinese wanted a cease-fire but it would be wrong to exaggerate the difficulties of winter warfare in the area and the Indians considered that the Chinese peace feelers were deceptive. The Chinese probably wanted a cease-fire for the purpose of preparing to resume their offensive in the spring.

5. The Indian Permanent Representative said that unless the Chinese were prepared to go back to the McMahon Line<sup>42</sup> and negotiate from that position, India would continue to fight. This was a better position than agreeing to negotiate from present positions on the ground. Moreover, if India could move in adequate arms and military equipment during the winter, when Indian lines of communication were much better than those of the Chinese, they might be able to push the Chinese back. When spring came, this factor would operate in reverse and China would have the advantage.

6. Mr. Chakravarty stressed the seriousness of the situation and said that there were at least ten well-equipped Chinese divisions in action on India's frontiers.

INDIA'S REQUEST FOR CANADIAN MILITARY EQUIPMENT

The following, for your information, is a brief report on where this request now stands. We are also submitting for your consideration possible moves which could be taken almost immediately in response to it.

2. Our High Commissioner in India called on Krishna Menon on Monday. The latter expressed his appreciation for your assurance of immediate and sympathetic consideration of India's request. He also asked for information about the number of F-86s available and the extent of the work required on the CF-100 all-weather fighters (we had indicated to the Indian High Commissioner last Saturday that some of these aircraft would be available although requiring some work). These questions are being looked into. Mr. Menon reiterated the hope that equipment would be made available at the lowest possible price on easy terms.

3. Following inter-departmental discussions full lists are being prepared of available equipment from Canadian armed forces surplus, for sale on the commercial market or off the production line. Possible methods of financing sales of these items to India are also being considered. We shall be reporting further on these questions shortly. We have also brought to the attention of the Indian authorities a list of aircraft available commercially in Canada (i.e. from TCA, Spartan Air Services, etc.).

4. In addition to approaches to Britain and the United States an Indian approach to the French has also been reported. United States officials have raised with our Embassy in Washington the question of coordinating responses to these Indian requests, perhaps through a coordinating group either in Washington – where the Indians have a purchasing mission – in New Delhi or both. This group would ensure some degree of standardization of equipment and ammunition and perhaps possible substitutes whenever certain pieces of equipment needed by India are not available. This question will probably have to be considered as soon as the Indians come to grips with detailed procurement issues; they have been invited to send some officials to Ottawa for technical discussions.

5. Arrangements for Indian military purchases in Canada may clearly take a while to firm up. As the Canadian Government may wish to announce without delay what measures are being taken to assist India in view of the unanimous support in the House of Commons for a forthcoming Canadian response and of the prompt British and United States reactions, we are submitting for your consideration the following possible moves:

(a) Six RCAF Dakotas not immediately required by Canadian forces are now available and could be given to India (technically a token price might have to be set) by Order-in-Council under the terms of existing legislation. Dakotas were among the items specifically mentioned in India's request and we understand Mr. Harkness has in principle agreed to their release. These aircraft could be flown to India within a few days (possibly carrying some automatic weapons if arrangements could be worked out soon enough).

(b) For the longer term the Indian Government could be informed that to the extent foreign exchange was spent on the purchase of equipment in Canada – such as Caribou or Otter aircraft – the recent cuts made in our Colombo Plan contribution to India would be restored. This would enable the Indian Government to continue using for development purposes funds which might otherwise be diverted to military procurement. In diverting these funds the Indians might in particular curtail their purchases of industrial materials for Canada; if the restored aid took the form of such materials it would be of benefit to our exports; it would also encourage the purchase of Caribous and contribute to India's defence efforts.

6. These two possible steps have not been fully discussed inter-departmentally, but we should appreciate your reactions. If they commend themselves to you the quickest way to move ahead would be an early Cabinet discussion. In the meantime you might find it profitable to raise this orally with your colleagues, the Minister for National Defence and the Minister of Finance. Their Departments will have to receive from them appropriate directives if the kind of help suggested by Ministerial statements in the House is to move forward promptly.<sup>43</sup>

SINO-INDIAN BORDER DISPUTE

Note: The following appraisal represents the views of the United States as of October 31, 1962.

On or about September 8, 1962, Chinese Communists established outposts in that portion of the Northeast Frontier Agency adjacent to the Bhutan border. This action probably was in response to attempts by the Indians since last spring to check or reverse creeping Chinese advances in Ladakh. The Indians attempted to dislodge the Chinese from this new position and announced that they intended "to throw the Chinese out."

Intensive fighting broke out on October 20 when the Chinese advanced simultaneously in the northeast corner of the Indo-Bhutan-Tibetan border and against Indian positions in Ladakh in the northwest. In the northeast, Chinese forces have pushed the Indians beyond Towang,

Go ahead with discussion with the other dep[artmen]ts and also with Herb Moran. H.C. G[reen] which is located some fifteen miles south of the McMahon line. (On October 27 Ambassador Galbraith made the following statement regarding the McMahon line: "The McMahon line is the accepted international border and is sanctioned by modern usage. Accordingly we regard it as the northern border of the Northeast Frontier Agency area.") We expect that a strong Indian stand will be made along the natural defense line at Sela, southeast of Towang. Further to the east, near the Burmese border, the Indians appear to be holding the Chinese advance at Walong, some fifteen miles south of the border. In Ladakh the Chinese are believed to have advanced to the limit of their claim, which is deep inside Indian claimed territory.

An important factor in the Chinese success thus far has been Chinese ability to bring supplies by motor road to within a few miles of the fronts. The Indian front line troops are supplied by coolie, pack train, and undependable air drop. Furthermore, Indian weapons appear to be obsolete. What the Chinese military objectives are is not yet clear, although it seems doubtful that the Chinese have territorial ambitions beyond what they have hitherto claimed. The mounting of a Chinese drive on the Indian plains from Tibet would entail enormous supply problems and would risk the virtual certainty of a major war. We do not believe the Chinese desire a major war at this time. It appears that the political objectives of the Chinese are aimed at humiliating the Indians, destroying their prestige, and forcing them into negotiation on Peiping's terms.

The Chinese Communist attack and the deteriorating military situation are leading the Indian leaders to consider some fundamental reassessments in Indian foreign policy. A Pravda editorial of October 25 is probably regarded as convincing evidence that the Soviet Union could not or would not intercede effectively with the Chinese Communists, and that India must rely upon the West for help.

In a letter to President Kennedy dated October 26, corresponding to letters sent to other nations, Prime Minister Nehru requested United States sympathy and support. On October 29 when Ambassador Galbraith delivered President Kennedy's reply promising United States sympathy and support, Prime Minister Nehru personally requested United States assistance in meeting India's requirements. Later that same day the Indian Government handed the United States Embassy at New Delhi a list of priority needs. All the equipment requested by the Indians to date is composed of basic infantry and infantry support items.

The United States believes it is in the free world's short-term, as well as basic, long-range strategic interests to assist India in meeting its defense requirements and to demonstrate to India that the nations of the free world are India's real friends and can be counted upon in a time of national crisis. We believe that early fiscal assistance and a psychological "lift" are vital to India's resolute but tired and disillusioned leaders.<sup>44</sup>

RELATIONS BETWEEN INDIA AND PAKISTAN

The Pakistani High Commissioner called on me yesterday at his request. He brought with him a copy of the statement made by President Ayub Khan on November 5 (attached).<sup>45</sup> He mentioned that he had also sent a copy to the Minister's office.

2. Mr. Khan then explained that his Government was concerned by the continued military build-up on the Pakistani border and more by the supply of military equipment being sent to India.

3. On the first, he gave me figures for the Indian forces on the various parts of the border as follows:

(1) In Ladakh, one division, one brigade.

(2) In Nefa, three divisions.

(3) In Kashmir on the Pakistani border, three large divisions.

(4) On the Pakistani border south of Kashmir, one armoured division, one armoured brigade, one infantry division, one infantry brigade.

(5) On the East Pakistan border, one division, two brigades.

4. On the second point, he gave me figures for Indian military expenditure taken, he said, from Indian official publications. These showed $619 million in 1960-61. He claimed that the Indian military strength was consistently three times that of Pakistan. This, taken with the additional supplies now being sent or anticipated, produced a situation which was of considerable concern to Pakistan. He obviously sought to indicate that the military build-up was not for one war but a possible two.

5. At this point, I took the opportunity of explaining the Canadian position. We were faced with an aggression by Communist China against India and we had immediately offered to give what assistance we could. Mr. Khan asked questions about what we proposed to send, how long this programme would go on and whether we were co-ordinating our shipments with those of the United States and the United Kingdom. I answered that the whole process was in an early stage, that we had sent some Dakotas which we could spare and which were asked for; other requests would no doubt be made, some of which we might be able to meet. I thought, however, that our participation would be minor compared to that of the two great powers. On co-ordination I said that to my knowledge no specific machinery had yet been set up, that obviously there would have to be some kind of consultation if the programme as a whole was to be a coherent one.

6. We spent a long time discussing the relations between India and Pakistan and, of course, in particular Kashmir. I asked first about the state of the Pakistani negotiations with China on the eastern fringe of Kashmir. Mr. Khan said that these began about a year and a half ago arising over a Chinese offer to discuss demarcation (an offer also made to Burma and Nepal).

Somewhat later a meeting was held, and an agreement was reached on procedure for further discussions. Subsequent discussions have not yet taken place.

7. Mr. Khan contrasted the Pakistani attitude towards these negotiations with the comparable one taken by India. The Pakistanis had explained that on this western strip Pakistan was concerned with an area, the defence of which was her responsibility. Nothing was said about ownership and it was added that any agreement would be subject to ratification when the Kashmir question had been settled. On the other hand, when India made an offer in the United Nations to discuss with China the Kashmir border, Pakistan had given formal notice that it would not necessarily be bound by the results of negotiation concerning a territory not owned by India.

8. Mr. Khan having raised the question of the appeals made to his Government to relieve the pressure on India to allow concentration on the Chinese hostilities, there was an opportunity for getting his views on whether any such arrangement was possible. Making reference to his earlier statements on Indian military capacity and the increase of this by western shipments, he said that they could not possibly give a blank cheque to India in view of the latter's record on Kashmir. He recounted Ayub Khan's efforts to discuss the Kashmir question with Nehru. The former had first gone to India for this purpose without securing a private interview. Later Nehru had visited Pakistan and there had been private discussions. According to Khan, Ayub had talked at some length on his desire to reach a settlement. To this Nehru had made no response and after an hour or so had only remarked that attention should be given to the division of the books in the old India Office in London.

9. I suggested that on one extreme it would not be practical to envisage a final settlement of the ownership of Kashmir (necessarily following long negotiation) in time to affect the present hostilities. On the other extreme, Mr. Khan had said that his Government could not accept a simple statement that the Pakistanis would do nothing to embarrass the Indians during hostilities provided that at the end of those hostilities negotiations began on Kashmir. They had seen too much of vague Indian promises ending in the kind of discussion mentioned above.

10. I asked the High Commissioner then if he saw any compromise between these two extremes. Was there any conceivable arrangement that could be reached to cover the period of hostilities? To this he could give no reply.

11. One incidental point interested me. After listening to his account of the differences between Indian and Pakistan forces (although he avoided my question as to what Pakistani forces were on the Indian and Kashmir borders) I asked why the Indians should maintain a three to one majority. He said he could not explain this but launched into a somewhat subjective account of the history of old India leading to the conclusion that the Hindus felt safe only when they had overwhelming superiority. Goa, he said, was a recent example of this state of mind.

12. After a long conversation, Mr. Khan said that he was available if I should wish to see him again. I said that we were anxious to keep in touch with him and that I hoped that he, for his part, would let me know if any new points arose for examination.

BORDER DISPUTE BETWEEN INDIA AND CHINA

20. The Prime Minister said that consideration should be given to whether a statement should be made in the House of Commons to the effect that assurances were being required that assistance given by Canada to India would not be used other than against Chinese forces. The United States had made this a condition respecting the assistance it was giving. Pakistan was concerned about the war matériel and other support being given to India and might take the view that it should withdraw from the CENTO and SEATO alliances. It had stood by the Commonwealth in these alliances but had received no thanks. Perhaps this would be a time to urge upon India and Pakistan the necessity of making strong efforts to settle their dispute over Kashmir and perhaps also the Canadian position with respect to the sale of wheat to China should be made clear.

21. During the discussion the following points were made,

(a) It was desirable that such a statement should be made and that Pakistan's position as a member of the Commonwealth and its various alliances should be underlined. The public should also be told that the best trained and equipped troops in the Indian Army were being held on the Pakistan border despite the apparent reverses suffered by Indian troops at the hands of the Chinese.

(b) It should be ascertained whether Prime Minister Macmillan and President Kennedy were considering putting pressure on the two countries to settle their dispute at this time. This should be done before a statement was made in the House. It would be preferable if Canada's statement were to be made before and not after any similar statements by the United States or Britain. Prime Minister Nehru was standing out against settlement of the Kashmir dispute, whereas President Ayoub Khan was anxious to get it settled.

(c) It would not be advisable to make a statement in the House of Commons on this subject. If the object was to get India and Pakistan to agree to a settlement of the Kashmir dispute it would not be furthered by an admonishment in the House. More could be done by mentioning the need to co-operate to the Indian High Commissioner.

(d) Not only should the views of the U.K. and the U.S. be sought and the Indian High Commissioner told that it was difficult to see how India could fight a war with a large part of its Armed Forces tied down on the Pakistan border, but a statement should also be made in the House of Commons telling the Canadian people the facts. There should be no suggestion that Canada was holding back aid to India because of the Kashmir dispute or because of the position of Pakistan in the Commonwealth.

22. The Cabinet agreed,

(a) that Canada should ask India's assurance that arms supplied by Canada should not be used against Pakistan;

(b) there should be no suggestion that Canadian aid to India would be discontinued or have any conditions attached other than that contained in (a) above; and,

(c) the Prime Minister might determine what he should say publicly on this subject, and its relation to a settlement of the Kashmir issue.

SECRET. CANADIAN EYES ONLY.

[London], November 21, 1962

You will have seen the very serious statement made by Mr. Nehru in his Parliament on the 19th November. Clearly the Chinese attacks have taken on a new and formidable form.

2. Bomdilla, the headquarters of the NEFA command, has been surrounded and the equivalent of two divisions are in difficulties and it is not certain how many will be able to extricate themselves.

3. In a message to me Mr. Nehru has said – “the Chinese are by and large in possession of the greater portion of the NEFA and are poised to over-run Chushul in Ladakh. There is nothing to stop them after Chushul till they reach Leh, the headquarters of the Ladakh province of Kashmir.”

“Events have moved very fast and we are facing a grim situation in our struggle for survival and in defending all that India stands for against an unscrupulous and powerful aggressor.”

4. It is still uncertain whether this will develop into a major assault or whether there may yet be any possibility of negotiation. But should all other efforts to stop the Chinese fail, we and the Americans and perhaps our other Western allies may need to intervene militarily.

5. The Americans have told us that they are sending today a high level mission consisting of Harriman, Nitze, Johnson and a four star General to India to assess the position. We are also sending out immediately a similar team which will leave tomorrow. This will include the Chief of the Imperial General Staff and a suitable military team together with Mr. Tilney, Parliamentary Under-Secretary for Commonwealth Relations. Duncan Sandys was planning a visit this week to Pakistan and India but is unfortunately ill; otherwise he would have gone, but he hopes to be able to make his visit next week. Our idea is that our team would be able to hold discussions with the Indians about the situation and see what we can do to help; in particular, we hope to be able to explore what is on Mr. Nehru's mind as to their military plans, whether there is any possibility of his being prepared to negotiate in any form, whether he wishes to take the matter to the United Nations and whether there is any form in which he would like the support of Commonwealth countries as a whole to be demonstrated.

6. As you know, both we and the Americans have met all the Indian demands for supplies to date, but they have now asked for very much more, especially combat aircraft and crews for fighters from the Americans and the two missions will be able to explore all this on the spot.

7. Both we and the Americans think that it is most important that before we do anything further there should be some understanding over Kashmir and our latest reports show that the Indians may be thinking of making a move.

8. I thought you would wish to know our thoughts on this situation which is full of potential danger and I will keep you in close touch with any developments. I shall be glad to receive any thoughts that you may have.

SINO-INDIAN CONFLICT: SUGGESTED REPLY TO PRIME MINISTER MACMILLAN'S MESSAGE OF NOVEMBER 21

I attach for your approval a suggested reply to Mr. Macmillan's message.

SECRET. CANADIAN EYES ONLY.

I was glad to receive your message of November 21.

Since your message, developments have continued to move swiftly; India's military situation has worsened further, and the Chinese have announced their unilateral cease-fire and withdrawal plan.

It is still not clear exactly what the Chinese have in mind and what will be the Indian decision in the grave dilemma in which the Chinese move has placed them. It is clear, however, that Prime Minister Nehru and his Government are in a very difficult position. Mr. Nehru may feel it necessary to reject part or all of the Chinese conditions as a result of the emotional response in India to military reverses and of temporarily diminished international prestige. However, I continue to hope that some accommodation may be possible which would not bear too heavily on India's national pride.

I am sure that the consultations which your team and the American one will have in New Delhi will be enlightening and helpful. I should be glad if you would let me know what the findings of the British team are. Meanwhile, no doubt, consultations between our officials will continue.

We have, as you know, taken from the first a firm stand in support of India against Chinese aggression. We have been in constant touch with Indian authorities on their requirements for military supplies and will continue to do what we can to meet their requests as these are made.

Like you, I have been giving a good deal of thought recently to the question of relations between India and Pakistan. I stated in the House on November 20, after a brief review of India-Pakistan relations:

“In the present circumstances, when Communist Chinese aggression has forced India into a bloody conflict, the entire sub-continent, home of both India and Pakistan, is exposed to a grave threat. We would hope that this ominous situation might give new impetus to the search for a settlement of outstanding differences between these two fellow members of the Commonwealth. Such a settlement would, among other things, facilitate a concentration of effort against the invading forces on the northern frontier. If there is anything Canada can do to further such a settlement, the Canadian Government will respond whole-heartedly.”

Although the Press have made deductions from these remarks, turning them into proposals for a “non-aggression pact” or an offer of “mediation,” I did not in fact think it wise at this stage to make any suggestion at all until there was some evidence as to what steps by either government might appear possible. I am very interested to know from your message that the Indians may have been thinking of making some move, and would be grateful if you would keep me informed of any such developments. I earnestly hope, however, that the friends of both countries may be able to use their influence to avoid a further divergence between India and Pakistan at a time when there is such a need and perhaps an opportunity for a settlement of disputes. Similarly, a protracted war between India and China would have the most serious effects on the Indian economy and political structure, whereas such a war might be acceptable to the Chinese, who could to a considerable degree control its extent.

SINO-INDIAN CONFLICT AND INDO-PAKISTAN RELATIONS

While Pakistan High Commissioner Hilaly was jubilant prior to de facto cease fire over defeats being administered to Indian army, he was depressed and greatly disturbed when I saw him on November 25 by military support being given India by USA and UK. He fears massive support from Western Powers which would place India in impregnable position with respect to Pakistan.

2. Hilaly said Pakistan is now in a state of ferment which could be very dangerous. Communist influence was gaining ground. Chinese offer of non-aggression and mutual defence pact without requiring Pakistan's withdrawal from either CENTO or SEATO was very tempting to many Pakistanis. He said India was doing absolutely nothing to improve relations with Pakistan. President Ayub's ability to control situation was ebbing fast. Nehru is becoming more intransigent on Kashmir question and unless pressure is exerted on him by Western friends of both India and Pakistan, situation will become worse. When I enquired if he did not repeat not think most productive pressure on Nehru would be from within India itself, he replied that "Indian pressure on Nehru to solve problem of Kashmir was too little, too slow and completely inadequate to meet emergency now existing." He added that effective pressure could only be brought on Nehru by powers supplying India with arms during this crisis.

3. From subsequent conversations I have had, it is obvious that Americans are exerting the pressures considered necessary by Hilaly with, I am afraid, nothing but adverse results so far. I told Harriman's aide, Sullivan, on November 26 that I had heard Senator Mansfield and his fellow senators who visited Delhi last week had "deeply wounded" Nehru by pressing him to make a gesture regarding Kashmir. Sullivan replied that if senators had "deeply" wounded Nehru, then Harriman must have "mortally" wounded him in his recent conversations. Harriman apparently minced no repeat no words when he told Nehru that if present cease fire continued President Kennedy would be unable to obtain USA congressional approval for extensive military aid to India unless Indians adopted different attitude to Pakistan.

4. I had previously forwarded Prime Minister Diefenbaker's statement in the House (your reference telegram) to the Prime Minister and had told Gundevia I would like to discuss Indo-Pakistan relations with him. November 26 Gundevia told me that Prime Minister had been very disturbed by USA attitude. Soon after seeing Harriman, he had told Gundevia in very strong terms that he could not repeat not understand how "our friends could blackmail us in our moment of crisis." Gundevia reiterated the blackmail theme to me and deplored the way in which Pakistan was taking advantage of a situation which threatened both countries to try to wring concessions out of India. Pakistan would prevent Western powers from giving India military aid to defend herself against Chinese regardless of fact that Pakistan has itself been beneficiary of that aid. Pakistan claims to fear Indian use of these military supplies to attack Pakistan, ignoring completely the fact that except for Kashmir cease fire line, all Indian troops had been withdrawn from West Pakistan border. Gundevia could not repeat not understand why Ayub, if he was so anxious to solve Indo-Pakistan problems, had not repeat not yet replied to Nehru's letter of November 11 which, he implied, was conciliatory and provided the basis for improved relations. Gundevia complained that the West never remembered a salient fact about Kashmir, i.e. that it was the Pakistanis who had committed aggression. The West had never asked Pakistan to vacate this aggression. Kashmir had legally acceded to the Indian union. Although he for one would be glad to hand over whole of Kashmir to Pakistan, this would solve nothing since holding a plebiscite would have a disastrous effect on Hindu-Muslim relations in other parts of India. Having thus shown that there was no repeat no give in the Indian position, Gundevia in a final burst of emotion said that if Indians were to be reduced to the position of slaves to another power, it would be better to be slaves under the Chinese than under the Pakistanis. In a reversal of the usual Indian position, he asked that Canada and India's other friends bring pressure on Ayub to reply to Nehru's letter and on Pakistan generally to see reason and to cease their campaign to prevent India from properly defending herself against Chinese aggression.

5. I have since received a letter from Gundevia in which he assures me that there was no repeat no misunderstanding as far as Indians are concerned regarding Canadian intentions as expressed in Mr. Diefenbaker's speech. On the contrary, Indian Government has very much appreciated sympathy and support which Canada has given. Gundevia also sent me text of Nehru's letter to Ayub (copy follows by bag). It contains, as Gundevia points out, an assurance that additional war potential that has to be built up in India will not repeat not be used for other purpose than to counter Chinese aggression. Otherwise I am afraid it contains nothing concrete to indicate a softening of Indian position or a willingness to try a fresh approach. Although Gundevia can be just as emotional as the Pakistanis, and as guilty of exaggerating in order to make his point, I judge from his remarks to me that American pressure has been counter-productive in driving Indians into even more intransigent attitude. There exists a growing body of opinion in India that consider Indo-Pakistani relations must be improved and recent crisis had brought this opinion more out into the open. But, although ministers like Lal Bahadur Shastri have taken a softer public line and may privately wish to see a more positive Indian approach, this moderating influence is likely to be erased by the instinctive Indian reaction against warnings from outsiders that the price India must pay for Western help is a settlement with Pakistan.

SINO-INDIAN CONFLICT – PRESENT INDIAN POSITION

In paragraph 6 of my reference telegram, I referred to Indian position, and particularly that of Mr. Nehru, in the aftermath of negotiations for the commencement of Indo-Pakistan talks. The impression which Gundevia had given me of Nehru's anger at the Americans for their pressure over Kashmir has been further strengthened by an interesting conversation I have had with Durga Das. He had just had a long interview with Prime Minister Nehru and his summing up of the impressions gained from that interview was that "we (i.e. Nehru, India and the West) are back to where we were before the Chinese aggression started." According to Das, Nehru was deeply grieved by "USA foolishness and Pakistan perfidy." He concluded from Nehru's attitude that the USA in its recent dealings with the Indians had failed to follow up the advantages which the situation presented and had managed completely to nullify all the recent gains made in relations between India and the West by "blackmailing India on Kashmir." Das believed USA incapable of understanding the "blackmailing" approach was bound to be counter-productive. Americans, in his view, have no repeat no understanding whatever of the sensitivity and pride of Indians, and consequently of the deep humiliation and resentment towards China, which Indians had felt as a result of Chinese victories. In this situation he likened Pakistan to a "jackal going in to clean up after the tiger's kill." He blamed Galbraith for having failed to measure the extent of Indian humiliation and of the danger in pressing for action which would only add to this humiliation. Galbraith, he considered, was an intellectual, who, having once latched on to an idea, was incapable of letting it go regardless of the realities of the situation.

2. Das felt that the USA had had and failed to take the opportunity to persuade President Ayub to approach Nehru and, on the grounds that India's enemies are Pakistan's enemies, to propose a mutual defence pact. If such a move had been made, other problems would have had a chance of being solved. When I said I doubted that USA could have accomplished this and enquired why Nehru could not repeat not have approached Ayub in a similar vein, Das replied that India, in its state of humiliation vis-à-vis the Chinese, could never have taken this step. This was particularly true, he felt, in the face of USA “blackmail” (he claimed that Harriman had gone as far as to suggest that if India could not repeat not agree to a plebiscite, it should give outright to Pakistan what the plebiscite would give). He said USA cannot repeat not understand that in present circumstances, Pakistan is the number one enemy and China the number two enemy. It was inconceivable that Nehru could make a proposal for a defence pact when the Pakistanis were flirting with China.<sup>46</sup>

3. Das said Nehru had greatly resented Harriman’s approach but had been more appreciative of Sandys’ restrained advice. In the end, he had made a gesture to Sandys but because of Harriman’s activities had ended by undercutting this gesture. At this juncture, the Prime Minister’s ability to announce that MiGs would be forthcoming meant to Indians that India had been “saved by the USSR” and that the Delhi-Moscow axis was stronger than before. A week earlier, the MiG announcement would not repeat not have drawn the cheers it did in Parliament, but the resentment among influential congressmen caused by American pressures had changed their attitude and greatly strengthened Nehru’s position which, a few weeks ago, was tottering. Thus, according to Das, Harriman’s pressure at least achieved something, in that it has unified Congress behind Nehru more than has been the case for a long time.

4. Despite his pessimistic interpretation of recent events, Das believed that Nehru still wished to receive Western military aid and that USA-Indo relations were not repeat not irreparable. There was nothing the Indians wished more than to achieve cooperation but they could not repeat not allow themselves to be blackmailed. This was particularly true now that a stalemate in the Sino-Indian conflict seemed to be in the offing and pressures were thus being relieved on that front. He expressed the view, which I think is prevalent in many Indian circles, that the USSR was making new advances for improved Indo-Soviet relations because, while India needed the USSR’s support, the latter also needed the support of 450 million Indians. As a result of this need on both sides, nonalignment could be saved.

5. Durga Das, fresh from his interview with Mr. Nehru, was certainly reflecting to some extent the Prime Minister’s views and his remarks tie in with those made by Gundevia regarding Nehru’s reaction to USA pressures. I do not repeat not put it past Das to have exaggerated the Prime Minister’s attitude or even to have encouraged him to be more inflexible than usual. The Indians are bound, I think, to use every opportunity to apply pressure on the Americans and the spreading of stories regarding Indian reactions is one way of doing so. Although Das has genuine sympathies with the West and would thus feel greater disappointment that the USA “has missed the boat,” he also looks at problem from a purely Indian point of view and ignores fact that USA cannot repeat not forget other commitments or the hard facts of life no repeat no matter how much it may wish to assist India or strengthen its ties with this country. On the other hand, I think he is basically correct in his analysis of the Indian attitude to USA methods and the failure of people like Galbraith and Harriman, in their anxiety to achieve practical solutions, to grasp the importance of emotional factors emanating from traditional Indian attitude to Pakistan and the Indian defeat at Chinese hands. This defeat represented not repeat not only India’s complete failure to reap the supposed benefits of non-alignment, but also a shattering blow to carefully nurtured Indian military prestige. Subsequent pressures to make a statesman-like gesture to Pakistan, the other enemy, when the latter is flirting with the Chinese, were to the Indians a demand that they invite further humiliation. This, in desperation, they were probably on the point of doing when the cease fire came. Now the situation has changed. Stiffened Indian resistance to outside pressures and the maintenance of their independent stand vis-à-vis Pakistan and the West are part of the desire to balance the humiliation suffered at the hands of the Chinese. (If they cannot repeat not be stronger than the Chinese, they can at least be stronger than the Pakistanis.) Militant North Indian Hinduism which would be strongest opponent of compromise with Chinese is at the same time dead set against compromise with the Pakistanis and ready to back the Prime Minister to the hilt in any hardening of Indian position relevant to Pakistan (see my telegram 958 December 7 † for the attitude of Morarji Desai, who in other circumstances would be the first to seek USA aid).

6. Certain other indicators lend support to theory that Nehru is back to mending his fences with USSR and expecting stalemate in Sino-Indian conflict. MiG statement was an example of his giving USSR benefit of doubt and seems to negate impression Sandys gathered from his talks with Nehru two weeks ago. During his recent visit to Tezpur, Nehru has been talking about importance and usefulness of continued Soviet economic aid and Defence Minister Chavac has told press of requests for “non-combatant” military equipment which Indians hope Russians will meet. Nehru, referring to requests for military aid, said that whatever requests India had made to UK, USA and some other countries would be enough for India’s needs for some time.

7. In regard to the border conflict, Nehru said December 6 in Tezpur that Chinese seemed to be proposing to withdraw behind McMahon line in NEFA. He felt that in this area it did not repeat not much matter whether the line was that of September 8 or November 7/59<sup>47</sup> (in contrast to Mrs. Menon’s remarks, paragraph 4 of my reference telegram). He said the question at issue had more to do with Ladakh than NEFA. In Ladakh November 1959 line would give Chinese an advantage. Asked whether Chinese failure to withdraw behind September 8 line in Ladakh would mean no repeat no negotiations, Nehru hedged by saying that subsequent steps which they (Indians) had proposed would naturally be affected. His usual reference to forcing the Chinese out if they did not repeat not withdraw from Indian territory seemed to be connected more with situation in which Chinese failed to carry out their own withdrawal proposals than with the previous vow to drive Chinese from every inch of Indian territory. Conclusion seems to be that Nehru has no plans to upset present situation, that he is drawing closer to possibility of talks and that he feels confident enough of his control over the internal political situation to resume independent manoeuvring. Otherwise he would not repeat not have dared to take this mild approach four days before Parliament is to have its first chance to discuss Chinese cease fire proposals. It was apparent from discussions in Parliament yesterday that opposition groups are already disturbed by signs of a shift in the Government’s position and of a decrease in their ability to apply pressures.

8. The picture of current Indian thinking drawn by Durga Das does not repeat not augur well for successful results to the Indo-Pakistani talks or for the future of long term military assistance arrangements between India and the USA. In considering Indian reactions, it is, however, always necessary to remember that Prime Minister Nehru tends to react in terms of current circumstances rather than in accordance with long term objectives and that this factor, plus Indian sensitivity, produces a mercurial Indian reaction. These mercurial variations are particularly to be expected during a period of governmental confusion and are more obvious to the outside observer than the much slower acting efforts of the advocates of reason who exist in India as well as in Pakistan (reference my telegram 958 December 7). One important effect of the Sino-Indian conflict has been to make the Prime Minister more aware of his need for support in the Congress Party. While this situation provides a good opportunity for the more extreme elements to push their views, it also has given the moderates a chance to speak their minds more openly.

9. Our conversations with American officials here indicate some appreciation of the practical difficulties ahead and of the need to go slow in pressing Indians towards détente with Pakistan. Yesterday I gave Carol Laice, who has returned here temporarily from her Washington job as Deputy Director of the South Asia Department, a brief outline of my impressions of Indian reactions. I am seeing Galbraith this afternoon before his departure for Washington. According to this morning's press Galbraith has in any event taken first step towards an improvement in the situation by telling a press conference yesterday that political considerations would not repeat not influence the USA Government in deciding its long term military assistance programme for India.<sup>48</sup> Americans here know, however, that it takes more than a psychological treatise on Indian pride and sensitivity to convince USA Congress that India deserves continued assistance and must be humoured rather than forced into what appears to be reasonable path. Main problem now is to get the Indo-Pakistan talks started (a date before the end of December is being mentioned) and, once started, to keep them going.

INDO-PAKISTAN RELATIONS

Pakistan is displacing China as issue of prime concern here.

2. I have talked about Kashmir with Durga Das, influential dean of Indian newspapermen. He has weekly interview with top Cabinet ministers, Prime Minister and Congress and Opposition leaders, all of whom are keenly interested in his syndicated political comment column supplied in all principal languages to network of newspapers throughout India. His views are not repeat not necessarily official but are based on information and regular discussions with India's political leaders. His opinions are significant because they are shared by politicians who determine Indian policy.

3. On essential assistance for long term modernization and equipment of India's armed forces Das said this must come from abroad and cannot repeat not be financed by India's decision to double annual defence budget. India has therefore made known in general terms this "shopping list" to USA and UK and also to USSR. He said USA and UK have indicated willingness but insist that congressional and parliamentary support can only be obtained for such great expenditures if India "yields to Pakistan on Kashmir." USSR however he says has offered military assistance unconditionally and in fact is encouraging India to stick to her guns on Kashmir. Das said India would prefer to receive aid from Western democracies because India attaches importance to democratic methods and is the only genuinely democratic nation in all Asia but India "cannot repeat not and will not repeat not pay the price of yielding the vale of Kashmir to Pakistan." The USSR he said seems to be the only great power which really understands and sympathizes with India on Kashmir. If the West cannot repeat not adjust in some way to India's views India may be forced to accept Russia's unconditional offer which also has additional inducement of involving only rupees payment. This he says would of course result in drawing India closer to the communist bloc and increasing Soviet influence.

4. Das said that during dangerous period of border war with China Pakistan was on the point of crossing ceasefire line to invade the Vale of Kashmir as it was assumed that significant portion of Indian army had withdrawn to fight Chinese. When it was discovered India's forces remained in Kashmir the plan was temporarily abandoned. Many Indians, says Das, think that it would be better for India if Pakistan would actually start a military invasion of the Vale because this would enable Indian army decisively to defeat Pakistan. Indian armed forces would thus re-establish the confidence in themselves which was lost in recent defeat administered by Chinese and would regain for Indian army confidence of Indian people.

5. Of Galbraith's proposal for a solution of Kashmir Das said there is not repeat not the slightest possibility of Indians and Pakistanis working together in joint commissions on trade, cultural activities, etc. Galbraith and all Americans, said Das, are incapable of understanding the feeling which exists between Hindus and Muslims.<sup>49</sup> He explained: "our feelings for each other are like those which the Crusaders had for the Saracens and in dealing with each other, Hindus and Muslims are still centuries behind modern attitudes which have been developed in the West. The West does not repeat not understand the situation and continues to pressure us to take concessions which are utterly impossible."

6. When it comes to the Kashmir issue, Das said, it is incorrect to think that Mr. Nehru is the chief stumbling block. "All Hindus are united on this question and Nehru's stand has placed him more firmly in the saddle of leadership than he has been since the discovery of the Chinese road through Aksai Chin."

7. I will try in a subsequent telegram to comment on this interview.

SINO-INDIAN CONFLICT AND KASHMIR

Perhaps the most important point arising out of Durga Das' remarks about India's relations with the West and USSR is not repeat not so much the fact or fancy of USSR intentions, but the fact that some of India's leaders believe that this is the way things are developing. As far as USSR intentions are concerned, I have no repeat no confirmation from other sources that USSR is contemplating assistance in field of long term military re-equipment, although apparently changed USSR attitude regarding delivery of MiGs is one indicator. It is some extension of the facts when Durga Das says India has made known her defence shopping list even in general terms to other countries. The "three plus three" division programme for 1963 has not repeat not been worked out, let alone subjected to cost estimates, and the air programme is even vaguer. There is certainly a reasonable doubt that, even when programme is worked out, USSR would undertake this task in light of its relations with China or that it would in any case wish to become committed to an overall re-equipment programme. As far as financing is concerned rupee payment as practised by Soviet bloc countries amounts to diversion of Indian exports from hard currency earnings and, in any event, USA policy on arms provision has been on even more advantageous lend-lease basis than any repayment would be in rupees. Regardless of these facts, the latent propensity in India to emphasize positive aspects of USSR proposals and negative aspects [of] western offers enables Russians to convince gullible public and many politicians that their terms would involve no repeat no strain on exchange resources. I am sure that USSR is not repeat not wasting any time trying to regain ground lost in India over past two months. Russians may well have made tentative long term offers and without committing themselves entirely they may hope to woo Indians away from action which would place India more solidly in Western camp. If USSR offers have been made, they would obviously be unconditional insofar as Kashmir is concerned and thus highly attractive to Indians. It would not be the first time USSR has taken advantage of a Kashmir row to raise its stock in India. I do not repeat not believe therefore that we can ignore the possibility that USSR is dangling substantial long term military re-equipment offers before Indian eyes.

2. It is equally possible, of course, that Indians will use these offers, whether they firmly exist or not repeat not, to force different Western attitude on Kashmir. The Indians would call this sort of pressure blackmail if practised by the West or Pakistan but in their own case would consider it merely a form of re-insurance or as a legitimate protection of their interests. I imagine present situation may be a mixture of Soviet hints or offers and Indian counter blackmail, but whatever the percentage of the components may be, the main Western countries will not repeat not have an easy time dealing with them.

3. What I find so disturbing about current developments is that, although clear cut Chinese aggression after October 20 and the immediate and sympathetic response of India's Western friends cleared the air of so many suspicions which have dogged relations between India and the West, the old bogey of Kashmir threatens once again to undo the progress made. Unfortunately the Western attitude on Kashmir – although with the best of intentions – has, I think, had much to do with the fact that this unsolved problem can continue to interfere in the solution of otherwise unrelated matters.

4. After five years in India I am convinced that there will be only one practical solution of the Kashmir problem and that is partition with minor adjustments along the cease fire line with guarantees by India to Pakistan regarding such matters as access to Kashmir and the problems of river headwaters. This solution might eventually be accepted by both Pakistan and India provided some Western countries would stop holding out hope to the Pakistanis that they can get more. In my letter 313 May 11† I set out how short a distance India was prepared to go to secure a Kashmir settlement. I am sure their attitude now is as I described it then and doubt that even at height of Chinese onslaught any Cabinet member thought in terms of concessions to Pakistan in Kashmir. (Although India denuded Punjab of troops the three divisions plus facing the Pakistanis in Kashmir stayed put.) That the Indians will never give more is, in my view, a fact of life which must be accepted whether or not repeat not it is palatable or even moral in the minds of Westerners (after all who can determine in an issue of this type what is absolute moralist [sic]). Indian intransigence is probably chiefly responsible for this situation, also there is Pakistan's original aggression, and the perpetuation of Hindu consciousness that Muslims subjugated and humiliated them for a thousand years. I think it is time that the West (and USA particularly) stopped taking a moral view of the Kashmir issue which in any event does not repeat not contain the ingredients for a clear cut moral solution even in Western terms. During the Dulles era, India non-alignment was frowned upon on moral grounds. In time, however, the West has learned to live with non-alignment and in the specific case of India and Pakistan, USA while giving arms to Pakistan gave economic aid to India which enabled latter to buy elsewhere the arms (such as Canberra aircraft from UK) needed to maintain parity with Pakistan. This understanding USA attitude has yielded tremendous dividends in this country. But whenever this balance has been upset by, for e.g., Western manoeuvring on Pakistan's behalf in Security Council, USSR has stepped in to take advantage of the situation. It now looks as if they may be successfully going through the same manoeuvre again. If the West would now start looking at the Indian position on Kashmir in the same way as they have for some time looked at India's non-alignment, I think they would be farther ahead in their dealings with India, and not repeat not much farther behind in their dealings with Pakistan. There is nothing that any outside country can do to change the Kashmir situation, and only India and Pakistan can on their own work out a solution. The Pakistanis will never repeat never come to terms with this problem until they are disabused of the idea that the West is consistently on their side and ready to bring pressure on India at their behest. The sort of talk that Sandys had with Ayub in which he referred to the "necessity" of India making "major concessions to Pakistan" is likely only to postpone solution. It is worth noting in this connection that Galbraith's plan for a Kashmir solution has now been fully described in the Indian press and Indians have little reason to believe Western assurances that they plan only to bring India and Pakistan together and have no repeat no intentions of influencing the outcome of the talks.

5. Possibly USA considers that Pakistan's adherence to Western military alliances depends on USA position on Kashmir and that this adherence is more important to long term interests of USA than the less clearly defined development of Indo-USA relations. However, fifteen years of explicit or implicit support for Pakistan position on Kashmir has yielded little dividend and has brought the problem no repeat no closer to solution. At this important stage in the development of Indo-Western relations perhaps it is time to take a more practical approach to a problem which occupies altogether too important a position in the scheme of things.

6. I make this plea not repeat not in the light of the rights or wrongs of the Kashmir case but because of over-riding importance of other matters which are, I think, being seriously threatened at this particular juncture by developments in the limited Kashmir sphere. India occupies a dominant position in the world struggle for democracy as a way of life and a way of government. As far as the rooting and growth of the democratic process in Asian countries is concerned, India is so far ahead that no repeat no other country can compare. The massive concentration of economic aid in India has been based on this fact as was immediate and unqualified Western response to Indian requests for military aid against China. Indian democracy is a precarious thing and its workings can invoke serious criticism both before and since the crisis with China. But the facts are there in the form of free elections, a high degree of democratic parliamentary performance, and the pressure of an expressed public opinion. In past two months we have witnessed the fall of Krishna Menon in a political situation which could only be duplicated in a Western democracy. We have also seen a genuinely democratic leader himself being seriously threatened by democratic processes involving parliamentary pressures and dissatisfaction within his own political party. Subsequently we have also seen the rallying of a great majority of the population behind the Prime Minister in his determination not to be pressured into concessions to Pakistan. One of the West's main objectives in Asia is to preserve and nurture Indian democracy and to (have?) the use of this nascent force in the fight for democratic survival although there can be no repeat no question of destroying through Western action the link of friendship and sympathy between India and USSR, it would be most unfortunate if on the contrary Western attitude on Kashmir at this critical juncture were to have the effect of forcing India into USSR camp in return for essential military equipment. The other "force" in India today is the Communist Party which, while thrown temporarily into confusion by Chinese aggression, is still in a position to benefit greatly from any spectacular Indo-Soviet rapprochement at the expense of the Western powers.

In this message we would like to express appreciation to both missions and to convey our tentative thinking, directed particularly to reference telegram.

2. We find it hard to be sanguine about the prospects for the talks begun in Rawalpindi and soon to resume in Delhi, despite the fact that to the impartial observer it appears that both India and Pakistan can only gain by a settlement on Kashmir which would have to be based on some form of compromise. Certainly there can be no repeat no successful issue if either side adheres to its traditional and extreme position; on one side that the Kashmir problem has been decided and that only minor border rectifications could be contemplated and on the other that Kashmir's destiny can only be determined by a plebiscite over the whole area. Our own, very hesitant conclusion is that there is potentially more give in Pakistan's position than we can detect in that of India. And it may be some time, we would judge, before the intense popular emotion in India subsides sufficiently for the Indian Government to face up squarely to an assessment of the realistic demands of lasting national interest. Pakistan's action in reaching agreement in principle with China, on the eve of the Kashmir talks, on the border between China and those parts of Kashmir for which Pakistan exercises responsibility, will have done little to encourage Indian confidence in Pakistani good faith.

3. Whether or not repeat not the mountain fighting between China and India flares up again in the near future, India must now be aware of the lasting threat of aggression posed by China. This awareness is demonstrated by Indian interest in the long term development of defence forces capable of resisting future Chinese aggression. Even the most elementary calculation of India's strategic requirements would seem to demand a détente with Pakistan: (a) to ensure protection of the flanks presented by West and East Pakistan; (b) to enable India to concentrate its forces economically and effectively against any Chinese attack; and (c) to gain the cooperation or at least the friendly neutrality of Pakistan in case of war with China. Reluctant as the Indian Government may be to accept the necessity of a settlement with Pakistan, the logic of the situation will persist and may in the end be persuasive. Similarly, the Pakistani Government, hard pressed by extremists and dismayed by Western military support for India, does not repeat not at the moment seem willing or able to act on the basis of the realistic assessment that China potentially threatens Pakistan as much as it does India and that therefore a détente with India would be fundamentally important for Pakistan's interests and would be well worth some concessions, at least of "principle."

4. It is discouraging at this stage to know that responsible Indians are thinking of Western efforts to urge a Kashmir settlement as "blackmail." Traditionally, Commonwealth countries, the USA and other Western countries have seen the Kashmir dispute as providing a dangerous source of tension and as undermining or weakening plans for the economic development of the sub-continent. Now an expensive programme of military assistance to India has been undertaken by the West, foremost the USA. It is stark realism for Western governments to estimate that their parliaments and taxpayers will not repeat not be long content to provide funds, material and energy to building up Indian defence against China if India does not repeat not show itself deadly serious in this effort by drastically reducing forces confronting Pakistan and by a businesslike approach to gaining a well disposed neighbour in the sub-continent out of strategic and political necessity. It would be unhelpful and unfriendly not repeat not to acquaint the Indian Government with these predictable reactions which ought to be considered not repeat not as a threat but as a realistic forecast.

5. With the foregoing in mind we are not repeat not sure we quite understand comments in paragraph 4 of reference telegram about the role of morality or moralism in the present attitude of the West, particularly the USA, towards the Kashmir dispute. For the USA and others, our own view would be that pretty hard-headed political, strategic and fiscal considerations determine attitudes towards the dispute between India and Pakistan. The USA has taken a calculated risk in its relations with Pakistan by sending military equipment on a large scale to India but it would hope to reduce the risks. And the West cannot repeat not be content with a situation of hostility between two non-communist nations threatened actually or potentially by Communist China which hamstringing an effective concentration of military effort towards the Northeast. We think that the West is not repeat not thinking in terms of a "moral solution" in Kashmir but simply of a workable solution which will permit two friendly countries to organize their defence (and economic) policies in a way calculated not repeat not to impose unnecessary political and financial strains on Western countries.

6. We were very interested in the comments on recently developing Indian attitudes towards the USSR. We would agree that the Soviet Union will be quick to take political and propaganda advantage of any Indian resentment towards what they consider Western pressures but we think it is highly improbable that the USSR would in fact be willing to do more than follow through with the agreement made before the Chinese attack to provide some MiGs and an aircraft factory. It seems a most unlikely proposition that Russia is prepared to destroy its relationship with Communist China, no matter what strains it may have undergone, by replacing the USA as chief supplier to India's defence forces against China. If Indians seriously consider that the USSR is an alternative to the USA in the task of reorganizing and re-equipping the Indian army, we fancy they are in for early and sharp disillusionment.

7. We too have been thinking in terms of a solution as expressed in first sentence of paragraph 4 of reference telegram, though you might agree that some modifications weighted in Pakistan's favour of demarcation line could be envisaged. If both parties accepted such a solution each would be conceding its general position. The approach to such a settlement would no repeat no doubt be through the laborious repetition of familiar arguments. One wonders, however, whether Pakistan has not repeat not long since discounted any expectation of a general plebiscite or that there is any remaining meaning, even to the Indians, in "vacating aggression." If all these formulas, after their inevitable restatement, could be forgotten, both sides would surely gain heavily by some such settlement.

8. It may be that some time will have to pass before emotional attitudes in India and Pakistan will permit really sensible negotiation on Kashmir. In the meantime we can only hope that discussions or the framework for discussions will be maintained and that outside countries friendly to both India and Pakistan will continue, prudently but persistently, to recommend the fruits which a settlement would yield.

CANADIAN PARTICIPATION IN U.S. COMMONWEALTH
PLAN FOR MILITARY ASSISTANCE TO INDIA

15. The Secretary of State for External Affairs said that Canada should inform the United Kingdom, the United States, Australia and New Zealand of its willingness to become a participant in the Nassau plan for aid to India, subject to a clear understanding that Canada is not committed to a specific share of the $120 million programme and other reservations.

16. During the discussion it was said,

(a) Reference to the Nassau Plan should take note of the Prime Minister's statement at Nassau that Canada would be a participant in the plan.<sup>50</sup>

(b) Canada had already supplied, or undertaken to supply, aid to India in the form of Dakota and Otter aircraft, winter clothing and nickel. We should continue to participate with others in providing aid to India.

17. The Cabinet approved the recommendation of the Secretary of State for External Affairs,

(a) that Canada inform Britain, and also the United States, Australia and New Zealand, of its willingness to participate in the U.S.-Commonwealth Plan for military assistance to India, subject to the following reservations:

(i) Canada does not consider itself committed to taking a specified "share" of the $120 million programme, although Canada would expect to make a contribution commensurate with that of other Commonwealth contributors and appropriate to Canada's size and resources;

(ii) Canadian participation would be subject to further consultations with the other contributors especially with a view to agreed valuation procedure for items supplied from surplus military stores;

(iii) in as much as Canada has already met, or proposes to meet, various Indian requests received before the advent of the Nassau plan, the government would expect the cost of meeting these requests to count towards the fulfilment of any specific "share" which Canada might later decide to assume; and

(b) agreed that note was to be taken, in references to the Nassau Plan, of the Prime Minister's statement at Nassau that Canada was a participant in the plan.

ATOMIC COOPERATION: SAFEGUARDS ON CIR FUEL

Since the Canada-India reactor has now been operating for some time, fuel elements will soon be withdrawn containing plutonium produced from the Canadian fuel elements. We have given some consideration to the best method of implementing the safeguards provisions of the CIR fuel agreement which specify that India will agree to a joint audit (both physical and record audit) "if Canada so requests through AECL." We understand that Dr. Bhabha insisted on naming AECL because he wished to keep any transactions at the technical rather than the intergovernmental level.

2. In general, we consider the Atomic Energy Control Board the most appropriate organ to administer our bilateral controls including those in the CIR fuel agreement. It seems however that though the first audit will merely involve a physical check on the whereabouts of the Canadian fuel rods, later when they are withdrawn and the plutonium extracted, an officer would need to be permanently in India to keep track. (The alternative of returning the irradiated rods to Canada is not regarded as desirable.)

3. In view of these circumstances, and also of the sensitivity of the Indian Government about safeguards, we have decided that the first approach about CIR should be made by AECL, which should make every effort to avoid giving the impression that we are requesting an audit because we suspect that there may be something wrong. The letter from Mr. J.L. Gray to Dr. Bhabha† being sent to you by bag, which is at present for your own information only, represents this first informal approach. Our ultimate objective will be to establish a permanent scientific liaison officer in India (probably someone from AECL) who would report through External Affairs to the Atomic Energy Control Board on the safeguards aspects of his work with regard to the CIR and any other Canadian cooperative projects in India.

NUCLEAR POWER STATION FOR INDIA

On motion of Prime Minister Nehru acting in his capacity as Minister in Charge Department Atomic Energy, Lok Sabha yesterday passed Atomic Energy Bill Repealing Act of 1948 and giving Government wider powers especially to develop "national policy" for atomic power generation and its coordination with other power sources. Replying to debate for Prime Minister, Law Minister Sen announced intention to establish 200 megawatts nuclear power station near Rana Pratap Sagar. Further information on legislation will follow by letter.

2. In evening Bhabha told me Government approval had been given to proceed with Rana Pratap Sagar nuclear power station as well as Tarapur during third plan period. He said his intention was to construct CANDU type plant at site near Rana Pratap which had been surveyed by AECL team last summer. He said it was hoped that Canadian Government would agree to assist project not repeat not only in design and technically but also in external financing.

3. Bhabha said external financing would have to be outside Colombo Plan contribution. I reminded Bhabha that Canada was passing through period of financial austerity and said I could not repeat not encourage any optimism. I pointed out that Iddikki had been proposed as next major project to be phased into Colombo Plan during present year but had not repeat not yet been accepted by Canadian Government and suggested Bhabha might discuss substation with Finance Minister Desai with whom he had appointment immediately after our talk. Bhabha indicated he had no repeat no expectation that another power project would be dropped to make room for nuclear station.

4. From Bhabha's remarks and fact that he had yet to see Desai I concluded that he had succeeded in persuading Prime Minister of merits of second nuclear power project now and securing promise that Rana Pratap Sagar would be provided if Bhabha could find external financing outside funds already pledged to Third Plan. Bhabha was at his most persuasive and made great play with prestige Canada would gain by participation in one of first international nuclear power projects. He asserted that French and Americans were contesting hotly over Tarapur and implied we were fortunate to have clear chance at Rana Pratap. Bhabha said that upon his return to Bombay today he would send Gray further information on scheme.

5. Bhabha referred to estimates for external costs at Rana Pratap site and assumed I was familiar with AECL's report and estimates. I did not repeat not wish to admit that one year after AECL's survey we had still no repeat no notion of team's findings. Bhabha's round figures gave impression that dollar costs had been calculated by AECL at around thirty million but it was not repeat not clear whether this covered only the nuclear component or included generating equipment also. Once again I must repeat that our discussions on atomic energy with Indian officials would be greatly assisted if we received reports from Canadian sources giving salient points of any projects being considered for possible joint development.

[Ottawa], September 5, 1962

ATOMIC ENERGY OF CANADA LIMITED ENCOURAGEMENT OF EXPORTS OF CANADIAN NUCLEAR POWER STATIONS

In recent months AECL has encountered growing interest by other countries in the possible adoption of Canadian-designed nuclear power stations in their own national programs. Many of these countries will find it difficult or impossible to purchase any nuclear power station without financial assistance such as long-term loans. The purpose of this Memorandum is to point out the benefits that could accrue to Canadian industry and to Canadian export trade as a result of an initial installation of a Canadian nuclear power plant in India.

Background

2. In a Memorandum to the Cabinet of March 22, 1961, it was pointed out that the type of nuclear power station pioneered by AECL was likely to be suitable for application in the electric power systems of many other countries because of two especially attractive features:

- (a) it will produce electricity at relatively low cost, and
- (b) it uses an exceptionally simple fuel cycle.

3. The cost of electricity from a fairly large station using a CANDU reactor (like the one now being built at Douglas Point, Ontario) is expected, in many areas, to be competitive with medium-cost conventional fuels, especially if the capital charge rate is low. If conventional fuel costs are high, then even a small nuclear station may be competitive. Examples of both of these situations will be given below.

4. Some countries have been reluctant to buy the early types of atomic power station already being offered for sale by the U.S., the U.K. and France because of the complicated fuel cycle involved. With a British or French natural uranium Calder Hall type reactor, the used fuel cannot be simply stored as waste material but must, for economic and technical reasons, be returned to a chemical processing plant for treatment involving many problems, including the construction of significant capital facilities. With an American enriched reactor, not only must the used fuel be reprocessed but the new fuel is available from only a single source, the U.S. The Canadian design avoids both of these problems: natural uranium fuel is widely available on the world market and the used fuel has yielded sufficient energy that it may be considered as a waste product. This spent fuel is in such a form that it can be stored cheaply and safely without special treatment.

5. Purchasers of atomic power stations will only consider stations that have been built and proved in operation. Now that the NPD reactor at Rolphton, Ontario, has started operation and as experience is gained over the next year there are certain to be an increasing number of serious inquiries from abroad that could well lead to major export sales of Canadian-manufactured equipment and Canadian uranium. It was in anticipation of this interest that Cabinet approval was requested and granted in March, 1961, for a commercial policy under which AECL could charge licence fees and royalties to non-Canadian agencies or commercial companies for use of the Canadian nuclear power station design. Negotiations are already under way with authorities in the United Kingdom as a result of their interest in using the Canadian design, and it is hoped that an agreement will shortly be presented to Cabinet for approval.

6. It seems clear, however, that the most effective single stimulus for sales of Canadian nuclear power stations will be the first actual installation of such a station abroad. Not only would this increase the chances of further units in the same country (perhaps on a straight commercial basis) but knowledge that a purchaser in one country has seen fit to order a Canadian design would be bound to influence decisions in other countries. The most immediate and promising prospect for the initial Canadian unit is India. India is recognized amongst the under-developed countries as a leader in atomic energy developments with Dr. H.J. Bhabha the recognized scientific expert from such countries. World attention in the atomic energy field is also focussed on India by virtue of the international competition that has arisen as a result of an invitation to submit firm price bids for a contract to build a nuclear power station at Tarapur. At the time bids were invited for Tarapur, Canadian firms were unable to do more than submit an informal proposal as a result of which India is expected to accept either a U.S. or a French tender despite their stated preference for the Canadian design.

7. However, India's favourable view of the Canadian design led to a joint study carried out in 1961 by AECL and the Indian Atomic Energy Commission. The results of the study are such that a 200-megawatt nuclear power station of a design almost identical to the Douglas Point

Station has been found to suit Indian conditions extremely well. The total cost of such a station is estimated at $70 million, of which about $30 million would be spent in Canada. The Government of India has announced its intention "to proceed with a CANDU type power station at Rana Pratap Sagar, provided foreign exchange can be found outside the normal assistance given annually by Canada to India." The above quote is from a cable received by J.L. Gray (AECL) from Dr. H.J. Bhabha, Chairman of the Indian Atomic Energy Commission, dated August 21, 1962.†

8. Another promising prospect, though less immediate, is Pakistan. According to surveys by two separate groups of independent foreign consultants, a small-to-medium-sized nuclear power station could fill a serious need for electricity in the Karachi area of Pakistan where conventional fuel costs are high. AECL is arranging for a study to be carried out, starting in October, by a small joint Canadian-Pakistan group of engineers to assess the applicability of a larger version of NPD to this situation. If the study is favourable, it is hoped that Canadian General Electric Company will be able to offer Pakistan a complete 80-megawatt station on a straight commercial basis for about $40 million. About half of this amount would be supplied from Canadian sources.

9. Both Argentina and Israel have recently approached AECL informally to request joint studies similar to those mentioned above, and there is interest also from Spain and Finland in the Canadian system. Efforts are being made by AECL to promote the Canadian nuclear power design in Japan as well.

10. There is thus the clear possibility of generating export sales from Canadian industry to the extent of several tens of millions of dollars in the near future, plus a further several million dollars per year if Canadian uranium is used as fuel in these stations. In the opinion of AECL, the chances of such sales would be greatly enhanced by a successful initial installation in India, where world attention is now focussed so sharply.

11. It is therefore recommended that:

- (a) approval in principle be given for the use of Canadian long-term loan funds to encourage the sale of Canadian-designed nuclear power stations abroad, such loans to cover the cost of Canadian-supplied equipment, materials and consultation;
- (b) a sum of $30 million additional loan funds be made available to the Government of India for the proposed Indian nuclear power station modelled after the Douglas Point Station;
- (c) the Department of External Affairs, assisted as required by Atomic Energy of Canada Limited and other government departments, initiate discussions with the Government of India to negotiate agreed terms on the supply of a nuclear power station and the uranium to fuel it.

PROPOSED ENCOURAGEMENT OF EXPORTS OF CANADIAN NUCLEAR POWER STATIONS

41. Mr. Churchill, as Chairman of the Privy Council Committee on Scientific and Industrial Research, said that consideration should be given to the policy on the encouragement of exports of Canadian nuclear power stations. Mr. Nehru might raise this question during his forthcoming visit to London, and Canada should not miss its chance to sell such a station to India.

An explanatory memorandum had been circulated (Minister's memorandum, Sept. 5 – Cab. Doc. 283-62).

(a) that the Department of External Affairs, assisted as required by Atomic Energy of Canada Limited and other government departments, should initiate discussions with the government of India to negotiate agreed terms on the supply of a Canadian nuclear power station to that country and for the supply of uranium to fuel it; and,

PROPOSED CANDU REACTOR FOR INDIA:
SUMMARY OF PRESENT POSITION

Status of Negotiations

The Cabinet on September 6 agreed as follows:

(a) that the Department of External Affairs, assisted as required by Atomic Energy of Canada Limited and other government departments, should initiate discussions with the Government of India to negotiate agreed terms on the supply of a Canadian nuclear power station to that country and for the supply of uranium to fuel it; and,

(b) that approval should not be given at this time to proposals –

(i) that long-term loan funds be made available for the encouragement of the sale of Canadian-designed nuclear power stations abroad; or,

(ii) that a sum of $30 million be made available as a loan to the Government of India for the proposed Indian nuclear power station.

2. In early November, when Mr. J.L. Gray was in India, discussions in which Mr. Ronning, Mr. Arthur Campbell and Mr. G.A. Newman participated were held with Dr. Bhabha, Chairman of the Indian Atomic Energy Commission; Mr. Desai, the Minister of Finance; Mr. L.K. Jha, Secretary of the Economic Affairs Branch of the Indian Government; and later with Mr. S.S. Kehra, Secretary to the Cabinet. During the discussions the Minister of Finance stated that the Indian Cabinet had decided to give the CANDU project priority in the Fourth Plan, which begins April 1966. Mr. Gray stated that AECL would probably not be able to undertake the project unless it were to begin early in 1963. The target for a final decision is the end of 1962 or, at the latest, April 1, 1963. In this connection, it should be borne in mind that there will probably be a meeting of the Indian Consortium sometime in April.

Summary of Financial Considerations

3. The cost of building a CANDU reactor at Rana Pratap Sagar has been estimated at $70 million, exclusive of interest during construction. In addition, the cost of a first fuel charge installed would be about $4 million. Of this $70 million, something in the neighbourhood of $30 million or less would require external financing. The cost of the turbo-generators, which might be obtained from Canada or Britain or possibly manufactured in India, is not included in this $30 million estimate, nor is the cost of the heavy water. Both of these costs are, however, included in the overall estimate of $70 million.

4. About half of this external financing of $30 million, i.e., something between $15 million and $20 million, would have to be made available before the beginning of the Fourth Plan in April 1966. Indian officials have stated that foreign exchange financing for CANDU would have to be “over and above the present (or ‘normal’) aid to India programme.” At the present time, commitments through the Consortium for the two fiscal years, April 1961-April 1963, total about $2,365,000,000, of which Canada has committed $61 million ($25 million being a special credit through the Export Credits Insurance Corporation and $36 million grants under the Colombo Plan). It is not entirely clear whether, in speaking of the present or normal aid to India programme, the Indian authorities have in mind the total of all aid offered through the Consortium, or the total of Canadian aid so offered, or merely our Colombo Plan grants.

Moreover, in whatever way they define the aid to India programme, it is also unclear whether they mean simply that the $30 million for CANDU must be additional to commitments for 1961-63 or whether they assume a continued flow of aid at the present level after 1963 and consider that the $30 million should be over and above it. This is obviously a point which we should clarify as soon as possible.

5. The principal considerations to be taken into account appear to be:

(a) whether the CANDU project should be financed by grants under the Colombo Plan, by credits through the Export Credits Insurance Corporation mechanism or possibly by a combination of these;

(b) whether, if it were decided to continue Canadian aid to India at about the present level, financing for the CANDU project should be incorporated or should be regarded as additional (entirely or partly);

(c) whether we are prepared to begin the CANDU financing in 1963, with or without a final decision on (b);

(d) whether Canada should devote such a large share of its total aid to India to a single project, especially one which the Consortium may or may not consider deserves a high priority in the Fourth Five-Year Plan;

(e) what other financing arrangements might have to be made for the fuel and the turbo-generators;

(f) how and when we might wish to make known to the Consortium our intention of financing the CANDU project and whether we should seek advance assurances from the other members that this financing would be counted to our credit with the Consortium.

Safeguards

6. Dr. Bhabha has stated that India is prepared to accept a CIR type of arrangement which in effect means safeguards on the Canadian fuel (not on the reactor) carried out through agreed joint inspections and audits. There is a further provision that only Canadian or Indian-produced uranium will be used. It has been suggested that an additional safeguard precaution could be imposed for CANDU by requiring that the reactor maintain the high rate of burn-up for which it is designed. The plutonium then produced would be Pu 240 and not Pu 239 (the material now used in atomic bombs). India is building an extraction plant which would presumably process the fuel from CANDU as well as Tarapur.

7. Dr. G.C. Laurence, when he was recently in Washington, was allowed to see the draft agreement on the Tarapur reactor which the United States intends to propose to India. He got the impression that it is almost certain the United States will require bilateral and not IAEA safeguards. Under the agreement, the United States would have the right to account for all fuel from whatever source going into the reactor, to maintain this accounting system in the processing plant and also in any reactors in which the reprocessed fuel is being used. This is, of course, equivalent to saying that there would be safeguards on the reactor. The United States Atomic Energy Commission estimates that four or five inspectors would have to be permanently stationed out in India to carry out the above programme if the fuel were processed in an Indian plant. Dr. Laurence also asked the United States Atomic Energy Commission whether, in their view, a bomb using the plutonium taken from the fuel which had been subjected to a very high burn-up in a Canadian type reactor would be so inefficient that we could dispense with safeguards. The answer to this question is highly classified and they could not give it. It would be open to us to seek to find out through defence channels, though Dr. Laurence himself doubts whether we should be successful in doing so.

8. The Tarapur reactor and the CANDU are not altogether on the same footing. The United States reactor will be a package deal and the only source of the enriched uranium fuel is, at least at present, the United States. Thus the Indians could accept the United States terms, in effect imposing safeguards on the reactor, without losing too much face. CANDU, on the other hand, will be very largely built by the Indians themselves with the help of Canadian designs and know-how out of components most of which, though imported, would not be specific to nuclear energy. Moreover, the Indians can supply at least part of the natural uranium for the fuel elements from domestic resources and eventually could probably also manufacture the elements in India, provided they could get the necessary zircaloy. Dr. Bhabha has therefore consistently maintained that India will not accept safeguards on the reactor but only on the Canadian fuel. Mr. J.L. Gray has indicated to him on a personal basis that he sees some force in the Indian arguments.

9. So far as Canada is concerned, there are broadly three objectives to be sought in taking a decision on safeguards for an Indian CANDU. That is to say, the solution we hope to find should be consistent with and reinforce our general policy of supporting all practical steps towards peace and disarmament; it should be of a nature not to create any undue difficulties in our relations with the United States, either in the atomic energy field or in general; and, within the framework of these requirements, it should give due encouragement to the Canadian nuclear and uranium industries in their search for export outlets.

10. The following are some of the considerations that have to be taken into account:

(a) United States officials have repeatedly stressed in their talks with us that nuclear safeguards are essentially a delaying action, intended to postpone the acquisition of nuclear weapons by countries not now possessing them, but in no sense a permanent or even complete prohibition. There are widely different estimates of the length of time that India could be prevented by safeguards from making its own bomb. Some United States Atomic Energy Commission officials consider that the kind of safeguards they have in mind could delay an Indian bomb by 10-15 years. Dr. G.C. Laurence considers this an overestimate and suggests that a delay of four or five years is more likely if India were really determined to make the bomb. Even if India had to build a reactor entirely by itself, he thinks that the delay would probably not exceed seven to eight years. These estimates are of course very tentative and subject to modification by political events, since a strong and continuing threat from China might lead the Indian Government to inaugurate or expedite plans to make an atomic bomb.

(b) the period of grace may seem short, but if we are to be consistent with Canadian policy on general disarmament questions, we should probably argue that any delay that can reasonably be achieved is worth gaining. Moreover, the control system developed could make a small but useful contribution to the general disarmament machinery. We could also argue that as long as India does not have the means to make the atomic bomb now, political events could turn in such a way that the Indian Government would be less, rather than more, likely to aim at acquiring independent nuclear weapons;

(c) our general and specific relations with the United States would undoubtedly suffer if we did not require effective safeguards as a condition of supplying the CANDU reactor. Our example in this case could also put an end to all hope of maintaining a common front among Western suppliers;

(d) on the other hand, there is the argument (which has probably persuaded the United States to propose bilateral rather than IAEA safeguards) that if we propose terms so severe as to drive India to seek help elsewhere (France and the Soviet Union are of course the obvious possibilities), we shall have sacrificed an export opportunity for Canadian industry without any corresponding gain in the field of general policy;

(e) a further consideration is that, owing to the important differences between the Tarapur and CANDU projects, as set out in paragraph 8 above, it is not open to us to require as strict conditions as the United States;

(f) from the straight tactical point of view, however, it is probably advisable to make our initial proposals severe in order to leave room for the bargaining to which Dr. Bhabha and the Indian Government are apt to attach exaggerated importance.

Recommendations on Safeguards

(a) The Reactor

11. There does not seem to be any real possibility that we could impose safeguards on the reactor as such, since this would in fact amount to requiring safeguards on designs and know-how. Even the United States, which has a much stronger case than we have, appears to have avoided specifically imposing safeguards on the reactor and to have achieved the purpose indirectly by requiring safeguards on all fuel going into it. This requirement could become a significant safeguard measure when France has completed its isotopic diffusion plant and might be in a position to offer enriched fuel to India without safeguards.

(b) Fuel and Other Components

12. Since Dr. Bhabha has assured us that India would be prepared to accept safeguards on the fuel, we should probably concentrate on this and set as effective safeguards as possible. For technical reasons alone, the first charge of  $UO_2$  - zircaloy (which would be going into the reactor in 1966-67) would have to be entirely Canadian. We could seek to extend this period by further delaying the introduction of Indian-manufactured elements and limiting their number. We should have a means of enforcing these requirements because the sole source of zirconium for the zircaloy cladding is the United States. Perhaps we might start out with the proposal that the first two fuel charges would have to be entirely Canadian and thus make room for concessions on the above lines. Dr. Bhabha has also agreed in principle to maintain maximum burn-up and to furnish quarterly reports. Even though this may not be the complete answer, it certainly would strongly reinforce our safeguards requirements.

13. India has a small heavy water plant at present capable of producing about 15 tons a year. The CANDU survey (March 1962) noted that if the capacity of the plant were quadrupled at the beginning of the construction period, it would probably be possible to produce all the heavy water required (180 metric tons). At present prices this would save India $11 million - $12 million foreign exchange costs. If the plant is not stepped up, it will be necessary to buy about half the charge from abroad. The United States is at present the only other source of heavy water, though it is possible that a plant will soon be built in Canada. The supply of heavy water whether from Canada or the United States might also serve as a lever therefore in getting the safeguards we want, especially if we could offer some price advantage on the Canadian manufactured product.

CANDU REACTOR FOR INDIA

Final paragraph my reference telegram indicated we should have begun discussion of draft agreement by end of November if AECL was to be able to participate. I reached that conclusion after discussion with Gray regarding future employment of key personnel involved rather than on basis of considerations related to India. As I understood situation, at some stage, which might be quite soon, it would become increasingly difficult to take affirmative decision to provide CANDU reactor because of dispersal of design team.

2. Canadian participation is being taken for granted by Indian authorities and members of press. Editorial in Hindustan Times January 5 follows by air and illustrates point. I am therefore most anxious for information on state of consideration of this proposal. Indeed, if Canada is to attain competitive position in extensive future nuclear power market in India I believe early decision is advisable.

3. Regarding safeguards (reference your telegram E-7 January 2†) conversation I had with Bhabha last week gave impression that he considered negotiations with USA would have outcome satisfactory to him. He appeared to think arrangements for Tarapur would show that something like CIR agreement should be acceptable for CANDU type reactor.

FINANCING OF THE PROPOSED CANDU REACTOR FOR INDIA AND RELATED ISSUES

1. Cabinet in its decision of September 6, 1962, instructed that discussions be initiated with the Government of India to negotiate agreed terms of supply of a Canadian nuclear power station to that country and for the supply of uranium to fuel it. In this connection preliminary discussions have been held in Ottawa and in New Delhi with Mr. Desai, Indian Minister of Finance, and other Indian officials. On the Canadian side there is general interdepartmental agreement that a transaction with India would be the most effective single stimulus for sales of Canadian nuclear power stations and that Canadian financing of the CANDU Reactor on credit terms up to $30 million should be given high priority. There is also some urgency from the Canadian point of view to get the project under way in 1963 in order to maintain intact the most highly trained group of nuclear power plant designers in Canada. On the Indian side, they wish to begin construction of a CANDU reactor as soon as possible and would like Canada to provide credit facilities, but there are several hurdles to overcome. These include the fact that the CANDU project has not been included in India's current Five-Year Development Plan, India's reluctance to apply generally acceptable safeguards against diversion of nuclear materials to military use, the need to ensure that India is prepared to undertake to procure in Canada any uranium for the reactor which it cannot supply from its own natural resources and India's initial position that Canadian financing of the reactor must be over and above current financial assistance to India.

2. With reference to the inclusion of the CANDU project in Indian development plans, difficulties would arise if this were not done. Efforts should therefore be made to have India regularize the CANDU project in its development program either by including it in the Third Plan or by seeking Consortium concurrence to it being partially financed prior to the commencement of the Fourth Plan.

Safeguards and Fuel Supply

3. Preparations are proceeding for negotiations on safeguards. In this connection it is intended that negotiations on safeguards proceed separately but concurrently with those on financing. The question of fuel supply will also be taken up with Indian authorities to get Indian agreement to procure in Canada any uranium for the reactor which cannot be supplied from Indian natural resources. Final agreement on the project will depend on mutually satisfactory arrangements being reached on safeguards and fuel supply. Proposals on safeguards will be brought to Cabinet as soon as possible.

Financing

4. India appears to have taken an initial position that the CANDU Reactor must be financed over and above Canada's current financial assistance to India. This position must be considered against the background of overall demand for long term financing in India. Apart from Colombo Plan grants, Canada has already made available through the Consortium "special credits" totalling $25 million in the first two years of the Third Five-Year Plan which has been committed for approved projects. "Special credits" are amounts of Section 21A funds earmarked by the Canadian Government which are committed under the Consortium arrangement to finance the export of Canadian capital equipment and services for Indian economic development. In addition to this, and excluding the CANDU Reactor, Canadian exporters have initiated discussions on projects in India, which could involve substantial amounts of Section 21A financing in the near future. In total these potential claims for long term financing would, if realized, represent a disproportionately high amount of total Section 21A resources of $300 million. Such a commitment of credit to India over a short period of time is considered to be unrealistic, not only in relation to the distribution of Section 21A resources but also in relation to India's general ability to absorb external debts.

5. Officials of all Departments concerned have concluded that this problem can best be met by planned phasing of the higher priority projects over the next few years, financed by an annual increment in credits as they are committed through the Indian Consortium. In the first two years of the current Plan, Canada has committed "special credits" at the annual rate of $12.5 million. It is proposed for planning purposes that an annual increment of this amount be continued over the next several years. The regular flow of $12.5 million credit annually would appear to constitute an appropriate allocation of Section 21A export financing to India. An annual increment of this amount would permit the proposed financing of the CANDU Reactor over the proposed construction period, 1963-1969, and in addition permit the financing during this period of a reasonable number of other capital exports, totalling around $45 million (not including the $25 million already committed in 1961-63). The selection and phasing of these additional capital exports would be a matter for mutual agreement between Canada and India.

6. The financing arrangements for CANDU and the other aspects of Canada's long term financing program in India, along the lines outlined above, will require detailed discussions with Indian officials in New Delhi and would warrant sending a small government mission to India. In view of the urgency to get the CANDU reactor project under way early in 1963 it would be desirable for the mission to proceed to India as soon as possible.

7. Canada is also a member of the Consortium on Pakistan's Economic Development Program and has made available "special credits" totalling $15 million over a two year period

(1961-63). Considerations outlined above in respect of India apply in general to Canada's long term financing program in Pakistan. If Cabinet approves for planning purposes an annual increment in the special credits for India, it would appear appropriate that the same should be done for Pakistan. The comparable annual amount for Pakistan would be $7.5 million.

8. It is recommended:

(1) That a mission headed by C.L. Read of the Department of Finance, and including V.L. Chapin of the Department of Trade and Commerce and D.C. Taylor of Export Credits Insurance Corporation proceed to India as soon as possible to discuss financing arrangements for the CANDU Reactor and to discuss selection and phasing of other proposals for long term financing. The mission's discussions with Indian authorities will be undertaken in consultation with the Canadian High Commissioner to India and members of his staff as required.

(2) That discussion proceed on the understanding that, subject to satisfactory agreement on safeguards and fuel supply, the Canadian Government would be prepared in principle to finance under Section 21A of the Export Credits Insurance Act the export of Canadian goods and services related to the CANDU Reactor project up to $30 million, and on the understanding that export credit financing of the CANDU Reactor and other non-military capital exports to India will be based for planning purposes on an annual increment of $12.5 million in "special credits" committed under Consortium arrangements.

(3) That export credit financing of capital exports to Pakistan be based for planning purposes on an annual increment of $7.5 million in "special credits" to be committed under Consortium arrangements.<sup>51</sup>

pour le Cabinet*

*Draft Memorandum from Secretary of State for External Affairs

CANDU REACTOR – SAFEGUARDS

On September 6, 1962, Cabinet agreed that discussions should be started with India to negotiate terms for the supply of a Canadian nuclear power station to that country and for the supply of uranium to fuel it.

2. During discussions with the Indian authorities in November, 1962, it became clear that India was interested in a CANDU reactor and that the project might begin early in 1963. Cabinet has approved that a Canadian mission should visit India to discuss the financial aspects of the project. This mission has already left Ottawa and is due to arrive in India on February 23. It is desirable, therefore, that agreement be reached with India on the question of safeguards as soon as possible. A firm decision would be desirable in April, 1963.

3. India has refused consistently to accept a system of safeguards as established by the International Atomic Energy Agency. It is necessary, therefore, to conclude with India a

4. Dr. Bhabha has indicated that India would accept for a CANDU reactor the same conditions agreed upon for the Canada-India Reactor (CIR), i.e., no safeguards on the reactor itself and merely a pledge on the part of India that the reactor, and any products resulting from it, would be used exclusively for peaceful purposes. India also agreed to use only Indian or Canadian natural uranium for fuel and that the Canadian fuel and any plutonium produced therefrom (or an assessed equivalent quantity) would be subject to joint audits, both physical and record, to be made by mutual consent.

5. In the Canadian view, CIR safeguards would not be adequate for a CANDU reactor which is more powerful and has more potential military significance. Also, it appears that even at the very high burn-up for which the CANDU reactor was designed, the produced plutonium could be of a quality sufficient for some military purpose.

6. At a meeting of the Atomic Energy Advisory Panel on January 10, Dr. G.C. Laurence suggested a draft section of the agreement on safeguards which he thought might be acceptable to the Indian authorities. The Panel agreed that this draft should be studied by a working group and then sent to Mr. Ronning in New Delhi for his personal comments. Accordingly, on January 17, the following text was sent to Mr. Ronning:

“The two parties affirm their determination:

(a) to ensure that the said reactor, its equipment, its fuel, its heavy water and all fissionable material produced by it will be used for peaceful purposes only; (b) to discover and reveal any attempt to use them for military purposes or clandestinely to remove them from the territory of India; and (c) to cooperate in their efforts to these ends.

The two parties shall in cooperation carry out whatever inspection is deemed necessary by either, at times proposed by either, of the said reactor, its equipment, its fuel, and all fissionable material produced by it for the purpose only of discovering any use of it that is not for a peaceful purpose, or any removal from the premises of its equipment, its fuel or any fissionable material produced from it without the consent of both parties.

The Government of India affirms that it will not permit the removal of nuclear fuel or fissionable material from the premises of the said reactor without prior approval by both parties of the safeguard measures that would be applied to this fuel or fissionable material during and following its removal, and will not permit this fuel or fissionable material to come into the possession of or under the control of any other government, or the nationals of any other country without the consent of both parties.

The two parties agree that:

(a) Adequate records to assist in ensuring accountability for heavy water, fuel and fissionable material that are on the premises of the said reactor shall be maintained and produced when required by either party;

(b) Reports based on such records shall be made available at the request of either party;

(c) Both parties shall have the right to designate representatives to account for the fuel and fissionable material and to determine that the fuel and fissionable material are being used for peaceful purposes only. Such representatives shall be designated after consultation between the parties and, without being delayed or otherwise impeded in the exercise of their functions, shall be accompanied by the representatives of the other party if the latter so requests. They shall at all times have access to the premises, equipment and facilities of the said reactor and to all data relating thereto and to all persons who by reason of their occupation deal with such fuel or fissionable material or with such data.”

Mr. Ronning replied that in his view it would be most unlikely that the Indian authorities would accept the wording suggested.

7. In a later telegram on February 6,† Mr. Ronning asserted his view that India “will never sign a contract for a CANDU reactor unless we agree to ‘better’ (from the Indian point of view) safeguards than the CIR type.” Mr. Ronning expressed his belief that “unless we can be sufficiently flexible to meet India’s sensitivities on safeguards we would be well advised to drop the whole idea of Canadian participation in a power reactor for India.”

8. It is possible that a solution to the problem might be found in the context of the agreement which the United States hopes to conclude with India on the Tarapur reactor. The latest information from Washington indicates that the United States will endeavour to obtain Indian agreement on Agency safeguards or at least bilateral safeguards no less effective than Agency safeguards. If the Indians accepted either of these alternatives, there would appear to be an opportunity to reach agreement on acceptable safeguards for the CANDU reactor. It is also possible that if India refused to agree to any of the United States requirements and if, as a result, negotiations were terminated, the Indians might be more inclined to accept Canadian requirements if these seemed slightly less demanding than the United States ones.

9. There are, however, two differences between the Tarapur reactor and the CANDU reactor which appear very significant in Indian eyes. The Tarapur reactor will burn enriched uranium which is available, for the present at least, only in the United States; the CANDU reactor will burn natural uranium which is found in many places, including India. Secondly, the Tarapur reactor will be built entirely by the United States; the CANDU reactor will be built largely by the Indians themselves. For these reasons the Indians might feel able to accept United States control of the Tarapur reactor without a damaging loss of prestige, which would probably not be so easy with regard to the CANDU reactor.

10. The Indian authorities appear to attach great importance to the question of sovereign control of the CANDU reactor because it is built partly with Indian labour and technology and will be paid for entirely by Indian funds. In discussing the question of safeguards, it would be desirable, therefore, to make clear to the Indians that we regard the question of safeguards as important because of international considerations and because of the requirements of our own atomic energy legislation and not because of any financial or aid aspects of the transaction. In the circumstances the Panel might well conclude that our High Commissioner should now put Dr. Laurence’s original proposals to the Indian authorities with whatever modifications the Panel may think appropriate.

SAFEGUARDS: CANDU REACTOR

Following for Dr. G.C. Laurence. Advisory Panel on Atomic Energy discussed question of safeguards for Indian CANDU Reactor on February 15 and concluded that ministers probably would not be in a position to take firm decisions until after general elections April 8. Nevertheless it was decided that you should obtain Dr. Bhabha's reaction to your original proposal on safeguards minus, however, the inclusion of heavy water.

2. Proposal would now read as follows: Begins. The two parties affirm their determination: (a) to ensure that the said reactor, its equipment, its fuel and all fissionable material produced by it will be used for peaceful purposes only; (b) to discover and reveal any attempt to use them for military purposes or clandestinely to remove them from the territory of India; and (c) to cooperate in their efforts to these ends. The two parties shall in cooperation carry out whatever inspection is deemed necessary by either, at times proposed by either, of the said reactor, its equipment, its fuel and all fissionable material produced by it for the purpose only of discovering any use of it that is not, repeat not, for a peaceful purpose, or any removal from the premises of its equipment, its fuel or any fissionable material produced from it without the consent of both parties.

The Government of India affirms that it will not, repeat not, permit the removal of nuclear fuel or fissionable material from the premises of the said reactor without prior approval by both parties of the safeguard measures that would be applied to this fuel or fissionable material during and following its removal, and will not, repeat not, permit this fuel or fissionable material to come into the possession of or under the control of any other government, or the nationals of any other country without the consent of both parties. The two parties agree that: (a) adequate records to assist in ensuring accountability for fuel and fissionable material that are on the premises of the said reactor shall be maintained and produced when required by either party; (b) reports based on such records shall be made available at the request of either party; (c) both parties shall have the right to designate representatives to account for the fuel and fissionable material and to determine that the fuel and fissionable material are being used for peaceful purposes only. Such representatives shall be designated after consultation between the parties and, without being delayed or otherwise impeded in the exercise of their functions, shall be accompanied by the representatives of the other party if the latter so requests. They shall at all times have access to the premises, equipment and facilities of the said reactor and to all data relating thereto and to all persons who by reason of their occupation deal with such fuel or fissionable material or with such data. Ends.

3. You should tell Dr. Bhabha that if the above proposal is not acceptable to India, Canada would be prepared to consider accepting whatever relevant safeguards arrangements are agreed upon with respect to Tarapur reactor if the USA is the supplier. (For your own information only, there is some inclination here to accept for Canada the level of safeguards applied to Tarapur whoever may be the supplier (even France or the USSR). It is argued that if Tarapur were to be supplied under lax safeguards the damage would be done and the provision of a CANDU reactor on similar terms would not make a great deal of difference.)

4. As you are aware our COCOM commitments would require India to guarantee that any nuclear reactors, components thereof and other specified materials received from Canada will not find their way to Communist Bloc countries. India is not a participant in COCOM arrangements and for this reason among others therefore Dr. Bhabha is likely to object specifically to the "removal from the premises" provisions of our draft proposal. For your information, the panel felt that India should not be excepted from the COCOM requirements.

5. In presenting your proposal to Dr. Bhabha, you should make it clear that we regard safeguards on Indian CANDU as unrelated to the manner in which the transaction will be financed. The main reasons for seeking such safeguards are requirements of the Canadian Atomic Energy and Export-Import Control Legislation, the important commitments to our allies regarding strategic controls and general international considerations. You should stress the importance that nations like Canada and India should do everything possible to encourage the application of nuclear science and technology to peaceful purposes. An agreed formula now between Canada and India could well pave the way for similar agreements among other countries and could make a very significant contribution to the development of nuclear energy for peaceful purposes throughout the world. Indeed, by their cooperation now Canada and India could set an example and could lead the world in this field. Toward this end Canadian officials would be prepared to recommend that Canada reciprocate by making all AECL reactors, including NRU, NPD and Douglas Point, open to inspection by India or IAEA. (For your information, NRU reactor will not be involved in military production after end of this year.) We would hope very much, therefore, that India could join us in a concerted effort to achieve an agreement that would serve as an example to all other countries.

INDIA-CANDU REACTOR SAFEGUARDS

Last Friday I gave Bhabha a text which I described as unofficial and which attempted to state what I believed might be safeguard terms that would be acceptable to Canadian Government on India-CANDU Reactor as basis for discussion. This text was practically identical with that contained in your reference telegram except for addition of following paragraph at end. The two parties agree that "(d) when safeguard provisions that are applicable to the said reactor have been established by the IAEA, arrangements shall be made with IAEA for the application of the said safeguard provisions to the said reactor and the fuel and fissionable materials that are on its premises, whereupon the said provisions shall replace the safeguard provisions specified in this agreement."

2. Today I had a very friendly conversation with Bhabha. He reiterated his former argument regarding the philosophy and temporary effectiveness of any safeguards. I put the problem in the perspective recommended at end of your reference telegram.

3. Bhabha told me for Canadian ears only that in negotiating with Americans, he had indicated that India might accept agency safeguards on Tarapur if USA maintained a similar position on all projects in which USA gives substantial assistance to other nations. This was a reference to American contracts with Euratom group where USA has been content with much less.

4. India particularly dislikes agency safeguards because it might result in inspection by nationals of unfriendly countries.<sup>52</sup> I expressed feeling that there was very little margin for change in Canadian Government's position on most of safeguards provisions described in text which I gave him. However I told him I thought we might be prepared to give further consideration to the possibility of making provision at end of text which I quoted above permissive instead of mandatory.

5. I felt at end of conversation that no repeat no doors had been closed. Bhabha said that he is visiting USA shortly and could visit Canada thereby revealing apparently a desire to keep discussion open.

FROM (3 GROUPS MISSING) MISSION TO INDIA

Following courtesy call on Minister of Finance Desai, mission completed discussions today with L.K. Jha, Secretary, Economic Affairs Department and K.S. Sundara Rajan, Joint Secretary, Ministry of Finance. Following is the text of an agreed minute concerning the financing of a 200 MW CANDU type nuclear power station and other projects, signed by Head of Finance Mission and Sundara Rajan: "Canadian and Indian officials meeting in Delhi on February 25-28, to discuss long term Canadian government financing of the CANDU power station and other projects have agreed as follows:

(1) Canadian goods and services for the CANDU project up to $30 million will be financed under section 21A of the Canadian Export Credits Insurance Act within an annual allocation of $12.5 million in special credits which the Canadian government is prepared to undertake to make available under Consortium arrangements over the estimated six year construction period of the project beginning in 1963-64.

Indian officials advised that the latest estimate of foreign exchange cost in Canadian dollars, including the transfer to Canadian supply of turbine generators and auxiliaries and one half initial fuel costs, amounts to $36.9 million. A copy of this estimate is attached.† It was agreed that planning should proceed on the assumption that if the turbine generators and auxiliaries and one half the fuel supply are transferred to Canadian supply, full consideration would be given to financing the estimated additional foreign exchange costs of the CANDU project from the above annual allocation of special credits.

(2) Views will be exchanged between the two governments prior to the Consortium meeting in 1963 on whether, in the context of the above understanding, the full amount of the credit commitment in respect of the CANDU project should be declared by Canada as a Consortium commitment for 1963-64, or declared annually in accordance with estimated disbursements as part of the annual allocation of Canadian credits of $12.5 million.

(3) The Canadian credit in respect of the CANDU project will bear interest at the rate of six percent per annum, with a minimum grace period of five years and an overall term of twenty years from the date of contract.

(4) An overall agreement and contract on the CANDU reactor will be subject to mutually acceptable arrangements on safeguards, design, organization and other aspects to be discussed between the appropriate Canadian authorities and the Indian Atomic Energy Commission.

(5) Canadian officials asked for confirmation that uranium fuel for the CANDU nuclear power station which is not repeat not supplied from Indian indigenous natural resources, will be procured from Canada, subject to competitive prices, quality and delivery. The Indian officials were inclined to view this request with favour, but indicated that a final answer could only be given after consulting the Chairman of the Indian Atomic Energy Commission who is presently away from India. Canadian High Commission in India will be advised by Indian authorities of the final decision as soon as possible.

(6) Indian and Canadian authorities agree that the CANDU project should be given top priority in the use of Canadian special credits. Indian authorities confirmed that the CANDU power project was being given high priority in the Third Plan.

(7) Every effort will be made to reach early agreement on the order of priority and the time phasing of other projects to be financed from the balance of funds to be made available under the special credits. Indian officials have requested that consideration be given to the following new projects for such financing:

Estimated foreign exchange cost (1) Hindustan aluminium thermal power plant $14-16 million; (2) Kotah hydroelectric project (subject to international tendering) $ 8 million; (5) Copper mining equipment (Indian Copper Corporation) $4 million.

(8) In respect of the special credit of $25 million covering the first two years of the Third Five Year Plan, it was agreed that expeditious action should be taken with regard to the following projects:

(1) Rana Pratap Sagar hydro electric project $8 million; (2) Indaluco $1 million; (3) Cominco Binani zinc smelter $1.6 million; (4) Wind tunnel (National Aeronautical Laboratory) $4 million; (5) Diesel locomotives $4.9 million; (6) Paper mill $5.5 million. Total $25 million.

Read and Chapin returning to Ottawa and Taylor proceeding to Dacca and Japan in accordance with original itinerary.

Mission appreciates having been kept informed on developments concerning Iraq.

INDIA-CANDU REACTOR SAFEGUARDS

I had lengthy discussion yesterday with H. Bhabha and Cabinet Secretary S.S. Khera on safeguards. Khera had participated in financial agreement of Rana Pratap Sagar CANDU type nuclear power station. He is also familiar with safeguards problems and with safeguards negotiations on Tarapur.

2. I said that since financial agreement had now been reached on Rana Pratap Sagar I hoped that Bhabha would be more flexible on safeguards than he had indicated in Vienna to Laurence so that we could reach decision on project without further delay. Bhabha replied that position outlined in Canadian instructions to Laurence were unacceptable to India and whole project might have to be dropped unless Canada could be more flexible. He still hoped we could reach agreement similar to CIR. I said this was impossible in present circumstances and asked about progress he was making with USA on Tarapur, adding that agreement with USA could be a model for an agreement on Rana Pratap Sagar. Bhabha then repeated all old arguments based on contention that two projects were different in financial responsibility and also in type of fuel to be used. I said we did not repeat not agree that these differences had relation to safeguard requirements. Bhabha said that Americans understood difference and he would consider letting me have wording of clause in proposed Tarapur draft which would indicate relationship of these factors to safeguards.

3. I asked him if proposed Tarapur draft provided for agency inspection. He replied that India was prepared to consider acceptance of agency inspection after completion of project if during that time agency inspection was provided for in agreements reached between USA and any other country in joint development of nuclear power projects.

4. When I asked what should be next step in our negotiations Bhabha suggested that Gray should come to India. I suggested it would be preferable for Bhabha to go to Ottawa. Bhabha then said that if Canadian authorities agree he and Khera would come to Ottawa about mid-April to finalize an agreement on safeguards for Rana Pratap Sagar. They would not repeat not like to come merely for another round of discussions but would be prepared to conclude an agreement within course of four or five days. Khera would draw up a draft agreement along lines acceptable to India which he will give me within course of next few days for onward transmission to you so that you may study it before negotiations in Ottawa if you agree that Bhabha and Khera should come to finalize agreement on safeguards. You may also wish to prepare draft agreement.

5. You have recent general views on safeguards problem in my telegrams 94 January 24† and 141 February 6.† I shall comment further when Khera gives me draft. Meantime I should observe that Bhabha appears to have reached point of turning elsewhere if Canadian position remains rigid. Whether we agree or not repeat not I think we must accept unpalatable fact that since in final analysis Indians will pay for project and will use unenriched fuel they will insist on less favourable (from our point of view) safeguard provisions than for Tarapur.

6. You may wish to send draft agreement here for study prior to Bhabha's departure for Ottawa. If two drafts are not repeat not too far apart we could possibly narrow gap and finalize agreement here making trip to Ottawa unnecessary.

7. May I have your comments as soon as possible?

POSSIBLE VISIT TO CANADA BY PRESIDENT AYUB OF PAKISTAN

After reading Telegram No. 255 of July 27 from Karachi,† the Prime Minister sent the following Memorandum to the Minister:

“I visited in Pakistan four days or so after he became President and we have had the most friendly relations at all times since.

“If he desires to visit here, whatever the difficulties may be, I feel that he should be welcomed.

“Before the invitation is extended, however, I think you should get in touch with the Governor-General as he (and rightly so) wants to be consulted as State Visits fall primarily under him.”

The Minister wishes a telegram to Karachi implementing the Prime Minister's instructions to be prepared.

THE PRIME MINISTER'S CONVERSATION WITH PRESIDENT AYUB,
FRIDAY, SEPTEMBER 21

You might like to have a note of what was said when the President of Pakistan called on the Prime Minister last Friday.

2. After an exchange of courtesies the Prime Minister asked the President whether there were any points he wished to raise. President Ayub said there were three. He stated them factually and without polemic.

(1) He hoped for Canadian support at the January Consortium meeting in Washington.<sup>53</sup>

(2) He asked for Canadian support when the World Bank is considering the financial arrangements for financing the Indus basin replacement costs. He said the increase in cost was not the fault of Pakistan. On the other hand Pakistani agriculture depended on irrigation. His Government would therefore agree to any sacrifices that the World Bank wanted. He mentioned a reduction in industrial loans by $104 million and a reduction by one half of the $160 million item provided as a counter to inflation. The President said that the total cost would be $1700 million over ten years. It was important to have the work completed in that period "because after ten years India would take the water away."

(3) Pakistan was having difficulty in completing the arrangements for the desired purchase of commercial aircraft in Canada because of the seven-year limit on aircraft loans under which the Export Credit Insurance Corporation operates. The President wondered whether this difficulty could be circumvented by either

(a) a $12 million loan without specifying the purpose, or

(b) a loan for two periods of seven years.

The Prime Minister speculated on what might be done and said this would have to be studied since he would not like to propose an arrangement to circumvent the regulation.

3. The conversation then turned to more general topics, the President thanking the Prime Minister for all the assistance Pakistan has received from Canada and the Prime Minister mentioning Canadian pride in the Warsak dam. Mr. Diefenbaker described Pakistan as an Asian bastion of the free world.

4. The President took this up and described the problems his Government faces in developing the country. He said the development programme is under great pressure because everyone expects more quickly. Moreover the people do deserve better conditions and one must remember that they are "surrounded" by Communists.

5. The President mentioned that his country had accepted one loan from the U.S.S.R. of $25 million for oil exploration. In reply to the Prime Minister's question the President said he thought that the Soviet Union made this loan because it wanted to soften the attitude of Pakistan and to gain some influence in the country. He said that the Russians are suspicious and worried [about] CENTO "although it has no military life in it." The Russians are still trying to gain influence in the country and hence Pakistan needs more assistance from its friends "although (I know) Canada has its own problems."

6. The President then referred bluntly to Nehru's hostility to Pakistan which he said "bedevils the situation." The Prime Minister recalled the strong feelings on the Kashmir question which he had encountered when he visited India and asked if these were in any way diminishing. The President did not think so and went on to say that it has not dawned on Nehru that the pressure of communism in the sub-continent will grow and that the Indian and Pakistani armies should not face inwards towards each other but outwards.

The Pakistan Consortium meetings took place on March 28-29 in Paris and on May 2-3 in Washington. Voir/See Foreign Relations of the United States, 1961-1963, Vol. XIX (Washington: United States Government Printing Office, 1996), documents 282, 287.

7. In reply to another question from the Prime Minister the President mentioned the great pressure of the 2.3% annual population increase in Pakistan and referred again to the two main problems in agricultural development – water logging and salinity.

8. In closing the conversation the Prime Minister said that the attitude of the Canadian Government is to do everything it can to help Pakistan. He stressed that this is a definite policy not merely an expression of goodwill.

[Ottawa], April 10, 1962

AID TO NIGERIAN ARMED FORCES – AIR FORCE

Attached is a copy of telegram 1280 of April 9, 1962, from London,† in which Mr. Drew suggests that we may wish to reconsider our previous decision against the provision of assistance to the Nigerian Air Force. As you will see Mr. Drew's attitude is based on the following considerations:

(a) Nigeria is much the most powerful and at the same time the most hopeful of the emerging African members of the Commonwealth;

(b) Great Britain and the members of the Common Market have recognized the necessity of providing assistance to the amount of £550,000,000 to English and French-speaking countries of Africa in the next five years in order to safeguard Western positions in the area; at the same time Nigeria does not wish for obvious political reasons to accept substantial military assistance direct from these countries;

(c) The Nigerians are keen to receive this assistance from a country like Canada; if they cannot receive it from that source however there is a real possibility that they will turn to the U.S.S.R. in spite of their strong anti-communist sentiments.

In order to reduce the strain on our highly-trained military personnel, Mr. Drew suggests therefore that we consider the possibility of recruiting instructors from the pool of retired or retiring RCAF personnel.

You will recall that the possibility of providing assistance in setting up the Nigeria Air Force was first raised last September during the visit to Canada of the Nigerian Minister of Defence, the Honourable Muhammadu Ribadu. From his interviews with the Minister of National Defence and high officials of that Department, Mr. Ribadu clearly drew the impression that Canada would be prepared to consider assistance to his country in that field. When the general subject of military assistance to Nigeria was considered by the Cabinet Defence Committee on January 31, however, we had not yet received any formal request for assistance to the Nigerian Air Force, although the Canadian High Commissioner in Lagos had informed us that such a request was forthcoming. No decision was therefore taken by the Committee concerning assistance to the Air Force in Nigeria; on the other hand, the Committee agreed to the training of Nigerian air cadets in Canada, and the sending of two Army and six Navy instructors.

In February and March the Nigerian authorities officially indicated that they wished a single country to take on the task of establishing, organizing and training the first elements of their Air Force; they also indicated to the Canadian High Commissioner that, although the request for such help had been addressed to several other countries (now reduced to Great Britain and India) they would be pleased if Canada were prepared to accept the responsibility. There seems little likelihood that India would be able to provide this assistance, while Nigerian Ministers may see some political disadvantages in obtaining assistance in this vital field of defence from their former colonial power.

While in Geneva I approved the text of a letter from the Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs to the Minister of National Defence† bringing the Nigerian request to his attention and asking that it be given favourable consideration. The letter pointed out that Nigeria was an increasingly important African country of the Commonwealth and that it would be most unfortunate if the Nigerians were to gain the impression that we would be less willing to assist them than the Ghanaians. It was also stressed that assistance to the Nigerian Air Force would bolster the prospect of Nigerian purchases of Canadian aircraft. Mr. Harkness replied however that his officials had reached the conclusion that in order to perform this task efficiently fifty officers and one hundred men would be required and that such an undertaking would involve a commitment considerably beyond the scale of assistance which could be envisaged. He pointed out that the costs of our programmes in Ghana and of the offers already made to Nigeria (including the high cost air cadet training for Nigerians in Canada) would each amount to approximately $250,000 annually. In view of the position taken by Mr. Harkness, our High Commissioner in Lagos was asked to inform the Nigerians that it would not be possible for us to provide the assistance to the Nigerian Air Force.

I consider however that Mr. Drew's appeal deserves full consideration. I believe that in addition to the points which he raised in his telegram, a number of reasons would militate in favour of providing as much assistance as we possibly can to the setting up of a Nigerian Air Force:

(a) Although the Cabinet Defence Committee has already agreed to provide substantial military assistance to Nigeria, the Nigerian authorities have made it clear that they are more interested in assistance in building up their Air Force than in any other schemes;

(b) We have agreed to despatch a military training team of up to thirty Canadian officers to Ghana;<sup>54</sup> although the Nigerian cadet training scheme in Canada would no doubt be comparable to the Ghanaian programme in terms of cost and efforts, the presence of a Canadian team in their country would be more tangible for the Nigerians and would bring us more favourable acknowledgement for our efforts and expenses. The Nigerians are apt to resent our refusal to provide instructors to their country when Canadian instructors are serving in neighbouring Ghana even if the total amount of military assistance to Nigeria is equal;

(c) When the Cabinet agreed on June 1st, 1961, to provide military assistance to Commonwealth countries, one of the conditions specified in the memorandum approved by the Cabinet was that “first consideration in meeting such requests would be given to the provision of Canadian military instructors to the forces of the country seeking assistance”,<sup>55</sup>

(d) Even if it does not prove possible to recruit from the pool of retired or retiring RCAF officers all the instructors for this task, we may be able to set up an efficient training team by drawing from the active and the retired list simultaneously.<sup>56</sup>

You will note that on London’s request a copy of Mr. Drew’s telegram was referred directly to the Minister of National Defence. If you agree that the request for assistance in establishing the Nigerian Air Force should be re-examined, you may wish to indicate your views directly to Mr. Harkness.<sup>57</sup>

As you will recall, on receipt of telegram 1280 of April 9 from Mr. Drew, you raised the question of Canadian assistance to the Nigerian Air Force with the Prime Minister in a memo dated April 10 and suggested that this matter again be taken up with Mr. Harkness. The Prime Minister agreed.

2. In a letter to Mr. Harkness dated April 16, † you again reviewed the arguments in favour of Canadian assistance to the Nigerian Air Force. You directed Mr. Harkness’ attention to the points raised by Mr. Drew in his telegram, you expressed support for the idea of extending aid to the Nigerian Air Force and you said that you hoped Mr. Harkness would have another look at the way Canadian military assistance might be extended most effectively to Nigeria.

3. In his reply of April 24, † Mr. Harkness said that, due to the size of the commitment and its political implications, the Department of National Defence could not undertake the proposed assistance to the Nigerian Air Force. In the second paragraph of his letter Mr. Harkness said that the Nigerians have not yet replied to the offers in other fields which we already have extended. This is not quite the case as the Nigerians have expressed interest and asked for more information about our offers. Nor have the Nigerians refused our offer of a Commandant and Director of Studies for their military academy. Our offer was made on the condition that Britain did not offer to supply these officers; since then the British have made such an offer.

4. Even before Mr. Drew's intervention, we had more or less reconciled ourselves to Mr. Harkness' decision in this matter, i.e. that assistance in establishing an air force was beyond the scope of aid which the Department of National Defence was prepared to contemplate for Nigeria. Indeed, this reply already been conveyed by our High Commissioner. As a result there seems to be no alternative but to accept Mr. Harkness' position.

5. Enclosed for your signature if you agree, is a telegram to Lagos† informing our High Commissioner, Mr. Carter, of this decision<sup>58</sup> and letters† to Mr. Drew and Mr. Carter telling them of your letter to Mr. Harkness<sup>59</sup> and enclosing copies of Mr. Harkness' reply.<sup>60</sup>

Attached is a copy of telegram 161 of April 25, 1962 from the Canadian High Commissioner in Accra, transmitting a request from the Ghanaian authorities to train selected officers and other ranks of the Ghanaian Army in Canada.

2. You will recall that we raised this subject with you in our letter of March 23, 1962.† As we mentioned in that letter, it is natural for Ghanaian officers who have undergone military training under Canadian instructors to think in terms of the further military training courses that may be given in Canada. Furthermore, we know that the Soviet Bloc is anxious to train Ghanaian officers in their own countries and it would be useful if we could assist in providing training facilities in a Western area. As Mr. Williams has pointed out, the training of the Ghanaian Armed Forces is mostly being done by Commonwealth countries.

3. We would be grateful, therefore, if you would consider this request in conjunction with the one referred to in our letter of March 23, with a view to finding out how many vacancies in Canadian defense training establishments could be made available to Ghanaian military personnel. You may wish to consult the Military Adviser in Accra concerning the particular fields in which Canada would best be suited to provide training assistance in Canada.

TECHNICAL ASSISTANCE – MILITARY TRAINING

Ghana Ministry of Defence has requested that arrangements be made for the training of selected officer and other ranks of Ghana army in Canada. Vacancies are needed for technical and other training in armour (including reconnaissance), field engineering, infantry, signals, supplies and transport, electrical and mechanical engineering, ordnance services and provost. Certain other courses may be useful. When asked about numbers envisaged, Ministry of Defence stated that this would depend on the vacancies available. In other words they need all the vacancies they can get.

2. It is our opinion that this request should be examined as part of our technical assistance programme in military training in Ghana or an extension of it. At the present time Britain, Pakistan and India have accepted or have agreed to accept students from Ghana army at their various military schools and both Britain and Pakistan are contributing personnel in Ghana to assist in the training of Ghana armed forces. Viewed on a Commonwealth basis there is good argument that [we] should accept students from Ghana army on courses in Canada if at all possible.

3. As the Ministry of Defence is anxious to complete plans for the overseas training of selected personnel from the army as quickly as possible, early indication of your initial reaction to this request would be most useful.

TRAINING IN CANADA OF GHANAIAN MILITARY PERSONNEL

You will have noted the circulation copy of the attached telegram 201 of May 19 from Accra,† concerning a Ghanaian request for places on Canadian Army and RCAF courses. We have not been made aware yet of National Defence's reactions to this request, but we suspect that they will balk at its size. We hope, however, that they would agree eventually to providing a number of vacancies to the Ghanaians. Before approaching officially the Chairman, Chiefs of Staff, however, we would appreciate receiving your comments on the relative importance which should be given to Ghana versus Nigeria as receivers of Canadian military training assistance.

2. As you know, Canada has agreed to despatch a training team of not more than 30 persons to Ghana. We have also agreed to train a number of Nigerian cadets in Canada and to assist Nigeria in some other less important ways. In a letter to Mr. Green, dated March 30, 1962, the Minister of National Defence estimated that the cost of our programmes in Ghana and of the offers already made to Nigeria would each amount to approximately $250,000. Since that time however, the Canadian offer to provide a Commandant and a Director of Studies to the proposed Nigerian Military Academy has been cancelled because a similar offer had been made by the British. Canada subsequently declined an important Nigerian request to assist in the training of the Nigerian Air Force. The question arises therefore whether by agreeing to the current Ghanaian request we would not expose ourselves to raising feelings among the Nigerians that we are more forthcoming to Ghanaian requests.

3. On a more general plan, we are somewhat concerned by the possibility that if we continue to provide military assistance to these two countries only or primarily in the light of our ability to meet each particular request, the outcome might be that the balance which will be achieved will bear little relation to the political considerations involved. This could have important implications in view of the natural rivalry between these two Commonwealth members. We should like to know therefore which of the following courses you would recommend in the allocation of Canadian military training assistance to Ghana and Nigeria:

(a) To give priority to Nigeria, as the most important of the two and the one which follows a more moderate foreign policy.

(b) To give priority to Ghana as the country which is more tempted by Soviet blandishments and therefore the more in need of Western assistance as a counterpoise to Soviet offers.

(c) To strive to maintain an equal balance in provision of military assistance.

4. Any other comments you may wish to offer would be welcome.

TRAINING IN CANADA OF GHANAIAN MILITARY PERSONNEL

I apologize for not having replied sooner to your memorandum of May 25 concerning the allocation of military training assistance between Ghana and Nigeria.

2. We agree with Commonwealth Division that it would be the wisest course to try to maintain an equal balance between the two countries in the provision of Canadian military assistance.

3. The programme for Ghana has been important in providing a very welcome alternative in Ghanaian eyes to British military assistance and in demonstrating the practical usefulness of the Commonwealth association. It has been helpful to Western interests in preventing Ghana from becoming entirely dependent on the Soviet bloc for such aid. As you know, there is considerable rivalry between Ghana and Nigeria for influence in Africa and if we were to give marked preference to Nigeria this would destroy the good effects which our military assistance to Ghana has produced so far.

4. On the other hand, the Nigerians, who have been following a pro-Western foreign policy, will be resentful if they find that we are giving greater military training assistance to Ghana, apparently because of our fear that the latter might turn to the Soviet bloc for help. The Nigerians might also reason that, as a more populous and potentially a more important African country, they deserve at least equal treatment with Ghana. They might also claim that their economic need for outside help is greater than Ghana's.

5. We appreciate the reasons given in Accra's telegram 201 of May 19 for considering favourably the Ghanaian request for training places in the Army and Air Force in Canada and hope that the Department of National Defence will be able to respond to some extent. At the same time we would have to be prepared to give similar assistance to Nigeria if asked in order to maintain a reasonable balance.

6. If granting the request for training places to Ghana would produce a large imbalance in relation to the military aid given to Nigeria, this would be a valid reason for refusing the Ghanaian request. If, on the other hand, it would be possible to answer the Ghanaian request and at the same time to provide some assistance for the Nigerian Air Force, if this project is still alive, this might be the most desirable solution.

MILITARY TRAINING ASSISTANCE TO NIGERIA

Since Nigeria achieved independence, Canada has received a large number of requests for the provision of military training assistance to that country. These proposals were considered in a general way during the visit to Canada in September 1961 of the Honourable Muhammadu Ribadu, the Nigerian Minister of Defence. From his interviews with the Minister of National Defence and high officials of that Department, Mr. Ribadu apparently drew the impression that Canada would be prepared to provide substantial assistance in that field. Nigerian requests however were rather vague and it was only toward the end of January 1962 that specific proposals could be considered by the Canadian Government. Since then we have indicated that we would be prepared to try to meet a number of these requests. The Department of National Defence has stated however that because of the size of the proposed commitment they could not assume responsibility for the training of the Nigerian Air Force, although this appeared to be the request to which the Nigerians attached greatest importance. Moreover, those requests which we have indicated we would be prepared to try to meet have yet to be implemented because of minor administrative problems which remain to be resolved. The Nigerians therefore may well be disappointed with the present state of our military assistance programme to their country and Mr. Wachuku may refer to this matter during his conversations in Ottawa.<sup>61</sup>

2. The Canadian Government has agreed to accept a total of 32 cadets from Nigeria (6 navy, 10 army and 10 air force) for training in Canadian defence establishments. This Nigerians have asked various questions concerning the academic background required for candidates, the apportionment of expenses between Canada and Nigeria and the conditions of service. We have provided the information requested on the air cadet training schemes. The Department of National Defence is still considering the other two. It is to be noted that the Nigerians have not stated formally that they wished to take advantage of the Canadian offer, although they have expressed great interest. However, they have asked whether we would be able to provide training facilities for ratings of the Royal Nigerian Navy; this request is under consideration also.

3. The Canadian Government has also agreed to the provision of up to 6 naval officers for employment in administrative staff and training appointments at Nigerian naval shore establishments. Following a Nigerian request you signed a memorandum to the Cabinet† a few days ago suggesting that the Canadian naval officers be authorized to serve on board Nigerian ships in certain circumstances.

4. A Canadian offer to provide a Commandant and a Director of Studies for the proposed new Nigerian Military Academy was made subject to information being obtained that Great Britain did not also plan to meet the same request for assistance. The proposal was dropped when we learned that the British had in fact agreed to provide the directing staff at the Academy.

5. In February and March 1962, the Nigerian authorities officially indicated that they wish a single country to take on the task of establishing, organizing and training the first elements of their Air Force; they also indicated to the Canadian High Commissioner that, although the request for such help had been addressed to other countries, they would be pleased if Canada were prepared to accept the responsibility. You will recall that the Minister of National Defence informed us that such an undertaking would involve a commitment considerably beyond the scale of assistance which could be envisaged. In view of this, our High Commissioner in Lagos was instructed to inform the Nigerians that it would not be possible to provide assistance to the Nigerian Air Force. Mr. Drew asked from London whether this decision could be reconsidered in view of Nigeria's increasing importance in Commonwealth and African affairs. The decision was confirmed however after further consultation with the Minister of National Defence.

6. In a recent telegram (No. 171 of June 13†) the High Commissioner in Nigeria has reviewed our military assistance programme to that country. He pointed out that our funds would provide a greater impact if restricted to a particular field in which we would be particularly well equipped to help. He suggested therefore that we should consider the possibility of concentrating our efforts either on the Nigerian Air Force or on their Navy. He proposed that we should consider the possibility of acting in conjunction with the RAF or the Royal Navy.

7. In your letters to Mr. Harkness on this subject you have stressed repeatedly that it would be useful to have in Nigeria a service officer who could assess the military requirements on the spot and would submit concrete proposals as to the best way of assisting the Nigerians. You have also pointed out that the air training scheme in Nigeria seemed to provide a promising field for Canadian assistance in view of our considerable experience in air training and the possibility of thus promoting indirectly the sale of Canadian aircraft to that country. Mr. Harkness replied however that he feared that the despatch of an officer to Nigeria would encourage the Nigerians to expect to receive more help than we could actually provide. Under the circumstances, Nigerian requests for military assistance have been considered on a piecemeal basis; we have agreed to those requests which National Defence considered that they were in a good position to meet. It is therefore difficult to determine whether the best use has been made of the funds that might be available for military training assistance to Nigeria and Mr. Carter's suggestions are worth careful consideration. We are informed that the Department of National Defence is studying them. Meanwhile, we have some reservations concerning the advisability of assisting the Nigerian Air Force or Navy in conjunction with the RAF or the RN as suggested by Mr. Carter. There would be some obvious danger in tying up too closely the Canadian to the British military assistance in an African country and last fall you informed our missions in Accra and London that you would not agree to a similar proposal concerning Ghana.

8. As Mr. Carter has pointed out, Nigerian feelings in regard to military training assistance are sharpened by the existence of a Canadian Armed Forces Training Team in neighbouring Ghana. The relations between the two African countries are strained and Nigerians are apt to resent our providing assistance to Dr. Nkrumah in a form which is more easily noticed by the local population. The basic reason why a training team has been sent to Ghana rather than Nigeria is that the Ghanaians requested this military assistance earlier. It may be worth pointing out to Mr. Wachuku that Canadian military training personnel and finances are limited. The cost of sending 6 naval officers to Nigeria and training 32 cadets in Canada would be about equal to the cost of our 30 officer military training mission to Ghana – each about $250,000. We should like the Nigerians to either accept or reject our responses to their requests. If they are not accepted any new requests would have to be considered in the light of Canadian capabilities and further delay in initiating a programme of cooperation would inevitably result.

AID TO NIGERIAN ARMED FORCES

In view of my recent conversations [on] this matter with his permanent secretaries, Alhaji Ribadu, Defence Minister, asked me to call yesterday and the main results were to confirm what we reported in our telegram 179.

2. However the Minister went even farther in giving assurances of Nigeria assuming costs of the officers and men that we might spare from our regular force plus recruits from our reserve.

He assured me that not repeat not only did Nigeria expect to pay all the men's customary scales of allowances but also their base pay and their transportation costs from Canada and furthermore a hardship allowance adequate to compensate for adjustment to life here with different climate and fewer amenities, which could be negotiated later, plus more frequent vacations than in Canada. (It occurs to me that from a disciplinary viewpoint this financial willingness of Nigeria to assume all these costs might prove too generous and we might well reserve for our account some share of their pay in order to improve our disciplinary control over them but we would be under absolutely no repeat no pressure to do so by Nigeria.)

3. The above was discussed with reference only to Nigeria's previous request to us for the necessary personnel for setting up Air Force training establishments here. Although no repeat no other service arm was mentioned by Minister, who incidentally apologized for not repeat not being more explicit in his notes to us on an Air Force training group, it is now clear that Nigerians wish help in the form of skills and prefer to pay for all (or most of) the cost of such men rather than accept financial help for their armed forces. This would affect similarly the six naval officers requested whose detailed qualifications were transmitted our letter 324 June 30. †

4. Minister confirmed Indian officers arriving for Air Force survey, mentioning fourteenth, nevertheless stated he would be grateful for any future Canadian examination of his Air Force training needs, especially since he might well fail to reach agreement with India. He did not repeat not mention any restriction that might result from the present Indian examination of the subject; accordingly I stated that if Ottawa should later decide to offer to examine the project it would be understood that we would not repeat not wish to enter the situation while Indians were actively engaged in it. Minister then brought up possible difficulty finding all the necessary men in Canada which Air Force once estimated at fifty officers and one hundred ORs and which was given as main problem by Defence Department last April when considering Minister's original request. He now enquires whether a joint Canadian-Indian training group would be feasible since he suspects same problem with Indians, and I answered merely that I would pass on to Ottawa this enquiry. I then asked whether the Minister had any present intention of referring the project to British if agreement with India should prove impossible and he replied definitely negative even though he repeated that government strongly prefers a Commonwealth link, adding "You Canadians have always seemed to us the best people for this job." Incidentally Minister has been Acting Prime Minister for the past month during absence in the North of Prime Minister.

5. In view of above matters pending and because no repeat no Air Force cadets likely to be ready for training in Canada until well into next year we are holding your DL-161 May 15 † for subsequent transmission to Nigerians since it would have more impact as part of a larger Air Force proposal than standing by itself.

LETTER NO. K-88

Ottawa, May 3, 1962

UNCLASSIFIED

Reference: Mr. John Holmes' Visit in April 1962.

PROPOSED CANADIAN ASSISTANCE FOR JAMAICA'S FOREIGN SERVICE

As you no doubt know, last month Mr. John Holmes who was formerly an Assistant Under-Secretary in the Department and now is President of the Canadian Institute of International Affairs lectured in Jamaica for eight days taking part in a "crash programme" which that island's Government organized as training for members of its civil service who will be forming the core of its foreign service personnel. On his return from Kingston, Mr. Holmes wrote a realistic and constructive letter† to the Department suggesting specific ways in which we could help the Jamaican Foreign Ministry. The Under-Secretary has said we should follow up all the suggestions made by Mr. Holmes.

2. We realize, of course, that a number of the suggestions Mr. Holmes made were illustrative of the types of help we might offer the Jamaicans who according to Mr. Holmes "are desperate for guidance and would be most grateful for anything you could do." While in Jamaica, Mr. Holmes was very careful to avoid any commitments and was also very careful to make it clear that he in no way represented the Canadian Government; nevertheless the Jamaicans pressed him to find out what further help they might get from us.

3. Mr. Holmes has told us that the fifteen civil servants who took part in the lectures he gave were all university graduates, all with very high standing and a good deal of sophistication politically and socially. Mr. Holmes also mentioned that among their potential diplomats and civil servants generally there was a very considerable group of graduates from McGill and Toronto whose orientation was strongly Canadian. Among the interesting comments John Holmes made is that "the Jamaicans see their role in the world as that of a country which does not label itself neutralist or uncommitted but which uses its independence and its small but rather well-hinged role for useful purposes. Here again they like the Canadian model. They are a little concerned that Busta might, in one of his florid speeches, commit them to an alignment which they think it would be wise to approach cautiously at this stage. The seriousness with which they take Ottawa is to be shown by the fact that they have already arranged for office space for a High Commissioner's office."

4. Mr. Holmes made a number of constructive suggestions concerning the specific areas in which we might offer the Jamaicans some help. Among these suggestions are:

(1) Having one of our senior officers, preferably the Canadian Ambassador to Cuba, chat with some of their people about Cuba. Mr. Holmes told us that the Jamaicans do not like Castro and are worried about Cuba but they would much rather follow the Canadian policy of pursuing correct relations with that country than the U.S. policy of treating Castro as a pariah.

(2) Having one or two Jamaican officials who will eventually hold senior responsible positions in their Ministry come to Ottawa for attachment, possibly of three weeks' or a month's duration, to our Department's administrative divisions (Personnel, Administrative Services, Finance, Supplies and Properties). It is possible that one or both of these Jamaicans might wish to spend some of their time in Ottawa with one or more of our functional divisions (Consular, Information, Inspection Service, Legal, Protocol).

(3) Having one Jamaican official who will eventually hold a senior responsible position in the United Nations Division of their Ministry come to Ottawa for attachment possibly of a week or more to our United Nations Division followed by an attachment of a week or two to our Permanent Mission at United Nations headquarters in New York.

5. We are now in the process of making tentative arrangements for the above three kinds of assistance to the Jamaican foreign service and will be writing you again in a few days' time with proposals for helping the soon-to-be-independent country. We are sending a copy of this letter, and will also send a copy of our follow up letter, to the Trade Commissioner in Jamaica. It may be that your forthcoming trip to Jamaica (our telegram K-72 of May 3†) will be an opportune time for you to discuss these matters with Jamaicans. Incidentally, the person with whom you should go over our offers of assistance is the Hon. Egerton Richardson, C.M.G., Financial Secretary, who knows much of the background of this letter. However, should it happen that the timing of your Jamaican visit makes it inconvenient for you to discuss these matters with Mr. Richardson (who according to Mr. Holmes is “the Bob Bryce of Kingston and a very pleasant and able man”) then we would ask you to write to Mr. Blake requesting him to follow up this matter with Mr. Richardson.

P.S. You will realize that while we have sent this letter by airmail, with no classification, in order to ensure early delivery to you in Port of Spain, a number of John Holmes’ comments noted above are of a sensitive nature and we know that you will treat them accordingly.

Dear Mr. Lindo,

TRAINING JAMAICAN DIPLOMATS

After signing the attached letter for Guy Smith, a document came in from Canada stating that it would be useful if you were sending an officer to visit the Canadian United Nations Division in New York, that he be there at the time of the resumed Sixteenth Session of the General Assembly which opens in New York on June 7th, and will continue for a few weeks, possibly until the end of June.

It is pointed out that your officer would benefit far more by going to New York during the resumed Session in June than by going in July when there are few U.N. meetings and when many of the people he could usefully meet would be away on holiday.

The Canadian delegation in New York would be pleased to give whatever assistance they can through discussions with him and by showing him the General Assembly in motion. Then your officer could continue on to Ottawa for a period of a week or so with the Canadian United Nations Division if he so desired.

Mr. Smith will not be back in the office today, so I thought I would add this information to his letter.

Yours truly,

Dear Mr. Lindo,

TRAINING JAMAICAN DIPLOMATS

Following our conversation of yesterday, I have been asked by the Canadian Government to offer to provide you with help in the training of your Foreign Service officers along the following lines:

(1) If your Government feels that it would be helpful we would be prepared to have a number of your Foreign Service officers in training visit the Department of External Affairs in Ottawa in the course of the coming months before your Independence. Perhaps you might wish to send two officers to Ottawa for three or four weeks on attachment to the Administrative Division of the Department of External Affairs – that is to say, Personnel, Administrative Service, Finance, Supplies & Properties, and Inspection Service. We would also suggest that they might visit the Functional Division of the Department in order to observe their operations and discuss their problems and conduct of their business with the officers of this Division, i.e. Consular, Information, Legal and Protocol.

In connection with this proposal we would like to suggest that the officers whom you wish to send forward (if you so wish and can spare them at this time) would not be your beginners, but rather civil servants of some experience whom you would be sending out to your various Foreign Missions in relatively senior positions. In suggesting three or four weeks I would like you to feel that this is a very broad suggestion only, and we would be prepared to change it or to change the timing of the visits in any way that would meet your own convenience. Indeed we would be only too glad to make whatever arrangements fit in best with your own requirements.

(2) In addition to this sort of “training,” we would also be glad to arrange for one of your senior officers to visit our United Nations Division for possibly a week or two in order to go into the methods of preparing for a United Nations General Assembly session, the organization of work, and for general discussions of United Nations problems with particular reference to those facing the next session of the Assembly. This period in Ottawa might be followed by a week or so on attachment with our Permanent Mission to the United Nations in New York.

In general these visits, if you find them desirable and possible, would probably suit us best if they were to take place between mid-June and mid-July, but we would try to re-arrange our schedules for an earlier or later period should that fit in with your own requirements.

I am attaching a number of copies of pamphlets etc., that describe the operations of the Administrative Division of the Department of External Affairs. We also enclose copies of the Department of External Affairs Telephone Directory, which lists the main segments of each Division of the Department. This informative material might be of help to your officers who are to be connected with the administration of your own Ministry. It might also serve as a useful background for any of your officers that you wish to send to Canada in accordance with the proposals which I have mentioned herein.

If you find that you can or wish to take advantage of these proposals, will you let Mr. Blake, the Canadian Trade Commissioner in Kingston, know of what you propose to do, and he will be glad to pass the word to Ottawa and make whatever arrangements are necessary to see that your officers are sent forward and received in Canada at the times that you consider to be most satisfactory.

Yours truly,
R.G.C. SMITH

CABINET DOCUMENT NO. 384-62
CONFIDENTIAL

AID TO COMMONWEALTH TERRITORIES IN THE CARIBBEAN

Canada's original undertaking of a five-year programme of assistance to the West Indies expires next March 31st. In present circumstances it is not possible to respond to enquiries about new aid projects from Trinidad, Jamaica or the smaller West Indian islands because it is uncertain what funds are to be available for the area after next April 1st. For this, among other reasons, it would be desirable to have a decision, at least in principle, on the future of Canadian aid to the area.

It will be recalled that prior to the meeting of Commonwealth Economic and Finance Ministers at Accra in September 1961, Cabinet considered the question of a possible aid programme for Commonwealth territories in the Caribbean area on the lines of the Colombo Plan. My memorandum to Cabinet dated August 28th, 1961 suggested that Canadian ministers might sound out the representatives of other Commonwealth countries on the idea of instituting a joint programme of aid for former British territories in the Caribbean, with possible later participation by the United States.<sup>62</sup> This proposal was put forward after discussion in the External Aid Board by representatives of the Departments of External Affairs, Finance, Trade and Commerce and the Bank of Canada.

Cabinet decided at its meeting of September 7th, 1961 that Ministers representing Canada at the Accra meeting should avoid taking any position at that time on a possible future plan of Commonwealth aid to former British territories in the Caribbean. While Cabinet felt the matter should not be raised at Accra, it was agreed that the question would receive future considerations in the light of the developing situation in that area.

The major development since that time is the granting of independence to Trinidad and Jamaica. Both countries are now looking to Canada, as a friendly neighbour and Commonwealth partner, for advice and assistance. The smaller West Indian islands are endeavouring to form an eight unit federation with very meagre resources. British Guiana is pressing for early independence and British Honduras is still struggling to overcome the severe setback to its economic development caused by the hurricane in October 1961.

As pointed out in my memorandum of August 28th, 1961, Canadian aid to the British territories in the Caribbean has been applied so far almost entirely to the West Indies. The only Canadian aid available to British Honduras and British Guiana amounts to about $100,000 for technical assistance under the Commonwealth technical assistance programme. The following considerations were set forth at that time in relation to Canadian participation in a joint Commonwealth aid programme for the area:

(a) Canada has a definite political interest in the stability of Commonwealth territories in the Western Hemisphere.

(b) Canada also has a very substantial trade and investment interest in the area. The West Indies are traditionally an important market for Canadian goods particularly for a number of small firms in Eastern Canada. Canadian banks, manufacturing firms, insurance companies and other enterprises have branches and considerable investments in the West Indies. Jamaica and British Guiana are the chief sources of supply of bauxite to the Canadian aluminum industry and ALCAN has more than $100 million invested in the area.

(c) Recent constitutional developments in the area lend even greater urgency to the question of economic aid. It will be important that the islands which had previously been expected to form the Federation obtain sufficient economic assistance to become viable members of the Commonwealth and substantially increased aid to these territories from various available sources will be necessary as they gain independence.

(d) An expanded aid programme would be important in creating employment opportunities in the British territories in the Caribbean and reducing the pressure for immigration to Canada and elsewhere.

(e) Aid from Canada and other Commonwealth countries could be a factor in encouraging these territories to remain in the Commonwealth as they gain independence.

These considerations are no less relevant today. Indeed, the march of events in the Caribbean in the past year increases the importance of a continuing Canadian aid programme in that region.

Accordingly, I recommend that for 1963-64, Canadian aid to the Commonwealth countries and territories of the Caribbean area be maintained at the same level as Canadian aid to the area has averaged in recent years. Specifically this would mean that funds, additional to those which Canada has already committed under the five-year programme of assistance to the West Indies, be sought for the Caribbean area in the amount of $2.1 million.<sup>63</sup>

Dear Mr. Moran:

Thank you for sending me a copy of your memorandum dated November 2, 1962† recording your discussions with Mr. Tannis of the St. Vincent Government.

As you know, Canadian aid to the British Territories in the Caribbean over the past five years was conceived to a considerable extent in terms of encouraging and cementing an independent West Indies Federation. Aid was concentrated on Jamaica, Trinidad and the Little Eight and in so far as possible in a form most likely to help cement the Federation (e.g., the provision of inter-island ships). Those territories outside the proposed federation (British Guiana and British Honduras) received only small amounts of technical assistance. An independent West Indies Federation has failed to materialize, leaving in the area Jamaica, Trinidad and British Guiana as individual independent or about-to-be independent countries, and eight small islands and British Honduras which will continue as individual British colonies.

It has occurred to us that our future policy on aid to the area should continue in a manner most likely to help induce a desire in the area to work together. I have in mind in the first instance the smaller islands, and tend to conclude for the reasons outlined below that future capital aid to the area should exclude the smaller islands and be concentrated on the newly, or about-to-be, independent countries (Jamaica, Trinidad and British Guiana):

(a) Some form of federation of the smaller islands remains an objective of the British Government. This will be a difficult task and it is possible that bits and pieces of Canadian aid scattered throughout these islands might be more of a disturbing influence than good. Indications from us that we would have difficulties in dealing with each island individually might in fact serve to promote the concept of federation of the Little Eight, or at least the need to organize for the purpose of dealing externally as a group. This kind of an approach now would help, should we eventually come to organizing a Commonwealth or some other overall general approach to aid in the Caribbean area, [to] pave the way for dealing with the smaller islands as a group.

(b) We are not really equipped financially or otherwise to search out and administer effective capital assistance to so many individual territories. We would presumably have to rely to a large extent on the British in whatever we do, and in any event have to clear most everything in advance with them. As you well know, some of our policies (e.g., reluctance to pay local costs) have already raised problems with the British.

We could, of course, continue to extend technical assistance to the small islands and British Honduras, along with the technical assistance we currently extend to Commonwealth countries and territories not covered by our capital aid programs.

It may, of course, prove that something can eventually be salvaged from the broader concept of the Federation. There has been talk of a possible federation of the Little Eight and Trinidad, and central machinery may some day be developed to bring about closer cooperation (even a Confederation) between Jamaica, Trinidad and the Little Eight. Over the long term, External Aid generally might be provided to the area in ways which further these objectives, for example, if the Commonwealth were eventually to sponsor coordinated aid to the area, it could be stipulated that countries and territories in the area establish central machinery, perhaps on the foundation of the existing Commission on Common Services, to deal with and coordinate aid flows at the recipient end. In the meantime, you might like to consider the policy suggested above in respect of the smaller islands.

Yours sincerely,

A.F.W. PLUMPTRE

au sous-ministre adjoint du ministère des Finances*

Director General, External Aid Office, to Assistant Deputy Minister, Department of Finance

Ottawa, November 29, 1962

Dear Mr. Plumptre:

I am writing to acknowledge receipt of your letter of November 23, which has just arrived, and to record my general agreement with the views you have expressed on future Canadian assistance to the Caribbean area. As a result of the survey carried out by the Interim Aid Mission more than a year ago, certain projects in the smaller islands were approved for Canadian financing by both the External Aid Board and by Cabinet. When it later developed that neither the Americans nor the British intended to proceed in the smaller islands with projects which had arisen directly from the visit of the Interim Mission, it was decided by the Board, you will recall, that there would nevertheless be advantages for Canada if we did carry through to conclusion some of the projects which we had inspected. These consisted of warehouses, schools, and fresh water systems. Some of these are now under way.

As for the future, I was pleased to learn of your conclusion that Canadian aid should be concentrated in the "new, or about-to-be, independent territories." It will probably be desirable for political reasons to have some Canadian aid activity in the eight little islands, which I understand will be called the West Indies Federation, but we can perhaps confine our participation to technical assistance. For the reasons you have given, capital aid would create complications and administrative entanglements which we in this Office would certainly wish to avoid.

For one thing, it is clear that any capital projects in the "Little Eight" will be subjected to close scrutiny and perhaps even a measure of control by the British. You may have had an opportunity to read my memorandum of June 26† reporting my discussion in London concerning economic assistance to the West Indies area. On that occasion I was informed that in the case of the eight smaller islands we should deal direct with the Colonial Office on all financial questions, including the payment of local costs. This channel would probably have to be followed, I was told, even when a central government for the West Indies Federation came into being. It was made clear that the British Treasury would be the authoritative voice on questions of finance, but the Colonial Office would be our point of contact, and that office would in turn deal with the Treasury. It is unnecessary for me to refer to the delays which would inevitably result.

A further consideration is that the British, as they made clear in a note delivered through Earncliffe last year, are critical of our policy which requires local costs to be met by the receiving government. It is almost certain that London would insist on Canada meeting both foreign exchange and local costs on any project we might undertake. Such a departure from policy on behalf of the eight smaller islands might conceivably force us to a similar concession in Trinidad, Jamaica and the other independent units, leading to undesirable consequences.

An example of the experience which might become a regular occurrence in our assistance programme in the West Indies Federation is the recent submission to the British of a typical project agreement which is entered into with the receiving countries. This standard agreement in its present form has the approval of all interested Canadian Government departments, including the Department of Justice. It has similarly been accepted by all of the Asian and African countries. The British have come back with a series of comments and some requests for amendment. They have also suggested that such documents might be registered at the United Nations as an international agreement. As you know, these memoranda of understanding are in no sense formal treaties, but are intended simply to reduce to writing the understandings we have reached about the respective responsibilities of the two participating countries. Also, this suggestion of the British might well be regarded as a form of gratuitous advice.

This experience also illustrates the period of delay we would probably have to anticipate. It was October 4 that we sent our draft to Canada House, the normal channel of communication to the Colonial Office and the Department of Technical Cooperation, but it was not until November 26 that we received the British reply.

I should think we may wish to continue assistance to British Honduras on a reasonable scale, in part because Mr. Price and some of his colleagues have made such a favourable impression on Canadian authorities during visits to Ottawa, but also because we have carried out a fairly successful project in establishing a Department of Survey in that country and there is an enthusiastic awareness of Canadian assistance in British Honduras. During the past two years we seem to have developed a direct link with the administration in British Honduras, due in large measure to the personal contacts with Mr. Price, and it may be that we will be able to work out a special arrangement which would permit direct bilateral dealings rather than through the circuitous route of Ottawa to Canada House, to the Colonial Office, to British Honduras. Also, if the plans for double accreditation of Canadian diplomatic representation in the Caribbean area are carried out, the visits to British Honduras of Canadian representatives will probably be more frequent and more effective than in the past.

In any event, future Canadian assistance to the Caribbean area is a subject we will wish to discuss in the External Aid Board as soon as Cabinet has taken some action on the memorandum which is now before it. In the meantime, I wanted you to know that I am in accord with your views that our aid to the "Little Eight" should be primarily in the form of technical assistance and that our capital aid should be concentrated in the independent territories, where direct negotiation is possible and a speedier and more effective programme is probable.

Yours sincerely,

H.O. MORAN

COLOMBO PLAN ALLOCATIONS;
 1962-63 PROGRAMME

30. The Secretary of State for External Affairs said that the allocations for the Colombo Plan 1962-63 programme reflected Cabinet's earlier decision to reduce by $8.5 million the amount

Parliament would be asked to appropriate for this purpose.<sup>64</sup> The result was to reduce the total amount to $41.5 million, of which $4 million would be for wheat and flour. In arriving at the proposed allocations, several important factors had been kept in mind, such as the desirability to keep flour shipments as undisturbed as possible and to have at least two non-Commonwealth countries assume part of the reduction. The fact that Canada had committed itself to maintain aid to Pakistan and India at the levels recorded in the World Bank Consortia was also remembered. Other considerations were the present emphasis on technical assistance and pressure of needs in the various recipient countries.

An explanatory memorandum had been circulated (Minister's memorandum, Nov. 1 – Cab. Doc. 361-62†).

31. The Minister of Agriculture said he was prepared to support the reduction in these expenditures falling on wheat transfers, but there would be a blast at the government over it.

32. The Cabinet agreed,

(a) that the funds Parliament had been asked to vote for the Colombo Plan in 1962-63 be allocated as follows:

India	$19.5 million	($1.5 wheat)
Pakistan	12.1	(.75 wheat)
Ceylon	2.0	(1.0 flour)
Malaya	2.0	----
Burma	.325	(all wheat)
Indonesia	.325	(all flour)
Vietnam	.1	(all flour)
Technical assistance	2.0
Indus Fund	3.0
Contingency	.15

(b) that officials be authorized to discuss with the authorities concerned the programmes to be carried out under these allocations, including the provision of Canadian commodities, equipment and services for economic development in the Colombo Plan area.

...

Following are key paragraphs my statement Colombo Plan Meeting November 14 begins.

2. Members of Consultative Committee will be aware that Canada has this year been experiencing certain short term financial problems having implications from both budgetary and balance of payments standpoint. I will not repeat not take your time this morning to repeat outline which has been given in other international forums of comprehensive program which Canadian Government introduced in June this year to meet these current economic problems.<sup>65</sup> After careful scrutiny of all forms of government spending measures were undertaken to reduce in current fiscal year expenditures in every area of government activity both domestic and external in order to reduce Canada's prospective heavy budget deficit and relieve pressures on balance of payments position. Decreases in government expenditures are reflected in new estimates tabled last month in House of Commons. Under these estimates Canadian Parliament is being asked to vote $41.5 million for participation in Colombo Plan for current fiscal year. While this is less than amount which has been voted annually in recent years appropriation will be administratively handled in such a way that there will be no repeat no effect on capital projects program and no repeat no reduction in flow of industrial equipment and raw materials including base metals.

3. Finally I can report there is wide measure of support in Canada for Colombo Plan and its objectives. Canadians who have observed the accomplishments under it are satisfied that through Colombo Plan invaluable contribution is being made to economic progress and human welfare in one of most important regions of world. At this time when we have before us review of another year's progress in cooperative economic development in South and Southeast Asia I should like to take opportunity to assure other members of Consultative Committee that my country will continue as it has done since 1950 to support this program to full extent of Canadian capabilities.

INTRODUCTION

The 14th Annual Meeting of the Consultative Committee of the Colombo Plan was held in Melbourne, Australia. As usual, the Ministerial Meeting, which was held from November 12th to 16th, was preceded by a meeting of Officials, who met from October 30th to November 9th. Both the Officials' and the Ministerial Meeting followed much the same pattern as they have in other recent years. The Officials drew up an Annual Report reviewing progress in economic development in the Colombo Plan area in the past year and the Ministers approved this Report. The only really new development which took place at this Meeting was the decision to admit the Republic of South Korea and the Kingdom of Bhutan to full membership in the Colombo Plan.

The text of the Communiqué issued at the end of the Melbourne Meeting is attached to this report as Appendix A. It includes most of Chapters I and II of the Annual Report, entitled respectively: "Review of Economic Progress" and "The Task Ahead."<sup>66</sup>

PART I

OFFICIALS MEETING

The Canadian Delegation to the Officials' Meeting was headed by Mr. C.E. McGaughey, Canadian High Commissioner to Malaya and included Mr. A.S. McGill and Mr. J.D. Miller of the External Aid Office and Mr. L.P. Tardif, Third Secretary of the Canadian High Commissioner's Office in Canberra. This was a smaller delegation than Canada has sent to the Colombo Plan meetings in recent years and therefore Canada was a less active participant in the various committees in which most of the work of the Officials' Meeting was carried out. However, Canada was represented on the Drafting Committee, the Sub-Committee on Technical Assistance, on three Country Working Groups and on the Business Committee, which consists of the heads of all delegations. The activities of these committees are described below, along with a summary of the work of the Information Sub-Committee and the Sub-Committee on the Special Topic, on both of which members of the Canadian Delegation sat as observers to the extent that other committee work permitted. The various committee reports referred to in the following paragraphs are available in the External Aid Office but are too bulky to attach to this report.

Drafting Committee

This year the Drafting Committee worked with more despatch and perception than last year. Credit for the improvement must in large part attach to its British chairman, Mr. L.B. Walsh Atkins of the Commonwealth Relations Office, who, although not an economist by training, was experienced in conference work and had served in the Colombo Plan area. He had an extraordinary capacity to prevent, without bruising feelings, discussions from leading nowhere and to compromise differences through facile phrases.

The Australian contribution was also important but more behind the scenes than in Committee. It consisted largely of drafts prepared competently and speedily by members of its delegation. Since Australia was the host country, its officer resources far exceeded those of any other delegation.

There was a notable change of outlook and a strengthening of participation on the part of the United States Delegation. Last year, for example, it was headed by a good-natured State Department official and seemed happy to have semi-observer status. This year the United States official leader was Dr. Byron L. Johnson, a trained and experienced economist, who led his team to a leading role not only in the Drafting Committee but in all those other areas of the Conference which dealt with matters of substance. The Delegation emphasized the importance the United States attached to the Colombo Plan as a banner under which to participate in aid programmes within the region of the Plan.

Mention must also be made of the Indian Delegation, which was staffed by competent officers with a thorough knowledge of those subjects of particular concern to the Conference. Throughout the drafting proceedings the Indians usefully played the role of bridge builders and thereby contributed considerably to the harmony of the proceedings. The Pakistan Delegation did not have comparable strength in numbers, although its leader also made a positive contribution to the Committee proceedings.

While the Canadian Delegation played an active part in the drafting operation, it not unnaturally concentrated on those subjects of particular concern to Canada. Thus it was instrumental in strengthening the reference in Chapter I to grants as an important element of aid programmes, and it was also influential in having the recipient countries except for the Report, an assessment of the pros and cons relating to tied aid programmes considerably more balanced than the one they originally proposed.

Sub-Committee on Technical Co-operation

The Sub-Committee on Technical Co-operation had a total of 11 members, including Canada, and was chaired by Mr. Mohamad Sopiee from the Federation of Malaya. Mr. A.S. McGill was the Canadian Representative. As usual, the Sub-Committee had two major tasks: preparing a draft chapter on technical co-operation for the Annual Report and reviewing technical co-operation under the Colombo Plan in general, on the basis of the Annual Report of the Council for Technical Co-operation. In addition, the Sub-Committee had this year to consider the results of the recommendation made at the Thirteenth Meeting of the Consultative Committee concerning surveys of technical assistance needs. To accomplish these tasks the Sub-Committee divided into three Working Groups.

Since Canada had done the work of drafting the chapter on Technical Co-operation for the Annual Report in each of the two past years, the Canadian Representative excused himself from this Working Group and the job was given to the Indian representative, with the assistance of the representative of New Zealand. The usual unexceptionable paragraphs were prepared and there was no particular difficulty in this Working Group.

Canada participated in the second Working Group, chaired by the U.K. Representative, which prepared a review of technical assistance based on the report of the Council. The only point in this review which seemed to cause any particular concern was a reference to co-ordination among donor countries and co-operation with other aid-giving agencies. The first draft of the relevant paragraph was objected to by the Indian Representative on the ground that it implied that donor governments and agencies should club together apart from the recipient governments. He was assured that no such suggestion was intended and the offending paragraph was re-worded to make it clear that the Sub-Committee was simply endorsing the idea of consultation among recipient governments, representatives of donor countries and multilateral aid-giving agencies, preferably in the capitals of developing countries.

The third Working Group of the Sub-Committee on Technical Co-operation was entrusted with preparing some comments on the results of the surveys of technical assistance needs recommended by the 1961 Consultative Committee meeting in Kuala Lumpur. Fortunately, it emerged in the course of discussion that the countries which had previously urged a regional survey of technical assistance needs, mainly Malaya, Thailand and the Philippines, were coming to realize that their idea presented serious difficulties and was not likely to gain general acceptance. In the intervening year all countries in the area had been invited to submit reports on their individual technical assistance needs to the Colombo Plan Bureau, but in fact only two had responded – India and Pakistan. The problem before the Working Group therefore resolved itself into a face-saving exercise for those countries which had been advocating a survey of the whole region. The formula eventually worked out was to invite member countries to append to the “country chapter” which they present for the 1963 Colombo Plan Meeting, a survey of their individual technical assistance requirements, based on the Indian model already circulated. It will then be for the Consultative Committee to decide at its Fifteenth Meeting whether the individual reports can be grouped together in some way to form a special section in the next Annual Report. In fact, the likeliest outcome is that few, if any, of the other countries will be able to produce a survey on anything like the detailed scale of the Indian effort and the whole scheme is likely to peter out.

The Australian Delegation apparently felt it incumbent upon itself as host government to stimulate new thinking about technical co-operation at this meeting, and it chose the subject of training within the region on which to take its initiative. At the 1961 meeting in Kuala Lumpur a quite useful discussion of training facilities within the region had taken place on the basis of the survey and report by Mr. H.R. Mills. The Australians circulated a paper at Melbourne suggesting that, as a follow-up to the Mills Report, a number of steps might be taken to promote intra-regional training. These steps included making use of the Colombo Plan Bureau as a clearing house for the placement of trainees within the region, the establishment of a new programme of grants for training within the region, and the appointment of “field representatives” operating under the Bureau. Finally, the Australians suggested that a standing committee be appointed to look into these matters and to report to the Fifteenth Session of the Consultative Committee.

The Australian proposals, which were not circulated until the Conference was in full session, raised some quite fundamental questions for member governments. The British Delegation, in particular, was disturbed by the abrupt way in which these radical suggestions were put forward. It also appeared that some of the Asian countries were not particularly receptive. The Canadian Delegation sympathized with the Australian objective of stirring up interest in training within the region, which might well lapse into inactivity once the effect of the Mills Report had worn off. However, the Canadian Representative pointed out to the Australians that such things as a new programme of grants and an enlarged and active role for the Colombo Plan Bureau would require careful consideration by the Canadian Government. In addition, the Canadians pointed out that the Colombo Plan Council was established for the purpose of reviewing and guiding the technical co-operation aspect of the Colombo Plan and this was surely an appropriate topic for the Council to discuss.

The Australians realized that their ideas were not going to get very serious consideration at this meeting of the Consultative Committee, and they acquiesced in the Canadian suggestion that the whole question might be referred to the Council in Colombo. The report of the Sub-Committee on Technical Co-operation contains an explicit recommendation to the Council for an early discussion of the recommendation of the Mills Report on increased training within the region at the technician level.

Sub-Committee on Information

There was no Canadian representative this year on the Sub-Committee on Information. However, Mr. Tardif attended some of its meetings as an observer. The Sub-Committee was chaired, rather ineffectually, by U Hpe Aung of Burma.

The "Report on Colombo Plan information activities in 1961-62 and Programme for 1962-63," and certain "new proposals" prepared by the former Information Officer of the Colombo Plan Bureau formed the substance of the Sub-Committee's discussions. In brief, apart from taking note of and approving the report, the Sub-Committee discussed three main topics: the possibility of holding a conference of national Information Officers in Tokyo in May 1963; a proposal to invite a team of well-known journalists from recipient and donor countries to tour the Colombo Plan region; and the advisability of including the report of the Sub-Committee on Information in the Colombo Plan Annual Report.

The first subject arose from the recommendation of the Tokyo Meeting in 1960 that future delegations to the Consultative Committee should as far as possible include a specialist in information matters, and to the failure of most countries to implement it. The proposal for an Information Officers' Conference in Tokyo in 1963 obtained limited support, although it was especially advocated by Mr. Jose, the new Information Officer of the Colombo Plan Bureau. The United States and the United Kingdom indicated that they did not object to the proposal in principle but, should it be adopted, it would be most likely that their Information Officers stationed in Tokyo would be sent as representatives. The proposal would present a greater problem to the smaller countries, who would most probably not have qualified Information Officers on their staff in Tokyo and who would be faced with the cost of sending Information Officers directly from home.

The discussion of this matter dragged on for some time. In view of the weak support the proposal had and the problems it raised, alternatives were successively proposed and finally it was agreed that the Sub-Committee would recommend that a conference of national Information Officers should be held either (a) in May next year; or (b) immediately before; or (c) in conjunction with the next Consultative Committee Conference. The Business Committee considered the report of the Information Sub-Committee and recommended that next year every member country should include an Information Officer in its delegation and that the Sub-Committee on Information should be made a committee of the whole, thus combining the work of the regular Sub-Committee with the role of a conference of information officers. It is understood that in fact most countries will at best have an officer from one of their missions in the Colombo Plan area who is familiar with information work cover this committee. This was approved by the Consultative Committee.

The second proposal relating to the "invitation to a team of well-known journalists to tour the Colombo Plan area," drew a great deal of discussion. One delegate felt that it would be somewhat presumptuous to initiate this practice with invitations to "teams" of journalists. Another delegate from a donor country said he assumed that the expenses involved would be paid by the host country, as had always been the practice in his country. These and similar remarks had the effect of cooling enthusiasm for the proposal. The Sub-Committee finally agreed simply to recommend that member countries should encourage and facilitate information media representatives visiting their countries to observe and give favourable coverage to Colombo Plan activities.

The conviction of the new Information Officer that the success of the Colombo Plan depends to a great extent on the publicity which is given to it, led him to propose that the report of the Sub-Committee on Information should be included in the Annual Report. This suggestion did not obtain much support. It was felt that, important as Colombo Plan publicity may be, it was not appropriate to include in the same report the achievements of the Colombo Plan in fostering economic development and the activities of the Information Bureau. The Sub-Committee, however, agreed that the importance of Colombo Plan publicity should be recognized and recommended that a special paragraph on this subject should be submitted to the Drafting Committee for insertion in chapter 2 of the Annual Report. This was done.

Sub-Committee on the Special Topic

For the past three years a special topic relating to economic development has been selected for discussion at the annual Colombo Plan meeting. This year a Sub-Committee under the chairmanship of Dr. Byron L. Johnson, leader of the U.S. Delegation, and including representatives from eleven other countries, was appointed to study and submit a report to the Consultative Committee on the special topic: "Techniques and Institutions for the Mobilization of Domestic Savings for Economic Development." Canada was not a member of the Sub-Committee but endeavoured to have an observer present at its sessions.

At the first meeting of the Sub-Committee, convened immediately following the opening plenary session on October 30, members had obviously not had an opportunity to familiarize themselves with the papers which had been submitted by nearly every member country or the summary paper prepared by the Australian Secretariat. The Chairman, before adjourning the meeting, requested all members to come to the next meeting prepared to recommend the form that the final report should take. He suggested as alternatives:

- (a) a report which would highlight specific country problems and propose solutions; or
- (b) a general report which would be confined to financial measures successfully adopted by various member countries and therefore worthy of consideration by other countries.

The Chairman also suggested that members of the Sub-Committee should give some thought to topics that might be submitted for special consideration at the next Colombo Plan Consultative Meeting.

At the second meeting it was agreed that the Sub-Committee report should be of a general nature and that the committee should not endeavour to review the problems and suggest corrective measures for each country. A working group under the leadership of Mr. S.S. Marathe of the Indian Delegation, drafted a report on the special topic which seeks to highlight the main problems and questions in the field of mobilization of savings but does not attempt to provide answers.

The Sub-Committee also had the responsibility of recommending a special topic for the 1963 meeting and suggested the following, in order of preference:

- (1) Man-power planning for economic development
- (2) Practical techniques for improving agricultural productivity
- (3) Administration for development
- (4) Government policies for the stimulation of domestic private investment and attraction of foreign private investment
- (5) The balance of direct and financial control.

The Business Committee decided with no apparent disagreement to recommend the first topic: "Man-power Planning for Economic Development" for discussion at the 1963 Consultative Committee Meeting. Members will be expected to submit a paper on this topic in advance of next year's meeting.

There was considerable discussion in the Business Committee about possible publication of the papers submitted on the special topic and of the Sub-Committee's report. Proposals ranged from issuing a special publication, through including a special chapter in the Annual Report to merely mentioning the subject briefly at appropriate places in the Annual Report. The U.S. Delegation appeared to favour wider publication but some Asian countries were not so keen, on the grounds that they had not written their papers with a view to publication. In the end it was agreed that suitable references to the topic in the introductory chapters of the Annual Report would be sufficient.

1963 Meeting

It will be noted from the Communiqué that the 1963 Meeting will be held in Bangkok at a date to be notified by the Thai Government but which will be approximately the same as in 1962. The Australian Government succeeded in reducing the number of working days occupied by the Officials' Meeting this year and on the basis of their experience the Business Committee has recommended that next year's Officials' Meeting should be convened on a Thursday and should be completed by the Friday or Saturday of the following week. If the Ministerial Meeting met from the Monday to Thursday following, the whole Colombo Plan Meeting would be completed in two weeks and one day, compared with the three weeks which has been the rule in recent years. It remains to be seen, of course, whether Thailand can provide the secretarial and other services required to follow this shorter time-table.

The composition of the Country Chapter Working Groups was reviewed at this year's meeting and as a result Canada will next year be a member of the Working Groups on Burma and Laos and will be required to provide the Chairman of the Working Group on India. Member governments have been asked to send copies of their draft chapters of the annual report to the members of the Working Group responsible for their chapter at least a month in advance of the next Colombo Plan Meeting.

PART II MINISTERIAL MEETING

The general discussion in the Colombo Plan Consultative Committee is ostensibly directed to the Annual Report which has been drafted by the officials but, as usual, at this year's meeting the Ministerial representatives ranged widely in their statements and commented on whatever subjects they felt to be of most immediate concern to their country in the whole field of trade and aid. What very evidently concerned most of the representatives of countries in the Colombo Plan area at this meeting was trade problems: in particular the need for stable and fair prices for primary products and of easier access for the exports of developing countries to markets in the highly developed countries.

There was ample evidence in the draft report that trade imbalance is something that is indeed of concern to all members of the Colombo Plan. The report notes, for example, that only four countries in the area succeeded in improving their trade balance in 1961 and there is a pattern of deteriorating balance of payments situations almost throughout the region. In general, the review of economic and financial development in the Colombo Plan area in 1961-62 does not present a very encouraging picture although there are a number of instances which can be cited of increasing agricultural, mineral and industrial production.

The Prime Minister of Australia, Mr. Menzies, made a vigorous and forthright opening address to the delegates, in which he referred to the problem which was obviously uppermost in the minds of most of his listeners – that the less-developed countries must be able to earn what they need by the export of their goods to the rest of the world.

The U.S. representative, Mr. Frank Coffin, Deputy Administrator of A.I.D., gave a thoughtful address in which he discussed what he called the "counter revolution" of effective response to the needs and aspirations of the less-developed countries. He discussed world-wide efforts to meet the needs of developing countries, mentioning the U.N., DAC, the Alliance for Progress and various other aid activities of the United States, as well as the Colombo Plan. Mr. Coffin's speech was well delivered, although what he had to say might have read better as an article in some quarterly such as Foreign Affairs.

A point of interest was Mr. Coffin's mention of the United States intention in future to attribute its aid programmes in South and South East Asia as "Colombo Plan assistance." This is evidently part of a deliberate U.S. policy to take a more active part in the Colombo Plan.

Although the U.S. has been officially a member of the Colombo Plan for some years it has conducted its bilateral aid programmes in the area without much recognition of the existence of the Colombo Plan. The U.S. has now apparently concluded that the Colombo Plan should receive considerably more attention as a regional aid organization.

The British Delegate, Mr. Vosper, Minister of Technical Cooperation, made a rather routine speech. He found it necessary to defend the U.K.'s efforts to enter the Common Market. The fears of the less-developed members of the Colombo Plan about the consequences of this move had been expressed earlier in the meeting, particularly by India and Pakistan, and were reflected to some extent in the opening chapters of the Annual Report. Mr. Vosper contended that the Common Market, especially with U.K. participation, would provide an expanding market for the exports of developing countries.

In their statements, the delegates from countries within the region described their particular economic problems and their efforts to solve them. India made only a passing reference to her difficulty with China. The Indonesian representative assured the other members of the Consultative Committee that now that the West Iran question was on the way to solution, Indonesia could concentrate more effort on her economic development problems. The representative of South Vietnam spoke of the difficulty its Government faced in putting down Communist rebellion, and he was the only country to speak of Communism. As mentioned above, there was much emphasis in almost every statement on the need to ensure stable prices and markets for primary commodities and the necessity of removing barriers imposed by industrialized countries to the export of the products of less-developed countries.

The statement made by the Canadian representative, Mr. H.O. Moran, is attached as Appendix B.<sup>67</sup> It contained a brief reference to the reduction in this year's Canadian Colombo Plan appropriation and an effort was made to reassure the recipient countries that this reduction would not have any serious effect on continuing Canadian projects and programmes. There was no direct public comment in the course of the Meeting on the Canadian decision, but there were private expressions of concern that Canada, which had been one of the leaders in Colombo Plan aid, had found it necessary to reduce its contribution at this time.

There was a short discussion about the special topic "Mobilization of Domestic Savings," but most delegates were really only repeating in brief form what they had said in papers that had been circulated. There was a similar short discussion on technical assistance, in which the U.S. representative commended the Australian proposals on intra-regional training which had been put before the Sub-Committee on Technical Cooperation. The Australian Delegate indicated that these proposals would be actively pursued in the meetings of the Colombo Plan Council in Colombo.

The Consultative Committee decided to welcome South Korea as a member of the Colombo Plan and also the Kingdom of Bhutan, both of which had observers present. Bhutan sent as its representatives two charming ladies, who are apparently the wife and sister, respectively, of the Prime Minister. The South Koreans were very assiduous in lobbying amongst the delegates for support of their entry, and while they were not sure of Indonesian and Ceylonese assent until the last moment, these two countries evidently decided that they would not wish to be conspicuous by withholding agreement. The Malayan Representative at the final meeting of the Business Committee, when Korean membership was discussed, asked to have it noted on the record that the decision to admit South Korea had been taken without any discussion of the geographical limits of the Colombo Plan.

RELATIONS BETWEEN BRITAIN AND THE UNITED STATES

It seems to me that any attempt to assess the present state of Anglo-American relations should begin by examining the effect on the U.S. administration of the recent crisis over Cuba. If my judgment is correct, the result of President Kennedy's handling of the Cuban crisis has been:

(a) to increase very greatly the self-confidence of himself and of other key members of his administration (e.g. Rusk, McNamara and Bobby Kennedy);

(b) to convince the Kennedy team that they were able to act effectively without any help from their Western allies. In particular it seems to me that a result of the past two months has been to dispel any lingering notion in the minds of Kennedy and his team that Britain could and should play some "special role" as adviser to the United States in regard to Western relations with the Soviet Union.

2. I am sure that the feeling now uppermost in the consciousness of Kennedy and his advisers is that they handled the Cuba crisis without any assistance from their Allies; and that they handled it successfully. Their frame of mind must obviously be very different from what it was a year ago. When the Kennedy administration took office its members were apparently very conscious of their inexperience in foreign affairs. The Bay of Pigs fiasco certainly did nothing to improve their self-confidence; nor did the meeting between Kennedy and Khrushchev later in 1961. A year ago, therefore, they were looking for diplomatic aid and comfort from their more experienced friends and, in particular, the British. The situation prevailing today is altogether different.

3. I get the impression that Kennedy's people are predominantly cool, intelligent and tough. Some observers have commented on the Boston antecedents of Kennedy and many of his advisers in an effort to establish that they are anti-British. I think this is a mistake. On the other hand, the opposite is not true. Very few of these relatively young men appear to have such cultural or emotional attachments to Britain as seem to be present in older men such as Adlai Stevenson. The most characteristic quality of Kennedy and his men seems to be a cold determination to make an accurate judgment of the present division of power in the world. While they may have felt some temporary dependence on British experience during the early days of the administration I don't think they ever really accepted the viewpoint of Macmillan and other British statesmen to the effect that Britain had a "special role" to play in regard to relations between the Soviet Union and the West. And certainly, as mentioned above, I think the Cuba business nailed down the coffin lid on this. In this context it seems to me significant both that Acheson made his recent rather insulting speech about Britain's role being "played out,” and that Rusk reacted so blandly, and apparently unconcernedly, to press questions on Acheson’s speech.<sup>1</sup> Rusk made no real effort to salve injured British feelings at a time when his press interrogators clearly expected him to do so.

4. If the foregoing is true than it would seem to follow that Kennedy will be in no particular mood to make concessions to Macmillan when they meet later this month. Most observers seem to believe that the two principal subjects which will be discussed will be Anglo-American defence arrangements (particularly the decision as to whether or not the “Skybolt” project should be terminated), and the question of Britain’s entry into the Common Market. On the face of it there would not seem to be too much likelihood of Macmillan getting real satisfaction on either of these subjects. It appears that the Americans regard the Skybolt project as both expensive and inefficient. On the other hand, they are no doubt aware that to brusquely terminate this project would be very harmful to the Macmillan Government in terms of the internal political situation in Britain. As to the Common Market business it seems to me that many influential members of the U.S. administration consider that the United States has gone about as far as it can go in pressuring the European powers to ease the terms for Britain joining the Market. It should be remembered that most Americans have simply never liked our system of Commonwealth preferences and they are thus not particularly disposed to cushion the effects of abandoning this preferential system. The present administration is clearly aware of the problems facing Britain and the Commonwealth but, at least in Congressional circles, antipathy to the Commonwealth preference system remains very strong. There is also the fact that the success of Kennedy’s reciprocal trade programme depends heavily on cooperation from France and Germany. In view of this there are obviously limits to how far the American planners can go in asking these countries to make concessions to Britain, even though there is no doubt that the U.S. administration wants Britain to be a member of the Market.

5. The defence and Common Market questions will presumably be the main ones discussed between Kennedy and Macmillan, but there is one other series of problems, seldom mentioned in press speculation, which I think might be discussed. This is the anxiety felt by the British (and others) at the tendencies of the present United States administration to “export” its jurisdiction. In the past year the British have reacted to several examples of this tendency in very much the same fashion as has our own Government (which is even more directly concerned). Like us, the British have made sharp protests to the U.S. administration against some of the proposed taxation “disclosure” regulations of the Internal Revenue Department in regard to U.S. residents abroad and to foreign residents of the United States. Like us, the British Government has also filed briefs with the U.S. Supreme Court concerning the series of cases now being heard by the Court relating to the jurisdiction of the National Labour Relations Board in regard to foreign-registered ships plying to U.S. ports. There are no doubt other examples in the same field. I would not think it at all improbable that Macmillan might refer to some of these matters in his discussions with Kennedy.

6. In summary, my own opinion would be that, for the reasons given above, the U.S. administration will probably not be in any particular mood to make concessions to Britain. However, I am convinced that the Kennedy administration is aware of the fact that, if they act in a manner which leads to Macmillan's overthrow, they will almost certainly get a government in power in Britain which is much less sympathetic to U.S. economic and political objectives. For this reason I am sure Kennedy will try to do everything possible to avoid hurting Macmillan politically in England. However, Kennedy's and Macmillan's estimate as to what will hurt Macmillan may differ widely, and this difference may well be the hard core of their discussions.

DISCUSSIONS WITH PRESIDENT KENNEDY,
NASSAU, BAHAMAS – DECEMBER 21, 1962

(1) The Question of Trade with Cuba.

They have no objection at all to our trade in non-strategic materials, and no objections have been raised. He also stated that our Ambassador in Cuba has been particularly helpful, and the fact that our Embassy is open has provided services for the United States for which they were indebted to Canada.

(2) The Question of Trade with China in Wheat.

No objection had been made by the United States and I asked him directly whether there was any objection to this trade and the answer was in the negative. He was under the impression that as a result of our sales to China our wheat surpluses had been reduced to a point where there was in fact no surplus. I informed him that that was not so, that we had some 700 million bushels on hand at the present time, and that there had been a falling away in wheat marketing generally in the last few months. He was under the impression (and understandably so in view of the Minister of Agriculture's statement in the House) that the last sale announced was a new sale rather than one of the instalments of the original agreement.<sup>2</sup> He asked whether Australia was selling more wheat to China than we were.

(3) India and Pakistan.

There was some reference to India and Pakistan of a general nature and as I recall it the figures which I gave to the press of $120 million were not referred to. My recollection is that they came to me for the first time when talking to Prime Minister Macmillan at Government House at the afternoon discussions immediately after the President's departure for Miami.<sup>3</sup>

(4) Defence.

I informed the President when I first arrived that there were a number of matters I hoped we would have an opportunity to discuss soon in connection with the defence of North America and the provision of nuclear armed missiles for Canada. (I did not go into the question of storage in the United States or the joint training there of United States and Canadian squadrons, although on Saturday in talking with the Prime Minister, Lord Home, Lord Amory and the British civil servant it was brought out that something along this line was being planned for under the agreement now being considered by the two countries.) I informed them that the plan I had in mind would provide the Canadian Air Force with the necessary defensive weapons but would not thereby be extending the nuclear family of nations which I believed should be kept strictly under control.

During the course of the conversation at luncheon the President asked one of the scientific men [for] his explanation of the radio which the President found difficult to understand. He was informed that the waves separated going through the air. He asked whether they were also around us. He said he was now certain that he could never understand the radio with the knowledge that had been given him.

He spoke of the fact that a man would be on the moon in 1967, and that there would be two sections to the rocket to the moon and one portion would revolve around the moon and the other, occupied by an astronaut, would land on the moon and when necessary would be connected with the portion remaining in the air and the two portions would join together to come back. I suggested the cost would be $5 billion and he said $5 billion for five years.

ENDING NUCLEAR TESTING.
 NASSAU MEETING – DECEMBER 21 & 22, 1962

While the U.S.S.R., the United States and the United Kingdom were agreed that there was no need for inspection of explosi[on]s in the air and under the water, no agreement was possible even to this extent because the U.S.S.R. insisted that they would not enter into a partial agreement to this extent, and would sign no agreement until it included as well underground tests.

I asked about the black boxes and was informed by Lord Home that they can be tampered with, that an explosion a few feet away could upset the mechanism and give the impression that there had been a seismic explosion.

He believes that there is little hope of early agreement and believes that the Russians are about ready to start another series of tests.

NUCLEAR ARMS.
DISCUSSIONS WITH PRIME MINISTER MACMILLAN
NASSAU – DECEMBER 21 AND 22, 1962

Mr. Macmillan stated that possession of the Polaris would carry the British people forward for twenty years. To accept the Hound Dog would mean that the aircraft of 72 or 75 of the first-line bombers in Britain would have the Hound Dog attached to the bottom of the aircraft and there would only be a space of 2 feet between this missile and the ground and it would create a most dangerous hazard for the aircraft and crew.

Having submarines armed with Polaris with a range of 1000 miles makes it possible to have a moving launching-pad close enough to the U.S.S.R. for Britain to be able to say that any time she was threatened she could launch an offensive against the U.S.S.R. Indeed, the communiqué as to the control of the Polaris missiles<sup>4</sup> indicates that the British Government alone will decide their use. This will place the British in a strong position if at some time in the future Britain has to invade countries such as Kuwait or Brunei or elsewhere, and the Russians say if you do that you will bring war on yourself, the British will be in the position of being able to reply: "We are strong enough in our own right to smash you and will not be subject to such blackmail as would otherwise be the case."

THE COMMON MARKET.
NASSAU – DECEMBER 21 AND 22, 1962

Mr. Cadieux and Mr. Warren informed me that at the meeting in Paris the story had been leaked and appeared in the Western press that some alternative plan for free trade in industrial products would be submitted as an alternative.<sup>5</sup>

When I told Mr. Macmillan this he said all he knew about it was that some low level of government officials had so stated. (This conversation took place on Friday.)

On Saturday I informed him that in the meantime I had found out that it came from Cabinet Ministers. He said he believed this was so because only one ruled as king and no one can offer an opinion to him.

While General de Gaulle talked freely he gave no indication of relenting in his demand that the Treaty of Rome should not be diminished in any way even though failure to do so might prevent Britain's entry.

Mr. Macmillan told me that there has been no sign of any progress in recent weeks. There were meetings to be held on the 13th and 14th of January and the first few days in February. He did not intend to have the negotiations continue indefinitely. He is not going to have the negotiations protracted into a Council of Trent which took twenty years, and so far as he was concerned the target date was close enough so when I am in the United Kingdom for the Freedom of the City of London a firm determination one way or the other should be accepted at that time.

WEST GERMANY.

NASSAU MEETING – DECEMBER 21 & 22, 1962

Khrushchev having now established himself as the Man of Peace may not be expected to allow any troubles to arise in West Berlin for the time being.

De Gaulle's view was that he would not have been surprised if on the Tuesday following the President's declaration as to Cuba, Khrushchev had launched an attack on Berlin. Having not done so, however, would indicate that he realizes the might of the United States.

Besides the ICBMs and intercontinental ballistic missiles [sic], the United States has enough nuclear missiles for immediate use to equal 6,000 Hiroshimas, which would be launched within a few hours. If an attack was taken against the United States without notice there has been a further estimate made of those who would be killed in the first stage. It has now been reduced very considerably as to between 10 and 22 million in the first few hours.

Khrushchev knows this, and as the Russian people want peace he suddenly has become an exponent of peace, hence he makes public the speech that he made before the Supreme Soviet. Three pages of this appeared in the Ottawa Journal. The Russian Embassy paid $60,000 for publishing this last week.<sup>6</sup>

Now the plan appears [to be] to wait and sooner or later Germany will change its position with the giving up of power by Adenauer. The prize that will be offered for Germany's withdrawal from NATO would be the reunification of Germany. Mr. Macmillan believes that

NASSAU: CONVERSATION WITH LORD HOME

In the course of the dinner, at the Governor's Residence on Friday, December 21, I sat next to Lord Home and he gave me some impressions of his talks with the U.S. team.

2. On the multilateral agreement for a nuclear deterrent, Lord Home felt that it would be "stillborn." However, from the U.K. point of view the agreement is eminently satisfactory. "It provides what we want." I asked Lord Home whether he did not see direct implications for Canada. He thought that we might be involved in the operations of the NATO nuclear committee which, he expected, might play a more active role. It might be possible, through that Committee on which the Germans are represented, to disseminate information on nuclear matters and in particular to reach agreements on targeting for instance.<sup>7</sup>

3. Later on during the conversation, Lord Home said that it was vital for the U.K. to retain an independent nuclear deterrent if they were to continue to play a role of worldwide significance. The deterrent could become essential if, as in Kuwait or in Brunei, the U.K. were to intervene with conventional forces. At that time, the Soviet Union might threaten to use nuclear weapons against the U.K. Unless the U.K. had power to inflict substantial damage through their nuclear force, they might find themselves open to blackmail and compelled to give up any prospect of intervening anywhere in the world to protect their interests.

This is an old Br[itish] theme. [Ross Campbell?]

4. De Gaulle, having achieved a most favourable arrangement for French agriculture in the Common Market at the expense of the Germans very largely, is reluctant to allow any change, according to Lord Home. De Gaulle is now trying to calculate whether he can let the U.K. in without upsetting unduly this arrangement. If the answer is yes, the U.K. will be allowed to join. If the answer is negative, he will remain inflexible. For the U.K., Lord Home is persuaded that the best course is to join: when investors are faced with a choice between a 50 million market in the U.K. and one involving 150 million people in Europe, they are bound to choose the latter. I explained to Lord Home that in preparation for the meetings, I had read papers prepared by economists: I thought that from the point of view of Canada, the situation was grave. The interests at stake were very substantial and yet, on each point of interest to us, there was either no provision, or a mere promise, or an interim arrangement which would leave us nowhere by 1970.

5. Lord Home is not optimistic as to the prospects of a settlement of the Kashmir issue. He thought that two strong leaders like Ayub Khan and Nehru could have reached agreement on a sensible arrangement and used their great influence to sell it to their respective countries. Nehru was, however, it seemed, incapable or unprepared to entertain any idea of concessions.

6. The Congo situation was very serious. The U.K. had felt it necessary to warn the United States that if the matter were brought up in the Security Council and there was any suggestion that force would be used, the U.K. would have to veto it. Lord Home felt that if there were any way of conveying the message to Tshombe, he would urge him to settle now for a reasonable arrangement. This would enable the U.N. force to leave and later he would be able to work out a better arrangement.

7. Lord Home expressed keen interest in Canadian proposals relating to collateral measures: they felt that these were hopeful and that a determined effort should be made along such lines.

8. On Indonesia, Lord Home told me – you may have had confirmation of this by now from other sources – that he had just authorized a message to the U.K. Ambassador in Indonesia, instructing him to give a serious warning to Sukarno as to intervention in Brunei.

TALKS IN NASSAU
KENNEDY - MACMILLAN

Lord Amory called on the Under-Secretary today to give an account of some aspects of the USA/UK talks in Nassau and the subsequent Macmillan/Diefenbaker conversations.

Skybolt

President Kennedy clearly thought at the outset of the talks that the UK was determined to have Skybolts at any price and was evidently taken by surprise at the UK decision not to accept the USA offer to complete development and production on a 50/50 basis. The main reason underlying the UK decision was a UK fear that if the USA lacked confidence in Skybolt to the point where they were not going to equip their own forces with it, there would be no incentive for the USA to perfect the development of the weapon or to produce it within any reasonable time scale.

Because of the vulnerability of fixed missiles in a small area such as the UK, Mr. Macmillan made it clear that the UK were not interested in that type of missile as an alternative to Skybolt but would be interested in the Polaris. As Kennedy had not come prepared to discuss Polaris, he had to send to Washington for special advisers and it was this that led to the extension of the Nassau meeting (and to the deferment of Mr. Diefenbaker's arrival).

Mr. Macmillan told Lord Amory that he was satisfied with the arrangement the UK had been able to make with the USA over Polaris. The cancellation of Skybolt was not, in Mr. Macmillan's view, likely to be a major embarrassment to his Government since he could argue that Polaris did preserve the independent British nuclear deterrent, so passionately supported by the majority of the Conservative Party. The Labour and Liberal Parties were not likely to make a major issue of Skybolt. The Government could also argue that while the Polaris would cost more in the immediate future than Skybolt would have done, in the long run there would be a saving since Polaris was a weapon which would remain effective well into the 1970s. Skybolt's effective life had never been calculated beyond the mid-1960s.

Lord Amory said that the position France had taken with respect to the retention of an independent deterrent was having the effect of forcing the UK to do likewise, although he conceded that UK policy since 1957 may have exerted a similar influence on French policy.

USA – UK Relations

Lord Amory admitted that there was a basic UK anxiety about USA over-confidence following the Cuban success – an over-confidence which was displayed less by Kennedy himself than by some of his senior advisers. Kennedy was relaxed and not domineering during the talks and, as usual, got on well with Macmillan.

Lord Amory added that, following Nassau, UK Ministers had been frankly shocked by the Kennedy performance at Miami on the occasion of the return of the Bay of Pigs prisoners. The UK Government was perplexed by a gesture which might have incalculable repercussions and where the political losses surely seemed to outweigh any possible gains.<sup>8</sup>

MACMILLAN - DIEFENBAKER TALKS

Mr. Macmillan gave the Prime Minister a progress report on negotiations with the Six to date and frankly admitted that a difficult point in the negotiations had now been reached. The UK would try to bring the negotiations to a head in the very near future, but did not know what the outcome would be. Mr. Diefenbaker had not specifically raised the question of another collective conference of Commonwealth Prime Ministers before any UK decisions are taken but as he would be in London anyway on February 25 to be given "the Freedom of the City," there seemed to be general agreement amongst the three Ministers that this should be regarded as an opportunity to talk "Common Market." The UK Ministers, for their part, hoped that such Kennedy, 1962* (Washington: United States Government Printing Office, 1963), pp. 911-913; Tom Wicker, "Kennedy's Speech Stirs Cuba Exiles: 'War! War!' bilateral talks at Prime Minister level will be accepted by Canada as a fulfilment of the undertaking to consult further before a UK decision is taken.

Asked by the Under-Secretary whether UK/Six talks would be at an appropriate stage by late February, Lord Amory replied in the affirmative. The UK Ministers were pressing ahead as they were worried about the political effects of delay. Still, the Macmillan meeting with de Gaulle had not been reassuring. At one point de Gaulle seemed to be against British entry in principle, but subsequently modified his position to one of willingness to have the UK in on the basis of the terms of the Rome Treaty. This was not particularly reassuring since the French must be aware that the UK cannot accept the full Treaty and for this reason has been seeking special arrangements through negotiations. It was not possible to say how far de Gaulle would go in resisting UK entry, but it was clear that he would press at best for minimal derogation from the Rome Treaty. Mr. Macmillan was frankly gloomy about the prospect but still not prepared to examine any new alternative to Common Market entry. Even the question of an industrial free trade area had not been carried any further.

Lord Amory noted that Schroeder would be coming to London shortly with a big team of advisers but the purpose was probably to discuss NATO and the Nassau talks, not Common Market. Heath will take the opportunity however to urge Germany to be more robust in support of the UK position if the negotiations with the Six are to reach a successful conclusion.

On the whole the outlook was not promising for the UK. Many important questions remained unsolved – agriculture, old Commonwealth trade interests and certain industrial raw materials, and there was a long way to go before agreement among the Six could be expected. The UK for its part had made its final concessions and Europe must now move or UK entry was not on.

The domestic political reaction to the Common Market negotiations was worrying the UK Government. A middle group of Conservatives whose influence in the end would be decisive, had begun to shift their positions away from support of entry. The danger was that there might be a tendency for the Conservative Party to take a majority decision to do nothing at this time. It was up to Edward Heath to produce the miracle that would restore confidence in the Government's policy. Another worrying feature was the effect of the current uncertainty on the investment climate. Industry in Britain was understandably holding its hand until the big decision had been taken. There was also the difficult position of the EFTA countries. The UK were demanding satisfactory arrangements for their entry but the Six were adamant that the UK should make their decision first. In any event, EFTA negotiations could scarcely be completed before the end of 1963. Finally there was the unknown factor of French opposition, who were not hesitating to throw up all sorts of obstacles including that the Treaty required a year's notice for the admission of new members.

Despite the manifold obstacles UK Ministers are determined to have the matter settled one way or the other by the end of April and hope to be at a point where some judgment can be made by late February. The prospects for entry are however bleaker than before – about 50/50 where formerly 60/40 might have been a fair estimate.

Congo

Mr. Macmillan told the Prime Minister of his dislike of the use of force and tried to focus attention on the revenue-sharing proposals of Tshombe as the most promising avenue for a negotiated settlement. Mr. Diefenbaker agreed that force should not be used to seek a political solution and that no sanctions should be applied. Macmillan made it clear that the forceful prevention of the secession of a province simply to preserve the status quo was something that deeply worried the UK because of the possible precedent that might be set for similar action elsewhere.

Referring to the message of January 1 Lord Home had sent to Mr. Green, Lord Amory hoped that Canada would share the UK's concern about the use of force by the UN. In reply the Under-Secretary described the representations which Tremblay had made to U Thant yesterday on instructions from the Minister and the reassuring answer given by U Thant.<sup>9</sup> Lord Amory suggested that Mr. Green might wish to reply in due course to Lord Home along similar lines.<sup>10</sup>

BAHAMAS MEETINGS – DECEMBER 21-22, 1962

SPECIFIC POINTS DISCUSSED WITH PRESIDENT KENNEDY
LUNCHEON MEETING DECEMBER 21ST*(i) Trade with Mainland China – United States Foreign Assets Control – Oil Bunkers for Grain Ships*

The fact that the United States Treasury has written to Standard Oil of New Jersey, the parent company of Imperial Oil, concerning violation of regulations under the Trading with the Enemy Act, was not raised specifically with President Kennedy. However, the Prime Minister asked in a general way whether there was any objection to our trade with China. The President replied in the negative. Mr. Diefenbaker recalled the difficulties which had earlier arisen concerning bunkering in Canada of ships carrying grain to China and the fact that, following the conversation which had taken place at that time, the difficulties had been overcome. President Kennedy indicated that no consideration was being given to any change in the present arrangements. This assurance will be important should the State Department be unsuccessful in its efforts to head off the action which the United States Treasury is taking vis-à-vis Standard Oil of New Jersey.

President Kennedy was under the impression that Canadian supplies of wheat had been substantially reduced as result of the lower 60/61 crop and increased overseas sales. The Prime Minister advised him that the supply position had greatly improved as a result of the record 61/62 crops. Canada had some 700 million bushels available. The President also had the impression that the December sale to Mainland China of an additional 34 million bushels of wheat represented new business. The Prime Minister explained that this sale was within the existing long-term undertaking announced in 1961.

The President was interested in the financing of Chinese grain purchases and speculated that the sterling was being earned by sales of potash to the USSR which in turn was selling gold. In the course of this discussion, President Kennedy asked whether there was anything which Canada could do to assist in securing the release of American prisoners of war held by China. The Prime Minister undertook to consider the question, but made no commitment. He pointed out that the release of American prisoners of war was far removed from the normal discussions between Canada and the grain purchasing agencies of the Chinese Government. Thus, it was unlikely that the Chinese representatives would be the right people with whom to discuss the matter.

(ii) Trade with Cuba

The Prime Minister asked President Kennedy whether he had any objection to Canadian trade with Cuba. The President indicated that there was no U.S. objection to trade in the items Canada was selling to Cuba. He went on to mention specifically the very helpful role which had been played by the Canadian Embassy in Havana throughout the period of the Cuban crisis.

(iii) Appointment of U.S. Ambassador to Canada

There was a brief exchange between President Kennedy and the Prime Minister about the appointment of Mr. Butterworth. President Kennedy said that he had first known Mr. Butterworth when he was a member of the United States Embassy staff in London at the time his father was Ambassador. Mr. Butterworth had been highly regarded. The Prime Minister did not mention the unfavourable "big boss" impression which Mr. Butterworth had left with Mr. Green.<sup>13</sup>

CONVERSATIONS WITH PRIME MINISTER MACMILLAN
P.M. FRIDAY, DECEMBER 21, 1962

(i) U.K./U.S. Discussion on Nuclear Defence Systems and the Proposed Multilateral NATO Nuclear Force

Mr. Macmillan discussed with the Prime Minister the result of the talks on Skybolt and Polaris to which reference was made in the joint United States/British Communiqué and Statement on nuclear defence systems.

The Macmillan/Kennedy conversation took place against the background that with more effective missiles available the end of the era of the manned bomber was in sight. In the light of the implications for Britain of discontinuance of the Skybolt missile, a number of alternative possibilities were discussed. The first of these was the further development of Skybolt on a joint basis with both the United States and United Kingdom putting up 100 million dollars. If this course were followed, there would be no certainty of eventual success and the end situation might be no different from that at the present time. The technical difficulties were very great. Success in accurately directing a missile to a long distance target from an aircraft travelling at more than 500 miles per hour was extremely problematic. It was agreed that this alternative would not be pursued.

The second alternative offered by President Kennedy was to equip the British V-Bombers with the Hound Dog air to ground missiles now carried by United States bombers and which had a range of about 200 miles. With Hound Dog affixed to the bottom of the V-Bombers, there would, however, be only 2 feet ground clearance. Adaptation of the V-Bombers to Hound Dog would in any event be very expensive and would leave Britain in the out-dated manned bomber stage. This alternative was therefore also rejected.

After further discussion, agreement was reached to provide the Polaris missiles to the United Kingdom. Mr. Macmillan was very pleased with this outcome and, mainly for political reasons, appeared to the Prime Minister rather like the cat which had swallowed the canary. Mr. Macmillan referred to Polaris as one of the three nuclear horses in the defence stable. Polaris, being carried by submarines, had the advantage of not being tied to a fixed base. Since the submarines returned to port only once every three months, they would form less of a political target for the elements in the United Kingdom represented by Lord Russell. Prime Minister Macmillan indicated that the submarines to be constructed by the United Kingdom to accommodate Polaris would be adapted to U.K. requirements, would be smaller than those in use by the United States Navy and would not carry so many missiles. Some six years would probably be required to achieve a Polaris force: two years in submarine development and four years in construction.

Mr. Macmillan emphasized that in the final analysis control of the British Polaris Nuclear Submarine Force would remain in the hands of the British Government. Although there was an obligation to move towards development of a multilateral NATO Nuclear Force, the Agreement made it clear that the final decision would rest with the British Government when, in the words of the communiqué, "supreme national interests are at stake." Mr. Macmillan stressed that the United Kingdom was determined to go ahead regardless of the attitude of each or any of the other NATO partners.

Mr. Macmillan was also very pleased with the inclusion of the words "on a world-wide basis" in paragraph 10 of the Agreement, concerning the importance of increasing the effectiveness of conventional forces. The United Kingdom would be allowed to strengthen their forces anywhere in the world. They felt that there was an urgent need in the free world for elasticity in military arrangements. It was important to have ability to move conventional forces quickly from one place to another. During the last few years the United Kingdom had had to move such forces to Kuwait and more recently to Brunei. Adequate reserves must be strategically placed so as to be available quickly where they were needed. As a result of this Agreement, the United Kingdom anticipated that the pressure on them to increase their forces in Germany would be reduced.

In his press interviews, the Prime Minister was asked, on a number of occasions, to interpret the passages in the joint U.S./U.K. Defence statement concerning Polaris and development of a multilateral NATO Nuclear Force. The Prime Minister pointed out that what was involved was a bilateral agreement between the United States and Britain. Their intentions with respect to the development of a NATO Nuclear Force would be discussed with other NATO countries, but could not bind such countries. It would be for individual NATO countries, when consulted, to decide whether or not they wished to take part or make a contribution. So far as Canada was concerned, there could be no direct implication, since Canada had not been consulted. Any question of Canadian participation through the assignment of Canadian forces now in Europe to a multilateral NATO Nuclear Force would be a matter which would have to be the subject of policy consideration by the Canadian Government. What was clear was that, irrespective of the reaction of other NATO countries, including France, Britain and the United States would go ahead to implement the Agreement.

Asked about the relationship of the Macmillan/Kennedy Agreement to questions of North American Defence, the Prime Minister said that so far as nuclear weapons were concerned, Canada's general approach was to avoid extension of the "nuclear family." This was the stand which the Canadian Government would take so long as there was any hope of making progress in disarmament; in the event, however, that the disarmament conversations failed and the situation might require it, it would be the Government's intention to arm Canadian forces in the way most suitable for modern warfare.

In the December 22nd conversations with Mr. Macmillan, the Prime Minister confirmed his understanding of the purport of the U.S./U.K. Agreement as regards any implications for other NATO countries.

In the talks on nuclear weapons systems, Mr. Macmillan gathered the impression that Secretary of Defence McNamara was the strongest and most effective member of President Kennedy's group of advisers.

(ii) Common Market

Mr. Macmillan told the Prime Minister that he had been unable to detect any obvious change in General de Gaulle's attitude towards British membership in the E.E.C. The General repeated that he would welcome Britain as a member, but gave little or no indication that this meant any change in the terms of the Treaty of Rome. In fact, there was no indication of French willingness to make any concessions to facilitate a successful outcome to the negotiations.

Mr. Macmillan said that his Government was not prepared to allow the discussion endlessly to drag on – there could be no question of a Council of Trent. Accordingly, it was Britain's intention to press forward with the negotiations during January and February, so that in February a final determination of the position could be made. Mr. Macmillan thought that the odds on success were now less than 50/50. It was Britain's intention to press forward and should there be a breakdown to fix the blame in a clear and specific way. Matters would be brought to a head; France would not be permitted to continue a policy of delay.

Mr. Macmillan remained convinced of the important political reasons for Britain's joining, particularly in order to hold the Germans within the Western family. While Defence Minister Strauss had left the Adenauer Government, he was none the less a strong force in Germany. There was always the danger that Strauss and those elements in Germany which thought like him would pay the price of another pact with the U.S.S.R. to obtain German reunification.

As regards agriculture, Prime Minister Macmillan referred to the concern about policies of self-sufficiency in the European Economic Community. In this connection, he pointed out that in Britain agricultural production had increased by more than 80% over the last ten years. Yet imports had remained more or less at the same level due to the increase in the standard of living in the United Kingdom. It was important that the agricultural policy of the Common Market should allow for a reasonable level of imports.

Mr. Macmillan commented that even more so as a result of the recent referendum and election, de Gaulle was the complete master in France. He was not at all receptive to suggestions from within or without. Sometimes de Gaulle gave the impression of being in orbit to the moon.<sup>14</sup> Whereas no inferences were drawn as to after-effects of possible failure of Britain to obtain entry to the E.E.C., Mr. Macmillan made the point that, in the period ahead, great changes were coming in any event.

As regards further consultation with Britain concerning the Brussels negotiations, the Prime Minister told the press that the question of another Prime Ministers' Conference was not discussed in his meetings with Mr. Macmillan. He recalled, however, the position he had taken during the Commonwealth Prime Ministers' Meeting in London, concerning the arrangements to be made for future consultations as and when the lines of a settlement for particular commodities had been established.

Mr. Macmillan indicated to the Prime Minister that, in the light of Britain's intention to bring the negotiations to the point of decision in mid-February, a number of matters should be ripe for consideration between the Canadian and British Governments at about the time the Prime Minister will be in London to accept the honour of being made a Freeman of the City of London on February 25.

There was no substantial discussion with Mr. Macmillan of the possibilities which might be open to Britain should the Brussels negotiations fail. However, the Prime Minister did learn that, during the period of the talks with General de Gaulle, one of the French Ministers had mentioned to one of the British Ministers an industrial free trade area as an alternative to British membership in the E.E.C. The Prime Minister understood from Mr. Macmillan that such an alternative would definitely be ruled out from the British point of view.

CONVERSATION WITH PRIME MINISTER MACMILLAN
A.M. SATURDAY, DECEMBER 22, 1962

(i) India

Generally speaking, the situation is not encouraging. Nehru thinks there will be no further attacks but the people in India are greatly aroused particularly after the Chinese threat to Assam which is an area from which 80% of Indian exports are earned. Now that the danger is removed, Indian leaders are less concerned to remove the cause of conflict with Pakistan. In this regard, Mr. Nehru seems to be showing much less interest in reaching an agreement. While he has agreed in principle to a meeting with Ayub Khan, the United Kingdom are not hopeful as to the outcome.

In regard to possible solutions, Mr. Macmillan indicated that Pakistan wanted a plebiscite, which it was believed would favour them; on the other hand, a well-known Indian had stated that in the event of a plebiscite Kashmir might declare itself an independent state. Other possibilities envisaged were:

(a) partition with the Vale under international control; or

(b) leaving Kashmir under the Maharajah who could operate under joint Indian and Pakistani direction.

Mr. Macmillan believes that Krishna Menon could return to a position of influence. His enemies are trying to keep him out but they may not be successful. The only alternative to Nehru is Desai who, unfortunately, does not have the same world outlook. He has done little travelling abroad and was a nationalist.<sup>15</sup>

(ii) Indonesia

Mr. Macmillan said that the U.K. Ambassador had returned to Djakarta to cope with a very serious situation in regard to Brunei. President Sukarno has made a number of threatening statements and the Indonesian authorities have been encouraging people in Brunei to oppose Malaysia. Because the Netherlands had been willing to settle New Guinea without too much difficulty, the Indonesians have been encouraged to challenge the interests of other countries elsewhere. Mr. Macmillan felt that the situation could become serious. (The Prime Minister will have additional points to add on this subject.)

(iii) The Congo

Mr. Macmillan pointed out that by February the United Nations will be without adequate financial resources to continue operations. The United Nations is therefore under a compulsion to bring about a settlement or to get out. The latest offer made to Tshombe would involve a division of revenues from Katanga along the following lines: 40% to Tshombe, 30% to Adoula and 30% for the Union Minière. While Mr. Macmillan thinks that this would be a fair arrangement, he does not think that Tshombe will accept. Mr. Macmillan stressed that the United Kingdom are opposed to sanctions as this would involve an intervention in the domestic affairs of a country. Mr. Macmillan thinks the United States might be prepared to intervene and to send to the Congo the necessary forces to compel Tshombe to come to an arrangement. The United Kingdom view is that while an enlarged U.N. force might be able to defeat Tshombe, it could not hold on. (The Prime Minister indicated that he had more to report on this subject.) Mr. Macmillan foresaw the danger of the U.S.S.R. stepping in after the United Nations forces has withdrawn.

(iv) British Territories in Africa

Mr. Macmillan does not feel that Nyasaland will be able to carry on by itself. It has insufficient resources. The hope had been to bring about a federation with Tanganyika and Uganda but now the situation was not hopeful. Welensky contends that at the time of the 1952 agreement an understanding had been reached that Nyasaland would not be allowed to secede and was now accusing the British of bad faith.<sup>16</sup> Mr. Macmillan acknowledges that there may have been representations on this point but he is very clear that there was no agreement. Without Nyasaland, and for other reasons, it will be almost impossible for Northern and Southern Rhodesia to continue together particularly as a result of the latest election in Southern Rhodesia. Looking to the future, Mr. Macmillan could see the possibility of some arrangement emerging between Southern Rhodesia and South Africa. This might not be as remote as some people think particularly if Southern Rhodesia were to follow policies close to apartheid.

Mr. Macmillan was opposed to imposing economic sanctions against South Africa.

(v) Recognition of Yemen

The United Kingdom do not agree with the United States. They see, however, little possibility of the Arab countries getting together. Mr. Macmillan said that Nasser has shown some signs lately of being slightly more reasonable than he has been in the past.

(vi) Ghana

According to Mr. Macmillan, Nkrumah is having a "lachrymose" time. Mr. Diefenbaker said that he had mentioned to Mr. Macmillan his own personal experience of Nkrumah's changeability. He is apparently sitting at home waiting and crying. Just before coming to Ottawa, Nkrumah had said in the Sudan that Ghana would become an independent republic. However, after a few days in Ottawa, he told Mr. Diefenbaker that he had been surprised as to how well he was being accepted and he could get along with other Commonwealth leaders. In view of the kindness of the Canadians, he had come to realize the value of the Commonwealth and he had given up his earlier plan to have Ghana leave it. Such an encouraging statement was, however, repudiated no more than eight days later in New York when Nkrumah had reverted to his earlier line that Ghana would become an independent republic. Apparently, Mr. Macmillan feels that Nkrumah is even more changeable now.<sup>17</sup> A stabilizing factor is that the cocoa market is very good and the people are accordingly better off and more content.

Talks in the spring of 1952 between British officials and leaders from Britain's Central African colonies resulted in a "draft federal scheme," which contributed to the formation, in 1953, of the Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland.

(vii) Berlin

(The Prime Minister will wish to add material on this subject.)<sup>18</sup>

(viii) Latin America

There was some discussion of the question of Canada's membership in the Organization of American States. Mr. Diefenbaker summarized our position. If we joined and were to side with the United States, we would be accused of being puppets. On the other hand, if we were to oppose the United States, this would create other problems. If hostilities were to break out in Latin America, the Canadian position could be very difficult.<sup>19</sup> The consensus of opinion among the British was that our position was a sound one. They could very well understand it as a logical stand in the situation. The Prime Minister indicated that this subject had not been discussed with Mr. Kennedy.<sup>20</sup>

SOVIET CANADIAN RELATIONS – CONVERSATION WITH LAVROV

At Kremlin reception on November 7 I had a rather curious conversation with Lavrov, Head of Second European Division MFA. It was at Lavrov's initiative, and I think prompted by fact that following my conversation earlier in evening with Khrushchev, latter had mentioned to Chief of Protocol that he planned to see me before I returned to Canada. Lavrov said Protocol had mentioned this to him, and he thought it would be very good idea.

2. Lavrov began by saying that we should try to bring about some real improvement in Soviet-Canadian relations. We were neighbours and such improvement would be in interests of both our countries. I said I entirely agreed. I hoped speedy implementation of agreements on Cuba and resolution of Cuban crisis would pave way toward negotiations for more agreements between East and West, which would make possible much better relations between USSR and all Western countries including my own.

3. Lavrov said we should improve our bilateral relations without waiting for solution of difficult multilateral questions. We should draw correct lesson from recent crisis. Soviet Government had decided to withdraw its rockets from Cuba as conciliatory step in interests of peace. But in face of American provocations decision might well have been otherwise. Had I reflected what would have happened to Canada in that event? I asked whether he meant in event of major war, and he said yes, it was very close. I said in that event much of USSR would have been destroyed, and no repeat no doubt also much of North America. I was very glad Soviet Government had decided to withdraw strategic long range weapons from Cuba. They were serious threat to all countries in Western hemisphere.

4. Lavrov said danger to Canada came exclusively from our special military arrangements with USA. Without them Canada would be much safer. (Lavrov is an old reader of Minifie and has never given up hope.) I said most Canadians did not repeat not agree with theory that we would be safer if neutralist. Cohesion of free world had been response to Stalin's policies of expansion and threats to Western interests. But Canadians did feel that we would all be much safer if we could reach early agreement on genuine and reliable measures of disarmament. Policies of threatening each other, or attempting to upset strategic balance, whether in Central America or in Germany, seemed to me dangerous and lesson of recent events was that such efforts should be abandoned.

5. Lavrov then abandoned effort to sell advantages of neutralism by implied threats and talk of warnings of military dangers involved in association with USA. He took up new tack. This was that increasingly it would be necessary to solve problems through UN, and this would mean that UN would put into positions of prominence and leadership countries in which both sides, USA and USSR, had confidence and with which both sides had relations of easy friendship. If Canada took steps to improve its relations with USSR this would inevitably mean more important international influence and roles for Canada in UN.

6. Lavrov went on to make assertion that Canada's attitude to USSR was less friendly and normal than that of UK or Australia. Soviet relations with Britain were normal and fairly satisfactory, despite fact that there were much greater problems dividing USSR and Britain than any dividing USSR and Canada. I asked what problems he had in mind and he said Berlin and nuclear testing and disarmament. I said that freedom of West Berlin had been guaranteed by NATO and maintenance of that freedom was problem for all NATO members. In disarmament also Canada had direct interest. I expressed surprise however that he should suggest Canadian-Soviet relations were less "normal" than Britain-Soviet relations, or Australian-Soviet relations. I said I did not repeat not understand this suggestion, which seemed to me erroneous.

7. Lavrov said problem was one of anti-Soviet demonstrations in Canada, and of speeches by Canadian leaders. He insisted demonstrations could always be stopped by government if it so desired. I said we deplored demonstrations against embassies. I hoped there had no repeat not been any recurrence. He said he did not repeat not know, he had been apprehensive about what might happen on November 7 (so had I, though I did not repeat not admit this to him. I hope there was in fact no repeat no demonstration).

8. Lavrov said his main point was that Canadian leaders made violently anti-Soviet speeches, which neither British nor Australian leaders did. These speeches encouraged anti-Soviet demonstrations. Moreover they could not repeat not but worsen relations between our countries.

9. Lavrov referred particularly to charges of Soviet imperialism and Soviet colonialism. He said Canada took lead in this propaganda which seemed to him gratuitous and explicable only by anti-Soviet bias and desire on part of Canadian Government to appear more English than England, and more American than USA.

10. Lavrov referred particularly to statement of a few days previously by Prime Minister,<sup>1</sup> of which I have not repeat not seen text.

11. I told Lavrov that Soviet charges of imperialism against West inevitably seemed hypocritical to Westerners in light of record of Britain and other Western powers since World War Two in granting independence to so many nations formerly incorporated in colonial empires. Soviet charges of imperialism inevitably struck Westerners as propaganda contrasting strangely with Soviet expansion under Stalin after World War Two. I said I thought that if Soviet side stopped making propaganda and political warfare moves to undermine Western influence, it would be reasonable to expect that what he called anti-Soviet propaganda would likewise decrease from side of most Western countries. I thought we should both turn our attention to settling outstanding problems such as nuclear tests and disarmament, and reducing international tension.

12. I then told Lavrov that I could not repeat not understand his statement that Canadian-Soviet relations were less normal than those with other two countries (Australia and Britain) with which his division deals. In cultural relations there had been a considerable development during last couple of years. Our trade was not repeat not big but was larger (at least in 1961) than that between USSR and Australia, and I hoped ways could be found of expanding trade. I mentioned forthcoming trade consultations. I also mentioned exchanges of technicians and scientists, and said that here too our relations were much more extensive than those between USSR and Australia. In all these fields exchanges between USSR and Britain were admittedly very much greater. I thought there could be room for further developments in our own relations, and would welcome any proposals he might have.

13. Lavrov then admitted that in substantive questions, leaving speeches aside, Soviet-Canadian relations were much closer than Soviet-Australian relations. He said his ministry had also appreciated independence of Canadian policy towards Cuba during past couple of years. He said he genuinely wanted to try to develop closer good-neighbourly relations with Canada. But he found some Canadian speeches made things difficult in this regard. There were also he said certain problems about visas. However he was not repeat not specific about this, and as a new and rather attractive concert item was starting conversation wound up with mutual expressions of personal esteem and friendship, and of mutual desire to improve practical relations between our countries so far as we could.

14. Apart from further evidence of Soviet Government's sensitivity to the campaign against Soviet colonialism (I believe this sensitivity is very real), I do not repeat not think too much importance should be attached to this conversation. Lavrov's warning about military dangers to Canada inherent in our defence relations with our allies strikes me as a naïve, rather inept, and certainly ill-timed, parallel with threats against Turkey which I understand Soviet Ambassador [in] Ankara made at height of Cuban crisis last month, threatening imminent destruction unless Turkey got rid of American bases there. However I thought Lavrov's remarks sufficiently interesting to merit a report.

15. Incidentally I reminded Lavrov, as I had done ten days previously when he and Aroutunian lunched with me, that I was still hoping for a favourable reply to our request for support for 1967 world's fair in Montreal. As reported in my telegram 813,† on November 10 Lavrov phoned me to say that Soviet Government "probably" had no repeat no objections to Canadian proposal on this matter. He added that in his personal opinion despite this reservation in the official communication, he felt virtually certain that Soviet delegation would support our bid.

CONVERSATION WITH KHRUSHCHEV – INTERNAL AFFAIRS

In response to my opening remarks, reported in my reference telegram,<sup>2</sup> Khrushchev said he would comment first on what I had said about domestic situation. He did so at length and with many fascinating anecdotes. He said he planned big investments in agriculture, and more democratisation.

2. He acknowledged that he had been pleased with developments in general since Stalin's death. They had made a lot of progress in industry and technology. He said they had taken decisions of extraordinary importance at recent Central Committee plenum to improve planning and general direction of economic affairs, and to make a better deployment of key manpower at all levels in the party. How this would work out remained to be seen, but he thought it would prove good.

3. Khrushchev acknowledged that in agriculture there were serious problems. He blamed these squarely on Stalin and the heritage which he left. Stalin disliked peasants and did not repeat not understand them. Lenin's and Stalin's treatment of peasants had been utterly different. Though [a] dedicated Marxist Stalin was impatient and brutal and had done grave harm to USSR. He reiterated that Stalin's régime had created widespread fear, and said Lenin's forecast about what would happen if Stalin got central power had proved remarkably prescient and accurate.

4. Before Stalin's death Benediktov had warned Stalin accurately about real position of Soviet agriculture, and proposed setting up commission to re-examine whole question of agriculture structure. Stalin had proposed that Khrushchev be chairman. Khrushchev said he had at once realized that this put him in a dangerous position since in view of Stalin's fixed ideas he would not repeat not be able to help peasants or agricultural production, but could easily do himself grave personal harm. So he tried to persuade Stalin to make Malenkov Chairman. Stalin refused saying Malenkov understood nothing about subject. Nevertheless Stalin left Malenkov in effective charge of agricultural sector of economy. But Khrushchev had to chair this special commission.

5. Khrushchev realized that since Stalin disliked what Khrushchev wanted to propose, he could do no repeat no good to agriculture. If he recommended what would please Stalin it would hurt agriculture. Stalin had wanted to increase taxation on peasants to fantastic level higher than their total earnings. Since however he could not repeat not duck job he tried to spread responsibility by claiming that issues were too big for his little commission which should therefore be enlarged and strengthened. He recommended that all Politburo members except Stalin should participate. He said his real motive was to make all of them responsible, instead of himself alone. Nevertheless Stalin agreed that most Politburo members should participate, except for Bulganin and Kaganovich. Khrushchev had been particularly pleased to get Beria and Malenkov onto commission: "I felt it would be easier and safer to share responsibility with them."

6. After study Beria, Malenkov and other members had realized impracticability of Stalin's tax ideas. "We were then all in dangerous dilemma. But we reported to Stalin. He was angry, said report bad. I privately agreed with this assessment, but for opposite reason: Stalin thought report went too far: I thought it should have gone much farther. But we had reported on Saturday. He fell ill on Sunday, and died on Monday. A good day for Soviet agriculture." I asked whether this might have been act of God. Khrushchev looked startled, but replied "Yes on that occasion God was with us."

7. Khrushchev went on about his experiences cooperating with other Presidium members to correct Stalin's mistakes. They all had to feel their way and had made some mistakes of their own. It was impossible to cooperate with Beria since he was a rogue. "Perhaps you think all Communists are rogues but Beria was a special one."

8. There were a good many more fascinating anecdotes about Khrushchev's manoeuvres against Politburo colleagues to preserve himself and gradually improve agricultural situation without getting into too exposed position. There was some reminiscence about start of virgin lands project. Khrushchev said there had been many mistakes in this. It was inevitable that there should be some mistakes in any major project. But on whole project had already proved successful, heavy investment had now been recouped and country had started to make profit from virgin lands enterprise. In future they should begin getting good returns.

9. Khrushchev conceded that he himself, as well as his colleagues, had worked so long with Stalin that they had to some extent become influenced by Stalin's ways of thinking so it had taken considerable time for them to learn how effectively to improve situation and to release and harness initiative of agricultural population.

10. Khrushchev said that they had similar difficulty in industry. Their planners, educated under Stalinist techniques, still had excessively mechanical approach. This all had to be changed, and change took time. But Khrushchev felt confident they were now on right path.

11. They had been more successful in industry than in agriculture but in countryside too they were now he thought on right path. USSR would still overtake and surpass North American productivity. I might be sceptical but there was no repeat no real secret in our success. Only secret of North American success was money – they too had to invest in fertilizers, irrigation, and agricultural education. All this took money but they would provide it.

12. I agreed it took money, but suggested it also took incentive. I expressed scepticism about collectivization. Khrushchev said we had different understanding of best incentives. Capitalists thought profit was key incentive, whereas Communists thought good wages, scope for initiative coupled with education, and moral satisfaction provided soundest incentives. He illustrated this thesis by Soviet progress in development of missiles.

13. In response to my comment Khrushchev said he recognized capitalism had changed fundamentally since Marx's day. A century ago capitalism meant management both in industry and agriculture by owners. But now capitalist industry was essentially matter of big public corporations run by professional managers. Industrially therefore situation was essentially similar in West and in Socialist countries.

14. I agreed, and said I was interested that Khrushchev recognized this. I suggested real difference between Western and Communist societies was less in field of economic organization than in political field. Real difference was between democracy and dictatorship.

15. Khrushchev replied that I had already acknowledged that there had been considerable progress towards less dictatorship and more liberty in USSR. He considered conditions now right for further measures of liberalization in wide range of fields. He had thought it would be appropriate to propose new measures in this direction at last week's plenum. But many people had felt USSR would get indigestion if they tried to do too much at once. Many steps had therefore been left over for future decision and implementation. But Khrushchev insisted that they would introduce further measures of democratization soon.

16. I expressed interest in this, and Khrushchev said many Westerners claimed that if Socialists liberalized their society they would be digging their own graves. His answer was that if democratization was dangerous, it was a danger that they would quickly rush to embrace. "Democracy is our goal."

17. Khrushchev said he was tired of Western prophets who forecast Soviet society's doom, but he did not repeat not really mind these forecasts. "If one's enemies are fools that is perhaps all to good." It was at this point Khrushchev interpolated story that he had genuinely regretted Dulles' death. He had instructed Gromyko to express Soviet condolences but Gromyko had not repeat not wanted to attend Dulles' funeral because he really did not repeat not understand.

18. Reverting to theme that he envisaged considerable further measures of domestic democratization Khrushchev said it was inevitable that man must be man, and that as men developed they must come to govern themselves.

19. I said I agreed, but that if Khrushchev really thought this, then he should acknowledge that politically as well as economically Western democracies and Communist societies could become increasingly similar. Therefore we would be wise to drop idea of ideological rivalry and struggle, and instead should get on with organization of international cooperation.

20. Khrushchev hesitated at this, and said "Yes possibly so, but we understand things differently. West is copying us in certain regards. Kennedy's speeches are often full of social insight and increasingly hold out elements of genuine social vision. But this is because Kennedy wants to take into account popular social aspirations."

21. Khrushchev went on to claim that Kennedy was essentially a clever demagogue. He might be personally sincere in some of these aspirations but he would not repeat not be able to deliver on his social promises. Khrushchev said "Please don't tell press that I called Kennedy a demagogue. I will say it directly to him if we meet but I do not repeat not want him to hear through press that I insult him and doubt his ability to carry through on social promises."

22. Reverting to earlier theme Khrushchev said emphatically that genuine socialism and Communism would be possible only with development of democracy. He was determined to proceed in this direction.

23. Unfortunately at this point Malik reminded Khrushchev of time and Khrushchev said he must turn to discussion of certain international problems, particularly German question. I have reported our conversation on these topics in separate messages.<sup>3</sup>

KHRUSHCHEV'S POLITICAL POSITION – DILEMMAS OF SOVIET POLICY

Since I returned to Moscow three weeks ago from Canada I have had hunch there must have developed within top Communist Party of the Soviet Union (CPSU) circles some domestic political threat to Khrushchev's leadership. Hypothesis that Khrushchev himself has considered it expedient to conciliate or yield to critics seems to me essential part of explanation for certain current tendencies in Soviet affairs, particularly for manner of domestic crack-down on Soviet intelligentsia. Since virtually all my diplomatic colleagues here have disagreed with my thesis, I have delayed reporting in effort to get evidence for firmer conclusions one way or the other. I still have no repeat no conclusive evidence, but view which most of my colleagues continue to hold that there has been no repeat no challenge seems to me increasingly unconvincing. I am therefore now submitting this message which I regret I did not repeat not send ten days ago when first dictated. But I must warn that my views are still tentative.

2. This telegram is not repeat not intended to predict Khrushchev's downfall. Although I suspect there has been or still is real challenge to his leadership, my guess is that Khrushchev will win out. He is politician of extraordinary nimbleness, flexibility and flair. Moreover his domestic prestige and image is probably an important asset to the party, even to those who have grave misgivings about some of his policies. Given extent of intellectual and perhaps general party and public ferment in this country it could seem risky to dispense with it.

3. Main reasons I have concluded that Khrushchev must have considered himself in serious domestic political trouble are related to current campaign against intellectuals and freedom of expression, and apparent attempt to delimit or even call halt to destalinization process. There are certainly good reasons for profound misgivings or dissatisfaction by conservative elements in Party here about several of Khrushchev's policies. Furthermore, Khrushchev has trod on many influential toes. I suspect also that some army leaders may be dissatisfied and concerned at certain of Khrushchev's views. These points are developed in latter part of this message.

4. My conclusion that there has been domestic challenge to Khrushchev's position is reinforced by Chinese behaviour. I do not repeat not believe there is any pro-Chinese wing as such within Soviet Presidium or Central Committee. But lack of restraint in recent Chinese attacks on Moscow policies suggest Chinese themselves must have thought they have chance of toppling Khrushchev. Though they are probably wrong they doubtless have some information on which to base such drastic hope.

5. Four months ago Khrushchev told me, in course of long discussion of internal situation, that he was determined to move further in direction of democratisation and individual freedom. I believe he was sincere in this, and in his expressed belief that as Soviet society and economy become more developed and technically advanced, more freedom of initiative and hence more relaxation of centralised controls over thought and expression, would be essential for efficient functioning and progress. Most of Khrushchev's record in recent years seems to confirm this. Although his secret speech of 1956<sup>4</sup> and his Nov/61 decision to remove Stalin's body from mausoleum were I think prompted in part by considerations of domestic and intra-block rivalry, Khrushchev is quite intelligent enough to have foreseen, and quite daring enough to have accepted and indeed willed, not repeat not only jolt to conservatives but tremendous encouragement to more freedom of thought here which his public debunking and desecration of Stalin made inevitable. During past year there seems to be evidence Khrushchev personally approved and encouraged publication of various pace-setting items such as some of Yevtushenko's most daring anti-Stalinist poems, Solzhenitsyn's "One Day" novel about concentration camps, and some destalinisationist plays.

6. On November 28/62 Khrushchev told me he had planned to announce at Party Central Committee plenum session concluded few days before, various further measures in direction of democratisation and freedom of expression, but that several of his colleagues in leadership had opposed this on grounds it would be dangerous to move so fast and might create "political indigestion." Khrushchev said he had therefore agreed to postpone additional liberalisation measures but was nevertheless determined soon to move further in this direction which he considered inevitable and indeed essential if "socialism" is to be achieved. Three days later Khrushchev started campaign in precisely opposite direction: Khrushchev's drastic shift, seen in light of his remark to me that several of his colleagues opposed at least timing of his further destalinisation policy, seems to me extremely significant.

7. It is not repeat not surprising that many conservative elements in Soviet leadership should have become alarmed by extent of present intellectual ferment in this country. This ferment has been inherent in contradictions of Soviet political situation, but has been mightily stimulated by what I have called literary brinkmanship practised by many intellectuals seeking to expand area of freedom and honesty here by taking advantage of official encouragement given by Khrushchev's destalinisation policy. My January/February report to CIIA and university groups in Canada<sup>5</sup> discusses background and political implications of this ferment, and Embassy Despatches 1069 Dec. 20/62† and 200 Mar. 14† describe something of efforts to check it. Khrushchev's personal contributions to attacks on intellectuals and his efforts to call halt to destalinisation process [seemed] to me to suggest intemperate behaviour of ruthless man suddenly worried about own political skin rather than mere revised judgments of statesman weighing questions of due degree and proportion in social trends.

8. I suspect that Khrushchev must have been forced to realize, during final weeks of 1962 and first months of 1963, that opposition to basic direction of his leadership was dangerously extensive. This, coupled with various unwelcome international and domestic developments, coinciding with vicious Chinese criticism on certain points of doctrine and policy which could hardly fail to strike chord to some extent among Russian Marxists, probably convinced Khrushchev he must reverse some of his policies in order not repeat not to jeopardise personal domestic-political power. It is important to recognize that nowadays Russian Marxists are in effect going through major “crisis of conscience” (as a Russian friend put it to me a year ago). This spiritual crisis, coinciding with economic and political difficulties at home and abroad, could prove vitally important in affecting political decisions here.

9. Khrushchev’s thundering denunciation of abstract painting on December 1/62<sup>6</sup> proved mere opening salvo in concerted and growing campaign against freedom of expression and venturesome thought in general. Significantly Khrushchev delivered his December 1/62 “donkey’s tail” diatribe ex cathedra – i.e. surrounded by full Presidium, and with extensive front page coverage arranged in Pravda and other Soviet newspapers next day.

10. It has since become clear, if it was ever in doubt, that party leaders’ attack was directed primarily not repeat not against painters but against writers. Main individual targets were popular young poets Yevtushenko and Voznesenskiy who by daring jolts, unexpected associations or occasional breath-taking beauty have stretched listeners’ minds out of safe conformist thought patterns; against Ehrenburg, an old man trying at last to square his conscience, because his memoirs point up question (inevitably inherent in whole situation) of shared responsibility for crimes of Stalinism; against more courageous editors; and against certain film-makers and playwrights for calling undesirable attention to gap in sympathy between generations or to less savory features of Soviet past or present. Party-spirit and national-mindedness are nauseatingly urged as key desiderata for Soviet creative artists who are daily being exhorted in major press campaign to accentuate the positive.

11. Many Moscow intellectuals with whom I have talked recently fear present campaign may presage return of Stalinist techniques of thought control and compulsory intellectual prostitution. As yet things are far from this point but campaign is still developing. Exciting destalinisation plays continue occasionally to be shown. A few victims of attack (Yevtushenko, Shostakovitch, Polevoy but notably as yet not repeat not Ehrenberg nor Tvardosky) have confessed their errors but some well known creative workers and editors, most top rank writers and film-makers have thus far remained pointedly silent. Party leaders have warned menacingly that “conspiracy of silence” is also form of answer and that silence on ideological issues cannot repeat not be tolerated. There was scarily veiled threat by Khrushchev to lock up recalcitrant writers in mental asylums, and this has reportedly been done recently in at least three cases. Perhaps most unpleasant feature of all has been zeal with which several former Stalinist hacks (e.g. Yuri Zhukov) have leapt to public attack of their literary intellectual and moral superiors. Press attacks on those who have confessed continue. Thus a testing time and a sorting time has begun once more for Soviet intellectuals.

12. How far Soviet leaders may have to go, and may prove willing to go, in reintroducing repression against writers and film and theatre directors, is of course related to their dilemma about basic allocation of resources and relative priorities to be given to housing, consumer goods and agriculture compared with size of budget allocations for defence and investment in heavy industry. Political influence of intellectuals seeking more freedom is naturally related to receptivity and dissatisfaction of general public seeking more housing, better food and improved consumers’ gadgets. Problem of abstract artists and freedom for writers in this country is thus related to basic issue of major domestic and foreign policy. Just at present all these issues are I think bound up more or less directly with political position of Khrushchev himself.

13. Several important policies both international and domestic with which Khrushchev has identified himself and heavily engaged his personal prestige in top Party circles, have been going rather badly.

(a) Outstanding international example is probably last year's Cuban fiasco. Attention of Soviet public has been successfully focussed on Khrushchev's "statesmanlike and moderate action to save world peace": his public popularity did not repeat not suffer, at least in short run, and was perhaps even enhanced. But within sophisticated circles near leadership level, e.g. in or near Central Committee and presumably also in top military circles, I suspect that Chinese charges of ill-thought-out adventurism followed by capitulationism must tend to strike chord and draw some blood.

(b) Growing schism between USSR and China may have been unavoidable but it is certainly costly to USSR and has probably led to some questioning and criticism. Inevitably man at top must take responsibility for unwelcome trend. Resultant threat to Khrushchev's domestic political influence could be more disturbing if Chinese have been playing their cards wisely among Soviet party circles as they may well have been doing. Russians now seem anxious to call halt to public quarrel with Chinese providing this can be done without paying too great price.

(c) Personally I think that Khrushchev's wooing of neutralist "national bourgeois" leaders such as Nehru, Nasser, Kassem, Nkhrumah etc. has been on whole wise, and in Russia's interest. Nevertheless recent events have made this policy too relatively open to criticism from Soviet standpoint, particularly in Mideast. Overthrow of Kassem and establishment of virulently anti-Communist and more or less pro-Nasser régimes in Iraq and Syria may have laid Khrushchev's whole policy open to criticism in Russian Communist circles. So perhaps has support of India at cost of deepened quarrel with China, at least among top Soviet Communist Party circles ill-informed about international affairs.

(d) Berlin issue which Khrushchev has personally sponsored for some years, has thus far not repeat not proved particularly profitable to USSR.

(e) It would probably be relatively easy for Khrushchev's critics to find shortcomings in various aspects of Soviet policy toward France, Germany, Britain and Common Market during past few years.

(f) It is I think possible, perhaps even probable, that American opposition of Soviet big diameter pipe purchases [texte manquant/text missing?], and to acceptance [of] test-ban agreement on Soviet terms now that USSR has offered three token inspections, may have been genuinely unexpected, and may in any case have strengthened hand of those in Moscow who oppose concept of trying to seek agreements with West. Some Soviet acquaintances have urged this point on me.

14. Domestically, several of Khrushchev's policies must have laid him open to more or less severe criticism or opposition.

(a) I have already discussed Khrushchev's role in dramatic destalinisation, and several specific instances of his encouragement of outspoken literary efforts. Results have certainly and understandably alarmed many of Khrushchev's conservative companions, if not repeat not Khrushchev himself. These results are of course dangerous to maintenance of supremacy of party at least in traditional totalitarian sense of this concept. Inevitably logic of this destalinisation goes far beyond role in Soviet society of intelligentsia as such.

(b) Kazakhstan seems to have become almost a public scandal. Top governmental and Party leadership has been repeatedly changed in past few years, and during 1962 some sixteen thousand persons were sacked from trade network mainly for widespread economic crookedness. All this can hardly help but reflect on Khrushchev's virgin lands project, in which his prestige is rather heavily committed.

(c) I am not repeat not here going into recent issues in Soviet defence policy and question whether Khrushchev has been proved wrong or has advocated unpopular decisions. Sufficient information is not repeat not readily available here to discuss this question, but it is worth bearing in mind. So are possible implications of Penkowsky case, which may have shaken Soviet military circles rather deeply.<sup>7</sup>

(d) Khrushchev seems periodically to have toyed with idea of trying to find increased resources for chemical industry and agriculture by cutting down military budget, not repeat not at cost of new sophisticated gadgets but by reducing large scale conventional armed forces and perhaps lowering priority of heavy industry which supports their weaponry. This seems to have met with hitherto successful resistance by military leaders. Khrushchev's scepticism about massive conventional forces may however have stimulated significant distrust among military hierarchy, who could be important in any challenge to establish political leadership.

15. Quite apart from policy issues which various members of Praesidium or Central Committee might find politically dubious or distasteful, there have been number of issues in which Khrushchev's decisions must have created resentments among politically significant sections of population. In addition to all above issues several other Khrushchev policies in recent years, though often popular with masses, have tended to alienate certain significant groups:

(a) recent division of Communist Party regional and district organizations into two (one for industry and one for agriculture) with establishment of two Party First Secretaries where one had ruled before, must have tended to reduce or jeopardize power of many regional and local tin gods whose importance in the régime is far from negligible.

(b) Khrushchev's insistence that many students must spend two years in ordinary productive labour between secondary school and university has annoyed many educators, managers, and of course many parents. His practice of sending urban workers to give temporary help in harvest has also been widely unpopular.

(c) Khrushchev's abolition of motor tractor stations meant that many people in relatively privileged positions in countryside were forced to return to more lowly posts in collective farms or to seek new jobs in cities: this disruption presumably created resentment.

(d) Khrushchev's emphasis on reducing size of bureaucracy, and possibly also his effort to get more turnover in political offices, must have created fear and resentment among some of those affected.

16. In general, Khrushchev's propensity to engage in rather drastic and relatively frequent institutional reorganizations has been very unsettling to innumerable Soviet personalities. Khrushchev has always put much faith in institutional reform as a means of achieving his ends. But during past year he seems to have resorted to this device with growing frequency. Some of these changes seem to have been ill-thought out and premature and have themselves been subjected within a few weeks to further change. By now, these changes and counter-changes must have created at many levels of party and bureaucracy a climate of uncertainty, confusion and even annoyance.

17. I list all above not repeat not to suggest that I think Khrushchev has usually been wrong: on contrary I think that with exception of his propensity for foreign policy adventures (Berlin, Cuba etc.), he has quite often, from point of view of long-term interest of Soviet régime, been right in his innovations. But many of them have alienated significant groups, and some have proved very vulnerable to criticism if ever Khrushchev's leadership is brought seriously into question.

18. These various considerations have led me to give serious consideration to possibility that Khrushchev might find himself in serious political trouble at home, and to conclude that

Khrushchev himself may have decided fence mending and conciliation of critics or potential opponents might be prudent, in order to consolidate domestic leadership.

19. It seems to me quite possible that as suggested in Peter Roberts' very interesting letter 63-8 January 23 from Hong Kong,† Chinese Communist leadership may have decided that if they cannot repeat not topple Khrushchev then their best interests may lie in trying to establish new international Communist movement under Peking's leadership with USSR excluded as heretics. Presumably Chinese extremism would have built-in advantage in appealing for support of CPs in most Asian, African and even Latin American states, although USSR, being far richer, would have advantage with CPs of most established Communist régimes and also for reasons of its relative moderation would have advantage with CPs in highly developed countries such as Western Europe and North America, where CPs must rely in part on ability to appeal to educated public opinion. Presumably many Soviet leaders would go some distance to avoid open break with China, in order to preserve at least façade of unity of world Communist movement under Moscow's influence. Presumably Chinese could try (and I expect are trying) to exploit Moscow's desire to prevent open break, by pressing subtly for weakening of Khrushchev's position.

20. But I doubt that Khrushchev could afford at this time to surrender government leadership and retain merely First Secretary's position in Communist Party or vice-versa. It seems to me that surrender under pressure of any part of his present institutional position might create trend against him which in absence of revived physical instruments of repression could prove disastrous.

21. My guess therefore, and it is certainly very tentative, is that Khrushchev (a) is under dangerous domestic political pressure; and (b) will win out at some cost of compromising on domestic and foreign policies but not repeat not at cost of any compromise on his institutional positions of power. In these circumstances I would guess that Soviet Government would not repeat not for time being be inclined to make any important new concessions designed to reach agreement with West in fields such as disarmament, nuclear test bans, Berlin, or Cuba, or other major "East-West" areas. Soviet leadership will probably wish to avoid measures likely to lay themselves open to serious further charges from Peking, until issue of Moscow-Peking relations is further clarified one way or the other.

22. Meanwhile CPSU's renewed emphasis on old doctrine that there must be no repeat no peaceful coexistence (with West) in field of ideology is disappointing. So is reassertion in CPSU's March 30 letter to Chinese that "peaceful coexistence of states with different social systems presupposes unremitting ideological, political and economic struggle between the two social systems," i.e. Cold War.<sup>8</sup>

23. It is too soon to draw firm conclusions about how much these words may mean in practice, or how far they may be merely tactical and defensive. But for what they are worth they suggest disappointing and conceivably even disquieting prospects, for international as well as domestic policies of USSR.

24. On other hand evidence of how strongly and far-reachingly the ferment of destalinization is working in Soviet society, and how deep are the contradictions between "life itself" and Marxist intellectual strait-jacket, is fascinating and welcome. Crisis has seeds of promise as well as possible dangers.

CULTURAL EXCHANGES BETWEEN CANADA AND THE U.S.S.R.

Since coming to this post near the beginning of 1961, I have been very interested in the development of cultural exchanges between Canada and the Soviet Union. I believe that, provided a reasonable degree of reciprocity can be developed, there is substantial mutual advantage in these exchanges. The Russians, and several other peoples of the U.S.S.R., have great cultural traditions and much to offer the West. Other things being equal, Canadians will find genuine cultural enrichment in seeing some of the outstanding performing artists and artistic groups of this country.

2. On the other hand, we should recognize that sending theatrical, musical and other artists and groups abroad is a highly organized and deliberate element in Soviet foreign policy, motivated in part (particularly insofar as the artists themselves are concerned) by considerations of culture and normal international interests, but also motivated, and indeed controlled, by the desire to further the influence-expanding objectives of Soviet foreign policy.

3. Conversely, there is I think a genuine and in my judgement a very substantial Western interest in encouraging visits by Western artists and cultural groups to various parts of the U.S.S.R., not only for more obvious and elementary reasons, but specifically in order to increase the exposure of various sections of this still essentially closed society to the outside world, and to contribute to the gradual opening up of Soviet public opinion and the progressive normalization of Western-Soviet relations. Provided we can successfully avoid the real dangers of war, and do not blow each other up during the next decade or two (and I think we can avoid this), then there is I think substantial reason to believe that the further development of exchanges in cultural and other fields (scientific, business, technical, etc.) can provide one of the best hopes, and indeed one of the most effective instruments, in encouraging the development of more normal and safer international attitudes and relations.

4. Soon after I came here I concluded that there were two main problems in this general area, insofar as Canadian-Soviet cultural exchanges were concerned. The first and simplest problem was that, up to that time, visits by Soviet performing artists and cultural groups to Canadian centres were in almost all cases organized by contracts made between Soviet State organizations and American impresarios, Canada being treated for practical purposes as a series of subsidiary branches or occasional stopping-points in Soviet cultural tours of the United States. This situation was unfavourable for Canadian business (that is, for Canadian impresarios). It usually meant higher ticket prices for Canadian audiences. And it inevitably meant that the question of reciprocal Canadian visits to the U.S.S.R. seldom arose except by chance, in cases where a Canadian artist happened to be sponsored by an American impresario, or happened to be invited directly by a Soviet organization. This situation was thus unfavourable not only from the point of view of Canadian business enterprise; it also restricted opportunities here for Canadian artists, and inevitably complicated the problem of getting any substantial degree of reciprocity. This lack of reciprocity meant that Canada was failing to pull its weight and make its due contribution to Western cultural penetration of the U.S.S.R. It also meant that Canada was missing opportunities to impress Canada's national identity on Soviet society, with all the political and other implications this failure involved.

5. During the past two years this first problem of persuading relevant Soviet State cultural organizations to deal directly with Canadian impresarios where visits to Canadian cities were concerned has been largely resolved. We have impressed our views about this on Madame Furtseva (Minister of Culture), on the State Committee, and on Gosconcert: and they now accept them and operate accordingly. This has not been achieved without some difficulty, and indeed not without some complications: but not all of these have been at the Moscow end. Direct Canadian-Soviet contacts at the organisational or impresario level means encouraging the Soviet authorities to deal with a Canadian impresario who is willing and able to operate on an international scale rather than on a merely city or regional scale as sub-contractor to a major American impresario. I have had considerable correspondence already with the Department on this question, particularly as regards relations between Mr. Koudriavtzeff, the leading American impresario Sol Hurok, and certain other Canadian impresarios operating chiefly on a local sub-contractor basis. Canadian problems in this regard are, of course, complicated by the relatively small size of the Canadian market, the vast geographic extension of our country and hence the relative cost of travel, both from Europe to Canada and within Canada, and the resultant financial and sometimes delicate inter-impresario implications.

6. Nevertheless, as I say, this problem seems, at least for the time being, to have been successfully resolved. Koudriavtzeff and Hurok seem to have developed a mutually satisfactory working arrangement, with the co-ordination and resultant economies in transportation, etc., which this makes possible. I gather also (though admittedly only from remarks made to me by Koudriavtzeff himself, who has visited Moscow many times, and was here again within the past few weeks) that Koudriavtzeff has now developed more or less satisfactory working arrangements with Homburger and other Canadian impresarios who thus far work only on a local or regional scale. Naturally if other Canadian impresarios wish to visit Moscow and try to work out arrangements on a national scale for visits of Soviet performing artists, this Embassy will give them the same assistance which I have thus far been giving to Koudriavtzeff.

7. The more difficult problem of trying to get a reasonable degree of reciprocity remains. Here too there has been some real progress, but there is still nothing approaching a reasonable balance. I doubt if Canada can expect, for many years to come, to achieve one hundred per cent reciprocity, since the U.S.S.R. is a vastly bigger country with correspondingly greater cultural and artistic wealth to offer. Nevertheless the degree of reciprocity thus far achieved has been, in my judgement, far from satisfactory. A major improvement here is both desirable and, on certain conditions, may, I think, prove possible.

8. The easiest and most certain way of ensuring a reasonable degree of reciprocity in the cultural exchange field would, I think, be to have a formal cultural exchange agreement between Canada and the U.S.S.R. This is the basic approach to relations with the U.S.S.R. worked out (or accepted) by the Americans, the British, the French, and many other Western countries. Implementing such an intergovernmental agreement is not easy for a free enterprise society. On the other hand, American and other Western experience has proved that it is not, in practice, impossible. I have discussed this question with the senior State Department official in charge of their cultural, scientific and technical exchange agreements, and with other Western government representatives in this field who periodically visit Moscow. I am very conscious both of the problems which they have faced, and of the relatively high degree of success which they (and particularly the United States) have, nevertheless, recently managed to achieve in grappling with them.

9. I realize, however, that quite apart from the inherent but not insoluble difficulties of implementing an intergovernmental agreement in this area, which is normally outside the activities of government in free enterprise Western societies, there are certain particular political difficulties or inhibitions in Canada in adopting the framework of an intergovernmental agreement, substantial though the advantages of such a framework have proved to be in the experience of our friends.

10. I think we can probably go some considerable distance to achieve a greater degree of reciprocity, even without the advantages which the framework of an intergovernmental cultural exchange agreement can provide. I have discussed the question on several occasions with Madame Furtseva (Soviet Minister of Culture), with Yuri Zhukov and Romanovsky (the previous and current Chairmen of the Soviet State Committee for Cultural Relations with Foreign Countries), with Mr. Rudnev (Chairman of the Soviet State Committee for Scientific and Technical Co-ordination), with the previous and present presidents of the Soviet Academy of Sciences, and others. Although when I first came here the U.S.S.R. was pressing us hard to conclude such an intergovernmental agreement, they now seem to have recognized that it is not essential for their purposes. The question whether it is desirable for Canadian purposes is, of course, a distinct question.

11. In certain fields an easy way out is to have an exchange agreement worked out between some Canadian body, operating on a national scale, and the corresponding Soviet State society. This is the solution which has been adopted by Canada in the field of scientific research, where we have an exchange agreement between the Canadian National Research Council and the Soviet Academy of Sciences. There have, of course, been certain administrative difficulties in implementing this agreement, but the particular problem of reciprocity is not outstanding.

12. Similar specialized agreements for reciprocal exchanges of technical personnel can be and occasionally have been worked out, on an adequate basis of reciprocity, between various technical organizations in Canada, operating on the governmental or semi-governmental level on a national scale, and their counterparts in the U.S.S.R. Usually these agreements have been relatively ad hoc, relating to individual tours of specialists each way. A series of broader "framework" agreements might, however, be useful in some fields.

13. In the field of performing arts there are, however, a number of special complications. These arise in part from the fact that enterprise and organizational responsibility in these fields, in a free capitalist society such as that of Canada, are essentially non-governmental and in the area of private business.

14. Even now that we have got this business into the hands of Canadian rather than American impresarios, we must recognize that the impresario's financial interest lies essentially in the profit which he can make by bringing to Canada individual Soviet artists or performing groups (orchestras; theatrical, ballet or opera groups; choruses; circuses; etc.) which will appeal to and allow him to sell tickets to large Canadian audiences. The Canadian impresario makes nothing, or at best relatively little by way of management fee, out of arranging the reciprocal tour of a Canadian artist or artistic group to the U.S.S.R. A firm grasp of this basic point is essential to any real understanding of the problem.

15. The financial interest of the Western impresario is thus to a considerable extent identical with the political interest of the Soviet officials in charge of what they consider their cultural penetration offensive: the Western impresario's financial interests tend to be quite different and usually indeed the opposite of those of the Western government official primarily concerned with developing an adequate degree of reciprocity, and of Western cultural penetration and opening up of Soviet society. This problem is not insoluble, as is shown by the American Government's experience with Sol Hurok and indeed to some extent (although it is thus far much less satisfactory insofar as reciprocity is concerned) by our own experience with Koudriavtzeff. Nevertheless, it is a real difficulty which must be faced squarely. The Canadian or American impresario will cooperate with his Government and Embassy because he is a patriot, and because he needs their assistance. But his pocketbook interest is inevitably on the other side.

16. The question of reciprocity should be seen in at least three aspects:

(a) Getting contracts for Western, and in our case Canadian, artists or artistic groups to visit the U.S.S.R., as counterparts to those arranged for the visits of Soviet individual artists and groups to the West. This means not merely arranging for an individual Canadian singer or pianist to visit the U.S.S.R. in exchange for the visit to Canada of the Bolshoi Ballet or the Moscow Circus, but getting some degree of reciprocity in the exchange of big group for group, and of individual artist for individual artist;

(b) A reasonable degree of reciprocity in the number of cities and other centres in which the visiting artists on each side are to perform. The Soviet authorities are prone to try to restrict visiting Western artists to two or three, or at the most a handful, of relatively well-known and relatively tame or civilized tourist centres in the Western part of the U.S.S.R. (Moscow, Leningrad, Kiev, and sometimes Yerevan and Tiflis) but to seek opportunities to perform in all parts of Canada and the United States. The Canadian and American impresarios' interests tend to coincide in this matter, for obvious financial reasons, with the Soviet political and cultural organizers'. Without a real political initiative by the Western government concerned, it is difficult, if not impossible, to arrange for Western artists to have an opportunity of performing in Siberia, or in the population centres of Central Asia (other than possibly Tashkent, which has been developed into a subsidiary international show-place by the U.S.S.R.). Indeed it is difficult and very unusual for Western artists to have an opportunity to perform in minor, but by no means politically or culturally unimportant, Western Soviet cities such as Odessa, Rostov, Kuibyshev, Stalingrad, Dniepropetrovsk, etc.). Nevertheless, the populations in these centres are probably even more anxious than those in Moscow, Leningrad and Kiev to have an opportunity of seeing representatives of Western civilization and culture, and it is vastly to the Western political interest that we should find means to give them this opportunity;

(c) Financial reciprocity. The majority of Western artists, both individuals and large groups (e.g. the Montreal Symphony Orchestra) find it to their interests, for reasons of prestige and publicity in the West, as well as for understandable reasons of personal curiosity and satisfaction, to be invited to perform in the U.S.S.R., which still has some of the glamour of the exotic unknown. Western artists are therefore very apt to accept Soviet contracts offering much less pay than they normally obtain for performances in the West, and indeed often (and in the cases of Canadian artists usually) to accept contracts paying them wholly or in substantial part in unconvertible roubles. As contrasted with this, the Soviet government authorities in charge of arrangements in this field normally drive very hard and very successful bargains for very high pay, always one hundred per cent in convertible dollars, for performances in such countries as Canada and the United States.

17. What this all adds up to is that left to themselves Canadian, American and other Western impresarios cannot reasonably be expected to achieve anything significant, beyond a modicum of reciprocity designed mainly for face-saving and publicity purposes, if they have to deal individually with the Soviet Government in this field.

18. The real bargaining lever for the West in this area lies frankly and bluntly in the ability of Western governments to refuse the necessary visas. This lever need not necessarily or normally be exercised very bluntly or overtly, but it is precisely in the latent recognition that this lever exists that the bargaining power of Western representatives (whether individual artists, private impresarios, or government officials) lies, in their dealings with the Soviet government representatives with whom they must negotiate.

19. This should be obvious, but I do not want to risk the possibility that it should be thought that I am exaggerating in this matter. I will therefore cite one example, important in Canadian experience because it relates to the first large-scale cultural visit of a major Canadian group to the Soviet Union – the visit here last spring of the Montreal Symphony Orchestra. I can state with assurance that the Soviet authorities would not have gone through with arrangements for this visit had I not made it clear to them, discreetly but effectively, that the Canadian public would not for long accept the idea of cultural exchanges if they thought that this field was regarded by the Soviet authorities as a one-way street. It was only when the Soviet authorities got the impression that unless they completed a contract for the visit of the Montreal Symphony Orchestra they would not be able to continue sending important Soviet cultural troupes to Canada, that the Soviet Government organization Gosconcert and the Soviet Ministry of Culture stopped stalling and signed a firm contract for the visit of the Montreal Symphony. Nevertheless, the Montreal Symphony's Soviet tour was, I think, a tremendous success, and it did a considerable amount to make Canada better and more favourably known in the leading western cities of this country. The Soviet Minister of Culture had attached particular importance to our permission that they send the Red Army Chorus to Canada, since the Americans had for years been rejecting Soviet requests that it be allowed to tour the United States. They regarded the Montreal Symphony tour here as the quid pro quo for the Red Army Chorus.

20. Nevertheless, it must be recognized that whereas the Red Army Choir visited many parts of Canada, including the West Coast, and whereas several other major Soviet artistic troupes visited Canada that season, all earning high pay in convertible dollars, the Montreal Symphony played only in Moscow, Kiev and Leningrad, and settled for payment solely in unconvertible roubles. Their tour became financially possible only because the Quebec Government, the Montreal Arts Council and the Canada Council all considered that a Soviet tour by the Montreal Symphony Orchestra would offer such prestige value to Montreal and Canada that they put up a subsidy of $50,000 to assist in the expenses. Nevertheless, all the concerts of the Montreal Symphony in Soviet cities were sold out well in advance (the point is that virtually all theatrical, musical and sports performances in the U.S.S.R., whether by foreign or Soviet groups, are always fully sold out in advance).

21. I hope that you have been impressed, as I have, by the profound imbalance in the programmes for current and prospective cultural exchanges between the U.S.S.R. and Canada which have been worked out thus far between Koudriavtzeff and Gosconcert. An outline of this programme was included in my despatch No. 400 of May 9, 1962. I am appending to this despatch a memorandum prepared for me by Miss Berton, my Third Secretary, on current and prospective exchanges.† You will note that during the past few months, since August of this year, three major Soviet cultural groups have visited or are still visiting Canada:

The Moscow Circus
The Leningrad Symphony Orchestra
The Bolshoi Ballet
The pianist, Ashkenazi

A Soviet hockey team is also in Canada. Financial arrangements for most of these artists and groups were set out in my despatch under reference. In addition, arrangements have been made for the following Soviet artists and groups to visit Canada during the next year or so (there will, I think, be additions to this list):

Gutnikov

Violinist, winner of the Tchaikovsky Festival, to play March 19 and 20, 1963, with the Montreal Symphony and April 28 in London, Ontario. Receiving $1,000.00 per performance.

Moiseyev Dancers

To dance in the West in June or July, 1963, perhaps at the Vancouver Festival. Receiving $30,000.00 per week plus transportation from Vancouver to Quebec.

Obrazov Puppets

May 15 to June 15, 1963, in Montreal, Toronto, Stratford and Vancouver. Receiving $7,500.00 per week for four weeks.

David and Igor Oistrakh

January 15 to end of January, 1964 to perform with the Montreal Symphony, Winnipeg and Vancouver. David Oistrakh to get $2,500.00 per performance and Igor $500.00 with David or $1,000.00 alone.

S. Richter

Not yet finally arranged. Contract depends on Koudriavtzeff conferring with Richter in Italy. Possibility Richter may go to Canada only and not the United States.

22. As against this Koudriavtzeff has arranged, or knows of arrangements, for the visit to the U.S.S.R. this season of:

Ronald Turini

January 25, 1963, for one month. He will receive $200.00 plus 200 roubles per concert.

Teresa Stratas

Next May. To receive $350.00 plus 300 roubles per concert, to sing in the Bolshoi Theatre, Moscow, and in Leningrad. These arrangements have, however, not been confirmed by Miss Stratas.

23. In addition, arrangements have been made, but for the following season (April-May, 1964) for the Théâtre du Nouveau Monde to come to Moscow. They are to be paid 7,000 roubles per week (all unconvertible). Transportation will be paid one way by the Russians.

24. Since I came here I have urged Koudriavtzeff to do more to get reciprocity by arrangements for Canadian artists to visit the U.S.S.R. He has, at my prompting, had some discussion about the possibility of the Toronto Symphony Orchestra visiting the Soviet Union. The Russians have indicated a tentative willingness to accept it in the spring of 1964 although no detailed arrangements, or even preliminary financial arrangements, have yet been discussed. The Russians do not expect to pay other than in unconvertible roubles. They have indicated that they expect to make the same sort of arrangements that they made for the Montreal Symphony. I understand from Koudriavtzeff that the Toronto Symphony Orchestra has not yet been able to agree to visit the U.S.S.R. because it has not been able to get guarantees of the requested dollar subsidies from Canadian philanthropists or Government bodies.

25. In principle it seems to me that subsidies should not be necessary. We should be able to demand a sufficient number of concerts for Canadian artists or orchestras in the U.S.S.R., and for all or a sufficient portion of the payment to be made in convertible currency, and at a sufficiently high rate, to cover their expenses. The State Department exerts pressure to get higher fees from the Soviet authorities for American artists than Gosconcert wishes to pay: but it also does subsidize some American groups to come.

26. I have discussed this question on several occasions with Koudriavtzeff. I like him. I have helped him quite a lot, and he knows it, particularly in getting direct contacts with Gosconcert and the Ministry of Culture for the visit of Soviet artists and troupes to Canada rather than having their Canadian tour given to Hurok. But I think he finds it difficult, and I can well understand this, to insist on adequate financial arrangements for visiting Canadian artists, particularly large groups, such as symphony orchestras or theatres.

27. Koudriavtzeff makes the point to me that the wages or salaries paid to Soviet artists and musicians are much lower than those paid in the West. He claims that subsidies by Canadians for Canadians are therefore inevitably needed. This point does not really carry full conviction in my mind. When Soviet artists and groups visit Canada and the United States they demand, and succeed in obtaining, Western-scale remuneration, entirely in convertible currency. In principle it should, I think not be impossible for the West to insist that comparable Western artists visiting the U.S.S.R. should be given remuneration at equivalent levels and similarly in convertible currency. But to achieve this will, I am convinced, take pressure by governments, exercised either through their authority to approve programmes under a cultural exchange agreement, or through their control over visas. The Americans are now exerting this pressure, and getting results. Pending instructions, we of course are not.

28. I am not arguing that Canadian artists should always obtain the same fees as Soviet artists. The fees paid to different groups and artists will, of course, vary according to their abilities and reputation. The Bolshoi Theatre Ballet is obviously "worth" more than any presently existing Canadian ballet company. But it strikes me as ridiculous that Mr. Koudriavtzeff should undertake to pay Gutnikov, an undoubtedly good young Soviet violinist but certainly not yet of the top rank, $1,000 or $1,500 per concert while Teresa Stratas, who is probably as good a singer as Gutnikov, is a violinist, at least as well known, and who is far better than any of the innumerable Soviet female singers I have heard, a mere $300.00 plus 300 roubles per concert; and Ronald Turini, who certainly ranks with winners (such as Gutnikov) of the recently-concluded Tchaikovsky Competition, a mere $200.00 and 200 roubles per concert (see my despatch No. 400 of May 9, 1962).

29. The question of convertibility of currency could in principle be solved in either of two ways. One would be for us to insist that visiting Canadian artists be paid in convertible roubles. To achieve this would take pressure, exercised by the latent possibility of visa control. It would have the disadvantage that it might arouse resentment in the case of certain Canadian artists who would be quite prepared, for prestige and publicity reasons, to accept contracts for relatively low sums in unconvertible roubles. The other method would be to arrange either that the Canadian impresario who handles the two-way transaction should pay Soviet artists who visit Canada at least a significant proportion of their fee in roubles; or alternatively that the roubles be absorbed by the Canadian Embassy in exchange for dollars. It is this latter solution that is used in many cases by the Americans, operating with the benefit of an intergovernmental cultural exchange agreement, which we do not enjoy: though they also press for convertible payments just to drive home the point of reciprocity.

30. The line of thought which I am suggesting involves, if we decide to act on it, not merely the possibility but the probability of a period of pressures and friction between us and the Soviet authorities. I would not relish this. On the other hand I do not consider that the indefinite continuation of what I call the one-way street principle is really healthy either for Canada or for the U.S.S.R.

31. The problem of satisfactorily developing Canadian-Soviet cultural exchanges on an adequately reciprocal basis is therefore by no means easy. I am quite aware that the Department of External Affairs and the Canadian Government would be reluctant to become more deeply involved than they now are in the field of cultural exchanges. Adequately to administrate a satisfactory programme would, I think, take additional staff, certainly in the Department, and probably also at this Embassy. In the present atmosphere of austerity this might not be easy for you to achieve.

32. On the other hand I think we should recognize frankly that if we value cultural exchanges, and give weight to the desirability of achieving some reasonable degree of reciprocity, then in due course real efforts will be necessary to accomplish this. Providing these efforts are made, I think we could obtain a very satisfactory balance. If these efforts are not made, we will not.

33. In any case I do not think we should aim at a one-for-one balance. Canada's cultural resources and wealth are by no means as great as those of the U.S.S.R., which has much older cultural traditions and a vastly greater population. When I was discussing this question some time ago with Madame Furtseva, she said she would be quite prepared to accept a one-for-one balance in exchanges with Canada. This was in reply to my statement that I did not demand this, but did expect a less imbalanced relationship than that which we enjoyed at present.

34. To sum up, I think that the problem lies largely in our own hands, and the extent to which we will resolve it depends on decisions, most of which will not be easy or without cost, which the Canadian authorities can take, and indeed must take, whether consciously or by tacitly letting matters more or less ride.

35. I apologize for the imperfect organization and style of this exposition which I have dictated hastily, just before leaving Moscow for home leave. I apologize also for not sending these long-promised comments many months ago.

36. In conclusion may I suggest that even if the difficulties at the Ottawa end should make decisions difficult for the time being on some of the more far-reaching, costly or politically difficult issues which I have raised, it would, I think, be very desirable that serious continuing thought be given at your end to working out a list of projects which it might be desirable to suggest, whether directly through this Embassy to the Soviet authorities, or indirectly to suggest to some appropriate Canadian impresario operating on an international scale. I would like to see thought given by the Department, presumably in consultation with the Canada Council and other appropriate bodies in Canada, in working out such a list. This should include not only Canadian theatrical or musical groups and artists, but also exhibitions. Developing ideas in this field may make possible some improvement in at least one side of reciprocity, even without solving some of the thornier problems indicated above.

THE PRINCES AND THE CONFERENCE

Pushkin has now told MacDonald that it will be impossible to hold a plenary session without criticism of Boun Oum whom he calls "that impossible Prince." If the Plenary were held, he as well as the rest of the Communist representatives would be very critical. In these circumstances, MacDonald persuaded Pushkin to drop the idea of Plenary for the moment. A meeting between the Co-Chairmen and the three Princes is scheduled for this afternoon and a reception in honour of the three Princes for this evening. Boun Oum and Phoumi finally have been persuaded by Western delegations to attend both.

2. MacDonald told Harriman, Roux and me this morning that Pushkin is angry not repeat not only about the impasse in negotiations but also because in his talk with Phoumi, the latter acted as a general talking to a private. Pushkin is becoming very impatient about the situation which he describes as "impossible and dangerous." He has told MacDonald that if the Conference founders, the ceasefire cannot repeat cannot continue. He and the other Communists, he claims, thought that Phoumi and Boun Oum received instalment of four million in aid in order to come to Geneva to form a coalition government. Communists profess surprise that Phoumi continues to block agreement and are once more beginning to suspect that USA may be behind his intransigence.

3. Phoumi and Boun Oum continue to be impossibly difficult. When invited to meet with the Co-Chairmen and the other Princes, Boun Oum said that any such meeting would have to be informal and in a villa rather than at the Palais. Pushkin told Boun Oum that the meeting would be in the Palais or not repeat not at all and MacDonald backed him up on this. Yesterday, when MacDonald officially invited Boun Oum and Phoumi to the meeting with the Co-Chairmen, Phoumi rejected the invitation. MacDonald refused to accept the rejection. Harriman instructed Brown “to put on the heat” and this plus further British persuasion seems to have brought Boun Oum and Phoumi around to acceptance.

4. Boun Oum also told MacDonald that he would not repeat not meet à trois with the other Princes but that he would accept an invitation from MacDonald. The latter thereupon invited the three Princes to a dinner tonight at which MacDonald and Warner will be the only non-Laotians present and at which the Princes will be invited to talk in Lao. The effects of all the Western representations to Boun Oum and Phoumi obviously have not repeat not been substantial. Phoumi remains rigid about matters of substance and MacDonald this morning described his and Warner’s meeting with Phoumi and Boun Oum yesterday by saying that they “had talked for five hours with a lunatic.” Of course, MacDonald told us “there was a fourth presence in the room looming in the background. The presence was mere bulk with the physique of an elephant and the brain of a flea and this presence listened in silence and humility to the words of the great General Phoumi,” whom MacDonald described as “a pocket Napoleon who is prepared to destroy his own country and Southeast Asia for the sake of his own selfish ambitions.” MacDonald summed up his impression of Phoumi by saying that he has a tendency towards mental unbalance. He is not repeat not a normal decent citizen but a megalomaniac.

5. This portrayal of Phoumi is harsh but it is shared by Harriman who told us this morning that he has “been alone in saying these things in USA.” Harriman, who was not repeat not accompanied by advisers at this morning’s meeting, was very frank and expressed opinion that “[this] man is willing to destroy his country and is most dangerous.”

6. During their long session with Phoumi and Boun Oum yesterday, MacDonald and Warner asked Phoumi what he thought would happen if the Geneva Conference broke off as a result of his refusal to permit the formation of a coalition Government. Phoumi did not repeat not reply directly but said that he would utterly refuse to accept Souvanna Phouma’s proposals concerning the Defence and Interior portfolios – “It would jeopardize my control of the army.”

7. Phoumi told MacDonald that the Co-Chairmen should not repeat not have invited Boun Oum and Phoumi to Geneva. He wanted to know why the invitation had been extended and said that he and Boun Oum had come only to find out this (Harriman pointed out that this was not repeat not true. They had come because Laotian Cabinet had decided they had to come in order to obtain the current four-million-dollar aid payment. He added that if USA payments stopped, it was possible that most of Phoumi’s supporters would desert him.)

8. Phoumi stated emphatically that he would not repeat not discuss the composition of a government in Geneva, since this would be an insult to the King. Harriman told us that when Phoumi had said the same thing to him he had pointed out that Phoumi had not repeat not been so concerned about insulting the King in December 1960, when he attacked Vientiane. This rejoinder apparently had jarred Phoumi badly.

9. Phoumi had told MacDonald that Souvanna Phouma had been given a chance to form a government and that he had failed; therefore, all the arrangements between Boun Oum and Souvanna, and between the King and Souvanna are now past history and no repeat no longer binding. The only solution left, according to Phoumi, is for the King to head a new government as Prime Minister with a Deputy Prime Minister from each of the three parties. Under this arrangement Souvanna could have the Ministry of Defence. Warner drew Phoumi’s attention to the two main objections to this scheme: first of all, the King would not repeat not agree to it, and secondly the plan would solve nothing because for eight months the work of the Geneva Conference has been based on the assumption that the basis of any agreement would be a coalition government under Souvanna Phouma. Phoumi was not repeat not impressed. He said that the King would accept the arrangement if the three Princes put it before him and if USA, UK and France would endorse it. If Communists did not repeat not like the plan they could, said Phoumi, “be frightened into liking it by the Western Powers.” Although Phoumi did not repeat not say so explicitly, MacDonald and Warner are both convinced that he is prepared to fight for Southern Laos and that he is sure that he will receive help in any such undertaking. (Alternatively, he may think that with SEATO support and, if necessary, with a USA threat to use nuclear weapons, or even with only Thai support, he is strong enough to drive the Communists out of Laos.) At the moment, however, he professes to want a peaceful settlement with the King as Prime Minister.

10. MacDonald asked Phoumi why he could not repeat not accept Souvanna’s proposals. When Phoumi replied that Souvanna was too weak to head a government, MacDonald pointed out to him (and to Boun Oum who was sitting silently nearby) that there are lots of Prime Ministers who are only silent figureheads. Finally Phoumi admitted his fear that acceptance of Souvanna as Prime Minister would be too much of a risk for him and plaintively asked “Why didn’t the King call upon me to form a government?” Phoumi’s last words to MacDonald at yesterday’s meeting were “You must not repeat not ask me to give up control of the army.”

11. Harriman clearly welcomed MacDonald’s assessment of Phoumi, which reinforced his own views, and when he asked me for my opinion I said that, largely on the basis of Mayrand’s reports, I had reached the same conclusions about Phoumi’s motives and his unreliability. Harriman told us that it would be much better if Phoumi had no repeat no part at all in the government, but that if he had to have a position then it should be something like Minister of Public Works. He told us that Phoumi had recently been on the point of reopening hostilities, but that USA had blocked him. Harriman had told President Kennedy what he thought of Phoumi but he admitted to us that Brown did not repeat not altogether agree with him. Harriman had told State Department last September that Phoumi would never accept a coalition government and this talk along these lines was all pretence. He intended to wreck the Conference and has not repeat not changed his intentions.

12. Harriman told us very emphatically that “Phoumi must be pushed out. The RLG is really no repeat no government at all. It came into being only because it was backed by the Pentagon. It has been a puppet of the Pentagon and now it has become a monster. Sarit is egging Phoumi on and he depends on Sarit, but our difficulties in Laos have been due to the fact that CIA, the Pentagon and State Department have been working at cross purposes. Most of the fault lies with the Pentagon and not repeat not with CIA.” Harriman was firm in his views, but he told us that the only thing he had not repeat not decided was the exact time he would see Phoumi and tell him that USA was closing the door on him. There is a danger, Harriman recognizes, that the whole right wing in Laos may come down with Phoumi; on the other hand it is possible that when it is made clear that USA support [would be?] withdrawn, Phoumi’s friends may desert him and maintain a conservative force which is nevertheless prepared to reach an agreement with Souvanna. Brown, said Harriman, has been too delicate in his treatment of Phoumi. USA has to place its reliance on Souvanna.

13. Harriman is seeing Phoumi and Boun Oum today<sup>1</sup> and although he will not repeat not make the final break he intends to say that if Phoumi wants to destroy Laos he should persist in his present behaviour. Harriman, at the same time, is carrying on talks with Souvanna who called on him yesterday and continued their conversation of January 16.<sup>2</sup> Boun Oum plans to leave Geneva tomorrow and we hope Western delegations will obtain assurance that Phoumi will be able to negotiate during his absence.

Telegram 44 from Laosdel (attached†) reports the present state of negotiations concerning proposals for a Proclamation of Cease Fire to be made by a unified Laotian Government.

2. You will recall that negotiations took place for several weeks last year between the three parties in Laos on proposals for a Cease Fire Agreement, and that negotiations were finally abandoned without an agreement having been reached. Accordingly, the Conference, when it drafted Article 9 of the Protocol giving the Commission a role in supervising and controlling the cease-fire, provided that the Commission would exercise its functions "within the framework of the cease-fire agreement or cease-fire arrangements made by the three political forces in Laos or the Royal Government of Laos."

3. The U.S. has been trying for some time, and without success, to bring the Soviet bloc to agree to giving the Commission some role with regard to the problem of "private armies." They appear now to be trying to accomplish this by including a reference to the integration of forces in a Proclamation of Cease Fire which it is proposed Souvanna Phouma would make on assuming office, thus bringing the question of integration of forces within the Commission's jurisdiction through Article 9.

4. Telegram 44 gives the various proposals that have been advanced how this might best be accomplished, and our Y-27, attached† for your signature, if you agree, comments on these proposals.<sup>3</sup>

Telegrams 45† and 46† from Laosdel (attached) set forth the western proposals for a Declaration of Neutrality to be made by the Government of Laos. This Declaration would form part of the Declaration on Neutrality of the thirteen (telegram 2055 of December 18 from Laosdel, attached†) and therefore would form part of the final Agreement. The Declaration was formulated to include the relevant points covered in the Declaration of the thirteen and in the Zurich communiqué of the three Princes of June 22, 1961.<sup>4</sup> (Laos Conference document 18, attached.)

2. The most important part of this Declaration is Article 2, providing that Laos will not join in any military alliance inconsistent with its neutrality. You will recall that agreement has not yet been achieved on some provision withdrawing the protection of SEATO from Laos. The Soviet bloc, and particularly the Chinese, are insisting that in withdrawing their protection the SEATO powers must mention that organization by name. The SEATO powers hope to be able to avoid this, and would prefer merely to take note of a declaration similar to that in Article 2 of the proposed wording. It is therefore important that the Laotian Declaration should not make specific reference to SEATO, and fortunately the wording of the Zurich Agreement provides a precedent for silence on this point.

3. The draft declaration includes an optional paragraph stating that the Government of Laos will not use or threaten the use of force. We agree with our Delegation that this concept is adequately covered by other parts of the Declaration.

LAOS

The United States Delegation at Geneva has, as you know, been putting forward for discussion a number of possible alternatives to putting full pressure on Phoumi and Boun Oum to agree to the establishment of a Coalition government. Their reason for doing so appears to be that President Kennedy wished every possibility to be explored before making the crucial decision. The Americans have not advanced the various suggestions with much appearance of conviction.

Ronning's telegram No. 76 of January 18† reports on proposals for modifying the composition of the Coalition Cabinet in ways that might be more acceptable to the Vientiane group. He describes this as "political juggling as a means of avoiding anything in the way of shock treatment." Attached for your signature, if you agree, is a telegram commenting on these proposals.

THE PRINCES AND THE CONFERENCE

I share your strong reservations concerning utility of "carrot type" solutions that have so far been put forward by USA Delegation, and I am particularly disturbed by indications you have had that certain elements might be prepared to contemplate continuation of present most unsatisfactory situation in Laos into indefinite future. Although our direct concern is of course for highly unsatisfactory position in which Commission would find itself in a situation of that kind, we find it hard to see what USA could hope to gain. Apart from ever present danger of resumption of hostilities, which we agree with you is very grave, we do not see that passage of time would either improve chances of Phoumi becoming more amenable or improve his military strength in relation to what all reports indicate is steadily growing strength of Pathet Lao forces. Pathet Lao now hold some areas adjacent to South Vietnam, and are extending political influence through areas they hold all over Laos. Every indication therefore would point to a more unsatisfactory solution with passage of time.

2. Danger of proposed solutions now being advanced is that they do not appear to be nearly attractive enough to be likely to sway Phoumi (who would appear from conversation reported in your telegram 77 to be unprepared to accept any solution that did not leave him with control of army) but that they might, if put to Souvanna, reawaken his suspicions of American intentions.

3. Indication of division between Harriman and other members of USA Delegation on assessment of Phoumi's utility is interesting. With passage of time value of having Western interests represented in Laotian Cabinet by person such as Phoumi is becoming increasingly doubtful.

LAOS: POLITICAL SITUATION

Boun Oum and Phoumi left Geneva a.m. on January 20 as planned. As when they arrived, MacDonald and Pushkin were on hand along with all other delegations except the other Communist delegations. Boun Oum read a prepared statement to the press and answered some questions; he was polite, urbane and said nothing new. Phoumi, who also was polite, was a little more pointed in answering questions. He confirmed that it is his view that the question of the French presence is something to be worked out between the Government of Laos and the French Government and that, for this reason, he was not repeat not particularly happy about Article 5 of the Protocol which would make some provision for the French presence. On the question of formation of a government he is reported to have said "We will agree to renounce our claim to the ministries of Defence and Interior only if Prince Souvanna Phouma gives us good reasons for taking them himself."

2. After lunch on January 20 I saw Souphanouvong. In the evening I met with MacDonald, Harriman and Roux to review the situation. Our respective advisers and Ambassador Brown were also present. After the meeting we saw Harriman off to Washington. At the meeting we discussed chiefly the tactics to be pursued by the Western Three outside the Conference, and the question of what, if anything, the Conference should do in the immediate future. On the evening of January 21 we had a further meeting of the Four on the latter subject, following an interview which MacDonald had had with Pushkin and addressed ourselves to a renewed Communist demand for a plenary session. However, I am reporting on this development in a separate telegram.†

3. On January 21, MacDonald gave the other members of the group copies of a letter from Souvanna to the Co-Chairmen covering a "joint communiqué" which the three Princes did indeed sign at the conclusion of their meeting on January 19 (8 of our reference telegram). The text of this letter and its enclosure are in a following telegram.† You will note that Souvanna has requested that the enclosures be treated as confidential, at least for the time being.

4. It was generally agreed at the meeting of the Four on January 21 that the three Western ambassadors should renew contacts with Phoumi on his return to Vientiane with the object of taking such diplomatic action as might be best calculated to encourage him to give a favourable response to Souvanna on the question of the key ministries. At the same time, it was recognized that the main burden in this regard would have to be carried by Brown, and it was agreed that the Co-Chairmen should refrain at this time from any further messages to the Princes. It was also the American view that any effort by the Commission to influence Phoumi in the right direction would be “counter-productive” at this time. Brown commented that Avtar Singh is a sensible man and that he anticipated no repeat no difficulty in this regard.

5. On timing Brown said he expected Phoumi and Boun Oum to report to the King in Luang Prabang on January 22 and that he, Brown, would reach Vientiane the same day and would see Phoumi on January 23.

6. While Boun Oum will presumably be occupied with the funeral ceremonies of his mother until January 27 or 28, Phoumi has told the Americans the he must explain the situation to other members of the Government in Vientiane as well as to members of the Assembly and Party supporters. You will recall that, before leaving for Geneva, Boun Oum had taken an adamant stand in an address to the Assembly. On the face of it, therefore, Phoumi’s intention is to explain the position in the light of conversations in Geneva and to seek backing for a reply to Souvanna on the key ministries which would facilitate a settlement.

7. However, looking down the course to be followed, it is impossible not repeat not to recognize several obstacles which could be formidable. First is a matter of timing and procedure. Souvanna told the French and Americans, and they are satisfied that this is the case, that he had been assured by Boun Oum that Phoumi would arrange to have an answer on the question of the key portfolios in Souvanna’s hands early this week; it was evidently just question of a little time being needed for the necessary consultations in Vientiane. On the other hand, the Americans seem to have understood from Phoumi that Boun Oum’s answer would be given to Souvanna after the latter’s return to Laos. Phoumi’s people have taken the line with the Americans and with us that Souvanna has promised to meet the other two Princes again in Luang Prabang on January 27 (or 28).

8. On January 21, Brown told us that Phoumi had indicated to him that he could hardly let Souvanna have an answer before the middle of this week; Brown himself thought that it was unlikely to be forthcoming until toward the end of the week. Today Roux told us that he had learned from a member of Phoumi’s delegation that no repeat no answer would be given to Souvanna until he returns to Laos. Roux had passed this information to Souvanna, who was annoyed by it.

9. A second procedural obstacle is the fact that members of the RLG delegation have told both the Americans and ourselves that Souvanna assured Boun Oum that, if the Princes could not repeat not resolve their differences over the key portfolios, it would be left to the King to decide. On the other hand, you will note that the joint communiqué of January 19 says “The final disposition of portfolios will be made by Prince Souvanna Phouma, it was mutually agreed.”

10. A third obstacle is more substantial. A member of the Phoumi delegation, whom we regard as a reliable source, has told us that it is the intention of the Government of Vientiane to reply to Souvanna that the ministries of Defence and the Interior should go to “Vientiane neutrals.” We have told the British, American and French delegations. The British commented that we might as well expect the Vientiane side to try a gambit of this kind. All felt that such a reply would not repeat not advance a settlement because it is impossible to think of any individual “Vientiane neutrals” to whom Souphanouvong, or, for that matter, Souvanna would be likely to be prepared to allocate these two key ministries. The French agreed with us that it would be undesirable to mention the above possibilities to Souvanna.

11. Another, though probably secondary, substantial difficulty arises of the competing claims for the ministries of Finance, Foreign Affairs and Information. Since the Vientiane side are apparently not repeat not particularly interested in the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, and since Souphanouvong is not repeat not asking for it, there would seem no repeat no difficulty about its going to the centre. On the other hand, at the moment, there are three competing claims for the ministries of the Interior and it seems possible that Souvanna might be reluctant to see Finance go to the right wing.

12. On a point of detail (paragraph 3 of our reference telegram) the present plan is that the total number of members of the Cabinet, including the Prime Minister, should be eighteen.

13. On the question of the ratio, in the centre, between Souvanna's supporters and Vientiane neutrals, Harriman has asked Roux to urge on Souvanna that instead of either seven to three (desired by Souphanouvong) or six to four (desired by Boun Oum), the ratio should be five to five. Harriman says this would be most desirable from the point of view of public presentation and allocation of funds in USA.

14. A dialogue is going on between the French and the Americans over the proposed use by the RLG of the Seno Base for the deployment of a considerable number of troops accompanied by American instructors. We understand that, for the moment, the Americans are not repeat not pressing this proposal but that, at the same time, they are maintaining that they should be allowed to implement it at any time if this is considered necessary, since the Base has been used for this purpose in the past.

15. Sullivan has told the Four that Harriman had sent instructions to Young in Bangkok once more to make clear to the Thai Government USA attitude toward a settlement in Laos and that, at Harriman's request, the President had sent a message to Sarit in what Sullivan thought were very helpful terms.<sup>7</sup> It is our impression that the intention behind the messages is to persuade the Thais to cooperate in the endeavour to make Phoumi see sense.

16. During our recent meetings with the Western Three there has been no repeat no disposition to discuss the situation with a view to reaching a common appraisal. However, certain attitudes, within the group and outside it, are clearly discernible.

17. Lall is cautiously optimistic but the Burmese representative is cynical. The Communist outlook is sceptical. The Russians still seem to be working hard for a settlement but Pushkin, in his recent conversations with MacDonald, has drawn attention to the danger of renewal of hostilities on a significant scale. He has covered himself by pointing only to alleged activities or build-up of Phoumi's forces, but he may also have in mind the possibility of the Communists re-opening a military offensive. Both Souvanna and Souphanouvong, when I talked to them recently, referred to two fairly recent attacks they said had been carried out by the other side, and to a substantial build-up which they claim is at present being made south of Xieng Khouang. Souphanouvong, who claimed that small-scale attacks by the other side are going on right now, declared that he had given orders to his forces to take defensive action only but expressed himself worried about the unpredictable intentions of Phoumi. He argued that the sudden change in Phoumi's attitude while in Geneva is to be explained as reflecting a realistic reaction, at least for the time being, to the military situation in Laos. Roux, who also talked to Souphanouvong recently, found him very relaxed and confident, especially with regard to his strength on the ground in Laos. It is possible to regard these Communist attitudes as nothing more grave than a form of pressure; but there is no repeat no doubt that the situation is inherently unstable.

18. On the political front Souphanouvong, agreeably surprised by the modification in Phoumi's attitude while here, remains highly sceptical of the latter's willingness to reach a settlement. He made it clear that he is not repeat not committed to meet the other two Princes again in Laos. While he has mentioned personal security as a problem with regard to a further meeting in Luang Prabang, I think his general attitude toward a further meeting and toward further negotiations in general will depend to a large extent on the nature of the reply which Boun Oum makes to Souvanna on the key ministries.

19. The Chinese attitude, expressed to me privately by Chang Han-Fu on January 18, was one of profound scepticism regarding the genuineness of USA efforts to persuade Phoumi to settle. They are convinced that Phoumi will continue to evade the issue at least until USA really applies economic and financial sanctions which they say [it] will not repeat not do. They were incidentally scornful in the extreme of the whole concept of "Vientiane neutrals," which they say is an invention of Harriman. They made no repeat no military threats but they expressed bewilderment as to how we could keep the Conference going much longer. They seem prepared to think in terms of an agreement being reached before some time in February at the latest but I am convinced that their attitude is hardening and that they will want to see real progress in the near future.

20. So far at least, Souvanna remains hopeful and determined to reach an early agreement with the other two Princes. While the British and French are only prudently hopeful, Harriman went away in an optimistic frame of mind. My appreciation is still essentially that in my reference telegram. I think that Phoumi will continue to temporize as much as he can and that, if USA still wants a settlement of the Laos question in the foreseeable future, they will have to accept the unpleasant necessity of applying sufficient pressure on Phoumi to bring this about.

21. I can understand USA reluctance to apply final pressure to Phoumi and, while I believe that they may still have to come to this, I hope they can avoid it. In present circumstances, the minimum essential requirement would seem to be that USA stand firm in their previous support of the ministries of Defence and the Interior going to Souvanna Phouma nominees. I do not repeat not question the vital role of these ministries in relation to the elections which will determine the short-term future in Laos; but readiness or otherwise to entrust these ministries to Souvanna is really a touchstone of the new USA approach to the Laotian problem, and USA has already expressed their readiness publicly.

22. I am encouraged by the views expressed in your reference telegram and I would hope the main considerations which weigh with you are also being given full weight by those who are making USA policy on a day-to-day basis. One would judge from Harriman's attitude and from what we understand to be the President's point of view, that this is the case. Nevertheless, I am not repeat not yet sure that we can altogether discount the influence of those who still seem inclined to think in terms of a rather indefinite prolongation of negotiations. This tendency, if press reports are accurate, was given some substance by the remarks about Laos attributed to Secretary of State Dean Rusk in his January 18 press conference.<sup>8</sup> He is reported, for example, to have said that it should not repeat not be assumed that, if the three political Princes fail to reach a quick solution on a coalition government, there will be a fresh outbreak of fighting in Laos, and that USA believes there is a basis for more detailed negotiations among the three Princes on the coalition Cabinet which is to be formed. In substance I would not repeat not quarrel with either of these statements but, taken together, they seem to reflect a lack of awareness of the sort of individual USA has to deal with in Phoumi.

TALK WITH SOUPHANOUVONG

In addition to the points covered in my telegram 85 the following, which emerged from my talk with Souphanouvong on January 20, may be of interest.

2. When I suggested that the main reason why Boun Oum and Phoumi had adopted a more reasonable attitude while in Geneva was that USA and her friends had been exerting a healthy influence on them, Souphanouvong expressed doubt and referred to the continuing presence of MAAG officers with Phoumi groups which he said are harassing his forces. He believes that the MAAG officers are encouraging Phoumi forces in these activities. I assured Souphanouvong that, to the best of my knowledge, all USA activities in Laos including that of the MAAG officers are coordinated under State Department policy which is that laid down in accordance with the wishes of the President and Harriman. Souphanouvong merely said he hopes that I am right and that, if I am, this policy will show results.

3. To the suggestion that Phoumi might have failed to come closer to agreement in Geneva because of the need, so to speak, to save face, Souphanouvong seemed sceptical because of the effect he fears the Vientiane atmosphere will have on Phoumi following his return. He agreed, however, that the influence of the Conference on Boun Oum and Phoumi must have been constructive and that it was useful for the three Princes to meet here.

4. In response to a question from me Souphanouvong said that Chiang Kai-Shek forces are an increasingly significant element in Laos. According to him they are now to be seen in considerable numbers in the Central part as well as in the North.

5. Souphanouvong said that he had not repeat not yet decided the date of his departure from Geneva.

LAOS: PROSPECTS FOR A SETTLEMENT

Souphanouvong, who leaves Geneva tomorrow, returned my call today. He reverted to his anxiety about the military situation in Laos. He referred to UPI and AFP reports of an attack by RLG forces in battalion strength in the Mahaxsay area, while the Princes were in Geneva and implied they were based on fact.<sup>9</sup>

2. Souphanouvong once more alluded to two build-ups, also in battalion strength, which he claims are taking place, one in the Thathome-Paksane area south of Xieng Khouang, and the other north of Luang Prabang, we think in the region of Muong Sai. According to Souphanouvong, these build-ups, and projected attacks to be based on them, were planned in Vientiane with the assistance of MAAG officers, and MAAG officers are with Laotians in both places.

3. I again told Souphanouvong that my information is that USA policy is, through its MAAG officers, to restrain any tendencies on the part of Phoumi to take the offensive. I also reminded him of the completely unsatisfactory position of the ICC as an instrument for controlling the military situation in present circumstances; it lacked both accurate information and power to investigate. However, like Souphanouvong, I deplored the continuance of a state of hostilities in Laos and hoped for an early political settlement.

4. Souphanouvong did not repeat not dispute the unsatisfactory condition of the Commission but also stressed his own desire for an early political settlement. He said he hopes I am right about USA restraint of Phoumi through the MAAG officers; the future behaviour of Phoumi's forces, particularly in the two areas he had mentioned, would show whether I was right or not repeat not. He was afraid that Phoumi intends to make one more effort to settle the issue by force during the next two months which remain before the rainy season sets in again. Any such effort, he warned, could only have a bad effect on the prospects for a settlement. He hoped that we and others might do what we could to make sure that the Americans understand the situation.

5. The alleged attack in the Mahaxsay area was the subject of some comment from Communist delegations at the plenary session. At a meeting of the Four the day before the session, Sullivan had been concerned about the UPI report on this which had just appeared. (It was published here in the Herald Tribune on the following day, January 24.) He said that he was trying to get a report on the facts before the plenary session. He declared that if the RLG had really launched an offensive of the kind reported, that would mean the cutting off of military aid. He doubted if the facts could be as reported; at any rate, Malloy, who wrote the UPI report, was known to be a sensationalist journalist. As it turned out Sullivan apparently received no repeat no report on the facts until after the plenary session, but he told us yesterday shortly before leaving Geneva for Washington via Hague (he is now going to work on New Guinea in the State Department) that he had now received information that the military situation in Laos was fortunately quite quiet.

6. When I sought Souphanouvong's present views on the prospects for the formation of a government, I found him pretty unbending. He confirmed that he would never agree to the Vientiane side having Defence, Interior or Foreign Affairs. He realizes that the only basis on which Phoumi has indicated that he might be prepared to give up Defence and Interior, is his side getting instead two of Foreign Affairs, Finance or Information, but as far as Souphanouvong is concerned, Phoumi can have either Finance or Information, the other going to Souphanouvong. He did not repeat not seem to care which, as long as his party also got the Ministry of Economic Planning, not repeat not so far regarded as a key ministry.

7. On the procedural side, Souphanouvong's attitude also seemed stiff. He is obviously seeking to counteract any further effort by Phoumi to spin things out. When I expressed the hope that he would soon find it possible to meet again with the other two Princes in Laos, he declared that, once there is an answer from Phoumi agreeing to the Defence and Interior ministries going to Souvanna Phouma supporters, the problem of formation of a government is as good as solved. There would really be no repeat no need for any further meeting to discuss details; it would be just a question of each leader nominating the necessary number of Ministers and Secretaries of State. He seemed to envisage the government actually being formed in the Plaine des Jarres, and then moving to Luang Prabang to present it to the King for formal investiture.

8. I suggested that, especially if Phoumi should give a qualified answer, there might well be a need for a further meeting of the Princes to discuss portfolios. I also thought that it would be a good deal easier for the Boun Oum side to contemplate a meeting in Luang Prabang rather than in the Plaine des Jarres. Souphanouvong seemed pretty adamant about not repeat not returning to Luang Prabang before the formation of a government. The last time he went there, he had to go with a strong escort and he did not repeat not like doing this. He more than once mentioned the five months he had spent in jail in Vientiane in 1958, and he really seemed to have this problem of personal security on his mind. The only chink in his armour on the procedural side, was an indication that, if Boun Oum's answer was such as to seem to require further discussion among the Princes, he would be prepared to negotiate but it would be up to Souvanna Phouma to decide what to do.

9. Partly in response to questions on my part, Souphanouvong gave some interesting information about present and future trends in economic development of Laos as seen from Xieng Khouang. He wants transportation in terms of both road and rail for main arteries, supplemented by the use of small airplanes. The Xieng Khouang administration have already started building two roads. On the air side, Souphanouvong said he had been impressed, when in Moscow, with a small bi-plane called, we think, the AM-2, and had persuaded Souvanna Phouma to accept two on a trial basis. We said we thought Otters and Beavers are pretty good; he agreed but said the Otter was too big for what he had in mind and the Beaver was less stable than the AM-2. When I asked about stocks of oil and petrol, Souphanouvong surprised me by saying that the stocks they had received from USSR were sufficient to last three years at the present rate of consumption and perhaps, two years if peaceful requirements were to increase. Souphanouvong said that a large number of Laotian soldiers would have to be returned to civil life, and he freely conceded that Xieng Khouang forces have far more arms and ammunition than they know what to do with.

10. Sullivan attended a dinner given by Vongvichit a fortnight ago, prior to Souphanouvong's arrival. However, Vongvichit made an uncompromising attack on USA Laotian policy at the plenary session on January 24, and members of USA delegation, though invited to Souphanouvong's reception yesterday, boycotted it. As they may therefore be out of touch with Souphanouvong's present line of thought, I am going to inform them of the substance of my interview with him, particularly with regard to the relationship of the military situation to the prospects for a settlement.

LAOS

We share concern felt by Foreign Office at prospect of continued delay in reaching political settlement in Laos. As long as no agreement is reached on composition of government, danger will continue that military incidents might give rise to general hostilities which Commission would be able to do little to curb. Uncertainty will also remain and perhaps increase as to whether agreement worked out at Geneva will ever become operative. Moreover, if Vietcong should suffer severe reverses in Vietnam during this period, and if for this or some other reason Soviet Government should decide to leave Communist initiative in Laos primarily to Chinese, these external complications could adversely affect prospects of reaching satisfactory international settlement on Laos.

2. It is clear also that while principally interested Western powers are now substantially agreed on specific objectives in Laos (including type of government required if provisional Geneva settlement is to become effective) this agreement is still resolutely opposed by Phoumi and bulk of his supporters in army and administration. Since it must be apparent that scope for further modifications in composition of a coalition government has by now been narrowed almost to vanishing point, and since moral support and material assistance of friendly neighbours alone could not be expected to maintain Phoumi in even his present territorially limited power for more than a few months, only plausible explanation for his intransigence is that he still refuses to believe that USA is finally committed to kind of settlement agreed on at Geneva.

3. There would appear to be only two means by which this deadlock can be broken. First would be a renewal of military operations by Pathet Lao forces (with such support from Kong Le's troops as they could get) to bring about total defeat of Phoumi's army. It seems probable that Soviet Union and possible that Chinese Communists are sufficiently apprehensive of dangers of this course to want to avert it if possible, at least in immediate future. Nevertheless this is a possibility that cannot be excluded if some solution to problem of government is not found. Its effect would almost certainly be extension of full Communist control to whole of Laos.

4. Second means of ending deadlock would be application of additional pressure by USA sufficient to force Phoumi and his supporters into line. Withholding of financial support has so far proved ineffective, and despite rising prices in Vientiane and other signs of strain it is possible that Phoumi might be able to carry on financially for several months by drawing on reserves and by securing additional help from other countries. Withholding gasoline and other consumable supplies would be effective only with full Thai co-operation, and of this (despite Sarit's assurances to Harriman) there appears some doubt. Given stocks of military equipment now held by Laotian army, even a complete ban on further military supplies would probably not be immediately effective. Withdrawal of all American military advisers might have effect of reducing ability of USA to exert restraining influence on local commanders.

5. More important in long term than these practical difficulties of applying adequate pressure, however, is maintenance of balance of political forces in Laos. If pressures were of such a nature as drastically to weaken the group now supporting Phoumi, there would clearly be a danger that they might destroy this balance and so defeat their purpose. Souvanna himself, while publicly expressing conviction that USA military sanctions against Phoumi are now essential, has given clear indications of realizing that durability of a neutral government under his leadership would largely depend on maintenance of such a balance of forces. Moreover it is evident that if Thais and South Vietnamese are ever to be brought to full acceptance of settlement worked out at Geneva, they must be convinced that a neutral and independent Laos has some real prospect of continued viability.

6. It will be apparent that we fully recognize difficulty and delicacy of decisions USA Government will have to make if Geneva settlement is to be made effective and dangerous alternatives avoided. At same time we wish Americans to be aware of our anxiety that undue delay may jeopardize prospects for settlement, and we would welcome fuller information on what they would regard as most practicable and hopeful means of applying additional pressure. You should accordingly seek early opportunity for discussion of this problem at appropriately senior level in State Department.

[Ottawa], May 15, 1962

LAOS

The situation in Laos has again become critical, mainly as a result of military developments in the northern region bordering on Communist China and Burma. Following a skirmish at Nam Tha on May 7, the troops of General Phoumi fled in haste and apparently in some confusion toward the Thai border where some 2,000 of them are reported to have crossed into Thailand and been disarmed. At least part of the territory abandoned by the Vientiane forces has been occupied by the Pathet Lao, who have thus advanced well beyond the Cease-Fire line of May, 1961.

2. Neither the precise sequence of military events nor the underlying intentions of the various Laotian factions is yet altogether clear. Each side has charged the other with provocation and a flagrant breach of the provisional Cease-Fire. Each has claimed that non-Laotian troops (North Vietnamese and Chinese Communists on the one side; Thai, South Vietnamese and Chinese nationalists on the other) participated in the fighting. There is however no confirmation that Chinese Communist troops were involved, although a limited quantity of military equipment may have been supplied recently by Peking to the Pathet Lao, and there are other indications of increasing Chinese interest in the situation.

3. Both the Pathet Lao and the Vientiane Government could have had reasons for instigating a military flareup at this time. The persistent refusal of General Phoumi's group to agree to a political solution along the lines worked out at Geneva, even in the face of strong American pressure, has probably proved increasingly irksome to the Pathet Lao; the fighting could therefore have been intended as a warning to Phoumi to agree now or suffer total defeat. On the other hand, Phoumi had been aware for some time before the outbreak that American pressure on him was about to be increased, and he may quite possibly have concluded that a serious military clash would hardly fail to involve the United States in his support.

4. Reaction by the great powers has, on the whole, been cautious and restrained. The British and Americans immediately and strongly urged the Soviet Government to exercise a moderating influence on the Pathet Lao with a view to restoring the Cease-Fire. While the considered Russian response is not yet known, there have been a number of indications that the Russians continue to profess support for a neutralist solution. If Phoumi expected the United States Government to abandon its pursuit of the neutralist solution, he has been disappointed: the American response has combined precautionary military moves with continued pressure for the formation of a coalition government under Prince Souvanna Phouma. The sending of the United States Naval Task Force to Southeast Asian waters appears to have been intended partly to induce reflection in the Communist capitals, partly to reassure the Thais and other regional allies, and partly to disarm domestic criticism of the continued pursuit of a neutralist solution. Comment from Peking has not so far been particularly strident or threatening.

5. Despite the atmosphere of crisis resulting from the military developments, therefore, it would seem unnecessary to assume that the prospects for a political settlement of the kind envisaged at Geneva have become more remote. They may even have become somewhat brighter. Phoumi appears at long last to be more or less reconciled to the formation of a coalition government. The Pathet Lao has reiterated its adherence to the agreed solution. Souvanna has announced his intention to leave Paris for Laos on May 19 and to convene immediately thereafter a tripartite meeting of the parties.

6. As in previous violations, the Commission has been prevented from conducting an investigation on the spot. The Canadian delegation has however pressed for such an investigation, and the Indian Chairman has reacted with irritation and indignation to the Polish attempts to obstruct. The Commission is expected to send a factual report within the next few days – we hope on a majority basis.

CANADIAN POSITION IN COMMISSION

We agree that everything possible should be done to preserve Commission's ability to concern itself with situation such as that which has developed in North Western Laos. Passivity at this dangerous juncture for sake of solidarity within Commission would seriously and perhaps fatally compromise principle provisionally agreed at Geneva that decisions relating to initiation and carrying out of investigations can be adopted by majority vote.

2. A report setting out Commission's efforts to supervise and clearly establishing responsibility for rebuff of those efforts would not repeat not only help to preserve that principle but might also be of considerable value in attempts now being made through diplomatic channels to restore ceasefire and achieve political settlement.

3. We are encouraged to learn that in your view Indians might quite possibly agree to such a report on majority basis. You should make every effort to attain this objective. If necessary we would be prepared to contemplate a minority report to make our position clear, but only if it was evident that the Indians would not go along with an objective report to the Co-Chairmen.

REPORT TO CO-CHAIRMEN

At informal meeting this morning draft report prepared by Avtar Singh incorporating much of our first draft met with vehement objection from Polish Commissioner Thee whose own draft dealing largely with comment on political negotiations with pronounced anti-Vientiane Party bias has made little impression on Avtar Singh's second draft.

2. Thee said he was under instructions from his government to ensure that report to Co-Chairmen should include at least all that has appeared in press over period on subject of political situation. Thee is now preparing paragraphs for insertion in our present draft to meet his requirements. Therefore it now appears that our next report to Co-Chairmen is unlikely to be agreed upon quickly since it is probable that much of Thee's material will be objectionable to it.

3. They made one remark which indicates optimism of Polish Government with regard to possibilities of early political settlement. It appears that like us Polish delegation had proposed to their government that team officers completing their tour need not repeat not be replaced for time being. However Warsaw had overruled that recommendation on grounds that they felt an early political settlement was very likely and that therefore there would be a need for team officers in near future. Consequently they are sending replacements.

REPORT TO CO-CHAIRMEN

Commission message 18 was signed today after some difficulties arising purely out of early Polish draft which insisted upon [quoting?] press and radio reports and dealing largely with political settlement and finally out [sic] of our position on question of Commission action at Ban Houei Sai. Copy is being sent by next air bag.<sup>10</sup>

2. Report is objective and deals with Commission attempts to restore ceasefire and records rebuffs received. It records that Khang Khay forces took Muongsing and Nam Tha and gives their explanations without comment. Main emphasis however is upon our visits to Khang Khay to discuss restoration of ceasefire and their<sup>11</sup> responsibilities clearly implied in consequence. This is justifiable notwithstanding our suspicions of Phoumi's coat trailing tactics (reference our telegram 153 May 28†). One paragraph is devoted to political negotiations and establishes Phoumi's responsibility for impasse. This is factual and is based upon exchange of messages between Souvanna and Phoumi through Commission.

3. Background of difficulty over Ban Houei Sai is that on May 14 I had urged Avtar Singh and Thee to agree on Commission visit there. It was not repeat not then clear whether Pathet Lao had occupied it. After we knew that it was still in hands of Vientiane party I continued to press for Commission visit to be followed by other frequent but irregular visits as being best way of establishing Commission presence without running into Polish inability to deploy team. Avtar Singh and Thee were more concerned with making report to Co-Chairmen but I insisted such report must show whatever action Commission agreed to take re Ban Houei Sai. Canadian proposal to send message to parties signifying Commission wished to visit Nam Tha and Muongsing was made at formal meeting May 8 but had been shelved as had other similar proposals in past. I therefore prepared draft statement following receipt of your telegram (Y-225?) May 15 requesting formal decision on our first proposal and suggesting early visit to Ban Houei Sai. Draft statement also made point that in Canadian view decision could be taken by majority vote. I gave copy of draft to Avtar Singh who urged me not repeat not to take formal line saying no repeat no purpose could be served and that meanwhile he must consult his government re majority decision question. In course of meetings on draft report I reiterated that we should take action to visit Ban Houei Sai and include result in report.

4. As reported earlier informal approaches to Sisouk re Commission visit to Ban Houei Sai by Avtar Singh and later by me had not repeat not received encouragement. In yesterday's meeting Thee, having agreed to include in draft report that Khang Khay authorities had told us on May 16 they had no repeat no objection to Commission going to Ban Houei Sai, said that did not repeat not constitute agreement in context of Co-Chairmen's message of May 6, 1961<sup>12</sup> and for formal Commission visit three parties must first come together and agree among themselves. He said that it was not repeat not sufficient for Commission to get agreement from parties itself.

5. At this morning's meeting I proposed sending message to parties at once requesting cooperation and assurances to make possible early visit to Ban Houei Sai. Thee refused and Avtar Singh was unwilling. I then asked that Secretary be called in and we go into formal session meanwhile handing out copies of prepared statement which put my proposal formally and asked for decision by majority vote. Avtar Singh who had apparently taken no repeat no account of my earlier draft was upset. He refused to vote on proposal saying he would first have to consult Delhi. Thee said Commission had no repeat no procedural rules yet and could not repeat not decide anything except unanimously. I refused to agree to report which left Ban Houei Sai situation practically without comment. In order to clear present report I proposed following be inserted: "In case of Ban Houei Sai Commission is considering Canadian proposal for early visit and frequent subsequent visits by Commission to allay fears and prevent alarming rumours and to reduce danger of either accidental or mischievous action which might precipitate international complications." On that basis message was signed.

6. Discussion of my proposal will continue at formal meeting June 6 when Canadian statement will be read into minutes. Meanwhile Thee has succeeded in getting message from Souvanna through Poland Delegation to effect that he will in no repeat no circumstances agree to formal Commission visit to Ban Houei Sai. Addis, with whom I discussed whole matter before meeting this morning, said he had raised question of Commission visit to Ban Houei Sai with Sisouk yesterday making much same case as that in my paragraph quoted above. Sisouk had undertaken to see Phoumi about it but Addis thinks Phoumi will not repeat not agree. Meanwhile I have told Avtar Singh and Thee we might want to have special report sent to Co-Chairmen re Ban Houei Sai situation.

PROSPECTS FOR LAOTIAN SETTLEMENT

Your reference telegrams have been very helpful to us in assessing situation which now appears rapidly approaching critical phase. We agree that extent of erosion of Souvanna's authority and degree of pressure which USA will or can exert on Phoumi are most important present factors within Laos. In wider context, outcome seems likely to depend primarily on judgments in Moscow, Peking and Washington as to each other's intentions regarding Laos and by extension whole Southeast Asian region.

2. Military developments of past month in north western and perhaps also in southern Laos, followed by Allied strengthening of Thai defences, appear to have given rise to serious doubts in both Communist and Western governments as to continued adherence of other side to terms for Laos negotiated at Geneva, despite public and private assurances from both sides that such doubts are unfounded.

3. There are some indications that a broad reassessment of Southeast Asian policy and indeed of East-West relations generally has lately been taking place in Communist capitals. It seems at least possible that more emphasis than in recent months has been given in this reassessment to desirability of repairing fissures in Communist bloc. Since Chinese are certainly more sceptical than Russians of American sincerity in pursuing Geneva policy for Laos, this could be major reason for recent stiffening in PAVN and Pathet Lao attitude towards Neutralists as well as towards Phoumi's faction. If so, prospects for settlement along Geneva lines are clearly far from bright and Souvanna's deadline may mean, as suggested in your telegram 151, that next fortnight is last chance.

4. Western Governments are now engaged in renewed efforts to convince Moscow that point of no return for Geneva type settlement in Laos has not yet been reached. British Government, after consultation with USA Government, has expressed to Soviet Government its "gravest concern" over recent military developments in Laos and its "gravest fears for peace and security in the area," and has urged Soviet Government (a) to restrain Xieng Khouang authorities from any further military action, as UK has been doing in Vientiane, and (b) to agree to immediate despatch of further instructions to ICSC to enable it to supervise and control ceasefire, thus affording opportunities for resumption of political negotiations on formation of coalition government without military duress. You will be aware that British Ambassador in Laos has been instructed to exert renewed pressure on all Laotian factions to same effect. Urgent consideration is being given in Washington to further means of forcing Phoumi into line.

5. While recognizing inherent limitations on ability of Commission to influence developments in present circumstances, we think it most important that fullest advantage should be taken of every opportunity to do so. In particular, since apprehensions in major capitals are intimately related to threat of further and more widespread violations of ceasefire, we think you should continue to press as strongly as possible for sending observation team to Ban Houei Sai, which we agree is area of greatest sensitivity at present time. We understand that Souvanna renewed to British First Secretary May 30 assurances given to you May 16 (your telegram 141 May 17†) that Xieng Khouang parties had no objection. Pressure you are maintaining on this matter in Commission and with Vientiane authorities has our fullest support. We will try to enlist assistance in Washington.

6. As regards proposed report, it seems to us that Avtar Singh's encouraging resistance to Polish demands on content have been largely nullified by his apparent unwillingness to proceed on majority basis, as Vietnam Commission is doing. A majority report along lines suggested by you and accepted by him could have been quite useful several weeks ago. We wonder however whether it may not have been overtaken by events. We wonder too whether reason for Chairman's attitude may be Indian disinclination to force Poles into minority in two Commissions simultaneously, thereby increasing doubts which may already exist in Warsaw and Moscow as to continued usefulness of Geneva structure from Communist point of view. We should be grateful for an immediate statement of your own views on these questions on desirability in present circumstances of a Canadian minority report and its possible content. We should also be interested to know whether Addis, as representative of Co-Chairman, considers that there would be any value at present in pressing for early report on either minority or majority basis.

7. Without disclosing interpretation put by Cooper on most recent events in Ban Houei Sai area, please speak urgently to State Department about importance we attach at present juncture to restraining role Commission could play if permitted to send representatives to sensitive areas, particularly Ban Houei Sai, to observe and report. You should emphasize that resistance to this is coming from Vientiane authorities and should say that we would greatly appreciate anything State Department could do to bring about removal of these obstacles, thus enabling Commission to make at least a beginning on role envisaged at Geneva.

LAOS COMMISSION

Comments on points raised in your reference telegram will be sent in a separate message.† Bridle's conversation with Gundevia yesterday did not repeat not touch on such specific questions as Commission reports but dealt rather with the general Indian attitude to the current situation in Laos and the action which the Commission might usefully take.

2. Bridle found Gundevia, as we have reported previously, to be in a generally pessimistic mood regarding the Indochina picture and the role of the Commissions. Gundevia's attitude has obviously been soured both by the pressures which have developed over Vietnam and by the frustrations facing the Commission in Laos through its own unsatisfactory terms of reference and the attitude of the parties. His generally pessimistic outlook was accompanied however by what appeared to be a reaction against pressures from all sides, particularly from the Poles, and a determination to continue the conduct of Indian policy in the Commissions along already familiar lines.

3. Referring to Laos, Gundevia outlined once again the Indian view that effective Commission action required agreement amongst its members and the cooperation of the parties. He thought however that the Commission, despite its vague and unsatisfactory terms of reference, had performed a useful function so far and expected that it would carry on in much the same way. He referred to the difficulty of giving Avtar Singh specific instructions to meet the fluid circumstances and Bridle was left with impression that the latter was operating on an ad hoc basis under a general Delhi instruction to contribute in any way possible to achievement of a peaceful settlement while at the same time avoiding a split in the Commission.

4. To Bridle's suggestion that in the present situation Commission and its teams might have a particularly useful role to play in preventing the spread of military activities while negotiations for a coalition government were proceeding, Gundevia's first impatient reaction was that Boun Oum had acted in an appallingly irresponsible manner and that the other side had every reason to be fed up. He conceded however that the Pathet Lao's reactions were equally immoral and unpredictable. He referred again to the Commission functioning effectively only by agreement among its members and with cooperation of parties. When Bridle pointed out that effective functioning had on occasion been possible because there was no repeat no enforced unanimity rule, Gundevia agreed but showed no repeat no disposition towards majority action.

5. Bridle concluded that despite Gundevia's pessimistic view about Laos he was still for Commission making every effort within its power to help in easing situation. Gundevia had warm words for Mayrand's contribution to the work of Commission and expressed pleasure at Canadian decision to ask Bridle to return to Laos.

COMMISSION REPORT

Our telegram 161 June 2 gives account of report to Co-Chairmen without Canadian minority but recording our initiative (5 groups missing) Cooper yesterday and reiterated statement at informal meeting this morning just prior to my arrival that his government's view is that at present reports of action by Commission require unanimous agreement. They do not repeat not accept in present circumstances principle of decision by majority vote. Polish Commissioner Thee holds same view but also takes more extreme stand that Commission may do nothing except at request of parties as result of unanimous agreement reached by them on their own initiative not repeat not as result of any Commission approach.

2. In case of proposed visit to Ban Houei Sai, Avtar Singh yesterday raised matter with Souvanna at Khang Khay in presence of Souphanouvong and British Ambassador Addis as well as Commissioners. Souvanna said he had no repeat no objection to such visit by Commission. Souphanouvong appeared unenthusiastic and drew Avtar Singh aside at first opportunity to make NLHX position clear. He said Commission had no repeat no legal right by any international or other agreement to make such visit but that he understood our intentions and would not repeat not object.

3. In view of Avtar Singh's efforts in favour of our proposal Cooper agreed to meet informally again this morning to discuss despatch of message to Vientiane Government requesting agreement and assistance for visit to Ban Houei Sai. By this means we have refrained from exerting further pressure on Avtar Singh on majority question in which he has apparently no repeat no leeway from his government. Meeting produced considerable argument between Avtar Singh speaking in favour of Commission visit to Ban Houei Sai and Thee who remained obdurate and even argued that agreement expressed by Khang Khay Princes yesterday meant reverse of what they said and that in fact Commission had no repeat no agreement from them for such official visit. Meeting adjourned with Avtar Singh saying we must place on record Polish reasons for refusing to agree and that it would appear in next report to Co-Chairmen. Cooper reminded meeting that we might ask for early report to Co-Chairmen dealing exclusively with Ban Houei Sai. Thee asked for day in which to draft statement of his position re proposed visits for inclusion in report. Notwithstanding his government's sensitivities to majority decisions Avtar Singh who was annoyed by Thee's manoeuvres said report would make it clear that Indians and Canadians favoured such action but it was prevented by Polish refusal. He added There might have to answer to history on that score.

4. At brief meeting this morning with USA Ambassador Brown, Cooper was told Phoumi was doubtful about agreeing to Commission visit to Ban Houei Sai for fear Poles would pass information re military dispositions to Pathet Lao. Same objections apply to sending team to Sardvanne (reference our telegram 154 May 30†).

5. Addis was consulted by Cooper (our telegram 161 June 2) on subject of report to Co-Chairmen and has been kept informed of subsequent developments. He had agreed Ban Houei Sai question was (deserving?) of strong stand and could see no repeat no disadvantage to Canadian minority on that point if necessary. He felt it was desirable to get report away before June 4 which was also our view as well as Avtar Singh's earnest hope. Hence we adopted solution already reported in our telegram 161 June 2.

MY CONVERSATION WITH GUNDEVIA

I am grateful Delhi for their skilful and accurate résumé of my conversation with Gundevia on June 4 which provides an interesting preliminary to information which we forwarded in our telegram 167. I would only like to add that while Gundevia had no repeat no reference to functioning of Commission once new Geneva agreement becomes operative he said nothing to suggest that his recent aversion to division in Laos Commission would prevent Indians from accepting and if necessary applying provisions of new agreement covering majority or minority action.

2. May I add with reference to Vietnam one bit of information which I did not repeat not adequately convey in Delhi. Gundevia implied that Polish Ambassador in Delhi threatened Indians with some sort of reprisals in North if as Poles seem to expect Diem Government were to renew harassment of Poles in South.

ACTION FOLLOWING A SETTLEMENT

When I saw Brown yesterday he told me that at its first meeting the new government will appoint three committees: one to deal with integration of armed forces, one to deal with (creation?) of unified administration and one to consider the employment of soldiers following (and possibly during) the demobilization period.

2. Brown said Souvanna thinks it will take about four months "to reach agreement" on integration of forces. Brown also said Souvanna has told him that elections will not repeat not take place until after integration.

3. Brown told me that his government will be looking to the Commission in due course to provide evidence of some kind that the Vietminh have left Laos. Until such evidence is forthcoming Brown said the USA would not repeat not withdraw its military advisers. I told Brown that while the new Geneva agreement will provide a procedure whereby it would be possible for the Commission to supervise withdrawal of Vietnam as well as other foreign forces it would probably prove very difficult if not repeat not impossible for us actually to see any Vietminh soldiers over the borders. For some reason the DRVN simply will not repeat not admit their forces have ever been in Laos.

4. Brown then recalled Pushkin's indication to Harriman in Geneva to the effect that at the right moment it would somehow just have to become evident that there were no repeat no Vietminh in Laos. Brown implied this would not repeat not be good enough. I promised we would reflect on the problem. The only further thought I have at the moment is that especially in view of the negotiating history a public USA assertion in the terms of the second sentence of paragraph 3 would probably drop quite a spanner in the Geneva works.

LAOS COMMISSION ROLE

June 18 Cross State Department Officer in charge Laos Affairs called us in to say that since Western discussions at Geneva would not repeat not convene for some days yet State Department wished to register with Canadian authorities hope that the period for withdrawal from Laos of foreign military personnel as provided in Article Two of the draft protocol could in the event be stretched out to the maximum possible duration in order to make the transition from USA military training programme to a French presence as smooth [as] possible. USA representatives would be commencing discussions June 18 with French authorities to see how the changeover could best be done. A major point was that certain training programmes for Far [East?] could best be completed if the transition were smooth and if existing instructional programme were continued unchanged as long as possible. Although it was recognized that there were arguments against such a stretch-out USA authorities had decided that on balance prolongation was desirable if feasible. USA authorities would be grateful for any indication for our views on how Canadian delegation to ICSC could help in securing this objective either in the course of dealings with other ICSC delegations or with Government of National Union. It was part of the appreciation of State Department officials that Souvanna Phouma might wish to see the departure of Vietminh personnel take place rapidly, but that he might not repeat not wish to see Western advisers depart at the same rate. State Department officials also realize that there might be considerable pressure on Souvanna Phouma to see MAAG personnel leave which would probably be intensified because Vietminh authorities would probably remove major units and equipment quite rapidly and cause other units or personnel to fade into the landscape.

2. Cross said that much of the reasoning behind the request mentioned above related to the distinct domestic pressures on the Administration which had already become evident to show that a neutral independent Laos could be made to work. USA was going to do its best to help towards this objective but the degree of its assistance would obviously be relevant to the success in persuading domestic critics that the task was going well.

3. Cross also asked us to register USA hope that some means could be found for the Commission to establish check points near the DRVN and Chinese Communist borders. In particular Tchepone and Sam Neua were regarded as desirable locations. Officials were resigned to the possibility that USA personnel were likely to be the only foreign military who would be observed departing from Laos and that it might be difficult to establish the need for observation of Vietminh withdrawals. Nevertheless officials hoped that the Commission could establish its presence on the borders mentioned on one pretext or another. State Department would be grateful to know our views on the possibility of doing so.

LAOS – WITHDRAWAL OF FOREIGN MILITARY PERSONNEL

If we read American request correctly State Department is asking Candel in Vientiane to do what it can to stretch out deadline for withdrawal of foreign military personnel as much as possible. Reasons given for request and methods envisaged for implementing it both strike us as being very fuzzy.

2. Idea seems to be that “existing instructional programme” would continue unchanged “as long as possible” and that it would be picked up unbroken by French instructors. A question arises as to what troops MAAG will be training. Until now it has been training RLG personnel under General Phoumi while Pathet Lao troops have been assisted by PAVN. Neutralist troops if they have been receiving any training at all presumably have been receiving it from PAVN or at least from non repeat non Western instructors. We have not repeat not heard of any agreement between USA and new coalition government which would involve MAAG in training function and we wonder therefore how MAAG training programme can continue without interruption. It seems unlikely that new government would make this very easy.

3. We can understand USA desire to keep MAAG personnel in Laos as long as possible but we wonder whether reason given by Cross is only one. You will recall that during early stages of Geneva Conference USA delegation stated that although USA was prepared to withdraw its military personnel from Laos [it] would do so only if process were phased with withdrawal of PAVN forces. Despite this strong stand USA delegation when faced with Communist refusal even to admit presence of PAVN personnel accepted Pushkin's assurance that any PAVN troops that might be in Laos would simply "evaporate" when a settlement was reached. Despite Canadian misgivings USA dropped any attempt to obtain admission that PAVN troops were present in Laos and Western delegations dropped provision in Article 15 of Franco-American draft which would have required a census of foreign military personnel and equipment. Thus there exists no repeat no public admission of presence of PAVN forces. Corollary of this of course is that if PAVN does not repeat not notify Commission of withdrawal of its forces (and we would assume they do not repeat not intend to) provisions of Articles 2, 3 and 10 will have no repeat no relevance vis-à-vis PAVN personnel.

4. However despite USA acceptance of Pushkin's assurances and despite fact that idea of a phased withdrawal had been dropped USA delegation made it clear to us that USA would not repeat not withdraw its personnel until it was satisfied that there were no repeat no PAVN troops left in Laos; furthermore it would have to rely on International Commission to ensure that any PAVN troops which might be present would be withdrawn. This struck us as a responsibility Commission might not repeat not be equipped to carry out. Negotiations on Article 2 of Protocol hinged on question of base-line for time limit of withdrawal. Communist side had wanted deadline to run from time of signature of agreement; USA delegation wanted deadline to be based on time at which all points of withdrawal were covered by Commission teams. This did not repeat not meet question of phased withdrawal, for if DRVN did not repeat not admit presence of its troops and did not repeat not therefore notify Commission of their withdrawal there would of course be no repeat no points of withdrawal between Laos and North Vietnam. Furthermore it seemed obvious from way agreement was shaping up that it might be very difficult for Commission to undertake investigations to determine whether or not repeat not certain foreign military personnel were still present in Laos if officially there had never been evidence of such presence. Conceivably Laotian Government might complain to Commission but this would not repeat not be a very reliable instrument since first of all Government might not repeat not become aware of presence of PAVN troops until after deadline for withdrawal was past (and incidentally after USA troops would have left Laos, if agreement was not repeat not to be violated) and secondly Government might not repeat not for a number of reasons wish to complain to Commission.

5. Presumably USA through intelligence sources will have fairly clear idea of whether or not repeat not PAVN forces have withdrawn. If on day before deadline USA has evidence that PAVN forces are still in Laos it will be able to complain to RLG in hope that latter will ask Commission to investigate. In these circumstances, though, RLG would not repeat not be under any obligation to invite MAAG personnel to stay past deadline; indeed agreement makes no repeat no provision for exceptions. There is further problem of how Commission can be expected to find any PAVN personnel who might be present in Laos or how it can provide evidence such as that suggested by Brown (paragraph 3 Candel Vientiane telegram 187 June 14).

6. This is an extremely complex problem which evidently will not repeat not fade away if USA Administration and Congress decide to maintain MAAG personnel in Laos until there is clear evidence that all PAVN personnel have left. USA seems to be placing great deal of reliance on Canadian member of Commission but it should be obvious to them that if Canadian influence on Commission is to be maintained action in this field will have to be based on fairly sound evidence and not repeat not simply on accusations. Following are some of lines that might be examined by USA in attempt to meet problem:

(a) Souvanna will be under heavy pressure from part of Cabinet to squeeze out MAAG personnel as soon as possible. We presume USA is already trying to reach some understanding with him that would permit MAAG personnel to remain in Laos until deadline of Article 2 if necessary.

(b) At same time it should be made clear to Souvanna that USA agreement to support his government and to withdraw MAAG personnel was based on understanding that all PAVN personnel would be withdrawn. Souvanna should recognize need to provide USA with assurances and clear proof that PAVN personnel have left Laos.

(c) Even if some evidence of PAVN presence is brought to attention of Commission Canadian member alone would not repeat not be able to produce investigation. Indians should see reasonableness of USA desire for assurance that PAVN personnel have left but a frank discussion with Indians would not repeat not do any harm.

(d) Article 2 provides that points of withdrawal shall be determined by Government of Laos in accordance with Article 3 within 30 days after entry into force of Protocol, that Commission shall place its teams at these points and notify Government of Laos thereof within 15 days after determination of points, and that foreign military personnel shall be withdrawn within 30 days after this. Article 3 provides that routes and points shall be determined by RLG in consultation with Commission and Commission therefore has some role in determining this. If consultation has not repeat not been adequate (e.g. if no repeat no routes and points have been determined for withdrawal of PAVN personnel even though evidence exists that personnel are present in Laos, it might be argued that points had not repeat not been determined by RLG in accordance with Article 3 and that time limits established by Article 2 would therefore have to be extended until requirements of Article 3 had been met. (This admittedly is a devious argument but it is sort of thing that might be necessary if presence of USA personnel after deadline is to be justified at all.)

7. Paragraph 3 of Washington reference telegram suggests that USA have not repeat not given up idea of fixed teams which would in effect provide more or less permanent intelligence centres. This is another intricate problem concerning desire of USA for certain Commission operations beyond 75 day period set for withdrawal. Task of finding "one pretext or another" for establishing Commission teams near DRVN and Chinese borders can be approached in a number of ways but here again cooperation and understanding of Indians will be essential.

Ottawa, June 26, 1962

Dear Mr. Green,

I have been asked by the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Lord Home, to deliver to you the following message from the Co-chairmen of the Geneva Conference on the settlement of the Laotian question. My Government have agreed with the Government of the U.S.S.R. that this message should be delivered jointly by the Soviet Ambassador and myself in the names of the two Co-chairmen.

“The Co-chairmen of the Geneva Conference on the settlement of the Laotian question have the honour to draw the attention of the Government of Canada to the decision of the Conference on January 23rd, 1962, that the date of the next meeting should be decided by the two Co-chairmen bearing in mind that at that meeting a single Laotian Delegation appointed by a Government of National Unity of Laos would be expected to take part. The Co-chairmen have been informed that a Government of National Unity has now been formed in Laos and that a single Laotian Delegation will proceed to Geneva to take part in further discussions. The Co-chairmen have accordingly agreed that the next meeting of the Conference should take place at Geneva at 3.00 p.m. on Monday, July 2nd, 1962.”

Yours sincerely,

R.W.D. FOWLER

LAOS: NATURE OF COMMISSION'S TASKS OVER NEXT YEAR

Since my arrival I have been once more impressed by the extent to which during the past year the Commission has been able to exert a generally conciliatory influence and by the usefulness of the various practical services it has rendered the negotiating parties. Even though its efforts to supervise the ceasefire have been frustrated it nevertheless deserves great credit for the wise and patient manner in which over the past months it has maintained its presence in Laos. There can be no repeat no doubt that it played an important part in helping to bring about a settlement.

2. The Commission's task during the next few weeks will be to prepare for assumption of the new duties which will devolve upon it following signature of the Geneva agreements and to do anything possible within the limits of its effective terms of reference to keep the military situation quiet. We are reporting separately† on preliminary steps being taken with regard to the former. With regard to the latter Phoumi is always capable of some irrational act designed to upset the Geneva applectart and military moves by either side designed to reinforce political objectives cannot repeat not be ruled out. However while there will probably be some minor incidents particularly in view of the continued existence of "pockets" on one side with territory controlled by the other, it seems likely that the Laotians in control of the respective forces will be prevailed upon for reasons of policy to exercise restraint.

3. In the period following signature of the Geneva agreements the Commission will have to exercise both determination and patience if it is to fulfill the functions designed for it. Since its activities will be to a large extent subject to the consent of the government and since the government is supposed to operate on a basis of unanimity, the crux of the problem for the Commission (apart from mere reporting) will be to establish a relationship of confidence between it and the government. The main obstacle will no repeat no doubt continue to be Communist resistance, whether in the Government or in the Commission, to significant Commission action.

4. It is also possible that difficulties will be created by the Phoumist element in the government: for there are signs that Phoumi has not repeat not given up hope of maintaining some sort of bastion of the right and this could lead him and his followers to adopt obstructionist or separatist attitudes which combined with traditional Pathet Lao allergy to quick integration, could be detrimental to attainment of the Geneva objectives. From this broad point of view, which is not repeat not in its entirety the direct concern of the Commission but which will certainly have a direct bearing on its activities, the task ahead appears rather formidable.

5. In the interval before Souvanna returns it will be difficult to achieve any real solidarity in the government and unless present trends are reversed serious fissures may develop in the early stages. At the moment it appears that the right is obstructing the coalition by reluctance in some cases to yield control of ministries to the new appointees. On the other side, Vongvichit has made a highly partisan statement in the name of the government and Souphanouvong is spending at least part of his time [in Khang?] Khay. Even after Souvanna has returned he will have to work very hard to get the principal elements in his Cabinet to work together in cooperative support of common objectives. Also regroupment of forces will not repeat not be easy while integration of forces and establishment of local administration responsive to coordinated control from the centre will probably take [a] long time. It may be that present partisan manoeuvres are more tactical than strategic – Phoumi may simply be putting on another act designed to impress his followers; Vongvichit, however inexcusably, may simply be running interference for a Communist effort to get USA forces out of Thailand, and Souphanouvong (who, seen last in Vientiane, was a fugitive from political detention) may be staking out a claim for Khang Khay as the future capital. Nevertheless, the underlying fissiparous tendencies are strong and there can be no repeat no doubt that sustained efforts will be needed over an extended period to make the Laotian settlement stick. If it should again fall apart, as it did in 1958, the consequences would be hard to predict. In these circumstances the Commission will have a special responsibility, in spite of the obstacles it will certainly encounter, to discharge its assigned tasks as effectively as possible. Also as in the past it may be able from time to time to exert a conciliatory influence in informal support of more orthodox diplomacy.

WITHDRAWAL OF FOREIGN MILITARY PERSONNEL

Since USA officials are realistic enough to be resigned to possibility that USA personnel are likely to be only foreign military personnel who will be observed departing from Laos, I would very much like to adopt helpful attitude toward two requests in Washington reference telegram. I am afraid however that it is difficult to be as forthcoming as I would wish. Draft protocol lays down that all foreign military personnel shall be withdrawn from Laos in shortest time possible and while balance of relevant article does provide for possible delay of 75 days from signature of agreements emphasis is clearly on despatch.

2. With regard to first period of 30 days within which government is to determine exit points, leftwing elements in government (for reasons I touch on below) might press to have these points designated fairly quickly. No repeat no doubt Americans could ask rightwing elements to delay process but it would certainly be invidious for Commission to do so in course of consultations. Canadian delegation could hardly seek to delay despatching of teams during subsequent 15 days since we have hitherto pressed for team visits on all occasions of reported breaches of ceasefire. During final period of 30 days Commission would have no repeat no control over timing of withdrawals. In short it seems to us there is really no repeat no scope for Commission to help in achieving delay. If indulged in it would have to be done either by Americans through rightwing elements in government or by Americans themselves.

3. In addition we are doubtful if any practical advantage would accrue from delay. Whatever hiatus there may be between USA and French (planning?) could hardly be very damaging and if it is really intended to give maximum military support to Phoumi's forces for longest possible time we do not repeat not see much advantage in this. On past performance, presence of MAAG personnel is unlikely to make Phoumi's troops much more capable of standing up to Pathet Lao/Vietminh. It seems likely that main USA objective is semi-political one mentioned by Cross in paragraph 2 Washington telegram. This is certainly an understandable objective but it is difficult to see how prolongation MAAG presence, which might in turn make actual withdrawal of Vietminh even less likely, would provide convincing evidence that policy of neutral independent Laos could be made to work.

4. On other hand we are in full sympathy with USA desire to have Commission teams despatched to check points near DRVN and Chinese Communist borders. We shall certainly do our utmost to get teams to places such as Tchepone, Nape and Sam Neua localities on trail to Dien Bien Phu and on new road to China from Phongsaly. Two opportunities could arise for Candel to pursue this general objective (1) in consultations with government with regard to check points for withdrawal of foreign military personnel and (2) if Commission could establish need for investigations related to reintroduction of forces. Nevertheless obstacles in way of this are considerable. In first place while Commission is to be consulted about exit points in last analysis it is government which will decide where they are to be therefore it is most likely that they will select places which are as advantageous as above to Western side. Secondly we foresee possible difficulty in having exit points named at all except at places which would clearly be designed for exit of USA personnel. This would be invidious in the extreme and we will do our best to prevent it but it is possible that Communist tactic will be to make an early announcement that Vietminh forces have been withdrawn thus providing plausible basis on which to argue that there is no repeat no need to establish exit points to take care of them. This possibility is distasteful to us (especially as it would follow hard upon Communist refusal to admit presence of Vietminh) and we imagine that it would make Americans angry. Consequently, since it is at moment no repeat no more than speculation, you might think it advisable not repeat not to mention it explicitly to them.

TALK WITH SOUVANNA PHOUMA

Mayrand and I called on Souvanna yesterday afternoon. We wanted not repeat not only to pay our respects but also to explore problems facing Conference and lend our support wherever appropriate to Western position.

2. Prime Minister himself took initiative by saying that he had been giving consideration to two problems which seemed to be causing difficulty at Conference: SEATO and integration.

3. He threw out suggestion that SEATO problem could be solved if SEATO powers would formally declare that they would withdraw protection of SEATO from Laos. He in turn would not repeat not mention SEATO specifically in declaration. We told Souvanna that Canada, of course, was not repeat not directly involved in problem of SEATO, and that we were therefore not repeat not in a position to comment on it. We suggest however that procedure he had suggested probably would not repeat not find favour with SEATO countries.

4. Souvanna then turned to question of integration of forces and described this as an internal matter. I agreed with him that this was an internal problem and concern of Laotians. On other hand war in Laos really had been an international war and one might speculate as to whether there would have been a civil war if it had not repeat not been for rivalries between outside powers. For this reason question of integration has important international implications and could have serious international repercussions. We therefore considered that it would be appropriate and wise to make a reference to subject in Laotian Declaration of Neutrality.

5. Souvanna replied that he did not repeat not consider a reference to subject necessary but did say that in a statement made during closing plenary session of Conference he would be prepared to mention Zurich agreement and recent Royal Ordinance,<sup>13</sup> both of which dealt with integration. I pointed out that this procedure would not repeat not clothe subject with same prestige and status as would inclusion in Declaration of Neutrality. Even a simple reference to subject in Declaration of Neutrality probably would cover requirement.

6. Although we had not repeat not mentioned International Commission it seemed evident that he was fully aware that desire to give Commission function re integration lay behind Western insistence that subject be covered in Declaration, for he said at this point that integration was an internal matter and not repeat not within competence of Commission. I replied that we agreed fully about this and that any function Commission might perform within this field would be contingent on a request by Laotian Government. If Geneva agreements contained no repeat no mention of this subject it would be very difficult, if not repeat not impossible, for Commission to extend assistance to Laotian Government if at some future stage right-wing forces or Pathet Lao (or both) were to make life difficult for duly constituted Central Government.

7. Souvanna clearly did not repeat not consider that he would require such assistance. He said there was no repeat no need to worry – Pham Van Dong had assured him during his recent visit to Hanoi that he would do everything possible to ensure Laotian neutrality and independence. (Pham Van Dong also had said, incidentally, that he would do everything possible to “extinguish fire in Vietnam.”) As far as Laos itself was concerned, Souvanna said, steps had already been taken to deal with question; a Cabinet decision concerning establishment of mixed commissions to deal with process had been made. Furthermore, Souvanna had told NLHX leaders that there would be no repeat no elections until integration had been carried out. Souvanna considers that since NLHX have no repeat no members in present Assembly, they are more interested than any other group in having early elections; for this reason, he believes, they can be counted on to carry out integration.

8. Thus, although I pointed out that there existed in Laos two armies not repeat not under control of government, and that Souvanna might be victim of either or both, Souvanna could not repeat not be persuaded that question of integration should be dealt with in any way other than inclusion in a statement by him at final plenary session of conference.

It is not clear which ordinance Souvanna was referring to here. For the text of Royal Ordinance 219, which on June 23 had officially created the new government headed by Souvanna, see the attachment to Canadian delegation Laos to Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs, Numbered Letter 73, July 16, 1962, † DEA/50052-B-2-40, part 29.

9. We then asked Souvanna for his views about withdrawal of foreign military personnel from Laos. We said that everyone knew there were USA military personnel in country and that this had been officially admitted; on other hand, although everyone knew there were PAVN troops in Laos, this had not repeat not been admitted by Communist side. Since Commission would be directly concerned in this matter we would be interested in knowing what arrangements he contemplated. By this time Quinim had joined us and both he and Souvanna said that government would fix points through which all foreign military personnel would withdraw. Mayrand asked whether these points would be located even in North and Souvanna replied that withdrawal points would be located everywhere they were required. Souvanna seemed to accept very readily our assumption that PAVN troops were present in Laos and Quinim did not repeat not deny it.

10. We expressed hope at end of our talk that discussion here in Geneva would lead to satisfactory conclusion of Conference. Souvanna expressed confidence that this would be the case. He said he anticipated that work of Conference would be completed in four or five days. Then he would return to Laos by way of Washington.

11. Mayrand had another talk this morning with Noupbat Choun Ramany, member of Laotian delegation, who told him that at a meeting of delegation this morning final text of Laotian Declaration had been agreed to. He showed copy to Mayrand. It will not repeat not contain a specific reference to SEATO, but in a covering letter to Co-Chairmen, Souvanna will state that provision does apply to SEATO in particular. There is no repeat no reference to integration in declaration. If Laotians have taken a final decision on draft there would seem to be little likelihood that Western delegations will be able to effect any changes. It remains to be seen whether they, and USA delegation in particular, will find it possible to accept a declaration which pretty effectively closes door to any Commission competence in field of integration.

LAOS CONFERENCE – DECLARATION BY LAOTIAN GOVERNMENT

The Laotian declaration has been amended by Souvanna Phouma, as desired by the western delegations, on the question of forbidding the use of Laotian territory for interference in the internal affairs of other countries. This is an important point, since it covers the use of Laos by the Vietminh for infiltration into south Vietnam. Souvanna has also modified the reference to non-recognition by Laos of foreign military protection in a way which has already been found acceptable in Washington, London, Paris and Canberra.

2. The only point on which the declaration still appears somewhat less than satisfactory is the omission of any reference to integration. In view of the concessions mentioned in paragraph one above, and the apparently adamant opposition of the communist powers, there seems no likelihood that it will still be possible to obtain the inclusion of such a reference. For the reasons indicated in your telegram Y-278 of July 9,† this omission, though regrettable, is not likely to make any great difference in actual practice.

3. Attached for your signature, if you agree, is a telegram to Ronning authorizing him to accept the declaration in its amended form.<sup>14</sup>

LAOS CONFERENCE – STATE OF NEGOTIATIONS

Our acceptance of the Laotian Declaration as amended is of course dependent upon this declaration being satisfactory to our Western friends. These appear to be content with a mere mention of integration by Souvanna at closing plenary instead of inclusion of a reference to this matter in a formal conference document. You should make sure that they understand it will be difficult for the Commission to act in this field without any specific reference in conference documents. Subject to this we have no objection to inclusion in its present form of Laotian Declaration in thirteen-power Declaration.

LAOS CONFERENCE – INTEGRATION OF FORCES

We are very grateful for background and careful analysis of this problem which you have provided and we shall explain your view to Western delegations, if after taking account of considerations set forth below you still consider this a desirable course to follow.

2. We too were rather taken aback by way in which issue of integration suddenly melted away. However, on basis of information we have gathered during past day or two it is possible to piece together reasons why USA delegation, and therefore other Western delegations, decided to give up any attempt to have subject dealt with in any way other than a mention in Souvanna's statement at final plenary referring to Zurich communiqué and Royal Ordinance. (Roux will attempt to persuade Souvanna Phouma to make an explicit reference to subject.)

3. Souvanna, in draft he had given Falaize in Paris, had mentioned integration and Western delegations considered that his overnight change of mind had been result of pressure by Quinim and probably by Communist side. However, after all Western delegations had spoken to Souvanna in Geneva it became obvious that there was no repeat no hope of convincing Souvanna that subject should be covered in Laotian Declaration. Souvanna evidently had reversed his position, probably under pressure from Quinim and Communist delegations, and did not repeat not intend to change again.

4. About same time as realization of futility of exercise was dawning in Harriman's mind, he began to be influenced by members of his delegation (and particularly military advisers) who argued that interests of USA might be undermined by any clearcut provision for integration. There are signs that at least one part of American Administration intends to keep General Phoumi's army in existence as long as possible. We presume they calculate that Pathet Lao could evade any requirement for integration more easily than could Phoumi and that it therefore would be prudent to keep process and supervision of it as vague and ill-defined as possible.

5. This approach to future of Phoumi's forces was reflected yesterday in remarks Harriman made during discussion of problem of civilian technicians. French informed Americans that, with Souvanna's agreement, they would be prepared to take over administration and maintenance of USA military equipment in Laos, thus making it possible for Filipino personnel now there to leave and also making possible withdrawal of reservation on Article 4 by Western delegations which was designed to leave open possibility that civilian technicians might be introduced. Harriman stated that USA had established an elaborate system for control and maintenance of military equipment. If Laotians took over there would be rapid deterioration and loss; USA wanted to avoid this since it wanted to keep Phoumi's forces strong.

6. Furthermore, in this as well as so many other subjects, Harriman probably has been strongly influenced by provisions of Article 8, which reflect Pushkin's assurance that Co-Chairman will make sure their respective allies observe Declaration and Protocol. This may be another case in which Harriman expects Article 8 to carry greater burden than it is designed to handle. Leaving aside more obvious shortcomings of this guarantee, it seems obvious that Article 8 cannot repeat not apply to integration process if latter is not repeat not mentioned in Declaration or Protocol.

7. All these factors probably affected USA decision to drop subject and we know UK delegation did nothing repeat nothing to keep issue alive. Continued argument about integration could have blocked successful conclusion of conference – an end which UK clearly considers very important.

8. This new line of American thinking seems to involve as a corollary a lack of emphasis on Commission role in this field, since subject has not repeat not been pressed recently. Perhaps USA as well as Communists now wish Commission to keep hands off integration process. In such circumstances (with no repeat no sanctions in agreement against maintenance of private armies, and with no repeat no international supervision of process of integration) two non repeat non-governmental forces presumably would counter-balance each other and, perhaps, integrate and disband in phase with each other.

9. There seems to exist among Western Four a gentleman's agreement not repeat not to probe this subject very deeply and we hesitate now to have a frank discussion with USA delegation unless a clear opening presents itself. If our assumption of USA thinking is reasonably correct, however, we should not repeat not expect any pressure from USA to have Commission deal with subject, at least in early stages. If, on other hand, Phoumi's army starts disintegrating (repeat disintegrating) USA might very well become more anxious to ensure integration and disbandment of Pathet Lao. At such time we might conceivably be asked to cause Commission to make bricks without straw. There would be, therefore, some advantage in making our position clear to our friends now.

10. As I have said, however, we adduce from a number of Harriman's remarks in meetings of Western Four that USA demands concerning integration now have been dropped, and because of this new situation motives behind suggestion in paragraph 11 our telegram 1228 are no repeat no longer as strong. USA has so clearly given up any attempt to bring integration into final settlement that it would be very difficult for Washington to belabour us on subject at later date. Furthermore, I have more than once made it clear orally to Western colleagues that omission from declaration of any reference to integration would make Commission action in this area very difficult if not repeat not impossible and I am sure USA delegation took account of this view when reaching its decision. Perhaps it would be wiser, therefore, in view of rather delicate situation which has arisen, not repeat not to give USA delegation a memo at this stage. Instead we would hope for casual opening which might provide us with clearer understanding of USA policy in this field. Then, if necessary and appropriate, we might explain views set forth in your reference telegram more explicitly.

11. I should appreciate your advice.

LAOS CONFERENCE – INTEGRATION OF FORCES

Mr. Ronning reports in his telegram 1232 of July 11 that the United States delegation has “clearly given up any attempt to bring integration into the final settlement.” He wonders whether, in these circumstances, it would be wise not to give the Americans a memorandum on the subject but rather to take advantage of any “clear opening” which might occur to make our position clear to them.

2. From Earncliffe we have learned that the British delegation was “reasonably confident” on July 10 that Souvanna would mention integration in a final unilateral statement “of which the Conference could take note.” It may be, however, as Ronning suggests in his telegram, that the Americans will now prefer to keep this matter “as vague and ill-defined as possible.”

LAOS CONFERENCE – INTEGRATION OF FORCES

Since, despite apparent decision of USA to abandon pressure for some formal reference to integration in Conference documents, possibility remains that at some later stage we may be called on to “make bricks without straw,” I continue to think it would be desirable to put to USA delegation in explicit terms our views on what it would and would not be possible for Commission to do with regard to integration.

2. In view of attitude which Americans now seem to be taking, and of inherent limits we see in any possible action by Commission in this field, I agree that it would be wise to avoid giving any impression that we are arguing in favour of insisting on some formal mention of integration. However you should say that we had been giving some thought to the possibilities for useful action by the Commission, having regard to its previous experience in this connection, and had put down our thoughts on “a piece of paper” which it occurred to us USA delegation might find useful to have on file.

CONVERSATION WITH PHOUMI

Yesterday I first talked with Phoumi following signature of agreement.<sup>16</sup> He said Boun Oum had asked him to convey to me his deep appreciation of part Canada played in negotiation on neutral status for Laos. I asked him to thank Boun Oum and to assure him that your constant endeavour had been to obtain best possible terms of reference for International Commission.

2. Phoumi told me he has been studying new agreement and that he has set up small committee inside his own group to analyse it. When he has considered it further he would like to secure my views on how it may be best implemented. In any case he said my views would be welcome at any time. He wants to keep very closely in touch with me in order that he may help me to act effectively in Commission and vice versa. He thought that provisions for (group corrupt) action in Protocol combined with what he regards as disposition on part of Avtar Singh to favour Western point of view should facilitate my task in Commission and that his own weight in government should be increased by fact that Souvanna Phouma is really more of his persuasion than that of Souphanouvong's.

3. While some of Phoumi's assumptions seem over-optimistic I contented myself with commenting that ideal situation would be one in which Commission could function effectively in support of objectives of settlement and government could work together in prosecution of its declared policy. At same time I agreed there would be occasions when [Poles?] or Pathet Lao would be acting in manner which would require corrective action. In any case I said that I certainly wished to keep closely in touch with him since this would assist me to play my part in implementation of new agreement. (Though I did not repeat not say so to Phoumi, Avtar Singh has told me that he regards this as of great importance with respect to work of Commission as whole. You will also recall our telegram 260 July 17† that Unger would like me to help in endeavour where necessary to keep Phoumi on reasonable track.)

4. Phoumi said that he was reflecting on parts of agreement covering French presence and that he would be glad to receive my views on this in due course. He seemed to wish to facilitate assumption by French of their responsibilities but Morris Australian Minister who saw Phoumi immediately before I did subsequently told me that Phoumi said that in almost every way they are ill qualified to train his forces or look after their equipment.

5. Phoumi also raised with me question of withdrawal of foreign forces. I am reporting on this separately.

6. We parted on best of terms and agreed that we would consult frequently.

WITHDRAWAL OF USA MILITARY PERSONNEL

I talked yesterday to Unger about withdrawal of foreign forces and am reporting separately on main discussion which was on Vietminh.

2. Unger outlined for me USA policy on withdrawal of USA personnel. He said his government intended to do this in accordance with agreement and within time limit prescribed. Only circumstances under which USA would hold back on withdrawal would be if there were evidence – and he said evidence supplied by Commission – that Vietminh personnel were still in Laos. He regarded this a rather hypothetical condition.

3. At same time Unger offered to have military staff of Embassy expose to us more fully than heretofore evidence (which he regards as convincing) of Vietminh presence in Laos. I welcomed this but warned that it would be impossible to use in Commission USA evidence supplied confidentially to Candel.

4. Unger again expressed the desire that 75 day period for withdrawals be as near 75 days as possible. He said his authorities want this mainly in order to be able to keep in Laos as long as they can fairly small number of personnel who are in field and who are essential from intelligence point of view.

5. At same time Unger told me that he has been considering possibility of having bulk of USA personnel withdrawn in D plus 30 i.e. 30 days after signature of agreement. In reply to question he confirmed he had in mind withdrawal before Commission teams were in place. Another possibility he was considering was that fairly soon – possibly after Souvanna's return on August 4 and USA prisoners had first been released – perhaps 40 personnel might be withdrawn as preliminary move.

6. Unger has in mind political and psychological advantage which might accrue from such moves. At same time he stressed he is also considering plan from point of view of whether or not repeat not it would assist USA authorities and indirectly Candel to create climate for best possible implementation of overall withdrawal provisions of agreement. He said he would like my views. I replied I would like to consult military adviser and you. He said he has not repeat not yet discussed possibility either with his own military personnel or with Washington but was agreeable to my consulting on strictly confidential basis.

7. My inclination is to tell Unger that we sympathize with desire to keep key personnel 75 days but are not repeat not well placed to help with this; that we would welcome withdrawal of USA personnel at earliest feasible date because this would have favourable effect on whole settlement and might somewhat facilitate efforts to arrange some Commission role with regard to other foreign forces; that it would nevertheless be most important for main USA withdrawal to take place when Commission teams were in place and could supervise them since to do otherwise would be technically contrary to Articles Three and Ten of Protocol and might expose USA to charges their withdrawals were incomplete: and that we would not repeat not object to small preliminary withdrawal provided that it was conducted in accordance with Articles Three and Ten i.e. that an exit point was designated so that Commission could supervise.

8. I would be grateful to receive your views as early as possible in week of July 30.

WITHDRAWAL OF FOREIGN MILITARY PERSONNEL

I saw Unger July 26 and informed him of state of my discussions with other two commissioners. Before seeing him I had secured from Avtar Singh undertaking to consider possible means of facilitating some sort of Commission action with regard to withdrawal of forces other than USA military personnel. Unger thought this and similar assurance I had had from them encouraging.

2. Unger confirmed USA attitude reported in paragraph 3 of Washington telegram 1826 and reproduced in paragraph 10 of our reference telegram. At same time he attached importance to Commission acting somehow with respect to Vietminh personnel as well as USA personnel. I agreed and we discussed possible course on assumption that Vietminh presence would not repeat not be admitted and that no repeat no exit point to cover them would be proposed. On personal basis we reached tentative conclusion that best course might be one similar to that suggested in paragraph 9 of our reference telegram, i.e. that we might try to arrange that if government were agreed that exit points were needed only for USA personnel it might nevertheless make provision for check by Commission at selected places to verify that other foreign forces were not repeat not present. Although Unger thought it conceivable that one on-ground Commission team might find some evidence of Vietminh presence we both recognized that results would almost certainly be negative and that action taken would provide no repeat no conclusive proof that Vietminh were not repeat not present in Laos. At same time we thought that such action would be preferable to no repeat no action except with respect to USA personnel.

3. Unger expressed hope that once teams were on ground reasons might be found to let them stay. I said that under terms of agreement they could remain only for duration of their current task.

4. I pointed out that under strict interpretation of agreement Commission has no repeat no specific mandate to carry out checks of kind we envisaged. Unger thought however that in all the circumstances proposed action could reasonably be construed as consonant with purpose of agreement and that if Government were agreeable there should be no repeat no juridical problem. At same time we both recognized that one advantage of scheme would be that while there could be no repeat no assurance government would agree to places we would want most strategic places could be more easily justified as places to check on absence of foreign military personnel than could be case if conceived as exit points.

5. Unger and I agree that best chance of getting such scheme off ground would be if Souvanna were to adopt it and sell it privately to Souphanouvong before any discussion of withdrawal question in Cabinet. As such discussion may take place at next meeting of Cabinet (group corrupt) is due five or six immediately following Souvanna's return, Unger agreed to inform Washington of our conversation and to suggest that our idea might be discussed with Souvanna while he is in Washington. He said he had no repeat no idea whether Washington would think this is advisable and that if idea were discussed with Souvanna it would be mentioned on a contingent basis only.

6. I tried idea out on Avtar Singh yesterday and found he would be wholly receptive. At same time (in spite of slight advance in his thinking with regard to possible exit points for Vietminh noted in paragraph 6 of our telegram 269†) I found him again allergic to this conception on grounds that it was simply unrealistic to expect government to name exit points for Vietminh personnel if at same time it were alleged there were no repeat no Vietminh to be checked out.

7. This morning Avtar Singh told me that Thee who returned yesterday from Khang Khay had told him the Plaine des Jarres might be used as exit point for some Vietminh technicians. I saw Unger and told him this. [I? He?] emphasized that at present it could hardly be regarded as more than straw in the wind however since it might indicate that government would ultimately name one or two relatively innocuous exit points for some Vietminh personnel – presumably civilian technicians working with Pathet Lao forces – we should perhaps consider effects of this on idea we had developed. Unger confirmed that if idea were discussed with Souvanna it would be mentioned only as possible technique in event Vietminh presence were not repeat not admitted and government would not repeat not propose exit points for them. He would nevertheless inform Washington I had told him making clear that prospect of any change in Communist attitude on Vietminh presence is by no repeat no means certain.

8. Unger thought that even if Communists do follow course suggested by Thee it might still be desirable for Commission teams to carry out checks at additional points. I said that in these circumstances it might not repeat not be at all easy to obtain agreement either in Commission or in Government that such checks should be made and I pointed out that since checks would in any case be inconclusive they would be of no repeat no use to his Government as means of assessing adequacy of any actual Vietminh withdrawals. Unger acknowledged these limitations and agreed that if Government should decide to establish exit points for Vietminh idea we had discussed might become irrelevant.

CONVERSATION WITH GEN. KONG LE AND GEN. SINGKAPO

The Military Adviser accompanied by Maj. Y. Bernier of Candel Laos visited Khang Khay on July 25, 1962 to pay calls on Maj. Gen. Kong Le and Maj. Gen. Singkapo. They were well received.

2. Gen. Kong Le received the Military Adviser at his house. He was in uniform of a sort but with no rank badges and his paratroop badge hanging precariously by one hook. After the usual formalities, Kong Le enthusiastically affirmed how happy he was that the agreement had finally been signed at Geneva. He particularly welcomed the cease fire, which he said is earnestly desired by all Laotians. He obviously has the feeling that the Neutralists should be appointed at the head of all important posts and meetings, for he said "how can Laos be neutral if the heads are not neutral and are under a foreign influence." He felt particularly keenly on this in respect to the integration of forces and believes that integration should be based on the Neutralist forces. No doubt he has a personal interest in this proposal. He also said that some Left and Right generals did not really want integration as it would decrease their power. He said that his soldiers want integration and he is sure that the general population wants it too. But integration would be a long drawn-out procedure and the Left and Right generals who quietly opposed it would have to be converted or go.

3. Kong Le mentioned that while on his European tour he had received an invitation to visit Great Britain. He indicated that he had not accepted because the invitation had been only for himself and his secretary and not for the entire party of nine. His secretary then interjected (somewhat bitterly) that perhaps nine would have been too many to feed.

4. Kong Le invited the Military Adviser and other officers to a "Fête Neutraliste" to be held at Phong Savan on August 9. It will commence at 0800 hrs. and continue until midnight and will include a parade (with small arms and heavy weapons) and field sports. He would also be glad to see other officers of the Commission at the fête.

5. While awaiting transportation the civilian escort (who is a secretary or interpreter for Kong Le) pointed out a prisoner of war cage. He would not divulge any other information about it except that it held “many prisoners.” This civilian had taken a course in Wisconsin and from there had gone to Australia under the Colombo Plan. He spoke quite good English and said that Canada could provide the greatest help by making educational facilities available to Laotians. He mentioned some friends who had attended Laval University. Unfortunately time and circumstances did not permit the Military Adviser to have a longer conversation with him. It was interesting that he also attended the Military Adviser’s conversations with Gen. Singkapo.

6. Gen. Singkapo received the Military Adviser at his house. He was not in uniform. While the Military Adviser had intended to keep the conversation principally on military matters he found Singkapo prefaced his remarks by pointing out that since Laos is completely surrounded by other countries it is vital that she follow a neutral program. He felt that this would be possible only if Laos could keep clear of all foreign influences. Strangely enough he spoke objectively on this and inserted no partisan Communist comments. He, too, was obviously enthusiastic about the Geneva Agreement. Singkapo went to some lengths to stress the importance of everyone understanding the Geneva articles. He said that, on his part, every officer, soldier and villager would be taught the terms and meaning! He added that if Phoumi’s forces did not understand it, it would be too bad for them.

7. Singkapo also stressed his conception of the difference in the role of the Commission now to what it was the previous time. He said that under the old agreement “the teams could go anywhere they wanted and this caused trouble.” However, he said that now the “Commission will really be working for the government of Laos” under whose direction it would determine whether the terms of the agreement were being carried out. The Military Adviser commented that close cooperation between the government and the Commission would, of course, be essential. He added for the agreement to be truly effective the central government would have to be strong, honest and not torn by internal dissension. Did Singkapo think this would be rapidly achieved? Singkapo was noncommittal in his reply. However, he did say several times how important the work of the Commission would be in the development of a free and neutral Laos.

8. The Military Adviser raised the question of introduction of foreign personnel and matériel into Laos and Singkapo then became evasive. He said that he had not studied the agreement yet and all he knew about it was from fragments on the radio. After he had had a chance to study the agreement he would have some views. This statement seems at variance with his previous apparent knowledge.

9. In answer to a question on leave for his soldiers, he said that they had one leave per year; he would not say for how long. However, he added that after a soldier had served a year or two he could get a special leave, e.g. to get married.

10. The visit was well worthwhile as a means of establishing contact with the Neutralist and Pathet Lao military leaders. They, on their part, seemed genuinely to appreciate the visit. Kong Le struck the Military Adviser as being somewhat out of his depth whereas Singkapo seemed intelligent, mature and decisive.

WITHDRAWAL OF FOREIGN MILITARY PERSONNEL

On August 18 Quinim received Chairman, myself and Acting Polish Commissioner (Thee was away but will be back today) and told us that at Cabinet meeting previous day no repeat no agreement was reached on exit points for foreign forces. Chairman pointed to deadline and urged early decision. Quinim promised to see Commissioners again following Cabinet meeting to be held today.

2. On August 18 and 19 Unger and Hopson saw Phoumi and Souvanna separately and they have kept me informed. It appears that having received ministerial views on proposal he made August 13 (exit points at 8 to 10 places) Souvanna did not repeat not think it profitable to follow through on this on August 17. Instead each leader was to propose exit points for foreign forces in his area. Souvanna proposed Khang Khay for Vietminh technicians. Phoumi proposed Vientiane for Americans plus 2 or 3 other places if desired. Souphanouvong said there were no repeat no Vietminh in his area and therefore no repeat no need for exit points. Phoumi proposed 1 at Banban but Souphanouvong refused.

3. Phoumi subsequently suggested to Souphanouvong that those leaders simply declare that foreign forces have left their areas. Although Souphanouvong refused this Phoumi sought Unger's opinion. Unger said he could not repeat not speak for his Government or for Commission but he thought plan could only be considered if it were coupled with agreement that Commission could at any time investigate presence of foreign forces if it felt need to do so.

4. Souvanna told Unger he would do his best today to get 3 points though he was not repeat not very hopeful of this. He also gave Unger version of Phoumi's plan re tripartite military groups (paragraph 2 our reference telegram) which probably corresponds more closely to Phoumi's real thinking and which Souvanna seems to have adopted. Government would set up these groups to watch for presence or introduction of foreign forces and they would investigate any suspected violations. If they needed help from Commission they would call in Commission teams. Unger pointed to Commission's responsibility under agreement for investigating suspected introduction of forces and argued that in signing agreement Government had given consent in advance to any investigations Commission wished to make. He also said troika within groups would inhibit them and prevent any reference to Commission. On first point Souvanna politely demurred saying he felt that to conduct investigation Commission must receive Government concurrence however he took point about troika and said he would propose that groups operate on majority basis. Unger was seeing Phoumi this morning and would request him to advocate this.

5. Avtar Singh agrees with me that even if Government adopts such plan Commission must assert its right and responsibility (probably in practice with concurrence of Government) directly to investigate suspected introduction of forces if it has reasonable ground for doing so and that it need not repeat not wait upon information or request from Government or tripartite groups. Relating this to question of checking on (group missing) presence of foreign forces he points out that if with respect to any given place Commission has not repeat not been advised of an exit point and route to that point Commission would have right to assume, if it subsequently had reason to suspect presence of foreign forces in or near that place, that such forces were introduced subsequent to withdrawal exercise. Consequently it could seek to carry out investigation under articles relating to introduction of forces.

6. There are now 3 possibilities: (1) Government may reach decision which is reasonably satisfactory (2) it may reach decision which is unsatisfactory from West's point of view and (3) it may reach no repeat no decision before 30 day deadline which we calculate expires August 22. In any event Commission would probably report situation to Co-Chairmen. In case (2) or (3) Hopson feels Co-Chairmen should take suitable action.

7. USA is still trying to get several exit points on both sides. If Souphanouvong persists in denying any exit point for Vietminh from his area Unger thinks USA may hold back on its withdrawals.

8. In discussion with Unger and Hopson I renewed [reviewed?] plan Unger and I had previously discussed (paragraph 2 of your telegram Y-300†) but although I pointed out it should be acceptable if Government were to request it they thought it would be difficult to persuade Government to do this. Like Avtar Singh Hopson was not repeat not enthusiastic because procedure is not repeat not provided for under agreement. I still think plan has merit but am not repeat not pressing it at present.

9. I will discuss implications of above when reporting on results of today's Cabinet meeting.

WITHDRAWAL OF FOREIGN MILITARY PERSONNEL

On subject of your reference telegram Rufus Smith, USA Embassy Counsellor called on department this afternoon to express Washington's "severe concern" over lack of progress in establishing exit check-points for foreign forces, specifically for Vietminh. Because acceptance of check-points by all sides was at heart of Geneva Agreement refusal of Pathet Lao side to comply at this early stage cast serious doubt on both long term success of Agreement and on confidence that could be placed in present Laotian Government. He added that in light of these developments USA Government was considering whether or not to withhold its withdrawals pending clarification of situation. USA would take up this question with Soviet Union in Moscow. Smith emphasized that Washington's views should in no repeat no sense be taken as implying criticism of Canadian efforts in Laos.

2. We agreed with seriousness of problem, referring to points covered in your reference telegram and to analogy with situation in Vietnam where Communists refuse to admit their well-known sins. Pending further clarification from you we did not repeat not suggest any immediate solution to problem and will await your further report with interest.

LAOS

We received today August 24 with the Acting Officer in Charge of Laos Desk the announcement from Vientiane that agreement had finally been reached by the Laotian Government on three exit points for the evacuation of foreign troops from the country.

2. While acknowledging that some agreement was better than none, our informant remarked on the astuteness of Souphanouvong's action in choosing Nhommarat as the exit point for Pathet Lao<sup>17</sup> forces. Although there had certainly been evidence of Pathet Lao activity in that area, it would have been much more satisfactory from a Western point of view if the agreement had provided for an exit point farther to the north where it was known that concentrations of Pathet Lao forces were present. Noting that the ICC teams had fifteen days in which to station themselves at Nhommarat, our informant thought it was highly unlikely that there would be any Pathet Lao forces there when the ICC teams arrived. In addition, because of the ethnological similarities of the tribes in the region, it would probably be extremely difficult to distinguish between native inhabitants in the region and Vietminh.

3. We were informed that the selection of Vientiane as the exit point for foreign troops with the right wing faction posed considerable logistic difficulties for departing USA military personnel and consideration is being given in the State Department to the possibility of requesting the addition of one or two sub exit points closer to the area where USA personnel are currently stationed.

4. We obtained the impression that State Department officials concerned are not repeat not particularly optimistic about the possibilities of the Commission being able to fulfil its

Vietminh? [Auteur inconnu/ Author unknown]

functions effectively under the new agreement. Our informant laid particular stress on the importance of recognizing the authority vested in the ICC to conduct investigations without requesting permission on each occasion from the Laotian Government. The view in the State Department is that the restricted record of the Geneva Conference shows clearly that the Laotian Government had signified its agreement to the concept of the Commission undertaking investigations when there were reasonable grounds for the Commission believing that a violation of the Geneva agreement had occurred. Our informant said there were signs that Souvanna Phouma had been labouring under a misapprehension and an effort was being made to remind him of the understanding which had been reached and agreed to by his representatives at Geneva.

WITHDRAWAL OF FOREIGN MILITARY PERSONNEL

On August 20 Souphanouvong again refused to name exit point for foreign forces to be withdrawn from his area. Faced with impasse both Souvanna and Phoumi threatened to resign. There ensued consultations among Laotians during which Phoumi consulted separately with Unger, Avtar Singh, and me and Unger saw Souvanna. Unger continued to press for point in Pathet Lao area and I suggested that this could be facilitated if instead of Souphanouvong formally designating point Souvanna were to propose points including one for Pathet Lao pre-agreed with Souphanouvong and Phoumi. This procedure was followed, Phoumi tried but failed to get Tchepone, and on August 23 Cabinet met and agreed on Vientiane, Plaine des Jarres and Nhommarat as exit points for foreign forces.

2. Nhommarat is complex of small villages approximately 250 kms southeast of Vientiane and about midway between Thakhek and border of North Vietnam: it is just north of Mahaxay and is in Pathet Lao area.

3. Although Commission had been informally advised that Government considered August 23 to be deadline, Commissioners called on Foreign Minister Quinim August 22 saying deadline had been reached and asking if Government had agreed on exit points and routes and was prepared to consult with Commission. Quinim was doubtful if routes would be named but was hopeful of decision on points August 23. Commission was informed of points August 23 and called on Quinim August 24 for consultation. Chairman said no repeat no routes had been named and asked if Government intended to do this. Quinim said he did not repeat not think so.

4. Chairman said Commission was somewhat surprised that Nhommarat had been named as exit point since it has no repeat no airfield and is considerable distance from any frontier. How did Government envisage foreign military personnel leaving Laos through Nhommarat? Quinim said it was difficult for him to reply officially. He could say unofficially that Nhommarat had been named because it had proved necessary to name some point in Pathet Lao area. He said that some foreign personnel might be evacuated by helicopter and left impression these might be transported from (PDJ?) for this purpose.

5. I had previously ascertained that though by no repeat no means satisfied Unger was relieved that at least one point had been named in Pathet Lao area and was not repeat not disposed to seek to change Government decision. Phoumi had spoken separately with Avtar Singh and me urging us not repeat not to press Quinim for [explanation?] with regard to what had been decided since Phoumi said Quinim could not repeat not give it.

6. When Chairman had given Quinim Commission's views I saw no repeat no point in our further disputing matter and (or course without prejudice to what we may say in eventual report to Co-Chairmen) Commissioners agreed to accept points named.

7. On August 22 Unger told Avtar Singh and me that on August 25 USA wished to make initial withdrawal of 58 out of total of some 400 Filipino personnel. They are to be transported by commercial aircraft from Vientiane. As transport arrangements for August 25 had been made Unger (hoped?) Commission could agree as matter of urgency. Commission subsequently agreed provided that movement would be without prejudice to date of (formal?) commencement of 30 day withdrawal period, and [his?] Government agreed and named Vientiane as exit point so that team could supervise withdrawal. Commission would also require information in advance about time of withdrawal and personnel to be withdrawn. On August 23 Unger left appropriate note with Souvanna and when Quinim met Commissioners he said that Government was agreeable and that he would communicate officially with Commission in sense required.

8. Quinim then informed us that Neutralist authorities at Khang Khay wished to evacuate foreign personnel from PDJ on August 27. Especially in view of position re Filipino personnel there were no repeat no adequate grounds for refusing this request. Commissioners agreed on same conditions as laid down for Filipino personnel.

9. When I saw Unger to tell him results of meeting with Foreign Minister he told me that he thought it would now be difficult to move Filipinos on August 25 and that he would now like to do this on August 29. He subsequently so informed Quinim who advised Commission. We learned later that reason for postponement was that General Tucker Head of MAAG had just received message from his superiors in Washington requesting that Filipino withdrawals not repeat not start August 25 as planned but await commencement of withdrawal of USA personnel. Unger's decision was compromise between this and August 25.

10. Withdrawal foreign personnel from PDJ is to take place under Commission supervision August 27 as planned.

11. Quinim inferred that on August 23 Government had established Central Commission responsible for implementation of Geneva agreements. Its members would be leaders of Laotian delegation to Geneva Conference i.e. Quinim as Chairman, Vongvichit and Ngon Sananikone. Central Commission would be assisted by Ceasefire Committee and by another mixed committee called Mixed Committee for Control and Supervision of Withdrawal of Foreign Forces. International Commission's liaison with Government would be effected through Central Commission and its subordinate bodies. Quinim said nothing about establishment of tripartite Commissions which would have responsibility in field with regards to presence or reintroduction of foreign forces but reliable information suggests that this may be under active consideration by all three groups in Government. Ngon Sananikone has told me that these groups would [be given?] freedom of movement anywhere in Laos.

12. Few days ago on instructions Unger saw Souvanna and reinforced points he had previously made (re?) ability of such commissions since they might interfere with proper functioning of International Commission re foreign forces, and regarding wording of Protocol as meaning that Government had given concurrence in advance to Commission investigation (paragraph 4 our telegram 325 August 20). Result was inconclusive. Unger says he has given up effort to have any tripartite commissions operate on majority basis and I have made similar points in conversations with leaders but Unger and I [are] both beginning to feel that if all three leaders want such commissions it may be difficult to resist their establishment. There would of course be some advantage in such commissions moving freely throughout Laos.

13. At same time Commission has no repeat no intention of abrogating any of its responsibilities re foreign forces. Before end of 75 day period it might be able to use Avtar Singh's plan based on absence of routes (paragraph 5 of our telegram 325) (group omitted) for taking initiative to investigate: thereafter it would of course operate straightforwardly on basis of Protocol.

14. Avtar Singh is not repeat not now inclined to report to Co-Chairmen and my own inclination unless I find (Hopson?) disagrees is same.

COMMISSION ACTION

It became evident to negotiators in Geneva that neither DRVN nor PL would even admit presence of Vietminh in Laos. As recently as last June (Washington telegram 1826 June 18) USA officials in Washington were resigned to possibility that USA personnel were likely to be only foreign military who would be observed departing from Laos and that it might be difficult to establish need for observation of Vietminh withdrawals.

2. Naming of Nhommarat (from which at best there will be small token withdrawal of Vietminh technicians) and actual withdrawal of 15 Vietminh technicians from Plaine des Jarres under Commission supervision August 2 (more may come later) were mainly due (a) to serious efforts by Souvanna and Phoumi and (b) to Souvanna's determination to do his best to come clean in area under his control. Americans, British and ourselves were right to do all possible to bring about properly balanced withdrawals under supervision but Americans should not repeat not be surprised that actual results have been minimal. Attention must now be focussed on efforts to guard against continued presence of Vietminh after 75 day withdrawal period.

3. This involves question of Commission's freedom to investigate discussed in paragraph 4 of reference telegram. Unger and I are doing what we can here with Laotians and in Commission to gain acceptance for view that in signing agreement (the?) Laotian Government had given its concurrence in advance to Commission investigations on Commission initiative at least of certain matters. However we are not repeat not finding it easy to gain acceptance for this concept. As far as Laotians are concerned, unless they did so during resumed session of Geneva Conference this year, I do not repeat not think Conference record supports view that Laotian Government had actually accepted such a concept and it is difficult to assert with confidence that Indians did at least in any general sense. It is also relevant that even if Commission has concurrence of Government practical arrangements for investigation have to be made with cooperation of Government and local authorities.

4. You may count on me to do everything I can to support positive and reasonable interpretation of Protocol on this issue in Commission. So far as Laotian Government is concerned I do not repeat not think there is anything to be gained from suggesting that Souvanna has been labouring under misapprehension. I am not repeat not opposed to continued efforts to get him to accept Western concept but it may prove more profitable simply to use degree of concurrence afforded by Protocol as argument against Government opposing investigation when specific instances arise.

WITHDRAWAL OF FOREIGN FORCES

On August 27 the first withdrawal of foreign troops took place at the Plaine des Jarres. The ICSC team, comprised of one officer from each delegation, was present to supervise the withdrawal in accordance with the Protocol to the Declaration of Neutrality of Laos as per instructions issued to it by the ICSC. In anticipation of this withdrawal the team had been based at Xieng Khouang on August 25 in readiness to move to Plaine des Jarres as soon as a precise withdrawal time was made known. After consultation with the Liaison Officer appointed by the Royal Government of Laos the team positioned itself at the airfield, Plaine des Jarres, shortly before 10:00 hours, August 27. The withdrawing foreign forces arrived at the airfield shortly thereafter by truck.

2. The withdrawing personnel were in uniform consisting of sun helmets, dark khaki shirts, long trousers and jungle boots. After a brief ceremony of farewell, during which they received bouquets of flowers, the withdrawing personnel boarded the aircraft. The team Chairman requested that the aircraft departure be delayed until the arrival of the Commissioners but this request was denied on the grounds that it was necessary to adhere to the flight schedule. Since there had been a misunderstanding on departure timings at the ministerial level in Vientiane, it is not believed that denial of this request was for other than the reason stated.

3. The team was given a copy of the aircraft manifest but its request to examine identity papers was refused. This refusal was entered in the team's report to the Commissioners. The aircraft was identified as LI 14/W6112 and the crew as Russian. There were 15 passengers listed on the manifest as technicians, 5 officers and 10 NCOs; the destination was shown as Hanoi.

4. On inspecting the aircraft the team found that twenty-one male adults and one male child were aboard. On the Chairman asking which were the foreign troops the Liaison Officer pointed to the fifteen men in uniform. He stated that the others, in civilian clothes, were not part of the withdrawal. When again asked if it would be possible to examine the identification papers of the withdrawing group, the Liaison Officer again stated that this was impossible and that he had no orders which would allow the team to carry out such a procedure. He stated that the people in uniform were Vietnamese and they were returning to Hanoi. When asked to identify the five officers he pointed to five individuals. (It was noted that none of the uniformed personnel wore badges of rank.)

5. Accordingly, the team accepted the information provided by the manifest and the Liaison Officer and the aircraft departed at 10:35 hours.

[Ottawa], September 6, 1962

LAOS

You will recall that Mr. Rusk, in conversation with you on August 24, stressed the importance during the early stages of implementing the new Agreement on Laos of meticulously keeping to the letter and spirit of its provisions. He suggested that any departure from these provisions which would tend to weaken the Western position should be notified immediately to the Co-Chairmen so that pressure could be put on the U.S.S.R. to obtain compliance by its friends. You agreed as to the desirability of being firm from the outset in order to prevent erosion of the Agreement. You undertook to speak to the Indians along these lines.

2. At the time of Mr. Rusk's visit, the question of check-points had in fact been settled by the three leaders of Laos on a basis accepted by the West. As you know, the compromise finally reached was that Vientiane should be used as the withdrawal point for the foreign military elements attached to Phoumi's forces, the Plaine des Jarres for Vietminh personnel in neutralist areas, and Nhommarat for Vietminh personnel in Pathet Lao territory. The Commission's teams at Vientiane and the Plaine des Jarres have already witnessed initial withdrawals from right-wing and neutralist areas. We have not yet been informed whether withdrawals through Nhommarat have taken place. It would appear, therefore, that the articles concerning withdrawals have been or are being carried out. In fact, however, at least one provision has been ignored or by-passed, with the result that Commission inspection of withdrawing Communist units has been partially frustrated.

3. The provision in question (article 3 of the Protocol) makes it clear that withdrawal routes as well as check-points should be designated. Moreover, the selection of Nhommarat for the withdrawal of foreign troops from Pathet Lao territory is unsatisfactory because there is no airfield at that point; Nhommarat is far from any frontier and, while it is under Pathet Lao influence, it is not in a territory controlled by Vietminh troops. It is true that Phoumi has urged Avtar Singh and Bridle not to press the Government to change its decision with respect to Nhommarat or the absence of withdrawal routes, that the United States Ambassador has himself indicated that he is not disposed to challenge this decision, and that the decision is the result of difficult negotiations between the three factions. The fact remains that one stipulation in the Geneva agreement has not been complied with, and that three exit points for the 12,000 foreign troops (10,000 Vietminh and the remainder Americans and Filipino technicians) that are estimated to be in Laos seem hardly adequate. The Commission, as the organization entrusted with seeing that the Agreement is fully honoured, should perhaps take note of these facts and report them to the Co-Chairmen.

4. Other minor infractions of the rules (Vientiane telegram 331 of August 28,† attached) have occurred:

(a) there was a discrepancy between the number of Vietminh personnel withdrawn on August 27, through the Plaine des Jarres check-point, and the number listed on the aircraft manifest;

(b) the 15 Vietminh then being withdrawn refused to show their identity papers; and

(c) the aircraft carrying those Vietminh took off before the arrival of the Indian and Canadian Commissioners.

5. Another development giving some cause for concern is the proposal of the Royal Laotian Government to establish tripartite commissions which would have responsibilities regarding the presence or re-introduction of foreign military personnel. Such commissions might in time tend to take over rather than supplement the International Commission's responsibilities with regard to these matters.

6. Finally, there is disagreement between the Pathet Lao leaders and Communist representatives in Laos on the one hand, and Phoumi and Western missions on the other, as to the interpretation to be placed on articles 9, 11, 15 and 16 of the Protocol, which make it clear that the Commission must act with the concurrence of the Government of Laos. The first hold that the Laotian Government can withdraw its consent to any particular act of the Commission of which it does not approve, while the second maintain that the prior permission of the Laotian Government is not required in every case and that the Commission should be given facilities to go wherever and whenever it wishes. The Americans say that they had assurance from Souvanna Phouma on this point at the Geneva Conference. MacDonald made the point on a number of occasions that the general Laotian agreement to the operations of the Commission should be deemed to have been given at the time that the Protocol was signed by the Government of Laos. The wording of those articles was of course recognized to be ambiguous. The position of the Commission is not strengthened by the fact that in practice it is dependent on the R.L.G. for liaison officers, interpreters etc.

7. In the eight years since the International Commissions in Indochina were established, there has undoubtedly been a gradual erosion of the letter and spirit of the 1954 Agreements, accompanied by a slow deterioration of the situations in Vietnam and Laos and a serious loss of prestige by the Commissions in these two countries. It seems to us important that the revived Commission in Laos should establish from the outset that it is not going to let the new Agreement be thus diluted without the signatories being fully informed. We therefore consider that the infractions described above should be duly recorded and, if need be, reported to the Co-Chairmen and through the latter to the members of the Conference.

8. Attached for your signature, if you agree, is a telegram† requesting Ronning to discuss these matters with Indian officials, and asking Bridle for his comments on the views we have expressed.<sup>18</sup>

REPORT TO CO-CHAIRMEN ON WITHDRAWAL OF FORCES

Consulting with Unger and Hopson I have been participating in preliminary discussions with other commissioners re report to Co-Chairmen on withdrawal of foreign forces. Chairman invited colleagues to give him notes but it was agreed that he would prepare draft as basis for formal discussion. On October 10 I gave Chairman preliminary Canadian draft. Thee has so far submitted nothing.

2. Basis of Canadian draft was your wish that report should make clear respects in which agreement was not repeat not being fulfilled either in letter or spirit. Factual part brings out failure of Government to name route and inadequacy of Nhommarath as exit point. Chairman's draft is too neutral in (this?) respect and I will try to strengthen it.

3. On central issue of Vietminh failure to withdraw bulk of forces under Commission supervision and likelihood that substantial number remain I prepared language indicating that Commission has reason to believe that total number of DRVN personnel in Laos was far greater than number withdrawn under Commission supervision. Avtar Singh would not repeat not accept this on grounds that Commission could only make such statement if it officially possessed evidence to support it. He wishes to say instead that Commission has reason to believe that considerable withdrawal of foreign forces took place without supervision or control of Commission during twenty five day period and that Commission has no repeat no means of knowing exact extent of such withdrawal.

Tel Y-318 signed by SSEA Sept. 6, sent 5:20 p.m. Sept. 6. [R.H.]

4. Unger accepts my inability to get desired language even on majority basis and would prefer that alternative proposed by Chairman be omitted. His reason is that this language could apply to USA personnel as well as to Vietminh. I have reason to believe that relatively small number of USA personnel left Laos prior to thirty day period without Commission supervision. Even so there is little doubt that Vietminh technical breach of this aspect of agreement has been of far greater scale. Therefore Chairman's proposed language is somewhat efficient in equity. Nevertheless in my opinion balance of advantage lies in retaining such language, since it can be read as implying considerably greater Vietminh presence than Commission supervision has revealed and at same time gives somewhat more realistic impression of general situation. Unger is not repeat not very happy about proposed language but does not repeat not consider its deletion essential.

5. On second central issue of what foreign forces may still be in Laos Chairman intends to quote relevant part of Prime Minister's statement of October 7 (our telegrams 400† and 401 † October 9).<sup>19</sup> At same time it is necessary also to reflect interview which commissioners had October 9 with Quinim in capacity as Chairman of Government Commission in charge of implementation of Geneva Agreement. Quinim said Souvanna's statement had not repeat not been cleared with Cabinet and was made on his own responsibility. Quinim had so far received no repeat no information or complaint that foreign forces are still present in Laos and until he receives proof to contrary he must accept that such forces are no repeat no longer present. If and when he received information or complaint of presence of foreign forces he would have matter investigated and would inform Commission.

6. Unger and Hopson agree that report must somehow reflect this statement. In sense it can be regarded as complementary to Souvanna's and as of some small use with respect to Commission action.

7. Chairman's draft would also contain information Government has indicated to Commission that according to USA Embassy withdrawals of USA and Philippine personnel which have taken place mark total withdrawal of such personnel from Laos. Thee has informally circulated to Commissioners text of (group omitted) of DRVN information agency which states that agency is authorized to declare that Vietnamese military personnel who were sent to Laos at request of Government of Laos have been withdrawn from territory of Laos. It also charges that certain number of USA military personnel remain in Laos having been introduced into diplomatic, economic aid or information agencies, that others have formed secret maquis units, that there are still in Laos military personnel belonging to Thailand, South Vietnam, Philippines and "Chiang Kai Shek," that USA military personnel withdrawn from Laos have reinforced USA troops in Thailand, and that USA continues to parachute supplies to "armed bandits" in certain parts of Laos.

8. Chairman does not repeat not regard this declaration as having any official status but I think Thee may seek to introduce it possibly by having at least substance of second sentence paragraph 7 conveyed officially to Government of Laos. If he does so USA Embassy may take similar action to provide Commission with claim of continuing Vietminh presence which [would] have official status.

9. Since Chairman's draft already contains statement to effect that various radio broadcasts and newspaper reports are making strong charges about continued presence of thousands of foreign forces of various nationalities in Laos there is probably little to be gained as far as report is concerned from adding more detailed charges from both sides. If it comes to this I will not repeat not resist since Hopson feels that inclusion of Vietminh charges would make it easier for UK Co-Chairman to persuade Russians to join in some sort of recommendation to Commission that facts be ascertained.

10. Chairman's draft contains statement that so far Commission has received no repeat no complaint or request for investigation from any quarter regarding presence of foreign forces. Unger is opposed to such statement in report and says that if Chairman insists on retaining it his Embassy will have to make complaint forthwith. If Chairman agrees to delete this sentence Unger will continue as at present to judge utility and timing of Embassy complaint to Commission in relation to current efforts within Laotian Government to work out (group corrupt) which allegations from both factions would be investigated. (I am reporting separately on this.)

11. Chairman's draft concludes with sentence "if and when Commission has reasonable grounds for considering that violation of relevant article of Geneva Protocol has occurred Commission will take appropriate actions about it as laid down in Protocol." I will try to have word article written in plural since I consider that in addition to action under Article Eleven covering investigation of violations of article on introduction of forces Commission could take initiative under Article 15 investigation [or?] Article 2 on withdrawal of foreign forces.

12. I have discussed with Unger possibility of Canadian minority report on any central issue on which agreed report may fall short of what would be best from Western point of view. Like me he sees little advantage in this provided agreed report meets minimum Western requirements. In any case possibility of minority report containing conclusions is problematical except re investigations.

13. Commission will discuss Chairman's draft October 15. I expect to be under some pressure both from Western representatives and from Thee to facilitate early despatch of report. Please advise soonest by quickest means if I may sign report on own responsibility if it seems best that can be obtained in circumstances.

REPORT TO CO-CHAIRMAN ON WITHDRAWAL OF FORCES

We are anxious that this first report by the Commission on implementation of Laos agreement should establish a firm basis for efforts to secure full compliance with the Agreement's provisions. We are also anxious that report should convey clear impression that Commission is fulfilling its proper responsibilities effectively and promptly and should avoid any implication that Commission's responsibilities and powers are greater than defined in the agreement.

2. Such a report would have to be factual and to refrain from stating conclusions or drawing inferences from evidence not at present before the Commission. Since unanimity is in any case required by Article 14 for decisions on questions relating to withdrawals and for conclusions on major questions, it seems evident that only by keeping factual can agreement be reached.

3. Points which we consider it essential to include in report are these: (a) a precise listing of withdrawals supervised by Commission under Articles 2, 3 and 10 of Protocol, naming nationalities and points, (b) a clear statement that Commission is not in a position to say whether or to what extent these controlled withdrawals constitute full compliance with Article 2 of Protocol, paragraph 2 of declaration and sub-paragraph 6 of Laotian Government's statement incorporated in declaration; this statement should not include reports of charges and counter-charges of violations, although we would see no objection to some reference to Souvanna Phouma's statement of October 7, (c) an affirmation of Commission's readiness to investigate under articles 15 and 11 when there are reasonable grounds for considering that a violation has occurred, and to report immediately under Article 8 any violations, threats of violation or other important information which might assist Co-Chairmen.

4. So as not to inhibit future efforts to secure fuller compliance, report should avoid any implication that responsibility for compliance was limited to period designated in Article 2. Emphasis should be placed on primary and continuing responsibility of signatory parties to agreement. Mention should also be made of obligation assumed by Laotian Government in its statement of July 9 to "require" withdrawal of all foreign military personnel. To protect position and prestige of Commission, it is important to make clear that Commission's specific responsibilities with regard to withdrawals are those set out in articles 2 and 10.

5. We would prefer to see text before signature. If however in your judgment text conforms with above criteria, and if your colleagues are strongly inclined to proceed without delay, you may sign report without further reference to Ottawa.

REPORT TO CO-CHAIRMEN ON WITHDRAWAL OF FORCES

I put to other commissioners principles outlined in your paragraph 1 and deductions therefrom in first sentence of your paragraph 2. They fully accept your principles and your deductions.

2. Nevertheless though I did my utmost I could not repeat not persuade them to accept (main?) proposal in your paragraphs 3 and 4. On 3(b) the commis(sioners were?) adamant that the role of the Commission is to supervise and control withdrawal, to investigate any suspected violations and to report any violations or threats of violation of the relevant articles. The Commission they hold is not repeat not called upon by the Protocol to state whether or not repeat not there has been full compliance with relevant parts of it, the declaration or the Laotian statement. To state our inability to do so would be to imply that we have duty to do so and this they will not repeat not accept.

3. On 3(c) other commissioners are both of view that paragraph in Chairman's draft quoted in paragraph 11 of my telegram 407 and amended as indicated in that paragraph gives a stronger and more comprehensive statement of the Commission's intentions than the wording in 3(c). They hoped you might (agree?) and suggested that word "immediately" might be inserted so that operative part of sentence would read "Commission will immediately take appropriate action etc."

4. On charges and counter charges of violations I had a word with Unger before Commission's meeting and found he would greatly regret disappearance of relevant sentence. He feels this would rob British Chairman of main talking point in event that at some stage it should be desired to ask Co-Chairmen to make appropriate recommendations to Commission. Both Commissioners would also like to retain this sentence. They consider it valuable as portraying atmosphere in which Commission finds itself at this stage before it has received any formal complaint, and they submit that as written it involves no repeat no inference on Commission's part. I think they would reluctantly drop this sentence if you are not repeat not persuaded but they would very much like to see it retained.

5. I also told Unger of material outlined in second and third sentences of your paragraph 4 which I had been instructed to have included. He hoped that this emphasis would not repeat not indirectly tend to diminish continuing role of Commission. In Commission I nevertheless advocated language embodying the sentence but found that both my colleagues were strongly of view that any such assertion by Commission would seriously weaken Commission's position with regard to investigation of suspected violations. I am yet to be convinced of sincerity of Polish Commissioner's present professed attachment to investigation but since above proposal was not repeat not one which you consider essential I agreed not repeat not to press it further.

6. 3(a) was already fully covered and with respect to the only sentence in the draft which might possibly have been construed in the sense apprehended in the first sentence of your paragraph 4 I was able to have it reworded so that it could not repeat not be so construed.

7. In separate telegram† I am sending abbreviated text of draft which is acceptable to other commissioners. They submit that it conforms to the principle in paragraphs 1 and 2 of your reference telegram and, though it is far from ideal, I also believe it meets this test.

8. A formal complaint about Vietminh presence has already been lodged with the National Commission and though I do not repeat not rate highly chances of Commission referring to International Commission there may be early developments in that body and partly depending on these Americans may soon submit complaint to International Commission. Thus events may alter situation and force revision to draft report possibly preventing its despatch for some time since Polish Commissioner has threatened to stall if no repeat no complaint has been received from Communist side.

9. Other commissioners and Western colleagues most anxious that report be sent soonest. In the circumstances I may find it necessary to take advantage of discretion to sign afforded in paragraph 5 of your reference telegram but I would be most grateful to receive your further instructions this weekend if possible.

LAOS COMMISSION – REPORT ON MILITARY WITHDRAWALS

On Saturday afternoon, October 20, we received two telegrams from Bridle concerning the report to be made by the Laos Commission on withdrawals of foreign military personnel. He stated that a draft acceptable to his two colleagues had been prepared, and he expressed the belief that it conformed to the principles enunciated in your telegram Y-355 of October 17. While explaining that he might find it necessary to use the discretion you had given him, he asked for further instructions during the weekend if possible. (Vientiane telegrams 415 and 416† of October 19.)

2. It seemed clear that the tentatively agreed draft covered adequately two of the three points mentioned in your earlier instructions. On the third point, it appeared to convey the substance though in a different way: instead of stating that the Commission was “not in a position to say whether or to what extent the controlled withdrawals constituted full compliance,” the draft merely noted that “various radio broadcasts and newspaper reports are making strong charges about the continued presence of thousands of foreign forces of various nationalities in Laos.”

3. In view of the discretion you had already given to Bridle, the strenuous efforts he had made – with some success – to secure full acceptance for your suggestions, and the urgency he attached to an immediate reply, we informed him that the draft text was acceptable. I trust that in doing so we were acting in the spirit of your instructions.<sup>20 21</sup>

FOREIGN FORCES IN LAOS

I have continued in close touch with Western representatives, Phoumi and Avtar Singh re timing and method of Commission initiative.

2. Consensus is it would be best if National Commission were to refer any complaints it has received to International Commission. Although Souvanna has urged this on National Commission and Vongvichit has told me this might be done, chances of this have seemed unlikely and week ago had begun to feel that, although National Commission is still awaiting Vongvichit's reaction to proposal that complaints be investigated, it was time to have complaint submitted directly to International Commission. However we then learned that October 23 Souvanna would visit Hanoi to urge leaders there to have remaining Vietminh withdrawn. In spite of risk that Souvanna might return sufficiently reassured to feel that investigations should be postponed a little longer, we felt that we should await his return before taking action since it is important to have his cooperation.

3. Chances of government facilitating investigation might be improved if PL complaint were also before Commission but except for complaint to National Commission re alleged presence of USA military personnel in USA agencies, which Commission is taking up directly with Embassy, Vongvichit is still being backward about submitting complaints to substantiate PL propaganda charges (our telegram 420 October 24+).

4. On October 23 Phoumi told me he was prepared to have Ngon Sananikone, in effect his representative on National Commission, provided "almost officially" with precise information which could form basis for International Commission initiative. I discussed this with Avtar Singh and Hunter and we agreed that this would be best method short of several [texte manquant/text missing] by National Commission. Providing it was done informally it would seem natural for Ngon, having attempted without success to obtain action in National Commission, to approach International Commission to act on basis of complaint from one of Laotian factions than on basis of complaint from USA Embassy. Latter will however keep in touch with Phoumi with view to assisting Ngon to put in precise and reasonable complaint.

5. It was also agreed that exact timing of Commission action would depend partly on appreciation of situation shortly to be made in light of Souvanna's attitude on his return from Hanoi as well as on state of play in National Commission. However general disposition, which I certainly share, is to act soon.

6. Possibility of early International Commission was given further impetus late yesterday by reports (as yet unconfirmed) that Souvanna on return from Hanoi had said North Vietnamese, while still asserting no repeat no Vietminh remain in Laos, wanted International Commission investigation to set suspicions at rest. Phoumi (who October 24 had given press conference detailing still somewhat exaggerated account of Vietminh presence)<sup>22</sup> asked for meeting on National Commission yesterday but Vongvichit asked for postponement until today – presumably to enable him to consult.

FOREIGN FORCES IN LAOS

I should add that when Unger and I were still considering possibility of action on basis of USA complaint Unger had decided that this would best be done by means of informal approach to me. However he drew up letter which he proposed to send me and which he showed me in advance which outlined USA compliance and DRVN failure to comply and said that information re letter in an attached memorandum was forwarded for whatever use I might wish to make of it to further objective of having remaining Vietminh withdrawn. Since material in memorandum was rather general and based on pre October 17 evidence, letter added that I might expect to receive more precise information from Embassy. Unger explained that he had in mind 2 or 3 cases based on post October 7 evidence.

2. I pointed out that letter in these terms would place me and perhaps indirectly Commission in vulnerable position since even though material received was not repeat not very suitable as basis for action and it was understood I was not repeat not expected to act on it, yet could be construed as putting me and Commission in position to act even though we had not repeat not done so on basis of information provided.

3. I felt concern about this because Unger repeatedly said that purpose of letter was to place his embassy "on record." This was incidentally reminiscent of situation shortly after October 17 when (Washington telegram 2985 October 12†) State Department spokesman Lincoln White had incorrectly conveyed impression to press that USA had asked Commission to investigate<sup>23</sup> and Cross of State Department explaining this to our Embassy said he presumed Unger had "in accordance with his instruction" confidentially and informally requested Commission chairman or Canadian delegation to undertake investigation. Cross also understood that USA representatives had made it clear that USA was "urging" investigation by Commission. Except in sense that Unger has been urging this on Laotian Government both these latter statements are also incorrect. I let all this pass at that time; Unger's proposed letter made me feel that it might be designed to place USA authorities in position to make some similar statement in future.

4. Unger took my point but was reluctant simply to give me memorandum without any covering letter. He said he would write letter omitting part to which I objected and that he would continue forwarding information from time to time. Following procedural decision reported in reference telegram we thought such information could probably best be used in support of complaints received from Laotians.

5. I find USA tactics puzzling. My best guess is that Unger, who has participated in consultation here on timing and procedure and who agrees with decisions taken nevertheless still has instructions which made it necessary for him at least to address letter to me in terms now used. This leads me to wonder if Washington may not repeat not want to be in position at later stage to say publicly that USA did everything possible to keep Commission informed re Vietminh presence requiring investigation. This is perhaps unexceptionable in itself but manner in which USA has proceeded leads me to feel Canadian delegation or Commission could obliquely be put in somewhat invidious light. This would no repeat no doubt depend on style of any USA statement if by that time Commission had taken initiative re investigation. I hope that any discussion of this question by our Embassy in Washington would preserve friendly informality of my discussions of it with Unger.

6. Text of letter is in following telegram. † Please advise if acknowledgement.

PERSONAL AND SECRET

Washington, November 13, 1962

Dear John [Teakles],

In our telegram No. 3336 of November 9, we reported that we had informed State Department of your instructions regarding the inception of Commission action on alleged foreign forces in Laos and had discussed your views on appropriate means for consultation between Canadian and United States authorities in relation to Commission action in Laos. During our interview Cross, of the Laos desk, was friendly and appeared to accept our viewpoint without demur.

However, he not unnaturally asked some fairly searching questions about the circumstances of Ambassador Unger's letter to Paul Bridle, which, as we reported, he had not known about. I attempted to answer as fully as I could on the basis of Paul Bridle's telegram No. 423 of October 26. In the course of doing so I pointed out that it might become invidious for the Canadian Commissioner alone to receive written statements of the views of the United States Government. When Cross enquired why this might be so, I said that it would depend, of course, upon whether the fact became known, but that assuming it did, the Canadian Commissioner might be made to appear unnecessarily responsive to the interests of the United States Government rather than to his terms of reference under the Geneva Protocol, which clearly was intended to impose international, rather than national, obligations upon the individual members of the Commission.

Cross seemed to find this point of view somewhat disturbing. He said that United States officials had believed that the Canadian role in the Laos Commission, in the light of the second Geneva Conference, would be distinctly different from, and "more forceful" than, the Canadian role in the other two Indochina Commissions. He thought that Canadian efforts in the Laos Commission to avoid the appearance of being a spokesman for Western, or even United States, interests, would fool no one. I agreed that in all three Commissions, and perhaps especially in Laos, we might readily be identified as representing a Western point of view in many instances, simply because we did share many objectives with Western countries and with the United States in particular. However, I pointed out that formally, and for tactical reasons (especially in our relations with the Indians), it was necessary for the Canadian role to be related as closely as possible to the relevant terms of reference and to avoid unnecessary identification with particular Western interests.

Cross did not pursue his line of argument and readily agreed that for tactical reasons our position of independence within the Commission had to be protected. Also, in the specific case in question (Unger's letter to Bridle), Cross seemed to appreciate fully our position.

I do not believe that we have at the moment a serious problem in explaining to the Americans our role in the Laos, or other Commissions. There have been perhaps undertones of Cross's suggestion in other conversations we have had with State Department officials, although never so bluntly expressed. At the same time senior State Department officials, and in particular Assistant Secretary Harriman, have as a rule been carefully correct in making suggestions to us about what the United States would like to see achieved in specific situations under consideration in the Commissions. Until now Cross himself has never more than tacitly implied that United States and Canadian interests in Laos are identical, or that we should somehow be the avowed exponent of a United States point of view. Accordingly we are not disposed to be alarmed at Cross's statement to me on November 8, but we thought you should be aware of this attitude so that you, as well as we, may be alert to any further development of it. Naturally if you think there is anything we could usefully say to Cross or others on this subject, we should be glad to hear from you.

I am attaching a copy of this letter in case you wish to send it to Candel Vientiane.<sup>24</sup>

Yours sincerely,

TED RETTIE

COMMISSION INVESTIGATIONS

On December 5 at Unger's house there was general discussion of ICSC investigations of presence of foreign forces with Alexis Johnson who passed through from Bangkok en route to Saigon and Washington. Hopson, Morris (Australian Minister), Avtar Singh and I participated. While Hopson (having in mind possible utility of report to Co-Chairmen as means of bringing Russian pressure to bear on PL) favoured ICSC initiative as best way of maintaining its moral authority, consensus was that aim should be to get ICSC into action without much further delay on best possible basis. Johnson seems to have left Vientiane convinced that, while issue should be brought to head, it would be best if National Commission could reach agreement thus activating RLG request to ICSC.

2. On December 6 Hopson discussed with Unger, Avtar Singh and me telegram he had received from Foreign Office which inter alia took exception to National Commission attempting to lay down conditions for ICSC investigations and asserted that ICSC should itself take initiative and tell Government where it proposes to investigate and how it intends to do it. Upshot of discussion and of discussion following day at weekly meeting of Western ambassadors was that Hopson sent telegram to Foreign Office saying that it was general view of his Western colleagues that RLG should be given two or three more days to reach agreement if it can and if not repeat not ICSC should take initiative. Unger sent Washington long telegram which he subsequently showed me which attributed to his Western colleagues, Avtar Singh and me general view that it is possible (and from point of view of time desirable) that there be prompt request from RLG to ICSC to investigate and that following these initial investigations which would be carried out under less than optimum conditions ICSC would take initiative with view to making further investigations of Vietminh presence on basis of what was described (presumably without clinical overtones) as Bridle's complaint; but that if there were no repeat no prompt request from RLG (and prompt was elsewhere defined as "in coming days") ICSC should take initiative on basis of my complaint with view to investigating at one or more points where Vietminh are suspected and if warranted would follow this up with proposal to make further investigations of this kind.

3. Following Phoumi's return to Vientiane December 6 National Commission discussed foreign forces December 7. Vientiane side would not repeat not accept proposal that RLG request ICSC to investigate at two specified places without mention of perimeter and maintained demand for ten km radius; according to USA source they also increased demand re duration of renewable visits to seven days. We have also unconfirmed report that Vongvichit will not repeat not agree to visits to places without specified perimeter and that he still wants two km radius; at any rate daily renewable visits seems all he is prepared to contemplate with regard to duration.

4. On December 7 following meeting of National Commission Phoumi told me in his view time had come to accept disagreement there leaving it to ICSC to approach Government. Quinim told Hopson it was unlikely National Commission would not repeat not meet again [sic] until three leaders had met to discuss implementation of November 27 agreement and related matters. Meeting of leaders scheduled December 8 was postponed because Phoumi was indisposed.

5. On December 9 at Souvanna's dinner for Malcolm MacDonald (here on short private visit) Hopson informed Souvanna of gist of Foreign Office telegram mentioned in paragraph 2 above. Souvanna asked Quinim re latest developments in National Commission and on being informed of continued impasse told him and subsequently Ngon that time had come to stop haggling over details and to reach agreement on basis for RLG request to ICSC to commence investigations. Souvanna thought that if this involved imperfect modalities ICSC would make its views known at appropriate time and RLG should then try to cooperate in providing additional facilities needed by ICSC.

6. Following morning I saw Phoumi at his request. He said both Pushkin in Moscow and MacDonald here had impressed on him desire of their respective governments to see Geneva Agreement fully implemented and to support coalition government. In Delhi Nehru had emphasized desirability of government affording ICSC cooperation it needs to fulfill its task as part of implementation of agreement. Phoumi told me he is impressed with need to get ICSC into action on best possible basis without further delay and that consequently after talking to Ngon he was prepared to have Ngon agree in National Commission to RLG request to ICSC mentioning modalities re place and time while PL have indicated they would be prepared to accept. However Phoumi said there is alternative of ICSC approach to RLG in which case he thought issue would be posed in same terms but, he suggested, his side could then accept modalities PL had indicated they would accept. He would like me to reflect on these alternatives and give him my views; he would also like to have views of Avtar Singh and Unger. He himself was now endeavouring to persuade his group that first alternatives should be adopted. I again said that in this case Ngon could protect Vientiane side by emphasizing, when indicating agreement in National Commission, that he did not repeat not consider modalities satisfactory.

7. On returning to my office I found that Hopson wished to see me to tell me of development after dinner previous night. I told him of my subsequent conversation with Phoumi and he said it was his opinion that Ngon should now accept modalities PL have indicated they would accept. I then saw Unger and Avtar Singh. Three of us reached same view as Hopson though Unger wished to add rider that if at next meeting PL sought to introduce new restrictions and Ngon would not repeat not dissuade them Ngon should break off negotiations in National Commission and leave ICSC to take initiative. I was asked to see Phoumi and convey views accordingly.

8. Phoumi had gone to Luang Prabang to report to King on his tour and to bring to Vientiane Crown Prince whom he was to accompany today to Savannakhet for two day festival. I made every effort to see Phoumi between his return to Vientiane yesterday evening and his departure for Savannakhet early this morning but without success. However Hopson who had seen Unger at lunch yesterday saw Phoumi yesterday evening with MacDonald. At subsequent dinner given MacDonald by Commission Hopson told me he had informed Phoumi of view held by Unger himself, Avtar Singh and me, and that Phoumi had said that in Savannakhet he would endeavour to persuade Boun Oum and others of his group to adopt course we prefer.

9. I have told Unger of my inability to see Phoumi and of view Hopson had conveyed to him (which may have included Unger's rider). Unger and I are to see Hopson when he returns this evening from Luang Prabang (where he has taken MacDonald to see King) and we will see Phoumi on his return to Vientiane December 13.

10. Ambassadors and Commissioners have been invited to Kermesse at patronage of King. Phoumi told Hopson it is unlikely National Commission can meet again until after December 15.

LAOS – ICSC INVESTIGATION

On December 17 Koren, Director of Office Southeast Asian Affairs, accompanied by Cross of the Laos Desk, called us in to say that State Department had come to conclusion that failing

RLG request “within next day or so” to ICSC to conduct investigation in Houeisai and Sam Neua ICSC should take initiative to conduct investigation itself. Agreeing with recommendation of Ambassador Unger State Department was therefore asking Canadian Government to instruct Canadian Commissioner to proceed with action towards independent ICSC investigation.

2. In subsequent discussion it appeared that Unger had decided that continual delays occasioned by RLG National Commission could no longer be tolerated and that ICSC not repeat not having acted independently up to the present would be cast in a ridiculous light. State Department fully agreed. Officials understood that National Commission would have been considering question of investigations over past weekend and in any event at the latest on December 17. If RLG request to Commission were forthcoming and if it were “conditioned” (USA of course would prefer that no repeat no conditions be attached) ICSC investigation could proceed subject, they would hope, to clear statement by ICSC of its resistance to conditions and subject also to ICSC report after the investigations had been concluded as to any deficiencies in investigation arising out of conditions.

3. If however RLG request were not repeat not forthcoming State Department hoped that independent initiative would be taken by ICSC to conduct investigations and that these investigations would be “unconditioned.”

4. In further discussion Koren indicated that USA objectives were to secure adequate investigation or make plain source of frustration and obstruction of ICSC activities called for by Geneva agreements. He did not repeat not think that a further prior approach to Soviet Co-Chairman either by his British colleague or directly by USA representative would serve any useful purpose. Only course in his view was to equip Western representatives with actual instance of Pathet Lao frustration and obstruction in relation to specific investigations as a prelude to any further approach to USSR. He and Cross confirmed that Soviet position as conveyed to President Kennedy by Mikoyan (see also our telegram 3545 December 5† paragraph 6) was that Laos agreements should be observed and that USSR was carrying out its obligations.<sup>25</sup>

5. Another objective stressed by Cross was desirability of ICSC activity as a means of strengthening Souvanna Phouma’s position even though Souvanna might not repeat not be as active as he should be in taking advantage of ICSC role in support of his position. Cross and Koren however derived considerable satisfaction from reports they had had that Souvanna was now in favour of ICSC investigation. Koren was not repeat not sure of whether Souvanna wished investigation to proceed as a result of RLG request. However Cross agreed that Souvanna still seemed to be thinking of request by RLG.

LAOS – COMMISSION INVESTIGATIONS

You will recall that in its unanimous report of October 22 (made public on November 10) the Laos Commission referred to radio and newspaper reports of “strong charges about the continued presence of thousands of foreign forces of various nationalities in Laos.” The report concluded: “If and when the Commission has reasonable grounds for considering that a violation of the relevant articles of the Geneva Protocol has occurred, the Commission will immediately take appropriate action about it as laid down in the Geneva Protocol.”

2. On November 15, in accordance with your instructions of November 7 (your telegram Y-363, copy attached†), Bridle formally proposed to his Indian and Polish colleagues that the Commission should “at once initiate investigations of the alleged presence of foreign military personnel.” He suggested that it should begin with two named localities, on the understanding that others would follow; and he urged the Commission to “make its intentions known to the Royal Laotian Government.”

3. On November 16 the Laotian Prime Minister, Prince Souvanna Phouma, asked Bridle “to impress on you that ICSC approach to RLG at this time would be poor strategy.” Recalling that he had spoken publicly of resigning if some tangible progress were not made in the direction of unity, Souvanna implied a wish “at this time to avoid disturbance within government which he considered ICSC intervention would create.” His main emphasis seemed to be “on ICSC refraining if at all possible in order to allow time for RLG to approach ICSC rather than vice versa.”

4. You replied on November 22 (telegram Y-371 attached†) that in the light of Souvanna’s views you were “prepared to agree that Canadian initiative should not be pressed to a vote before he (Souvanna) has had an opportunity” to exert further pressure on the fractious extremists in his government. You instructed Bridle, however, to “resume pressure when in your opinion this would help advance overriding objective of strengthening Souvanna’s authority and implementing terms of Laos Agreement.”

5. A further month has now elapsed. During this time the Laotian factions have continued to haggle – partly over the localities to be investigated, but principally over the extent of the areas to be investigated and the length of time the teams should remain at each place. The Canadian and Indian Commissioners and the Western ambassadors in Vientiane are all agreed that these matters should be decided by the Commission (subject of course to a right of dissent by the Laotian Government). The Pathet Lao, however, probably supported by the Russians and Poles, firmly maintain that it is for the Government of Laos to decide such matters. On this question they can count on some support from Phoumi’s faction, which attaches importance to its own right of veto. It has seemed to Bridle that, in the interest of getting investigations started, the best course would be to accept in practice such limitations as the Laotians can agree on, criticize these as necessary, and seek to remove them as investigations proceed.

6. I think that Bridle is probably right in his judgement that insistence on the Commission’s right to send teams where in Laos it sees fit, and to have them stay there as long as it considers necessary, is likely to result in no investigations for the time being – and probably in a report to the Co-Chairmen explaining the obstruction. Souvanna Phouma might not like this and would probably prefer to continue pressing his recalcitrant colleagues. I also think, however, that a bold assertion by the Commission of its rights, with suitable attendant publicity, might in the long run prove more valuable than immediate investigations; and I think that the risks in this course, which undeniably exist, are worth running.

7. Attached for your consideration is a telegram of instructions to Bridle.<sup>26</sup>

LAOS – ICSC INVESTIGATIONS

I think that disadvantages of further inaction on this question now outweigh risks of proceeding decisively in Commission. While I was prepared to wait in deference to Souvanna's wishes while he exerted further pressure on his recalcitrant lieutenants (your telegram 441 November 17 † and my telegram Y-371 November 22), only tangible result seems to have been continued bickering between Laotian factions on how far ICSC teams may go from chosen localities and how long they may stay there.

2. These are questions on which, as all Western representatives and Avtar Singh agree, ICSC itself should make proposals "in relation to requirements of particular investigation" (Article 16 of Protocol). Our view is that having decided under Article 15 that reasonable grounds exist for considering that a violation has occurred, ICSC should request RLG to render "all possible assistance" and to take "all necessary measures" as specified in Article 13 (my telegram Y-363 November 7). We believe also that concurrence of RLG required by Article 15 should be assumed rather than asserted, and I am glad to note general agreement with this view by Western representatives (your telegram 466 December 14. †) Relevant sections of your memorandum of November 15 to ICSC † have my full approval.

Tel Y-384 to Vientiane signed by SSEA Dec. 19/62 and sent Dec. 19/62. M. N. B[ow]

3. I realize of course that PL probably supported by Russians and Poles strongly hold contrary view that questions of time and place should be decided by RLG, and that in this they can probably expect some support from Phoumi's group. If RLG could agree on request to ICSC to investigate, even on inadequate basis, I would see some advantage in acceptance so that investigations could commence and restrictive conditions could be protested and reported. But having taken position that one month after terminal date for withdrawals was time enough for Laotian factions to agree (my telegram Y-363 November 7), and then at Souvanna's request waited for a second month, I am now convinced that further delay would be seriously detrimental to position of ICSC and injurious if not dangerous to prospects for implementation of Geneva agreement.

4. In reaching this conclusion I am influenced by fact that investigations have been requested in principle by Souvanna (your telegram 422 October 26), by DRVN (your telegram 429 October 29†), by Phoumi's group (your telegram 433 November 4†) and by PL (your telegram 438 November 16†), while Russians, Chinese and Western powers concerned have all reiterated support for full observance of agreement. This consensus is certainly more apparent than real, but ICSC as organ of Geneva Conference (Article 14) should make every effort to give it effective expression.

5. There are two risks, as I see it, in pressing ahead with insistence by ICSC on its right to decide (subject to dissent by RLG) how its investigations shall be conducted.

(a) It may result in no investigations at all for time being. This would be unfortunate; but since I agree with you that we cannot reasonably assume teams even with utmost zeal will be able to produce proof of continued large Vietminh presence, I would regard this as less important than well publicized assertion of principle that representatives of Geneva Conference powers have right and duty to investigate suspected violations of agreement.

(b) It may increase dissension within coalition government. As I said in my telegram Y-371 November 22,† I think Souvanna's expressed views on such matters must be given every consideration. This does not mean however that we must necessarily accept them. Assertion of international interest in full observance of Geneva Agreement, symbolized and embodied in ICSC, should in my view have effect of contributing to stability and authority of Souvanna's Government; failure to make that assertion can only tend to consolidate existing fission of Laos with consequent dangers.

6. Unless therefore request for investigation has been received from RLG, you should press for immediate reconsideration of proposals in your memorandum of November 15, suitably amended as to locality but unrestricted in principle as to scope. You should inform Souvanna of action you are taking, using above arguments as appropriate and on my behalf, and making every effort to secure his cooperation.

NOTE ON LAOS FOR SELECTED DOCUMENTS

After the October 7 terminal date for the withdrawal of foreign forces passed, reports reached the International Commission regarding the continued presence in Laos of foreign military personnel. On November 15 the Canadian Commissioner proposed the immediate initiation of a Commission investigation; it was agreed, however, that this proposal should be held in abeyance pending agreement amongst the various factions in the Laotian government to request the Commission to conduct an investigation. The Laotian request, containing highly restrictive conditions, was finally made on December 20. It has been accepted by the Indian Chairman, with the Canadian Commissioner concurring and the Pole dissenting. The Chairman, in his letter of acceptance, noted the restrictions imposed on the Commission (with a view to underlining these in an eventual report to the Co-Chairmen) and re-asserted the Commission's right under the Protocol to initiate investigations (telegrams 470† and 472‡ from Vientiane).

LAOS – ICSC INVESTIGATIONS

Now that investigations have commenced on conditions which we accepted reluctantly and with full recognition of their inadequacy, emphasis must in our view be placed on importance of early report to Co-Chairmen setting out clearly and in precise detail nature of restrictions under which ICSC has had to begin its field enquiries. This report must not repeat not be open to interpretation that any valid conclusions as to continued presence in Laos of foreign military personnel can be drawn from these two limited enquiries. On contrary, report should very clearly imply if not expressly state that no repeat no such conclusion can possibly be drawn from enquiries of this nature. While we would hope that you can persuade Avtar Singh to accept wording in this sense, if this is not possible you should ensure that Canadian view is expressed in agreed report as provided in Article 15 paragraph 3 of Protocol.

2. We are not repeat not impressed by Chairman's arguments for separate initial report to RLG. Tone and content of Foreign Minister's notes December 18 and 22<sup>27</sup> appear designed to emphasize subordination of ICSC to RLG and to minimize its independence as organ of Geneva powers. Avtar Singh's reply December 20 seems to us defective not so much for what it said as for what it did not say. In particular, while drawing attention to those restrictions related to length of investigations, it ignored more serious restrictions related to radius of movement permitted. It seems to us that a separate report to RLG would be almost certain to confirm impression, which Quinim is evidently seeking to create, that right of ICSC to initiate enquiries and to propose means, clearly set out in Protocol, is purely formal and without practical effect of any kind. We find it difficult to see what advantage there could be in continuation at present of direct dialogue between ICSC and RLG to compensate for this grave disadvantage. Accordingly we strongly favour earliest possible report to Co-Chairmen. RLG might be given copy simultaneously as courtesy.

ICSC INVESTIGATIONS

Foreign Forces: Report to Co-Chairmen. On January 7 anticipating aggressive Polish draft I introduced very strong Canadian draft. After argument negotiation proceeded on basis of Chairman's draft which on whole was more favourable to Canadian than to Polish view.

2. Following strenuous negotiation involving several redrafts commissioners have agreed on text in my case ad referendum.

3. After introductory paragraph referring to previous report of October 22, report indicates towards end of October Commission became aware RLG considering number of allegations re foreign forces in different parts Laos with intention referring same to Commission for investigation.

These were letters from Laotian Foreign Minister Quinim Pholsena to the ICSC.

4. Report continues: on November 15 Commission received memorandum from Canadian delegation stating it had received information indicating number of foreign military personnel in several areas of Laos contrary to Protocol and proposing that as start Commission initiate investigations in at least two areas. Commission considered memorandum and in (circumstances?) felt it advisable first to investigate cases Government expected to refer to Commission. Canadian delegation accepted this view reserving right to revive its proposal or part of it after Commission had carried out first investigations on request of Government.

5. Next paragraph indicates Polish delegation stressed Canadian memorandum included only part of complaints before RLG and that Polish delegation reserved right to bring before Commission complaints about foreign military personnel in other parts Laos.

6. Report then states December 19 Foreign Minister presented letter to Chairman requesting Commission send two teams one to Longkou other to Ton Pheung to investigate whether foreign military personnel still present in those villages after October 7 contrary to Article 2 Protocol, and that on December 20 Commission sent reply confirming it was ready to send teams immediately for purpose mentioned. Paragraph contains sentence indicating Longkou is village included in one of areas listed in Canadian memorandum.

7. Following paragraph indicating when investigations took place there are two paragraphs reporting results of investigations in the two villages. Paragraph on Ton Pheung indicates some Kuomintang forces which arrived about beginning of 1962 rainy season were driven out by RLG troops toward end rainy season. While weight of evidence indicates this happened prior October 7 this not repeat not absolutely clear.

8. Paragraph on Longkou indicates evidence was uniform and all witnesses stated no repeat no troops had been stationed in village.

9. There follows paragraph briefly reporting firing at Commission helicopter January 3<sup>28</sup> and Commission note of January 5 to RLG about this. Reproduces language of note some of which has weak flavour but this was best I could get.

10. Final paragraph reads "with respect to actual conduct of investigations which Commission has just undertaken at request of Royal Government, Commission wishes to record with appreciation that Commission and its teams received full cooperation from Government and from local authorities. Commission considers that these investigations constitute useful beginning. Aware of its obligations in Geneva Protocol, Commission looks forward to continuing its activities and to conducting further investigations in manner which will be helpful to Royal Government and which will make constructive contribution to implementation of Geneva agreement."

11. Pole, who made general effort to include or annex material with propaganda content, wished to annex team reports clearly for propaganda purposes. To obviate this it was necessary to analyse reports more fully than I wished but I think we have managed reasonably good presentation.

12. Problem of correspondence with RLG was handled by sending reply to Quinim's letter December (22?) in following terms. After acknowledging letter and clarifications contained in it, reply states "at this stage International Commission does not repeat not wish to make any further comments on the points covered in your letter. In any case I am sure RLG and International Commission agree that investigations have to be carried out in accordance with Geneva Protocol." This brings discussion of modalities back to dead centre on basis of Protocol while reserving Commission's position re further comment if necessary. This done it was decided not repeat not to annex correspondence to report, and that comment on it in report was unnecessary. This consigns correspondence to Commission and RLG files and does not repeat not lend it whatever currency it might have acquired from being forwarded to Co-Chairmen and circulated to Conference members.

13. On central consideration covered in your reference telegram I made repeated and determined efforts to include language explicitly drawing attention to restricted nature of initial investigations and indicating their results have no repeat no real significance in relation to general question of presence of foreign forces in Laos. This proved impossible. However in my judgement minimum requirement in paragraph 1 of your reference telegram is met by contrast between areas desired by Canadian delegation [texte manquant/text missing] actual investigations in villages (and both words are mentioned several times) coupled with last two sentences which though I tried to make them stronger) indicate Commission regards recent investigations as only beginning of what it intends to be (constructive?) investigation process.

14. I therefore do not repeat not consider it desirable to include explicit statement of Canadian minority view and recommend that I be authorized to approve report as drafted.

15. Hopson, though he has not repeat not had time to consult London re final text, is satisfied I have got best possible. Unger is seeking Washington reaction and will do his best to convey it to me January 11.

16. Most grateful receive your instructions January 11 if all possible since I wish to make proposal re further investigations soonest.

ICSC INVESTIGATIONS FOREIGN FORCES: REPORT TO CO-CHAIRMEN

On January 11 Unger read me telegram conveying strongly unfavourable State Department reaction to draft report. He has also conveyed Washington's views to Avtar Singh who nevertheless maintains that draft though imperfect is adequate and who does not repeat not wish to add majority Canadian-Indian views. He considers that draft makes clear very limited area of investigations and that it was at request of Government that Commission so investigated; also that question of limitation in time did not repeat not arise in fact. Since ICSC is free to propose further investigations of wider scope he sees no repeat no need in draft to reflect further on scope of those already conducted.

2. I understand from Unger that USA views have been conveyed to you.<sup>29</sup>

3. Avtar Singh has now told me he has received telegram from Delhi saying that Americans wish report to Co-Chairmen to draw attention to limitations of recent investigations and that he is to hold report pending receipt of letter from Delhi. This letter may arrive any time. Avtar Singh has also told me that if Delhi instructs him to add to or modify report in above sense (presumably on majority basis) he will do so but will protest his instructions.

4. Pending receipt of your further instructions on report and discussions which may now be anticipated with Avtar Singh, I recommend that additional language to be sought if report should be in sense that two limited enquiries which have just been conducted can have very little significance.

5. As indicated in my reference telegram I consider that report as drafted meets minimum requirements of your reference telegram. Also, as you know, I did utmost to have included language explicitly stating ICSC view that no repeat no valid conclusions regarding continued presence in Laos of foreign military personnel can be drawn from limited enquiries just conducted.

6. In my judgment even if Avtar Singh on receipt of instructions is prepared for majority opinion it would be mistake to press for statement in above terms. I prefer statement of kind outlined in paragraph 4 above because even if ICSC conducts future investigations under vastly improved conditions it will never be possible to draw valid conclusions from these investigations regarding presence of foreign military personnel in Laos as a whole. All that ICSC can do is attempt to prove or disprove specific charge thus providing basis on which appreciation of situation re foreign forces can be made by it or other interested parties. If we assert no repeat no valid conclusions re presence of foreign military personnel in Laos can be drawn from recent enquiries we enunciate general principle which even under optimum conditions ICSC could never fully implement.

7. This observation also applies to any Canadian minority view in current report though I am still of view that this would add so little to report as drafted that it would not repeat not be worthwhile.

LAOS COMMISSION – REPORT ON INVESTIGATIONS

You will have seen telegram No. 11 from Vientiane, in which Bridle recommends that he be authorized to sign the tentatively agreed draft report on the Commission's recent investigations. Although dated January 10, this telegram reached the Department only at noon yesterday. We immediately sent a brief reply confirming that he should take no action until he received instructions.

2. Bridle has, I am sure, made every effort to obtain a satisfactory text. I am not at all convinced, however, that the result meets the requirements which you outlined in telegram No. Y-1 of January 3 (copy attached). Since the Protocol lays down that the Commission "shall submit agreed reports on investigations in which differences which may emerge between members of the Commission on particular questions may be expressed," the only way in which we can be sure that the Canadian position is made clear and explicit is to have drafted for inclusion in the report a separate section for which the Canadian Commissioner alone would be responsible. This is what the attached telegram instructs Bridle to do.

3. I might add that the State Department shares strongly our view on the importance of this question and expressed "shock" when it learned from Vientiane the nature of the proposed report.<sup>30</sup>

LAOS – ICSC INVESTIGATIONS

We consider it essential that this first report to Co-Chairmen on investigations by Commission into alleged violations of Agreement should set out clearly and unambiguously both Commission's own understanding of its responsibilities to Geneva Powers and precise nature of restrictions so far imposed on its investigations by RLG. If these basic points are not clearly made now, we foresee likelihood that (a) impression would be created ICSC tacitly accepts dependent role implied in Laotian Foreign Minister's notes of December 18 and 22, and (b) inference might be drawn that essentially negative results of these two restricted enquiries demonstrate lack of foundation for reports of violations.

2. As indicated in our telegram Y-1 January 3, we would prefer to have at least Indians associated with us in expression of these essential points, but whether or not this is possible we think it necessary to insist that report, so far as we are concerned, be explicit and not open to interpretation mentioned in paragraph one above.

3. While appreciating strenuous efforts you have made to secure inclusion in draft report of suitable agreed wording on these points, I consider that tentatively agreed text summarized in your reference telegram falls well short of what is required. I hope that Indians (who have been spoken to by USA Embassy in Delhi) may yet be persuaded of advantages of being more explicit. Since this cannot be assumed, however, I would like you to draft suitable paragraphs for inclusion in report under Canadian responsibility and to telegraph them urgently to Ottawa for my approval.

4. With regard to significance of these two investigations in relation to general question of presence of foreign forces in Laos, I do not repeat not think it necessary to make a positive statement provided implication is clear. To go further might merely give rise to debate on whether a positive statement was a "conclusion" requiring unanimity under Article 15 paragraph 4 of Protocol.

5. If our emphasis on restricted nature of these investigations leads to inclusion of references to further allegations of violation, I would see no objection. Indeed insofar as this would provide justification for further investigations it might have some merit.

6. I entirely agree that proposal for further investigations should be made as soon as possible. You should not wait for adoption of report to resume initiative in Commission on this matter. To do so would increase probability that ICSC will receive further unsatisfactory requests for investigation from RLG. I realize of course that decisions on initiating and carrying out investigations must be taken by majority vote and that Indian Chairman may be unwilling to participate in decisions on further investigations until report has been agreed and despatched. Nevertheless I think we must keep up the pressure.

LAOS – COMMISSION INVESTIGATIONS

Before either reference telegram received Miss Mutthama, Indochina Desk in External Affairs Ministry, called in one of my officers yesterday to make a strong plea for Canadian support for the Laos Commission draft report and for Canadian assistance in explaining the situation to Americans. Miss Mutthama said Gundevia had wished to approach me on this subject but could not repeat not because of his involvement with Indo-Pakistan talks. Miss Mutthama expressed considerable concern about American attitude to current Commission effort. She asked us for Canada's moral and practical support in face of what Indians consider an American failure to recognize that India has same objectives in Laos as USA and other Western countries. Indians want to stabilize the situation, to see the real integration and strengthening of RLG and to prevent Pathet Lao falling back into arms of Chinese. Indians felt that if Commission at this stage lost its unanimous approach and thus seemed to be beset by the same divisive forces which affect Laotian Government, this would mean a serious set back in the hopes for Laotian unity. Disagreement in Commission would, they felt, serve seriously to weaken Souvanna Phouma's chances of achieving integration. Indians, she said, held no brief for Souvanna Phouma. He seemed incapable of firmness and decision. But there was no repeat no alternative leader available. Even Americans had finally admitted this. Indians feared, however, Americans were now once again prepared to scupper Souvanna Phouma because they felt things were not repeat not moving quickly enough.

2. Indians believed that ICSC efforts should be directed to bolstering régime and that ICSC could move only as quickly as RLG. Indians were grateful for Canadian cooperation in Commission and were prepared to seek our assistance in putting position to Americans because they felt we shared Indian view that Commission's balanced approach to Laotian Government problems could help to establish atmosphere in which RLG could make most constructive steps forward. Although situation in Laos was by no repeat no means satisfactory, Indians drew some hope for future from developments such as Phoumi's visit to Communist bloc countries. The uneasy balance could however easily be disturbed by differences within ICSC which would only serve to make factions more intransigent.

3. Miss Mutthama showed us Avtar Singh's telegram sent in reply to Delhi enquiry after USA démarche here. He argued strongly against adding anything more specific to current Commission report on grounds mentioned in Vientiane reference telegram. Judging from Miss Mutthama's remarks, Indians here are prepared to back him up. She repeated several times Indian hope that Canada would not repeat not only support draft in present form but also use influence to persuade Americans to understand genuine Indian belief that only adverse results could come from rocking Commission boat at the present time.

4. I appreciate the need to get on the record at an early stage the Canadian view of ICSC responsibilities and of limited approach taken by RLG as result of Pathet Lao obstruction. I am inclined to believe however that this is not repeat not the appropriate time or occasion to bring this matter to a head. My views are of course affected by the Indian request for our assistance and support and my own feeling that minority Canadian positions can usefully be taken in Indochina Commissions only as a last resort. I also believe that hardening of positions in ICSC could have an adverse effect on the vital question of cooperation amongst the three Laotian groupings. Apart from these political considerations there is one other factor which occurs to me as being of some importance. I suggest that an exposition of Canadian views on Commission responsibilities (it is apparent that in this case it will not repeat not be a Canadian-Indian majority opinion) should not repeat not be made in connection with a set of investigations resulting formally from an RLG initiative. It seems to me that we would be on firmer ground (and more likely to obtain Indian cooperation) if we worked for a statement of those views in connection with a report on investigations in which Commission, rather than RLG, has taken initiative, presuming, of course that RLG turns out to be uncooperative. From Vientiane telegram 16 January 15,† it would appear that Avtar Singh is sympathetic to Canadian investigation proposal and if some agreement on area can be achieved will back us, even in face of Polish opposition. If area agreement with Indians can be achieved, Chairman would be more committed to supporting our position than he is by facts of investigations now under discussion. My own view is that area question and maintenance of principle of Commission's unrestricted scope might be (group corrupt) by proposing specified but different size and shape (of?) areas for each point to be investigated. This would maintain Commission's freedom of action while at same time meeting need to give RLG some specific requirements to go on in arranging logistic support.

5. As far as current draft report is concerned, I see another danger in our using these investigations to outline our views. As a natural riposte, Poles will, I think, press for publication of the correspondence with RLG, contents of which are unsatisfactory. Move would be difficult to resist because our own statement would have to refer to RLG attitude. I think that Avtar Singh's point that time limitation is irrelevant because teams, in fact, had plenty of time, is well taken. If you agree that Canadian minority statement might be postponed, I wonder whether we might not repeat not partly avoid the inferences or implications mentioned in paragraph 1 your reference telegram in present report by laying greater stress on fact that investigations took place at RLG request and were limited by Government's limited interests, thus drawing distinction with Commission's future initiatives. This might be achieved by repeating in final paragraph that this was a Government request for investigation of two villages.

6. In considering the Indian request for Canadian support which I have outlined in this telegram, you might take into consideration its relation to the question of the Vietnam Commission legal report to which I referred in my telegram 53 January 15.† The possibility of establishing a quid pro quo cannot repeat not be excluded and it is possible that our efforts in regard to the Vietnam Commission could be considerably assisted by our attitude to the present Indian request.

FOREIGN FORCES: FURTHER ICSC INVESTIGATIONS

Following is operative part of Canadian memorandum which I am sending today to Chairman, copy to Polish Commissioner, for consideration in Commission at earliest convenient date. Begins:

It is therefore recommended that the Royal Government be informed that the Commission proposes to conduct an investigation into the alleged presence of foreign military personnel in the area of Nape, as follows: (a) in Nape (approximately VF0824) and its vicinity (b) in Laksao (approximately VF9812) and its vicinity (c) in Banbo (approximately VF8313) and its vicinity (d) in Kham Keut (approximately VF7119) and its vicinity. To avoid misunderstandings on the ground, it might be further explained to the Royal Government that the points to which the teams would go for purposes of investigation would be related to the requirements of the investigation and that the Commission expects that these points would fall within a radius of 15 kms around each place.

It is recommended that, in requesting the assistance of the Royal Government, the Commission indicate: (a) that the Commissions team would be transported to Nape in helicopters (b) that the team might be accommodated in Nape or elsewhere as seemed appropriate (c) that the duration of the team's stay would be determined in relation to the requirements of the investigation, and that the Commission expects that it would be approximately two weeks. Ends."

LAOS – COMMISSION INVESTIGATIONS

We have given careful and sympathetic consideration to strong Indian plea for our support of draft ICSC report and for our assistance in explaining situation to Americans. With Indian statement of objectives (stabilization, integration, prevention of Chinese interference) I am of course in broad general agreement. Their specific requests however seem to me to be based in large part on a misunderstanding of our position and I think also of USA position.

2. Canadian position is based firmly on Geneva Agreement. A central feature of that Agreement was formation of Laotian Government of National Union, and I remain anxious at all times to do whatever we can to strengthen stability and authority of that government (my telegram Y-371 November 22† and paragraph 5 my telegram Y-384 December 19†). I do not believe however that this requires members of Commission to act only at behest of that government, much less to consider itself bound by views expressed by whichever faction in

Tel. Y-25 signed by SSEA Jan. 21/63 [and sent] Jan. 21 2:30 p.m. M. N. B[ow] government happens to be most recalcitrant at any particular time. Such a view of Commission's responsibilities seems to me clearly at variance with Protocol, which assigns to Commission certain defined duties as organ of Geneva Conference (Article 14). Scrupulous performance of those duties by the Commission cannot but have effect of contributing to stability of settlement reached at Geneva.

3. With regard to particular question now under consideration, I believe that Geneva Agreement imposes on Commission three specific duties: (a) to investigate when there are reasonable grounds for considering that foreign military personnel are present in Laos in violation of Protocol, (b) for this purpose, to seek from RLG all possible assistance and all necessary measures so that investigations may be conducted where and when required, (c) to report to Geneva Conference through Co-Chairman all significant steps taken by it and any other important information. Commission need not do more than this; it cannot do less without being remiss in fulfilling its obligations to other Geneva signatories. I can see no contradiction between these obligations and need to sustain government coalition, particularly as all Laotian factions agreed (in Zurich communiqué and again in RLG statement on neutrality) to "require the withdrawal" from Laos of foreign military personnel.

4. It is true that initial investigations on this matter were conducted at request of RLG and under restrictions as to place and time which we regarded as most unsatisfactory. These restrictions reflected highest common denominator of agreement in RLG at that time, and there was perhaps some advantage in starting on that basis. My own view is that these restrictions imposed by RLG can hardly be regarded as constituting "all possible assistance" (Article 13) or as being appropriate to "requirements of particular investigations" (Article 16). I recognize however that this is a matter of opinion, and in interest of harmony and cooperation in Commission (Article 14) I would not regard it as essential that this opinion should be expressed in report. What I do think essential, in view of importance of question of foreign military personnel, is that report should set out precisely what conditions were, so that other Geneva signatories may form their own opinions about their adequacy. This could be achieved simply, and I should have thought uncontentiously, by annexing to report texts of communications exchanged between ICSC and RLG. I recall that Avtar Singh himself suggested this (Vientiane telegram 483 December 29†).

5. Similarly, though I regard results of initial investigations as having very little significance in relation to general question whether or not foreign military personnel are present in Laos, I would not insist on any statement of opinion on this being included in report and would be content to have it emerge by inference (my telegram Y-20 January 16 paragraph 4). Other Geneva signatories can however make their own assessments on this important question only if all relevant factual information about scope of investigations is included in report. In particular, I think it important report should make clear that initial investigations took place, on request of RLG, only at two villages and within limits of those villages.

6. Indians have expressed concern lest differences within ICSC should make Laotian factions more intransigent and undermine Souvanna's position. Apart from general observations above as to nature of Commission's responsibilities, two comments might be made. First, there is no apparent reason why a full and factual report on these investigations along lines indicated above need cause differences within Commission, at least between Indians and ourselves. Second, Souvanna himself has made clear on several occasions (e.g. Vientiane telegram 462 December 11) his view that if conditions proposed by RLG are regarded by ICSC as unsatisfactory, ICSC should say so and RLG should then try to cooperate in providing additional facilities needed.

7. I am convinced that Souvanna's position would be weakened not strengthened if important relevant information reflecting attitude of Laotian factions to implementation of Geneva

Agreement were withheld by Commission from Geneva signatories. His position and such authority as he has derive essentially from international compromise embodied in Geneva Agreement. He more than anyone else needs support of signatories, particularly of Co-Chairmen who have formal responsibility for supervising observance of whole Agreement (Article 8). Commission can help by providing all relevant information to other signatories.

8. As you know, we have consistently held views outlined above (e.g. my telegram Y-384 December 19 and Y-1 January 3). When USA representatives here approached us recently about ICSC report, we explained very fully position we had already developed: so far as we know, this is accepted in Washington. While I am of course principally concerned that Indians should understand Canadian position and reasons for it, there might be some danger of further misunderstanding if we let pass without comment Miss Mutthamma's remark that USA may now be prepared to scupper Souvanna. I think Indians should be told we have discussed Souvanna's role from time to time with USA representatives, saying to them (as Indians have said to you) that whatever his faults there seemed no alternative, and Americans have invariably agreed with us this is so. Our understanding of USA Government's position is that it remains firmly resolved to support integral implementation of Geneva settlement by all concerned.

9. We shall comment on Bridle's recommendation regarding text of report as soon as his delayed telegram No. 20 is received.

LAOS COMMISSION REPORT

If Gundevia can be brought to recognize that what we are insisting on is no more and no less than a report containing all relevant information, so that other Geneva signatories will be able to make their own assessments of conditions under which initial investigations were conducted and of their results, it should then be possible to examine together existing draft with view to seeing whether it fulfils adequately Commission's obligations to other signatories of agreement.

2. In our view (based on summary of draft in Vientiane telegram 11 January 10) it does not contain all information which Geneva Powers have a right to expect from Commission. In particular it appears (a) to omit any mention of stringent restrictions set out in Quinim's note of December 18 to purpose, radius and duration of team activities; (b) to omit any reference to Commission's insistence in its note of December 20 that investigations are to be carried out in accordance with provisions of Protocol. These omissions could be rectified by annexing texts of communications exchanged between RLG and ICSC.

3. In addition we consider that reference in final paragraph of draft to “full cooperation” of Laotian authorities, though related to actual conduct of investigations, is seriously misleading in context of persistent efforts by certain elements in RLG to place Commission in dependent position. We think this sentence should either be deleted or heavily qualified by emphasis on restricted scope of investigations undertaken at request of Government.

4. Finally, we think phrase in final paragraph about the investigations being a “useful beginning” should be amplified. Report should go on to say that ICSC will be considering in consultation with RLG what further investigations may be required, and will look forward to receiving from RLG, in accordance with provisions of Protocol, all necessary assistance in connection with these further investigations.

5. If Indians are prepared to amend draft as suggested above, there will be no need for separate statement of Canadian views. If they are not, or if Poles insist on introducing contentious expressions of opinion, we shall be obliged to make our own position clear.

FOREIGN FORCES: FURTHER INVESTIGATIONS

Yesterday Commissioners discussed Canadian memorandum of January 19. Following my presentation Pole argued ICSC should not repeat not propose further investigation to RLG until it has completed report to Co-Chairmen on investigations requested by RLG and informed it accordingly. He also said further delay in completing report is being interpreted in Communist circles as having political significance.

2. Thee then referred to one of introductory paragraphs in Canadian memorandum which emphasizes restricted scope of investigations just conducted and limited significance which can attach to them and which indicates future investigations must be of scope which will enable Commission properly to discharge its functions. I had made clear that this part of memorandum was not repeat not intended for transmission to RLG but Thee said he thought it might be my intention to have memorandum annexed to next report to Co-Chairmen. He stated generally that coalition is delicately balanced and that ICSC should be careful not repeat not to act in manner which will stimulate controversy among Laotian factions thus upsetting coalition and further reducing its capacity to cope with central issues such as integration of forces.

3. Thee's third point was that in response to Canadian memorandum he will follow through on his earlier intention to bring before ICSC problem of Air America which he alleges is paramilitary organization which may not repeat not in fact be operating with approval of coalition government. In his view its activities are example of unilateral support to one faction by outside powers which ought by now to have been replaced by full support of coalition government.

4. Thee said that consulting his government he is preparing memorandum covering these three points which he intends to present at formal Commission meeting as comment on Canadian memorandum. He hoped to be able to present his memorandum January 25.

5. Chairman took position that decision on Canadian memorandum should be reached earliest and that, though he would have preferred to complete report before putting new proposal to Government, it is not repeat not necessary to await completion of report. He supported initiative by Commission at this stage and thought investigations into alleged presence of foreign forces should assist integration process by helping to remove potential obstacle. On Air America he was not repeat not persuaded that ICSC should investigate since it seems Government wanted existing supply arrangements to continue pro tem and even Russians had kept up own supply flights for time. More generally Chairman urged Thee to state his views on Canadian memorandum without delay and if possible before January 25.

6. I kept up pressure for earliest decision on Canadian memorandum, unrelated to completion of report, and denied delay on report had any political significance. On paragraph in our memorandum mentioned by Thee I said it had not repeat not been included with the object of annexing it to future report to Co-Chairmen. I made no repeat no direct comment re Air America but generally urged Thee to confine his memorandum to matters relevant to Canadian memorandum and to cooperate in enabling Commission to reach early decision on it.

7. Thee may be trying to buy time to facilitate possible RLG approach to ICSC re further investigations before ICSC takes initiative. However, this approach may not repeat not easy to arrange and I think his main objective is to get Polish views on investigations and related matters, possibly accompanied by some material such as a complaint to National Commission, on record in Commission for possible inclusion in next report to Co-Chairmen. From this point of view it seems best to await his statement and, making whatever comments are necessary at time, to give notice of intention to make subsequent statement in reply if this seems necessary.

8. On one ground or another Thee will probably oppose action on our memorandum at this time but Chairman will vote with me when this becomes necessary. Thee will probably also advocate some sort of Commission investigation into activities of Air America. Question therefore arises whether we should oppose such investigation and if so on what grounds. I am consulting informally with Chairman and USA Embassy on this and will endeavour to formulate views soonest.

LAOS COMMISSION INVESTIGATIONS

I had preliminary conversation with Gundevia soon after receiving your reference telegrams. He told me he was very disturbed by great pressure from Americans whom he thought still did not repeat not understand the disruptive effect which their proposals would have on Commission and RLG. Gundevia stressed that Poles had agreed unconditionally to present draft. He could not repeat not therefore accept any changes in current draft which Poles would not repeat not accept. He had hoped that Canadians would also be in favour and unanimity could thus be achieved. I explained that our main objective was to ensure that Geneva signatories were given a clear picture of circumstances surrounding recent investigation so that they could form their own opinions regarding conclusions to be drawn from report. I suggested that attaching RLG-ICSC correspondence was one way of achieving this and Gundevia thought Poles might not repeat not be unwilling to let correspondence go forward. He personally had no repeat no objection but wondered whether correspondence might not repeat not go separately. I replied that I could not repeat not express an opinion on this suggestion.

2. In sum, Gundevia's attitude was that he was prepared to negotiate changes in the draft report provided these changes were accepted by the Poles. He is very anxious for unanimity now in Commission, especially in regard to a request for investigation submitted by RLG. He thought position of ICSC would be seriously undermined if differences within it were revealed at this stage. He agreed that it was important that Co-Chairmen should have all the facts before them so that they could use their influence to bring about the expulsion of foreign troops from Laos in cooperation with ICSC and Laotian Government. But he then laid stress on relationship between Polish attitude and that of USSR Co-Chairman. Poles represent USSR in Commission and if Polish delegation casts dissenting vote this clearly shows where USSR stands on same question.

3. Judging from this conversation there is some room for negotiation of draft report's contents. Because Indians are so anxious for unanimity we can expect them to exert some influence on Poles to move from their present position. Indian pressure on Poles will, however, be limited by fact that Poles and Indians are agreed on present draft and it is Canadians who will be responsible for a split in the Commission if this occurs. Personally I do not repeat not think that the stakes are high enough in present circumstances to warrant a Canadian minority position. I hope that we can concentrate on obtaining as many of the changes outlined in your telegram Y-28 as possible. Although I am as reluctant as Bridle (Vientiane telegram 29 January 21+) to see unsatisfactory RLG-ICSC correspondence given wide publication, I think attaching this correspondence to report is, as you have pointed out, the simplest and least contentious way of ensuring that all facts are available to Geneva signatories. I can see no repeat no advantage whatsoever in forwarding correspondence separately.

4. Subject to your concurrence, I propose following procedure:

(a) I shall submit to Gundevia the amendments outlined in general terms in your telegram Y-28, stressing that non-acceptance of this result in Canadian minority;

(b) I shall ask him to rescind his instructions to Avtar Singh (Vientiane telegram 27† January 20) and to authorize latter to negotiate these amendments with Bridle;

(c) I shall also urge him to use Indian influence with the Poles to accept a compromise solution.

5. I am suggesting that substantive negotiations be transferred to Vientiane because I think it is only in the circumstances pertaining there that details of satisfactory wording can be worked out. Grateful for early instructions.

LAOS COMMISSION INVESTIGATIONS

Please proceed as suggested in your paragraph 4.

2. As background for your further conversation with Gundevia it may be helpful if we briefly reiterate our views:

(a) Though our position is similar to that of the Americans it was arrived at independently.

(b) We do not consider that we are expressing a partisan position but merely asking that the whole record be accurately included.

(c) We agree on the desirability of unanimity if that can be achieved consistently with an accurate report.

(d) We do not think it wise or helpful to mislead the Co-Chairmen or the Geneva Powers by giving the impression that no problems exist in relation to investigations.

(e) If the present draft were accepted we would have every reason to apprehend that future investigation would be under whatever restrictive conditions the RLG might impose.

(f) We regard the present report as basic for the future work of the Commission and not merely recording two minor investigations.

LAOS COMMISSION INVESTIGATIONS

Gundevia called me in this morning and asked me what I thought of the draft outlined in reference telegram. I told him Bridle had recommended acceptance and that I personally was prepared to do same. Gundevia said Indian Government approved present draft but he wanted to make it clear that they could go no repeat no further. He told me M.J. Desai had been reluctant to see publication of correspondence with RLG for fear of adverse effect this might have on Commission's future position. Since, however, Poles had agreed to attach correspondence, Indians were prepared to accept their addition.

2. My own view is that text meets our basic requirements and that addition of paragraphs on helicopters serves useful purpose of pointing up Commission difficulties even more clearly. I would recommend acceptance.

LAOS COMMISSION – REPORT ON INITIAL INVESTIGATIONS

Bridle has secured acceptance by the Polish Commissioner as well as the Indian Chairman of our amendments to the draft report, i.e.:

(a) Attachment of the main correspondence between the Commission and the Laotian Foreign Minister, thus putting on the public record the precise nature of the restrictive conditions attached to the initial investigations;

(b) Expansion of the reference to “full co-operation” of the Laotian authorities to make clear that this co-operation was merely within the limits of the two villages;

(c) Inclusion of a reference to the Commission's intention to consider what further investigations may be required and to request “all necessary assistance” from the Laotian Government.

2. The amended draft does not include the texts of the Laotian Foreign Minister's two requests for a report on the investigations, though it does refer to them. It does include the text of a strong Commission note to the Government about firing at, and wilful damage to, Commission helicopters.

3. In my opinion the draft report, as now amended, is a very much more satisfactory document than the original. I believe that it meets our essential requirements and I recommend that Bridle be authorized to sign it. Attached for your signature, if you agree, is a telegram† to this effect.<sup>32</sup>

LAOS – COMMISSION REPORT

You should inform Gundevia of our acceptance of report as amended. When doing so I should like you to say how pleased we are it has been possible to reach unanimous agreement within Commission on a report which places on record for information of all Geneva signatories full account of developments to date concerning implementation of this important part of Geneva Agreement.

2. Doubts expressed by M.J. Desai about advisability of publishing RLG-ICSC correspondence have of course been shared to varying degrees in several quarters (including USA State Department, which had qualms, according to USA Embassy here, about publication of Quinim's second letter of December 22). While recognizing possibility that publication of correspondence may entrench parties in positions taken, I continue to think that responsibility of Commission requires, and long-range prospects for implementation will be improved by, placing full story on public record. Short-term disadvantages should in any case be substantially reduced if not eliminated by unanimity of report. Souvanna's remarks to Avtar Singh (paragraph 16 Vientiane telegram 47 January 28†) suggest that he at least will not be disturbed by report of kind now agreed.

3. At this juncture I think it particularly important that Indians should recognize (as you seem to have been able to persuade them to do) that our reasons for pressing for changes were related to our own assessment of Commission's obligations under Protocol and of need for doing everything possible to ensure that Geneva Agreement is fully carried out.

FOREIGN FORCES: FURTHER ICSC INVESTIGATIONS

Canadian submission January 19 is designed to restore ICSC initiative as such. At same time in substance it is intended as counter-offensive to RLG's presumption in its recent request to ICSC and as strong negotiating position for discussions which must be anticipated possibly in Commission and certainly with RLG on actual modalities of investigation.

2. Achievement of general aim outlined your reference telegram would provide precedent for future investigations, at least those on ICSC initiative. However resistance of recalcitrant elements in RLG even to conditions of this kind will be strong. Basic Pathet Lao attitude is that ICSC should investigate by going seriatim to single places and doing little but examine witnesses some of whom might be brought in from surrounding area. Apart from design to use negative results of such investigations for propaganda purposes they harbour genuine suspicion of ICSC personnel spying on them for unfriendly powers and prying into their area for non-ICSC reasons. Quinim abets Pathet Lao by systematic effort to give Protocol sort of interpretation desired by Communists at Geneva.

3. Souvanna's attitude is that ICSC should have better conditions but in view of RLG troika his own appreciation seems to be that most we can get is facilities for fairly frequent inspection visits to various places for quite short periods of time. He thinks problem of foreign forces can be solved only through integration of Laotian forces but considers ICSC inspections valuable for their moral effect.

4. In principle rightwing stand is for ICSC investigations under really effective conditions but during earlier negotiation in National Commission they first held out for more than West thought essential at that stage and finally collapsed by allowing Quinim to write letters which in substance, in tone and in their embarking on restrictive doctrinal assertions were far worse than minimum terms which Pathet Lao had been saying they would accept.

5. In short, modalities in Canadian memorandum will never be accepted by Pathet Lao and Quinim as they stand and quality of support to be expected from friendly elements is uncertain. Only tactics which will have any hope of success will be to pursue aim outlined in your reference telegram by attempting to negotiate with help of friendly RLG elements an acceptable compromise between full Canadian proposals and Pathet Lao counter-proposal if this materializes. If initial Pathet Lao reaction is flat rejection ICSC should use appropriate tactics to get negotiation started.

6. As indicated in paragraph 3 our telegram 25 January 1971 there is considerable negotiating fact [sic] on Canadian memorandum not repeat not only with respect to radius but also with respect to number of points and estimated time. Total area now covered is about 2000 square kilometres or about 800 square miles. In my view we could negotiate if necessary (the?) investigation in vicinity of one place with say 8 kilometre radius lasting say approximately one week. I think also we might if necessary accept actual rather than estimated area for each particular investigation and that if it came to one area we might wish to substitute for circle an area of different shape but similar size.

7. Additional advantage of proceeding in this manner would be that if RLG would not repeat not agree to minimum requirement of latter sort ICSC report to Co-Chairmen on RLG failure to provide assistance considered necessary to conduct of investigation would place RLG in worst possible light and give UK Co-Chairman maximum grounds on which to seek USSR cooperation in intervention by Co-Chairmen.

8. If it should be thought that Commission would give appearance of too great willingness to be accommodating by bargaining down from area approximately 2000 square kilometres to area of order of 200 square kilometres, or by leaving out of investigation suspected areas, following is relevant. By creating situation in which RLG would not repeat not know until toward end of its discussion with Commission which of proposed areas would actually be subject to investigation at this time, Commission would make it more difficult for Pathet Lao to cleanse area effectively before investigation actually took place. Moreover in accepting to investigate in one area Commission could give notice that it might wish to investigate in other areas at later stage and that it would expect to do so under conditions at least as favourable as those for forthcoming investigation.

9. My conversations with Unger lead me to believe that USA would not repeat not look with favour on eventual ICSC decision to scale down if necessary to conditions such as those in paragraph 6. I think that they would rather ICSC dug in at much higher level and that they would by no repeat no means be displeased to see this result in decision not repeat not to investigate but to refer to Co-Chairmen. Reason may be that they are increasingly sceptical of willingness to use Co-Chairmen role as lever against intransigence of Communist extremists or more generally as the way of bringing whole issue of Laotian settlement to head one way or other.

10. Another reason for this analysis of USA attitude is in following telegram. I add here only that until we are persuaded that general situation is as nearly hopeless as USA may think and that it is therefore desirable for Commission to act so as to precipitate showdown, we should continue to pursue our objective of bringing about investigations under acceptable and if possible increasingly advantageous conditions accepting need for reference to Co-Chairmen if RLG is recalcitrant on this. I would be grateful for your further instructions.

FOREIGN FORCES: FURTHER ICSC INVESTIGATION

You will recall that Tchepone was one of two places selected for early investigation in memorandum November 15. This was done because it was one of two places which Vientiane side was then putting forward in National Commission.

2. Because it is of first importance now to establish satisfactory conditions for investigation, I considered and discarded Tchepone in favour of Nape when preparing for next step in ICSC. My reason is that Tchepone (which is adjacent to South Vietnam) is important to Vietminh mainly as staging point in South Vietnam and that consequently ICSC effort to penetrate this area would encounter special obstacle of North Vietnamese determination to protect it as a vital to continuing use of Laos as corridor into South Vietnam. At this stage when ICSC must seek to conduct investigations under satisfactory conditions it would be mistake to entail this special obstacle. It therefore seemed advisable to go now for area of Nape (which is adjacent to North Vietnam) and where there are in any case substantial reports of Vietminh presence. Tchepone might be our next choice there. Rightwing sources have told us that neutralist forces are now kept away from Nape area by Pathet Lao and USA Embassy has said there is considerable area near Tchepone from which Pathet Lao have recently been excluded by Vietminh. This confirms importance of Nape area as appropriate for investigation and bears out our appreciation of special obstacles to be encountered re investigations at Tchepone.

4. At one stage Souvanna talked rather lightly of ICSC soon being able to go to Tchepone and both Ngon and Unger urged Tchepone on me. However Souvanna almost certainly imagined relatively brief visit of very modest scope and all three accepted my preference for Nape at this stage. Unger added it also makes sense now because it is area where Vietminh are exerting pressure on neutralists through Pathet Lao – i.e. which is clear case of Vietminh interference in Laotian affairs as such.

5. Forrestal of White House and Hilsman of State Department were here in course of tour January 10-13.<sup>33</sup> I met them at Unger's house night before their planned departure. In conversation with me Forrestal talked in very general terms and it was only following evening when I met him again after his plane had been delayed by accident that he remarked to me that he hoped that we were going to make next step test case (in?) investigations and that he hoped Commission would propose next investigation at Tchepone. He recommended it because "it has nothing to do with Laos." He referred to part of Geneva Agreement prohibiting use of Laos for interference in other countries and said that it is important to bring "full Geneva machinery" into operation quite soon. He implied this was his reason for hoping ICSC would head for Tchepone now and said if ICSC were unable to investigate under proper conditions it would presumably so report to Co-Chairmen who would be urged to persuade RLG to be more cooperative. It seems probable that he also had in mind facilitating move by USA to persuade Russians to implement their private undertaking at Geneva re use of Laos for interference in South Vietnam. Forrestal said he fully understood my reasons as Commissioner for preferring Nape now but when I remarked that if Russians failed to respond satisfactorily as result of appeal to Co-Chairmen over Tchepone or any other place eventual upshot might conceivably be recourse to renewal of Geneva Conference. Forrestal replied that this is prospect from which one should not repeat not necessarily shrink.

6. This may be indication of present trend of USA thinking on Laos especially in relation to South Vietnam and possibly explanation of apparent USA tendency to seek to bring Laotian issue to head. If so, sense of urgency evinced in Forrestal's remarks may relate in some way to American appreciation of likely developments in Vietnam in next few months. Whether this is so or whether USA attitude is geared simply to their appreciation of situation in Laos I have certainly sensed in recent conversations with Americans here positive interest in seeing whole issue of ICSC investigations thrown up to Co-Chairmen in most clear cut terms possible. They want ICSC to succeed in its efforts to investigate on satisfactory basis but they give impression they regard our efforts in this direction as more means to end than attainable end in itself.

LAOS COMMISSION

I saw Gundevia this afternoon and gave him message in your reference telegram by reading to him your first two paragraphs. Gundevia replied that he found it difficult to express in words the very great appreciation he had for the Canadian position in regard to the draft report. Canadian position had been particularly appreciated during what he described as a very difficult time with Americans. Referring to your paragraph two, Gundevia said that in the light of M.J. Desai's doubts about publication of the correspondence with RLG, Gundevia had asked Avtar Singh to sound Souvanna Phouma's views on this subject. When neither he nor the Poles had any objection, it was decided to go ahead.

2. I agree with your view (paragraph 3 your reference telegram) that at this juncture it is particularly important that Indians should recognize that Canadian reasons for seeking amendments arose entirely out of Canadian assessment of Commission's responsibility and obligations. I think Indians appreciate this fact. However, I am not repeat not at all sure that they will continue to hold this view if we have a repetition of the events of past two weeks in connection with subsequent Commission reports. I have been increasingly disturbed by manner in which USA pressure has been exerted on Indians in connection with draft report and negative results which this pressure has had and I wonder whether something could be done in Washington to persuade Americans to change or modify their tactics in the future.

3. I have in previous telegrams described resentment shown by Gundevia at USA methods and his belief, which seems to have been reinforced by each American démarche, that Americans (50 groups missing) [Tim]mons, USA Deputy Chief of Mission, told me last weekend that he had been instructed to see Gundevia Friday January 25 in order to state American position for third time. When Timmons spoke to me he was still very shaken by Gundevia's sharp reaction. Apparently the latter mentioned nothing about Canadian-Indian discussions (which had taken place the day before) and gave Timmons impression that Indians would stand firm on their own draft and could see no repeat no reason for re-opening the subject. Fortunately I was able to give Timmons a brighter picture. I gave him copy of paper contained in my telegram 96 January 25,† stressing that Gundevia had seemed personally sympathetic, although bound by his desire for Polish agreement in the light of their support for original draft. Timmons used this information, I believe, to soften contents of his report to Washington regarding the conversation with Gundevia. Timmons was unhappy about possible harmful effect of American pressure but pointed out he was bound by his instructions.

4. When I saw Gundevia January 29 he gave me his version of Timmons interview. Timmons had read to him what was obviously his telegram of instructions. It contained a sentence expressing USA view that Indians' continued insistence on unanimity was making ICSC a farce. Gundevia said he stopped Timmons at this point to say ICSC had not repeat not been, is not repeat not, and would not repeat not become a farce as long as India served on it. If it threatened to become a farce Indians would be the first to pull out. He told Timmons that certainly Indian Government desired unanimity in the present circumstances. They, however, always reserved their right to go into majority with Canadians, or for that matter with Poles, if circumstances warranted taking of such a position.

5. Gundevia told me that Canada, as a member of the Commission, had a perfect right to bring up any question it wanted and that, regardless of the strength or divergence of our opinions, Indians would always be prepared to listen and come half way. Gundevia could not repeat not understand, however, how an outside government, not repeat not a member of Commission, felt it had the right to exert the kind of pressure Americans had indulged in. Governments were certainly entitled to state their position and Indians appreciated being informed of positions taken by various Geneva co-signatories. But USA had gone far beyond this by arguing the details of the case and suggesting drafting changes in a Commission document.

6. A clear illustration of Indian annoyance with USA tactics is fact that Gundevia was not repeat not even prepared to give Timmons the satisfaction of knowing that Canadian-Indian discussions had reached state where there was a good chance that draft report would be amended to include all relevant factual information. I think you will agree that this is an unfortunate state of affairs which, if it is repeated, may seriously hurt our chances of obtaining Indian agreement to various Canadian proposals regarding Laos Commission activities. Certainly, it has not repeat not made our recent discussions with Indians here any easier. I had the impression each time I spoke to Gundevia, that Americans had been there just before me and that the effect of their approach had been to sour the atmosphere. Because American démarche came first (paragraph your telegram Y-20 January 16), Indians were probably tempted to suspect that our attitude had been influenced by USA position. I very much hope that this situation can be avoided in the future and that Americans can be persuaded to hold off at least until Canadian opportunities for persuasion have been exhausted. It could be argued that an extreme USA position assists us in obtaining Indian agreement to a more moderate Canadian proposal, but this is a risky method of operation which requires previous and close consultation if one is to avoid the danger of pushing Indians into extreme positions.

COMMISSION REPORT

Report amended as in our telegram 47 was signed January 31 and forwarded to Co-Chairmen. Copy was sent to RLG. Full text in our telegram 59 February 1.<sup>34</sup>

2. Possible risk of difficulties arising from annexure of correspondence with RLG will I think be minimized if recipients do not repeat not embark on doctrinal discussion which could be used by unfriendly elements in RLG as means of justifying continuing assertion of their views. We cannot repeat not control Communist reaction to report but it would seem best on our side, having made situation clear, to act in greatest possible degree so as to let doctrinal argument die leaving issue to be put to more practical test in expected Commission effort to conduct successful investigation. While propaganda field will be of some importance it would also seem desirable to avoid doctrinal dispute at Co-Chairmen level. ## LAOS: REPORT TO CO-CHAIRMEN

Following arrival of report to Co-Chairmen we saw Simons Laos Vietnam desk in order to obtain preliminary reaction of Foreign Office. Foreign Office seems to be quite satisfied with the report. Simons observed that the more investigations the Commission can carry out the better. He did not repeat not think there should be too much concern as to whether the Commission can find evidence in favour of West or not repeat not. The main thing was for the Commission to go out in the field as often as it can and thereby assert itself and become factor contributing to stability in Laos. If there are many investigations carried out obviously the Commission also stands a better chance of making findings. On Vietminh presence, he was not repeat not too concerned either with the suggestion that KMT forces may have been in Laos or with the possible use that the other side might make of this. He thought that in fact this possibility may help the Commission to initiate more investigations. We are of course keeping Foreign Office informed of efforts of our delegation in this respect.

2. We took liberty of transmitting to Simons the views of our Commissioner concerning the kind of approach which should be made to Russians (Vientiane telegram 62 February 2). Simons merely smiled and observed that there seemed to be a united front in Vientiane. He read to us part of a telegram from Hopson, British Ambassador Vientiane, which expresses substantially the same views as Bridle. Simons said that he had discussed the matter with Warner, Head Southeast Asia Department, and that Foreign Office now tends to disagree with this line.

3. Foreign Office feels that it is their responsibility as Co-Chairman to raise any irregularity or deviation from Geneva Protocol. As this is first report to the Co-Chairmen this is even more important as Russians might use later the fact that no repeat no objection was made now. Simons said that Russians realised very well that they had come to a compromise with West over Laos for fear of worst and that they would expect us to make sure that they live up to their part of the bargain. He thought that in the context of Laos Conference and of the numerous discussions between Pushkin and MacDonald it was important to reassert point of view of West. He added however that Foreign Office has not repeat not yet reached final views on this and would not repeat not do so until Warner's return from Washington in approximately 10 days' time. Warner will probably raise this question with Harriman and obtain his views.

4. We observed, as personal comment, that much depended on the way this matter was presented to Russians as to whether or not repeat not a protracted doctrinal discussion on interpretation of Geneva Protocol was likely to follow. Simons agreed strongly with this and pointed out that Foreign Office did not repeat not intend to rush headlong into a discussion on fundamentals with Russians. Foreign Office will probably agree with Russians next week to circulate report to members of Geneva Conference and any points of substance would probably be taken up following week or even later. His thinking at the moment was that Foreign Office would point out restrictions under which investigations were carried out and stress necessity for Commission to be completely unhampered in its task. Simons welcomed our views on this matter. We should be grateful for any views you may wish us to pass to Foreign Office.

5. As an aside Simons said that Co-Chairmen have now agreed to circulate, each on its own, documents concerning Laos Commission to all nations of the world. Russians had originally proposed that both should divide task between "your friends and our friends." Foreign Office was somewhat dismayed to receive from Russians rather short list of Britain's friends which included among other bizarre items "Tchiang Kai Shek clique." Foreign Office of course objected to this and as they were also afraid that USSR might send out only selected reading material to "their friends," both reached this compromise.

LAOS: REPORT TO CO-CHAIRMEN

When report on investigation was being written our objective was to have facts recorded as fully as possible in order that they might be brought formally to attention of Co-Chairmen and other members of Geneva Conference for such action as they considered appropriate. We have carried out this policy to best of our ability and do not repeat not believe that it would now be consistent with it or with our position as Commission member to attempt to restrict use made of report. We were of course aware even before investigation took place that Foreign Office intended to use resulting report as means of opening discussion with Soviet Co-Chairman with view to persuading Russians to use their influence with left wing in Laos in constructive way (see your telegram 4484 December 20/62†) and that State Department were also thinking of using it in further approaches to USSR (Washington Telegram 3665 December 17† paragraph 4). If UK and USA consider such approaches could yield useful results we would not repeat not wish to dissuade them.

PERSONAL AND SECRET

Washington, February 15, 1963

Dear John [Teakles],

At a dinner party over the weekend, Assistant Secretary of State Harriman sought out the Ambassador to speak to him about Laos. Making it clear that he was not registering "a complaint," Harriman disclosed dissatisfaction with developments in relation to the ICSC. He did not elaborate on the basis for this dissatisfaction, but implied that an over-conscientious exercise of judicial impartiality in the Commission would be playing into Communist hands.

2. To find out the background for Harriman's remark I spoke on February 12 to Charles Cross of the Laos desk, who is usually very frank with us. In the course of a long conversation which included a review of many of Ambassador Unger's reports from Vientiane, I gathered that United States authorities were unhappy about the Commission's unanimous report of January 31; were extremely anxious to see the Commission make more effective investigations, or failing that, disclose emphatically the reasons why investigations were ineffective; and that pending such a demonstration by the Commission, would strenuously oppose an investigation by the Commission into Air America operations. I gathered that a telegram of instructions bearing on the last two points had been sent to Delhi and Ottawa, the latter, however, to be used at the discretion of the Ambassador. By this time you may have heard from the Embassy but in case you have not I thought you should have an informal report from us.

3. As regards the Commission's January 31 report Cross said the United States authorities, including Governor Harriman, were very disappointed that the Commission, or at least an Indian/Canadian majority, had not seen fit to disclose in the text of the report the limitations imposed by the RLG on the Commission's investigations at Ban Long Kou and Ban Ton Pheung. They were not impressed by the argument that these limitations were apparent from the annexes to the report. In their minds proof of the inadequacy of the report had been supplied when Secretary Rusk raised the question of Laos with Soviet Ambassador Dobrynin on February 9. Dobrynin had simply said that the unanimous report of the Commission had established that evidence of the presence of KMT troops had been found, whilst there had been no evidence of the presence of Vietminh troops or charges of Pathet Lao obstructionism. To Cross this showed the impossibility of relying on "implication or inference" in reporting the Commission's operations. In fact, at various points in our conversation Cross referred to the operations of the Commission so far as farcical.

4. Cross said that in the light of the ineffectiveness of the Commission in its first efforts, Unger on February 7 had had a long detailed discussion with Bridle and Avtar Singh. Unger had reported that Singh had been elated at having achieved Polish agreement to a formula for describing the scope of investigations to be conducted by the Commission. The formula was to the effect that the Commission would investigate a point "and its vicinity." It appeared that Paul Bridle's efforts to adopt the term "vicinity" in the Commission had been opposed by the Pole, who had, with admittedly considerable justification, argued that since the Protocol used the term "points" in Article 16, the Commission should simply indicate that it was going to investigate "points." Singh thought that the addition of the phrase "and its vicinity" was a considerable victory. Unger nevertheless questioned Singh very closely on the attitude he would adopt in applying this new formula. For instance, how would he react to RLG attempts to impose “ridiculous limitations” on the scope of investigations by the Commission’s teams? If the team wished to examine a place at the point of investigation and the local authorities argued that this place was “outside the vicinity,” what would be Singh’s attitude? If the team received prima facie evidence during an investigation of the existence of a situation “nearby” that required investigation, would Singh regard this as within the vicinity? – and so on. Unger reported that Singh had given a categorical assurance that in all these hypothetical situations he would base himself solely on the terms of the Protocol. In reply to Unger’s question Singh also said that he thought the adoption of the term “vicinity” would enable the Commission to conduct much more effective investigations than in the two cases already dealt with by the Commission. In the light of this discussion Unger reported to Washington that whereas previously he had opposed the use of the “vicinity” concept, he was now prepared, in the light of Singh’s assurances, to recommend that the United States go along with it.

5. We gathered that at a discussion on the same date Unger, Singh and Bridle had noted that the Pole had put in a request to the Commission for investigation of Air America operations. Unger reported that he had made it plain that the United States was willing “in principle” to have an investigation of Air America, but was not prepared to agree that the Commission should decide to conduct such an investigation until it had demonstrated its ability to act effectively on other investigations involving the Vietminh. In particular such a demonstration would have to include some use of the right of the Commission to act by majority decisions and a clear refusal by the Commission to accept unreasonable limitations on its freedom of action. When this had been done the United States would be prepared to see Air America investigated, although when such an investigation commenced, the United States would want it clearly understood that:

(a) the investigation was not merely to provide the Pole with an opportunity for a “fishing expedition”;

(b) the Pole would have to specify (preferably in writing) what he meant by his allegations that Air America was a “para-military” operation; and the Commission would have to be prepared to define for future reference what it understood by the term “para-military” because of the very vague and imprecise connotation of this term;

(c) October 7, 1962 would have to be the relevant date for determining the status of Air America. (Cross commented that the United States had “cleaned up” Air America operations prior to that date, in order to be certain of complying with the requirements of the Geneva Accords); and

(d) it must be clearly understood that the activities of Air America outside Laos were irrelevant.

6. It appeared that Bridle and Singh had been doubtful whether the Polish request for an investigation of Air America could be deflected at that stage. However, they apparently undertook to try. According to Unger’s report of February 9 the Commission had presented the RLG Foreign Minister with its plan to investigate two places at Canadian suggestion, two at Polish suggestion, and Air America operations at Polish suggestion. Singh and Bridle had represented this agenda as part of a package deal. On receiving Commission plans, Quinim had accepted them and asked what the Commission could do to investigate Phoukate and Tchepone. Unger had expressed his disappointment at the failure of Singh and Bridle to avoid reference to investigation of Air America. He said it would be essential that the Commission take no action to investigate Air America until it was clear that the Commission’s other proposed investigations, especially at Nape, were proceeding “effectively.” He also urged that there be prompt and effective action towards investigating the Tchepone area (a development which Bridle had already concluded was desirable).

7. Cross said that State Department had fully approved the stand taken by Unger in his talks with Singh and Bridle, as well as a further recommendation of Unger's that investigation of the possible presence of Chinese Communist troops in Northern Laos "should not become part of the present equation." State Department had then prepared instructions for Embassies in Delhi and Ottawa, as noted in my paragraph 2 above. These instructions indicated that there was concern "at the highest level of the United States Government" over the prospects in the Commission. It went on to say that since the Indian and Canadian members had, against the advice of the United States, agreed to the investigation of Air America operations, it was the position of the United States Government that it would refuse to permit co-operation in respect of any investigation of Air America until the Commission had made some progress in an effective investigation of the Vietminh presence in Laos. Cross said that the Ambassador in Ottawa, however, had discretion not to communicate this to the Department of External Affairs.

8. I tried, without, I am afraid, very much success, various arguments with Cross. He was reluctant to see any virtue whatsoever in unanimous action by the ICSC, even as a preparation for firm Indian/Canadian majority action, or for a statement of Canadian minority views. He believed that the Communist side from Vientiane to Moscow would press as hard as they could to exploit any failure of the Commission to ensure, by majority decisions as necessary, the rigorous implementation of the clauses of the agreements. Any failure to apply the letter of the agreement was, in his view, simply playing into the Communist hands. He thought this had been the net effect of the Commission's January 31 report. What the United States now feared was that an investigation of Air America operations would give the Pole and the Communists generally a propaganda heyday from which would emerge at best a strong Polish minority position, a weak straddling position by the Indians, and an insufficiently strong Canadian minority position. Obviously, in his view, the Air America operation could and would be conducted rapidly and effectively in comparison with investigations directed against the Vietminh presence. The United States was not prepared to have the sum total of effective investigation by the Commission directed against them without any balancing effective investigation against the Vietminh. Nor was he prepared to concede that, once having been raised, the Air America situation had to be proceeded with, the alternative being a propaganda barrage against the United States for failure to co-operate in the investigation. In this respect Cross said it made little difference to them, and they were quite prepared to take this opprobrium.

9. In the course of discussion Cross also threw in some thoughts on Laos generally in order to demonstrate that the problem concerning the Commission was only one of a number of anxieties about Laos. In rather broad terms he complained about Souvanna Phouma's indecisiveness, unscrupulous Communist pressure and failure of the right wing in Laos to play a useful role. He commented somewhat ruefully that the United States had practically broken the right wing in Laos in order to get agreement at Geneva and had extracted agreement from General Phoumi to co-operate with Souvanna Phouma. Phoumi was now taking the position that co-operation meant simply agreeing with whatever Souvanna Phouma agreed to.

10. As usual Cross was rather vague as to the alternatives to the use of the Commission as a means of stabilizing the situation in Laos and ultimately making progress towards desired Western objectives. About all he had to say was that if the Commission was not going to be effective, it was better not to have it and the United States held up to ridicule. He also spoke rather vaguely of the need for the United States to "beef up" the right wing in Laos.

11. I think there can be no doubt about the concern of the State Department over what they regard as a less than faithful execution of the Laos agreement, and I think that there is no doubt that they would like to see a rapid, and, perhaps, even immediate, transformation of the Commission into a more effective instrument. I am sure that the Indian and Canadian authorities would agree that this is a desirable objective. I suspect that the somewhat greater sense of urgency shown by the State Department is related to fear of congressional pressure in the event of a deterioration of the situation in Laos, especially because the Laos agreement was, at its inception, viewed by the United States (and by the President in a personal sense) as a first test of Soviet good faith towards the present Administration. There may also be a certain element of gamesmanship in the State Department approach, based on the thesis that the Indians and ourselves will only move as rapidly towards effective operations in the Commission as circumstances seem to demand, and that one element, therefore, must be a continuation of strong pressure from Washington.

12. On the whole we are inclined to think that United States concern is largely related to a question of tactics in the Commission and that there has not yet been any very serious thought given to alternatives to working through the Commission. The rather strong views put forward by Cross (which, he took pains to make clear, bore Harriman's imprint), and the remarks made by Harriman to the Ambassador were clearly intended to ensure that we did not lose sight of American hopes for the effective working of the Commission, but there was no suggestion that the Administration was facing an immediate test, either in Congress or in Laos itself, of the validity of the peaceful course chosen by the United States. Our preliminary view would be that these intimations of the United States position should be taken seriously, but not as cause for alarm or agitation.

13. As you know, the Royal Laotian tour will take place here toward the end of next week. It will be necessary to see whether there is any further stiffening of the United States position after the Laotian party leaves.

Yours sincerely,

TED RETTIE

LAOS

The High Commissioner for India called on me today, in part to speak of Laos. He spoke of some difficulty that had been reached and it was only after a period of confusion that I found he was not aware that there had been an agreed report to the Co-Chairmen. I took the opportunity of reading to him some sentences from Mr. Ronning's report of his conversation with Mr. Gundevia and then indicated that we had some concern about the situation regarding investigations which is now current.

2. In brief, I explained to Mr. Jha that while we were anxious to avoid unnecessary disputes with the RLG, we were not prepared to allow a position to develop under which the International Commission would be the creature of the RLG. I suggested that the boundary between compromise and a firm stand was not always easy to determine and then turned to our favourite theme of the common interest between India and Canada. One thing on which Mr. Jha had evidently been informed in some detail was the American pressure in New Delhi, and I explained to him that while we of course kept in touch with the Americans our attitude toward the report to the Co-Chairmen, and in general on Commission affairs, was our own whether or not it bore any similarity to that of the United States.

3. Mr. Jha reminded me that he had previously been in charge of Indochina affairs in his Department of External Affairs and offered to take any part here that was useful. Since New Delhi is notoriously slow in informing its Missions I said I was sure that the Far Eastern Division would be more than happy to keep any of his officers up to date on the developments in Vientiane. I said too that we would from time to time like to discuss Laos with him and he said he would welcome this.

4. You will recall that in the past we took some advantage of Mr. Chakravarty's interest to relay our thoughts to New Delhi. While it is evident, as Mr. Jha himself suggested, that the main conversations must be in New Delhi, we can well supplement these by occasional conversations here.

LAOS COMMISSION INVESTIGATIONS – U.S. REACTIONS

On Friday, February 15, Rufus Smith, Counsellor of the U.S. Embassy, called on the Far Eastern Division and said (not, he emphasized, under instructions) that the State Department had been surprised and disturbed by the most recent decisions of the Laos Commission concerning further investigations. Washington was particularly unhappy about the Commission's decision – taken on Polish initiative and communicated to the Laotian Government on February 10 – to propose “an investigation with the object of determining whether Air America is a foreign para-military formation ...”.

2. When reminded by Teakles that the possibility of an investigation into Air America had been discussed by Canadian and U.S. officials in Ottawa, Washington and Vientiane on a number of occasions in the preceding weeks, and that we had been given to understand that the United States saw no objection to such an investigation and perhaps even some advantage, Smith confirmed his understanding that this had in fact been the position. The concern now felt in Washington, he thought, was related mainly to the timing of the Commission's decision: the State Department's impression was that it had formed part of a “package deal” on which the Poles had insisted, and, in view of the very unsatisfactory nature of the field investigations already undertaken by the Commission, it considered that the balance of Commission action was being shifted heavily against the United States. A subsidiary cause of irritation was that U.S. officials did not appear to have been consulted on the wording of the proposal to investigate Air America.

3. Bridle's emergency telegram 86 of February 15† confirmed the strong U.S. objections to the course taken by the Commission. These objections had been made known to Bridle on February 9. He had immediately called a meeting of the Commission at which he did his utmost, with Avtar Singh's support, to persuade the Pole to postpone the Air America investigation. The Pole however had insisted that all the proposals or none should go forward. Finally, Bridle had agreed to all being presented simultaneously. On February 14 the U.S.

Ambassador had informed both Bridle and Avtar Singh, under instructions, that since the decision on Air America had been taken “against Washington’s wishes and advice” the U.S. would not cooperate in any such investigation until the Commission had conducted meaningful investigations of the Vietminh presence in Laos and had reported on such investigations to the Co-Chairmen.

4. A letter dated February 15 from Rettie in Washington on the same subject was received yesterday by Teakles. This letter reported that Mr. Harriman had spoken to Mr. Ritchie over the weekend of February 9-10 of his dissatisfaction with developments of the Laos Commission (although he had made it clear that he was not registering “a complaint”). On February 12, in a conversation with the Laos desk officer, Rettie had been told that “U.S. authorities were unhappy about the Commission’s unanimous report of January 31; were extremely anxious to see the Commission make more effective investigations or, failing that, disclose emphatically why investigations were ineffective; and pending such a demonstration by the Commission (which would have to include some use of the Commission’s right to act by majority decisions and a clear refusal to accept unreasonable limitations on the Commission’s freedom of action) would strenuously oppose an investigation into Air America operations.” Instructions to speak along these lines had been sent to U.S. representatives in Delhi and Ottawa – with the proviso for Ottawa that they were to be used only at the discretion of the Ambassador.

5. Yesterday afternoon, February 18, I called in Ivan White and Rufus Smith of the U.S. Embassy, and in a discussion lasting almost two hours went over with them in detail the whole sequence of recent events in the Commission.

6. I referred first to the limited expectations which we had had at Geneva that it would prove possible to conduct “meaningful investigations” into the presence in Laos of foreign military personnel. I quoted to them an authoritative U.S. assessment of last September to the effect that the Commission would be unlikely to be able to carry out effective inspections in the vicinity of the Ho Chi Minh trail, although occasional visits of Commission teams would make communist activity in the corridor “somewhat more difficult.” I said this was in general agreement with our own assessment.

7. Nevertheless, I went on, we were determined to make such investigations as meaningful as the circumstances permitted; and I gave them a copy of our telegram Y-105 of February 16,† which instructed Bridle to propose that the Commission’s reply to the Laotian Government’s latest request for investigations be in more explicit terms than the drafts previously considered. It was our opinion, I said, that this R.L.G. request of February 6 could provide an excellent opportunity for the Commission to make a stand for its rights. We would decide in the light of the Indian and Polish reactions to our proposal what our next step would be.

8. Turning to the Air America question, I pointed out that we had been careful to consult the Americans well in advance as to their views on an investigation into its operations. I showed them a copy of Bridle’s telegram 40 of January 25,† which reported that the State Department had informed the U.S. Embassy in Vientiane that “U.S.A. Government would have no objection to ICSC investigation of Air America and think this might enable ICSC to play part in search for constructive basis for air supply operations.” We were conscious, I said, that our role in the Commission was in a sense that of the Western representative. We had always maintained, however, that our actions in the Commission must be consistent with the provisions of the Protocol. We would not be prepared to act “illegally.” It had seemed to us that the proposal to investigate Air America was a valid proposal under the Protocol; and indeed this was not, so far as we knew, questioned by the U.S. Government. In agreeing to place the proposal before the Laotian Government, therefore, we had acted in accordance with our obligations under the Protocol, as we saw them, and we had certainly not been aware that we were acting contrary to the wishes of the U.S. Government in a matter which directly concerned them.

9. As for the Commission's report of January 31 on the two initial investigations requested by the Laotian Government, we had insisted that it contain full and precise information concerning the restrictive conditions laid down by the Laotians. We knew that the U.S. Government would have preferred that these conditions be commented on critically by the Indian and Canadian Commissioners in the body of the report; but since, for reasons with which the State Department was familiar, the Commission had accepted the conditions in this instance in order to get investigations started, we had not felt that that was possible. Nor, in our view, was it necessarily desirable; public criticism of the Laotian Government by the Commission could well have the effect of making the Commission's activities less rather than more effective.

10. I then turned to the question how consultation between our two governments on Commission matters might be improved in future. I said that what was principally needed, in our view, was a fuller and more constant exchange of views between officials in Washington and Ottawa who were responsible for recommending policy on these matters. This did not mean that we wished to limit in any way the exchanges between our Commissioner in Laos and the U.S. Ambassador; it did mean, however, that we thought it desirable, from both our points of view, that discussions which might be reflected in instructions for action should take place between the State Department and the Department of External Affairs, and that neither Department should have to learn of the other's decisions indirectly from Vientiane.

11. Another question of a procedural nature which had caused us some concern in this connection, I said, was the most effective means of influencing Indian thinking. I said frankly that in dealing with the Indians on the report of January 31 (and also in other earlier instances relating to the Indochina Commissions) we had found that the Indians were prepared to listen to arguments from us as a fellow-member of the Commission while being impatient and resentful of interventions by non-Commission powers. I read, from Ronning's telegram 125 of February 1, the remarks attributed to Gundevia to the effect that the Canadian attitude had been particularly appreciated during "a very difficult time with the Americans," and that he could not understand "how an outside government ... felt it had the right to exert the kind of pressure the Americans had indulged in."

12. I then said that on February 16 we had asked Bridle to come to Ottawa for consultation before the end of February, if possible; and I wondered if the State Department would think it useful for one of their responsible officials to come to Ottawa at the same time, so that we could have a frank, informal discussion about the whole range of problems concerning us both in Laos.

13. Ivan White replied that he very much welcomed this suggestion, which he was sure would be appreciated in the State Department. It might be that the most appropriate official would be Henry Koren (Director of the Office of South-East Asian Affairs) or Koren's Deputy, Norman Hannah. Another possibility would be Edward Rice, the Deputy Assistant Secretary for Far Eastern Affairs. He would immediately inform Washington of our suggestion.

14. White and Smith made only a few comments of a general nature on the substance of my remarks. They said that at each stage of the Commission's activities to date the United States had been able to derive only "minimal satisfaction"; that the United States entirely rejected the doctrine, put forward so persistently by the Indians, that unanimity within the Commission was essential if relations within the Laotian Government were not to be disturbed; that the Laotian settlement was one of the few tangible results of the meeting at Vienna between Mr. Kennedy and Mr. Khrushchev; that it was consequently very important, for international relations in general, that the settlement should be made to work; and that if it broke down, a long shadow would be cast over prospects for accommodation of some sort on wider problems.<sup>35</sup>

LAOS COMMISSION INVESTIGATIONS

The ICSC in Laos has now completed its first two investigations (on the presence of foreign military forces) and has reported on them to the Co-Chairmen. These investigations of two small villages discovered no evidence of the presence of North Vietnamese troops but found that Kuomintang troops had been in one of the villages (probably before October 7, 1962, the deadline for withdrawals under the Protocol). We were not at all satisfied with the conditions under which these investigations were carried out, for the Royal Laotian Government, in requesting them, had restricted the area which the Commission could visit to the confines of the two small villages and had limited the time the investigations could take to two days each. Our dissatisfaction with these limitations was, however, counter-balanced by our desire to end the Commission's long initial period of inaction and get it off the ground. We considered, and the British and Americans agreed, that it was better to get some sort of investigation under way, even at the cost of accepting the RLG restrictions, than to dig in our heels and refuse to go along with any investigation unless our interpretation of the rights of the Commission were met. This latter course would have meant, at least, a much longer delay in the holding of any investigations and, possibly, a complete deadlock between the Commission and the RLG or within the Commission itself.

2. Now that investigations have been started (though initially under unsatisfactory restrictions and with inconclusive results) there would seem to be much to be said for taking a firmer stand on the Commission's rights and duties under the Protocol with respect to future Commission action. In particular we think it will be advisable to resist much more strongly the attempts of the Poles and the RLG (under left-wing pressure) to impose restrictions of time and area on Commission investigations. We are also considering whether it will be desirable to protest any such restrictions to the Co-Chairmen, if necessary as Canadian minority views, in a Commission report.<sup>36</sup>

3. There are, of course, certain pitfalls in the way of a more vigorous policy. One of these is the danger that serious disagreement between the Commission and the RLG, especially criticism of the latter by the former (e.g. in a report to the Co-Chairmen), could weaken the already shaky Government perhaps badly enough to contribute to its downfall and place in jeopardy the whole Laotian settlement. We must remember that Prince Souvanna Phouma's Government is a very loose coalition of antipathetic factions and that Souvanna himself could very well, in the face of Commission criticism and dissent within the Government, carry out his oft-repeated threat to resign and go to live in France.

O.K. [H.C. Green]

4. We must also consider our relations with the Indians, for no progress on a majority basis can be made without their co-operation. If we take what they may consider too rigid an attitude we will not only find ourselves in a minority but will also lose any power we have to persuade them to move in our direction and will, on the contrary, throw them into the arms of the Poles.

5. Because of the complexity and delicacy of the issues involved, and because our decisions now will provide the framework for our Delegation's action for some time to come, we have asked Mr. Bridle to come to Ottawa for consultations. He will arrive on Monday, February 25.

6. We have recently had indications here, in Washington and in Vientiane, that the Americans are unhappy about developments in the Laos Commission. They fear in particular that, because of the relative openness of their operations and the tight control exercised by the Pathet Lao in their area, the balance of Commission findings will tend to be against them and their friends rather than against the Vietminh. They have even suggested that they will not co-operate in a Commission investigation of one of their operations (Air America) until the Commission has taken effective action regarding alleged Vietminh presence in Laos. We therefore thought that it would be useful to take advantage of Bridle's visit to discuss Laotian matters of common interest with the Americans and have suggested that they send to Ottawa one or two officials from the State Department during the latter part of next week.<sup>37</sup>

When I was seeing the Secretary of State on other matters February 21 he made a particular point of expressing the anxiety of USA Administration over situation in Laos. Rusk's tone was one of unmistakable concern and at one point he said he would appreciate it if I would express to the Minister personally how apprehensive Administration are about Laotian developments and how much they are counting on the International Commission, and particularly Canadian member, to help stabilize the situation.

2. Rusk explained urgency of his concern by drawing attention to implications of growing tension between Souvanna Phouma and the Pathet Lao. The confrontation in the Plaine des Jarres was “ominous.” If the tension were to continue the situation could “blow wide open.” He intended to talk to Souvanna Phouma on Monday February 25 on the latter’s arrival in Washington in an effort to enlist his cooperation in achieving greater stability.<sup>38</sup> He had already spoken in this sense to the Polish Ambassador here who was returning to Warsaw for consultations.

3. Rusk said that a vigorous operation by the International Commission could be a very important factor in preventing Laotian situation from getting out of hand. He emphasized the high importance which USA places on securing the widest possible freedom of action for the Commission in an effort to forestall further deterioration.

4. I said that I knew Canadian Government wished to do everything possible to ensure an effective role for the Commission and that we were not satisfied with conditions under which Commission investigations had been conducted. I added that I was sure the concern he had expressed would be seriously and sympathetically received in Ottawa and that his references to the Commission would reinforce Government’s already firm determination to work for satisfactory arrangements to permit Commission to carry out its functions. I also knew that the Canadian representative was doing his utmost to achieve this result.

5. Rusk then observed that one uncertain factor was the degree to which USSR was able to control developments in Laos. USA was not repeat not fully informed on such questions as whether Moscow or Peking had the greater influence in Hanoi and as to the source of outside control of or influence on the Pathet Lao. As we knew, Khrushchev had made certain commitments in regard to Laos but it might be that he was inhibited from carrying them out to the full. One way in which Geneva agreement could be supported and Khrushchev helped to deliver on his undertakings was for the International Commission to utilize its terms of reference to the fullest limit. Without implying any dissatisfaction with Canadian policy in the Commission, he made a strong appeal to Canadian Government to do whatever might be possible at this and succeeding stages to resist efforts by the Communist side to limit the Commission’s effectiveness.

LAOS – COMMISSION INVESTIGATIONS

You will recall that on February 6 the Laotian Foreign Minister asked the Commission to undertake fresh investigations “at Tchepone and Phoukate” and to inform him “of measures that you would like to take in the matter.” The Commissioners considered several possible replies without being able to reach agreement. 3. The telegram to Delhi leaves open the important question of what we will do if the Indians decline to go along with us on a majority basis. A decision on this will have to be taken within the next few days. #### LAOS – ICSC INVESTIGATIONS

It seems to us that recent developments and impending decisions in Laos make it imperative to take a careful look at whole trend of events there in order to determine whether there is anything more Commission can usefully do to foster stability and generally to promote objectives approved by Geneva Conference. We have called our Commissioner to Ottawa for consultation, and we would very much like to share our thinking with Indian Government.

2. Central fact is that seven months after formation of coalition government and signing of International Agreement, Laos is very little if any nearer to real unification. Factional attempts to intimidate, suborn and harass other elements in coalition are unfortunately a persistent reality; understanding in principle on integration of administration and forces remains at best an aspiration and at worst a façade. Dangers of this situation are illustrated by present apparently critical situation at Plaine des Jarres, in which Indian Chairman has taken an initiative which has our full support (Vientiane telegram 100 February 22†). Another cause for anxiety is continuation of allegations from various quarters that substantial numbers of foreign military personnel remain in Laos in violation of agreement. Also disturbing, especially for Commission members, is evident reluctance of Laotian factions (particularly Pathet Lao but also to some extent right wing) to agree to investigations by Commission teams except on terms calculated to produce negative or inconclusive results which can be exploited for propaganda purposes; these terms seem also designed to demonstrate Commission's dependence on RLG agreement to most minute details of arrangements.

Tel. Y-46 to Delhi signed by SSEA Feb. 25/63 and sent Feb. 25. M. N. B[ow]

3. We are of course well aware from whole experience since 1954 that patience is indispensable in dealing with Laotian problems. We are also fully conscious of difficulties experienced at last Geneva Conference in reaching agreement on degree to which ICSC could independently make decisions on need for and scope of investigations. Nevertheless present situation in Laos, while not entirely devoid of hopeful elements, seems to us sufficiently precarious to justify examining with greatest care every possibility of bringing Commission influence to bear more effectively. We are convinced, for instance, that unless future investigations can be carried out under conditions much more satisfactory than those conducted on December 30 and 31, Commission's prestige and influence may be seriously and perhaps irreparably impaired. Since Commission represents Geneva Powers, whose agreement made settlement possible, such an impairment could have far-reaching results. We are also convinced that ICSC need not and should not move only at pace of most recalcitrant Laotian faction. No doubt it should refrain from action which might place an unbearable strain on internal cohesion of coalition. But it should not hesitate, in our view, to take decisions on matters within its competence designed to stimulate and prod Laotian factions in direction of real compliance with Geneva Agreement. Nor do we think relevant provisions of Protocol should be interpreted so as to give any one member of ICSC a right of veto. Had Geneva Conference intended ICSC to operate on same principle of unanimity as provisional RLG, it would have drafted Protocol differently.

4. This emphasis on constructively independent role for ICSC is not new for us, as Indians will recognize. At Geneva it was Canadian delegation which argued more insistently perhaps than any other for maximum freedom of movement for Commission teams. We did not fully share opinion of some other Western delegations at Conference on importance of having fixed team sites, operational centres, etc. We did however press as hard and as long as we could for specific provision that teams could move freely in any part of Laos as required. While not satisfied that last sentence of Article 16 was an adequate substitute, we finally accepted it as best that could be obtained. Performance to date unfortunately falls well short even of what Communist delegations at Geneva professed themselves willing to accept. It was Pushkin who said ICSC teams should be free to travel to any part of country and stay there as long as necessary, e.g. five or six weeks or perhaps longer (Laos delegation Geneva telegram 1645 October 15/61); he went so far as to suggest provision for ICSC supply depots and housing "in some centres" (Laos delegation Geneva telegram 1793 October 27/61). Confinement of teams within villages designated by agreement of factions is practically antithesis of what we regarded then, and still regard, as necessary to optimum influence and effectiveness of Commission.

5. Having agreed to defer action on our proposal of November 15, 1962 in order that Laotian factions might reach some initial agreement, and having then accepted unsatisfactory conditions laid down in Foreign Minister's letter of December 18 in order to get investigations started, we are now most reluctant to become involved in another series of investigations so narrowly circumscribed that results might be misleading or appear derisory to Geneva Powers whom Commission represents. This is why we thought ICSC reply to Quinim's letter of February 6 should be along lines proposed by Bridle February 18. (His draft text in Vientiane telegram 96 February 19† has our full approval.)

6. We want to make it clear to Indians that our purpose is not to enter into dispute with RLG over interpretation of Protocol or deliberately to invite rejection by RLG of arrangements proposed by ICSC. Indeed we see some merit in Chairman's contention that it is more appropriate for Commission to propose arrangements when it is initiating investigation than when it is responding to request from government. But in present case, when RLG letter asked ICSC to define measures it wished to take, it seems to us quite proper for ICSC to respond by giving information requested. We consider moreover that specific arrangements proposed in Canadian draft are inherently reasonable and wholly consistent with letter and spirit of Protocol.

7. We very much hope Indians will agree with us on this matter, which we regard as particularly important not only because of precedents now being established but also because of substantive importance of Tchepone as nodal point on Ho Chi Minh trail. If they share our objectives (as we believe) but have reservations about our draft, can they suggest other means of achieving same ends? For example, would they be prepared to send reply along lines of Chairman's compromise (paragraph 2 Vientiane telegram 81 February 12†), following this promptly with specific proposals from ICSC for further investigations in vicinity of Tchepone – both if necessary on majority basis?

USA – CANADIAN TALKS ON LAOS

This to confirm that following discussion with Sullivan of Harriman's staff, a team composed of Unger, Forrestal (White House), Czyzak (State Department) and possibly Cross (State Department Laos desk) will be available in Ottawa for talks Monday March 4 and as necessary morning March 5.

2. We think that this is as well-balanced and well-connected a team as could be got together here short of direct participation by Harriman himself.

3. We are told by Sullivan that as a member of McGeorge Bundy's staff in the Executive Committee of the National Security Council Forrestal is directly responsible for coordination of activities of agencies (State, Defense, CIA) concerned with Far Eastern Affairs.

4. Forrestal has a particular interest in Southeast Asia and is said by State Department to be intimately connected with formulation of policy on Laos. As to experience he has toured the area at least twice and attended the last Geneva Conference. He evidently serves as the President's "expediter" in a field where, as you know, presidential interest dating back to Vienna and reflecting current congressional pressures is both personal and anxious.

LAOS: ICSC INVESTIGATIONS

I outlined to Gundevia yesterday afternoon in general terms our views regarding situation in Laos and Commission's role. I told him Bridle was in Ottawa at the moment discussing these problems with you and would be returning through Delhi to brief me on situation. I asked him whether Bridle and I could call on him to discuss problems facing Laos Commission. He stressed that meeting would have to take place before March 9 in view of his departure for Calcutta on March 10.

2. I think an approach to India along lines suggested in reference telegram would be much more effective if Bridle were present to provide first hand account of Laos situation and of practical steps which he considers might meet both Canadian and Indian interests. I hope therefore that it will be possible for Bridle to arrive in Delhi on either March 7 or 8.

3. Gundevia said he was glad I raised question on Laos because it gave him opportunity to tell me about yet another American démarche regarding Commission's activities which Galbraith and Timmons had made recently. He described American action as triple onslaught. Following original démarche two senior American officers presented Laos desk officer with written document followed by a second visit by Galbraith and Timmons to get Gundevia's reaction. Gundevia asked whether Americans had approached Canadian Government again on this subject. I said I was not repeat not aware of any approach apart from Unger's discussion with Bridle on Air America investigation. Gundevia gave me copy of American paper (text in immediately following telegram<sup>40</sup>). You will note it reiterates already familiar American argument regarding ineffectiveness of Commission. Gundevia was as usual enraged with this further American intervention in Commission's business. He wondered how Commission could possibly be expected to operate when it was constantly subjected to these outside pressures. He referred again to Indian Defence Ministry's desire to cut down commitment in Laos and his own personal view that Indians might just as well pull out if they are to be continuously high-pressured to support USA policy. Gundevia particularly resents USA attitude (which I gather has been made fairly clear to Indians) that they now expect Indians, who are receiving USA aid to resist Chinese aggression, to accept USA interpretation of political situation in Southeast Asia hook, line and sinker. He stressed Indian desire to maintain as friendly relations as possible with USA but was obviously determined to maintain Indian view of Laos questions regardless of USA attitude.

4. USA interventions and Indian reactions are now becoming all too familiar and I describe this latest incident in detail only to emphasize the kind of situation and atmosphere in which Canada must try to negotiate with Indians for most effective Commission possible.

Because of Laotian King's visit to USA,<sup>41</sup> American officials cannot be here before March 4, 1963. Consequently, Bridle (who will be going first to Paris and London) cannot reach Delhi before Gundevia's departure on March 9.

2. We had anticipated that you would put before Gundevia the full argument in our telegram Y-46 but recognize the difficulties created by USA pressure. We are impressed by neither the Indian nor the USA attitude in this connection. The Indian doctrine that the Americans should not repeat not express their views on the Laotian problem cannot repeat not readily be defended in logical terms. On the other hand, the tone of the American paper is such as to cause irritation and resentment. In some respects (e.g. the reference to the Canadian proposal having being delayed and to a package deal) the paper is simply inaccurate. What is particularly unfortunate is that the argument in the USA paper is sufficiently near to our own to suggest collusion, though put in terms that we would neither use nor fully accept. Specifically we cannot repeat not accept the penultimate paragraph in your telegram 341. We regard the phrase in Article 15 "which is acting with concurrence of RLG" as subject to conflicting interpretation and have consistently maintained at Geneva and since, that the best course is not repeat not to press for the solution of an insoluble legal argument, but rather to press whenever the question of ICSC-RLG cooperation arises for the best possible conditions.

3. In spite of the unfavourable climate, we see no repeat no alternative to asking you to put in detail to Gundevia the argument in our telegram Y-46, pointing out, perhaps, that he could recognize the elements in it as Canadian points already made. The timing is influenced both by Avtar Singh's request for instructions and by the unwisdom of allowing the ICSC to appear as inactive and indecisive.

4. You should in particular put to Gundevia specific alternative proposals in final paragraph of our telegram Y-46. We would very much prefer that our draft reply (Vientiane telegram 96 of February 19†) be accepted: if the Indians object to it, they will presumably do so on ground that to define scope of investigation in space and time would be appropriate in an investigation initiated by ICSC, but not repeat not in investigation requested by RLG. Since an argument can be made both on legal and political grounds for such an interpretation, we are not repeat not prepared to insist on a reply of this kind to point of going into minority (though we might wish our proposal to be mentioned in subsequent report).

5. Alternative suggested in paragraph 7 of Y-46 has already been accepted in ICSC by Chairman, subject to Polish consent; if Indians therefore continue to object to such a reply going forward on majority basis, they would in fact be insisting on right of one member of ICSC to a veto on such questions. This principle we cannot repeat not accept.

6. However, we realize that the Indians are as anxious as we to make the Commission fully effective, and we would be interested in any alternative suggestion which would take cognizance of the principles we have attempted to outline.

LAOS

You will have seen from our reference telegrams that the attention of the press and Congress is being drawn to developments in Laos. Reports have also appeared concerning USA policy in South Vietnam i.e. that USA military personnel were, under present rules of conduct, unable adequately to protect themselves, that large USA aid payments to Vietnam were being wasted, and that USA press representatives in Vietnam were not repeat not being given a fair deal.

2. These reports bear out apprehension expressed privately to us over the past few weeks by USA officials that the Administration stands in danger of a barrage of criticism of its policy towards Laos. The continuing harassment of the Administration over its Cuba policies are taken as an indication of the kind of tactics that would likely be adopted by critics of USA policy on Laos.

3. At present it may be too soon to say whether apprehensions of officials will be borne out. Both in Congress and in the press over the past year or so there has been only more or less sporadic sniping at Administrative policy on Laos. Also Cuba continues to be a popular point of attack. On the other hand the visit of the Laotian Royal party to USA and press reports of the deteriorating situation in Laos may tend to focus public interest on the Administration's policy and provide a solid base in public opinion for Republican charges against the Administration. Furthermore the political debate over Cuban policy has at least had to give full marks to the Administration for the resolute manner in which Soviet intrusion with offensive weapons was handled. On the contrary although USA forces were rushed to Thailand in May 1962 to induce Communists to negotiate over Laos, there was no repeat no dramatic Communist response comparable to the Soviet weapons withdrawal from Cuba to take the edge off criticism of the Administration.

4. The concern of State Department officials derives not repeat not only from consideration of likely congressional attitudes but also from fact that amongst various USA agencies involved State Department was probably the foremost advocate of a neutral Laos. State Department was moreover according to information we can gather acting as the chosen instrument of the President in bringing the Laotian settlement about. The degree of State Department concern that the chosen policy should succeed is we think heightened by the fact that the President's first meeting with Khrushchev in Vienna had brought about mutual undertakings to work for a neutral solution in Laos. Failure of the Administration's policy in Laos would therefore represent not repeat not only a setback in objective terms but also a personal setback for the President. State Department officials have in addition told us on a personal basis that not repeat not least among critics of the Administration's policy on Laos would be elements of the Pentagon and CIA.

5. USA officials have made it clear to us that a central point to be made by the Administration in the event it comes under congressional fire in regard to Laos will relate to the effectiveness of the ICSC in supervising and controlling the 1962 Geneva Accords. As we understand it, USA based its decision to accept a negotiated settlement in Laos not repeat not only on a realistic appreciation of the difficulties of a military solution but also on its belief that

(a) USSR had no repeat no such vital interests at stake in Laos as to militate against Soviet observance of its obligations under the Geneva agreements;

(b) Souvanna Phouma with intelligent Western support could hold the country together with some prospect of avoiding a political conquest by the Communists; and

(c) the ICSC would have and would be prepared if necessary on a majority basis to act on greater authority than the Commissions in Cambodia and Vietnam and formerly in Laos itself.

6. The current emphasis on effective operation of the ICSC reflects some disenchantment with Souvanna Phouma and even with the USSR in respect of signs of deterioration in Laos. It seems now that USA officials are coming more and more to believe that a stronger performance by the ICSC is the only means for inducing more satisfactory performances by the Russians and Souvanna Phouma.

7. For these reasons there can be no repeat no doubt that USA authorities will press vigorously for maximum effectiveness in the operation of the ICSC. They do not repeat not suggest that ICSC can hope to ensure fully the observance of each and every provision of the Geneva Protocol. However they would hope that the Commission would have full freedom of movement throughout Laotian territory and that it would exercise this freedom to the full as a means of inhibiting clandestine activities by foreign Communist military elements in Laos about the existence of which USA authorities are in no repeat no doubt.

8. Officials do not repeat not seem to be sure that a demonstration of freedom of movement by the ICSC would be sufficient to disarmament determined criticism in Congress. However they believe it would at least permit them to rebut criticism advanced within the Administration itself.

9. These apprehensions also appear to lie behind the State Department's reluctance to allow ICSC investigation of Air America, until ICSC has proved its effectiveness in investigations into Communist activities in Laos. Concern appears to be two-fold: State Department fears at best a majority ICSC report that would not repeat not give Air America the clean bill of health they consider it deserves and that Communists will make propaganda gains. In addition however State Department fears that its policy of relying on ICSC will be undermined by congressional and even internal Administration criticism if first effective ICSC investigation (which is what USA would expect Air America case to be since it is not repeat not a clandestine operation) were directed against USA.

10. State Department officials have also clearly implied to us their expectation that even if ICSC operations cannot repeat not be more effective immediately, at the very least that Indo-Canadian majority will make clear in reports where the blame for this lies, i.e. with the Communist elements in the RLG, the ICSC, or the country at large, as the case may be. They believe that only if armed with such information can USA or British attempt to hold USSR to its undertakings.

11. Ottawa talks March 4 and 5 with USA representatives should permit fuller exploration of foregoing and perhaps other points. For the moment therefore we should simply like to point out that growing sense of frustration in Washington highlights as never before the importance of Indian policy and tactics in the ICSC. Reports from Delhi have clearly reflected Indian irritation and even rage at USA representatives' efforts to register Washington's point of view. Indian officials appear to think that Canada should act as the channel for USA views. They also appear to have concluded that USA policy towards Laos is different from their own (Delhi telegram 235 March 1) which in general we do not repeat not believe to be the case so far as concerns major objectives like the maintenance of an independent neutral Laos.

12. We hold no repeat no brief for the tactics or forms of expression used by USA in approaches to Indians. At the same time we believe the Indians should be encouraged to recognize that as distinct from cases of Cambodia and Vietnam USA is a party to Geneva Accords on Laos; is moreover very closely identified with the Laotian settlement now being tested; and is facing potentially strong internal criticism. We would agree that Canada can and in its own interest probably must try to increase mutual awareness in Delhi and Washington of problems other faces. But we do not repeat not believe Canadian efforts should be exclusive or preclude a direct dialogue in which both USA and Indians can and indeed must learn a few lessons. Our view would be that such a dialogue would be wholly consistent not repeat not only with the broad cooperation between the two in the economic development field over past several years but also with the assistance extended by USA to India since the Chinese military attacks. Perhaps Ottawa talks might provide an opportunity for a discreet exploration of this general problem as well as of the problems on the ground in Laos.

LAOS

The other night I had a brief conversation with Averell Harriman on Laos. Harriman was in a state of considerable agitation about the general Laotian situation and expressed some pretty pointed views about the role of the International Commission in recent months. He said more plainly than we have heard it from other officials that USA authorities are impatient with what they regard as an excessively scrupulous tendency to search for compromises in the interest of preserving Commission unanimity. It seemed implicit in his comments that Administration would prefer a showdown with the Poles in the Commission so as to set the stage for a direct USA approach to Soviet Government on Laos. Harriman said frankly that it was his personal inclination to go to Moscow for this purpose if conditions warranted it.

2. I mentioned Harriman's comments to Arnold Smith, who saw Llewellyn Thompson this morning and sought to draw him out on what Administration really aims to achieve by the tactics outlined by Harriman. Thompson confirmed what we already know about Administration's dissatisfaction with the way matters have been developing. He said that USA concern over Laos was closely connected with the problem in Vietnam in the sense that USA's difficulties in Vietnam could be considerably lessened if a way could be found to stop Vietminh infiltration through Laos. While he did not repeat not say that the Administration had given up on Laotian neutrality or that they were thinking in terms of bringing an end to the operations of the Commission, he also said nothing specific to deny these propositions.

3. Thompson did not repeat not relate current USA tactics on Laos to any particular objective in the broad pattern of USA-Soviet relations, nor did he lay emphasis on Laos as a test case in the Administration's assessment of the possibilities of reaching satisfactory accommodations with USSR on major issues. It may be significant, in terms of what Harriman had said to me, that Thompson remarked to Arnold Smith that Harriman was always looking for an opportunity to revisit USSR.

4. In speaking to Arnold Smith, Thompson was careful to emphasize that he had kept out of Laotian matters and that his comments, therefore, did not repeat not reflect direct familiarity with details of Administration intentions. I think what he said is nonetheless of some interest, not repeat not only as a postscript to Harriman's remarks to me but also because, if Administration policy on Laos were being developed deliberately in context of USA relations with USSR, Thompson would certainly be directly involved. I am afraid however that despite these conversations and earlier explanations we have received of USA policy, it is still difficult to be certain what long term purpose the Administration is pursuing by its current tactics on Laos.

LAOS

Washington reference telegram and your telegram Y-108 March 2 both show that our reports of talks with Indian officials have not repeat not conveyed clear picture of their attitude towards approaches by USA. Although I have tried to correct any misapprehension in my telegram 243 March 4,† I consider matter of sufficient importance to warrant longer emergency telegram to reach you at start of second day of Ottawa talks with USA officials.

2. Gundevia's irritation derives from persistent USA attempts to impose policy. Instructions to Galbraith evidently require him to do much more than present USA point of view. Understandable concern of State Department at situation described in Washington reference telegram seems to have prompted them to try to solve their problems by forcing ICSC policy. In my view their prospects of influencing Indians would be better if their methods were less forceful.

3. I entirely agree with our Embassy Washington that dialogue between Indians and USA is desirable. I believe Gundevia and other officials would welcome relations on dialogue basis. None of them have ever suggested or implied that Canada should be channel for USA views although they have upon occasion implied that Canada was sometimes being used as such. Indian complaint is that USA officials come only to talk about USA position and not repeat not to listen to Indian views.

4. Above all, Indians resent crude USA thesis that because they give aid they automatically possess wisdom and sound judgement in all areas. Indian appreciation of USA munificence is tempered by something close to resentment as Indian need to depend for economic development and now for defence upon outside which means mainly USA assistance. Any hint that USA economic and defence contributions should influence Indian policy in ICSC only reminds latter of their dependence and has the effect of strengthening their will to independence. On Laos in particular Gundevia and others freely and frequently recall that USA policy record only began to look good after USA started taking Indian advice.

5. You may consider it useful to discuss with USA officials desirability of framing Galbraith's instructions so that he may discuss problems with Indians rather than present cut and dried solutions. Among other things, such an approach would diminish some of the difficulties I have encountered when seeing Gundevia after Galbraith has been in. A further point is that as we and USA are usually aiming at substantially same detailed objectives, we might be able to coordinate better our tactics for achieving them. In particular as cooperation of Indians is indispensable for successful use of ICSC in attaining those objectives, I would hope that there could be closer consultations before USA takes decisions concerning action in Delhi.

MEETING OF CANADIAN AND UNITED STATES OFFICIALS
ON LAOS, MARCH 4 AND 5, 1963

Present

Canadians:

Mr. G.P. de T. Glazebrook, Mr. J.M. Teakles, Mr. H.B. Singleton – Department of External Affairs.
Mr. P.A. Bridle – Canadian Commissioner, ICSC in Laos.
Brig. H. Love – Department of National Defence.
Mr. E.R. Rettie – Canadian Embassy, Washington.

Americans:

Mr. Leonard Unger – U.S. Ambassador to Laos.
Mr. Michael Forrestal – White House Staff.
Mr. Rufus Smith – U.S. Embassy, Ottawa.
Mr. John Czyzak, Mr. Charles Cross – State Department.

PURPOSE

The purpose of these meetings was to exchange views and information on a question with which both Governments were concerned, and to arrange for more frequent inter-governmental consultations on Laos.

THE SITUATION IN LAOS

In the American view the present situation in Laos gave cause for serious concern. Prince Souvanna Phouma's neutralist party was weak and suffering from internal dissension and even its military force, the army of Kong Le, was tending to split into left and right wing factions. The coalition government had not been able to exert its authority throughout the country which was still in fact ruled on a regional basis by the three factions. No effort was being made to deal with the very grave economic situation.

The Canadians agreed that the Royal Laotian Government was unstable and that there had been little progress toward unification of the country. They did not believe, however, that there was any immediate cause for alarm and indeed wondered whether, given the background, the general situation was much worse than might have been expected.

THE ROLE OF THE ICSC

The Americans looked on the ICSC as the "enforcing element" of the Laotian agreements and had believed that, under the 1962 agreements, the Laotian Commission could play a much more effective role than had been possible for it under the 1954 agreements or was possible even now in Vietnam. They had therefore been greatly disappointed when the Laotian Commission's performance had not fulfilled their expectations. Indeed they thought that the Commission machinery was in danger of deteriorating through disuse. They recognized that the principal reason for the limited role the ICSC had so far played was the unwillingness of the Pathet Lao, the North Vietnamese and probably the Chinese to allow the Commission free access to the parts of Laos held by the left wing forces. They had reason to believe, however, that the Russians were trying to live up to their undertakings and were willing for the Commission to function properly. What the Americans had in mind, therefore, was that the Commission, if necessary by Canadian-Indian majority vote or even by a Canadian minority statement, might report formally to the Co-Chairmen that, because of RLG obstruction, the ICSC had been unable properly to carry out its functions under the Protocol. Armed with such a report the Americans could then approach the Soviet Government to determine whether the Russians still intended to fulfil their obligations and, if they did, to urge them to use their influence to persuade the Pathet Lao, the North Vietnamese and the Chinese similarly to honour the agreements. The American intention was evidently to use the vehicle of an ICSC report to the Co-Chairmen to raise the issues again to what they called "the level of international concern"; they intimated that if this did not produce satisfactory results they might regretfully be obliged to conclude that the Agreements were unworkable.

The Canadians agreed that the ICSC had an important contribution to make to stability in Laos but pointed out that the Commission dealt with only one aspect of the problem and that its role therefore should not be exaggerated. The Protocol was perhaps better than might have been expected in view of the political and military situation in Laos at the time of the Conference. In some respects it was an improvement over the agreements of 1954. Nevertheless it was an imperfect instrument and contained many articles which were ambiguous and which therefore gave rise to conflicting interpretations and difficulties of application. The Canadians also suggested that an Indian-Canadian majority report or, especially, a Canadian minority statement might not carry sufficient weight with the Russians to serve the purpose the Americans had in mind. It seemed to the Canadians that an appeal to the Co-Chairmen was not a step to be taken lightly especially when there was no guarantee that the results would be helpful to the Commission or would contribute in any other way to the stability of the situation.

THE PROBLEM OF INVESTIGATIONS

1. Investigations So Far Conducted

The Canadians noted that the ICSC had so far undertaken only two investigations and that these had been carried out under most unsatisfactory conditions imposed by the RLG. After attempting unsuccessfully to have the conditions improved the Canadian Delegation had finally agreed to accept them as the only means of getting investigations under way.

The Americans said that they had not objected to these investigations but had thought that the limitations would be made known to the Co-Chairmen. What had happened was that two unsatisfactory investigations had taken place, one on the Pathet Lao side which had found no evidence of Vietminh presence and one on the right wing side which had found indications of the earlier presence of Kuomintang forces. The results of these investigations were reported but the limitations which invalidated them were not brought out clearly in the report. This had led to the feeling in the United States that the ICSC was not only ineffective but was positively harmful to United States interests.

The Canadians pointed out that they were also strongly of the view that the report should have made clear the restrictions on the investigations. They had, in fact, after prolonged negotiations with the Indians, succeeded in achieving this result in some measure by attaching the correspondence between the RLG and the ICSC but it had not been possible to get the Indians to agree to comment critically on the restrictions in the body of the report.

2. Investigations on the Agenda

The Canadians pointed out that further investigations which have been proposed fall into three categories, viz:

- (a) Proposed by Canadians – 4 places in the area of Nape.
- (b) Proposed by Poles –
  - (i) 4 places in 4 different provinces.
  - (ii) 1 place where KMT forces were alleged to be.
  - (iii) Air America.
- (c) Proposed by RLG – Tchepone and Phoukate.

The Americans thought that the ICSC should send a letter to the RLG pressing for a reply on the Nape proposal. The Canadians said they would try to have such a letter sent.

With regard to the first of the Polish proposals, the Americans had no objections. They also did not object to the Polish second proposal because they felt no responsibility for the KMT. However, because the Communists always tried to associate the KMT with the U.S. Government the Americans hoped that the investigations would not be given too much prominence.

The Americans regretted very much, however, that the proposal for an investigation of Air America had gone forward to the Government from the Commission. While they did not object in principle to such an investigation, being confident that Air America was not contravening the agreements, they did consider that the Communists would gain a propaganda advantage from the mere fact that an investigation was taking place. The U.S. Government could not, therefore, accept an investigation of Air America until effective investigations of the Vietnam presence had been carried out by the ICSC.

The Canadians noted with regret that there appeared to have been a misunderstanding of the American position on Air America. From earlier discussions in Washington, Ottawa and Vientiane they had gained the impression that there were no American objections to an Air America investigation; only after the Commission had agreed to propose such an investigation had they become aware that the American position was conditioned by considerations of timing. The Americans in turn expressed regret that, when telling the Canadians of their agreement in principle to an Air America investigation, they had not indicated the importance they attached to timing. The Canadians explained that, while the Air America investigation could not be set aside, both the Canadian and Indian Commissioners were agreed that it would require a good deal of preliminary work so that the Americans need not fear that the investigation would go forward too quickly.

With respect to the Tchepone and Phoukate investigations, the Canadians said that they were approaching the Indians in Delhi to try to obtain their support for a Canadian draft reply to the RLG which would say that the ICSC, in undertaking these investigations at the request of the Government, wished to visit areas within a radius of X kilometres from Tchepone and Y kilometres from Phoukate. If the Indians would not accept this or something very similar, the Canadians would agree to carry out the investigation within the limitations indicated by the RLG provided that the Indians gave formal assurances that they would support, promptly and if necessary by majority vote, supplementary investigations in the Tchepone area proposed by the Canadian Delegation.

The Americans considered that this latter procedure would meet minimum Western requirements but emphasized the importance of the supplementary investigations taking place in conjunction with or at least immediately following and related to the original investigation. They thought that any appreciable delay between the original investigation and the supplementary investigations (such as might be caused by a delayed response from the Government to the Commission's proposal) would not be acceptable.

OTHER MATTERS

It was agreed by both sides that increased consultation in Ottawa and Washington was desirable.

It was also agreed that it would in general be desirable to consult closely regarding Canadian and U.S. representations in Delhi on Laotian questions to avoid the danger of working at cross purposes.

The Canadians mentioned that they had always assumed that the U.S. Government would not expect them to take an "illegal" or otherwise indefensible position in the ICSC in support of Western interests. The Americans confirmed that the Canadian assumption was correct and that United States proposals with respect to Canadian action in the Commission would relate only to tactics and timing.

LAOS

Since your discussion of Laotian problems with Mr. Glazebrook, Mr. Bridle and Mr. Teakles on February 25 there have been no significant changes in the political situation in Laos and no developments in the Commission.

2. The talks which you agreed might be held between Canadian and American officials took place in Ottawa on March 4 and 5. These meetings provided an opportunity for a very frank exchange of views and laid the groundwork for more regular consultations in future. The Americans expressed in strong terms their concern at the way the situation in Laos was developing. They were particularly worried about the instability and ineffectiveness of the coalition government and about the continued presence of North Vietnamese and Chinese forces. They felt that the Commission was not playing the role they had envisaged for it and thought that its best course would be to bring its difficulties to the attention of the Co-Chairmen. It would then, they believed, become clear whether the Russians still intended to honour the obligations undertaken at Vienna and Geneva and, if so, whether they could make their friends comply with the agreement. A summary of the discussions will be sent to you shortly.

3. At the first meeting the Americans produced a letter to you from Mr. Harriman on current problems in Laos. The letter and a draft reply<sup>42</sup> are attached.

Washington, March 2, 1963

Dear Mr. Green:

You will recall that, when we took leave of each other in Geneva last July, we both agreed that the situation in Laos would require the closest continuing attention if peace was to be preserved in that country. I know, from the constant contact we have had with your representatives, that this continues to be your view. Therefore, I am sure you share my current concern at the serious deterioration which has recently taken place in Laos.

In viewing this deterioration, I think both our governments can say without equivocation, that we have done our best to carry out the letter and the spirit of the Geneva Agreements. We have given unstinting support to Prince Souvanna Phouma and have urged those elements in Laos which were formerly associated with us to do the same. On the whole, I think we can be satisfied that General Phoumi and his colleagues have responded positively to this encouragement and have established themselves in close association with and support of Souvanna's government. In doing all this, we and they have acted on the assumption that the communists believed it in their own interests to preserve peace in Laos and to avoid violations of the agreement.

In similar fashion, your most able ICC Commissioner Paul Bridle and the Indian Chairman of the ICC, Avtar Singh, have attempted to preserve unanimity with their Polish colleague and cooperation with their Lao associates. They, like we, have bent over backward to avoid disruption and discord in the hope that a spirit of harmony could actually be developed, despite the violence which characterized the past.

All of us have now given the communists these several months to observe our good intentions and to reciprocate in kind. It seems, however, that they have chosen to interpret our generosity as weakness and our patience as vacillation. There is convincing evidence that the Viet Minh retain significant forces in Laos, and that, through these forces and their continued involvement in the internal affairs of Laos, they are influencing the Pathet Lao to disrupt the coalition government and frustrate the processes of demobilization and integration. By their actions within the Lao National Commission, they have intolerably impeded the work of the ICC, and, indeed, have infringed upon the prerogatives of that body.

I recall with admiration the vigorous efforts which you personally made at Geneva to ensure that the ICC would have the right and power, in circumstances like the present, to expose the violation of the Lao Agreements and to bring such violations to the attention of the international community. I believe your efforts, and the efforts of those of us who supported you, were successful in fashioning an ICC with an ability to act forcefully if necessary.

In the face of the deliberate design of the communist side not to facilitate but to prevent the ICC from exposing the continued presence of Viet Minh and Chinese Communist military personnel in Laos, I believe that the Free World must give as good as it gets both in and out of the ICC. To do less is to risk the loss of the whole country, a tragedy which would not be the less for having been carried out by indirection behind the facade of the Geneva Agreements rather than openly by military conquest. I shall not belabour the issue with quantities of detail which are available to you in any case from Commissioner Bridle's reports. I do hope, however, that you can find time to look into the problem personally with a view to ensuring that Commissioner Bridle's instructions are both strong and broad enough for the ruthless political warfare which is now being waged against an effective ICC by the communist side.

We are also enlisting the support of Prime Minister Nehru to make the ICC the effective instrument we had hoped it would be at Geneva.

With my warm personal regards,

Yours sincerely,

W. AVERELL HARRIMAN

Ottawa, March 15, 1963

Dear Mr. Harriman,

Thank you for your letter of March 2 about the situation in Laos. I fully share your concern that every possible effort should be made to avert deterioration of the situation there and to promote the implementation of the objectives on which agreement was reached at Geneva. In working towards these objectives I believe it to be important that our two Governments should remain in the closest consultation.

I have learned with interest of the useful and timely discussions which took place in Ottawa on March 4 and 5 between officials of our two Governments concerning prospects for the more effective action by the International Commission which we both desire.

I recognize, as you do, that if the Commission, representing all the parties to the Geneva Agreement, is to make the contribution to the promotion of our common objectives which we anticipated at Geneva, it will have to find ways and means of bringing its influence to bear more effectively than has been possible so far. This is what we are now striving, in consultation with the Indian Government, to achieve.

During the meeting of officials in Ottawa the course we were following was described in some detail. I hope that it will commend itself to you and that it may achieve the results we both have in mind. I shall arrange that the State Department is kept in close touch with developments.

Yours sincerely,

LAOS: ICSC INVESTIGATIONS

I called on Gundevia today with Bridle who spoke in accordance with your telegram Y-46 in support of paragraph 4 of Canadian draft in Vientiane telegram 96.†

2. Both Gundevia, who was friendly and relaxed, and desk-officer Miss Mutthama, who was with him, spoke of great difficulty of conducting effective investigations even if their scope is widened but declared they nevertheless want better investigations. Gundevia did not repeat not specifically take issue with our draft addition to Chairman's draft reply to RLG but went out of his way to remark that ICSC can and has put investigation proposal to RLG.

3. More generally, he warned against Commission action of type likely to divide and weaken RLG and wondered what upshot would be if, while Commission sought vigorously to investigate more widely, coalition were to crumble. When Bridle reiterated our view that effective Commission action should strengthen RLG by demonstrating close interest of Geneva powers in implementation of agreement Gundevia made clear that it is major Commission actions taken on majority basis which he particularly fears would divide and weaken RLG. He stressed he is fully aware of facilities for majority decisions in Protocol but wishes to avoid these wherever possible.

4. Clearly having in mind USA desire to place issue of investigations squarely before Co-Chairmen as basis for demand that Russians follow through on their Geneva commitments, Gundevia said that Americans do not repeat not seem to grasp that, while Russians want Laos settlement to work, they will never try to force Chinese to be more amenable on an Asian issue in response to an American demand, particularly if this is done publicly. Indeed, Gundevia thought, very fact of USA taking increasingly strong stand on Laos at present time tends to make Russians less ready to accept whatever risks may be involved in their pursuing policy on Laos which no repeat no doubt seems to Chinese to be closer to that of Americans than to theirs.

5. Gundevia seemed interested in our readiness to consider modifications of our proposal. We consequently drew attention to Chairman's compromise mentioned in paragraph 7 of your Y-46 Gundevia finally said he would reflect on both this and our draft and get in touch with Avtar Singh. In view of general emphasis he placed on unanimity it seems likely that any latitude he gives Avtar Singh would not repeat not go so far as to authorize him to support us against Poles on issue now under consideration.

6. In light of your reference telegram, Bridle asked Gundevia if he could possibly let Avtar Singh have his views before he leaves for Calcutta. Gundevia said he hoped to be able to reach a considered view tomorrow and that he would in any case communicate with Avtar Singh as quickly as possible.

7. In event that Avtar Singh does not repeat not receive instructions permitting him to support kind of reply to RLG we want, and if he nevertheless has authority to negotiate without further instructions, Bridle intends, in accordance with your instructions when he left Ottawa, to secure sort of fallback position you discussed with him. While he would explore possibility of Avtar Singh being prepared to use technique Unger said he had told him he would be ready to adopt, if this proves unobtainable he will start from following general position which he had prepared for presentation to Gundevia today: "It would be understood that Indian Commissioner would support Canadian Commissioner in a proposal to RLG designed to ensure that, as an immediate follow-up to investigation carried out at Tchepone at request of RLG, there would be further investigation or investigations around Tchepone of a scope considered adequate by Canadian Commissioner." This formula is designed to cover all alternative ways of dealing with the problem in manner which gives maximum change of satisfactory result. At same time, as you have instructed, Bridle would make it clear that we had not repeat not abandoned principle embodied in our current draft.

LAOS – ICSC INVESTIGATIONS

If Gundevia does not repeat not accept either our draft or "Chairman's compromise" we agree that you and Bridle may fall back on arrangement Avtar Singh told Unger he would accept, i.e. broadening of investigation in being on basis of information discovered by team in situ or sent to it from Vientiane by one Commissioner. Until every effort has been made to reach agreement on this basis (which may involve consultations with Avtar Singh) it would seem to us tactically unwise to fall back farther. What worries us, as you will realize, is possibility that Indo-Canadian agreement merely to propose extended investigation to RLG, even if proposal is made immediately, might result in indefinite delay while RLG deliberated on its reply. Any appreciable delay between original investigation and supplementary investigations, for whatever reason, would present grave difficulties.

LAOS: ICSC INVESTIGATIONS

Following return to Vientiane March 10 I saw Avtar Singh and explained upshot of meeting Ronning and I had with Gundevia March 8. Avtar Singh said he had received telegram from Gundevia saying I had made strong plea for Canadian draft and asking for Avtar Singh's view. Avtar Singh had replied confirming his previous view that ICSC should carry out investigations requested by RLG but that investigation at Tchepone could be followed up by wider investigation proposed by ICSC. He recommended approval of this course.

2. When I asked how soon he expected Delhi to react he said he is certain that Delhi will accept his recommendation and that if he does not repeat not shortly hear to contrary he will assume this is case: it is Delhi's normal practice to allow him to operate within broad framework of Indian policy and to make specific decisions on his own responsibility. In present case reaction from Delhi would in any case be slow because in Gundevia's absence there is no repeat no one in Delhi who can make major decisions on Laos and, even if Gundevia were consulted in Calcutta where he is absorbed in Indo-Pakistani talks, it would probably take some time to obtain reply.

3. In light of your telegram Y-53 Ronning had already explained to me difficulty of obtaining continuity in decision-taking in Gundevia's absence and this was why I asked Gundevia to reach decision prior to his departure and to inform Avtar Singh accordingly. In circumstances outlined above you might wish Delhi to endeavour to ascertain from Miss Mutthama whether Avtar Singh's recommendation has been accepted. However for reasons outlined above and to be outlined below I think we may have to assume this and proceed accordingly.

4. Avtar Singh is concerned by continuing delay in decision on investigations, both those requested by RLG and those proposed by ICSC. When I raised question of prodding RLG on latter he said this would expose ICSC to counter-enquiry re delay in response to RLG letter of February 6 and that it is not repeat not easy to think of adequate rejoinder. Also he said Pole following recent visit to Hanoi has been taking line that delay in ICSC reply to RLG letter reflects Canadian-American desire to prevent ICSC investigation at Phoukate. (I found incidentally that Pole following his return from Hanoi had somehow become aware of our recent conversations with Americans.) He said Pole had expected I would return prepared to settle question of reply to RLG which had been outstanding when I left.

5. This morning I told Pole I was not repeat not yet in position to discuss this question further in Commission since I was awaiting further instructions which have not repeat not yet reached me. He said he would ask Chairman to arrange informal meeting tomorrow to discuss situation. I said I was agreeable but added that my instructions, though they should be here very soon, would not repeat not by then be received. (At meeting I will of course not repeat not allow sight to be lost of parallel delay on part of RLG in response to ICSC proposals.)

6. Re paragraph 7 our reference telegram: To expedite issue from current impasse I discussed with Avtar Singh several aspects of course he has recommended to Delhi. (I first raised technique of feeding information re other points to team at Tchepone which when in Ottawa Unger had said Avtar Singh had indicated he would be prepared to adopt. Avtar Singh said there must be some misunderstanding on this since most he had intended to envisage was team obtaining facility on spot to investigate other places with respect to which it itself might establish requirement.)

7. Avtar Singh's attitude on other questions I raised with him may be summarized as follows:

(1) Commission's authority might best be placed behind points to be investigated in vicinity of Tchepone by adding to written investigation proposal after "Tchepone and its vicinity" words such as "including points shown on attached trace." He thought Pole might accept this and gave impression he would support it by majority if necessary. In general he reiterated he would support my investigation proposals by majority if necessary and agreed that ICSC must make quite clear to RLG what it is proposing to do and that equally ICSC must receive clear indication from RLG of what it is prepared to facilitate.

(2) On substance there can be no repeat no doubt that he will support whatever Candel considers suitable both initially and in course of negotiation with RLG if any. His own disposition seems to be to favour ICSC putting forward points around Tchepone proper in first instance and pretty well insisting that this represents what ICSC considers it must do; if ICSC does this it could move on to other complexes in Tchepone area, building step by step though he recognizes that there may soon be quite a number of competing investigation proposals. He would not repeat not be opposed to all three complexes in Tchepone area going forward at same time but thinks that at best RLG would take attitude that one should be done initially along with place on other side.

(3) On timing of ICSC Tchepone proposal he would prefer it to be made at completion of investigations requested by RLG since they themselves might turn up further investigations possibilities and such time sequence would in any case seem natural. Nevertheless if we wish to put a Tchepone proposal forward now or at any other earlier time he will not repeat not object. On question of further Tchepone investigation immediately after first investigation there, he says that if desired by us he would support separate statement to RLG by ICSC to effect that it seems necessary to establish some priorities re investigations and that ICSC proposes to give priority to further Tchepone investigation. It is not repeat not yet clear to me whether he would carry this support to point of majority vote if we felt it desirable to assist this priority. On further question of whether ICSC would delay next report to Co-Chairmen until investigation at Tchepone including that proposed by ICSC had been completed or, alternatively, until it was clear RLG was not repeat not prepared to facilitate latter, Avtar Singh was only prepared to say he would agree to this at time if circumstances seem to warrant it. His caution on this point is I think largely dictated by feeling that delay in completing last report, and incidentally current delay in replying to RLG letter, is exposing Western side (with however little justification) to Communist charges that West is adopting delaying tactics. I impressed on him Americans' legitimate concern, which we share, re possibility of simple Tchepone investigation being conducted without any adequate follow up, and also without this being reflected in next report. My own feeling on this question of timing of ICSC-proposed investigation at Tchepone is that essential requirement is that RLG's readiness or otherwise to facilitate be established very soon after first investigation is completed; this would mean Commission either to include in report on investigations requested by RLG report that RLG would not repeat not facilitate subsequent investigation proposed by ICSC or, alternatively, to report that RLG was ready to facilitate such investigation. In latter case question of priority to be assigned to second phase of Tchepone investigation would perhaps be of secondary importance.

8. This I think is most I can get at present in form of indications as to how Chairman would cooperate in putting forward and seeking to implement ICSC proposal for wider investigation at Tchepone. On whole I am inclined to think it provides basis on which we might be prepared to proceed and in light of which we might now decide to acquiesce in sort of reply to RLG letter of February 6 which other members or members of Commission favour. Text of such reply may be taken to be roughly that in draft† which Singleton prepared at my request when I was in Ottawa; it is I think entitled "Chairman's draft reply with minor amendments." If you decide to take this course I would take steps you have outlined to safeguard in principle Canadian position with respect to proper ICSC attitude toward investigations requested by RLG.

9. While I realize there may be aspects of course recommended by Avtar Singh which you will want me to discuss with him further at appropriate time I hope that decision may now be taken as to whether or not repeat not we are prepared to acquiesce in sort of reply which he has proposed ICSC send to RLG letter of February 6. I suggest that this decision need not repeat not wait upon confirmation from Delhi that Avtar Singh's recommendation in this matter has been accepted. Any further delay in reaching decision in ICSC as to how to respond to RLG letter will be increasingly embarrassing for us.

LAOS: ICSC INVESTIGATIONS

On receipt of your reference telegram I again spoke to Avtar Singh about arrangement mentioned in first sentence of your telegram. He is prepared to go further than indicated in Paragraph 6 of our telegram 118 in that in advance of investigation at Tchepone he would inform Indian member of team of points in vicinity of Tchepone which Candel considers require investigation. If in situ team by majority could establish need for such investigations on basis of evidence secured on spot he would support proposal to RLG for such investigations. Same of course applies to team requirement on basis of information discovered by it independently.

2. Canadian member of team would also be provided with above information and we would endeavour to arm him with questions designed to establish additional investigations requirements.

3. I have discussed this with Unger who feels it should provide basis for broadening investigation and favours ICSC now answering RLG letter without further delay.

4. Since we might also have to resort to extended investigation proposed by ICSC I should make clear, with reference to last part of (3) in paragraph 7 of our telegram 118 that, depending on Indian attitude, we may find ourselves in minority posture if we (seek?) to postpone report on RLG requested investigations to extent envisaged by me. Indians would certainly support inclusion in next report of fact that ICSC had proposed extended investigations but might well feel that report should not repeat not wait upon determination of whether or not repeat not RLG would facilitate this. I have discussed this with Unger and Hopson who are both inclined to regard question as somewhat hypothetical at present time.

5. While RLG ought by now to have responded to ICSC proposals made early February, ICSC is itself increasingly in default vis-à-vis RLG letter of February 6. Though Avtar Singh has accepted with some grace our inability to inform Souvanna and party, who returned today, of where matters stand he feels genuinely embarrassed by delay. You are aware of Polish pressure. All my Western colleagues hope ICSC reply may now go forward. While Indian reaction to arrangement mentioned in first sentence of your reference telegram falls somewhat short of what you would wish I am convinced we have now squeezed maximum out of Indians on this. In my judgment there is no repeat no point in attempting further negotiations with Indians before reaching decision on reply to RLG letter. Neither arrangement mentioned in first sentence of your reference telegram nor repeat nor alternative fallback provides certain prospect of avoiding difficulties apprehended by you. Nevertheless I am afraid further delay would create immediate difficulties which might jeopardize general prospect for further ICSC investigations. I would rather vote in minority than prolong indecision any further. Please instruct me prior to meeting of Commissioners Friday March 15.

LAOS: ICSC INVESTIGATIONS

We were disappointed that Gundevia could not repeat not be persuaded to address himself specifically to texts of Canadian draft and Chairman's compromise or to make concrete suggestions of textual amendments that would be acceptable to Indian Government. All we have got for our pains is a lecture on the foolishness of American plans to bring investigation issue before Co-Chairmen and a polite hint that on questions of what Indians consider details of Commission operations we should deal with Avtar Singh who has full authority and not repeat not bother Gundevia.

2. While we realize that Indian Government normally do not send their Commissioner instructions on matters of detail we assume that they do so on major questions. We therefore wonder whether Gundevia fully appreciated that questions raised with him by you and Ronning are regarded by us as of fundamental importance to whole future of Commission. While we are aware of Indian reservations about discussing ICSC affairs with the Americans, they have insisted on their readiness to listen at any time to our views and to come half way to meet them (paragraph 5 Delhi telegram 125 February 1). We therefore assume that either Gundevia will take up these questions with Ronning again after his return from Calcutta or that he did not agree with us about importance of matters raised.

3. We are not prepared to abandon our stand on Commission's right to determine modalities of investigations proposed by RLG. Nor are we satisfied to proceed in this instance with alternative procedures on basis of vague assurances of support in hypothetical contingencies such as Avtar Singh has been prepared so far to give. You should accordingly seek precise assurances from Avtar Singh on following points:

(a) On same date reply to RLG letter of February 6 is sent ICSC will in separate letter inform RLG that it proposes to investigate presence of foreign forces at points in vicinity of Tchepone including "points shown on attached trace."

(b) All points in all three complexes will be included.

(c) Letter will also say that ICSC proposes to give priority to these further Tchepone investigations and that, while it would prefer for reasons of administrative convenience to carry them out in conjunction with initial Tchepone investigation, if this proves impossible the ICSC proposes to carry them out immediately following initial investigation.

(d) Report to Co-Chairmen on initial Tchepone investigation will also include either report on follow-up investigations or clear statement that latter could not repeat not be carried out because of lack of RLG concurrence or cooperation.

(e) Avtar Singh will carry out above undertakings by majority vote if necessary and will also be prepared to override by majority vote Polish attempts to introduce procedural obstructions such as debate on voting rules.

4. If above assurances are given you may, while reiterating preference for action along lines of your draft, accept text referred to in paragraph 8 of your reference telegram.

5. We have not of course abandoned our ideas of attempting to have initial investigation expanded by team in situ. We see no repeat no reason why Canadian team member should not propose visit to air field and other points in vicinity and we would hope Indian team member would have instructions to support him. Canadian team member should be briefed to grasp any reasonable opportunity to propose extension of investigation.

6. We gather from your paragraph 4 that Poles have something up their sleeves regarding Phoukate presumably opportunity for anti-American finding. You might try to discover, perhaps from USA Embassy, what the team is likely to find at Phoukate so that Canadian team member can be forearmed.

LAOS INVESTIGATIONS

I agree with Bridle that time has come to accept Chairman's draft reply to RLG letter February 6 with changes Avtar Singh himself will accept. We asked Miss Mutthamma how matter had been viewed by Gundevia before his departure for Calcutta. She said Gundevia had expressed intention of sending message to Avtar Singh following our talk but clearly had not repeat not seen text nor Avtar Singh's reply. However she stated that Avtar Singh had discretion in tactical matters within broad instructions and objectives laid down by Delhi. She indicated that text of reply fell into "tactical" category and that Gundevia was most unlikely to override Avtar Singh's judgment.

2. Miss Mutthamma was emphatic about Indian desire to conduct investigations on Commission initiative. She insisted that only difference with Canadians concerned best methods of securing results which would advance purposes of Geneva Agreement. She expressed confidence that because Bridle and Avtar Singh had common objectives they could work out mutually satisfactory procedures.

3. I doubt that we can create situation more to our liking by awaiting Gundevia's return and recommend that we accept substantially at their face value Indian oral assertions of intention to proceed with Commission initiatives.

LAOS: ICSC INVESTIGATIONS

If Avtar Singh will not repeat not agree to action proposed in paragraph 3 our reference telegram you should (a) request a formal meeting for consideration of ICSC reply to RLG letter of February 6 (b) at that meeting, if Chairman introduces simple affirmative reply propose amendments to bring his draft into line with your draft circulated February 18 (c) insist on vote on your amendment which will presumably be defeated by Indo-Polish majority. (d) vote in favour of Chairman's original draft explaining that you will not repeat not oppose investigations requested by RLG (e) as soon as Chairman's draft has been approved, introduce draft letter to RLG proposing investigation of presence of foreign forces at points in vicinity of Tchepone including all three complexes to be undertaken in conjunction with or immediately following initial investigation. We think it important that these steps be formally recorded so that reference may be made to them in next report.

2. You will of course appreciate that in using word "priority" in paragraph 3(c) of our reference telegram we did not repeat not intend that wider investigations around Tchepone should necessarily be undertaken or completed before other investigations into presence of foreign military personnel (which could in view of Commission resources take place simultaneously) but rather that it should be undertaken in conjunction with or immediately following initial investigation at Tchepone. Similarly, on timing of ICSC proposal referred to in our paragraph 3(a), what we regard as essential is that proposal go forward before initial investigation at Tchepone is organized; this would mean within two or three days of ICSC reply on initial investigation.

LAOS: ICSC INVESTIGATIONS

This morning on receipt of your telegram Y-57 I sought precise assurances from Avtar Singh on points in your paragraph 3. He was agreeable to (a) except that he felt it would not repeat not be feasible to send separate letter on same date as reply since Pole would have to have time to consider ICSC proposal. Involved in this is intention to modify presently agreed vicinity formula by addition of words relating to points on attached trace. He is agreeable to (b). He would have no repeat no objection to (c) but warns that Pole would also demand priority for investigations proposed by him and would almost certainly place Air America at head of his list. On (d) he was not repeat not prepared to go further than indicated in paragraph

7 (3) of our telegram 118, his reason being that it is premature at this stage to decide when report should be made and what it should cover. On (e) he will carry out any undertakings by majority if necessary and, subject to Indian views on substance which seem similar to ours, will be prepared to override procedural obstructions by majority if necessary. At same time you realize that Indian disposition to seek unanimity wherever possible, because of their conviction that majority decisions unsettle government and achieve little with Co-Chairmen, is still very strong.

2. Clarification of your views on timing of ICSC proposal in your telegram Y-59 which I have just received brings your position close to what Avtar Singh would accept subject to time required to get ICSC proposal through Commission. Avtar Singh will support proposal as soon as we make it but no repeat no one can guarantee that (it) will be approved within two or three days. (Indeed it is also out of question to expect that RLG will make arrangements for initial investigation in time for it to commence two or three days after ICSC reply has been received. Nevertheless in view of Avtar Singh's reactions to (a) and (e) I think it would be fair to say that he is prepared to meet your view on timing of ICSC proposal to best of his ability. This leaves (d) on which I find he still feels unable to meet you.

3. It would therefore appear that I am to proceed as outlined in paragraph 1 of your telegram Y-59. Before receiving this telegram (in view of circumstances described in our telegram 119 March 12† which I hope you have by now received) I had with some difficulty succeeded in obtaining postponement of today's Commission meeting until March 18 or if necessary 19 to allow time for you to send me further instructions without which I was unable to act. I am taking advantage of this delay to comment on some implications of your latest instructions which I think are important.

4. As you no repeat no doubt realize registering of votes as envisaged in your telegram Y-59 will not repeat not only be accompanied by statements of Indian, Canadian, and Polish views on substantive issues but may also lead to introduction of procedural obstructions by Pole. These may include concurrence, reasonable grounds and probably (because of voting procedure required by you) issue of voting procedure. Avtar Singh would like if possible to avoid these complications which could further delay reply and wonders if your requirement might be met if, following decision at informal meeting to send simple affirmative reply, Canadian draft and position on it and actual reply were placed on record at formal meeting. Other Commissioners' views would doubtless also be recorded and reference to whole proceedings could appear in next report. I said I would forward this suggestion for your consideration. He wishes me at same time to make clear he is prepared to vote if you desire this.

5. With regard to timing of Canadian initiative on wider Tchepone investigation, whether as part of procedure in your telegram Y-59 or otherwise, I must draw to your attention effect of timing you have in mind on any efforts to expand initial Tchepone investigation as envisaged in paragraph 5 of your telegram Y-57. If you have by now received my telegram 120 March 13 (in reply to your telegram Y-55 in which you indicated that this was your first objective) you will have noted that Avtar Singh's latest response provides basis for expanding initial investigation not repeat not unlike that outlined in your telegram Y-57. I do not repeat not wish to exaggerate chances of doing this effectively but I think you should know that Unger attaches great importance to this method being tried to utmost and that he believes that forwarding of vicinity proposal by ICSC at time envisaged by you would provide unfriendly elements in RLG with plausible basis for refusing broadening since this would be provided for in separate Commission proposal. This effect would certainly be heightened by inclusion in relevant letter to RLG words to effect that investigations proposed by ICSC are to be undertaken in conjunction with or immediately following initial investigation. Inclination of both Unger and Hopson is to hold ICSC proposal in reserve until we have better idea as to how initial investigation is going to work out. You may therefore wish to give further consideration to timing of ICSC proposal and Canadian initiative related thereto.

6. You may also wish to reflect on likelihood (mentioned in paragraph 1 above) that Canadian demand that Commission proposal on Tchepone indicate intention to conduct wider Tchepone investigation immediately following initial investigation would almost certainly give rise to Polish demand, however unreasonable, that Commission assert similar priority for Air America investigation. This is point which it might be desirable to discuss with Americans before taking action you now intend with respect to Tchepone. To save time I will discuss it with Unger here and send you his reactions soonest.

7. I have thought it necessary to raise these considerations because I think they deserve careful consideration before we proceed in manner indicated in your Y-59. I would nevertheless be grateful to receive your further instructions before morning of Tuesday March 19 at latest.

LAOS: ICSC INVESTIGATIONS

I would like to inform you of following points which arise with respect on implementation of paragraphs of your reference telegrams.

2. Re (b) of paragraph 1 of Y-59 you will be aware that conditions for investigation advanced in my draft February 18 differ from those in Commission's recent investigation proposals in that latter do not repeat not include radius or estimate of time. In case of Nape precision as to scope was given through attachment of trace showing points (though Pole did not repeat not support this) and estimated time is to be asserted when RLG responds. Furthermore in discussion Pole might refer to compromise suggested by him (paragraph 3 of our telegram 81†) and ask why this is not repeat not acceptable to Candel.

3. I intend to propose amendments in terms of my draft of February 18 at same time making clear that we have been prepared to consider any modification of this which would constitute satisfactory alternative. If Pole raises above question I will say that without further precision his compromise was not repeat not adequate for our purposes.

4. Re (a) in paragraph 3 of Y-57 I intend to say “specifically” instead of “including” because this removes vagueness from proposal and makes it much more difficult for RLG to refuse. Any subsequent requirement to go to additional points established by team could be properly asserted at time.

5. Re (b) of same paragraph I am deleting small number of points on Tchepone trace which are too eccentrically placed. Also, it might be sufficient from point of view of conducting effective investigation to investigate first in one complex leaving others to be done subsequently. When in Ottawa I understood you to feel that this would be acceptable if RLG was not repeat not prepared to facilitate all three at same time and Unger with whom I have discussed matter is of this view. On other hand Avtar Singh (while fully prepared to support all three complexes) is of view that just as ICSC should not repeat not bargain with RLG over scope of investigations requested by it so RLG should not repeat not bargain with ICSC over scope of investigations proposed by ICSC. (For this reason though he recognizes that we have put forward four rather smaller complexes in case of Nape he would really prefer to put forward one complex at time at Tchepone.) I think he would generally be guided by us with respect to investigations we put forward and in present case he would be prepared to regard staggering of three complexes, if this proved possible and desirable following presentation of three, as question of timing rather than of substance, nevertheless nature of RLG response to three complexes cannot repeat not be predicted and I think we should be clear that in putting forward all three we incur some risk of simple RLG unwillingness to facilitate all three becoming basis [of?] report to Co-Chairmen re not repeat not cooperation. Until I hear from you further I will act in accordance with your Y-57 but would be grateful for your views.

LAOS: ICSC INVESTIGATIONS

As you point out in your telegram 122 assurances Avtar Singh is prepared to give do not repeat not meet our requirements and you will therefore have to proceed as outlined in paragraph 1 our telegram Y-59 Mar 14.

2. Reference paragraph 4 your telegram 122 we do indeed realize that our insistence on recording of votes may lead to introduction of procedural obstructions by Pole. We must nevertheless insist on vote and your explanation being formally recorded so there will be no repeat no doubt about our stand on Commission's rights in determination of modalities of investigations proposed by RLG. We are of course relieved to learn from paragraph 1 your telegram 123 that danger of procedural problems is lessened. Pole doubtless sees that if he raises these issues responsibility for delay or reply to RLG will be transferred to him.

3. Reference your paragraph 4 we still hope that expansion of initial Tchepone investigation by team on ground will be possible and we expect Candel to do utmost to bring this about. We do not repeat not however rate very highly chances of achieving effective expansion in situ or even of obtaining majority team decision recommending extension in view of Avtar Singh's attitude (paragraph 1 your telegram 120 March 13) that such a team decision would have to be based on "evidence secured on spot." In view of the fact that the "spot" is a Pathet Lao stronghold we regard chances of teams finding useful evidence as minimal.

4. Reference latter part of your paragraph 5 while, in accordance with paragraph 1(e) our telegram Y-59, you would press for Canadian draft to be approved and sent to RLG immediately, Chairman will undoubtedly give Pole time to consider it. Your proposal may therefore not repeat not be in hands of RLG when team on ground is proposing expansion of investigation. (If initial investigation is in fact under way before your draft is sent, draft will have to be modified to delete "in conjunction with".)

5. Reference your paragraph 6 possibility of [Pole] requesting priority for Air America investigation is chance will have to take although you should propose that Air America be not repeat not further considered in Commission until reply is received from RLG. Perhaps Americans can persuade right wing representatives in National Commission to delay reply. We are pleased to note Unger's view (your telegram 123 paragraph 2).

6. As you will appreciate our effort has been not repeat not only to secure meaningful investigations but to avoid series of precedents under which restricted investigations proposed by RLG formed a pattern which could apply not repeat not only to those investigations but by extension to investigations proposed by ICSC. We have made every effort to explain to Indian authorities why we were so concerned that any steps now taken should be in light of above considerations. Not repeat not only have we proposed several alternative courses but we have explicitly invited alternative ones intended to achieve effective investigations. We can only regret that they have shown no repeat no readiness to face with us problem which we at least regard as critical.

7. On basis of instructions in paragraph 1 above we envisage following developments:

- (a) you will be overruled in attempt to amend draft letter to RLG
- (b) reply will go without any delay caused by us
- (c) you will then put forward proposals for further investigations by ICSC.

8. While we are now far from satisfied with course which has to be followed it should at least be clear

(a) that we are not repeat not now causing delay in the taking of the steps on which Avtar Singh has insisted and

(b) we have done everything we could to implement the views of those who agree with us that the ICSC should accept its full responsibility, under the Protocol, to ensure that investigations are designed and conducted in such a way and at such times as would carry out the purposes described in the Protocol.

LAOS INVESTIGATION

Although I have no repeat no wish to delay or complicate procedures in Vientiane I feel I should comment on final sentence paragraph in reference telegram. External Ministry here does not repeat not underrate importance of Commission conducting effective investigations. However they do not repeat not consider issue clear when RLG has requested investigation. They see no repeat no convincing argument based on Protocol or otherwise to refute contention that when RLG requests investigations it is entitled to prescribe their area and duration.

2. You recognize that by pressing for vote we create a majority decision which otherwise would not repeat not explicitly exist to effect that Commission does not repeat not enjoy rights we believe it should. This is the kind of reason why this mission generally has resisted moves to assume minority position in any of Commissions unless majority is insisting on taking decision. As I see it by placing our views on record by means of voting we run strong risk of foreclosing possibility that those views might later prevail.

3. It seems that Avtar Singh is ready to stand with us on Commission's right to prescribe modalities of investigations proposed by itself. Ministry here agrees with this position but contends that in practice RLG cooperation is essential especially for transport, interpreters etc. without which investigations are impossible. I hope apparent misunderstanding of Indian view of importance of Commission's rights may be removed. Their essential difference with us is that they do not repeat not consider RLG requests for investigations to be strong position from which to defend Commission's rights. I must say that I think we should give that position a fair test in an initiative taken by the Commission without prejudicing it in present investigation proposed by RLG.

LAOS: ICSC INVESTIGATIONS

Reference your paragraphs 2 and 3 we agree with line you intend to take. Since your proposal is doomed to defeat in any event there is no repeat no reason to weaken it to accommodate your colleagues. If of course Avtar Singh should suddenly appear willing to support his compromise (paragraph 2 your telegram 81†) by majority vote you should agree. You should not repeat not however accept anything weaker than this.

2. Reference your paragraph 4. While agreeing that change makes proposal more precise and more difficult in terms of Protocol for RLG to refuse we would not be happy about any implied abandonment of area concept and consequent restriction of teams' freedom of movement. You may on this occasion use wording you propose but you should bear in mind that we may wish to reintroduce area concept in Canadian proposals in future.

3. Reference first sentence your paragraph 5. Points for investigation should be chosen on basis of information re presence of foreign forces not repeat not on basis of administrative convenience. Eccentric points give advantage of team movement over wider area. We therefore hope you have not repeat not removed many of them.

4. Reference remainder your paragraph 5. Possibly Avtar Singh's use of wording "bargain" is casual but it is well to make clear that we have never suggested that ICSC should bargain over scope of investigations requested by RLG nor would we be prepared to do so. Our position is that it is duty of ICSC to suggest amendments to RLG proposals should the information available to ICSC indicate necessity for doing so. As to investigations proposed by ICSC we are puzzled by use of word "bargain." Our working assumption would be that if ICSC proposals were altered in such a way as to reduce seriously their effectiveness, ICSC might have to protest and refuse to make meaningless investigations. It would then so report to Co-Chairmen. On other hand it is conceivable that minor amendment by RLG might still give appearance of allowing for useful investigations although subsequent report to Co-Chairmen would still have to reflect objection by ICSC that its full proposal had not been accepted. While we find it hard to envisage acceptance of an altered ICSC proposal, we see no reason for ruling out possibility at this stage. Any group of proposals put up by ICSC would be submitted on their merits and not repeat not bargaining purposes. All three complexes around Tchepone must therefore be put forward and RLG refusal to permit ICSC to visit any points in them for any reason or pretext will be reported to Co-Chairmen.

LAOS: ICSC INVESTIGATIONS

Linville and Kiselyak of USA Embassy called on us today apparently on instructions to discuss Laos Commission's activities. They said USA Government was unhappy that we were delaying investigation of Tchepone by our refusal to agree to Avtar Singh's draft reply to Quinim's letter of February 6 and that the longer the delay the less chance team would find anything in Tchepone. The burden of their argument was an elaboration of Unger's views as reported by Bridle.

2. As it seemed that Americans were arguing on basis of position in our Y-57 we brought them up to date with gist of our telegrams Y-59 and Y-109, reading them last three paragraphs of Y-109. We pointed out that our current instructions to Bridle should permit sending of reply to Quinim's letter without further delay. This explanation appeared to satisfy them that our course of action would involve no further delay.

3. We thanked them for coming in, noting that such conversations were in accordance with the recent agreement to maintain consultation between governments. We then explained at some length the steps we had been taking and the reasons for them as a back-drop to an expression of puzzlement at what seemed to be contradictory American views. We reminded them that when in Ottawa the USA group had described in highly critical terms the first two investigations leading from RLG requests. They had felt so strongly about them that they had urged in New Delhi major changes in the first report to the Co-Chairmen. We pointed out that our effort to amend the reply to the RLG was in order to avoid a series of acceptances of carefully tailored investigations and added that in fact we would never again have such a favourable situation since on this occasion the RLG had asked the Commission to describe the measures necessary to conduct the investigation. We said that we would like some enlightenment on why the USA condemned so strongly the acceptance of the first two RLG proposals and a few days later urged us to accept the second two.

4. We then looked at the situation as it would be after the failure of our efforts either to get the ICSC reply amended or to get a firm commitment from the Indians on investigations proposed by the ICSC. We said we had little confidence in the team finding evidence in Tchepone which would allow them to propose wider searches. Tchepone was completely controlled by the Pathet Lao and it was significant that it was the RLG that had proposed this investigation and a not unreasonable guess that they had done so in order to get a controlled investigation. Even, however, if the team did find evidence, it seemed obvious that the local authorities would then take two steps: (1) they would say that they had to refer the question to Vientiane and (2) would send officials to the point mentioned by the team as re-insurance that nothing would be found there even if Vientiane agreed to the further move. We admitted of course that this was speculation but we thought it seemed to fit a probable Pathet Lao motive in agreeing to have Tchepone investigated at all.

5. It seems important for us to get from Washington some light on their thinking. We do of course recognize the desirability of avoiding all possible delay but we have balanced this against more rapid action which in our opinion would produce results similar to those about which the Americans have so violently protested and which might well frustrate the future activities of the ICSC. We are not looking for a debate but are genuinely anxious to maintain the best understanding we can with the USA authorities.

For London

6. Since the Foreign Office seem to have had thoughts similar to the State Department, you should put to them a suitably worded explanation and question similar to above. As you will realize, we have regarded the recent issues as highly important for the whole future of the Commission and appropriate for intergovernmental consultation in addition to that regularly taking place in Vientiane.

541.

LAOS – ICSC INVESTIGATIONS

On March 18 we had a lengthy discussion with Cross, Officer in Charge Laos Affairs, about position in ICSC from which it was apparent that on that date State Department was unaware of Canadian position as set out in your Y-109 March 16. In ignorance of this position, State Department had agreed with assessment of Unger in telegram March 16 (based on discussions with Bridle, Hopson and others, up to and including March 15) that there should be no repeat no further delay in sending simple affirmative response to RLG's February 6 request for investigation at Tchepone; and that for fear of prejudicing prospects of expanding scope in situ of ICSC team investigation, and possibly even of prospect of investigation taking place at all, it would be best if Candel held off for the time being in proposing ICSC-initiated investigation in Tchepone. Cross said that instructions had been sent March 18 to USA Embassy Ottawa to advance these arguments favourably to you.

2. We therefore informed Cross, on the basis of your Y-109 March 16, that as we understood your position, possible outcome of course advocated by Unger and accepted by State Department might well result in no repeat no progress whatsoever and that, moreover, in absence of action by ICSC on basis of Candel request, ICSC report to Co-Chairmen on RLG-requested investigation at Tchepone would probably have to go forward without any indication whatsoever that Indo-Canadian majority, or at any rate, Canadian delegation, was dissatisfied with the effectiveness of the pattern of negotiations being established. We told Cross that whilst we still hoped that expansion of initial investigation would be possible and would work toward this end, we were doubtful either of achieving an effective expansion in situ or even of obtaining a majority team decision, since such a team decision would probably have to be based on evidence obtained on the spot. In view of Pathet Lao control of spot, we regarded likelihood of such evidence emerging as minimal.

3. Cross was grateful for our information but thought, nevertheless, USA Embassy approach to Department should be allowed to proceed. We ventured the personal opinion that approach would be unlikely to result in any change in our position unless very specific and compelling reasons were advanced.

4. In the light of your Y-61 we confirmed to Cross March 28 that your instructions to Bridle to act as in your Y-109 had been maintained. Cross had already had general indication to this effect from USA Embassy in Ottawa. Cross was not repeat not inclined to attach great importance to difference in our respective views, which he regarded as essentially tactical in nature. In Cross' view, only possible source of regret as a result of your decision (which, of course, by the time of our conversation March 20 would already have been put into effect by Bridle) might be that there would have been no repeat no opportunity offered for testing possibilities of expanding initial investigation in situ. Had this opportunity been taken, as recommended by Unger, and it had worked out successfully, then distinction between RLG-requested and ICSC-initiated investigations (which State Department officials did not repeat not like to see enshrined in Commission practice) would no repeat no longer be necessary.

5. On the question of whether evidence permitting an expansion of the ICSC team's initial investigation would have been likely to emerge, Cross told us (both on March 1 and again March 9) that, as we knew, Unger believed he had specific assurances from Avtar Singh that Indian member of team would actively work for production of evidence which would permit expansion. State Department had no repeat no basis on which to dispute Unger's assessment. Cross thought that in view of these assurances (which had been renewed to Unger approximately March 15) it would have been desirable to institute the initial investigation on the basis of a simple affirmative reply to the RLG request February 6, the only condition being that the ICSC response to this request did nothing repeat nothing to weaken ICSC position with regard to modalities for investigation. We said we did not repeat not wish to appear to be casting any doubt on Avtar Singh's assurances, but drew attention once more to our belief that despite best efforts it might be very difficult for ICSC team to secure evidence on which to base an expansion. Our understanding was that if in fact it were impossible to obtain such evidence, only recourse would be to initiation of request by ICSC with all the lapse of time through necessary procedural devices that this would probably entail. We also drew attention to unusual nature of RLG's February 6 request which gave an opening to ICSC to make progress on question of modalities. Finally we pointed out once more that delay on our part in promoting ICSC-initiated investigation would compound difficulties in ICSC position if, as we feared might be the case, ICSC team failed to expand initial investigation as hoped. Cross agreed that the record in such circumstances might well show no repeat no improvement over January 31 report to Co-Chairmen, but he thought that USA authorities for their part would be satisfied with an honest effort to expand the initial investigation. He thought that had this occurred there would have been no repeat no difficulty in ensuring a reasonable understanding on the part of those interested in USA and elsewhere why ICSC report on initial investigation showed no repeat no advance over January 31 report. Alternatively, assuming efforts to expand investigation were frustrated by Pathet Lao authorities, a report on their action would, of course, form a convincing element in demonstrating where the blame lay. He did not repeat not dispute, however, that his arguments did not repeat not allow for the possibility which we foresaw that neither a successful expansion nor a demonstration of Pathet Lao frustration would have been the result of the course of action which USA officials had recommended.

SITUATION AT PLAINE DES JARRES

We are increasingly concerned about reports of serious deterioration of situation at Plaine des Jarres. It has occurred to us that if Kong Le is still in mood reflected in your telegram 111 March 2† he might welcome some sort of ICSC presence at or near Plaine des Jarres and that in view of Avtar Singh's strong stand re ICSC supply flights to help Kong Le's forces Avtar Singh might support such a proposal if it were acceptable to Souvanna.

2. Presumably it would not repeat not be possible technically to send a team because there would be no repeat no investigation to carry out. However ICSC representatives could perhaps go as an administrative unit for example to provide liaison and wireless communication in connection with ICSC supply flights. It might even be profitable to think in terms of the "logistic stations" which were discussed at Geneva. Apparently Indians supported this concept at Conference (see page 49 of Canadian commentary on Protocol†).

3. We should be grateful if you would discuss with Souvanna, Avtar Singh and others you deem appropriate ways and means whereby ICSC might support neutralists with special reference to Plaine des Jarres situation and obtain their reactions to idea of some sort of ICSC presence.

4. We should also like to know in due course whether Soviet aircraft given to RLG have resumed supply flights to Plaine des Jarres and if not repeat not what the reason is.

KONG LE ON PRESENCE OF VIETMINH IN LAOS

Kong Le told Grondin March 23 that reports re Vietminh presence near Ban Ban were not repeat not yet confirmed and that he was sending spy (sic) to check on reports. On this occasion he said he had received reports of two Vietminh battalions.

2. When Morris Australian Ambassador saw Kong Le March 22 latter showed him on map three points near Ban Ban where Vietminh had been reported. Yesterday French officer visited Plaine des Jarres and was told by Kong Le that there is new Pathet Lao battalion at Ban Ban commanded by a North Vietnamese. Kong Le also said Vietnamese labourers doing construction at Khang Khay are in fact Vietnamese regiment.

3. At airport March 25 when awaiting arrival of King and Souvanna from Thailand, Pheng Phong told Avtar Singh that in response to Souvanna's request for more information as to facts Kong Le had reported that presence of two Vietminh companies was confirmed. This information would be passed to Souvanna on his arrival.

4. Singh and I then discussed situation with Unger and Hopson who urged Singh to see Souvanna with object of encouraging him to ask ICSC to investigate and of reminding him that failing this ICSC might have to take initiative. Singh demurred saying he would prefer to leave it to Souvanna without prompting from him to react to Kong Le's request. Re possibility of ICSC initiative he did not repeat not wish to put himself in position of potential protagonist of complaint originating from one of parties (even?) neutralist faction since complaint must be against one of other parties and, while he is prepared to support investigation proposals from other Commissioners, by taking initiative himself he would compromise his position as impartial Chairman.

5. In these circumstances and in light of your telegram Y-66 I decided to see Souvanna myself and sought appointment for March 26. Souvanna was due to leave for India with King early March 27 and request for appointment was made through Protocol on urgent basis. Nevertheless yesterday afternoon I received message from Souvanna he was very sorry he was too pressed to see me that day but would be glad to see me after his return from India. This morning when saying goodbye at airport he asked me to excuse him for his inability to see me and hoped I would understand he was very pressed for time during his short stay.

6. After King and Souvanna had departed I talked to Pheng Phong who told me that Souvanna was now seeking more detailed information from Kong Le. It was hoped this would be available within two or three days. When I asked what action he thought Souvanna was likely to take he said he might himself ask ICSC to investigate or he might turn question over to National Commission with view to RLG request for ICSC investigation. He thought latter course more likely since it would seem necessary on matter of this kind to seek agreement of three factions. He was not repeat not at all sure Pathet Lao would agree. When I mentioned possible ICSC initiative he expressed hope we could be patient until nature of Souvanna's reaction to Kong Le's request could be determined more positively.

7. I informed Unger, Hopson, and Singh of what Pheng Phong had said. Unger and Singh also talked to (portion missing) separately.

8. Information so far attributable to Kong Le is not repeat not very coherent. Nevertheless Americans in particular are convinced that there is some sort of Vietminh presence near Ban Ban which should be investigated. If ICSC is to propose investigation this would have to be initiated by Candel and we would probably have to get necessary precision from American sources.

9. An advantage of ICSC proposal as compared with RLG request would be that former could be on basis which would provide for some freedom of movement. It might also be easier for Souvanna vis-à-vis assurances he has received from Ho Chi Minh than investigation requested by him or RLG.

10. On other hand because complaint really originates with Kong Le whole matter is highly charged politically and problem of securing RLG cooperation would probably be as formidable as problem of securing agreement within RLG to approach ICSC. Kong Le's report of Vietminh presence has already received considerable publicity in newspapers read here and while most neutralists seem seriously concerned, Pathet Lao attitude may be gauged from this line that whole business has been engineered and that it is significant that certain mysterious persons (not repeat not Grondin and Colonel Singh) visited Kong Le shortly before press reports appeared.

11. In these circumstances it is most likely Souvanna in spite of consideration mentioned in paragraph 9 will want to keep matter in own hands as long as possible. (Sisoumang, one of few neutralist ministers with whom Souvanna apparently discussed matter yesterday, told Unger that he thinks Souvanna has written letter to Ho Chi Minh).

12. Unger came to see me this afternoon to ask if I felt I could now initiate investigation proposal in Commission. His reasons for suggesting this were that Souvanna is unlikely to take any effective action and that situation in Plaine des Jarres area is so uncertain that Commission action at early date is highly desirable. I said that although Souvanna by not repeat not seeing me had rather exposed himself to a Commission initiative, in above circumstances I did not repeat not feel justified in launching investigation proposal without reporting to you and obtaining your guidance.

13. ICSC proposal would not repeat not only cause controversy in Government (8 groups corrupt) with consequent report to Co-Chairmen. Singh as usual would support Canadian proposal if made but is pessimistic about chances of RLG agreement within any reasonable time. We should also be clear that Canadian initiative even if based directly on American intelligence would be generally regarded as taken in support of Kong Le's complaint. This would not repeat not altogether enhance his neutral status.

14. Nevertheless if Kong Le's charges are well founded there is strong case in principle for Commission initiative. Also if Vietminh are present and acting in support of Pathet Lao as some reports suggest this could represent serious threat (not repeat not necessarily by means of overt attack) to Kong Le which ought to be resisted with all possible means. On March 23 Kong Le told Grondin that Singkapo had just told him he could send forty truck convoy in Vietnam to bring back supplies without Pathet Lao hindrance. This may be only tactical move but Kong Le was encouraged by it and did not repeat not think Pathet Lao were likely to attack him. Still, he is certainly correct about reports he has had of Vietminh presence with Pathet Lao.

15. Singh goes to Bangkok March 28 for medical treatment probably returning April 1. Souvanna returns with King late March 30. I suggest my best course is to prepare submission but not repeat not table it in Commission until I have seen Souvanna on his return. I would be grateful in meantime to receive your instructions.

16. I will report separately on more general aspects of Grondin's visit to Plaine des Jarres and on action so far taken on your Y-66.

LAOS – SITUATION AT PLAINE DES JARRES

Rufus Smith of USA Embassy called March 26 on instructions to convey State Department view that ICSC should push ahead with establishment of presence on Plaine des Jarres and investigation of Viet Minh in Ban Ban area. These two objectives seemed to be confused in mind of Americans who appeared to think of investigation as means of establishing presence. They also thought ICSC should establish presence and/or conduct investigation even if Souvanna objected. They believed attempt should be made to save Souvanna's military support for him in spite of his reluctance to act.

2. Because we did not repeat not have benefit of your reference telegram, which arrived only yesterday, we could not say much about Ban Ban investigation except that we saw no repeat no reason in principle why it should not repeat not be attempted. We did however attempt to clarify for Americans difference between investigation and establishment of ICSC presence pointing out in particular that probable time limitation on investigation would prevent its being suitable vehicle for establishment of presence.

3. Americans were aware of instructions in our telegram Y-66 March 22 and agreed with them except insofar as they implied necessity of Souvanna's concurrence. We said Indian cooperation would be essential in such an exercise and that Avtar Singh would not repeat not likely go along with us unless Souvanna consented.

4. We are now awaiting your report of Grondin's visit to Plaine des Jarres and can not repeat not of course decide on further action until we know what happened there.

INVESTIGATION OF VIET MINH ON PLAINE DES JARRES

In view of reports from Kong Le about Viet Minh presence near Ban Ban and general unsatisfactory situation on Plaine des Jarres we consider there is clear and urgent need for ICSC investigation. We understand Souvanna's reluctance to request ICSC investigation of Viet Minh presence so soon after receiving Ho Chi Minh's assurances but even if he did so his proposal would probably be emasculated by National Commission on its way to ICSC. We therefore think it best that proposal be initiated by Candel so that its terms will be broad enough to make meaningful investigation possible. Of course we realize that investigation may be blocked by RLG and if this happens are prepared to report facts to Co-Chairmen.

2. You should therefore complete your submission and present it to formal meeting of Commission immediately after Souvanna's return. Definition of scope in space and time should be sufficiently broad to form basis of effective investigation.

3. We think it would be desirable for you to call on Souvanna as soon as possible after his return to inform him of action you are taking under instructions and to express hope that RLG will give full cooperation to ICSC in carrying out the investigation.

SITUATION IN LAOS

The situation in Laos has become worse in the past few days. There now seems an appreciable risk – though not, perhaps, a probability – that the settlement so arduously negotiated last year will collapse. If this were to happen, a grave international crisis in the area would be difficult to avoid.

2. No Laotian leader or party has yet called into question the existence of the coalition government. Until very recently it could indeed be said that, although the Government had made no substantial progress towards integration of the forces and the administration, at least it had reached a number of agreements in principle leading in that direction and there had been no real retrogression. The tensions between the neutralist forces and the Pathet Lao have, however, been increasing in recent weeks; scattered fighting – the extent and seriousness of which are difficult to judge – has now occurred; and with the exception of a few hundred dissident neutralists, who are co-operating with the Pathet Lao, the neutralist force seems increasingly to be aligned against the Pathet Lao and thus increasingly to be tending towards co-operation with the right wing forces of General Phoumi.

3. The murder of the Foreign Minister, Mr. Quinim Pholsena, which precipitated the latest clashes, has led to an outburst of invective from the Communist side. Prince Souphanouvong lost no time in attributing responsibility for the murder to the United States. His line has been echoed explicitly by Moscow radio and the Peking press. Officially, however, both the Russians and the Chinese have been cautious in their statements, though Mr. Khrushchev's message of condolence did refer to "schemes of the hostile forces of whom Quinim Pholsena was a victim." The Russians have joined the British in sending to Souvanna Phouma a joint message from the Co-Chairmen, deploring the assassination and appealing to all parties in Laos "to assist in such investigations and in taking such measures as may prove advisable to prevent actions which might endanger the peace of Laos and the execution of the Geneva Agreement." This message has been published.

4. This morning, when receiving the Co-Chairmen's message from the British and Soviet Ambassadors in Vientiane, Souvanna Phouma spoke bluntly of the "perfidy" of the Pathet Lao, which was, he said, supported by Vietminh cadres. He formally requested the Co-Chairmen to intervene on his behalf (a) with the North Vietnamese Government, to ask them to withdraw their cadres immediately from Laos, (b) with the Pathet Lao, to request them to call off their operations. He also told the two ambassadors that he was going to ask the Commission to establish a permanent base at the Plaine des Jarres. This he has since done. The Commission met immediately afterwards to consider the situation. We have not yet had a report of the meeting, but prior indications were that the Polish member would oppose both the establishment of a Commission "presence" on the Plaine and an investigation by the Commission into charges that Vietminh troops were there – an investigation which Bridle had proposed, on instructions, several days ago. From Delhi there are indications that the Indian Government is determined to do what it can to support Souvanna Phouma and to secure action by the Commission, if necessary by Indo-Canadian majority.

5. Within Laos, then, the process of polarisation has gone quite far – perhaps not far enough to split the government and country in two, but certainly far enough to make any hopes of early integration seem illusory. Outside Laos, the Russians are acting in a way which suggests some uncertainty as to the course most consistent with their interests. If they decide to support the coalition and the Geneva Agreements, and if their influence can be brought to bear effectively in Hanoi, the present crisis may be overcome. If either of these conditions is not met, the storm warnings may well be up in Southeast Asia.

SOUTH VIETNAM – COMMISSION'S ROLE

We have not yet commented on your conversation with Harriman reported in your reference telegram, concerning increased USA aid to Vietnam and Commission's role in present situation.

2. Of particular elements in USA position noted by Harriman, there are some we think we can successfully argue in the Commission, and some we do not. Following comments on points in order named may be useful as background in future conversations with State Department.

(a) We are now pressing in Commission for parallel consideration of items concerning increased USA aid and Northern subversion. We would not want to predict at this stage how successful we will be at keeping these items developing at same rate of progress, but recent telegrams from Saigon are reasonably encouraging. Degree of success may however depend to a considerable extent on underplaying publicity connected with arrival of further shipments.

(b) We doubt very much if, under established procedures, Commission would be able to refrain from asking for precise information on material that has arrived on USS Core, since imports have been apparent to all and since press reports have been explicit concerning quantities. If similar publicity is avoided in connection with future imports of war materials, however, we think it possible that Commission might not have to ask for explicit information. As you know (our telegram Y-677 December 21), we do not think that Commission could accept argument that Southern imports of war material are justified by Northern violations and that consequently there can be no question of violation of Cease-Fire Agreement.

(c) We are pleased to see that USA do not intend to notify arrivals of men and equipment for which there are no credits. We have asked Saigon for their opinion whether SVN should continue to notify arrivals for which credits do exist, and we will comment further on this when we receive their reply.

(d) We will do all we can to support in Commission SVN requests for increased patrols.

(e) We are glad to note USA view that CFA should be regarded as continuing in force. Question of applicability of articles 16 and 17 concerning introduction of troops and equipment will be dealt with below.<sup>45</sup>

(f) We note that USA considers Commission continues to play useful role. It would seem to follow that every effort should be made to preserve CFA and to maintain influence of Commission.

(g) We hope SVN will continue to cooperate with Commission. Any repetition of recent anti-Commission acts and demonstrations would have unfortunate effects on our efforts to assist them in Commission.

3. Harriman's desire that Commission should regard articles 16 and 17 of CFA dealing with entry of foreign military personnel and import of war materials as no longer applicable in present circumstances is more difficult to accept. We do not think it would be appropriate for us as member of Commission to take this line and we see no possibility that if we did Indians would support us. In any event, we think it would be very difficult to secure advantage of this kind for South without leaving way open for similar argument in favour of North. Articles 16 and 17 are now in fact principal articles of Vietnam Agreement and their supervision has been main reason for most team patrols. It would be difficult for us to argue for increased patrols while also arguing for suspension of these articles.

4. We have said before that we hoped USA could avoid explicit demonstration that articles of CFA are being evaded. We hope repetition of USS Core incident can be avoided not only because of very greatly increased difficulty in Commission for Canadian delegation but because of bad effect such open violations of letter of CFA may have not only on situation in Vietnam, but also on new agreement for Laos which has still to be concluded.

LETTER NO. 11
CONFIDENTIAL

Saigon, January 6, 1962

COMMISSION MEETING – JANUARY 5, 1962

At the Commission Meeting on January 5 two major items regarding the increased US Aid were discussed, the SVM letter advising the IC that they were asking for increased aid in the exercise of the right of self defence and a PAVN message alleging the import of 40 helicopters and 400 troops.

2. On the first item the Poles demanded that the SVM letter be sent to the Co-Chairmen and that the SVM be told that the IC does not accept the position of the GRVN, that they must operate within the Geneva Agreement which is unconditional and requesting them to withdraw the letter. Both the Indians and ourselves played down the letter on the basis that it should be considered in the context of future events in this connection. The final unanimous decision [was] to send a letter to the SVM drawing their attention to the Geneva Agreement and the party's obligation thereunder and stating that the IC had separately under active examination the Nam<sup>46</sup> [and] subversion cases which the SVM had used as justification for requesting increased aid.

3. On the second item the Poles demanded a citation for violation of the Geneva Agreement, an export order to withdraw the helicopters, a citation for non-cooperation and a letter to the Co-Chairman. The Indians took a very reasonable approach and the final unanimous decisions were to send a letter to the SVM asking for comments on the PAVN allegations within three weeks and refer the reports of Fixed Team Saigon on their inability to control the arrival of the Core to the Operations Committee for examination and report back to the IC within two weeks.

4. We had discussed these two items with the Chairman on a number of occasions prior to the meeting. This permitted a moderate and largely procedural discussion in the Commission. The fundamental issues raised by the SVM letter of December 9 have been played down and the US military aid item has been put into regular but accelerated channels. The Chairman would not accept a letter without time limit to the SVM and we felt it better to go along with him after the assurances he has given us privately concerning the Nam and subversion cases (see our Tel No. 5 of 4 January†).

SVN – COMMISSION'S ROLE

Your comments on the role of the Commission in the light of our conversation with Harriman on December 15, should prove most useful as background in future conversations with State Department officials. We shall of course, be interested to learn Saigon's views and your further comments on the desirability of notifying deliveries and arrivals for which credits exist under the provisions of the CFA.

2. We should, however, draw your attention to the implication of paragraph 3 of your message that Harriman "desired" that the Commission should regard Articles 16 and 17 of the Cease-Fire Agreement as no repeat no longer applicable in present circumstances. In our conversation, Harriman made no repeat no reference to any desire on his part in this matter. I think that we both recognized that these provisions (which we referred to in general terms rather than by their specific numbers) could no repeat no longer be regarded as applicable insofar as the introduction of men and materials was concerned. Harriman's major emphasis was, not repeat not that this was desirable, but rather that it was inevitable in view of the massive prior violations of these articles by the North. Indeed, Harriman made very clear, as we reported in our telegram 3790 December 15, that it was the USA desire to restore and re-establish complete observance of the Cease-Fire Agreement by both sides.

3. From this I would say that it is clear that Harriman would fully agree with your view that it would be inappropriate for Canada, as a member of the Commission, to argue that Articles 16 and 17 of the Cease-Fire Agreement are no repeat no longer applicable in present circumstances. What Harriman wants, I am sure, is simply that we press in the Commission for parallel and related consideration of Northern and Southern charges.

USA MILITARY AID – NAM CASE

I must report that tension in Commission is rising as subjects under discussion move toward decision stage which we all expect will be in (by?) February. Parthasarathi who has on the whole given me impression that he would ultimately take what decisions were required without allowing expectations of Northern and Southern reactions to (group corrupt) him, is now very worried and wavering. Pohoryles the Polish Commissioner has been very depressed lately about general situation of Commission. On one hand he has been avoiding discussion of Nam and subversion cases in Legal Committee by the better than usual excuse that his legal adviser has badly burned legs. He will not repeat not however send a replacement from his delegation. On the other hand he is under instructions to secure decisions against the South on alleged importation of Core helicopters and other recently arrived equipment or to have the whole matter referred to Co-Chairman.

2. Last week USA carrier Breton docked in Saigon. It is reported to have off loaded some equipment including, according to Nolting, three helicopters. Nolting told me however that he had not repeat not known of its arrival as it was making a regular annual trip to a number of countries in Far East. He was disturbed that it had arrived at this juncture and told me that most of its cargo including a number of fighters were destined for Japan. Flagrancy of arrival so close on the stern of the Core has upset Parthasarathi who was already disturbed by SVN policy of non-notification and a January 15 statement of SVN liaison officer at Cap St. Jacques to the effect that he would henceforth be unable to furnish any information on movement of ships through Cap St. Jacques or movement of aircraft at airfield there. This statement the liaison officer admitted came from SVN mission in Saigon.

3. Parthasarathi with whom I have discussed problem of notification feels strongly that SVN should return to policy of notification and recognize that citations for violations of Articles 16 and 17 would ultimately be awarded. He says that such a policy would enable him to point to the good faith of SVN and would make it easier for him to find means for delaying citations. He was never given any clear indication however as to how he would delay citations on import of equipment which the SVN would have clearly admitted importing. Last week he referred to possibility of reviewing records of French equipment exported after ceasefire and asked if I would discuss this and the whole question of notification with Nolting.

4. In view of Parthasarathi's request I saw Nolting on January 19. We both agreed that Breton incident and Cap St. Jacques statement were unfortunate and the latter unnecessary. I suggested to him that while there [are] pros and cons for notification and non-notification the important fact at the moment appeared to be that Parthasarathi was becoming so disturbed by a policy of non-notification coupled with the two incidents mentioned above that there was some danger that he would take action quickly on USA aid allegations in advance of decision on Northern aggression. I suggested that Cap St. Jacques statement might be withdrawn as well as other obvious but unnecessary hindrances to team controls which have been introduced by SVN liaison officers. I also wondered whether it might not repeat not be wise to provide some notifications perhaps even an (ex post facto?) notification of Breton. Nolting agreed to take this matter up with SVN ministers but confirmed that general policy of notification was firm Washington policy and he was not repeat not certain that question could be reopened on short notice. He said he would raise again question of French equipment records but we were both aware that these had been studied previously and that decision was that these did not repeat not provide adequate scope for justification of present USA aid, particularly personnel.

5. The whole situation has been brought into focus today with a request from Polish delegation for an emergency meeting on Breton case. In an unofficial meeting today with three commissioners present Polish ambassador stressed urgency for dealing summarily with such obvious and flagrant violations of CFA. While not repeat not denying importance for Commission of all allegations I drew his attention to fact that his delegation had not repeat not been represented since before Christmas at Legal Committee which has been given an extremely important mandate concerning Nam and Northern aggression case. The three week time limit which had been given the Legal Committee expired exactly one month ago today. Pohoryles first of all referred to Nam case as one based on forged documents and as merely a cover for USA aid and then said that it was impossible for him to send a replacement to Committee for his legal representative who has burned his legs severely. It is nevertheless quite clear Pohoryles could provide some representation at Legal Committee if they wished.

6. Poles then made a formal request for an emergency meeting on the Breton for January 23 or 24. As item is already on agenda of a regular meeting for January 25 I said that I would have to have at least until January 25 to prepare myself for item particularly in view of the added importance which Poles by their initiative indicated they attached to it. Although I did not repeat not say so I was also anxious to give a very slight indication to Poles that their lack of cooperation in Legal Committee might bring inevitable repercussions. Pohoryles then threatened to read a statement into minutes when item was discussed and I replied by saying that this would only lead to other statements which we had avoided putting on record in hope that Commission could concern itself with more profitable and serious discussion.

7. I think it is possible that Polish Ambassador may approach you in Ottawa on this matter. If he does I think it would not repeat not be advisable to raise Nam case at same time. You might wish to consider however advisability of our Ambassador in Warsaw enquiring when Polish delegation intends to send a representative to Legal Committee in view of important items which are now before it. I should also be grateful for your comments on action which I have taken.

8. I think no repeat no harm can come from postponement of discussion of this item for one day on perfectly reasonable grounds. In addition it will have served notice on both Poles and Parthasarathi of our concern that Commission proceed with all its tasks in an equitable manner. This is I am afraid only the forerunner on much more difficult time ahead. Parthasarathi is now becoming less clear about dealing of [sic] Nam and subversion cases in Commission. He now seems to think that Legal Committee should not repeat not meet with a quorum of two and that material which Mukhi and de Goumois have been preparing should go forward when completed as a Secretariat document to Commission. He also mentioned today that he thought it unfortunate that decision to send case to Legal Committee had been taken before his arrival and implies that he would have sent at least parts of it to DRVN for comment. This is of course not repeat not a good sign at all. Parthasarathi has also indicated that he might make one more attempt to convince North and South of necessity for moderation before taking main decisions against them.

9. It is becoming more apparent therefore that Parthasarathi will be increasingly prone to indecisiveness as time for decision approaches. In these circumstances I think it is very important that Legal Committee produce a document signed by Mukhi and de Goumois which can serve as an official document of Commission. I have instructed de Goumois to do everything possible to secure such a document and to ensure that it includes if possible the view that there is conclusive evidence against North. If such a document is distributed to delegations prior to study by Commission it will be extremely difficult for Parthasarathi not repeat not to convince it and it would be vital document for us if there ever was a need for a showdown.

10. I think it is very important now that we do whatever possible to firm up Indian position and you may wish to consider appropriate instruction to our High Commissioner in Delhi. The approach might be along following lines: we are approaching a time of decision in Commission on important allegations against North and South. It is vital that these decisions be taken at same time not repeat not only in order that principle of equity be preserved but in order to prevent what could be violent reactions from one of the parties (Nolting agrees with me that reaction of GRVN to citations against them concerning USA aid without any indication on Commission action on Nam case could easily cause a repetition of October disturbances and that possibly they would be more violent).

11. The great danger of a reaction of this nature from South would be that Commission work might come to a halt thus stopping work on Nam case. There is no repeat no indication the Polish delegation knows how work on Nam case is progressing. If they were to anticipate a conclusive report on Northern aggression they might go to any lengths to see that it did not repeat not secure any official status. As Parthasarathi seems to think that a citation of North for aggression and subversion in South might easily lead to a complete withdrawal of cooperation from North, it cannot repeat not be ruled out that Poles might actually welcome an excuse provided by South for seizing up or breaking up Commission in order to avoid such a decision.

12. While difficulties of taking any action are obvious they are probably not repeat not much cheaper [sic] than difficulties of taking no repeat no action at all. We have foreseen this for some time and it continues to be my firm conviction that the only equitable course, if not repeat not the only course, will be to take action on two sets of allegations at same time. If Delhi could send instructions to Parthasarathi along these lines there is no repeat no doubt in my mind that he could find adequate means to implement them.

13. I am disturbed by Delhi Telegram 59 January 19† which seems to indicate some deterioration in handling of Vietnam problems in Delhi. You may think it very important that Indians in Delhi be seized again of delicate nature of situation here and consequences of inadequate (group corrupt) than simultaneous action on subversion and USA aid cases. I can see no repeat no way of avoiding ultimate action on USA aid cases and, with Parthasarathi at least, the best tactic has seemed to be to press for adequate and simultaneous treatment on both cases with object of relating them ultimately in terms of SVM letter of December 9.<sup>47</sup> Parthasarathi continues however to resist the idea that cause and [effect] relationship in that letter can be justified by Commission.

SVN – COMMISSION ROLE

Interpretation given in our telegram Y-11 January 5 to Harriman's remarks about Articles 16 and 17 of CFA was of course based on paragraphs 2(e) and 6 of your telegram 3790 December 15. We recognize that Harriman said only that these articles were "obviously inapplicable" and "could not be regarded as binding" and expressed no desire as to attitude Commission should take regarding them. Since application of these articles is however a matter which can be decided only by the Commission, it seemed evident that the clear implication of his remarks was that realistic course for Commission was to agree that they were inapplicable in present circumstances. As stated in our Y-11, we do not consider this would be either appropriate or possible.

2. We hope you will make it quite clear to State Department that while Candel will do what it can to prevent embarrassment to USA in implementing military assistance programme, it cannot argue in Commission that massive violations of CFA by North constitute legal repeat legal justification for disregard by South of articles of CFA.

3. If, however, as you say in last sentence your reference telegram, Harriman simply wants Candel to press in Commission for parallel and related consideration of Northern and Southern charges, then he wants only what we suggested in our telegram Y-667 December 21. In this

SOUTH VIETNAM

Attached are copies of our telegram No. 3790 of December 15, 1961, External's telegram No. Y-11 of January 5, our telegram 142 of January 16 and External's telegram No. Y-30 of January 24. It is evident from these that the Department is unclear as to United States wishes about how the International Commission should handle charges that the United States and South Vietnam have violated the prohibitions of the Cease-Fire Agreement against the importation of military personnel and equipment. In particular, the Department is concerned about whether the United States may want the Commission to take the attitude that Articles 16 and 17 of the Cease-Fire Agreement (which contain the principal statement of the prohibition) are no longer applicable; and may further want the Canadian Delegation to argue in the Commission that the massive violations of the Cease-Fire Agreement by the North constitute legal justification of Southern disregard of articles of the Cease-Fire Agreement.

2. It seems to me that there are two aspects to this problem. The first is the de facto situation regarding violations of the Cease-Fire Agreement. The second is the position that the Commission, and the Canadian Delegation in particular, should take about the violations.

3. As to the first, there is no doubt that everyone concerned realizes that there have been massive prior violations by the North and subsequent related violations by the South which it can be expected will continue for the time and to the extent necessary for the defence of South Vietnam. The fact that these developments are related is brought out fully in the exchange of letters between President Kennedy and President Diem, published on December 14, 1961.<sup>48</sup> The relationship was earlier publicly referred to by Secretary Rusk in his news conference on December 8, 1961, when he said that it was not a violation of the Geneva Accords "to take steps to protect oneself against the other party's breach, even though, in the absence of such a breach, those steps might not be considered normal."<sup>49</sup> Similarly, in its attitude towards the Commission, the South Vietnamese Government has made it clear (e.g., in its letter of December [9], 1961 to the Commission) that because of the prior Northern violations, it feels obliged to request increased assistance from the United States Government. It is important to note, however, that in its letter, the South Vietnamese Government refers, in describing its sense of obligation to obtain assistance, to the "inherent right of self-defence." President Kennedy's letter also referred to the United States declaration in 1954 that it "would view any renewal of the aggression in violation of the Agreements with grave concern, and as seriously threatening international peace and security." At no point, however, in any of the foregoing public statements, except possibly in that of Secretary Rusk, is there any clear attempt to establish a legal interpretation of the Cease-Fire Agreement, which, without reference to other factors such as the “inherent right of self-defence,” would justify increased United States assistance. Rather, the impression created is that on broad practical grounds, there is no alternative to increased United States support. You will, of course, recall that at an earlier stage Assistant Secretary McConaughy talked privately to us and others about a “well-established” legal principle permitting retaliation for violations of an agreement such as the Geneva Accord, but there has been no reflection of the language he used in any of the public statements described above.

4. Coming now to the attitude that the Commission might adopt, there is nothing specific in what Assistant Secretary Harriman had to say to us, or in any of the public statements referred to above, to suggest that the Commission is expected to utter a legal doctrine that the prior violations of the Agreement by the North justify violations by the South. So far as we are aware, the United States “wishes,” with regard to Commission action, could be summarized as follows:

- (a) Avoidance of detailed enquiry into the quantity and character of United States assistance; (This, of course, implies that there could be no legal justification).
- (b) Active investigation of subversion charges;
- (c) Increased patrolling by Commission teams; and
- (d) Implicitly, avoidance of condemnation or “citation” of the South for increased imports of men and equipment.

There have been no comprehensive or detailed suggestions as to how these United States objectives should be achieved in terms of Commission procedures, although there may be a somewhat more detailed form of consultation in Saigon between the United States representatives and the Canadian Delegation to the Commission of which we are not aware. The impression that Harriman’s words to us would suggest is that the Canadian Delegation and the Commission should be left to themselves to work out the formal position to be adopted in relation to increased United States assistance and the other objectives mentioned above.

5. For our part, we have given no undertaking to the United States authorities that we would attempt a legal justification for the increased United States assistance based on prior Northern violations. We have simply indicated that we would press on with consideration of subversion and infiltration charges and work for “parallel consideration” or pari passu consideration of items of the Commission agenda concerning subversion, etc., by the North and increased United States aid to the South. On the basis of Ottawa’s telegram No. Y-11 of January 5, I reiterated these points to Chalmers B. Wood of the Vietnam desk on January 17, using the attached memorandum of January 12† as a text. Wood’s reaction was rather interesting.

(a) When I pointed out that we did not think the Commission could accept the argument that imports of war material in excess of the levels contemplated in the Agreement are justified by Northern violations, Wood said he thought that in speaking to Harriman on December 15, 1961, we had agreed that this argument could be used. I said that this was certainly not the impression we had wished to convey.<sup>50</sup> I said I thought that perhaps the most we could expect would be pari passu consideration of charges by the North and the South in order to emphasize the background against which the increased aid to the South was taking place.<sup>51</sup>

Certainly not [A. D. P. Heeney]

Yes [A. D. P. Heeney]

(b) When I referred to our desire to maintain Articles 16 and 17 of the Cease-Fire Agreement as having continuing application because supervision of these articles has been the main reason for most team patrols and would provide the justification for the increased patrolling desired by the South Vietnamese, Wood said he thought that increased patrolling could be undertaken under other, and, in his view, more appropriate articles, namely Articles 19 and 24. I said I thought our view might be that Articles 16 and 17 might be more appropriate because patrols organized under these articles might offer less scope for argument on the part of the Polish Delegation and even the Indians.<sup>52</sup>

6. From Wood's reaction it would seem to me that McConaughy's legal theory continues to be current in some levels of the State Department. I think it would be useful if we could go back to Harriman and make our position clear once more. I strongly doubt whether he entertains any hope that the Commission publicly, or at any rate, the Canadian and Indian Delegations, can subscribe to the opinion that the increased United States aid can be legally justified (because of violations by the North) under the terms of the Cease-Fire Agreement. If any such hope exists, then it would seem necessary to explore more fully, not only the practical and legal reasoning behind it, but also the explanation for the United States policy that it does not wish the Commission notified of the precise extent of increased United States aid.

7. Such a discussion with Harriman should also include the present situation in Laos, and enable us to provide an up-to-date account of United States views.<sup>53</sup>

LEGAL COMMITTEE REPORT ON NAM AND SUBVERSION CASES

Legal Committee met March 3 and majority report was signed by Mukhi and de Goumois. Text in following telegram. Polish member was reportedly too ill to attend but another member of Polish Delegation who was sent to pick up what they probably thought would be draft conclusions, was present while report was signed. Main body of report will be put in final form over next two weeks during which time Polish Delegation has been asked to prepare note of dissent. We therefore seem to have got over this stage too satisfactorily.

2. As forecast in reference telegram report goes well beyond original mandate of Committee which was merely to consider whether allegations and evidence in two letters sent by SVM attracted prima facie Geneva Agreement. Report indicates that Committee has come to conclusion that in specific instances there is evidence to show that armed and unarmed personnel, arms, munitions and other supplies have been sent from zone in North to zone in South with object of supporting, organizing and carrying out hostile activities, including armed attacks, directed against armed forces and administration of zone in South. Committee has concluded further that PAVN has allowed zone in North to be used for inviting, encouraging and supporting hostile activities in zone in South, aimed at overthrow of administration in South. It is stated that this evidence is in violation of Geneva Agreement.

3. While we had partly for tactical reasons submitted a stronger draft indicating specifically that Northern authorities were responsible for violations, Indian Delegation was not repeat not prepared to go farther than their own draft. Rather than take risks involved in re-opening question in Delhi or in permitting any further delay, we agreed to report. In effect it gives us all that is necessary to indicate that Northern authorities have violated Geneva Agreement.

4. Moreover, report on whole corresponds to our evaluation of evidence submitted by SVM. Conclusive finding was made on basis of documentary evidence and other physical evidence such as seized weapons, medicines and other material provided by SVM. Main evidence was diaries of dead Viet Cong soldiers with whose authenticity Mukhi and de Goumois were entirely satisfied. Diaries revealed in particular that armed and unarmed personnel came from DRVN to carry out military operations in South. Complete report which should be ready about March 18, will show how conclusions were reached and will analyse in detail complaints made by SVM.

5. While PAVN is not repeat not directly charged with aggression inference is clear from report that Northern authorities have been implicated in activities occurring in South. Report opens door to further investigation by Commission on complaints for which there is only prima facie evidence and on cases which will be submitted by SVM in future. Commission may thus be in a position to make other findings against Northern authorities exposing their role in hidden war which has been going on in Vietnam.

6. You will appreciate importance of having secured this report in its final form in advance of completion of detailed appendices. It will now be extremely difficult if not repeat not impossible for Indian Delegation to change its line no repeat no matter what internal or external pressures may be applied.

LEGAL COMMITTEE REPORT

Complete text Legal Committee report repeated below: Title begins: Report of Legal Committee on Commission's reference at its 636th meeting held on November 28/61 and other references related thereto. Title Ends. Text Begins:

We have studied Agreement on Cessation of Hostilities in Vietnam, South Vietnamese mission letters 4660/IDVN/CT/TD/2 dated October 24/61<sup>54</sup> and 5078/PVDN/CT/TD/2 dated November 16/61 and related references from Commission together with evidentiary material made available by South Vietnamese Mission in connection herewith and reached following conclusions:

(1) Agreement on Cessation of Hostilities in Vietnam proceeds on principle of complete respect by either party of the zone assigned to other, and inescapable responsibility of parties for fulfillment of obligations resulting therefrom.

Article 10 of Agreement states expressly obligation of two parties to order and "enforce" the "complete" cessation of all hostilities.

Article 19 of Agreement casts obligation on two parties to ensure that zones assigned to them are not repeat not used for resumption of hostilities or to further any aggressive policy.

Article 24 of Agreement proceeds on principle of inviolability of demilitarized zone and territories assigned to two parties and states expressly that armed forces of each party shall respect territory under military control of other party and shall commit no repeat no act and undertake no repeat no operation against other party.

Article 27 of Agreement affirms expressly responsibility of commanders of forces of two parties of ensuring full compliance with all provisions of Agreement by "all elements" and military personnel under their command.

It follows that using of one zone for organization or carrying out of hostile activities in other zone, violations by members of armed forces of one party of territory of other party, or commission by any element under control of one party of any act directed against other party, would be contrary to fundamental provisions of Agreement which enjoin mutual respect for territories assigned to two parties.

(2) Having examined complaints and supporting material sent by South Vietnamese Mission, Committee has come to conclusion that in specific instances there is evidence to show that armed and unarmed personnel, arms, munitions and other supplies have been sent from zone in North to zone in South with object of supporting, organizing and carrying out hostile activities, including armed attacks directed against armed forces and administration of zone in South. These facts are in violation 10, 19, 24 and 27 of Agreement on Cessation of Hostilities in Vietnam.

(3) Examining complaints and supporting material, in particular documentary material sent by South Vietnamese Mission, Committee has come to further conclusion that there is evidence to show that PAVN has allowed zone in North to be used for inciting, encouraging and supporting hostile activities in zone in South, aimed at overthrow of administration in South. Use of zone in North for such activities is in violation of Articles 19, 24 and 27 of Agreement on Cessation of Hostilities in Vietnam.

(4) Committee considers that further investigation is necessary to reach a final conclusion as to whether kidnapping and murder of Colonel Nam, late Chief of South Vietnamese mission, was a part of activities referred to in subparagraphs (2) and (3) above and prohibited under Articles 19, 24 and 27 of Agreement. South Vietnamese mission has furnished prima facie evidence to warrant such a full investigation of case by Commission.

2. We shall submit in due course a full report setting out in detail complaints made by South Vietnamese mission, evidence forwarded in relation to these complaints, and our specific observations thereon. Text ends.

Report is dated March 3/62 and signed by J.M. Mukhi Chairman for India and by M. de Goumois for Canada.

CONFIDENTIAL

On February 14, on instructions of the State Department, Mr. Rufus Smith of the United States Embassy brought in an informal memorandum, copy attached, regarding the introduction of American troops and material into South Vietnam. It outlined in particular United States views concerning the problem of notification of such importations to the International Commission.

2. While Mr. Smith was here, we discussed the issues involved without, of course, expressing direct opinions on the particular points made. In view of the increasing extent of American assistance to Vietnam and the consequent problems created for the Commission, we thought it wise to examine the extent to which there was any conflict of interest. The attached draft Aide-mémoire represents our findings, and shows an encouraging absence of serious differences. If you agree, we would instruct the Embassy in Washington to hand this Aide-mémoire to the State Department (passing a copy to the American Embassy here).<sup>55</sup> It seems desirable to express our views in writing, so as to avoid any misunderstanding. We would hope that the State Department would find themselves in agreement with our analysis of the situation. That would give a firmer foundation for the discussion of Commission action in later weeks and of the exact method of notification by the South.

[PIÈCE JOINTE 1/ENCLOSURE 1]

Ottawa, February 14, 1962

The Geneva Accords, in the view of the United States Government, involve two obligations relevant to the introduction of United States troops and matériel into South Vietnam: (1) notification to the International Control and Supervisory Commission (ICC) of the entry and exit into and from Vietnam of United States personnel or United States military equipment; and (2) an undertaking not to introduce military personnel or arms other than authorized by the Accords.

The United States leans to the view that the December 9, 1961 note from the Government of Vietnam to the ICC constitutes notification within the meaning of the Accords, since, thereby, the ICC was informed of the intended increased support in men and matériel, by the United States, additional to that which was authorized by the Accords. Since the purpose of the December 9 notification was to place on record the fact that the limits prescribed by the Accords would have to be exceeded under present circumstances, it does not appear to the United States that specific numbers, amounts, and quantities need be placed before the ICC.

With regard to the more basic question of the introduction of new troops, arms, and munitions, beyond the limits specified in the Accords, the United States is guided by a clearly recognized principle of international law, namely that the non-observance of a treaty obligation by one party to that treaty justifies an equivalent corresponding or related non-observance by the other party. We are prepared to admit, of course, that this principle is subject to the limitation that the aggrieved party may continue its non-observance of the treaty obligations only until resumption of observance by the other party.

This point would seem to have been made in the December 9 note from the Government of Vietnam, which, among other things, said, "In view of the aggression being waged by the so-called Democratic Republic of Vietnam against the Government of Vietnam in flagrant violation of the Geneva Accords, the Government of Vietnam has requested the United States Government to increase the support in men and matériel which it has accorded in the past. The right of self-defense being an inherent and legitimate attribute of sovereignty, the Government of Vietnam is obliged by the North Vietnamese contempt for life and property of the free people of Vietnam and by North Vietnamese breaches of the Geneva Accords to exercise this right and to appeal for increased assistance." It is also clear that at the same time the December 9 note acknowledged the limitation on this principle by stating, "As soon as the authorities in North Vietnam end their aggressive acts and begin to observe the Geneva Accords, these measures of support can be terminated."

Not approved. Please see my memo of today's date. R. C[ampbell] 7/3.

In view of the foregoing, it appears to the United States that the December 9 note has already dealt with the question of notification and that further notifications are not required, since, as indicated above, the purpose of notification is to permit the ICC to verify that specified amounts are not exceeded, whereas the December 9 notification, for the reasons stated therein, clearly set forth the intention to break the ceiling.

The question which is thus left for the ICC to consider is whether the action taken can be justified on the grounds noted above, a consideration which raises the issue of subversion. In the view of the United States, therefore, subversion clearly becomes the issue with which the ICC must deal and which it cannot ignore.

It is the firm view of the United States that what is at stake in Vietnam is a question of world-wide concern: How can the community of nations identify subversive warfare as a violation of world peace fully as flagrant, fully as dangerous, and fully as violent as overt war of the kind experienced in the Korean conflict? There is no question that North Vietnam has trained troops on its own territory and has infiltrated them over a period of time into South Vietnam in lieu of using them in a massive and overt attack. Using newly infiltrated troops, local recruits, and personnel left in place when Vietnam was divided, North Vietnamese agents have directed the present insurgency in South Vietnam. The type of war being waged cannot be dismissed as not being aggression merely because the pattern of aggression it presents is novel.

It appears to the United States that, months after complaints by the Government of Vietnam regarding North Vietnamese subversion, the ICC has thus far avoided this central issue, and the matter is still being sifted through the ICC's legal committee. In the view of the United States the ICC must face this issue, which is at the heart of the problem of insecurity in Southeast Asia. In this connection, the United States is persuaded that the ICC has an important role to fulfill in beginning to formulate a body of legal doctrine to control subversion.

Our policy toward Vietnam is clear. The United States does not menace North Vietnam nor seek its re-conquest. However, it is our intent to provide the Government of Vietnam with all means necessary to preserve its independence. This exceptional aid will cease once North Vietnam ends its attempts to destroy the Government of Vietnam.

While we appreciate the difficulties which confront Canada and India, we consider that it would be damaging if the ICC were to find the Government of Vietnam and the Government of the United States in violation of the Geneva Accords without citing the "Democratic Republic of Vietnam" for its responsibility for the situation which exists in South Vietnam.

In our view the record is clear that, regardless of the present efforts of the North Vietnamese to obscure the facts, increased United States aid has been a response to increased subversion. The United States would therefore hope that the ICC, before considering the complaints of the "Democratic Republic of Vietnam," would first consider the complaints of the Government of Vietnam on the problem of subversion. If this should prove absolutely not to be feasible, the United States would nevertheless consider the two issues linked, since, in its own defense, the Government of Vietnam could only be expected to raise the issue of subversion once again.

Ottawa, March 5, 1962

The relationship between the measures which have been taken by the United States Government to assist the defence forces of the Republic of Vietnam, on the one hand, and the responsibilities devolving upon the International Supervisory Commission for Vietnam under the Geneva Agreements of 1954, on the other, has been the subject of anxious consideration by the Canadian authorities in recent weeks.

The Canadian Government recognizes that these measures have been taken for the primary purpose of maintaining the independence of South Vietnam and generally for the preservation of stability and peace in the Southeast Asian region. With these objectives the Canadian Government has the fullest sympathy and, as United States officials have been assured on a number of occasions, Canadian representatives in the Commission will do all they appropriately can to avoid or minimize embarrassment to the United States in the execution of its programme of assistance. At the same time, the Canadian Government welcomes the indications it has had that the United States Government, for its part, recognizes the difficulties which confront the representatives of Canada and India in the Commission on this matter. As the United States Government pointed out in its memorandum of February 1960, concerning the increases then proposed for the MAAG, such matters must necessarily be handled in the Commission "only as a question of interpreting the Geneva Agreements."<sup>56</sup>

The Canadian Government is in general agreement, moreover, with the view expressed in the same United States memorandum that the broad purpose of the Geneva Agreement for Vietnam was "to stop hostilities and to freeze the balance of military power between the two sides." Not only has this balance been upset by the increase in the strength of the North Vietnamese military forces; the North Vietnamese authorities have also unquestionably been responsible in very large part for the incitement and direction of subversive and terroristic activities in the South. The Canadian Government welcomes, therefore, as consistent with the spirit and intent of the Geneva Agreements, the statement of President Kennedy that "if the communist authorities in North Vietnam will stop their campaign to destroy the Republic of Vietnam, the measures we are taking to assist your defence efforts will no longer be necessary."<sup>57</sup> It would seem reasonable to infer from this statement that a return to the situation envisaged by the Geneva Agreements is an objective of United States policy.

It follows from the foregoing that the Canadian Government fully shares the view which has been expressed by United States officials that the question of Northern subversion and American assistance are directly and intimately linked, and that the establishment of this link is indeed the central issue now before the Commission.

The United States Government is aware of the prolonged and sustained efforts which were made by Canadian representatives in the Commission to obtain formal recognition by the Commission that it has the competence and the duty to entertain and investigate charges of subversive activity by one party against the other, and of the fact that a decision to this effect was finally taken by Indo-Canadian majority on June 24, 1961.<sup>58</sup> Since that time, and particularly since the receipt by the Commission of the South Vietnamese Government's letter of October 24, 1961, the Indian and Canadian representatives on the Commission's legal committee have been engaged (in the absence of the Polish representative) on a detailed examination of the mass of evidence submitted by the South Vietnamese authorities. This examination is progressing favourably, and it is the earnest hope of the Canadian Government that a report will soon be submitted by the legal committee on the basis of which the Commission will be able to take an appropriate decision.

The United States Government is also aware that complaints have been received by the Commission that the assistance in men and material recently made available to the Republic of Vietnam by the United States constitutes a violation of the Geneva Agreement. It is the understanding of the Canadian authorities that the United States Government recognizes that the limits for assistance set by the Geneva Agreement have in fact been exceeded; and although no public statement to this effect has been made, specific reports published in the press have not been denied. The Canadian Government is in the fullest agreement with the view expressed by United States officials that it would be damaging if the Commission were to find the Government of the Republic of Vietnam and the Government of the United States in violation of the Geneva Agreement without citing North Vietnam for its responsibility for the situation which exists in South Vietnam. The Canadian Government would not be a party to such a finding. It must however point out the extreme difficulty if not impossibility for the Commission, when considering these complaints "as a question of interpreting the Geneva Agreement," of not at some stage reaching the conclusion that violations of the relevant articles of the Agreement have taken place. It would be the hope of the Canadian Government that such findings, if made after a finding with regard to North Vietnamese responsibility, would be seen in their proper context.

The Canadian Government believes it to be the generally accepted view of the Western powers concerned with this situation, including the United States, that in the absence at the present time of any better alternative the preservation (or, where necessary, the restoration) of the "Geneva structure" for Vietnam is a desirable object of policy. If this is so, it would seem to follow that no avoidable action should be taken which would have the effect of undermining that structure or of rendering unable to function the Commission which was created to supervise and control the implementation of the Agreement. It is with these considerations in mind that the Canadian Government has recently been re-examining the questions urgently posed for the Commission by the allegations that articles 16 and 17 of the Agreement are being violated.

As the United States Government is aware, these articles prohibit the introduction into Vietnam of additional military personnel and additional war material (subject to provision for rotation and replacement), require each party to notify the Commission of any arrivals and departures of such personnel or material, and charge the Commission with responsibility for supervising and inspecting, through its inspection teams, the arrivals, departures and replacements of men and materials.

While recognizing that the United States regards its increased assistance as a response to increased North Vietnamese subversion, the Canadian Government finds it difficult to believe that the Commission could accept the suggestion that the South Vietnamese Government's note of December 9, 1961, which makes this point, constitutes "notification" within the meaning of the Agreement. This note was in very general terms. It did not indicate places, dates, numbers or use, as required by the two articles; and it afforded no opportunity for supervision and inspection by the Commission. A further suggestion that articles 16 and 17 should be regarded, in effect, as temporarily suspended by reason of North Vietnamese violations of the Agreement is also, in the view of the Canadian Government, one that the Commission could not be expected to accept. Whatever the intrinsic equity of these suggestions, they are not ones that a member state of the Commission could put forward consistently with the obligations which it assumed under the Agreement.

The dilemma which this situation presents for the Government of the United States and for the Government of the Republic of Vietnam is fully and sympathetically appreciated by the Canadian authorities who, as previously stated, are anxious to help in any way they can. It may be doubted whether any practical solution to the dilemma can be found until the Commission has been able to take an appropriate decision on the charges of Northern subversion. In view of the possibility that such a decision will soon be taken, however, the United States Government might wish to re-examine now, in consultation with the Government of the Republic of Vietnam, the question whether some form of notification – whether partial and specific or full and non-specific – would serve better than a continuation of the practice of no notification the double objective of deterring the North Vietnamese and preserving the Geneva Agreements.

VIETNAM – PROPOSED AIDE MÉMOIRE TO STATE DEPARTMENT

The Minister agrees that there is a need to remove any possibility of a misunderstanding between ourselves and the State Department on the issue of notification to the ISC of military assistance to the government of South Vietnam and he also agrees that it is perhaps best to record our views in writing. On the other hand, he regards any such exchange of correspondence as fraught with great risks in the event that any of the views expressed in the Canadian Aide Mémoire should become public. The propriety of any exchange of correspondence of this nature between a member of the Commission and one of the principal partners involved would certainly be open to question if it became known. It behoves us therefore, to exercise the greatest care to ensure that the views expressed in the Canadian Aide Mémoire are as “correct” from a Commission point of view as is possible in the circumstances.

2. In the Minister's view, this will require the elimination of direct reference to acceptance of certain U.S.A. views as now expressed in paragraphs 2 and 3 of the draft. (Indeed there are certain assertions and assumptions in the U.S.A. Aide Mémoire with which the Minister does not agree.) In summary, therefore, the new draft should confine itself as far as possible to a positive statement of the problem as seen from the point of view of a member of the Commission, without expressing the sympathy with which Canada as a government, may look upon the United States' difficulties in South Vietnam.<sup>59</sup>

The measures which have been taken by the United States Government to assist the defence forces of the Republic of Vietnam and the responsibilities devolving upon the International Supervisory Commission for Vietnam under the Geneva Agreements of 1954 have been the subject of careful study by the Canadian authorities in recent weeks.

The Canadian Government recognizes that these measures were taken by the United States for the purpose of maintaining the integrity of South Vietnam and generally for the preservation of stability and peace in the Southeast Asian region. These objectives are of course also those of the Geneva Agreements, which constitute the terms of reference of the International Commission.

The broad purpose of the Geneva Agreement for Vietnam was to stop hostilities and to freeze the balance of military power between the two sides. ## VIETNAM COMMISSION – USA MEASURES Minister has approved aide-mémoire outlining general Canadian attitude on problems now facing Vietnam Commission. (Text in our telegram Y-78 March 12.†) You should seek early appointment with State Department at suitably senior level and speak along lines indicated, leaving text. Please let us know date and time of appointment so that we may pass copy to USA Embassy here for their information.

2. Aide-mémoire is in effect a comment on points made to us recently both in Washington and Ottawa. (See particularly our telegrams Y-63 February 24† and Y-64 February 26.†) It reiterates our inability to argue in Commission (a) that GRVN note of December 9/61 constitutes notification within meaning of CFA and (b) that Articles 16 and 17 of CFA should in effect be regarded as temporarily suspended. It refutes statement that Commission has avoided issue of Northern subversion. At same time it recognizes fully and explicitly central importance of link between DRVN subversion and USA assistance. On particular question of notification it does not go beyond suggesting that USA Government re-examine with GRVN possibility of resuming some form of notification.

3. In order to put matters dealt with in aide-mémoire in proper perspective, you might remind State Department orally that general Canadian attitude of sympathy for USA objectives in Vietnam has been made clear on a number of occasions, and that in House on March 8 Minister explicitly recognized USA actions there to have been “in a measure of defence against Communist action.” (Our telegram PG-66 March 9† contains extracts from this statement.) You might also say that explanations of USA policy recently given to us in Washington and Ottawa have been helpful in considering what action ICSC could most usefully and appropriately take in coming weeks.

4. We would prefer that you did not at this time pass to State Department text of Legal Committee report (your telegram 745 March 9† refers). You may however tell State Department in strict confidence that Indians and Canadian members of Legal Committee have agreed there is evidence showing conclusively that DRVN actions have violated CFA. Though report is not yet completed, we are now reasonably confident that Commission will be in position to take decision on it before end March. You should emphasize importance in meantime of avoiding premature disclosure and of restricting closely distribution of information about Legal Committee's activities.

5. In discussing question of notification, you may at your discretion use material in Hooton's thoughtful telegram 29 February 22.† You should however make clear that views Hooton expressed to USA Embassy were his own and not necessarily those of Canadian Government. As indicated in paragraph 2 above, Minister considers problem should be re-examined but does not think it appropriate to suggest any particular solution.

VIETNAM COMMISSION – U.S.A. MEASURES

Yesterday, at my request, Mr. Rufus Smith, Counsellor in the United States Embassy, called on me for a discussion, in which Mr. Teakles participated, of the Aide Mémoire delivered in Washington on March 15.

2. I gave Mr. Smith a copy of the Aide Mémoire which I said was in effect an answer to their informal memorandum of February 14, but also an attempt to reconcile what might appear as differences in the American and Canadian positions in respect to Vietnam.

3. We told Mr. Smith that we had invited him here in order to add some explanation to the necessarily formal wording of the Aide Mémoire. We reminded him that expression had already been made of the Canadian government's sympathy and understanding of the American support of South Vietnam, and added that the explanations given here and in Washington of the American problems and political had been of assistance to us.

4. We then gave a somewhat more elaborate statement of the principal arguments in the Aide Mémoire, dwelling especially on the two points with which we had been unable to agree, namely, the American inclination to regard the Note of December 9 from the government of Vietnam to the I.C.S.C. as constituting notification within the meaning of the Geneva accords, and the impossibility of our accepting in the Commission the argument that Articles 16 and 17 of the Agreement could be regarded as suspended.

5. In respect to the first, we explained again the gap between the Vietnam Note and the kind of notification that is required. We said that we had not at this moment any fixed views on whether there should be Southern notification, or if so, in what form. We would like to consult the Americans about this later, and we recognized the difficulty of making any notification before a decision by the Commission on the North Vietnam violations.

6. In respect to the second point, that is, Articles 16 and 17, we explained that not only would it be inappropriate for a Commission member to suggest suspension of Articles, but such suspension would remove the principal basis for Commission investigations and patrolling.

7. We further explained to Mr. Smith that while we would not comment on the American argument that violation of a Treaty by one party justifies violation by the other, while we could not accept the interpretation of the Note of December 9, and while for reasons stated we could not agree to the suspension of Articles 16 and 17, we thought nevertheless that the Canadian approach to the subject as indicated in the Aide Mémoire and further explained in this conversation, was in substance similar to, and not conflicting with, the American approach. We said that we hoped that the State Department, after study of the Aide Mémoire, would make comments leading at best to a substantial agreement on American and Canadian policies. At first reading of the Aide Mémoire we had the impression that Mr. Smith saw some difficulties, but after the explanations and interpretations we had made, he said that he had a fuller understanding of our position and expressed satisfaction with the opportunity for having it detailed to him. He understands that the Aide Mémoire has been formally presented in Washington together with comment on the main points. He will, however, I think, send a supplementary message from here, no doubt, giving his own response to the document itself and to the explanations of it.

Dear George [Glazebrook],

At their request, Ted Rettie, who has been following Vietnam developments closely, lunched on March 26 with Abraham Chayes, State Department Legal Adviser, and Ben Wood of the Vietnam Task Force in the State Department. Ted has done the attached memorandum of the informal discussion which took place on this occasion about Vietnam developments, with particular reference to the role of the Commission.

As you know, on March 15 we left with senior State Department officials the Department's aide-mémoire on this subject, which suggested in its last paragraph that United States authorities might wish to re-examine their policy on notification. Chayes' comments made on this informal occasion on March 26 should not be regarded as a formal State Department response to our memorandum, but rather as an indication of the current thinking of Chayes and other State Department officials, particularly on the legal side, as to the basis of the present policy, and the advantages and disadvantages of urging the South Vietnamese authorities to resume notification in some form.

The memorandum of conversation and the State Department Legal Division background paper<sup>60</sup> which was passed to Rettie on a personal and confidential basis, require little additional comment. I agree with Ted that it would be useful if Chayes could be told, on an equally informal basis:

- (a) what our reaction is to the legal conclusions reached in the attached memorandum;
- (b) how, in our view, the best use might be made of the United States legal views; and
- (c) our informal advice on how an approach to the Indians along the lines of the attached memorandum might best be conducted.

On the substance of the question of notification, quite clearly this is a decision which the United States authorities and the South Vietnamese must take for themselves. From the attached account it is clear the United States authorities will be considerably influenced in coming to a decision by the specific action which the Commission (that is to say, the Canadians and the Indians) takes in linking the increased import of war materials into the

South directly and in a causal relationship with the prior and serious Northern violations of the agreement.

On this last point, I am personally of the view that the United States authorities would be well advised to discuss their view of developments of Vietnam and particularly the Commission's role "in depth," as the saying goes, with the Indian authorities, in the same way as they have exchanged views very frankly with us. From my own experience the best person to talk to would be M.J. Desai in New Delhi. I shall be glad to learn whether you agree that we might informally advise Chayes in this sense.

I think you can take it that Chayes is anxious, as we are, to preserve the informal character of his latest comments, and I hope that this form can be preserved in any comments which you may authorize us to pass on to him.

Yours sincerely,

S.F. RAE

SOUTH VIETNAM

At their request I had lunch yesterday with Abraham Chayes, State Department Legal Adviser, and Ben Wood of the Vietnam Task Force in the State Department. Their purpose was to have an informal chat about developments in Vietnam, with particular reference to the role of the Commission.

2. Chayes' major aim was to explore the pros and cons of a decision by the South Vietnamese to commence a policy of specific notification to the Commission of imports and arrivals of United States men and material for the expanded drive against the Viet Cong. It was evident that Chayes and others had been giving serious thought to the consequences of such a policy, possibly as the result of discussions in Saigon and informal conversations which we have had with the State Department here, as well as because of the suggestion in the last paragraph of the aide-mémoire which we left with the State Department on March 15, that the United States Government might wish to re-examine this question.

3. Chayes' view of the advantages and disadvantages of a policy of notification appeared to depend primarily on the extent to which it would be recognized (e.g., by the Commission) that the imports and arrivals into the South were causally related to the prior Northern violations of the Agreement, i.e., by subversion and infiltration into the South. His concern was that unless this causal relationship were preserved, the South Vietnamese, by following a policy of notification, would be practising a form of self-incrimination which could easily be exploited by the Communist enemy.<sup>61</sup> For example, he was concerned that the Soviet Union in such circumstances would be able to call for immediate international action to terminate the overt imports and arrivals into the South, whilst being in a position to delay any action to terminate the clandestine and unacknowledged subversion and infiltration being practised by the North.

Une note par G. P. de T. Glazebrook est illisible.

A note by G. P. de T. Glazebrook is illegible.

Chayes was, therefore, anxious to learn the circumstances in which such a policy of notification might have to operate.

4. On the basis of Frank Hooton's messages from Saigon, I said that we had no firm information as to how the Commission might deal with the related questions of increased United States assistance and the subversion issue. I said it was possible, however, that the Indians would be anxious to send a report to the Co-Chairmen which would take note of the two issues without emphasizing the causal relationship between them, and seek a recommendation from the Co-Chairmen as to how, in these new circumstances, the Commission ought to fulfil its mandate. I said I also thought that if this were the procedure adopted, the Canadian delegation would have to give thought to any available means (e.g., a minority report)<sup>62</sup> of emphasizing the relationship between the issues. However, I was doubtful whether the Co-Chairmen would find it possible to agree on a response to the Commission that would offer it much enlightenment, either on how to apply the concept of the causal relationship (if that were established in the report to the Co-Chairmen), or, indeed, on any other aspects of the Commission's mandate. Nevertheless I thought that once the Commission had taken a decision that subversion and infiltration were being, or had been, practised by the North, the Commission and others concerned would at least be operating in full knowledge of the background to the increased aid and assistance being given to the South Vietnamese. I suggested that it might also prove possible to continue to keep the relationship between the two issues to the fore if the Commission, in addition to receiving and acting upon notifications from the South, were to continue its investigations into the question of subversion and infiltration.

5. Chayes' reaction to these suggestions was that it would be very difficult to adopt a policy of notification in the face of such uncertainties. Certainly it seemed to him that there might be grave disadvantages in commencing a policy of notification until the Co-Chairmen had responded to the Commission's request for guidance. Thereafter a good deal would depend on what view the Co-Chairmen took.<sup>63</sup>

6. Chayes went on to indicate that it was this question of self-inculpation that lay behind a good deal of the legal work that has been done in the State Department recently on the question of justification for increased aid to the South.<sup>64</sup> In doing so he, of course, made it quite clear that he agreed with the view which the Ambassador had put to him some time ago that a legalistic approach to the problems of the Commission might not be helpful. Chayes hoped that we could keep our discussions on an informal and practical basis. He also wished to take fully into account our position in the Commission and our knowledge of its procedures.

7. It was nevertheless quite clear that Chayes was convinced that the increased assistance to the South could be justified legally and that, if it were appropriate to say so in the Commission, it would be the best way of establishing and maintaining the causal relationship to which the State Department attached great importance. Chayes then turned over to me the attached paper prepared in his office, which purports to establish that:

(a) the non-performance of a treaty obligation by one party to it will, so long as such non-performance continues, justify an equivalent and corresponding non-performance by the other party;

(b) the resulting non-observance, under certain conditions (which were believed to be applicable in the case of the Vietnam Agreement), could relate to an obligation different from the one which had been the subject of the previous non-observance by the other party, and, in fact, might be an obligation under a different treaty; and

(c) performance of the treaty must be resumed as soon as the requirements of legitimate self-defence are met.

The paper also indicates that these propositions “assume” that the treaty remains in full force and, in principle, fully operative, and that the intention is merely to consider the circumstances in which, on grounds of legitimate self-defence, it may be permissible not to perform, for the time being, a particular obligation of the treaty.

8. I did not, of course, read the paper during our conversation, but I did ask Chayes whether it was his belief that the Vietnam Agreement would continue to subsist in the event that the Commission were to adopt the legal principles to which he had referred in general terms. I pointed out that we might be concerned that if in effect the Commission were to interpret the Agreement so as to constitute a revision of some parts of it, the basis for the Commission’s operations itself might be put in some doubt since its mandate was also derived from the same Agreement. Chayes said that he thought that the Commission would continue to have all the legal authority necessary to continue its operations. I then suggested that although this might be the case, a good deal would depend not only on the willingness of the North Vietnamese to agree to such a position, but also on the uses to which the North Vietnamese themselves might be inclined to put such an interpretation of the Agreement. I suggested, for instance, that the North might claim that regardless of the justification for increased military personnel and equipment in the South, it would be essential for the Commission to permit similar increases in the North on the ground that it was an essential part of the Vietnam Agreement to maintain a military balance between the two sides. Chayes took the view that the North would have no say as to the continuing validity of the Agreement and that in view of the justification underlying the increased aid to the South, the North could not reasonably argue that the Agreement be interpreted so as to permit them an increase in their military personnel and equipment.<sup>65</sup>

9. It was of considerable interest that in this discussion Chayes did not attempt to make too much of the thesis mentioned in the memorandum given to the Department by the United States Embassy in Ottawa that the South Vietnamese note of December 9, 1961 constituted notification within the meaning of the Vietnam Agreement. On two occasions Wood ventured this approach but received little encouragement from Chayes. On the whole, therefore, I am inclined to think that Chayes is taking a somewhat more practical<sup>66</sup> attitude towards the problem of notification.

10. In the exchanges mentioned above none of us tried to arrive at any conclusions. Chayes simply requested that I try to obtain, very informally, Canadian views on the attached paper and the use to which the arguments therein might be put. He commented in passing that he had formed no opinion as to whether these legal arguments could, or should, be used, especially in the Commission, although it was evident that he thought they would provide a useful background for the causal relationship to which he had referred. His main concern in developing these legal arguments had been, as he explained it, to justify the State Department’s advice to the President to extend increased assistance in present circumstances to the South Vietnamese Government. His action in giving us a résumé of the legal research had been motivated by a desire to ensure that we understood fully the underlying principles guiding the United States Government. He added that he would also be very grateful for informal Canadian advice on the usefulness of speaking to the Indians about the United States legal views in order to complete their understanding of the United States position. He said he would be grateful also for Canadian suggestions as to where, and how, this might best be done.

11. It may also be of some interest to record some of Chayes' comments on the future of developments in relation to the Vietnam Agreement. Throughout our conversation Chayes reiterated emphatically that it was the United States' desire that the parties return to full observance of the Agreement. He was unsure when this might be possible, since he thought that there would have to be at least a minimum amount of political will on the part of the North Vietnamese authorities favouring a return to the conditions envisaged in the Agreement. Of this there was as yet no sign.

12. I suggested that there might be two aspects to the development of such a desire on the part of the North Vietnamese authorities. First, the success of the South Vietnamese efforts against the Viet Cong would obviously have a powerful influence on the political climate in the North. Chayes agreed that this was in fact the central problem for the immediate future.

13. Second, it was conceivable that the International Commission might have a role to play in developing conditions in which the North might revert to observance of the Agreement. I said I thought that our approach to the problems of the Commission had to be viewed in relation to its capacity to perform such a function. If the other countries concerned wished the Commission to remain in existence, I was sure Canada, for its part, would wish to co-operate in any efforts to make the Commission a more effective instrument for encouraging observance of the Agreement. I pointed out that the Commission did not, of course, have any obvious limits to what the Commission could do in the absence of co-operation from the parties, or, for that matter, co-operation between the parties. Chayes was sceptical that the North would ever extend any co-operation to the South for the better regulation of their relations. He and Wood were also rather scornful of the degree of co-operation extended by the North to the Commission and tended to view the South as more co-operative. I suggested that nevertheless the extension and expansion of Southern co-operation with the Commission was likely to be the most effective method of affecting the attitude of the Indian delegation, which, as we both agreed, played, and would play, a key role in future developments. Basing myself on paragraph 4 of Saigon's telegram No. 48 of March 22,† I suggested that there might be possibilities that the co-operation of the South, possibly even extending to the question of notification, might pave the way for the emergence of a more efficient and effective Commission, both in the South and in the North.<sup>67</sup> I emphasized that no authoritative Canadian views had been developed on this question but that it seemed to me to be one of the relevant considerations which the United States would wish to take into account in assessing the arguments for and against a resumption of the policy of notification. Chayes seemed to take this in and, at any rate, offered no immediate objection. He made it clear that the United States considered that the Commission was at present performing a useful role and that any feasible steps to make it more effective would, of course, be welcomed in principle by the State Department.

14. In this connection one point that he made was that the North and the South had virtually no machinery for contact. I said that this was, of course, our experience as well and that I suspected that the Indian concern for a revival of the Joint Commission sprang from the belief that ultimately a real pacification of the country would depend on some modium of mutual restraint based on more extensive contact than existed at present.

? [G. P. de T. Glazebrook]

15. It seems to me that Chayes is genuinely interested in promoting an understanding United States attitude towards our problems in the Commission and I hope that it will be possible to expedite some informal views which I can pass on. It seems to me that it would be useful if we could informally tell Chayes:

- (a) what our reaction is to the legal conclusions reached in the attached memorandum;
- (b) how, in our view, the best use might be made of the United States legal views; and
- (c) our informal advice on how an approach to the Indians along the lines of the attached memorandum might best be conducted.

Ottawa, April 26, 1962

Dear Saul [Rae],

I have taken a long time answering your letter of March 28 about the conversation which Ted Rettie had with Chayes and Wood. This was not caused so much by my sins of omission as by our efforts to examine the legal problem and to put it in its setting.

The position seems to be that the State Department have tacitly indicated that they do not want to comment on our aide mémoire until they can see their way through the question of notification by the South and the effect of that on the general position. We had, of course, suggested that the question of notification would need study but we had thought that the other principles might be agreed on beforehand. However, I am glad to pick up this informal conversation and add what I can to it.

The legal paper which came with your letter has been examined by the legal officers. We do not, of course, wish to make anything like a judgment nor were we asked to make one. Perhaps the nearest we can get is that it argues a principle for which there is good authority but one that cannot be regarded as firmly embedded in the agreed concepts of International Law.

You will have noticed, however, that we had previously kept away from a discussion of this argument concerning the breaking of treaties, not so much because we did not recognize its possible practicability but because it is one that does not fit our situation well. We see two objections to introducing this argument into the Commission itself:

(1) It could well be a two-edged sword as convenient to the North as to the South. Particularly in view of the more conspicuous, i.e., the more identifiable breaches by the South, it does seem that the North could, if they wished, take up this treaty argument and insist on the right to receive, say, 4,000 Chinese troops into North Vietnam in retaliation for the Southern breach.

(2) Our particular concern is the implication that we should announce in the Commission a doctrine of International Law which has not had general acceptance; in particular, this doctrine has not been the subject of a judgment in the International Court of Justice. The Commission would hardly seem to be a suitable platform for such an announcement, nor would we who are supposed to be the defenders of the Geneva Agreement appear to be the right people to do it. To come down to brass tacks and for your own information, I cannot conceive of the government's agreeing to our taking such action either from general considerations or bearing in mind our responsibilities in the three Commissions, in UNEF, and on the Kashmir cease-fire line.

I take it, however, that the essence of the American problem is what they call a "causal relationship." This is not necessarily dependent on a treaty argument and could be expressed in another way. You would have noticed that we have already taken up this point with the government of India (our telegram Y-202 of April 13 to Saigon†) and got a cool reply, although one which is surely defensible in logic. You will know by the telegram that we reserved our position on what attitude we would take when the time comes.

Assuming that the long drawn out process of drawing up charges against the North continues to go well in spite of the efforts of the Polish Commissioner, it is our hope that a majority report of substance can be issued (our telegram Y-97 of April 13†). If this process comes out all right and before the report is actually issued, the Poles and Indians would expect to be handling the charges against the South. You will recall that the best bargain we have been able to drive so far is that the two should be contemporaneous.

Presumably at that stage the Commission will consider anti-Southern charges either with or without notification from the South. I suppose that there is something in Chayes' argument about self-incrimination, although, as Washington has publicly announced on a number of occasions that it has sent troops and supplies way beyond any conceivable level allowed by the Geneva Agreement, this is a little more than a formality. Suppose, however, that the South does then notify at least something like the actual importations, the question then arises of causal relationship. The Poles, of course, would oppose this, and according to our present information, so would the Indians. This would leave us with the following choices:

- (1) We could take part in a unanimous citation or series of citations.
- (2) We could do that and then add orally a statement to the effect that the Southern build-up was in response to Northern aggression. This would appear in the Commission minutes but would not, of course be published.
- (3) We could make a minority statement in the agreed report or a minority report admitting the Southern breaches but putting them into the context of defence measures required by Northern aggression.

I would hesitate to guess now as to which of these courses we might choose until the circumstances become more evident. In general, we have in the past attempted to avoid action in any of the Commissions which could give to the Poles a substantive argument that we were departing from our proper duties and acting as a stooge of the United States. Perhaps we now have to do just that, but we are not even sure whether it would be helpful and will not be sure until we can see the picture pretty closely.

We have been asked three particular questions, and I have tried to answer (a) and (b). As to (c), that is the American approach to the Indians, I would hesitate to give any firm advice but in the light of my conversation with Chakravarty (Telegram Y-202) and of Ronning's telegram 301 of April 19,† and generally in the light of our experience in attempting to conduct conversations on Vietnam in Delhi, I would be very doubtful if an American approach based on the treaty argument would be in the least helpful; it might indeed be unhelpful.

I gather from your letter and from Ted's memorandum that the State Department proposes not to comment on our aide mémoire. I find this a little strange but see no advantage in pressing the matter. I would, however, be interested to know whether there is any indication that they agree or disagree with the attempt we made to analyze the situation.

Yours ever,

G.P. DE T. GLAZEBROOK

VIETNAM

A major current problem is the extent to which notification should be made to the International Commission for Supervision and Control in Vietnam of military equipment and personnel introduced into South Vietnam in quantities which appear to exceed the levels contemplated in the Cease-Fire Agreement for Vietnam.

2. One aspect of this question relates to whether, under present circumstances in Vietnam, the Cease-Fire Agreement should be regarded as continuing to impose an obligation to observe those levels. It has been stated that with regard to the applicability of these levels, the United States is guided by a clearly-recognized principle of international law, mainly that non-observance of a treaty obligation by one party to that treaty justifies an equivalent corresponding, or related non-observance by the other party, provided that the aggrieved party may continue its non-observance of treaty obligations only until resumption of observance by the other party. It is believed that this is a principle for which there is good authority, but one that cannot be regarded as firmly imbedded in the agreed concepts of international law.

3. Two objections are perceived to introducing this argument into the International Commission itself:

(1) It could well be a two-edged sword, as convenient to North Vietnam as to South Vietnam. Particular in view of the more conspicuous, i.e., the more identifiable breaches by the South, it seems that the North could, if it wished, take up this treaty argument and insist on the right to receive, say, 4000 Chinese troops into North Vietnam in retaliation for the Southern breach.

(2) The International Commission would not seem to be a suitable forum for introducing a doctrine of international law which has not had general acceptance, and in particular has not been the subject of a judgment in the International Court of Justice.

4. From another aspect, the essence of the problem of notification may be seen to consist of finding a means for establishing and maintaining international recognition that the increased assistance to the South Vietnamese Government is a response to prior and massive interference by North Vietnam in South Vietnam, in contravention of the Cease-Fire Agreement. If recognition of this causal relationship can be established and maintained as a practicable matter, then a purely legal justification, based on the principle of international law mentioned above, might seem to be unnecessary.

5. It appears that there are good grounds for believing that the International Commission will in the near future issue a majority report establishing, for the first time in an authoritative manner, the facts concerning Northern interference in South Vietnam. The Commission is, however, currently handling charges concerning the increased aid to the South in respect of which, also, it can be expected the Commission will have to take decisions citing South Vietnam for non-compliance with the terms of the Cease-Fire Agreement. In the interests of establishing, as a practical matter, the causal relationship referred to above, the Canadian delegation to the Commission has taken steps to ensure that any decision regarding Southern non-compliance will not take place prior to a decision on Northern interference in the South. At the present time the assessment is that decisions on both questions will be taken contemporaneously. There is, however, no assurance that the Commission, in taking these decisions or reporting them to the Co-Chairmen or members of the 1954 Geneva Conference, will unanimously, or by a majority, link the two decisions in such a way as to emphasize their causal relationship.

6. Indeed, the assumption is that the Polish delegation would oppose any such effort to establish causality, whilst the Indian delegation, as at present inclined, would also be reluctant to agree. This would leave the Canadian delegation with the following choices:

(1) To ignore the question of causality;

(2) To make an oral statement in the Commission that the Southern buildup was in response to Northern interference. This would appear in the Commission minutes but would not, of course, be published.

(3) To make a minority statement in the agreed report of the Commission or a minority report admitting the Southern breaches, but putting them into the context of defence measures required by Northern aggression.

7. It will be difficult to tell which of these courses might be most suitable until the circumstances at the time of the Commission report become more evident.

8. The question also arises of the extent to which the Indian delegation might be persuaded, on the basis of the legal arguments advanced in justification of increased aid to South Vietnam, to agree to action by the Commission that would assist in establishing the causal relationship referred to above. It is doubtful, in the light of Canadian experience in attempting to conduct conversations on Vietnam in New Delhi, whether an approach to the Indians, based on the treaty argument, would be in the least helpful. It might, indeed, be unhelpful.

VIETNAM COMMISSION

The Indian Chairman returned to Saigon from New Delhi on May 11, apparently with clear instructions to proceed with an interim report from the Commission to the Co-Chairmen on North Vietnamese subversion and U.S. military assistance. He [is] expected to circulate a draft of the report within a day or two and to give delegations only ten days to obtain instructions before beginning consideration of it in the Commission.

2. There have been strong indications that the Indians will not be prepared (as we would wish) to make explicit in the report the causal connection between Northern subversion and American aid. It is possible, however, that by suitable construction the report may imply this connection sufficiently strongly to be satisfactory. In our view, a majority report signed by the Indian and Canadian Commissioners – the Poles are certain to submit a minority report unless they withdraw altogether from the Commission – would have the maximum political effect, as two minority reports would tend to cancel each other. Only after the Indian draft is made available will it be possible to decide finally which alternative is preferable.

3. Last week, on his return journey to Saigon from consultations in Ottawa, Mr. Hooton discussed the situation along these lines with State Department and Foreign Office officials in Washington and London. Some consideration was given also at these talks to the question whether or not South Vietnam should resume notification to the Commission of importations of U.S. military equipment and personnel. It was generally thought, however, that this matter should be left in abeyance at least until after the interim report has been submitted.<sup>68</sup>

DRAFT OF SPECIAL REPORT TO CO-CHAIRMEN FROM VIETNAM COMMISSION

Gundevia informed me today that early this year he had instructed Parthasarathi to conclude as soon as possible the report to the Co-Chairmen. In March it was finally decided to summon Parthasarathi to Delhi to get the matter terminated. After consultation with the Prime Minister, Parthasarathi was instructed to finalize the report. He was told that it was unnecessary to wait for the completion of Mukhi's report with all the details involved. Mukhi's conclusions should be used and Parthasarathi was requested to draw up a draft, which was approved. The draft, said Gundevia, deals with the violations by the North and by the South. India will not repeat not agree to a report excusing either for action caused by the other. The report would merely outline to the Co-Chairmen the facts relating to violations by both sides with supporting evidence. Parthasarathi is instructed to send the report with or without a Polish minority report and/or a Canadian minority report. Mukhi must finish his report by May 30 as there have been criticisms here that Mukhi's fees are too high.

2. The Poles were annoyed when they learned of the instructions to Parthasarathi and the Polish Ambassador used every device, said Gundevia, to get the instructions modified. He insisted that if the North had given any aid at all to the guerrillas operating in the South, it amounted to zero compared to the magnitude of military aid given by the USA to the South in flagrant violation of the Geneva agreements. Gundevia was uninfluenced and Katz-Suchy insisted that he must carry out his instructions to see the Prime Minister. Gundevia then arranged for a 20 minute interview with Mr. Nehru. Gundevia briefed the Prime Minister in writing and learned afterwards that Katz-Suchy had spent over an hour haranguing Mr. Nehru with no repeat no regard for the state of his health. Gundevia received the following note in the Prime Minister's hand: "Polish Ambassador pleaded his case most eloquently and I gave the usual reply." The Indian Government is determined that even if the report is in a form which has never been made before with two minority reports, it must go to the Co-Chairmen.

VIETNAM COMMISSION – DRAFT SPECIAL REPORT

Had preliminary talk with Parthasarathi May 18 on procedure for handling draft Special Report in Commission. We did not repeat not go into substance of report but I hope to do this with him May 19 after more detailed study. There will also be an informal meeting of three commissioners early next week to discuss procedure.

2. With regard to Commission procedure, Parthasarathi was slightly less rigid than indications of Indian position given to British High Commissioner in Delhi (your telegram Y-226 May 15†). It is clear however that Parthasarathi is under instructions to process through Commission Indian draft contained in our telegram 78† with only minor changes of a factual nature. He considers that Indian draft has been carefully balanced and that any attempt to change one part of it could alter this balance. As Nehru read draft "word by word" before he approved it any substantial change would have to be approved by him. Parthasarathi expects that Polish Delegation will put in a minority report and suggest that if we wish to add a comment to report this might be done in form of a "Canadian addendum." I gathered that he thought we could agree in general with Indian draft but that he expected we might wish to emphasize cause and effect relationship and perhaps comment on certain paragraphs with a view to clarifying Canadian point of view without indicating opposition to main report. You will recall that this was generally view I expounded while in Ottawa before seeing Indian draft. I shall comment on this point after further discussion with Parthasarathi.

3. Timetable Parthasarathi is considering envisages an informal Commission meeting May 19 to discuss procedure, followed by a formal meeting on May 25 possibly extending to May 28. During this two or three day meeting Parthasarathi intends to make an Indian statement for record and presumes that Polish Delegation and Canadian Delegation will do likewise. He wishes to avoid a paragraph by paragraph discussion of text and his intention seems to be to induce Polish Delegation to indicate as early in game as possible its opposition to Indian draft and to steer Polish Delegation towards preparation of a minority report. By May 26 at latest Parthasarathi hopes to take final vote on main report. He would then give four days to other delegations in which they could prepare their minority report or addendum. Parthasarathi mentioned that DRVN had been sending numerous letters to Nehru and that Polish Ambassador had also been exerting pressure on Nehru to alter position indicated in draft Indian report. Parthasarathi expected a USSR démarche momentarily and in view of uncertainties of Laotian situation Nehru had given instructions to complete and forward Special Report urgently.

4. Parthasarathi said that he had taken a strong line with Pohoryles. He said Pohoryles was very concerned and had dropped hint that Polish Delegation might not repeat not be able to participate in a vote on Special Report. In reply Parthasarathi told him that if Polish Delegation absented itself from Commission meetings this fact would be noted in record but that report would be voted and sent forward to Co-Chairmen without delay.

5. Grateful if you would give urgent consideration to text of Indel draft and let me have your comments by May 24 at latest. (Group corrupt) you authorize Washington and London to show and discuss text with State Department and Foreign Office. It would be helpful to have their reactions prior to formal meeting.

6. As indicated above it is apparent amendment to Indian draft other than minor factual changes are going to be extremely difficult unless we are prepared risk exasperating Indel and to involve Commission in considerable delay while amendments are considered in Delhi. This could play into Polish hands and would give Polish Delegation opportunity to propose amendments as well. It is difficult to foresee what ultimate balance of report in such circumstances might be. My own feeling from a purely procedural point of view is that we should not repeat not accept on the spot and that if additional Canadian points are to be made we should accept Parthasarathi's suggestion that they be included in a Canadian explanatory addendum. Comments on substance of Indel draft will follow in separate message.

VIETNAM COMMISSION – DRAFT SPECIAL REPORT

I think you will agree that Indian draft Special Report as it stands is an exceptionally useful document. While in some paragraphs Indian line seems a little off-focus, the over all balance is clearly very much in favour of South. Most important feature of draft is firm Indian endorsement of conclusions of Legal Committee report which is contained in its entirety in their draft. It is quite clear from discussion with Parthasarathi that Indian Government is well aware that position they are taking in Commission will be interpreted, correctly, as a turning point in Indian foreign policy in direction of greatly increased firmness in dealing with Communist bloc.

2. I have discussed report paragraph by paragraph with Parthasarathi and have indicated a number of points which we would have preferred to see in different language. He took careful note of these points but invariably replied that while points might be reasonable he would prefer have them made in a Canadian addendum. I did not repeat not press very hard for amendments at this stage as it is quite apparent that they are not repeat not likely to be accepted. Moreover I am more than ever convinced that advantage lies in keeping as close to Indel as possible in discussion on Special Report. Parthasarathi therefore had no repeat no need to inform me that Indian draft might, if necessary, be sent to Co-Chairmen as a minority report. He did however, inform Nolting of this possibility. We will of course not repeat not allow this to happen.

3. While Indians obviously intend to avoid any explicit indication that Northern aggression can be accepted as cause of increased USA aid, inclusion in paragraph 13 of key section of SVM letter of December 9 coupled with full text of Legal Committee conclusion tends to make cause and effect relationship implicit. Some of amendments we suggested involved inclusion of dates which would indicate time relationship of Northern and Southern allegations. Parthasarathi was not repeat not however very receptive even to such factual amendments.

4. I have discussed Indian draft briefly but in detail with both Hohler and Nolting. Parthasarathi had previously shown text to Hohler who was very pleased with it. Nolting, from my description of draft, thought it much more favourable than he would have expected. He felt however that a short Canadian addendum indicating cause and effect relationship would be very useful. Hohler was of same opinion.

5. With regard to Canadian Delegation position on draft we feel we should be prepared to propose a series of amendments to report but to press them only if Polish Delegation insists on discussing draft paragraph by paragraph and presses for its own amendments. This would allow Chairman to refuse all major amendments and would enable him to insist that Polish Delegation indicate its disagreement with draft in a minority report.

6. In view of State Department and Foreign Office views on desirability of a Canadian minority report we think we ought to produce one in form of an addendum. I think it should avoid, if possible, taking issue with any section of Indian draft but should complement it by providing a short statement of cause and effect relationship. It might also include a sentence relating to paragraph 20 to effect that in our view USA military assistance arrangements for South Vietnam were something less than a military alliance. Nolting was however not repeat not very sensitive about this point mainly because he thought Commission description of their relationship as an alliance might encourage Vietnamese. We will draw up a draft Canadian addendum along these lines and will send it to you early next week. I should be grateful for your comments as soon as possible bearing in mind that Commission discussions may begin May 25.

VIETNAM COMMISSION – DRAFT SPECIAL REPORT

It is unfortunate that Indian courier carrying Saigon's telegram 78† May 15 was delayed en route and it was thus impossible for us to transmit this telegram to you until yesterday. In view of short time remaining before first formal meeting of Commission May 25 it has not repeat not been possible to give draft report detailed study or to discuss it further with Indian officials here. However, I should like to offer following general comments.

2. I am impressed by arguments set out in Hooton's reference telegrams and can confirm major points which they make concerning Indian policy. There can be no repeat no doubt that Indians are determined to defend draft as it stands and to resist any and all substantive amendments to it which may be proposed. Gundevia told me last week that report most of which had been drafted and re-drafted during Parthasarathi's recent visit to Delhi had been considered in detail at highest level in Ministry of External Affairs and by Nehru himself. A firm decision had been taken that substance of draft report was not repeat not to be amended and that if necessary it should go forward to Co-Chairmen with Canadian and Polish dissenting minority reports. It may also be correct to assume that report demonstrates some shift in Indian policy vis-à-vis Communist bloc. I have reported separately on this point. † Suffice is to say here that some Indian experiences in relatively recent past and particularly their difficulties with China have led them to take a more sympathetic attitude to Western reactions to Communist tactics.

3. This shift deserves fullest consideration in deciding what position we should adopt towards Parthasarathi's report. It is quite possible that Indians would see some advantage in expressions of Canadian dissent in form of a minority report or perhaps an addendum since this would assist them in maintaining their claim to impartiality and non-commitment. It seems to me to be at least equally likely however that they would welcome Canadian acceptance of existing draft without modification as a factor lending weight to report their representative has prepared and indeed to policy which they have adopted towards Southeast Asia. This policy has not repeat not been arrived at without considerable difficulty and I think that Indians deserve all encouragement we can give them particularly at this stage. I therefore strongly support Hooton's suggestion that we should not repeat not run risks of unravelling present text and thereby causing delays by pressing amendments to present draft. I also agree that it would be useful to prepare amendments and arguments and even an addendum to counter Polish tactics when report is discussed in Commission, but with a view to their ultimate withdrawal in final support of Indian draft. Although report may not repeat not be as kind to South as it might have been I certainly agree that it is as favourable as we could reasonably hope it to be. It may be that to attempt to gild this lily even in an addendum would be less useful than to encourage Indians in new line which they have taken.

SPECIAL REPORT OF VIETNAM COMMISSION – DRAFT CANADIAN ADDENDUM

Following is text of suggested Canadian addendum on which we are commenting in separate message. Text Begins: Canadian Addendum to Special Report to Co-Chairmen of (May(?)) 1962.

1. Canadian Delegation is in agreement with Special Report of Commission and in particular accepts principal conclusions of Report contained in paragraphs 10 and 20. It is of opinion, however, that military assistance arrangements between Governments of USA and Republic of Vietnam according to evidence available are not repeat not a military alliance in sense in which that term is usually understood.

2. Canadian Delegation considers it important that certain points which are implicit in Special Report should be brought clearly to attention of Co-Chairmen.<sup>69</sup> Documentation on which conclusions of Legal Committee (paragraph 9 of Special Report) were established contains allegations and evidence dating back to 1955. These allegations and evidence indicate that from time of Cease-Fire Agreement many subversive activities gradually increasing in intensity have been (carried?) on by authorities in North against Government and people of Republic of Vietnam.

3. On other hand, as indicated in paragraph 17 of Special Report, increased military aid (directed?) to Republic of Vietnam dates from late 1961.

4. Liaison Mission of Republic of Vietnam in its letter of December 1961 (part of which is reprinted in paragraph 13 of Special Report), has stated that it was only in response to aggression from North that Government of Republic of Vietnam felt constrained to call for increased military aid.

5. It is in light of these facts that findings of Commission in paragraph 20 of Special Report should be considered. Text Ends.

SPECIAL REPORT OF VIETNAM COMMISSION – DRAFT CANADIAN ADDENDUM

We have prepared draft Canadian addendum with a view to keeping as close as possible to Indian draft of Special Report. We have kept it moderate in tone and avoided taking issue with any section of Indian draft except for conclusion relating to a USA-GRVN factual military alliance in paragraph 20. Our main object was to bring out more clearly time sequence of Northern aggression and USA aid and to draw attention to cause and effect relationship. I have shown our draft to Nolting and Hohler on a personal basis. Nolting thought it a good statement. He felt however that the second sentence of paragraph 1 might be strengthened by putting in its place following addition to first sentence. "With exception that Canadian delegation on basis of evidence available does not repeat not consider that military assistance arrangements between two governments constitute a factual military alliance." His amendment makes our dissent from second part of paragraph 20 of Special Report clearer, [but] I do not repeat not think it makes point much more strongly than present text.

2. Nolting also wondered whether we would not repeat not add following sentence to paragraph 3: "USA Military Assistance Command was set up in 1962." I think we should agree to this sentence. Hohler and Burrows his minister both thought draft as it stands was acceptable. Hohler expressed view that if Indian draft of Special Report were accepted without major change as now seems likely, it might have more impact if it were forwarded without any additional Canadian comment. He did not repeat not seem to feel strongly about this however and thought that a decision could be taken either way.

3. At this stage my own feeling is that in view of Washington DC's interest in a Canadian cause and effect statement and views which have been expressed by Foreign Office, draft in reference telegram strikes about right note. I do not repeat not think it weakens in any way majority statement in Special Report and should strengthen its impact. Fact that Indian draft of Special Report is generally more favourable than we had anticipated fortunately removes necessity for us to make a formal minority report.

4. You may wish to show text of addendum to State Department and Foreign Office before sending instructions which should arrive by May 28 at latest.

5. Although I have informed Parthasarathi that Canadian delegation will be prepared for meeting by May 25 it now looks as though it may be postponed until May 28 or 29. Parthasarathi said he was prepared to meet without Poles if necessary if they would not repeat not participate by May 30. It is therefore essential that we do not repeat not hold up meeting because of lack of instructions. I intend to proceed with meeting on basis of position outlined in my telegrams unless you send instructions to contrary.

DRAFT OF SPECIAL REPORT TO CO-CHAIRMEN

Although we have not repeat not yet received text of your suggested addendum (your telegram 84 May 19 refers) we are sending comments on Indian draft without delay in view of Commission meeting May 25.

2. We agree that this is a most useful document. In general emphasis and balance it approximates fairly closely the sort of report we had indicated earlier we would like to see adopted by Commission (our telegram Y-215 May 9†). We are particularly pleased by inclusion of full text of Legal Committee's report and by unequivocal statement that Commission accepts Committee's conclusions. It is also highly satisfactory that draft gives assurance of appropriate action on each allegation and incident to be covered in full report of Legal Committee.

3. As regards USA assistance to SVN we are glad to note effective use made GRVN communications to ICSC and especially of letter of December 9, 1961 which clearly sets out SVN view of causal relationship between North Vietnamese subversion and American assistance. We would have preferred to see USA aid dealt with in general terms rather than by enumeration of items observed by Commission teams but since most if not repeat not all of this detail has already appeared in press reports we do not repeat not see how strong objection could be made to its inclusion.

4. While draft does not repeat not explicitly state cause and effect relationship between Northern aggression and American aid it seems to us chronology of events and dates it contains clearly establishes time factor. Thus record of Northern hostility, which is dealt with first, begins with reference to problem of subversion in Tenth Interim Report and continues with following:

October 1960 – attacks in Kontum and Pleiku. “Complaints of this nature continued to increase during 1961.”

June 1961 – Affirmation by Commission of its competence to investigate subversion charges.

July 1961 – SVN declaration that purpose of USA aid was to fight Communist subversion, coupled with reference to joint RVN-USA communiqué.

September 1961 – Second PAVN attack in Kontum.

October 1961 – Colonel Nam’s murder.

October-November 1961 – Submission to ICSC of documents relative to Nam murder and related subversion cases.

December 9 – SVN letter noting request for USA aid on grounds of legitimate self defence.

5. Although generalized references to PAVN allegations are interspersed in this chronology, specific dates are noted in only two instances:

(a) December 11, 1961 – A PAVN reply to ICSC rejecting all Commission decisions regarding subversion;

(b) a summary of PAVN allegations, significantly confined to recent period December 1961 to May 1962.

6. Nowhere in draft is there any suggestion of aggressive intention on part of South. On other hand, SVM’s assurance is quoted that its measures taken in self-defence will end as soon as North Vietnamese acts of aggression cease.

7. In view of generally satisfactory nature of Indian draft, of indications that Indians have resisted very strong Communist pressure to weaken it, and of their evident determination not to accept substantive changes, we believe that maximum political impact would be secured by its adoption on majority basis with only Poles shown in dissent. Unless therefore you receive further instructions on this point, you may sign report in its present form. You may use your discretion as to stage at which you so inform Parthasarathi.

8. At Commission meeting on May 25 however to clarify Canadian position you should be prepared to raise a number of points either in form of statements or as amendments to be withdrawn later. One feature of draft we find unsatisfactory is that South Vietnam is found to have entered into a “factual military alliance” with USA in violation of CFA while no mention is made of substantial military aid received by North Vietnam from Communist powers. You might point out that while (to our knowledge) SVM has not complained of a military alliance between DRVN and any of Communist powers it has alleged existence of Communist military missions in Hanoi. To underline assistance received by DRVN you might read into Commission record following passage from President Diem’s letter March 31 to ninety-two Heads of Government: “On other hand Communist bloc has conducted an extensive air lift of military supplies into North Vietnam for aggressive purposes for well over a year. Part of this military material has been sent on to Laos to support rebels and Vietcong but much of it has been turned over to Communist régime in North Vietnam to build up its war potential against South Vietnam.”<sup>70</sup>

9. Incidentally, it struck us as significant that Nolting not only considered unobjectionable the description of SVN-USA relationship as an alliance but thought it might have positive advantage of encouraging South Vietnamese (your telegram 84 May 19).

10. Again, because comparable detail on Northern subversion is not included, and because draft makes no mention of military aid to North Vietnam, it would seem to us more appropriate if detailed enumeration of American military equipment and personnel were omitted. Impact of this should be considerably lessened however by SVN’s emphasis on right of self-defence and by fact that much specific information on this score has already been widely published.

For London

Since Parthasarathi showed text to Hohler, Foreign Office will presumably have full knowledge of contents. You should however pass text to Foreign Office and inform them soonest of line we propose to take.

For Washington

You may show copy of text to State Department with explanation along lines of this telegram, drawing particular attention to chronological sequence which indicates clearly that North Vietnamese aggression preceded measures taken by SVN for survival. You should inform State Department of position we intend to take in Commission with general indication of our reasons.

VIETNAM – ICSC SPECIAL REPORT

In accordance with your reference telegram we showed State Department May 24 the draft report in Saigon telegram 78 May 15† with explanation along lines of your reference telegram, informing State Department of intended Canadian position in ICSC, with general indication of your reasons. Cottrell, Director of State Department Vietnam Task Force, Heavner of his staff, Assistant Legal Adviser for Far Eastern Affairs Czyzak and Trippe of his staff, were present.

2. Subject to any views Assistant Secretary Harriman might have, and to one comment from Czyzak mentioned below, there was general approbation both of the Indian draft report and of the proposed Canadian position in ICSC. Main reaction of State Department officials were:

(a) Indian draft report was a useful document, undoubtedly represented the most that Indians would be prepared to say, and contained, in "forthright fashion," the essential element establishing Northern aggression.

(b) Causal relations between prior Northern and subsequent Southern violations of CFA, while not repeat not specific, could readily be inferred from, and indeed was, from chronological sequence, implied in body of draft.

(c) Good use had been made of available material, including Legal Committee's conclusions (inclusion of which, in form shown in draft, was warmly welcomed by State Department officials) and, particularly, SVN letter December 9/61. State Department officials agreed with our suggestion that quotation of this letter in the draft, without the addition of any adverse comment, facilitated public inference that there had been tacit acceptance of basic contention regarding justification for self defence measures.

(d) Absence of a Canadian addendum, interpretive comment or minority report combined integrally with main report, would not repeat not necessarily prove damaging. Inclusion of such a Canadian position might, as indicated earlier by Assistant Secretary Harriman, be very helpful, but officials recognized that

(1) inferences regarding causal relationship and questions of a "factual military alliance" could be established publicly outside the Commission;

(2) proposed Canadian statements or amendments, floated in Commission but not repeat not necessarily pressed to breaking point, would create a good base for such public inferences; and

(3) separate Canadian position stated integrally with report might tend to cloud the clear unanimity of a Canadian-Indian vote in favour of draft as it stood.

3. Cottrell summed up reaction by saying that the draft "contained what they wanted (i.e. on Northern aggression) and they could live with it."

4. The only major point of concern on substance of draft was Commission finding that a "factual military alliance" existed. Czyzak, though ultimately agreeing that it would be unwise to sacrifice major favourable points in the draft in order to effect a change concerning the question of military alliance, thought it unfortunate that the purported Commission finding regarding a de facto alliance should be so directly related to proposed Commission recommendation (d) in paragraph 22 of draft: "that remedial action be taken to ensure that both parties .... do not repeat not allow zones assigned to them to adhere to any military alliance and to be used for resumption of hostilities or to further an aggressive policy." He thought, in the light of the Commission finding and the recommendation just cited, that it would be open to the Communists to conclude that the Commission had found USA and Vietnam in violation of stipulation of CFA that neither party could enter into alliance. He confessed that South had been in default in not repeat not at some stage making an equivalent allegation concerning the North and that it was now too late to remedy this, although proposed Canadian statement of amendment, as suggested in paragraph 8 of your Y-235, which he welcomed, would be of assistance in mitigating this error. Czyzak also conceded that recommendation (d) to the Co-Chairmen could be read as applying to both parties, and as an injunction regarding the future, as well as the past. On the whole he was inclined to think that you should be aware of his concern, but, as indicated above, he agreed it would be inadvisable to sacrifice any other essential part of the draft in order to achieve rectification. In his view it might well be something which USA and SVN would have to deal with independently of the Commission.

5. Two minor points raised by State Department officials related to:

(a) Paragraph 17 – The date for the commencement of the period of Commission controls mentioned in the second sentence was not repeat not clear, and other corrupt groups occurred. It would be useful to know exactly what findings Commission was purporting to establish. In particular, there was some question of the reference to “five jet aircraft”;

(b) Paragraph 18 – State Department officials would be interested to know what Commission would regard as “major items of war material.”

6. In general we were impressed with the favourable reaction of State Department officials. Their failure to make any strong case for a Canadian minority or separate position in the body of the report may, of course, be subject to review by Assistant Secretary Harriman. On the other hand we were definitely given to understand that officials to whom we spoke did not repeat not expect “any afterthoughts.” From a conversation with Sullivan, who, as you know, has been one of Harriman’s principal advisers on Southeast Asian affairs, we gathered that a good deal of thinking at the official level had been given to the question of a minority Canadian position. Sullivan implied that State Department officials had come to the conclusion that provided the proposed report was reasonably satisfactory, they would be sensitive to any difficulties that we might entertain about putting in a minority report. Sullivan said that he, for instance, had suggested that in preference to a Canadian minority report, the establishment of the causal relationship referred to above (this being, at that stage, the only major item envisaged as requiring establishment) might be brought about by a letter from South Vietnamese, Australian, or some other interested friendly government, drawing attention to this relationship and directed to the UN Secretary General with a request for circulation to all members. It remains to be seen what will be the effect of the concern voiced by Czyzak about de facto military alliance. Our guess, which can be no repeat no more than that at this point, is that this new element will not repeat not constitute a sticking point so far as State Department officials are concerned.

DRAFT OF SPECIAL REPORT

We confirm instructions in our telegram Y-235 May 23 concerning course you should follow in Commission.

2. In particular you should place clearly on Commission record Canadian view as to causal and temporal relationship between Northern aggression and USA assistance, emphasizing in this connection points made in GRVN letter December 9/61 and in exchange of letters between Presidents Diem and Kennedy made public December 14/61. You should also state that while we are prepared to accept description of RVN/USA military arrangements as amounting to a "factual military alliance" (paragraph 20 of draft report) we do not consider that military assistance which is limited both in scope (advice and material) and in time (duration of North Vietnamese aggression) constitutes a military alliance in normally understood sense of that term.

3. On balance we do not think it would be advisable for you to propose formal amendments to draft text to meet points made in paragraph 2 above, since to do so might involve danger of delay and possibility of further undesirable changes.

4. There are however two minor factual amendments which it would seem useful to incorporate in text if possible and which we think Indians might be persuaded to accept. These are:

(a) Paragraph 8. After sixth sentence ending "their contention" insert new sentence as follows: "This documentation contained allegations and evidence dating back to 1955."

(b) Paragraph 20. In second sentence after words "establishment of a USA MAC in SVN" insert "in February 1962" and continue as follows "as well as introduction, subsequent to the request in December 1961 by the GRVN, of a large number" etc.

5. You may think it advisable to seek informally Parthasarathi's prior agreement to amendments proposed in paragraph 4 above. In light of his reaction, your assessment of tactical situation, and paramount importance of securing generally satisfactory agreed text, we leave it to your discretion whether these amendments should be formally introduced in Commission meeting. If it becomes apparent that they cannot be adopted on majority basis, you should sign text as submitted by Indians without Canadian addendum.

6. We assume you will check carefully accuracy of tabulation of material observed by Commission teams (paragraph 17 of text). As you know, we doubt desirability of including this tabulation but do not think it necessary to press for its deletion. In addition to reference to five jet aircraft questioned by State Department officials we have serious doubts about references to five warships and other naval craft.

Cottrell spoke to us early this p.m. to inform us that, on the basis of telegram received this a.m. from USA Embassy Saigon strongly recommending inclusion of Canadian addendum in ICSC Special Report, Harriman had been inclined to think that perhaps Embassy was right and that maybe an addendum was desirable.

VIETNAM – (POSSIBLE CANADIAN ADDENDUM)

We have just received this morning the text of the suggested Canadian addendum to the report of the Co-Chairmen, and wish to offer the following comment. On balance we believe that the inclusion of the brief additional paragraphs as suggested by our delegation (and which are based upon acceptance of the anticipated Indo-Canadian majority report) would serve a useful purpose, and merits prompt and careful consideration. The addendum (which is not repeat not a minority report but an interpretative comment on conclusions on which the Indian and Canadian delegations are about to reach agreement) serves to make explicit in a clear and factual way the relationship in time between Northern subversion and increased military assistance to Vietnam (paragraphs 2 and 3). Wholly apart from the views of the USA or UK authorities, and the indications that the Indian delegation in Saigon seems prepared for the possible inclusion of a Canadian addendum on these lines, it seems to us to provide a significant interpretive comment by our delegation which would help to draw attention to the serious situation in Vietnam. The addition of these paragraphs as an integral part of the Commission's report would put the Canadian position clearly on the Commission and public record, and would also provide the basis for any supplementary public statement should this be deemed desirable. This report comes at a crucial point in the operations of the Commission, and we think an addendum on the lines outlined by our Commissioner would highlight the basis on which the Canadian delegation has concurred in its majority findings.

VIETNAM COMMISSION DRAFT SPECIAL REPORT

I have carefully considered arguments for and against a Canadian addendum to draft Special Report and have concluded that on balance advantages would be outweighed by disadvantages.

2. Our view that main emphasis of draft report is very heavily in right direction appears to be generally shared in Western capitals most directly concerned. There appears also to be wide agreement that Indian decision to place main emphasis on Northern subversion was arrived at with difficulty and may well have significance as regards general orientation of Indian foreign policy.

3. In these circumstances I am impressed by desirability of (a) ensuring that principal conclusions of report are presented without clouding as those of Indo-Canadian majority, thus reinforcing their immediate impact and strengthening applications in long term, of majority principle in all three commissions (b) giving all practicable encouragement to Indians in new line they have taken.

4. I recognize that Americans may with some reason not be entirely happy about those sections of draft report dealing with their military assistance to South Vietnam. Had we drafted the report this part would no doubt have been expressed rather differently. I believe however (a) that in their general lines the sections on USA aid with the qualifications contained in them, are not unfair and should not be unacceptable (b) that they are broadly consistent with what we have told the State Department for many months would almost certainly have to be accepted as the price for securing a strong majority finding on North Vietnamese subversion.

5. As you know (e.g. our telegram Y-215 May 9†) we have thought for some time that if wording could be agreed with the Indians which contained a strong implication even if not an explicit statement of causal and temporal relationship between North Vietnamese subversion and USA assistance, it might be wise to accept this wording and to reserve any explanatory comments for separate public statements by Western Governments. In my opinion the Indian draft does contain a strong implication of this relationship.

6. I am somewhat concerned to learn of Parthasarathi's inclination to prepare a rejoinder to Polish minority report. I should have thought that present draft was sufficient to deal with any points Poles may be likely to raise. In view of mounting Communist attacks on Indian attitude, I believe that sooner report can be adopted on majority basis smaller will be chances of its becoming unravelled. You should do whatever you can to encourage Parthasarathi not to delay.

7. Department will be sending you tentative draft of statement which might be made here when report is published by Co-Chairmen. I should be grateful for your own comments on it.

8. I should like you to know that I appreciate importance and delicacy of discussions in which Commission is now engaged and that I share hopes for final and satisfactory conclusion on major matters which have concerned Commission intermittently since 1954.

[Ottawa], June 2, 1962

DEVELOPMENTS IN SOUTHEAST ASIA

The situation in Southeast Asia has taken a critical turn in the past two or three weeks. Guerilla warfare continues unabated in South Vietnam; no one can at present confidently foresee an end to the fighting, despite the introduction of an American force (soon to total 8,000 men) which is being used for virtually all military duties except actual combat. In Laos the neutral settlement negotiated and agreed at Geneva has not yet been accepted in Vientiane, though there is now serious doubt whether they retain any ability to fight unaided and though very heavy pressure has been put on them by the United States. In Thailand, some 5,000 American troops (with additional small detachments of British, Australian and New Zealand forces) have been admitted with the double object of putting the United States Government "in a position to fulfill speedily its obligations under the Manila Pact of 1954" and of stabilizing the situation in Laos.

2. Fears are again being expressed in responsible quarters that the situation may deteriorate further and lead to war of the Korean type. Perhaps the principal reason for these fears is to be found in the doubts entertained by both Western and Communist Governments, following the military clashes of the past month in Laos and the strengthening of Thai defences, as to whether the other side continues to adhere to the terms for Laos negotiated and agreed at Geneva. Renewed and intensive efforts are being made by the United States and British Governments to convince Moscow that a neutral settlement for Laos remains possible if military duress can be avoided and if the major powers exercise immediately a restraint on the factions with which they are associated. As part of this effort, renewed attention is being given to the desirability of enabling the International Commission to supervise and control the military Cease-Fire.

3. One development of broad interest to Canada has occurred in Vietnam. A special report on the North Vietnamese aggression and United States military assistance is to be submitted shortly by the International Commission for Vietnam to the Co-Chairmen of the 1954 Geneva Conference.

4. The draft of the report, approved in New Delhi by Mr. Nehru and presented to the Commission on May 15 by its Indian chairman, on balance strongly favours South Vietnam. Its most important conclusion is that North Vietnam has conducted hostile activities, including armed attacks, against the South. It finds also that South Vietnam has received increased military aid from the United States in quantities which appear to be in excess of those permitted by the Cease-Fire Agreement of 1954, and has made military arrangements with the United States which amount to a factual – though not to a formal – military alliance.

5. While the report does not make explicit the cause and effect relationship between Northern aggression and U.S. aid, this factor is clearly indicated by the chronological sequence of events. Taken as a whole, the report is a clear and reasonably balanced exposition of the Canadian position. The Foreign Office and State Department, to whom we have shown the text informally and in confidence, have expressed their general approval. Mr. Green has instructed our Commissioner in Saigon to sign the report. It is thus virtually certain to be submitted as an Indo-Canadian document with the Poles in dissent. Mr. Green has also approved a press statement, to be issued simultaneously with the publication of the report by the Co-Chairmen (or possibly unilaterally by the British), emphasizing the Canadian position.<sup>71</sup>

INDO-CHINA COMMISSIONS
VIETNAM

On June 2 the Special Report of the International Commission, Vietnam, to the Co-Chairmen was signed by Indian and Canadian Commissioners, with the Poles entering a minority statement.<sup>73</sup>

2. The majority report contained few substantive changes from the draft, the main outlines of which were summarized in our memorandum to you of May 26.† Most of the amendments either recorded the Polish dissent from the views of the Indian and Canadian Delegations, or concerned minor changes in the numerical enumeration of military imports.

3. The Polish minority statement took the line expected – that the complaints of North Vietnamese aggression and subversion were legally unfounded; that South Vietnam had violated the Geneva Agreement by entering into a military alliance with the U.S., by persecution of former resistance members in disregard of Article 14(c) of the Agreement, and by its refusal to act for the unification of Vietnam as envisaged by the Agreement. The statement urged the Co-Chairmen to take immediate measures to reduce tension and preserve peace in South Vietnam by the withdrawal of U.S. armed personnel and war material, dissolution of the military alliance with the U.S., etc. (Saigon tel 98 of June 2, copy attached†).

The British Embassy in Saigon subsequently reported the view of the Indian Chairman of the Commission that the Poles called their statement a minority “statement” rather than a “report” and did not sign the latter in order to lay a basis for a claim that the document is illegal. The FO expected that the Russians might put forward this argument in opposing publication. (London tel 1049 of June 6.†)

4. The Indian Delegation submitted a short rejoinder<sup>74</sup> to the Polish minority statement, to the effect that it did not agree with many of the views expressed by the Polish Delegation nor with its interpretation of the Special Report. (Saigon tel 99 of June 2, copy attached.†)

5. Bearing in mind the over-riding importance of getting the report signed and forwarded to the Co-Chairmen, the Canadian Commissioner restricted his comments to the bare essentials of your instructions (Ottawa tel Y-239 of May 27) and made no comment on the Polish statement. He indicated concurrence, however, with the Indian rejoinder to the Polish statement.

6. The FO expects to receive the Co-Chairman’s copies of the report on June 9. It is expected that the British Ambassador in Moscow will present a Note to the Russians on June 13 suggesting publication of the report about one week later. (London tels 1049 of June 6† and 2055 of June 7.†)

7. The draft of the British Note emphasizes strongly the cause and effect relationship between Northern aggression and U.S. military assistance to South Vietnam and suggests that the immediate task of the Commission should be to ensure that further violations of the Cease-Fire Agreement are not committed by the North Vietnamese authorities. (London tel 1980 of June 1, copy attached.†) We considered the proposed British Note in general most satisfactory and had only minor comments to offer. (Ottawa tel Y-259 of June 5.†)

REPORT OF ACTIVITIES OF THE INTERNATIONAL COMMISSION
IN VIETNAM – MAY 1962

No formal Commission meetings were held during May. A Commission meeting was held on June 2 to approve a draft Special Report to the Co-Chairmen. Since the activities of the Commission covered in the following monthly report centred on the draft Special Report, the Commission meeting of June 2 is covered in the present report.

General

2. In view of the delays in getting the report of the Legal Committee on North Vietnamese subversion in South Vietnam completed, the Chairman began in April to consider sending a report to the Co-Chairmen based on the conclusions reached by the Indian and Canadian members of the Legal Committee. In late April, Mr. Parthasarathi returned to New Delhi for consultations. Subsequently, the Canadian Commissioner left for Ottawa for consultations and the Polish Commissioner for Vientiane and Hanoi.

...

Special Report to the Co-Chairmen

4. During the latter half of May the Commission was mainly preoccupied with a draft Special Report to the Co-Chairmen which Mr. Parthasarathi brought back from New Delhi. This draft dealt in a factual way with the allegations of North Vietnamese subversion and aggression in South Vietnam, and incorporated the full report of the Legal Committee's conclusions on the subject. The second part of the report was devoted to North Vietnamese allegations regarding United States military assistance to South Vietnam. The principal conclusions embodied in this draft Special Report were:

(1) that in specific instances there was evidence to show that armed and unarmed personnel, arms, munitions and other supplies had been sent from the Zone in the North to the Zone in the South with the object of supporting, organizing and carrying out hostile activities, including armed attacks, directed against the Armed Forces and Administration of the Zone in the South in violation of Articles 10, 19, 24 and 27 of the Agreement on the Cessation of Hostilities in Vietnam;

(2) that the PAVN had allowed the Zone in the North to be used for inciting, encouraging and supporting hostile activities in the Zone in the South, aimed at the overthrow of the Administration of the South in violation of Articles 19, 24 and 27 of the Agreement;

(3) that the Republic of Vietnam had violated Articles 16 and 17 of the Geneva Agreement in receiving increased military aid from the United States of America in the absence of any established credit in its favour, and

(4) that while there may not have been any formal military alliance between the Governments of the United States of America and the Republic of Vietnam, the establishment of a U.S. Military Assistance Command in South Vietnam as well as the introduction of U.S. military personnel beyond the strength of MAAG amounted to a factual military alliance prohibited under Article 19 of the Geneva Agreement.

5. At the suggestion of the Chairman, the main discussions of the Indian draft were held in private. Mr. Parthasarathi's aim was to iron out all difficulties regarding the text and the method of dealing with the draft, prior to the formal Commission meeting, then to have the Commission meeting simply record the formal position of the three Delegations and the final decision of the Commission.

6. It became clear soon after the Indian draft report was circulated that it would be virtually impossible to have any amendments accepted which either changed the substance or slanted the presentation of the material contained in the draft. Prime Minister Nehru's personal approval "of every word" of the draft effectively closed the door to any tampering with the text by either the Canadian or Polish Delegations.

7. Canadian efforts, therefore, to have Mr. Parthasarathi accept amendments which would establish more clearly the time and cause and effect relationships between the two sets of allegations were unsuccessful. One of the Chairman's main concerns was to avoid giving the Polish Delegation an opening to delay the report by proposing extensive amendments and debating the draft Special Report paragraph by paragraph. It was equally clear that the Chairman's concern was to avoid having the Special Report draw any conclusions about the root cause of the situation in Vietnam. At the formal Commission meeting on June 2, the Indian Commissioner explained the basic approach of the Indian Delegation as being to present a factual report confined to judging whether the parties had implemented certain important provisions of the Agreement on the Cessation of Hostilities in Vietnam. The object of the Special Report was to study two sets of serious allegations "made more or less contemporaneously," to deal with them on their merits, and to draw the attention of the Co-Chairmen to the serious situation in Vietnam resulting from breaches of the Agreement. Mr. Parthasarathi made it clear that his delegation did not think it was part of the Commission's responsibility to analyze the situation in any other way. In formulating the draft report, therefore, it had not tried to set out any cause and effect relationship.

8. This Indian approach ruled out the possibility of having even the minor factual amendments suggested in Ottawa's telegram Y-237 of May 25 accepted. As a concession to the Canadian Delegation, however, the Indian Commissioner proposed an amendment to paragraph 3 of the draft specifying the period covered by the Eleventh Interim Report in which the question of Northern subversion had been discussed. He also proposed rewording the penultimate paragraph of the Report in such a way as to make it clear that the Commission's recommendations to the Co-Chairmen were to be read "in the light of this Report" and were not intended necessarily to apply equally to both parties. The only other amendments which the Indian Commissioner would allow were statistical changes in the paragraphs dealing with United States military assistance to bring the information in line with Secretariat figures; and three additions noting the Polish dissent to the Special Report. (See paragraph 13 below.)

9. The Indian approach also limited the extent to which the Canadian Delegation could go in setting out for the record the cause and effect relationship between North Vietnamese subversion and United States military assistance which was implicit in the draft Special Report. As reported in our telegram 95 of June 2, † Mr. Parthasarathi warned the Canadian Commissioner prior to the formal meeting on June 2 that if the Canadian Delegation found it necessary in Commission to draw too specific cause and effect conclusions from the Special Report, he was under instructions to deny that any such conclusions were in the minds of the Indian drafters of the Report. To avoid creating a situation which might have forced the Indian Chairman formally to reject the Canadian interpretation of the Report and thereby jeopardize the impact of the Report, the Canadian Commissioner limited his formal comments to the bare essentials contained in the draft which had originally been proposed as a possible Canadian addendum (reference our telegram 85 of May 22). The text of the Canadian statement is attached.

10. For their part, the Polish Delegation concentrated their efforts, first, on delaying the date of the formal meeting; then on preparing a highly political, if badly-worded, minority "statement" to accompany the Special Report; and finally on attempting to have the Special Report go out as an Indian and Canadian Delegation report rather than a Commission report.

11. The Polish Delegation argued strongly for time to obtain instructions from Warsaw. It was obvious, however, that the delay which they wanted was intended to allow pressures to be exerted on the Indians in New Delhi, Saigon and Hanoi. (Reference New Delhi's telegrams 370 of May 17 † and 396 of May 29 †; our telegrams 83 of May 19 and 88 of May 23. †)

12. Once the Polish Delegation realized that the Indians were firmly committed to their draft and that it would go forward without any substantial change, they concentrated their attention on preparing a Polish minority report. The minority "statement" which they eventually submitted was obviously drafted with the intention of being read and published as a separate propaganda document. It rejected the Indian-Canadian picture of the situation in South Vietnam. According to the Polish interpretation of the situation, violations of fundamental provisions of the Geneva Agreement by the South had resulted in increasing tension, bloodshed and the threat of a resumption of hostilities. The South had persecuted former resistance members and democratic elements in violation of Article 14(c) and had refused to act towards reunification. To deal with the growing opposition movement to which this gave rise, the South had resorted to United States military aid. The Polish minority report charged that by giving undue weight to "legally unfounded" and unsubstantiated allegations about Northern subversion, the majority report covered up the important question of United States military aid. In the Polish view, United States military operations in South Vietnam and neighbouring countries (Thailand) increased existing tensions. The Polish report therefore asked the Co-Chairmen to take steps to reduce tension:

- (1) by the withdrawal of United States armed personnel and war material;
- (2) by the dissolution of the United States Military Assistance Command in Vietnam;
- (3) by the observance of Article 14(c) and all other provisions of the Geneva Agreement by the South Vietnamese.

13. The Polish minority report clearly attempted to minimize the impact of the Special Report by referring to it as a report of the Indian and Canadian Delegations rather than a Commission report. At the formal Commission meeting on June 2, the Polish Commissioner pursued this line in an endeavour to have the majority report itself amended to make it clear that this was a report of the Indian and Canadian Delegations to which the Polish Delegation did not subscribe. At the urgings of the Chairman, the Canadian Delegation accepted additions to paragraphs 4, 9 and 10 which recorded the Polish dissent. These amendments, however, retained the original Indian text which clearly established the status of the Report as a Commission document.

14. In the light of the basic Indian approach to the Special Report which Mr. Parthasarathi defined in Commission on June 2, it is not surprising that the Indian Delegation should have decided to submit a rejoinder to the Polish minority statement. Originally, the Indian rejoinder indicated that the Indian Delegation did not agree "with the Polish Delegation's assessment of the situation in Vietnam nor with many of the views expressed in the minority statement." As submitted at the Commission meeting, this sentence was revised to indicate that the Indian Delegation did not agree "with many of the views expressed by the Polish Delegation in its Statement, nor with its interpretation of the Special Report."

15. Without prior consultation with the Canadian Delegation, the Indian Chairman proposed that the Indian statement be embodied in the Special Report. While the Canadian Commissioner had indicated for the record that the Canadian Delegation concurred in the Indian Delegation's comments on the Polish Minority Statement, he resisted the inclusion of the statement in the body of the Report. Mr. Parthasarathi withdrew his suggestion without debate.

16. The Commission concluded its brief formal meeting on this most controversial item with the initialling of the Special Report by the Indian and Canadian Commissioners and of the Polish and Indian statements by the respective Commissioners. The following morning, June 3, the original copies to the two Co-Chairmen were signed and on June 5 they were despatched by special courier to New Delhi with the request that "In view of the seriousness of the situation in Viet-Nam, the Co-Chairmen may be requested to arrange for the early release and publication of the documents."

Reaction of the DRVN to the Special Report

17. As was to be expected, the DRVN authorities were well-informed of developments in the Commission and, even before the Vietnamese Press in New Delhi leaked the story that a Special Report was being prepared (reference our telegram 79 of May 16), had begun to mobilize their propaganda machine in an effort to dissuade the Indians from supporting a decision on Northern subversion.

18. Messages were sent to the Indian Chairman by Col. Ha Van Lau, the Head of the PAVN Liaison Mission, and later by Gen. Vo Nguyen Giap, Commander-in-Chief of the PAVN. These expressed regret at the tendency in the Commission to attribute the dangerous situation in South Vietnam to alleged subversive and aggressive activities of North Vietnam. Anticipating the line which the campaign would take after the signing of the Special Report, i.e., that the Special Report was illegal, they warned that such a conclusion would be contrary to the truth and the 1954 Geneva Agreements, and would be "a grave offence of the national spirit of the Vietnamese people, a challenge to the peoples now struggling against colonialism and a direct encouragement to the U.S. aggressors and warmongers."

19. In the early stages of the propaganda campaign, the North Vietnamese press restricted itself to charges of "erroneous tendencies" and growing signs of partiality in the Commission. It issued vague warnings about the serious consequences for the present situation, the implementation of the Geneva Agreements and the Commission's prestige which would result from a Commission conclusion on Northern aggression and subversion. As the campaign developed, the Indian Delegation, and particularly the Chairman, came under severe criticism. In a vicious editorial attack on May 22, Nhan Dan, the Vietnam Workers' Party paper, charged that the Indian Delegate was not worthy of being the Chairman of the Commission; that he failed to reflect the foreign policies of his country; that he was deliberately ignoring the United States military build-up in South Vietnam; and that he was misrepresenting the South Vietnamese patriotic struggle as "subversive activities." Taking the lead from Nhan Dan, other papers charged that the Indian Delegate was trying to distort the truth and slander North Vietnam in an effort to cover up for the United States.

20. Concurrent with the press and radio campaign, the Northern authorities mobilized their demonstrators and petitioners to protest the impending Commission decision. Despite the reported size and number of these demonstrations, they were generally well-controlled and not aggressive. With only a few exceptions, the delegations which visited the Commission's Hanoi Bureau, the Indian and Canadian Delegation offices and the team sites were orderly and presented their petitions perfunctorily.

21. While the primary target of this propaganda campaign was the Indian Delegation, the Canadian Delegation also came in for some criticism but only incidentally and in conjunction with the criticism levelled at the Indians. Members of the Canadian Delegation suffered no personal abuse, nor did they feel any material effects as a result of this campaign. We shall provide a more detailed report† on the reaction of the Parties to the Special Report after its publication.

ITEM NO. (1)

CONSIDERATION OF THE SUBMISSION OF A SPECIAL REPORT TO THE CO-CHAIRMEN OF THE GENEVA CONFERENCE ON INDO-CHINA, WITH REGARD TO THE IMPLEMENTATION OF THE AGREEMENT ON THE CESSATION OF HOSTILITIES IN VIET-NAM BY THE PARTIES.

CANADIAN STATEMENT

Canadian Ambassador: Mr. Chairman, the Canadian Delegation agrees with the Draft Special Report submitted by the Indian Delegation, as amended at the informal meetings of the Commission yesterday. In particular, the Canadian Delegation fully endorses the conclusions of the Report contained in paragraphs 10 and 20. However, although we are prepared to accept the description in paragraph 20 of the GRVN/USA military arrangements as amounting to a "factual military alliance," we do not consider that military assistance which is limited both in scope (advice and materials) and in time (duration of the North Vietnamese aggression) constitutes a military alliance in the normally understood sense of this term.

The Canadian Delegation would like to make the following brief observations on the Draft Special Report:

The documentation on which the conclusions of the Legal Committee (paragraph 9 of the draft Special Report) were established contains allegations and evidence dating back to 1955. These allegations and evidence indicate that, from the time of the ceasefire agreement, hostile activities, gradually increasing in intensity, have been carried on by the authorities in the North against the Government and the people of the Republic of Viet-Nam.

On the other hand, the increased military aid received by the Republic of Viet-Nam dates from late 1961.

The Liaison Mission of the Republic of Viet-Nam in its letter of December 9, 1961 (part of which is reprinted in paragraph 13 of the draft Special Report), has stated that it was only in response to aggression from the North that the Government of the Republic of Viet-Nam felt constrained to call for increased military aid.

It is in the light of these observations that the findings of the Commission in paragraph 20 of the draft Special Report should, in the view of the Canadian Delegation, be considered.

VIETNAM COMMISSION SPECIAL REPORT – SOME POSTMORTEM NOTES

When Mr. Ronning called on Commonwealth Secretary Gundevia regarding the possible extension of Mukhi's stay in Saigon, Gundevia was rather interesting on the subject of communist reaction to the Special Report and on the history of the Indian attitude to the subversion problem in South Vietnam.

2. Gundevia first traced the development of the communist campaign which had been conducted over the past few weeks in an attempt to change the Indian position. This campaign started with a comparatively mild letter from Ho Chi Minh to Mr. Nehru, describing the great confidence which the North Vietnamese had always had in the Prime Minister. Ho stated that the North Vietnamese had always felt that the Indians understood and supported the Vietnamese struggle for freedom and had been sympathetic to North Vietnamese problems since 1954. He noted that the Indians now appear to be prepared to take a stand against North Vietnam and asked that the Indians change this position. Mr. Nehru's reply to Ho was apparently equally as polite and restrained. He pointed out that the Indians, by virtue of their chairmanship of the International Commission, had a responsibility which must be taken seriously, and it was therefore necessary to make a factual report of recent developments in the area. Otherwise the Indian Government would be unworthy of the responsibility with which it had been entrusted when asked to serve on the International Commission. The Prime Minister concluded his reply with a request to the North Vietnamese to understand the Indian position and to explain to its friends and supporters that Indian policy in Vietnam was designed in all respects to further the cause of peace. He also pointed out that India was prepared to report factually on the position of both sides and intimated that the North Vietnamese should be grateful that the Commission's Report would not contain a description of cause and effect.

3. The next piece of correspondence was a rough and threatening letter from General Giap which, according to Gundevia, contained some veiled threats of blackmail, although he did not enlarge on their contents. Gundevia described the Indian reply to Giap as being firm and just as direct. Subsequently came the Polish approach in which Polish Ambassador Katz-Suchy, in a blend of Ho Chi Minh and General Giap, accused the Indians of no longer being impartial and of ganging up with the Canadians on the side of the South Vietnamese. In reply to this verbal approach, Gundevia stressed once again that the Special Report would contain no linking of North and South Vietnamese actions and would be purely a factual statement of recent developments in Vietnam.

4. Gundevia reached his histrionic peak in describing the Soviet Ambassador's call on Mr. Nehru. He came armed with a gift of bulbs for the Prime Minister, which was the ostensible reason for his visit. It soon became apparent, however, that his main purpose was to read to the Prime Minister a prepared statement on the Vietnam situation. Unfortunately, the Ambassador's timing was poor. His visit came just a few minutes before the question period in the House and Mr. Nehru had no time to listen to his statement. He therefore sent him along to Gundevia who, in exchange for the bulbs, presented him with a copy of the Special Report for transmission to the Soviet Co-chairman. The Soviet Ambassador, who was not prepared to be deprived of his opportunity, read the statement of his Government's views in Russian to Gundevia who then listened to the same thing in English from the Ambassador's interpreter. In speaking to Mr. Ronning, Gundevia dismissed the Russian statement with the remark that it contained nothing new. Gundevia offered no information regarding direct Chinese pressures on the subject of Vietnam, and it is probably safe to assume that, in the light of current Sino-Indian relations, the Chinese allowed the North Vietnamese, the Poles and the Russians to carry the burden of direct approaches.

5. Reviewing the history of the subversion question, Gundevia told the High Commissioner that when he took over as Commonwealth Secretary late in 1960 and was presented with this problem, his first impulse was to instruct the Indian Commissioner in Saigon to go ahead with effective Commission action on the South Vietnamese complaints. He confided, however, to Mr. Ronning that shortly afterwards he received a telephone call from Mr. Krishna Menon, who, by persuasive legal arguments, convinced him that he was wrong and that no action should be taken. Instructions were therefore sent to Saigon to continue stalling tactics on the subversion issue. Looking at the problem in retrospect, Gundevia described his action at that time as the worst mistake he had ever made. It is interesting, if not very surprising, to have Gundevia's own admission that it was Krishna Menon's influence which affected the Indian position during the long months which preceded the issue of the Canadian-Indian statement on subversion last summer. In our telegram no. 264 of April 5, 1961, we described how Gundevia accused Ansari and later Gopala Menon of dragging their feet on the subversion question. After subsequent talks with Gundevia, Mr. Ronning was, however, fairly certain that Mr. Krishna Menon's influence was the real stumbling block (our telegrams no. 266 of April 6 and no. 348 of April 29, 1961).<sup>75</sup> The immediate question which arises in considering Gundevia's attitude is why and when he changed his mind. A survey of our file indicates pretty clearly that in fact Gundevia had no opportunity to change his mind. It was Foreign Secretary M.J. Desai, one of the co-authors of the original subversion statement, who was responsible for reversing Indian policy. While Gundevia was in Geneva at the Laos Conference and Desai was handling Indo-China, the subversion statement was finally issued. Subsequently the Indians rested on their laurels for the rest of the summer while the situation in South Vietnam steadily worsened. In October 1961, not long after the murder of Col. Nam, Gundevia was again removed from the scene by illness, and it was again M.J. Desai who recommended sending Parthasarathi and Mukhi to Saigon.

6. Other events undoubtedly exerted a very strong influence on Indian policy in Vietnam during the past year: the ever-increasing tempo of Viet Cong activity, the reactions of the U.S.A., the murder of Col. Nam, and the subsequent South Vietnamese attacks on the Commission – all these factors helped to push India into its present position. It is interesting all the same to note the effect on Indian policy decisions which can result from the influence of one individual or another within the Ministry of External Affairs and outside also. With the benefit of hindsight, it is probably safe to say that we can be thankful for the set of fortuitous circumstances which placed M.J. Desai in a position of influence at crucial moments in the past year. Having said that, I should add that Gundevia, since his return to duty early this year, has shown greater decisiveness in regard to Vietnam questions and seems to have been honestly determined to push through the Special Report and to keep Mukhi on his toes.

7. On the subject of future Indian policy regarding Vietnam, I think it is important to make one further point which arises out of the last paragraph of telegram no. 1159 of June 14, 1962† from the Laos Delegation in Geneva, where mention is made of the fact that the communist side may launch a full scale campaign for the convening of a conference on Vietnam. In this connection, I would remind you of the contents of our telegrams nos. 830, 835, 837 and 839 of November 2, 4, 5, and 6, 1961. These telegrams described the "pitch" which the Indians were making for just such a conference when they decided finally to go into action on the subversion question. Officials of the Ministry were arguing then that the establishment of a link between the Viet Cong and the North Vietnamese would be one of the main raison d'être for a conference on Vietnam. They also expressed the hope that the Geneva Conference could deal with this problem once the Laos question had been settled. The possibility of a special Vietnam Conference has not come up in our more recent conversations with the Indians and we have therefore no indication of their current thinking on this problem. I do not think it would be too far fetched to suspect, however, that the Indians might support a communist demand for a conference on Vietnam and that, in fact, one of the ways in which they may have dealt with the clamour from the communist side about their action in producing the Special Report is to have promised Indian support for any communist move in this direction.

ASSESSMENT OF THE SITUATION IN VIETNAM
(FINAL DESPATCH – PART I)

...

The Commission

20. I must record that during my farewell calls I have been subjected to the warmest expressions of appreciation to the Canadian Delegation and Government for the part Canada played in negotiating the Special Report. The President brought this matter up twice, once during an official call and once during a private dinner which he gave in my honour. All other Ministers expressed their gratitude in equally cordial terms.

21. The Commission is at present at an impasse. Since the publication of the Special Report it has held only four meetings, one of which was to say farewell to Mr. Pohoryles and myself. Our teams are receiving no real cooperation in either the North or the South and it is facing a serious financial crisis due to the fact that several of the Geneva Powers have not paid their contributions for many months.

22. In the Special Report the Commission informed the Co-Chairmen that infiltration into Vietnam was taking place and also that the GRVN was importing large quantities of military equipment not permitted by the Geneva Agreement. The Commission in effect posed a political problem to the Co-Chairmen which because of their different approaches to the situation in Vietnam they are not able to resolve. The Commission is therefore left with the responsibility for administering a peace treaty in a time of hostilities without political guidelines and without cooperation from either of the two parties. In such circumstances one might have expected that some interested parties would have suggested that the Commission should consider either a reduction of its activities or a withdrawal from Vietnam. I am glad to report that I have not heard any suggestion that the Commission should withdraw; I have made a point of checking this question during my farewell calls. Both the DRVN and the GRVN wish the Commission to continue and all the western Ambassadors agree.

23. I am convinced that it would be most unfortunate if the Commission were to withdraw and I do not think there should be any reduction in our teams no matter how futile their efforts now seem to be. In the first place I think it is important in relation to the establishment of the Commission in Laos to avoid any reduction in Vietnam at this stage or any indication of a slackening of international interest in the progress of events here. Secondly, the teams, although operating under extreme difficulty in the North, nevertheless may provide some deterrent and the stationing of western observers in a tightly controlled communist country is obviously something which should not be given up or reduced without the most careful consideration. Thirdly, the Commission retains an important role as a means of contact between the North and the South. At some stages in the past this role has not been used very profitably but it will be of increasing importance if the situation continues to improve in South Vietnam.

24. Although the Commission has been relatively stagnant for the last three months, Goburdhun claims he is prepared to deal with current issues in a straight forward manner as they arise. He does not, however, show any desire to press for meetings. The French Ambassador has pressed him to avoid taking unnecessarily harsh action against the GRVN in connection with the importation of American equipment and personnel. With regard to intervention from the North we have been told that friendly intelligence estimates are that infiltration is continuing. Its level seems to be more a matter for guesswork than for proper assessment. The South Vietnamese Mission has not forwarded any good evidence of infiltration since the Special Report and the head of the SVM has told us that such evidence is not available. When I raised this matter with Mr. Nhu, however, he said that he was surprised that the Commission had not been receiving such evidence. He said that many more diaries had been captured and it was apparent that he had read them carefully himself. The difficulty is that some of these diaries contain information which for some reason could be of interest to the Viet Cong. Nhu said, however, that even if the information could not be given to the Commission, he might be able to arrange for Goburdhun to see it.

25. There is still, of course, the matter of the Legal Committee's detailed report which although completed has not yet been signed. It would seem to me that the development of the normal work of the Commission might proceed toward a new report to the Co-Chairmen with about the same balance as the Special Report. There is ample evidence concerning U.S. equipment and personnel on the one hand and if the SVM can provide new evidence of infiltration, the Indian Government may be more likely to forward Mukhi's report to the Commission. While some such general line of policy for the Canadian Delegation would seem to be appropriate if the Commission is not to stagnate, I suspect that Indian interest is more likely to centre on the possibilities for improving contacts between North and South in the light of the new situation which may develop. Goburdhun told me today that the PAVN have informed his representative in Hanoi that they are prepared now to discuss in detail Goburdhun's proposal for an exchange of five hundred families and that if the exchange can be arranged, it will take place without propaganda. There may therefore be some development along these lines although my discussions with the President and Mr. Nhu did not provide any reason to be hopeful. I shall be able to brief the new Commissioner in detail on these questions when we meet in Ottawa.

LETTER NO. 316

Saigon, October 19, 1962

CONFIDENTIAL

TALKS WITH THE PRIME MINISTER AND THE FOREIGN MINISTER OF THE DRVN
(FINAL DESPATCH – PART II)

On October 11 I went to Hanoi to pay final calls on Pham Van Dong and Ung Van Khiem. An informal dinner was also given in my honour by Colonel Ha Van Lau, the PAVN Liaison Officer. The atmosphere in the North and the attitude adopted toward the Canadian Delegation has improved immeasurably since the period immediately after the publication of the Special Report. The Foreign Minister was most courteous and quite friendly. Pham Van Dong was extremely friendly. Indeed, if he called me “mon cher ami” once during our conversation, he must have done so twenty times. This attitude of friendliness was, of course, a reflection of recent changes in policy toward the Commission. We have noticed during the past month that our teams in the North are receiving better treatment and even some hospitality.

2. With regard to the Special Report, the Foreign Minister spoke along the lines of the DRVN policy as it was expounded last July. He was prepared to discuss the problem in detail and claimed that the Commission had adopted an incorrect position vis-à-vis the North, that it had accepted false evidence of infiltration which, presumably, had been conjured up by the intelligence services of the South. I told him that we were, of course, aware of his point of view but that we and the Indian Delegation had been convinced by the evidence which had been submitted after we had examined it with the greatest care. It was unfortunate, if there was doubt about the evidence, that the Polish Delegation had simply refused to look at it when invited to do so. The Prime Minister's attitude toward the Special Report was along the lines of that adopted by Ho Chi Minh when he met Mr. Goburdhun early in September. Without changing their basic position on the Special Report, both Ho and Pham Van Dong now say that the incident of the Special Report can now be regarded as a thing of the past, an unhappy chapter in the Commission's history and one which they are prepared to forget. While the increased courtesy toward the Commission which has developed from this position is to be welcomed, it is, of course, quite impossible for the Commission to ignore the continued infiltration into South Vietnam. The North's present attitude merely emphasizes the shallowness of their courtesy and their opportunism in dealing with Commissioners.

3. I asked Pham Van Dong what the Northern position was on a new Geneva Conference on Vietnam. He replied that the situation was too difficult at the moment but that it was essential to work toward a situation in which some discussion could take place. He has consistently harped on the theme that it was necessary to talk about the differences dividing North and South Vietnam.

4. Pham Van Dong said that the Commission was obviously at an impasse at the moment and implied some sympathy with the unenviable tasks and frustrations faced by the Commissioners. He said quite clearly, however, that the DRVN wished the Commission to continue in operation. Although he did not, of course, say so, one of the strong reasons why the DRVN wishes the continuation of the Commission is that as long as the Commission is in existence, the Geneva Agreement, the only document which provides for reunification of North and South Vietnam, is maintained. Pham Van Dong professed Northern willingness to cooperate with the Commission but had no answer when I pointed out to him the number of instances of lack of cooperation which completely inhibited the work of the teams in the DRVN.

5. When both the Prime Minister and the Foreign Minister asked me about conditions in the South, I told them that there seemed to be a general feeling that the Southern forces were making considerable progress and that the strategic hamlet programme was also showing signs of success. I also mentioned to them that President Diem was very optimistic about the situation. It now appeared quite clear that the Americans, in response to President Diem's request for aid, were prepared to provide whatever aid was necessary in order to restore security in South Vietnam. Pham Van Dong nodded and said he realized this. I therefore asked him how he saw the situation developing in South Vietnam and whether he did not think there was some way in which the war could be ended. While his response was similar to the one he had given me last December – that the insurrection in the South was a broadly based revolution against an unpopular government and that a solution had to take account of this – I had the impression that he was more concerned about the trend of events in the South than he had been last December. When I talked of the tragedy of the situation in the South, the high casualty rates on both sides and the extent of human misery which resulted from present policies, he replied that there was no other solution and implied that guerrilla warfare would have to continue even though no immediate solution was in sight. I thereupon suggested to him that there was another solution if both sides were prepared to recognize the possibility of living side by side without interference in the affairs of the other and it was surely a conceivable alternative that the two parts of the country could develop different social systems and yet ultimately envisage mutually profitable commercial and other exchanges when the atmosphere of fear had abated. When Pham Von Dong indicated that there was nothing the North could do to change the situation, I questioned whether their influence could not be brought to bear to restore peace. There was, of course, no indication that the North would be receptive to this suggestion. Nevertheless, it is clear that the North may soon (in six months to a year if the United States Ambassador's forecast is correct) have to face a critical decision of policy if the Southern forces are able to isolate the Viet Cong and bring the security situation under a semblance of control. Pham Van Dong and Khiem seemed to be under the impression that the Americans were hated in South Vietnam. I told them both that this was not my impression at all although I admitted it was difficult to assess. My impression was that the Americans on the whole were liked in South Vietnam and that the propaganda emanating from the North and from the Viet Cong was largely untrue.

6. In summary, my discussions in Hanoi brought forth no indication of any change in basic policy but perhaps some slight indication of less certainty of ultimate victory than was the case six months ago. This impression is based not so much on anything that was said as upon what was not said. Last December Pham Van Dong and Khiem could point to many favourable indications in the South; in October the prospects are obviously gloomier. There was no indication that cooperation would improve but a confirmation that the North wishes the continuation of the Commission. The most welcome result of the visit was the indication that they wished relations with the Canadian Delegation to be on a courteous and even a superficially friendly basis.

VIETNAM COMMISSION – FUTURE ACTIVITIES

Seven months have elapsed since ICSC Vietnam forwarded to Co-Chairmen its Special Report making a number of general recommendations for “remedial action” and stating inter alia that it would “take appropriate action ... in each individual case” on basis of fuller report being prepared by Legal Committee. This Special Report was described by Mr. Nehru in Rajya Sabha on August 24 as “very objective and very good.” More than three months have elapsed since draft of fuller Legal Committee report was submitted to Indian Ministry of External Affairs and since Gundevia told Ronning initially that it would be submitted to ICSC (Delhi telegram 694 September 25†) and subsequently that, after study which would take at least three months, it might be presented to ICSC as a Government of India document (Delhi telegram 722 October 4†).

2. Recognizing sensitivity of Indians about reactions to Special Report and consequent importance of “treading carefully for fear of pushing Indians into an attempt to right the imbalance” (Delhi telegram 742 October 11†), and taking into account lengthy and complex nature of draft Legal Report, we have so far refrained from pressing for early action in ICSC along lines indicated in paragraph 3 our telegram Y-314 August 24† and paragraph 5 our telegram Y-331 September 17,† although such action seems to us no less desirable than it did then.

3. I am of course aware that you and Hooton in Saigon and Ronning in Delhi have from time to time spoken informally to your Indian colleagues about need for Commission to preserve its effectiveness by dealing equitably and expeditiously with whole broad range of matters within its competence, and that in both capitals private enquiries have been made about status of Legal Committee report. I know too that in making these enquiries you have been careful, in light of Gundevia's initial attitude (Delhi telegram 722 October 4), to avoid commenting on degree of our participation in drafting of fuller Legal Committee report or on extent of our knowledge of its contents. Unfortunately these informal bilateral approaches do not appear to have brought us any nearer to a way out of impasse in Commission; indeed I have the impression that Gundevia and Goburdhun are becoming more rather than less disinclined to make any serious attempt to grapple in Vietnam Commission with fundamental questions.

4. This has had effect (as you and Hooton foresaw) of obliging Commission to act mainly in terms of citation procedures. Even if there were firmest intention to deal equitably with the two sides, such an emphasis would be virtually certain to result in imbalance against South because of greater secrecy and non-cooperation of North. I am however increasingly concerned by indications that Goburdhun is deliberately seeking to build up citations against GRVN in order to offset impact of Special Report. Some of his remarks to you, moreover, suggest that this determination is not based solely on tactical considerations but is related to a quite unrealistic assessment of general situation in Vietnam. Unless we can soon find means of getting Commission back to broader and more realistic approach, I fear that its usefulness, either as a restraint on parties or as an objective observer for international community, will rapidly decline.

5. I accept Ronning's advice (his telegram 33 January 9†) that this is not an auspicious time to bring question to a head in Delhi. I have concluded therefore that our best course is to make formal move in Commission which should have effect of forcing a decision.

6. You should formally request, at an early meeting of Commission, that Legal Committee inform Commission within two weeks of progress made in preparation of fuller report referred to in paragraph 10 of report of June 2/62. You may if you think it desirable refer also to commitment made by Polish member of Legal Committee in his note of dissent May 28 to prepare his own detailed report. You should not make any reference to Canadian participation in drafting of Committee report or to possible reasons for delay in its receipt. It would be desirable however to state for the record that this is unfinished business which Co-Chairmen and other members of Geneva Conference have been informed is in hand, and to make it clear that until Commission has the report it will be unable to deal effectively with this important aspect of Commission's responsibilities or to report to Co-Chairmen that it has done so.

7. We are sending separate telegram† about current citation cases. If possible you should make request about Legal Committee report in such a way as not to impair chances of obtaining Article 17 citation against DRVN on item 2 considered at 658th Meeting.

VIETNAM – ICSC LEGAL REPORT

We have re-examined our position on handling of detailed Legal report (our telegrams Y-331 September 17/62† and Y-22 January 18/63†) in light of recent developments in Delhi and recommendations in London reference telegram. From what we know of report's contents (largely confined to summary in Delhi telegram 661 September 13/62†) it seems likely to be most constructive and useful document. Our first objective therefore was to persuade Indians to table report and in doing so to avoid if possible giving Indian officials any excuse for killing or substantially diluting Mukhi's draft. There now seems good reason to hope that this objective has been achieved as result of your efforts.

2. While we do not exclude possibility that attempts may still be made in Indian Delegation Saigon to dilute Mukhi's draft, this would seem on whole unlikely if report has been signed by Mukhi (your telegram 993 December 18†) and if possible reactions to publication have been taken fully into account by Indian Ministry of External Affairs before approval of text (your telegram 106 January 25†). We agree that if text could be agreed on by Indians and Canadians in advance of tabling this possibility would be removed.

3. Our second objective must be to secure conversion of Indian approved draft, if on closer examination it proves satisfactory from Canadian point of view, into official document of ICSC Legal Committee. As Gundevia has now recognized (your telegram 234 March 1†) approval would necessarily be by Indo-Canadian majority. Some of Gundevia's earlier remarks (e.g. your telegram 694 September 25†) revealed disturbing tendency to suppose that it would be practicable to introduce paper into Legal Committee as an Indian draft to provide basis for tripartite negotiation. In our view this is altogether unrealistic. There is not slightest possibility that Poles would wish to do anything with this report but kill it. Perhaps in discussing procedure with Gundevia you could remind him of decision taken in Legal Committee on February 28/62 which formally established drafting procedure on subversion question. Following extract from record of that meeting (attached to our letter Y-31 May 18/62†) is particularly relevant: "Chairman said that in view of fact Canadian member agreed with him, he and Canadian member would proceed to draft majority report. In view of fact that Polish member's disagreement with majority was hundred percent, Polish member should proceed to draft his separate report ... Polish member said he did not approve of parallel drafting. He said it was for majority to submit a report first; he would then draft and submit a dissenting note. It was then agreed to follow procedure suggested by Polish member."

4. On question of signature, we continue to think it desirable that report be signed by de Goumois as well as Mukhi. As pointed out in Delhi telegram 661 September 13/62 and London reference telegram, report purports to be impartial legal analysis by two qualified officials who examined all available evidence; we quite understand also that Mukhi, while he prudently submitted report to Ministry of External Affairs Delhi as Indian draft which would be presented as such to Canadians (your telegram 772 October 4/62†), should now wish his Canadian colleague to share his expert opinion by co-signing. Nevertheless report is in fact a delegation document and, as Gundevia has recognized on many occasions, its publication would constitute an important political act. We cannot therefore agree to authorize signature as if report were purely personal legal opinion. We would at least want you to read it and give us your views before we authorized signature.

5. Our third objective will be to ensure that report is not delayed indefinitely in Legal Committee or in ICSC by Polish procedural devices. This will almost certainly require imposition of deadline on preparation of Polish dissenting comments. You will recall that last May Gundevia informed you (your telegram 374 May 18†) that Parthasarathi had been instructed to send Special Report to Co-Chairmen with or without Polish minority report and/or Canadian minority report. Parthasarathi then told Hooton (Saigon telegram 83 May 19†) that he would give four days to other delegations to prepare their minority reports or addenda, and that if Poles absented themselves this fact would be noted in report but report would nevertheless be voted and sent forward without delay. Equal Indian determination is likely to be required to get this more circumstantial report approved as Commission document.

6. Our fourth objective will be to have report forwarded to Co-Chairmen. We recognize that Indians will probably insist, as they did in June 62, that report on subversion (affecting Articles 10, 19 and 24 of Geneva Agreement) be accompanied by report on military assistance (affecting Articles 16, 17 and 19). If this is done in factual and equitable way, we would in principle take same view we took last May, though there would seem no advantage in saying so unless Gundevia raises the question. We recall remark made to you then by present Indian Chairman (your telegram 388 May 26†) that without Canadian support Special Report would have much less value since it would mean isolation of Indian Delegation. We want Indians to know that in course outlined above they would have our fullest support. If, on other hand, Gundevia shows hesitation about adopting procedure outlined above, it would be helpful to know what procedure he envisages. We have in mind particularly impracticability as well as illogicality of reviewing report paragraph by paragraph with Poles either in Legal Committee or in ICSC.

For London and Washington

Please convey gist of this telegram to Foreign Office/State Department, adding that we will keep them informed of progress of our discussions with Indians on this matter.

VIETNAM LEGAL REPORT

Assuming that Legal Report will soon be sent to Goburdhun and pending arrival of de Goumois we have been giving preliminary consideration to techniques which will have to be employed to accomplish our objective of having report forwarded to Co-Chairman (Paragraph 6 reference telegram).

2. As we understand nature of report it will provide conclusive evidence of subversion and/or aggression in some cases covered and will recommend further investigation on basis of prima facie evidence established in other cases. Poles of course will be anxious to avoid or at least delay publication of report and we are concerned that Indians may be not repeat not unreceptive to Polish delaying tactics. Indians could for example agree to delay forwarding of report until prima facie cases have been investigated. If past experience is any guide this could postpone further action indefinitely.

3. One way out of such an impasse would be for us to press for immediate citations of North in those cases where evidence is accepted as conclusive by Legal Report. Commission by majority decision could then inform Co-Chairmen of these citations and send Legal Report at same time with promise to investigate other cases considered in it and to report in future on results of these investigations.

4. Unless some such procedure is adopted we foresee great difficulty in preventing Goburdhun from allowing Poles to succeed in delaying consideration of report. We should be grateful therefore to have your comments on suggested procedures outlined above as well as your instructions on other techniques to be adopted in achieving objectives contained in reference telegram.

VIETNAM LEGAL COMMITTEE REPORT

On basis of a necessarily quick exam the report strikes me as a carefully prepared and judicious examination of the evidence available. It is obviously the outcome of a tremendous amount of research and of plain hard work. I was struck by the careful and unbiased manner in which the evidence has been weighed and the judicious and impartial tone in which both arguments and findings have been made. I think this report is one which we can support without reservation and which we should fight hard to see produced, without watering down, as a Commission document.

2. Notwithstanding the impartial manner in which findings have been reached, the report is still a powerful indictment of DRVN activities in South Vietnam and as such cannot repeat not help but cause extreme DRVN reaction when made public. I am sure it is fear of this reaction which has made Indians delay so long and which still affects their attitude to the handling of the report. We are not repeat not, I suspect, out of the woods yet, although the fact that we have been given a copy and that the scene of activity has finally been shifted back to Saigon is a hopeful sign of Indian good faith. I think it can be expected that Indians, as they get closer to facing up to the report, will be casting around for means of balancing its effects (e.g. action on military questions against the South) to make the pill easier to swallow. Although Gundevis was specific with me regarding instructions he was sending to Goburdhun on procedure, Miss Muthamma has given our British colleagues impression that Goburdhun is being asked for his view on tactics and procedures. It has taken us six months to obtain a copy of the report. I do not repeat not think that we can now expect that Commission processing of the report will be accomplished in record time. We will certainly have to guard against moves which threaten the contents of the report itself (although I do not repeat not consider the final section, containing a perhaps unnecessarily provocative but delightfully devastating rebuttal to the Polish position, as sacrosanct) and maintain steady pressure for action. We must, however, I think, give Indians the time which they decide is required to process the report always keeping in mind that the report can still be dropped by Indians if they decide it will have too damaging an effect upon their relations with USSR and Poland.

CHINA; SOUTH VIETNAM; CANADIAN WHEAT SALES

As you know, before I left Washington, I was told that the U.S. Under-Secretary of State (Ball) had indicated that he would like to have a private conversation during the Ottawa meetings on two subjects: Cuba and Communist China.

2. Last evening, after Mr. Fleming's dinner at the Country Club, Ball did raise these matters with you. The Secretary of the Treasury (Dillon) was with him. I was with you. We were joined, as the talk got started, by the U.S. Secretary of Agriculture (Freeman), the Minister of Agriculture and one or two others.

3. Ball began by expressing the U.S. Administration's very serious view of the situation in South Vietnam which, he said, was even more critical and potentially dangerous than Berlin. (This was the President's own opinion.) U.S. intelligence, which was good in this area, made it evident beyond doubt that Communist China was behind the aggressive and subversive activities of the DRVN.

4. The U.S.A., Ball continued, was, as we well knew, engaged in a large increased programme of assistance to South Vietnam; this involved extensive military equipment and also U.S. military personnel (the latter as yet in a non-combat role). It might well be that, if this new programme proved insufficient, the U.S. would have to commit troops – this in turn, the U.S. fully realized, might mean general war.

5. If South Vietnam did fall, Ball went on, the U.S. felt that the whole of Southeast Asia would be in dire danger – including, ultimately, Australia and New Zealand.

6. As to the character and gravity of the situation in Vietnam and the undoubted involvement of Peking, Ball drew attention to the recent U.S. white paper<sup>76</sup> (with which – and a good deal more – I observed that we were quite familiar).

7. In these grave circumstances, Ball continued, the U.S. wondered whether advantage could be taken, in the general free world interest, of the current commercial contacts between the Canadian government and the Chinese Communist authorities (in connection with our wheat sales); also of the similar contacts of Australia, and (shortly) the French. If the Canadian <sup>76</sup> Voir/See United States, Department of State, A Threat to the Peace: North Viet-Nam's Effort to Conquer South Viet-Nam, Publication 7308, Far Eastern Series 110 (Washington, DC: Department of State, 1961).

Government shared the U.S. appreciation of the precarious situation in Vietnam and its relationship to Peiping (and the U.S. would be happy to sit down with Canadian representatives to review the evidence), then it had occurred to U.S. authorities that it might be intimated to the Chinese that deliveries of food from free world sources could not be continued unless the Chinese Communist authorities were willing to stop their stimulation and support of subversion and aggression in Vietnam. Admittedly and quite frankly, this would be to take advantage of the desperate current need of the Chinese population in order to attain a political objective; but the objective was of critical importance to the whole free world – the avoidance of war in which all could be involved.

8. The discussion which followed Ball's presentation went on for some time and touched on many aspects of the situation in Southeast Asia and relations with Communist China. All in the group contributed, Dillon (who seemed to be well aware of the proposal) supporting Ball's argument.

9. You expressed serious doubt as to the wisdom or effectiveness of the U.S. suggestion as likely to contribute to a peaceful solution. You referred to Canadian experience as a member of the ICSC in Vietnam. In this capacity, we were seeking to contribute to stability in the area and it was your impression that we had assisted U.S. objectives in their recently increased assistance programme; the latter seemed, you thought, to be having some useful effect.

10. Surely, you said, the U.S. did not want another war over Vietnam. Certainly not, Ball said; the U.S. were seeking to prevent disaster in Southeast Asia and his proposal had been made with that object.

11. I suggested that if, in the general interest, there were any advantage to be derived from current commercial contacts, a positive approach would be more productive than an ultimatum. Would it not be better to explore the possibility of exploiting these contacts to see whether or not some accommodation was to be had with the Chinese on Vietnam? An approach of this nature would be less provocative, less likely to have negative consequences. Behind any such conversations would be current arrangements for wheat.

12. Alvin Hamilton expressed the opinion that those charged with the Chinese negotiations on wheat had high political auspices from Peking.

13. It was left, as I understood it, that Ball would get in touch with me in Washington with the object of our reviewing together (and possibly with Australian representatives) the whole Vietnam situation.

SECRET. CANADIAN EYES ONLY. PRIORITY.

CHINA; SOUTH VIETNAM; CANADIAN WHEAT SALES

I sent you by yesterday's bag (January 15) a brief personal letter covering my memoranda on the conversations we had with the USA Under-Secretary of State and Secretary of the Treasury in Ottawa last Friday evening (January 12) on Cuba and Communist China. On my return to Washington I briefed my Australian colleague, Beale, on the approach which had been made to us on China; then, at Ball's request, Beale and I met with him in the State Department this morning.

2. Ball, who was accompanied by Rostow, the Counsellor and Head of the Policy Planning Staff, outlined in more detail and in a wider context the considerations which the State Department had in mind in raising the China question with us in relation to our current sales of wheat.

3. He began by saying that USA were searching for ways and means of inducing a more responsible and moderate attitude on the part of Peking. To this end, they were anxious to review all possibilities. The problem was given more urgency by the critical situation in South Vietnam where the USA were considering every means of restraining the Chinese Communists from increased measures of aid to North Vietnam, and from contributing to "escalation" of the aggression.

4. With this objective, Ball suggested that it would be useful for officials of the three countries (USA, Canada and Australia) to sit down together and have a careful look at the long-term situation, to make assessments of the role and relationship of Peking to developments in Vietnam and to see, in particular, whether the commercial contacts which Canada and Australia had with Peking authorities in connection with wheat and grain shipments could not be exploited to induce a greater measure of restraint on the part of the Chinese and to forestall their deeper involvement. Ball made it clear that he was not in any sense suggesting that Canada and Australia as exporting countries should present the Chinese authorities with an ultimatum or threaten to curtail present programmes. On the contrary, a considered look at the political elements in the problem in the light of general objectives of the free world might lead to the conclusion that an actual expansion in food supply or some improvement in credit terms would be the right course.

5. Rostow, who has been giving a good deal of thought to this problem (you may wish to refer to Rae's letter to Norman Robertson of November 13/61 and particularly paragraph 15 reporting on a conversation with Rostow after his return from Vietnam), then took up the discussion. He indicated that, while there has been little evidence suggesting that the Communist Chinese have so far directly participated in the campaign conducted by the North against the South in Vietnam, it was important to look ahead to future Chinese reactions, and to study the degree to which trade contacts could be employed to restrain the Chinese from increasing involvement. He went on to say that the State Department's preliminary look at the problem tended to indicate that there were indeed some clear advantages in arrangements such as those concluded with Peking by Canada and Australia not repeat not only as a means of disposing of surpluses but also for diverting Peking's scarce foreign exchange from industrial and military expenditures. If a greater consensus among the (Western) powers principally concerned could be developed, and if the Communist Chinese could be given some advance indication of the relationship between their trade contacts with the West and their actions in Southeast Asia, and elsewhere, this might have a salutary effect.

6. As a preliminary step, therefore, Rostow thought it would be useful if officials of the three governments could take a joint look at the whole problem and share their information and judgement.

7. My Australian colleague, on a personal basis, did not repeat not object to a study, and said he would take up the suggestion with his authorities in Canberra.

8. Also speaking personally, I then took the opportunity to make a number of observations on Ball's outline. I did not repeat not think that we would disagree with the premise that the policies of the governments concerned on trade with China, while certainly related to very important domestic considerations, should also be weighed in the broader context of war and peace in Southeast Asia. If such a joint study as Ball and Rostow suggested were to be undertaken, it should begin by trying to assess the degree of influence which Communist China might exert on the Vietminh and the extent of its involvement. In my opinion (as I had said in Ottawa), anything in the nature of an ultimatum to the Chinese would be likely to prove "counter-productive" and would be wholly unlikely to have Canadian support. I was interested to note that, in the State Department view, so long as the Communist Chinese were not repeat not engaged in active aggression in Southeast Asia or elsewhere, there were certain advantages to us all in their trade contacts with the West, and this should be borne in mind in any joint examination of the problem. I said that I thought it of great importance that USA suggestion should be regarded as one for informal normal consultation between competent officials of the three governments, not repeat not in any sense as calling for the institution of a formal study group. In particular I emphasized (and Ball fully agreed) that any publicity given consultation of this kind would put in jeopardy its whole usefulness.

9. I then went on to recall that, in addition to Canadian and Australian commercial contacts, there were other contacts with the Communist Chinese which could also be explored, including chiefly the contacts at Geneva in connection with the Laos Conference and also the continuing USA-Chinese discussions with their locale in Warsaw. While an informal exchange of views of the kind proposed might have real value in clearing our minds, a primary Canadian preoccupation would be our special position in connection with Indochina Commissions and our hope that the Laos Conference could be brought to a successful conclusion. Both of these had direct relationship to the whole problem of stability in Southeast Asia.

10. Ball raised the question whether the French should be included (because of their current transaction). It was our personal consensus that it would be best to keep any joint study to the three of us for the present, although it was recognized that the State Department might wish to discuss the matter with the French separately. The interest of Argentina and of West Germany in trade relations with Peking was also noted in passing.

11. I think you will agree that partly no repeat no doubt as a result of our conversation in Ottawa, the proposal put to us today appears in better perspective than when raised in Ottawa last week. Essentially, as I understand it, the USA suggest an informal tripartite exchange of information and opinion on the relationship of Communist China to developments in Southeast Asia and, in particular, a joint examination of whether and in what manner existing commercial contacts might be exploited in the effort to stabilize Southeast Asia.

12. My Australian colleague is referring the matter to Canberra as I have said, but he personally sees no repeat no reason to object to participating in the kind of joint study Ball has proposed. It is clear that thinking in the State Department is still in a preliminary stage. (The proposal put to us has not repeat not yet, for example, been taken up with Harriman whose view upon it I said that I would be glad to have.) Their suggestion has a number of gaps and fuzzy areas. Nevertheless I would hope that we would find it possible to make a positive response and agree to have a joint look at the problem in all its aspects and without by any means confining our study to current commercial relations. And one of my chief reasons is that we can, I think, from our own sources make a useful and solid contribution to thinking here on this whole problem.

CHINA; SOUTH VIETNAM; CANADIAN WHEAT SALES

In paragraph 12 of the above-mentioned telegram, Mr. Heeney recommended that we agree to participate in a joint study with the Americans and Australians of whether and in what manner existing commercial contacts with Communist China might be exploited in an effort to stabilize South East Asia.

Repeat for Information: Washington from Ottawa.

Australian Ambassador showed me today a report from Australian Ambassador in Washington concerning discussions in mid January in Ottawa between Mr. Fleming and Messrs. Ball and Dillon which Mr. Heeney attended. These concerned an American approach for a reconsideration of our policy concerning wheat export to China with a view to influencing Chinese to remove pressure on South Vietnam.

2. Mr. Ball was quoted as having said explicitly that Communist China was behind the aggressive and subversive activities of the DRVN and he spoke of the "undoubted involvement of Peking." I understand that as a result of this approach there will be further discussion with USA Government.

3. We are of course continually on the lookout for evidence of Chinese involvement in North and South Vietnam. The evidence however is scanty and assessments are based mainly on speculation. Speculation centres mainly on the reasons for Chinese military mission's visit to Hanoi last December. During that visit there were the usual expressing of friendship and solidarity but not repeat not much else became public. I would expect that some discussion on contingencies must have taken place. There are also indications of an indirect nature that

Noted. [N.A.] R[obertson]

Chinese may have pressed DRVN to more forceful action, based on speculation that DRVN may have rejected this Chinese pressure. The evidence is that General Vinh made a statement January 1 in (group missing) indicating that "in 1961 USA Diem clique changed its tactics from its plan to actively prepare for a march to North along with pacifying South, it has resorted to mainly coping with South Vietnam revolutionary movement." This statement has been interpreted by Trueheart of USA Embassy as a possible reaction by DRVN [to] Chinese pressure.

4. It is also significant that shortly afterwards an announcement was made of the formation of Vietnamese People's Revolutionary Party (see our telegram 15 January 27†). This has been interpreted by Australians and others as an indication that Viet Cong may now intend to stress a political rather than an overt military offensive with a neutralist solution for the whole of Vietnam as the new slogan. This would be accompanied by a continuation or possibly an intensification of guerrilla warfare.

5. More generally the assessment I heard in Hanoi last December was that present DRVN leaders are more in tune with Moscow than Peking. Another assessment which Parthasarathi puts forward is that Ho Chi Minh's status in Communist party is such that he may be in a position to resist pressures which a lesser Communist leader would be unable to resist, and that Ho Chi Minh is able to use his status on the existing difficulties between Peking and Moscow to strengthen his own voice in Communist policy in Southeast Asia.

6. Evidence is scant and speculation can easily be wrong but the overt evidence available to Western Embassies here does not repeat not support statement attributed to Ball. American Embassy has not repeat not given us any indication that they have additional evidence and Trueheart confirmed today to Hill that they had not repeat not. We have had piecemeal reports of items of Chinese equipment in DRVN but it is difficult to place these into a pattern of Chinese involvement.

7. You may therefore wish to query Americans further about their assessment when wheat export policy is discussed again. We should be very interested to receive any additional indications of Chinese involvements in this area as we might be in a position to follow them up.

CHINA AND SOUTHEAST ASIA: JOINT DISCUSSIONS WITH USA AND AUSTRALIA

As you know, I have been anxious to avoid giving USA authorities impression that we were unwilling to talk to them frankly and in confidence about any aspect of China question which they might wish to discuss. At same time I have always been concerned (my telegram Y-42 February 1, paragraph 2†) that USA interest in using wheat sales for political ends would take too prominent a part in any conversations. My own impression (and much more so that of Australians) is that such an imbalance has become increasingly likely. I would see little if any advantage in talks if these were to be virtually confined to those aspects of question on which disagreement could be foreseen in advance as only likely result.

2. In light of these considerations and of developments since my telegram Y-42 February 1, I have been looking again at proposal made to us by Ball. It appears reasonably clear from your comments on my suggestions and from what we have been told by Australians:

(a) that Americans wish to restrict talks primarily to question how existing commercial contacts might be exploited for political ends;

(b) that Australians believe as I do that such a study could give only one answer, yet do not want tripartite talks on a wider basis;

(c) that there is considerable likelihood of publicity for any tripartite talks that might take place (our telegram Y-50 February 6† and your telegram 378 February 8†).

3. In these circumstances, I have come to conclusion that it would be better not repeat not to proceed with proposal in form in which it was put to us by Ball. This does not repeat not mean of course that we would not repeat not be prepared to give most careful consideration to any information or views Americans may wish to convey to us through normal channels. It does mean however that in light of information now available I would see no repeat no advantage and some serious disadvantage in tripartite discussions as originally proposed.

4. On his return to Washington Ambassador might explain to Ball that under circumstances we would prefer that our views be expressed to him, and that he would report them to Ottawa. I shall meanwhile inform Australian High Commissioner of this decision. Australians may then turn to corresponding bilateral conversations.

Hong Kong, July 12, 1962

Yesterday afternoon Mr. T.H. Yu, Assistant General Manager, and Mr. P.S. Pang, Chief Secretary, of the China Resources Company paid a call on this office in order to discuss Canadian-Chinese trade and to complain specifically about what they feel is Canadian discrimination against the importation of Chinese products. (Incidentally, Mr. P.S. Pang is a newcomer to the China Resources Company. Although he does not have the title of Assistant Manager he seems to have replaced Mr. L.C. Pu who has been returned permanently to China, ostensibly for health reasons. Mr. Pang was formerly with the Hsinhua News Agency and represents a strengthening of political interest in the business of the China Resources Company.) Most of our meetings with the Chinese are conducted in the Bank of China building and when they make arrangements to call at our office it is a sign that the subject they wish to discuss is very important in their eyes. This again turned out to be the case.

2. Mr. Yu's first criticism was of a general nature. He claimed that when the first trade mission to Canada met with Canadian officials last Fall in Canada the Canadian side solemnly declared their interest in expanding trade between the two countries, and promised to assist the Chinese in developing trade. Mr. Yu declared, however, that developments since that time had proven that Canadian officials were hypocritical and that there was really no wish on our part to assist them in expanding their exports to Canada. He claimed that we had in fact thrown obstacles in their path. Mr. Yu then went on to state that our present attitude was not in our best interests and left no doubt in our mind that he was referring to future sales of Canadian grain to China. Mr. Yu repeated this statement several times during the course of our conversation and it is quite obvious he wished to impress us with the seriousness with which the Chinese view the present trade situation. We, however, do not feel that the Chinese can conveniently cut all grain purchases from Canada as we have every indication that they will continue to require large quantities of grain and there are virtually no alternate sources to which they can turn for their supplies. In any case, Mr. Yu revealed their real interest in our grain when later in the meeting he queried us regarding weather conditions and crop prospects of the prairies. We, of course, stated as we always have that we are interested in expanding trade between China and Canada and that we realize that it is a two-way street. We pointed out, however, that prior to the grain purchases our trade was closer to a balance and that we felt it would be very difficult to compensate for our grain purchases in terms of imports from China. To this Mr. Yu replied that they did not expect to bring Chinese-Canadian trade completely in balance but they certainly felt they should be given an opportunity to develop a market in Canada for some of their products and went on specifically to refer to what they feel is discrimination by the Canadian Government against imports of their textiles.

3. Mr. Yu claimed that their mission in Canada had negotiated contracts with Canadian importers for the sale of a variety of Chinese textiles only to have the importers informed by officials in Ottawa that U.S. market values would be used as a basis for valuation for duty (and possible consequent dumping duty) on the Chinese textiles. This, Mr. Yu claimed, was direct discrimination by Ottawa and nothing more than an attempt to keep Chinese textiles completely out of the Canadian market. His argument was that the application of U.S. market values to Chinese textiles was completely unfair and that if such a cost comparison had to be followed, Hong Kong or Japanese market values should be used as conditions and production costs in these countries were more nearly comparable with Chinese conditions than were those existing in the United States. This is, of course, an old complaint and one which we have gone over many times in the past with the Chinese. We employed the usual arguments used by Mr. Forsyth-Smith in the earlier discussions on this subject, and again reiterated in Ottawa when the Chinese delegation was there last October. We also attempted to indicate to the Chinese that they would, no doubt, have more success in their attempts to increase sales of other items but they promptly re-directed the conversation to textiles. We then discussed the question of whether they had instructed their importers to apply for advance rulings from the Department of National Revenue but they did not seem certain whether this had been done. We gathered from their comments, however, that importers must have followed this procedure in order to obtain any kind of a reply from the Department of National Revenue.

4. We are aware of the Canadian Government's position in this matter and of the problems we are faced with in textiles, but we must confess that the continued complaints by the Chinese on the question of import duties is rather embarrassing to us. Although we stick to the arguments which have been laid down in the past they do not sound very convincing to our own ears and our inability to effectively counter their claims or offer any really new suggestions only hampers our relations with the Chinese here. When Mr. Yu made his complaint to us yesterday we suggested that the trade delegation get together with interested importers and take the question up with the Department of National Revenue and with yourselves. Mr. Yu was not certain whether or not this had already been done but we suspect that they have made some kind of an approach to you. We would be most grateful if you would let us know what transpired at any meetings that were held and what line of argument we should take with the Chinese when this subject is again raised, as we are sure it will be.

SALE OF WHEAT TO CHINA

The Minister of Agriculture has submitted to Cabinet a request for less stringent credit conditions for the sale of wheat to Mainland China. A copy of the relevant memorandum is attached.†

2. The arguments favouring the course proposed are the following:

- (a) other exporters recently have made available to China improved credit facilities which may make our own non-competitive;
- (b) moreover, Chinese wheat import requirements are likely to diminish because domestic production appears improved;
- (c) China has now purchased the minimum amount specified in our long-term arrangement, would not be in default if no further purchases were made, and may require an inducement if purchases are to reach the maximum under the agreement (which would mean additional sales of 70 million bushels of wheat and 20 million bushels of barley, or 50% and 100% respectively of the amounts purchased thus far);

(d) Canada must increase exports (the carry-over next July 31 will likely be 25% higher than this year) but other exporters have also had good crops in 1962 and must find additional markets.

3. Therefore, in advance of the next round of negotiations with the Chinese, which opens in Hong Kong later this month, Cabinet is being asked to approve modified terms if these prove necessary to make a sale. While every effort would be made to maintain the current terms of 25% cash and 273 days credit for the balance, should a sale on these terms not be possible, it is recommended that the Wheat Board be permitted to offer terms of 25% cash and twelve months' credit for the balance. (These terms would still be less favourable than those offered by some of our competitors).

4. It should be noted that approval by Cabinet of these proposed terms would not be accompanied by any increase in the $100 million credit ceiling, established to permit the Chinese to take the maximum amount under the agreement on the basis of existing terms. A lengthening of the credit period without an increase in the credit ceiling will cause the ceiling to become inadequate to finance the maximum quantity foreseen by the agreement.

5. The trade considerations put forth in the Memorandum to Cabinet are very valid ones. The commercial case for improving the terms available to the Chinese is strong. However, in the past the length of the credit terms has been made public, and this practice presumably will continue. A change in these terms favourable to the Chinese might be interpreted as inconsistent with the Government's policy to provide military assistance to India. In fact, of course, although the public is not aware of it, the Cabinet decision of October 23, by which exports to China other than wheat will no longer be permitted, goes in exactly the opposite sense.

6. If Cabinet decides to accept the recommendation in the memorandum attached, the impact of the proposed change when made public might be minimized successfully by an earlier announcement concerning the decision on trade in general with China. Without either a marked improvement in the Chinese-Indian dispute or else a public indication of the Government's present attitude on trade with China, any easing of the credit terms involved in the sale of wheat could be misunderstood and lead to erroneous conclusions in several quarters, including New Delhi and Washington.

FURTHER SALES OF WHEAT TO CHINA
 (previous reference March 8†)

8. The Minister of Agriculture said that the sale of Canadian wheat was a matter of great importance. It was of direct benefit to Western farmers and Eastern farmers liked wheat to be exported, leaving them more room in the beef, pork and other meat markets.

A serious issue had to be resolved, namely the overall philosophy to govern Canada's trade with China. The key point was that Canada had a long term agreement for the sale of wheat to China. Minimum, as well as maximum quantities were specified in the agreement. The minimum was 112 million bushels of wheat, the maximum 187 million bushels. A limit of $100 million value had been set on the revolving credit or loan. So far, China had purchased 111.6 million bushels, just enough to satisfy the minimum requirement under the 5 per cent more or less clause.

The Canadian Wheat Board had advised that new negotiations would begin on November 19th for further sales to China under the long term agreement of June 1960. Although it was intended in the negotiations to limit credit terms to those now in effect, the Board pointed out that competition for the Chinese market had increased considerably. The French and the Australians had been offering better credit terms than Canada, and it was expected that China would press Canada for more favourable terms for any new orders. The Board's intention would not be to extend the $100 million credit limitation but it would like some leeway to extend repayments if need be to a twelve-month basis. France had been giving eighteen months' credit. Australia had stuck to twelve months but had modified the percentage payment dates.

An explanatory memorandum had been circulated (Minister's memorandum, Nov. 1, Cab. Doc. 356-62†).

9. Mr. Hamilton said that the London office of the Wheat Board had reported yesterday that China was buying from other countries and that the outlook in China was for better crops this year. The variable levy system in Europe was providing French and German growers with real protection. Germany, for instance, charged a levy of $1.94 per bushel on imported wheat. Although Canada's exports of wheat were down some 20 million bushels compared to this time last year, a more important figure was that of actual sales contracts. These figures showed that nearly 100 million fewer bushels had been contracted for this year compared to the same time last year. Under these conditions the Canadian negotiators should have room and flexibility with respect to the time and terms of repayment. They would fight hard to maintain the present conditions but would like to have a line to retreat to, if need be.

10. The Cabinet approved the recommendation of the Minister of Agriculture,

(a) that, in the forthcoming negotiations for the sale of wheat to China, a maximum effort be made by the Canadian Wheat Board to retain the existing credit terms, namely 25 per cent cash, balance 273 days; and,

(b) that, if the sale of wheat to China was not possible on the basis of the existing terms, the Canadian Wheat Board be authorized to conclude an agreement with the China Resources Company on the basis of 25 per cent cash and the remainder in the minimum period obtainable, not to exceed 12 months.

TRADE WITH MAINLAND CHINA

Attached for your information is a copy of a report dated November 30 on this subject to the Minister of Finance, prepared at the request of Cabinet by the Interdepartmental Committee on Low-cost Imports. We understand that the Minister of Finance may be circulating this report to the Cabinet.

2. The Mainland Chinese have been pressing to increase their exports to Canada and have objected that the values for duty imposed by National Revenue on their products have prevented them from selling in Canada. About two weeks ago the Chinese were given a list of non-sensitive products (Annex B) the import of which would not create any particular problems for Canadian producers or for Canada's other trading partners. The Chinese were told informally that if they could develop markets in Canada for these items it was not anticipated that there would be customs valuation problems in connection with their import to Canada (i.e. Chinese values would be accepted). The attached report recommends that this list be expanded to include a number of other non-sensitive items (Annex A).

3. The report goes on to observe that if the Government considers it necessary to make further concessions to China, the Chinese could be given a further list of more sensitive products which they could export to Canada in limited quantities (Annex C). The total value of such a quota list, which consists mainly of textiles and other consumer goods, would be around $3 million. The Committee has not made any recommendation regarding this step which would, of course, involve negotiations with the Mainland Chinese somewhat similar, although on a smaller scale, to those we have been conducting with Japan over the past few years on voluntary export restraints.

4. We might also report that the Interdepartmental Committee on Low-cost Imports met on November 29 with representatives of the Canadian Apparel and Textile Manufacturers Association (CATMA). The subject of imports from Mainland China was not raised directly, but the CATMA representatives expressed misgivings about the prospect of any significant increase in low-cost textiles of clothing from Mainland China (or indeed from any other low-cost countries). The CATMA representatives urged that the Government make greater use of the Cotton Textile Agreement to prevent further encroachment on the Canadian market by low-cost exporters. They also urged that the forthcoming annual negotiations with Japan on voluntary quotas should not result in any increase in Japanese exports of sensitive textile or clothing products.

5. Members of the Committee pointed out that the Cotton Textile Agreement was not an instrument for regulating levels of trade; it merely provided an international framework in which importing countries could seek the co-operation of low-cost exporters in dealing with genuine problems of market disruption. As for the negotiations with Japan, the CATMA representatives were told that Canada had been obliged to give assurances to the Japanese regarding a modest increase in exports of cotton textiles in the next few years, in order to obtain the agreement of Japan and other members of the Cotton Textile Agreement to exempt Canada from more precise commitments under the Agreement regarding automatic increase of quotas imposed under the Agreement.

[Ottawa], November 30, 1962

THE CUSTOMS VALUATION OF IMPORTS FROM MAINLAND CHINA

At its meeting on November 6th Cabinet referred to this Committee for further consideration, in the light of the discussion of the subject in Cabinet, the question of the basis of customs valuation of cotton fabrics and other sensitive imports from Mainland China.

It is the normal practice of National Revenue to accept Chinese invoice values except when complaints are made or there is other evidence of possible damage to Canadian producers. In cases where Chinese invoice values are not accepted, the values adopted by National Revenue are those prevailing in another supplying country, often the principal supplier, which in some cases is the United States. Japanese values are not normally adopted, for two reasons. First, it has proved extremely difficult to determine the true fair market value in Japan for most products. Second, Japanese values are in many cases so low that it has been necessary to control the level of imports by negotiating with Japan "voluntary" controls on many exports to Canada.

Within the framework of these valuation practices the Committee examined ways of facilitating the expansion of China's exports to Canada without endangering Canadian industry or jeopardizing Canada's trading relations with other countries such as Japan.

As a first step the Committee drew up a list of non-sensitive goods, generally of a type not made in Canada. In view of the fact that a delegation of Wheat Board officials was beginning negotiations with the Chinese for further sales of Canadian wheat, this list of non-sensitive goods was sent immediately to Hong Kong for transmission to the Chinese. The Chinese were told informally that if they could develop markets in Canada for the items listed it was not anticipated that there would be valuation problems in connection with the importation of these goods into Canada. The list consisted of about 85 items, and it included a few non-sensitive textile items such as natural silk and silk products.

The Chinese had given us in August a detailed list of goods which they wished to sell in Canada. The Committee examined each of the items on this list and divided them into three categories:

1. Goods which could be included in a second non-sensitive list further to the list already given to the Chinese.
2. Goods, generally of a type made in Canada, but which are imported in large volume, and of which carefully controlled importations from Mainland China would not be likely to cause serious damage to Canadian industry.
3. Highly sensitive goods in respect of which even limited imports from China would create difficulties for Canadian producers and for our trading relations with other countries.

The first category would bring to well over one hundred the number of non-sensitive items. The Committee understands that no problems have arisen or are likely to arise in connection with the valuation of these goods, and is therefore making no recommendations with regard to their valuation for duty. However, the Committee would consider it important that no publicity be given to the list of non-sensitive goods; and would also propose that it would be unwise to give any formal commitment in respect of valuation of such goods, or any undertaking going beyond the informal advice already communicated to our negotiating team in Hong Kong. This is because other countries are supplying some of these goods to Canada; and they would be likely to complain of discrimination if they became aware that Chinese invoice prices were being accepted without question for valuation purposes.

The second category consists mainly of textiles and other consumer goods which compete, either directly or indirectly, with Canadian production. The Committee suggests that if the Government considers it necessary to give the Chinese something more than the two non-sensitive lists, it might wish to allow the Chinese to ship certain limited quantities of goods in the second category. A list of these goods, containing suggested maximum quantities, is given in Annex C. It would be important to set an overall limitation of say $3 million, with specific limitations within this total for the items which compete most directly with Canadian production. As China's export trade is entirely in the hands of state trading agencies, it would not be difficult for China to limit its exports of these products to the quantities specified.

The most important item in this list is unbleached cotton fabrics. Canada is importing fairly substantial quantities of these fabrics from other countries, especially India, often for further processing by the textile industry in Canada. The Committee would not recommend unlimited imports from China or low-cost countries generally: Japan applies export restraints on these fabrics. India's shipments have been relatively stable in recent years, and that country would no doubt resent any displacement of its trade by Mainland China. Gingham and velveteen are not made in Canada, but at very low prices they would become substitutes for other Canadian fabrics. A quantitative limitation might prevent unduly low prices being set by the Chinese. These items are also subject to Japanese export restraint. Some of the other items are subject to Japanese export restraint, but the Japanese are not filling their quotas and Canadian production is holding up fairly well.

The Committee is not making the judgment that it is necessary or desirable to set up a quota list of this kind in the context of our present trade with China. The Cabinet will wish to make its own judgment in the light of considerations which go beyond the terms of reference of this Committee.

It should be borne in mind that giving the Chinese a quota list of this kind would represent an important new departure in Canadian policy. It would be likely to lead to requests from other Communist countries, particularly the U.S.S.R., for comparable privileges; and to requests from private enterprise countries, which are subject to statutory valuation provisions, for special valuation privileges. Since some of the items on the quota list are subject to Japanese export restraint, we could expect the Japanese to press for increased quotas. Finally, we could anticipate heavy pressure in the future from China to increase the coverage and quantities of the quota list.

With regard to the third category of goods, imports from various sources, including Japan, have created serious difficulties for Canadian producers, and the Committee would not recommend that any special concessions should be made to the Chinese in respect of these items. (Corduroy is one of the items in this category: the principal Canadian producer is in severe financial difficulties.) If significant imports of these items were to be allowed from China, the difficulties of Canadian producers would be increased. With regard to the items subject to Japanese export restraint, it would be harder to negotiate reasonable quotas with Japan. While theoretically the objections of the Japanese to Canadian imports from China could be met by increasing Japan's quotas, this would only aggravate the situation of Canadian producers.

Where difficulties arise in connection with imports of these very sensitive goods from China, National Revenue may, at its discretion, seek the advice of this Committee concerning valuation for duty.

The Committee recommends:

1. That the Chinese be given the second list of Category 1 goods (Annex A) as an addition to the list of non-sensitive goods they were given several days ago (Annex B).
2. That if the Government considers it necessary to make further concessions to China, it might wish to allow the Chinese to ship to Canada the goods listed in Annex C in the quantities indicated, the total not to exceed $3 million per annum. In respect of such goods the minimum value for duty should be based on the values of comparable countries which are making significant shipments to Canada of the products in question. In most cases the value for duty would be based on Japanese values.
3. That subject to recommendation 1, and any decision that may be made on point 2, no change be made in the system of valuation now being applied on imports from Mainland China.
4. That where special valuation difficulties arise in connection with the importation of any goods from Mainland China, National Revenue may, at its discretion, seek advice from this Committee.
5. That there should be no publicity about any of these arrangements.

*Le commissaire en chef adjoint de la Commission canadienne du blé
au ministre de l'Agriculture*

Assistant Chief Commissioner, Canadian Wheat Board, to Minister of Agriculture

Winnipeg, December 14, 1962

Dear Mr. Hamilton,

Within the next few days we are sending forward to you a copy of the minutes† covering the meetings held in Hong Kong between officials of China Resources Company and the Canadian Wheat Board. These discussions extended from November 19th to December 8, 1962, when they were successfully concluded, and resulted in a further wheat sale of 870,000 long tons, with a tolerance of 5% more or less, the particulars of which you are already acquainted [with].

My colleagues and I felt you would be interested in the discussions that ensued during the course of these conversations and that the detailed minutes might be of some assistance to you in formulating policy for the future if Canada hopes to establish a continuing market for wheat in China. It is unlikely that you will have the time to read the complete account of these protracted negotiations but we do suggest that you have one of your officials mark for your perusal the relevant passages of particular interest to you, and more particularly those which document the importance the Chinese officials attach to their need for greater opportunities to market Chinese products in Canada.

We draw to your attention the frequency of their assertions of "discrimination" against China in having access to the Canadian market. At no time did we admit that discrimination existed insofar as the term is applied in its narrow context but we readily admitted agreement [with] their contention that it was unreasonable to expect China to continue as a major importer of Canadian grains, necessitating a vast expenditure of precious foreign exchange, very little of which was secured by exports of Chinese products to Canada. The Chinese officials made it clear that they could not expect a balanced trade between our two countries. They made it equally clear that the present situation had run its course insofar as they were concerned.

In our view, and this is strongly held by me and my colleagues, the Chinese are completely frustrated at the failure of their efforts to gain a foothold in the Canadian market. Undoubtedly they have studied, and carefully watch, our domestic production and imports of products which they feel they could market in Canada if they had a reasonable opportunity of doing so. Furthermore, within the somewhat narrow confines of their trade philosophy, they undoubtedly make note of the substantial trade enjoyed by competing countries in the Canadian market under multilateral trade, with some of which Canada runs an unfavourable trade balance.

It is not the purpose of this letter to discuss the merits or otherwise of Canada's trade with countries, whether Communist or not. Our concern as a marketing board is the situation which we will face when the current contracts expire. It was made abundantly clear, and in fact Mr. Ting, General Manager of China Resources Company, at the social function held following the signing of the contract, reiterated in unmistakable terms their need for more favourable access to the Canadian market. He bluntly asserted that if we hoped, and it was their wish, to see a long-term development of trade between our two countries, it was essential that China be able to earn part of the funds for this by sales of Chinese products to Canada.

We as a board were willing to enter into a contract for the sale and shipment of wheat for the full 1963 calendar year. In this regard we were willing to accept current wheat prices as being relatively satisfactory and to assume the risk of carrying sterling over a lengthy period occasioned by the extension of credit from 273 days to 365 days. At the end the Chinese refused to go beyond the six months' period, January to June, 1963, and in all probability they had no intention of going beyond this at any time perhaps because, in their view, wheat prices are expected to decline over the coming year. Nevertheless it is worthwhile noting here that the reason given to us was that their willingness to enter into negotiations for a further contract for shipments in the July/December 1963 period would depend upon an improved opportunity for their products to enter Canada in the next six months. If this is not forthcoming, in our opinion the odds are against the completion of a further contract unless China desperately needs our grain. Our information, and the Chinese officials confirmed it, is that the food situation in China has materially improved.

As a marketing agency if the opportunity exists, and we think it does, to build up a steady continuing wheat trade with China it would be most welcome since such a development would broaden the base of our sales. Prior to the United States initiating its broad "give away" programmes under P.L. 480,<sup>78</sup> we could expect to market a substantial volume of wheat in markets either traditionally importers of wheat or in need of wheat due to shortages brought about by natural calamities. Nowadays such marketing opportunities rarely exist. Many of our former markets now depend almost entirely on American aid. Coupled with this is the American propensity for moving into markets in need of grain due to crop failures under one or other of the P.L. 480 Sections – markets that would normally secure supplies commercially. All this limits the sale of Canadian wheat and makes it essential that we exploit every possible market, and especially those we are not frustrated in on account of American largesse.

I have gone into some detail of the problem we face, and coupled with the record of our conversations with the Chinese, you will have a broad appreciation of the picture as we see it, and our views about the seriousness of the situation. We know that you are fully aware of the difficulties and the possible impact the loss of the Chinese business would have on the income of our wheat producers and for that matter to the Canadian economy as a whole. We appreciate that there are many complications and that difficult decisions may be required to solve the problem of affording the Chinese better opportunities to market their products in Canada.

However, we definitely undertook to bring this matter to your attention and to urge a change; to report to you our negotiating experience with the Chinese and to express our views on the precariousness of the Chinese market for Canadian wheat if there is no improvement. We know that you require no urging from us to strive for such a goal.

I would like to say how helpful it was to us to be able to extend the credit terms, and your assistance in this regard is greatly appreciated. The Chinese were insistent upon improved terms, obviously encouraged by the fact that they had obtained up to eighteen months from France and an improvement from Australia. We did everything possible to hold to the nine months' limit but after several days of hard negotiation we finally had to concede an improvement.

Another interesting development was a request by the Chinese that provision be made in the contract to permit them to prepay outstanding usance drafts prior to their maturity dates if they so wished. This we accepted readily and I think you will agree that it is an encouraging development. If the Chinese do indeed prepay outstanding drafts before maturity, it will go far to allay the fears of those who are critical of selling wheat to China on credit.

May we take this opportunity to wish you the Compliments of the Season.

With kind regards,

Yours sincerely,

W. RIDDEL

CONFIDENTIAL

Ottawa, December 19, 1962

My dear Prime Minister:

I am still numbed from our conversation. At the time of the original China sale, I said I was prepared to drop out of the Cabinet if the Chinese defaulted. You backed up this gamble and I played it to the hilt. The size of the sale gave us breathing space to find new markets. For the next 5 to 10 years there might be a temporary market in the Iron Curtain countries of Europe. I have tried to get long term agreements in Poland, Yugoslavia, Hungary and Czechoslovakia. These, in total, might add up to enough to hold up sales until we can convert more acreage into grass for beef cattle. Rightly or wrongly I have devoted much of my energies to this task on the assumption that, if we could sell wheat, we could hold the Prairie constituencies and have a chance in rural ridings in the East.

Now I gather that, because of the India-China situation, the national interest may best be served by slowing down efforts to sell in Communist countries. At the present time, thanks to the last Chinese agreement, we can expect sales of over 300 million bushels. With the new sales to South Africa and if 2 of the 3 deals with Russia, Hungary and Yugoslavia come through, we could hope for open quotas at most next June. This would mean continued good prices for cattle and hogs, and thereby a chance to hold rural seats in Ontario, as well as the Prairies. In my opinion, this has to be weighed against loss of support from those who feel we should act in a purer fashion than our allies. My personal judgment is that, unless open war breaks out, we would lose far more support by weakening our efforts to sell wheat.

Insofar as publicity is concerned, it will be difficult to play down sales to Communist countries, as details must come out eventually. To be clandestine would draw even more attention. Therefore, I believe factual statements should be made.

These are my considered thoughts. I would think that a careful review of the issues by Cabinet would be in order. Meanwhile, attached are the latest figures on grain sales and exports.

Yours sincerely,

ALVIN HAMILTON

TRADE WITH COMMUNIST CHINA

We have read Mr. Riddell's letter to Mr. Hamilton with considerable interest and, in the event that you may be called upon to comment, we are setting out our views below for your consideration:

1. The Canadian Government should not be stampeded into action merely by Chinese threats to cut wheat purchases if they cannot sell more to Canada. If the Chinese need wheat in the second half of 1963 and cannot purchase it elsewhere at a better price they will buy again from Canada.

2. The Chinese will stop buying grain from Canada and others if their crop production increases sufficiently to eliminate imports.
3. If Chinese grain imports are reduced, provided grain is available elsewhere (Australia, France, etc.), Canada will be the first supplier to be dropped because Canadian wheat is more expensive than competitors' wheat and the Chinese are not interested in the quality aspects of our grain which allow it to command higher prices in other markets.
4. Our competitors have not been more helpful to the Chinese than Canada in assisting them to market their exports. Indeed Australia has been much less helpful. If China has sold more in France and Germany than in Canada it is simply because of their larger populations and type of economy that require raw materials and commodities China exports. Neither of these two countries would allow China to flood its market with textiles. In fact Canada has lent considerable assistance to the Chinese through facilitating the efforts of their trade missions in this country.
5. The major commodity the Chinese have for export to this country is textiles. There is no reason why China should benefit by injury to, or destruction of, the Canadian textile industry. The failure of China to sell more of their other products has resulted from: poor design or quality standards, failure to promote sales by methods used in Canada, the appointment of poor agents or failure to appoint exclusive agents for various areas of Canada, the unstable Chinese supply situation, inability or unwillingness to establish post-sales service organizations, unacceptable Chinese terms of trade, general ignorance of Canadian market requirements, the relatively small size of the Canadian market and the fact that it takes time, study and effort for new suppliers to become established.
6. The Chinese refusal to sign contracts for the second half of 1963 almost certainly has more to do with:
  - (a) their expectation that Canadian prices will fall, and
  - (b) their hope that the 1962 improved Chinese crop position will continue in 1963,than with their failure to market more of their exports in Canada.
7. On the other side of the picture, the Chinese do have a point when they assert (and they frequently do) that Canadian importers have been frightened by previous assessments of dumping duties on Chinese textiles and paint brushes. In addition, while they recognize that no country will permit its domestic industry to be put out of business by foreign imports, they ask with some justification (after studying our import statistics) why China, for example, cannot obtain at least a small share of the very substantial market now enjoyed in Canada by United States textiles. If the recommendations of the Interdepartmental Committee on Low Cost Imports, dated November 30, 1962, are implemented they will probably go some distance towards mollifying the Chinese for the time being. In dealing with the Communist Chinese it is important to be able to offer some concession – however small – if business is to be successfully concluded and the first two recommendations are useful for this purpose.

TRADE WITH MAINLAND CHINA; PROPOSED EXPORT OF ITEMS
NOT ON THE INTERNATIONALLY AGREED EMBARGO LIST
(Previous reference January 15th†)

12. The Minister of Trade and Commerce said that on January 15th the Cabinet had decided that export permits should not be granted at this time for the export of aluminum ingots and stainless steel to Mainland China. Subsequently, Canadian manufacturers had expressed concern about the possible loss of continuing markets for Canadian goods. Other allied countries did not impose comparable restrictions upon non-strategic materials and equipment.

Consideration should be given to a change in policy to permit the export of items not on the internationally agreed COCOM list. This might be done on the understanding that any proposed departure from the past pattern of the trade which might be of military significance would be submitted to the Cabinet.

An explanatory memorandum had been circulated (Minister's memorandum, Feb. 15 – Cab. Doc. 65/63†).

13. During the brief discussion some said that no change in the general policy should be made at this time, but that the two specific items under consideration ought to be approved.

14. The Cabinet agreed

(a) that export permits should be granted for the proposed export to Mainland China of 2¾ tons of stainless steel strip and 22 tons of aluminum ingot;

(b) that no general change of policy on exports to Mainland China should be made or announced at this time; and

(c) that if other urgent proposals for exports to Mainland China should arise during the next few months, they would be considered on their individual merits by the Cabinet or the Special Committee of Council.

TRADE WITH MAINLAND CHINA
 (Previous reference February 21)

4. The Minister of Trade and Commerce said that Canada's exports to Mainland China exceeded by many times our imports from China. It was desired to negotiate another long-term contract for the sale of wheat to China, but the Chinese Communists had indicated that continued wheat sales would not be possible without increased Chinese export opportunities in the Canadian market. They had stated that they recognized that some goods were particularly sensitive from the Canadian viewpoint.

An Interdepartmental Committee had studied the subject and had submitted a detailed report. It was now proposed that the Chinese be notified of a second list of non-sensitive goods; and that the Chinese be also given access to the Canadian market for up to $3 million of Chinese goods, including quantities of a number of textile items, as listed in Annex C to the officials' report submitted with the Minister's memorandum. The valuation for duty purposes would in most cases be on the same basis as Japanese goods.

It was further proposed that the Minister and his deputy might discuss with Dominion Textiles Limited and Wabasso Cotton Limited the implementation of the proposed procedures. These companies now imported various textile items from the United States for further processing, and would be pleased to import them instead from China. The companies and the Federal government would both benefit financially from the diversion.

These proposals had been discussed with the Ministers of Finance and Agriculture who were in agreement. The Secretary of State for External Affairs, however, had not concurred.

An explanatory memorandum was circulated (joint memorandum of the Ministers of Trade and Commerce and Agriculture, March 1 – Cab. Doc. 84-63†).

5. During the discussion the following points were raised:

(a) Some said that the proposed arrangement with China might be prejudicial to negotiations with Japan. Canada exported goods valued at nearly $250 million annually to Japan, but imported less than half as much. Furthermore, Japan was an assured customer, whereas the recent wheat sales to China were abnormal. The Japanese had agreed to place voluntary quotas on their exports to Canada, but might not be willing to continue this procedure if the proposed arrangements were made with China. Others said the comparison was not valid because Canada's current exports to Mainland China were forty times as large as our imports from that country.

(b) Canada's trade with Japan, Taiwan and Hong Kong would not be adversely affected if the goods listed in Annex C represented only the diversion of items presently imported from the U.S.

(c) No announcement on this subject should be made at this time.

6. The Cabinet agreed,

(a) that the Mainland China authorities be notified in due course of a second list of non-sensitive goods as listed in Annex A to the report of the Interdepartmental Committee on Low-cost Imports, attached to the joint memorandum of the Ministers of Agriculture and Trade and Commerce (Cab. Doc. 84-63);

(b) that the Minister and Deputy Minister of Trade and Commerce be authorized to enter into confidential consultations with appropriate groups in the Canadian textile industry to establish procedures that might provide access to the Canadian market for limited additional quantities of Chinese goods; and,

(c) that no commitment should be made at this time on proposals that various textile and other items listed in Annex C to the report be imported from Mainland China on a quota basis.

Note: The Acting Prime Minister informed the Secretary (and the Minister of Trade and Commerce) that the Prime Minister desired that no action be taken on this decision at this time, even if it meant some delay in negotiating sales of wheat to China.

TOUR CHINA – THOMSON AND ROBERTS

Returned Hong Kong March 16 after interesting and useful visit. Reception in Peking cordial. Predictably theme most discussions was China's (large?) imbalance of trade with Canada and problems affecting Chinese exports to Canada.

2. Last meeting in Peking, unexpectedly and (group corrupt) sought by us, was with Lu Hsu-Chang, Vice Minister of Foreign Trade responsible for trade with all non Communist countries and Cuba. He is shortly to visit on official invitation. Lu made formal and blunt statement along following lines: Canada's grain trade with China could continue over long period despite improving agricultural situation because it is China's policy to export rice and import wheat. Rice production can be increased quickly but not repeat not so wheat production. But China expects "fair, just and reasonable treatment" from Canada. At present Canada has "a policy of discrimination" against certain Chinese imports. It will be "difficult to continue" wheat trade if discrimination is not repeat not removed. No repeat no special treatment is asked for but only treatment as good as that accorded to similar Japanese and Hong Kong imports. Moreover Canada would have to meet "terms and conditions" offered by other countries if new wheat sales were to be realized. I was asked to transmit this statement to you. I agreed to do so and added comment indirectly Canada's special problems and other relevant factors [sic], pointing out in particular why present basis for valuation for duty outside Chinese textiles was not repeat not discriminatory.

3. From our discussions with Lu and others we concluded that Chinese wish to continue to import wheat. We think however that they will try to find suppliers other than Canada unless Canada makes some effort to meet their point on taking necessary steps. Head Textile Corporation told us that they did not repeat not expect redress measures of trade or to earn much foreign exchange by textile exports to Canada. Neither did they have any textile surplus for export. But there was a point of principle at stake. "It is a question of our feelings" he said. We are inclined [to] accept this explanation and to think Lu was not repeat not bluffing. Full report† follows by bag.

CANADIAN-JAPANESE MINISTERIAL COMMITTEE

With reference to proposed agenda Item B(3) the following might be useful background information for Ministers.

2. The general position of Canadian exports to Japan is favourable and the outlook for the future is promising. Japan is Canada's third largest market and Canada is an important source of industrial raw materials. Wheat comprises more than 40 percent of total exports to Japan, which is our second largest market for cash sales. More than 80 percent of Canadian exports to Japan originate in Western Canada. Our sales of raw materials to Japan and therefore the volume of Canadian exports is correlated to the level of industrial activity in Japan. The market for wheat and industrial raw materials is subject to strong competitive pressures from other supplying countries. While our export trade is primarily in raw materials, as Japanese import restrictions and protective measures are eased there will be a potential market for some Canadian manufactured products which are competitive in world markets.

3. Japanese trade liberalization has purportedly reached 88 percent which in fact means 88 percent of non government imports in 1959 which itself was a restricted year. At the present time we estimate that approximately 60 percent of Canadian exports to Japan are not repeat not liberalized and are in restricted categories. So called liberalized products often are subject to highly protective tariff measures or to administrative persuasion on the part of the Government working closely with industry.

4. Following are current commodity problems about which Ministers may wish to be informed.

Sulphur – sulphur is on the negative list and no repeat no foreign exchange is allocated for imports. Domestic requirements are met in part from mining elemental sulphur but chiefly through production of sulphuric acid from smelting pyrites. Both are relatively inefficient industries which have been protected from foreign competition. On instruction the Embassy has pressed the Japanese Government to liberalize imports which could open the market for Canadian sulphur.

Aluminum – Despite current over capacity in all aluminum producing countries, the Japanese industry is working at full capacity and expanding facilities. Some export sales have been made to reduce stocks of ingot. Government pressure reportedly has been used to limit imports of Canadian ingot.

Pulp – Pulp and paper were freed from import exchange restrictions in October 1962. Since that date a substantial market for kraft pulp has developed and the first shipments have gone forward from Canada. The Japanese industry protested vigorously over the liberalization of sulphate pulp and the Government asked Japanese papermakers to guarantee the purchase of 240,000 tons of kraft pulp leaving an estimated annual market of 60,000 tons open to foreign suppliers. The chemical pulp market is controlled by the Japanese owned Alaska Pulp Co. and domestic users of this product have with Government suasion guaranteed to purchase from this source to the exclusion of other foreign suppliers. The Japanese economy is self-sufficient in sulphite grades of pulp and at the present time can produce most grades of paper and newsprint at prices below the Canadian export offerings.

Nickel Oxide Sinter – When metallic nickel was liberalized for import into Japan the Japanese applied a tariff quota system to it which in effect permits this product into Japan only in the amount which equals the excess of domestic demand over domestic production. In an effort to overcome this, INCO decided to market nickel oxide sinter, an intermediate product in metallurgy which is classified in the Brussels nomenclature under Tariff Item 75.01 to which no repeat no duty is applicable in the case of imports into the USA and EEC. The Japanese in a move to protect [their] refining industry ha[ve] classified it under Item No. 28.28 at 20 percent duty. We now understand that the Japanese intend to eventually put this product under 75.01 at a later date when a satisfactory protective tariff has been applied to that item. There could be a potential market in Japan for at least 3,000 tons a year under favourable conditions of entry.

Coking Coal – During the past few years Western Canadian coal operators have found a substantial market for coking coal and to a lesser extent anthracite in Japan although Canada is not repeat not a major supplier. The export of coking coal has been made possible by a freight subvention paid by the Federal Government. There is a continuing market for Canadian coking coal in Japan but neither the producers in Canada nor the importers in Japan can come to any satisfactory long term supply arrangement because of the fact that the subvention is on a year to year basis and therefore uncertain. A long term subvention policy would ensure a continuing market for Canadian coking coal in Japan amounting to $7 or $8 million annually.

Nuclear Power – The Japanese Government agency supervising the development of atomic energy ha[s] formulated a ten year program for the construction of nuclear power reactors. It is expected that contracts will be let in 1963 for the building of three power reactors proposed under this program. There is some hope that the Japanese will include a Candu type plant in this program although at the present time the Canadian export position is not repeat not as consolidated as the USA or the British, both of whom have extensive sales organizations active in this country, have built reactors in Japan, and have gained operating experience in medium sized nuclear power reactors.

Agricultural Products – Japan can be expected to consume rapidly increasing quantities of meat and dairy products. Livestock and poultry raising will grow greatly in importance, creating for Canada increased opportunities to supply breeding stock (cattle, swine and poultry), forage crop seeds, feed grains and possibly animal products such as cheese and meat.

DESPATCH NO. 27

Tokyo, January 18, 1963

CANADA-JAPAN MINISTERIAL MEETING

The members of the Canadian Delegation to the first meeting of the Canada-Japan Ministerial Committee, held in Tokyo on January 11 and 12, will have carried back to Ottawa their own account of what took place, but I thought it might be of some interest if we reported briefly on the meeting from the point of view of the Embassy.

2. I am convinced that in a general sense the meeting was an extremely useful one in promoting closer and friendlier relations between Japan and Canada. The mere fact that the meeting was held and that a strong Canadian delegation came to Japan for the purpose was undoubtedly much appreciated by the Japanese. As you know, they have been somewhat more actively interested in developing closer contacts of this kind with Canada than we have been inclined to be on the Canadian side. This is understandable, considering that Canada is a full and active participant in such things as NATO, OECD and the Commonwealth Economic Consultative Committee, while the Japanese are still relatively isolated and increasingly anxious to be more closely associated with the other members of the free world. It seems to me to be important that we take advantage of this Japanese attitude and seek to connect them to the Western world with as many threads as possible. This meeting, however, went considerably beyond a friendly discussion among Japanese and Canadian Ministers, serving to give the Japanese a greater sense of "belonging." There was a forthcoming exchange of points of view on trade and economic matters which are of very substantial importance to both our countries, as a result of which I believe there is now a much better understanding of the issues on which we differ, as well as the extent of common ground.

3. The Japanese were, I think, a little uncertain at first of what we meant by suggesting that the meeting begin with a review of the economic and financial situation and prospects in each country. However, they responded very well to Mr. Fleming's brief but succinct explanation of the basic factors in Canada's economic position at this time. Mr. Miyazawa, Minister of State and Director-General of the Economic Planning Agency, who spoke on Japanese economic prospects, is a very intelligent and articulate member of the Cabinet. The conclusion of his analysis was that the Japanese economy is not expected to grow quite as rapidly as it has in recent years. Both Mr. Miyazawa and Mr. Tanaka, the Minister of Finance, ended their statements on this item of the agenda with an emphatic statement of Japan's urgent need to increase its exports.

4. The question of restrictions on Japanese exports to Canada was, as expected, a persistent and strong theme in everything the Japanese side said throughout the meeting. They pressed continuously their claim that Japanese exports to Canada suffer under a double handicap because they are subject both to the voluntary restraints imposed by the Japanese and, since June of 1962, to the temporary import surcharges applied by Canada.<sup>79</sup> Some of the Japanese arguments were overdrawn to the point of being untrue, and on certain points Mr. Fleming found it necessary to make a rather firm rejoinder in order to set the record straight. At one point, for example, the Minister of International Trade and Industry, Mr. Fukuda, said that in the negotiations over Japanese export restraints, Canada insisted on reducing imports during a bad year, holding the line during a normal year, and allowing only very small increases in a good year. Mr. Fleming found it necessary to quote specific figures to show that Japanese exports to Canada of some "sensitive" items had in fact increased by more than 10 per cent in certain cases. I think it was all to the good to have the basic Canadian position with regard to Japanese exports set forth so unequivocally by Mr. Fleming, since I am not sure that it has ever been put directly to the Japanese Ministers concerned in quite such clear terms.

5. In these exchanges on bilateral trade questions, while the discussion was vigorous and frank it was our impression that the Japanese were taking it all in good humour. On matters of this kind they are persistent and even aggressive in pressing their own case, but I do not think they mind an equally vigorous rejoinder as long as it is accompanied by apparent understanding of Japan's position and evidence of a willingness to work toward acceptable solutions to the problems in question. On our side I think Canadian Ministers were able to demonstrate that they understood Japan's position and while they could not accept all of the Japanese arguments they did hold out a good deal of encouragement for increased Japanese trade with Canada, including exports of "sensitive" items, on an orderly basis. I think it was particularly important that Mr. Fukuda, the Minister of International Trade and Industry, should have had this face-to-face meeting with Canadian Ministers. He is a relatively new Minister who has not had much contact with Canadians and probably had up until now little real understanding of Canada-Japan trade relations. While he is not personally one of the strongest members of the Cabinet, his portfolio is an important one and I am hopeful that his participation in this meeting will assist in making his Ministry more accessible and more appreciative of the basic factors in Canadian-Japanese trade relations.

6. In the discussion of international economic relations, there was evidence of some difference in approach between Canada and Japan toward the GATT Ministerial meeting. While the discussion on this item was not greatly prolonged, here again there were quite frank statements of viewpoints on either side and while I am not sure that these viewpoints were brought closer together, I am quite confident that the Japanese understand much better now why our interests are not entirely identical to theirs and that we are not, to use the phrase Mr. Fleming employed, prepared to "gang up" with them in advance of the Ministerial meeting.

7. Under the fisheries item on the agenda, the Japanese Minister of Agriculture and Forestry, Mr. Shigemasa, made only a brief statement in which he explained that Japan wanted to see the principle of abstention done away with in a revision of the North Pacific Fisheries Convention. The Minister of Fisheries, Mr. MacLean, gave a careful and very frank explanation of the basic

Canadian position on this matter, leaving no doubt that Canada could not consider the abandonment of this principle. He emphasized the efforts that Canada was making to conserve and increase the salmon population which spawned in Canadian rivers. He ended by indicating that while some formula of words might perhaps be found which would not actually use the word "abstention," the principle was of very great importance for the conservation of the resources of the sea. Although Mr. MacLean asked that no account of his statement on this subject be given to the press, since he was speaking very frankly for the benefit of his Japanese colleagues, one or two newspapers carried a statement that Canada had agreed to a revision of the fisheries treaty. There was certainly nothing in what Mr. MacLean said that could justify this statement.

8. Perhaps I might say something here about the Japanese press coverage of the meeting. It was very full and the proceedings were front-page news. This is perhaps a measure of the importance with which the meeting was regarded by the Japanese. One of the difficulties about holding such a meeting in Japan, however, is that it is apparently constitutionally impossible for Japanese officials to withhold from the press details of what are supposed to be confidential discussions. The members of the Canadian delegation were rather disturbed to see the extent to which statements made in the meeting had apparently been relayed to Japanese newspapers but it was even more disturbing to find that Japanese officials or ministers had apparently given quite misleading impressions to the journalists of some parts of the meeting for their own domestic political purposes. Some newspapers' stories gave the impression that the Japanese Ministers had wrung new concessions out of their Canadian colleagues on the questions of Japanese export restraints and Canadian import surcharges as well as on the fisheries question referred to above. In the long run, I think these press stories are probably not of serious consequence, although they are decidedly irritating at the time of their publication. I am told that the United States was subject to much rougher treatment in the Japanese press at the time of the United States-Japan Ministerial Committee meeting.

9. On the matter of Japanese membership in OECD, the Japanese Ministers, as expected, put forward a straightforward plea for Canadian support. Mr. Fleming was able, with his background of active participation in and chairmanship of the OECD Ministerial Council, to give the Japanese a careful, thoughtful and helpful reply on this point. On the basis of your telegraphic messages he was able to assure the Japanese of unqualified Canadian support for their membership in OECD. At the same time he explained to them that the decision on Japanese membership was a matter for the whole membership of OECD to decide and, pointing out some of the considerations which were in the minds of other members of OECD, he suggested that the Japanese should be guided by their friends in OECD in deciding the timing of their formal application for membership. Mr. Fleming ended his statement on this matter with an optimistic observation that Japan could probably expect to become a full member of OECD in a relatively short time.

10. As you may know, the Japanese decided at the last moment that they would not raise the subject of trade with Communist countries under the heading of "Other Business." We had made it quite clear that Canadian Ministers were not anxious to get into a discussion of policy on this matter and the Japanese evidently decided that they might only embarrass themselves if they raised questions to which our Ministers might not be able to respond. There was a very short exchange on this subject at a small dinner party given at the end of the meeting by the Foreign Minister, in which the Japanese asked one or two factual questions but did not pursue the matter. Under "Other Business," therefore, the only matters discussed were a request from the Japanese side that negotiations be undertaken at the earliest possible time on a convention for the avoidance of double taxation between Canada and Japan and on the Canadian side a request for sympathetic consideration by the Japanese Government tobacco monopoly of Canada's interest in selling tobacco. On the double tax question, Mr. Fleming explained that Canadian officials concerned with this field were heavily engaged at the present time in revising existing conventions with other countries, but he assured the Japanese that Canada shared their desire to begin negotiations and would commence them as soon as our officials were available to participate. On the tobacco matter, the Minister of Finance, Mr. Tanaka, who is responsible for the tobacco monopoly, made a rather non-committal reply but indicated that samples of Canadian tobacco would be studied.

11. The drafting of a communiqué for this meeting proved to be not too difficult. The Japanese had prepared a draft which they submitted to the Canadian Delegation at the end of the first day and considering the vigour with which they had pressed their arguments about Japanese exports to Canada, their draft was fairly acceptable. A draft had also been prepared on the Canadian side and, by accepting in principle the Japanese draft as a basis for the communiqué, they were persuaded without too much difficulty to accept certain key paragraphs of the Canadian draft. I think the final document<sup>80</sup> is a reasonable compromise between the interests of Canada and Japan. From the Canadian point of view we have obtained a reiteration of the principle of orderly marketing of Japanese goods in Canada, there is mention of Canadian concern about Japanese import restrictions, and the paragraph on international economic relations represents some concession on the Japanese side. At the same time the Japanese are, I think, reasonably satisfied with the references to further expansion of trade between Canada and Japan, with our unequivocal support for their membership in OECD, and with the reiteration of assurances that Canadian import surcharges are temporary and will be removed as soon as possible.

12. The final event of the meeting was an invitation formally extended by Mr. Fleming on behalf of the Canadian Government to hold the next meeting of the Canada-Japan Ministerial Committee in Ottawa. Mr. Fleming suggested that the timing could be a matter for discussion through formal channels but perhaps there might be another meeting about a year from now. Later, at Mr. Ohira's dinner party, the Japanese revived the question of when the next meeting might be held and there was some rather light-hearted talk about the suitability of September or October and the beauties of the autumn landscape in Canada. This dinner table discussion may have been taken fairly seriously on the Japanese side because I noticed that the Japan Times reported next day that "in a later meeting with the Foreign Minister" it was agreed that the Ministerial Committee should meet in Ottawa in September. This report could only have come from the Foreign Minister or his Deputy, and I will try to determine at an early date if they are expecting the Canadian Government to make a move for another meeting in the fall.

CUBA; U.S. POLICY; FURTHER TRADE RESTRICTIONS

After dinner last evening, the U.S. Under-Secretary of State (Ball) and the Secretary of the Treasury (Dillon) informed us that, soon after the forthcoming OAS meeting (January 22), it was the U.S. Administration's intention to suspend remaining U.S. transactions with Cuba – if OAS did not take united action in this regard, the U.S. would proceed unilaterally.

2. As I understood it, the Administration had come to the conclusion that it could no longer tolerate provision to Cuba from U.S. sources of some $30 million U.S. This revenue derived from U.S. purchases of Cuban goods remaining on the permissible list, including tobacco. Whether or not the forthcoming action will include all U.S. exports as well as imports was not clear.

3. The U.S. Secretaries said that they were not asking us to take any consequential action; they simply wished us to know in advance what they proposed doing. So far as Dillon knew, there would be no particular effects of the new order on Canada (in answer to my question on U.S.-owned subsidiaries). There were no problems between us on administration of present U.S. regulations. Dillon did not know whether the action intended would be taken under the FAC regulations (Trading with the Enemy) or under new Presidential powers.

USA POLICY – CUBAN TRADE

At the suggestion of Martin (Assistant Secretary for Economic Affairs), we saw Hurwich, Head of Cuban Desk (State Department) last week to obtain clarification of some of the points which came up in the private conversation between USA Secretaries and Canadian Ministers in Ottawa regarding future USA policy towards Cuba. Hurwich said that USA hoped that the current OAS Conference at Punta Del Este would result in a general condemnation of the Castro régime. He said that their latest information was twelve of the Latin American countries felt strongly about Cuba and would go along with the Colombian proposals for economic and diplomatic sanctions; however, seven Latin American countries including Mexico, Brazil, Argentina and Chile were not repeat not prepared to go as far as this. It was not repeat not possible, therefore, to anticipate the exact nature of the decisions that might be reached at the conference.

2. Notwithstanding, as Ball had indicated to you in Ottawa, USA Administration itself intended to proceed with further steps against Cuba. The timing of such measures would depend on the results of the OAS Conference. Final decisions had not repeat not yet been reached, but the likelihood was that USA would cease all further trade and economic relations with Cuba. USA imports from Cuba last year were about $30 million (mainly tobacco, fruits and vegetables). USA exports to Cuba of items outside the embargo (food and drugs) were about $12 to $15 million.

3. On the basis of USA intelligence reports, Hurwich continued, it was apparent that economic and living conditions in Cuba were deteriorating rapidly and that there was increased dissatisfaction and resentment against the régime. Some 1500 Cuban refugees were coming to USA each week. Cuban Government was increasingly turning to repressive measures. USA wished to make conditions as difficult as possible for the régime and also to make Soviet support of Cuba as costly as possible.

4. The next several months, USA estimates, will be a crucial period. Cuba was now launching its four-year plan and urgently required foreign exchange and essential equipment. Capital goods and equipment to be obtained from Soviet sources under trade agreements would not repeat not be arriving in Cuba until the end of the year. During this "hiatus" it was important to deny Cuba alternative sources of supply.

5. We were told that the further economic action by USA was to be taken after the OAS Conference and (hopefully) some time in February. It had not repeat not yet been decided whether the action would be under the trading with the Enemy Act (foreign assets control), or under new legislation (Section 620(a) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 (paragraph 23 of our letter 1621 November 17/61.). This new provision authorized the President to establish a "complete embargo on all trade with Cuba" and was being interpreted in broad terms along lines similar to the foreign assets control regulations. It was likely, therefore, that USA measures against Cuba would be all-encompassing, affecting exports, imports, in transit movements, financial transactions and operations of USA subsidiaries abroad.

6. We reminded Hurwich of the discussions that had taken place last year<sup>1</sup> (during the Washington meetings of the Joint Committee) between Canadian Ministers and USA Secretaries regarding subsidiaries in Canada and particularly the assurances we had then received that USA subsidiaries in Canada would be completely exempted from the operation of USA action. Canadian Ministers on that occasion, we emphasized, had made it clear that they would expect any such exemption to be unconditional.

7. In response, Hurwich assumed that the position in this last regard continued unchanged. (This was subsequently confirmed to us in categorical terms by Martin, Assistant Secretary Economic Affairs.) Hurwich went on to say that, while exemptions for subsidiaries in Canada would doubtless be unconditional, he thought it likely that Canadian authorities would be asked whether it might be possible for them to review Canadian trade with Cuba, with a view to restricting exports of sensitive items (such as, transformers and parts for equipment). Hurwich understood that USA Administration was considering making similar requests also to other free world countries; without such cooperation USA embargo would fail in its purpose.

8. We did not repeat not, of course attempt to forecast the response which Canada would make to any such request but took the opportunity to reiterate the Canadian position as previously expressed by Ministers (reference my telegram 820 March 15/61). We were assured that we would be given advance information as to the nature of USA decisions before any action was taken.

9. As you know, the Cuban problem is presently before the OAS at Punte Del Este and, from current reports, it is as yet in doubt what action will be taken by the conference.

USA AND CUBA; RECENT DEVELOPMENT; CANADIAN INVOLVEMENT

The February 3 announcement by the White House of additional embargo measures on trade with Cuba (our reference telegram) opened a further chapter in the Administration's policy toward Cuba and Communism in the Western Hemisphere.

2. You will recall that, when USA Secretaries were in Ottawa for the meeting of the Joint Economic Committee, there was some private discussion on this subject.<sup>2</sup> At the time, we were told that, soon after the OAS Meeting, it was the Administration's intention to suspend remaining USA trade with Cuba (with the possible exception of USA exports of foods and medicines); if the Punta del Este Conference did not repeat not take action multilaterally, USA would proceed unilaterally. The point was made to us at that time that the Administration had come to the conclusion that it could no longer tolerate provision to Cuba from USA sources of USA dollars (estimated at some $35 million annually) from USA purchases of goods remaining on the permissible list (largely tobacco).

3. Subsequently we reported (our telegram 207 January 22) on the basis of further information provided us by State Department officials on the steps USA planned to take.

4. Following the meeting at Punta del Este, and the day before the presidential announcement and proclamation (my telegram 327 February 3), we were informed by the State Department of the substance of the proposed statement (our telegram 322 February 2†).

5. Thus it can be said that USA authorities were careful to give us advance notice of their intentions. On none of these occasions, however, it should be noted, was there any suggestion of any action on our part.

6. It should also be noted that the procedure employed thus far, i.e. the import embargo under the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 is such as to minimize the likelihood of consequential problems for Canada (as might have been the case under the Foreign Assets Control Regulations). This is in accordance with what USA Secretaries told us in Ottawa.

7. When the Secretary of State returned from Punta del Este, he met at once with the President, and shortly afterwards (February 1) with the press.<sup>3</sup> At his press conference, in reply to questions, Rusk forecast action on the lines taken and announced on February 3, expressing USA concern that Cuban dollar revenues were being used by Cuba for subversive purposes elsewhere in the hemisphere.

8. It was on this occasion and at this point that zealous correspondents asked the Secretary whether a problem did not repeat not arise in connection with Cuban-Canadian trade. While I am satisfied that the Secretary did not repeat not wish or intend to highlight the particular case of Canada, he replied to the effect that this question "would be taken up" but that he had "no repeat no comment" at this time. In reply to an immediately supplementary question from a Canadian correspondent, Rusk made it clear that he was "not repeat not referring to any single country." He did, however, express the hope that "other countries" would consider whether they might not repeat not align their policies with the policies of the Inter-American system (our telegram 313 February 2† reports the text).

9. You will have seen from my telegrams 336† and 343† February 5 that the Secretary of State testified yesterday before the House Select Committee on Export Control. His general statement with regard to Cuba made no repeat no specific reference to Canada. He did, however, say, as you will have noted, that "We (USA) expect that increased control of trade with Cuba by USA and Latin American countries will make evident to the member governments of NATO and other states friendly to USA the need to re-examine their trade policies and the extent of their commerce with Castro Communist Government of Cuba." You will also have noted the reference to Canada in answer to supplementary questions.

10. In the period ahead it will be very important for us to continue to do what we can to ensure that the facts of the Canadian position are understood in USA Government (Congress as well as Administration) and, to the extent possible, by public opinion. So far as the Administration is concerned, there has been a good history of consultation between us on this subject. The press and public opinion constitute a more difficult problem. As you know, everything in this country to do with Cuba is charged with emotion and strong feeling. For this reason, Americans tend to be especially critical of those who take a different view, particularly of friends in the hemisphere. When one adds to this widespread public ignorance of the attitudes of others, the results can be most unhappy for Canadian-American "public" relations.

11. The next step presumably will be for USA to approach other friendly governments engaged in trade with Cuba to learn whether and to what extent their trade policies can be reviewed in the light of the Punta del Este decisions.

USA AND CUBA; PRESS TREATMENT OF CANADIAN POSITION

On February 2 and 3, several newspapers carried misleading and inaccurate accounts of the Canadian position on trade with Cuba. Because of this, and as we had just received the text of the Prime Minister's statement in the House of February 2, I thought it wise to make the facts available over the weekend on as wide a basis as possible. We, therefore, prepared and issued from the Embassy the press release repeated in my telegram 327 February 3.† As you will have noted, it is based on previous official statements. Copies were taken by Embassy officers early that (Saturday) afternoon to all the wire services, the New York Times, the New York Herald Tribune (whose story that morning had been particularly inaccurate and mischievous) and the Washington Post, and delivered to all Canadian correspondents in Washington. The text was also wired for press use to all Canadian consulates in USA as well as to Ottawa.

2. A check made since has shown that the Embassy's statement was carried by UPI in USA and in Latin America, and by AP in USA. It was also carried by Reuters and by Agence France Presse. It went by special correspondent to at least one Brazilian newspaper. As is inevitably the case with such "corrections," however, it did not repeat not receive as considerable or prominent treatment as the earlier (misleading) stories.

3. On Monday, February 5, the same statement was sent by our information office to two hundred editorial writers, columnists, radio and TV commentators and Washington correspondents. Copies went to Senators and Congressmen who belong to the Canada-USA Interparliamentary Committee and to American members of the Canada-USA Committee.

While the results of this distribution cannot repeat not be expected to "make news," we believe they will be reflected over the coming weeks in editorial and other public comment.

4. We will, of course, keep you informed of any further press treatment of Canadian policies. Meantime, it is of the greatest importance in this connection that we be sent in advance or immediately on delivery (for suitable distribution) any statements made in Ottawa from official spokesmen, particularly by the Prime Minister or ministers.

TRADE WITH CUBA; CALL ON THE SECRETARY OF STATE; PUNTA DEL ESTE

In the course of a call on the Secretary yesterday afternoon, February 10, Rusk outlined for me and commented on action which USA Government had taken and proposed to take as a follow-up to the Punta del Este meeting. He recalled that, at the last NATO Ministerial meeting, he had referred to the forthcoming OAS Foreign Ministers' meeting and had expressed the hope that NATO governments would be prepared to consider the extent to which they could review their policies in the light of decisions which he then hoped would be reached at Punta del Este.

2. In referring to the further embargo action which the USA had taken following the OAS Foreign Ministers' meeting, Rusk pointed out that while this step was related to the resolution on economic relations (Resolution VIII), it had not repeat not been taken thereunder but under paragraph 3 of the Resolution dealing with security against the subversive actions of international Communism (Resolution II).<sup>4</sup> The principal motive had been to prevent USA dollar exchange obtained from Cuban exports to this country from being used for subversive purposes elsewhere in the hemisphere. Had USA-Cuban accounts been more or less in balance, he questioned whether this additional embargo measure would have been taken at all.

3. The next step which USA authorities planned, Rusk continued, would be to raise the problem of Cuba in NATO Council. There USA would propose that trade with Cuba be considered in relation to COCOM and dealt with on the same basis as trade with Soviet Bloc. USA, for its part, had in mind the addition of Cuba to the COCOM list and hoped to persuade other members of NATO to do likewise.

4. I took the opportunity of reminding the Secretary of the basis on which Canadian trade with Cuba had been for some time, and was now being, conducted. I pointed out again that it excluded military and strategic items: in addition, we did not repeat not permit any re-export from Canada of goods of USA origin. We had in fact gone beyond the Punta del Este decision on exports to Cuba.

5. Referring to special problems to be dealt with in any collective look by NATO governments at the problem of Cuban trade, Rusk said that USA wanted especially to have considered such matters as ship charters. This would affect the British, Scandinavians and perhaps the Greeks. (I did not repeat not think Canada much involved, if at all). At this time, Rusk went on, [he] had no repeat no particular request to make of Canada. He would, however, like to review with me at greater length, perhaps towards the end of next week, the whole situation post-Punta del Este and the general perspective for future relations with Cuba. Such an exchange would help to minimize any misunderstandings which might still exist between us on the Cuban question.

6. In referring to the attitudes of Latin American governments, Secretary told me that he expected that Uruguay and Chile might soon follow Argentina in breaking off diplomatic relations with Castro. Indeed Castro himself might take steps against them (though not repeat not, he thought, against Brazil or Mexico) which would precipitate rupture. Rusk emphasized, in this connection, that USA was not repeat not pushing Latin American governments in this direction. (He also referred to the difficult problem of “asylees” in Cuba now under the protection of, for example, the Argentine Embassy; some alternative arrangements would have to be made.) In passing, Rusk suggested we might think about using our Missions in Latin American capitals to explain to OAS governments policy towards Cuba, particularly with reference to trade. He thought the Canadian attitude was not repeat not understood in these countries, for example in Colombia and Venezuela.

7. Finally, the Secretary made the interesting comment that there was some evidence that Castro had sought more aid of one kind and another from Moscow than the Soviet Government were willing to give him. There were indications that Soviets were being cautious about their commitments. This conformed with what Khrushchev had said to the President at Vienna when Khrushchev had taken the line that Soviet authorities had not repeat not pushed their position in Cuba but that it had rather fallen into their lap.<sup>5</sup>

8. It now seems likely that I will be having a longer talk with Rusk towards the end of next week when I shall, of course, report fully. Meantime, if you have any points which you would wish me to make, please let me know.

PERIODIC REPORT NO. 1 OF 1962

The major development in the past quarter was the emergence of Cuba as a declared Communist state. This followed from Fidel Castro's December 1 announcement "I am and always will be a Marxist-Leninist." It is not clear why the Communist label was placed on the Cuban Revolution at that time. It is likely that following Blas Roca's and Carlos Rafael Rodríguez's visit to Moscow, the Communists demanded that Castro accept collective leadership and that he would have signed his political death warrant if he had remained a non-Marxist in a Communist-dominated politburo. An additional motive may have been the hope to force the Soviet bloc to provide greater military support against any United States or United States-supported intervention. The initial reaction in the Communist world suggests that Castro's announcement caught them by surprise, and it took some weeks for the Cubans themselves to perfect their new propaganda line.

2. Whatever the immediate explanations, Communists had clearly established a dominating position in the governing matrix which made it only a matter of time and tactics as to when the Revolution would become officially Communist. The Cuban Communists seemed pleased to be able to come out with their true colours. Efforts to train Marxist-Leninist cadres were stepped up as the Revolution moved from Castroism to Marxism. Fidel Castro was slated to become the Secretary-General of the new United Party of the Socialist Revolution but the propaganda spotlight was no longer directed solely upon his person. During the quarter Castro went an appreciable distance along the path from caudillo to chairman of the board.

3. A Communist Cuba presented an undisguised challenge to the United States and the Inter-American systems and opened a new gulf between Cuba and the Latin American republics with which it still maintained diplomatic relations. The United States was able to secure at Punta del Este at least the tacit acquiescence of the major Latin American states for the exclusion of Cuba from the Inter-American system, which they would previously have opposed. The Cubans treated Punta del Este as an American defeat, but are apprehensive as to collective measures which may be taken by the OAS and NATO in the months ahead. They remain confident that a Cuba-inspired Communist revolution will sweep Latin America but are becoming uncomfortably conscious of the obstacles in the way of revolution.

4. Cuba's economic situation worsened and Government leaders warned of a hard year ahead. Cuba suffers from the loss of middle-class technicians and professional men who have fled the country. It is difficult to re-adapt from United States to Soviet specifications and trading with the Soviet bloc demands not only long-term projection of requirements but also a willingness in many instances to accept what is offered. An additional difficulty is the 1962 sugar crop which will be well down from that of last year. Continuing shortages of basic foodstuffs and essential consumers' goods are increasingly costing the Government popular support and dampening the enthusiasm of its supporters.

5. On the other hand, the one-year crash campaign which had theoretically wiped out illiteracy in Cuba by the end of December last seems to have had at least partial success in achieving its goal, and to have been of great propaganda value both at home and abroad. The adolescents used as voluntary teachers in the countryside were given first call on the 50,000 scholarships announced by the Government at the conclusion of the literacy campaign. The houses of wealthy Cubans who had fled the country have been transformed into dormitories for scholarship-holders, who seem to enjoy the lush quarters provided for them.

6. The Government still retains the apparent backing of most of those under 25 (the prime military age), of a good proportion of the negro population, and presumably of the new managerial and Government elite; however, it is now opposed not only by the middle class but by substantial elements amongst the urban workers and the peasants. Opposition to Castro lacks any organized focus in Cuba and the conservative views of Cuban exile groups have limited political appeal within Cuba itself. Cuba now has a well-armed and well-trained professional army and this, combined with the Militia and the mass organizations which reach into every nook and cranny on the Island, probably makes the Government's position as strong as before despite its loss of public support.

CUBA; MEETING WITH SECRETARY OF STATE

You will recall (my reference telegram) that when I saw him on February 10, Secretary of State expressed the wish to see me later and at length to review with me his assessment of Punta del Este meeting and the general question of policy towards Cuba. I called on him Friday last, February 16, with Rae and Schwarzmann. We spent an hour and a quarter together.

2. Rusk began by saying that he wished to discuss Cuba with us not repeat not in the sense of a Canadian-USA problem but in terms of Canada's own policy and interest as a nation in the hemisphere. He had been wondering whether Canada had fully thought out its policy towards Cuba as such, and not repeat not merely as part of its general approach towards dealing with the Soviet Bloc. In his own judgment, the Cuban situation possessed certain special features inasmuch as it posed a threat to the whole hemisphere. The serious penetration and intrusion of the Castro régime into the affairs of other Latin American countries (which admitted of no repeat no doubt) was of special concern. Rusk was prepared to furnish us with detailed information of subversive and violent actions in various countries (Rusk gave as an example the recent bomb attempt on President Betancourt of which USA intelligence sources in Cuba and USA had been able to warn the Venezuelans in advance). There was also substantial documentary evidence of subversive activities on the part of Cuban embassies throughout Latin America. Even during the Punta del Este Conference various delegations had provided information about such difficulties, which were causing concern among them. The French had recently brought to the attention of USA the threat of illicit arms-running from Cuba into the French West Indies. It was for such reasons, Rusk concluded, that the present Cuban régime was thus not repeat not a purely Cuban domestic phenomenon but rather a "conspiracy" affecting the rest of the hemisphere. He thought that Canada would wish to examine and weigh all these ramifications of the Cuban situation since he felt sure that "in the battle for the Western Hemisphere" Canada and USA were on the same side.

3. Secretary then went on to review the history of USA and OAS relations with the Castro régime from its early days. One could ask whether any other policies could have been pursued; the record would show that repeated efforts had been made at solution, but they had met with little response from Cuba. He had, he went on, been particularly impressed by the much greater awareness of the danger and urgency of the situation among other Latin American countries at Punta del Este. It was true that six countries had abstained on two paragraphs of the resolution for Cuba's expulsion. USA delegation (contrary to much public report) had not repeat not exerted great pressure on these delegations to vote in favour; indeed, USA had felt that this would not repeat not be wise because of internal elements within these countries, which made abstention a better and safer course for them. It would be recalled that Colombia had put the Cuban issue before the OAS Council. This had been done without consulting USA on the timing. Rusk thought that, considering the internal situations in some of the Latin American countries, USA would not repeat not in fact have picked this particular time for bringing the OAS Foreign Ministers together. However, while the timing had not repeat not been ideal, the results, in the USA view, had been helpful. Here, for example, Rusk contrasted Mexico's constructive attitude at Punta del Este with that it had taken at San José only some six months before: "an extraordinary change." Though they had some concern as to the legal implications of the resolution on expulsion, the Mexican delegation had been very firm on the question of the incompatibility of the Castro régime with the American system. This increased awareness on the part of Mexico of the problems posed by Cuba had developed quite independently of any pressure from USA.

4. Reviewing the voting on the Punta del Este resolutions, Secretary pointed out that the countries most anxious to take firm action had been those which were experiencing special pressures from Cuba (the Central American countries, Colombia, Venezuela, Peru and Paraguay). From USA point of view, the most important delegations at the conference were not repeat not those of the largest countries but from those which were under direct attack. USA would have derived little comfort from favourable votes by the larger and more distant countries if those under more immediate Cuban pressure had felt the OAS indifferent to their plight. It was also misleading to judge the results of the OAS votes on a population basis. In any event, Rusk concluded, it was not repeat not irrelevant that Punta del Este was an OAS Conference, and the population of USA could hardly be excluded in the count.

5. Secretary then went on to other aspects of the general problem. Cuban medium-range stations were now jamming domestic USA broadcasts in Spanish, from radio stations in Florida and Louisiana, directed to Cuban refugees in these areas. This appeared to be in contravention of international radio regulations although he was not repeat not clear what could be done about it. Another example of Cuban intervention was that Castro was putting strong pressure on Haiti by threatening to repatriate tens of thousands of Haitians living in Cuba (of whom there were some 300,000). All in all, the present Cuban Government on its behaviour must be regarded as an "activist régime" intervening beyond its borders; there was, indeed, plenty of evidence that many of the Cuban leaders were not repeat not so much interested in governing their own country as in using it as a jumping-off place for greater adventures outside.

6. USA Administration was convinced, Secretary continued, that Castroism was not repeat not the answer to the problems of the hemisphere. Over the long term this would become fully apparent but, in the meantime, USA proposed to make this clear by pursuing vigorously and simultaneously two complementary policies: on the one hand, to press forward with the Alliance for Progress to assist the other Latin American countries to strengthen their economies; on the other, to take steps to ensure so far as possible that nothing was done to contribute to the strength of the Cuban economy. In USA view, it was very important that the whole problem should be dealt with on a multilateral rather than a unilateral basis. It was for this reason that USA had wanted it brought into the OAS framework. Cuba had become a major preoccupation in the minds of USA public and of the Congress and was in danger of affecting USA policies and relations in other areas. Some Congressmen were already asking why USA should be worrying about such places as Southeast Asia with the Cuban problem on their own doorstep. Cuba was also affecting the attitude of other countries towards USA (possible German doubts as to the strength of purpose of USA on Berlin if unable to deal firmly with Cuba). There was also the prospect of growing difficulties and irritations within the Western Alliance unless the Cuban problem could be dealt with effectively. In the Secretary's view, NATO should not repeat not look on Cuba as just "another member of the bloc," but the NATO countries should be aware of the special features of the Cuban situation and its repercussions within the Western Hemisphere.

7. In view of all these factors, Secretary continued, he would welcome, at our convenience, detailed discussions between Canadian and USA authorities. USA wanted to have a clear indication of how we appraised the Cuban problem in relation to the hemisphere, and in relation to Canada. They would be interested to know how we assessed the situation, looking at it from our own point of view and in terms of our own policies and interests; and also what we would consider to be the best response to it. Personally, Rusk thought, there might be certain items in the ledger which we might not repeat not have fully totted up so far, probably because we had not repeat not felt it necessary to do so.

8. Secretary then referred to Khrushchev's attitude towards Cuba. As he had said earlier, it was clear that the Cuban situation had not repeat not been deliberately engineered by the Soviets but rather had "fallen into their lap." Nevertheless, Khrushchev was, to a limited extent, willing to use Cuba to exploit existing dangers in the hemisphere. USA intended to make Soviet efforts as unpromising as possible and as costly as possible.

9. There were other points of view, Rusk went on, how best to deal with the Cuban situation. For example, Brazil had put forward a proposal to "negotiate" conditions of co-existence between Castro and the OAS; if the minimum conditions were not repeat not met, then military measures were to be taken by the organization. USA did not repeat not think this a sound approach, for (a) they did not repeat not accept that the present Cuban régime was a permanent situation and (b) it could lead to military measures which would be costly and unsatisfactory in many ways. Incidentally, USA had been keeping a careful watch on the military position in Cuba. There was no repeat no evidence of missile bases or of "modern (meaning nuclear) weapons." Cuba was now receiving fairly modern aircraft and torpedo boats which would have nuisance value and would require careful handling. But there was no repeat no evidence of any military build-up in Cuba which could pose a threat to USA itself.

10. Secretary then repeated his hope that, in the circumstances, as he had outlined them, we would wish to reconsider the Canadian long-range interest and the measures best calculated to protect the Canadian interest. So far as any formal USA approach was concerned, he was quite aware (as I had pointed out) that existing Canadian policy on exports to Cuba already went as far as the OAS resolution with regard to items on the COCOM list; USA was not repeat not asking its friends to go much further on export restrictions, although naturally if we wished to broaden our administrative interpretation of strategic items, this would be welcome. USA authorities believed that Canadian strategic controls (within their limits) were effective, though there had been some talk of evasion of our prohibition of re-export of USA-origin goods. (At this point I interjected that I would be surprised if our controls on USA items were being evaded since our licensing arrangements, as I understood it, were being strictly applied on all goods not repeat not of Canadian origin. I agreed, however, that it was important to ensure that USA were left in no repeat no doubt on this; Canadian authorities should be given promptly any information of alleged evasion which might come to USA attention. Rusk said he would have the USA Embassy in Ottawa check into this matter with Canadian officials and you will no repeat no doubt want to follow this up.)

11. Apart from the strictly strategic items, the Secretary continued, there were certain other things, for example in the "key spare parts" category, included in recent Canadian exports.

These could contribute to strengthening or maintaining the Cuban economy. President Dorticós of Cuba had boasted (at Punta del Este, I gathered) that, while spare parts had been a problem, this was no repeat no longer so since “a daily plane” now brought them to Cuba from Canada. USA was not repeat not now asking Canada to take any further steps (and Rusk emphasized this); the question was “whether Canada feels that it is in the long run to Canadian advantage to let the Cuban régime be supplied with such items on a normal basis.” Rusk had with him a detailed list of Canadian exports (over, I think, the first nine months of last year – our latest figures); he indicated that out of the $21 million total, some $6 million covered items which the USA would consider, in their definition, “strategic” or border-line.

12. The Secretary then went on to say that, in USA view, the objective of policy was not repeat not to overthrow the Castro régime but rather to isolate Cuba and deny it the means of strengthening its economy, and thus of extending its influence and subversive activity over the rest of the hemisphere. Canada might wish “to take a look at those things which might affect the success of the régime in Cuba, because this has a direct effect on its influence in Latin America.” He was not repeat not suggesting what particular means Canadian authorities might see fit to employ; we would make our own appraisal of the facts and our own judgment as to what we thought might be appropriate and effective in the serious situation confronting the hemisphere. As a theoretical example, the Canadian Government might decide that the best contribution Canada could make would be to send “one or two destroyers” to the Caribbean to help prevent Cuban arms going to Central American countries. Czech agents were being used by the Cubans in Latin America; they might be free to travel back and forth via Canada (presumably on Czech or Cuban airlines). These were merely illustrations of possible avenues. The two important questions to be considered were (a) suitable measures to prevent or limit the export of revolution in the hemisphere and (b) suitable measures to prevent, or minimize, Castro’s domestic success; at the same time, positive steps to demonstrate that Castroism was not repeat not the answer to Latin American problems.

13. Secretary went on to say that USA was proposing to discuss Cuba in NATO with particular reference to COCOM. In USA view, however, the position of Canada in this matter was different from that of other NATO allies; as a country in the Western Hemisphere, we had a special relationship to this difficult problem and the USA would be grateful for “a clear analytical statement” of Canadian views and policy after we had reviewed the situation. He would be interested in knowing first of all whether the Canadian Government accepted USA appreciation of the gravity of the Cuban problem and also in our assessment of the situation as seen from the point of view of another country in the hemisphere, directly interested and affected by developments. In appraising Canadian interests, Canada must, of course, take into account its relations with USA, although it was not repeat not in this context that our views were being sought. At the same time, he was, of course, anxious to minimize tensions between us on this subject. The whole matter was of such importance that it should, he felt, be discussed frankly and fully between us.

14. Because of their importance, I have reported Rusk’s views fully and consecutively in a conversation which lasted well over an hour. Although for the most part I listened, I did take the opportunity at the end, and in interjections, to make a number of points which might be summarized briefly as follows:

(1) The distinction in the traditional Canadian position deriving from our history and the absence of any commitment to “the Inter-American system”; this gave us in Canada a quite different view of the Monroe doctrine, for example, and a different perspective from that of the OAS countries.

(2) Our action with respect to exports to Cuba was taken two years in advance of the OAS resolutions and, so far as I knew, was more restrictive than that of any other NATO ally and most, if not repeat not all, Latin American countries.

(3) The general Canadian (as compared to USA) policy with respect to diplomatic representation and normal trade contacts with governments of whose systems we totally disapproved.

15. Nevertheless, I did, I said, agree with Secretary that we should continue to share our factual information on the Cuban situation and our assessments and appreciations of Cuban intentions. In drawing conclusions from the facts, I observed, there might continue to be differing views on the two sides of the border. But this did not repeat not mean that we should not repeat not, as he suggested, exchange information and consult with our usual [frankness?] and intimacy.

CUBA: MEETING WITH SECRETARY OF STATE

I attach copy of telegram no. 515 of February 19, 1962 in which the Canadian Ambassador in Washington reports on his conversation of Friday, February 16, 1962 with the United States Secretary of State. You will see that Mr. Rusk suggests that Canada should re-examine her policy vis-à-vis Cuba. His request is based essentially on the consideration that Cuba's case cannot be assimilated to that of any other member of the communist bloc, since it is situated in the Western Hemisphere of which Canada forms part. The Secretary of State underlined the subversive aspects of Cuban policies which in his view constitute a real threat to the Americas. He suggested that our policies be reconsidered with a view to ascertaining whether they meet the two objectives set out as a result of United States appraisal of the Cuban problem, namely (1) preventing the export of Castroism to other parts of the Hemisphere and (2) preventing or minimizing Castro's success at home by suitable measures.

2. It would be appreciated if you could provide us with your views on the general problem of Canadian relations with Cuba in the light of Mr. Rusk's approach, the results of the second Punta del Este Conference, and of Canada's general interests in the country to which you are accredited. We would appreciate receiving a brief report by cable as soon as possible. More detailed comments should be sent by bag.

3. The attached telegram is for your own information. You will note that this letter is marked for Canadian Eyes Only. In view of their sensitive character you will wish to ensure that appropriate security measures concerning these documents are observed.

CUBA – TRADE POLICY

The following is an attempt to recapitulate the views expressed by the Minister in two long discussions on our trade policy towards Cuba – a policy with which the Minister is anything but satisfied at the moment.

2. The Minister broached the subject shortly after the Opposition had raised questions in the House concerning reports that Canada was continuing to export to Cuba substantial quantities of materials which bordered on the strategic category.<sup>6</sup> He strongly believed that the continued export of commodities of this nature was steadily leading Canada into a serious crisis in relations with the United States.

3. The Minister stressed that we had to recognize that whatever the rights or wrongs of American policy may have been and however responsible the U.S. Government might be for the present state of affairs in their relations with Cuba, the fact remained that the Cuban problem had thoroughly aroused public and Congressional opinion in the U.S.A. It was therefore of the utmost importance that we cease treating the Cuban problem as simply one of trade or of relations with Cuba but rather as a highly sensitive issue in Canada/U.S. relations. It was “the most serious problem in this category since he had assumed office, one which might do irreparable harm to our relations with the United States if we did not amend our policy and might even lead the United States to take retaliatory action against us in other fields.”

4. He declared that the strong stand he had personally taken on Cuba two years ago had been unwise; even if it had had some merit at the time, the situation in Cuba had changed radically since. The Cuban régime had been getting progressively more communist-oriented and he had satisfied himself during his Latin American tour in 1960 that there was good evidence of Cuban subversive activities in several of the countries he visited, particularly in Argentina and Peru. It was moreover not enough in his view, for Canada to apply the same trade restrictions to Cuba as we did to other communist states. Because this was a hemispheric problem, for the containment of which we had to share responsibility, more stringent criteria had to be applied. He believed we would lose stature in Latin America if we took a soft line on Cuba.

5. The time had come to review the whole question of our relations with Cuba, approaching it from the point of view of our relations with the United States. In this connection he said it would be pointless to begin by analyzing in detail and challenging the view expressed by Rusk to Heeney as reported in Washington telegram 515 of February 19. By and large he agreed with Rusk's assessment. In any event the important point to keep in mind was not whether the American arguments were valid or U.S.A. policies sensible but the strength with which American views on Cuba were held throughout the United States.

See Canada, House of Commons, Debates, 1962, Vol. I, pp. 575, 759, 881-882, 897-900, 909-912, 949-963.

6. In developing a revised approach to the problem of our trade relations with Cuba, action was required on three fronts:

(1) Commodity Control List

A minimum shift in the Canadian position must be the elimination of "border line" strategic commodities. The embargoed list should include everything that could be considered as military, strategic or vital to the Cuban economy. It would include industrial dynamite, aircraft engines, machine spares, transformers, iron and steel, etc.

(2) Public Presentation of Canadian Policy

In this field a great deal more restraint is required. There is a need to abandon the aggressive and almost boastful way in which Canada has dealt publicly with its relations with Cuba and with its right to continue to trade with that country. The Minister stressed that in dollar terms trade with Cuba was negligible and certainly not worth preserving at the risk of jeopardizing our relations with the United States.

(3) Cabinet Attitudes

Here the Minister thought there was a great need for the Department to start the process of persuading Government departments and Ministers to see Canadian Cuba policy in a broader context than that of trade statistics or even the national right to determine Canadian trade policy free from external pressures. There had to be a new emphasis on the magnitude of the crisis we were facing in Canada/U.S. relations, an emphasis which the Minister thought had been lacking in previous memoranda dealing with the Cuba problem.

7. In further discussions with the Minister concerning the manner in which his views might best be implemented, in the course of which some of the considerations militating against any sudden switch in policy were brought out, he agreed that his intention was not to reverse Canadian policy but to modify it, and then perhaps only gradually. Nevertheless, he insisted that we were vulnerable on the question of the commodities now being permitted for export to Cuba (Senator Croll in the Senate on February 21 and the latest issue of U.S. News and World Report are cases in point) and requested as a first step a paper from the Department examining in detail the commodities now being exported to Cuba and proposing measures for a tightening of control. If necessary, he said we should proceed by Order-in-Council to further limit permissible items.

8. It would then be his intention to put to Cabinet a proposal for more stringent export controls and in the same memorandum to stress, for the benefit of his Cabinet colleagues, the extent of the crisis in Canada/U.S. relations which we face. He would at the same time put it to Cabinet that we should accept Mr. Rusk's invitation to discuss Cuba policy on a bilateral basis, but should be ready to do so in a sympathetic, frank and friendly way.

9. Just prior to his departure for the East coast, the Minister discussed Cuba policy with the Prime Minister. He said the Prime Minister agreed that while we could not back down on the stand we had taken we certainly should be more discreet in the public handling of the subject.

CUBA POLICY

It seems to me that serious consideration might well be given to a further comprehensive exposition of Canadian policy with respect to Cuba. I mentioned this in conversations with the Minister and the Under-Secretary, when I was in Ottawa on Monday last, as most desirable in terms of our relations with USA, if for no repeat no other reason.

2. It is true that there have already been a number of statements by Prime Minister in Parliament and by others in the House and elsewhere. Nevertheless, there persists in the USA a widespread misunderstanding of and, even where the facts are known, an inability to comprehend our present policy and practice, particularly with regard to trade but also generally concerning our relations with the Castro régime. We attempted to set the record straight by a press release from the Embassy on February 5 and this has been very widely used by our offices in this country. However, public understanding here has been further aroused and confused by the most recently published details of our exports and the questions to which these gave rise in Parliament on such items as "peaceful" explosives, machinery, aircraft engines, etc.

3. Our current scan of USA newspaper opinion will show a marked increase of critical editorial comment upon what continues to be regarded widely as our virtually unrestricted trade with Cuba. I would be surprised if the intended mission to promote export of Canadian fish products did not repeat not occasion further outbursts.

4. What I have in mind is that, following upon my long conversation with the Secretary of State (my reference telegram) and after reviewing the position in the light of such additional information as may be provided us by USA and after a careful scrutiny of our list of permissible exports (which I understand to be underway now) there should be an extended and authoritative statement of Canadian policy, probably in Parliament and by Prime Minister himself.

5. I am bound, of course, to look at this problem primarily in terms of our relations with this country. As I tried to emphasize in my talks with the Prime Minister, the Minister and officials in Ottawa earlier this week, there is no repeat no doubt that, quite irrespective of the merits, Cuba continues to cast a deepening shadow upon our reputation here. The whole question is deeply emotional among Americans; their attitude is rooted in their history and their frustration compounded by the very mistakes of the recent and less recent past. The clumsy publicity which attended the efforts of the Administration to obtain support from their European allies,<sup>7</sup> far from advancing their case, bids fair to being counterproductive as the reaction in NATO has shown. This will mean more frustration, and judgment, which may extend to affairs beyond the hemisphere, will, I am afraid, continue to be clouded by emotion. In such circumstances, and despite what we regard as a reasonable, cooperative and realistic attitude on our part, Americans will go on expecting Canada to be closer to them than any other ally, even in this hemisphere, and will continue to be disappointed, hurt and even angry when we do not repeat not share their views and follow in their footsteps.

6. What I am trying to say is not repeat not that USA policy on Cuba is correct or calculated to achieve its objective; the arguments against the efficacy of trade embargoes and breaking diplomatic relations are well known and I have made them here many times in public and in private, nor am I suggesting any important change in our own policy. What I am seeking to convey is the pervasive importance of the Cuban problem in terms of our relations with our closest ally and making a suggestion as to how the traditionally friendly Canadian "image" among Americans might be restored.

7. Finally, and on a less exalted plane, it seems altogether likely that the Cubans will have less and less hard currency to pay for Canadian exports which, in any conceivable future circumstances, cannot repeat not be very large. On the other hand, our reputation with our largest customer is of material commercial importance.

CANADA-CUBAN RELATIONS

It seems to me that some of elements of problem in brief are

(a) Cuba will be principally Communist until present government or its similar successor falls.

(b) Cubans are both activists and a symbol making them a grave danger to Latin American political stability but at the same time they have salutary policy acting as a goad, if anything can, to reform.

(c) Menace to Latin America is increased since USSR and China have been provided with a base for information and an agent through which they can operate. The minority bloc is therefore most unlikely to allow Cuban economy to collapse.

(d) West will be loser if USA becomes increasingly preoccupied for a protracted period with Cuban problem.

2. I see problem as being important chiefly in the light of Canada-USA relations. The latter who is our most important ally is of course highly emotional about Cuba and I wonder therefore whether for partly psychological and self-advantageous reasons we might not repeat not consider stiffening (group corrupt) our attitude towards Cuba by e.g. broadening definition of strategic materials and deprecating publicly (group corrupt) aspects of régime. Our non-membership in OAS does not repeat not seem to me to be material: Cuba is a base for subversion and it is not repeat not in our interest or that of West to have this additional constant threat to political stability hanging over Latin America nor to have attention of USA diverted from more vital areas. Of course whatever we do one way or other will have a minimal effect on political stability of Cuban régime but as long as latter continues to meddle in affairs of its neighbours I think we have grounds for attempting to avoid giving appearance of supporting it.

3. My thinking on this subject has shifted recently through receipt of a congratulatory letter on Canada's stand on Cuba from 15 prominent Ecuadorian Communists or Communist sympathisers (attached [to] my letter 5 February 27†). In logic I support cogent argument for trade with countries of differing ideologies; I (fear?) in this instance that in Ecuador Canadian trade with Cuba is generally being equated with political support. The Foreign Ministry does not repeat not accept this but referred to our increasing trade (second paragraph of its release on Sévigny statement; [see] my telegram 7 February 11†). There could be some danger in this if impression were to grow here that we are profiting by USA embargo. I doubt however that whatever we do will greatly affect Canada's relations with Ecuador.

CANADIAN RELATIONS WITH CUBA

Following is view of Buenos Aires and Montevideo. Continuance of our present Cuban policy is likely to do more harm than good to fundamental Canadian interest, partly because (it is?) misunderstood and partly because it is no repeat no longer appropriate. Reiteration of our present policy is not repeat not likely to be generally effective in dispelling widespread impression repeat impression Canada's sympathies are with Cuba in its difference with USA and other Hemisphere states. If we are to retain goodwill of USA and of responsible elements in Latin America, some gesture is needed to alter the current image. Unless it is altered our trade with USA e.g. oil could be adversely affected purely as a result of Congress attitudes. No repeat no serious effect on trade of other countries likely for moment.

2. Secondly, our policy does provide aid and comfort to Cuba which (2 groups corrupt) many Latin American states consider constitutes a threat to their security and which all consider incompatible with Inter-American system. Cubans are misrepresenting their relation with Canada in order to encourage other Latin American countries to stand up to USA and also to poison relations between USA and Canada.

3. Third, Cuban Communist threat is more serious throughout Latin America than that of any other Communist country. "Viva Castro" still draws crowds. "Viva Khrushchev" or "Viva Ulbricht" has little appeal. This fact justifies different treatment on our part.

4. What to do is difficult. Answer might be to announce although not repeat not member of OAS we have no repeat no desire to do anything in current situation which would have effect (group corrupt) even in part objectives of majority number and that we would favourably consider taking whatever steps majority took in matters relating to Cuba. This might require minor policy changes but would provide gesture which present situation appears to call for.

5. Any such move on our part should not repeat not weaken [reputation] we enjoy in Latin America of independence in foreign affairs, and could gain us marks for cooperation.

CUBA

Apparently only first seven pages Washington's telegram 515 February 19 were attached your letter. Would appreciate receiving final page or pages in next bag.

2. Keeping in mind our interest both commercial and political in maintaining long-term stability in all countries of Latin America, I am inclined to see some merit in Rusk's analysis. I would balk at such an overt move as sending destroyer to Caribbean. Castro's propagandists have been taking advantage of our imaginary support of present Cuban régime (e.g. Dorticós' statement re daily plane from Canada with spare parts), and there might be some value in a statement reiterating, as did all nations in Americas including those who abstained on exclusion resolution, our strong opposition to Communism as exemplified in Cuba. Concept of controlling trade for political ends is of course one which both sides in Cold War have accepted for many years. The principle involved in interference for political reasons with our natural flow of trade with Cuba is clearly not repeat not at stake since, through control of strategic goods and re-exporting of USA products, we are already carrying out such intervention. Question must resolve itself then into whether commercial advantages to Canada of that portion of Canada's trade with Cuba which USA and presumably its Latin American allies find objectionable is worth adverse publicity which we are receiving in such Latin American states as Colombia, and in USA itself.

3. With regard to latter, I understand that at recent conference of Canadian Trade Commissioners serving in USA some concern was expressed over cool attitude engendered towards Canada in some parts of that country by "misunderstanding" of our position on Cuba. I do not repeat not think we should delude ourselves into thinking problem is merely one of "misunderstanding." Basic difference in policy on Cuban question exists between USA and ourselves and this fact cannot repeat not be concealed.

4. Second Punta del Este Conference showed an increased awareness in Latin America of threats posed by Communist Cubans in marked contrast, as Mr. Rusk pointed out, to San José meeting six months earlier. The willingness of even Mexico and Brazil to support what amounted to a vigorous condemnation of Cuba's Communist ties appears to represent a hardening in positions of those two countries. While from USA standpoint conference might conceivably have had a more favourable result, many valid reasons exist for State Department to be satisfied with achievement of USA delegation in Punta del Este.

5. In view of previous reports to you, especially in our telegram 15 February 26, † you will be aware that a change in our policy toward Cuba would much improve our standing with Colombia Government and business community. Colombians have become to a degree emotionally concerned with Cuban question, partly because of fear of Communist subversion and partly because of involvement of their prestige in outcome of conference. Canada's position finds support here, and that not repeat not very vocal, only among left-wing Liberals and Communists, neither of which groups is likely to be running the Government for some time to come. Speaking therefore in terms of Colombia alone, Canada might be well advised to enlarge list of goods which for strategic reasons may not repeat not be exported to Cuba. Although complete approval of Canada's policy by Colombia would probably only be forthcoming if we broke relations with Cuba entirely, any gesture on our part in this direction would help our reputation here.

CANADIAN CUBAN RELATIONS

As a useful starting point for this review I am summarizing below main direct Canadian interests in Cuba today

(a) Trade: In 1961 our favourable balance of trade was substantial and represented cash in hand and for some sectors of economy an increase in normal exports. However 1962 trade is likely to be drastically reduced owing to Cuba's shortage of foreign exchange and reduced sugar available for export unless Russians provide considerable quantity of convertible currency. In addition some of last year's items are probably a non-continuing requirement.

(b) Commercial Interests: Our banks have apparently been satisfactorily recompensed. Our insurance companies with no repeat no future in present day Cuba would not repeat not be severely hurt by nationalization, which would enable them to withdraw without breaking faith with their policy holders. Our remaining interests of some half dozen subsidiaries facing (group corrupt) represent an investment of $500,000 at most.

(c) Church: Compensation of Church property nationalized last year does not repeat not appear to be an active issue since Church is essentially playing a waiting game with a view to a subsequent changing government.

(d) Protection of Canadian Citizens: The majority of Canadians have left Cuba, with total now reduced to under ninety. About half are members of religious orders whose positions have been improved by recent (softening?) in Cuban line toward Vatican. All our citizens have recourse to Embassy's assistance periodically and would be dependent on mission in an emergency.

(e) Mission: Apart from regular operations mission has value as a listening post. Any Canadian influence in moderating the trend of Cuban development is minimal.

2. The next consideration is our relations with USA, on which it is not repeat not my position to comment. Despite Mr. Rusk's demurrer that this was not repeat not the sense in which he was raising question of Canadian policy towards Cuba, it is presumably a major factor from our standpoint.

3. Turning to Rusk's general appraisal of Cuban problem I would agree that Cuba cannot repeat not fairly be viewed as just another star in Soviet constellation. First it represents initial intrusion of the Bloc into a Western area and specifically an American spherical influence as well as a potential threat of deeper intrusion into Latin America. The Cuban Government has thrown its lot in with the Bloc and must stand by this decision to maintain itself in power. Moreover, given way in which revolution has developed the country's racial associations and unnatural pattern of its present ties, Cuba has a vested interest in breaking through its present hemispheric isolation which has been stimulated by its exclusion from OAS. As reported in my telegram 24 March 2, † (all?) energy is therefore directed to promoting tension if not repeat not revolution in its sister republics and speaking to Latin American people over heads of their governments. It badly needs ideological allies in Latin America to ensure its durability just as it equally must maintain image of a voracious wolf on its doorstep to divert attention from domestic ills. The concept of withdrawing from Hemisphere and creating a Communist show of peace in isolation is politically too costly and difficult to sustain in present straits and furthermore caters to (group corrupt) idea of revolutionary leader.

4. One can accept the two objectives of USA policy outlined by Rusk even though harbouring doubt as to some of the measures employed to achieve them. Both as a Western and North American nation we can hardly be indifferent to spread of Communist influence in Caribbean. Also now that Cuba has presumably cast the die for Marxism and so closely oriented itself with Sino-Soviet Bloc I do not repeat not see it as in our interest to extend any aid or comfort to them. A related point is question of USA prestige in hemisphere which was particularly damaged by April fiasco leaving impression in some quarters that eagle had lost its claws. Thus it seems to me (plainly?) our interests [lie] in cooperating whenever possible with reasonable USA objectives.

5. Another factor bearing on our policy is question of stability of Castro régime. There is little doubt that Cuba is in serious economic difficulties which are likely to worsen before they improve. The revolution has lost some of its steam. The marriage between Castro and Communism has already run into trouble. As circumstances of life have deteriorated dissatisfaction has grown. The possibility that present government might later begin to stumble, perhaps also creating condition for USA intervention, cannot repeat not be ruled out. Furthermore although Rusk has talked about reducing effectiveness of government, he has also indicated that coexistence with Cuba is unacceptable. One cannot repeat not help but wonder whether USA intends if conditions are propitious to adopt a more forceful policy. Should revolution prove to be short lived then there is some advantage in ensuring we are not repeat not albeit mistakenly regarded as having prolonged its existence by those who follow.

6. In general and depending particularly upon weight given Canadian-USA relations my feeling would be that Canadian policy could afford to reflect somewhat more emphatically the liability of Cuban situation. Certainly our direct national interest in Cuba need not repeat not place any great restraint on such a policy modification. However I remain unconvinced that there is anything very decisive we could do to influence course of events here. Essentially it comes down to a shift in emphasis without engaging in any form of open antagonistic act which would be counter-productive if we wish to maintain diplomatic relations and protect our residual interest in Cuba.

7. Trade would appear to be one field for effecting some modification. While recognizing that practical results would be very limited we could with some justification and for presentational reasons place Cuba in same category as other Sino Soviet Bloc states for export control purposes. We might also be a little more restrictive in denying permits for quasi-strategic items such as industrial spare parts. Again a case could be made for our prohibiting re-export to USA of Cuban imports into Canada now that USA has embargo on such imports.

8. One can appreciate Rusk's desire for Canada to have a community of views with USA on a hemispheric problem that has in due course wide implications. However I am not repeat not certain it necessarily follows that our policy toward Cuba should be identical or in fact that this would be in our or America's best interests. While agreeing on desirability of not repeat not contributing to strength of revolution and containing its expansionist tendencies there is a risk that any indication of ganging-up on the part of Western states only enables Cuban government to blame domestic failings on outside pressure.

CUBA – MEETING WITH SECRETARY OF STATE

It can be agreed with Mr. Rusk that Canada shares with USA the ultimate aim of encouraging Latin America to develop in democratic tradition and to remain outside Soviet orbit. It may be also agreed that Canada as a western hemisphere nation has a special interest in obligations in Latin America. It is in assessing Cuban and Latin American situation and means likely to achieve our commonly sought objectives that Canada differs with USA. It is suggested here however that while Mr. Rusk's presentation of USA views and policy contains nothing to justify a fundamental change in Canadian Cuban-Latin American policy, the time may be opportune for a shift in emphasis of that policy, especially in view of Mr. Rusk's indirect emphasis on importance of some such Canadian effort in broader context of USA-Canadian relations.

2. Before proceeding to suggestions for a possible positive response to Mr. Rusk's approach three fundamental points may be explored:

(a) Is Mr. Rusk's analysis of Cuban problem and defined USA policy objectively convincing?

(b) Can Punta del Este results be interpreted as confirming soundness of current USA-Cuban policy?

(c) Would it be in Canada's interest in Chile to follow USA line?

3. USA-Cuban Policy Objective

Mr. Rusk stated by isolating Cuba and denying it means of strengthening its economy USA aims to prevent extension of Cuban influence and subversive activities throughout Latin America until Alliance for Progress takes effect. In connection with these objectives I should like to make following comments:

(a) Cuba cannot repeat not be fully isolated politically or economically from West and not repeat not at all from Soviet Bloc. To extent however that Cuban economic relations with West are cut off they increase with East not repeat not only in trade but in aid as well. It is obviously in Soviet interest to grant economic concessions to Cuba on a massive scale in order to build up Cuba as a growth model for Latin America. Is it impossible as Mr. Rusk assumes, for Cuba to achieve economic success in these circumstances? Surely the adverse political consequences in Latin America flowing from such a development would be infinitely greater than those resulting from Cuban penetration and subversive activities.

(b) The basic tenet of USA Alliance for Progress programme is that unless Latin America introduces fiscal economic and social reforms, liberalizes their regimes and redistributes incomes in favour of depressed classes, Communist forces in many of their countries could ultimately gain power. USA-Cuban policy on the other hand is forcing progressive and non-Communist left forces who share this view and whose support is necessary if Alliance reforms are to be implemented, to align themselves with Castro for domestic political reasons. This fundamental contradiction in USA policy seriously weakens prospects for successful Alliance programme and at the same time is so alienating [to] political forces which will (advance?) to power in event of programme's failure that USA could soon find itself cut from some key countries in Latin America as a result. We have pointed out for example that such a left wing element could come to power in Chile in 1964.

(c) While sympathizing with USA desire to counteract threat of Cuban penetration, I believe it is a mistake to assign more importance to propaganda and penetration than to the cause of the great receptivity in Latin America to Cuban propaganda and Cuban example. "Sanitary" measures alone will not repeat not root out existing pro-Castro elements in Latin America. As for other forms of Cuban intervention, e.g. Rusk's example of Castro's pressure on Haiti by threatening repatriation of thousands of Haitians – surely USA approach encourages rather than discourages this form of pressure?

4. Second Punta del Este Conference

It is difficult to share Mr. Rusk's views that Conference results indicates substantial Latin American support for USA-Cuban policy:

(a) Whatever ingenious construction is put on vote at Punta del Este, the fact remains that key governments chose to abstain on expulsion.

(b) It is remarkable that in his approach to us Rusk chose to emphasize desire for further sanctions while failing to mention that support for this existing USA policy was so obviously lacking at Conference it was not repeat not even introduced for formal discussion.

(c) Rusk's remarks imply that stand taken by most Latin American countries at Punta del Este was spontaneous. Whatever restraint USA delegation may have exercised was probably related to tactical considerations since both Colombia and Peru were doing the running for USA. Chilean delegation for one (see my despatch 48 February 12†) returned with impression that USA pressure was a factor at Punta del Este.

(d) USA spokesmen are (paragraph 2b Washington telegram 398 February 9†) on extremely shaky ground when they say if not repeat not for (divergent juridical?) approach there would have been a larger degree of unanimity of views on Cuba at Punta del Este collusion [sic]. Chile was one of countries that used legal argument at Punta del Este collusion [sic] but only because they provided an easy and tactical attractive presentation to a touchy political case.

5. Canadian Interest in Chile

Canada maintains a small but significant trade relationship with Chile. Canadian missionary activities, capital investment and ECIC backed loan in Chile must also be taken into account. Canada also has an interest in maintaining cooperative relationship enjoyed with Chile in international forums such as UN. The best protection for these interests in the long run would be afforded if Chile remains outside Soviet orbit. At the same time it would be in Canada's best interest in Chile to align itself with Chilean-Latin American view on such divisive issue as that of Cuba when it is doubtful that USA views command general support in area. In Chile specifically the line pursued by government regarding Cuba is identical to that followed by Canada. This will remain so in the predictable future in addition to which there is a strong possibility that a left-wing coalition more sympathetic to Cuban régime might come to power in 1964.

6. Possible Positive Response

Mr. Rusk's approach to us makes propitious the consideration of a shift in emphasis in a policy which would render it both more acceptable to USA and perhaps more fully consistent to Canada's assessment of the Latin American situation and its ultimate aim in the area. The following suggested points contain two elements which might be registered as contributing to such a shift of emphasis:

(1) Continue to observe control on strategic goods and transshipment of USA goods to Cuba. Canada might also offer to participate in other security arrangements within limits of our traditional approach to such questions. I might note that, according to Argentina's Ambassador here, USA is considering possibility of a SEATO type Caribbean treaty organization. Canada could hardly agree to participate in such a pact. However consideration might be given to Canada's participation in a less formal hemispheric arrangement designed to control illegal transshipment of arms in Caribbean.

(2) Canada might offer to participate in any arrangement ultimately decided upon by OAS to counteract Communist penetration and propaganda activities.

(3) Finally, to be consistent with our assessment that social and economic development in Latin American countries is ultimately the only effective antidote to Cuban threat, Canada might offer to commit itself to objectives of the Alliance for Progress programme. This would certainly involve a Canadian aid contribution to the effort although not repeat not necessarily affiliated directly with Alliance for Progress. Specifically I would think that a substantial contribution to the Inter-American Development Bank would be simplest and most effective form in which Canada could make this contribution (see paragraph 17 my despatch 189 May 30/61). The overall effect of a Canadian policy debate on above line would be to commit ourselves publicly and in practical terms to ultimate aims in Latin America identical to those expressed by USA. To this extent, we would be demonstrating to USA and to Latin America our fundamental solidarity with USA despite our difference of views on trade with Cuba and as well our determination to follow our independent concept of how best to achieve these aims.<sup>8</sup>

CANADIAN RELATIONS WITH CUBA

I believe situation created by Castro régime and consequent attitude of other American states as shown at Punta del Este warrants thorough re-exam of Canadian policy toward Cuba.

2. The serious Communist threat from Cuba for Latin America cannot repeat not be overestimated. In Central America at least Communist organizations are active in promoting Castro's ideology through press, literature, groups and plentiful financing. Agitation is conducted among workers particularly in banana areas and seaports. Groups of sympathizers and students go to Cuba from time to time for indoctrination, the guests of Cuban Government.

3. While I do not repeat not believe there is any serious danger of Cuban armed invasion to these parts despite claims made at times by Presidents of Guatemala and Nicaragua, it remains that Communist infiltration is a reality and there seems to be no repeat no doubt all this activity is directed from Cuba in cooperation with Soviet agents. Central American countries I feel are justified in showing serious concern over Castro's declared intentions and visible efforts to set up regimes of his brand in this area. I do not repeat not think chances to bring about progress through democratic ways should be jeopardized through Castroist interference.

4. Although only a limited measure of social reform has heretofore got underway in Central America I believe present situation on whole warrants a fair try for Alliance for Progress and other help from Western international sources. There is hope for greater and faster improvement in every one of five countries of this post where, except for Nicaragua, progressive democratic governments are in power. The necessity for reform and self-help is permeating more and more the minds of government and public opinion. There is therefore a very good case for holding Communists at bay and making it possible for these countries to try to work out freely their salvation with Western help.

5. In this context Canada's (divergence?) from OAS policies as well as Canadian press hostility toward present USA policy in regard to Latin America on one hand and Canada's growing trade with Cuba on the other hand appears somewhat strange on the part of a nation often regarded as leader of secondary democratic powers. As seen from here Canada's behaviour is tantamount to indifference and selfishness in presence of hemispheric problems of real gravity. Canada's goodwill in these parts has so far more or less escaped unfavourable reaction but I believe this will not repeat not go on for long if we continue saying nothing about our awareness of solidarity with other American countries in present struggle between Castroism and democracies.

6. I believe therefore that Canadian Government should at least emphasize publicly and clearly its dislike of totalitarian régime in Cuba and its disapproval of subversive activities in Latin American countries. As a first positive step in helping to contain Castroism Canada might revise and broaden its list of strategic exports to Cuba. It seems this revision should take into account potential supplies for guerilla warfare in addition to materials for modern warfare which presumably make up NATO list. Perhaps also some manufactured items, the supply of which is particularly sensitive for Cuban industry, could be included. Such a measure would I think do much to demonstrate in practical terms to Latin America our solidarity and understanding of their situation. The psychological value of an announcement to the effect the list of strategic materials has been broadened would be important for Canada's prestige and interest.

7. I would not repeat not for the time being advocate an overall embargo on non strategic trade for apart from humanitarian aspects involved in regard to Cuban people, I would doubt its effectiveness as long as other countries are likely to step into our shoes in supplying same exports. I have doubt also about wisdom of help in addition to (amendments?) for arms shipments as suggested by Mr. Rusk unless we were asked to fulfill a mission of this sort both by Cuba and other Latin American countries. I do not repeat not think we are qualified thus to intervene actively between two camps but believe we should at least assert in some unmistakable way where our sympathy and conviction lie and do our part within our trade relations with Cuba to avoid giving impression Canada is bringing undue strength to Cuban economy and Communist apparatus and thus contributing indirectly to further Castro designs in Latin America.

CANADA – CUBAN RELATIONS

These comments, which you have requested, are supplementary to those given in my telegram under reference. Since, as I stated there, "I doubt however that whatever we do will greatly affect Canada's relations with Ecuador," I will be more concerned here with Canada's relations with Cuba in the light of Mr. Rusk's approach.

2. I would find it difficult to quarrel with Mr. Rusk's analysis of the activist nature of the Cuban régime. However, I think it could lead to a few difficulties for the Americans if they continue to believe that because "Khrushchev was to a limited extent willing to use Cuba to exploit existing dangers in the hemisphere" (paragraph 8 of Washington's telegram) the extent of this willingness will continue to be "limited." This is what I had in mind in point (c) of paragraph 1 of my telegram; Cuba is a base from which and an agent through which the Soviet bloc can operate. The possibility of increased use adds considerably to the menace to the hemisphere. In passing I should mention that I note I worded the second sentence of that point incorrectly. I should have said that the Soviet bloc would go to considerable lengths to prevent (rather than "unlikely to allow") the Cuban economy and consequently the régime (be it of Castro or a more communist one without him) from collapsing.

3. The activist side of the Cubans has been clearly demonstrated in Ecuador in the year I have been here. The Embassy has grown to seven members on the diplomatic list, not including the absent Ambassador; this makes it the largest Latin American mission in Quito although the Brazilians will also have seven diplomats when an Ambassador is accredited. The Embassy here is notoriously a centre of Castrista intrigue. For example, it is known that Dr. Manuel Araujo Hidalgo was a frequent visitor at the Embassy before his political eclipse. The events recounted in paragraphs 10 and 11 of the annex to Canadian JIC 413/2(61) attached to your letter DS-184 of October 11, 1961, clearly show that the Cuban Embassy (and the Cuban government) are active in local politics. I have reported that it was most likely that former President Velasco received money from the Cuban Government for his June 1960 campaign. The political party URJE was formed for the sole purpose of supporting the Cuban revolution and while, of course, it cannot be proved, it would be surprising if the Cuban Government, through its Embassy, was not instrumental in the founding of this party and was not its chief financial supporter. Similarly there must be Cuban money in the weekly news magazine Mañana (established just two years ago) which trumpets the Castro line. There have been a few cases when Cuban diplomats have been caught out. The former Cuban Ambassador and the Cuban Cultural Attaché (as I have reported) made ill advised speeches at Ambato and Ibarra respectively in praise of the Cuban revolution. In the dying days of the Velasco régime the Cuban Chargé d'Affaires was asked to leave the country for his political activities. Similarly the Cuban Consul in Guayaquil late last year was withdrawn at the Ecuadorian Government's request. Plans are afoot, as I have reported, for taking 300 Indian peasants to Cuba for "training," and, as I informed you in early January, sixty-two selected Ecuadorians spent three weeks in Cuba at the Cuban Government's expense.

4. That Cuba has been and is a divisive political issue in Ecuador is not, of course, solely attributable to subversive actions by Cubans or Castrista agents. Much of the responsibility lies on the shoulders of past governments who have done little in the way of social reform. Ecuador was ripe for social unrest and the aims and ideals of the Cuban revolution enabled it to become the focal point for this discontent. That is why in my telegram I suggested that while the activist side of the Cuban régime constitutes "a grave danger to Latin American political stability," it has acted and can act as a goad to reform. It has often been truly said that without Castro we might not yet have the Alliance for Progress trying to get off the ground. In the sense of keeping the pressure on Latin American countries from Cuba (and consequently from the U.S.) to institute reforms, it could be an excellent thing for the continent if Castro or a similar régime could remain in power in Cuba for the next five years or so. However, I agree with Mr. Rusk's point that Castroism is not "the answer to the problems of the hemisphere," but I am afraid that reforms, having been so long delayed, possibly cannot come quickly enough in many countries to avoid the establishment of some Castro-like régimes. That, as I see it, is the danger in Ecuador.

5. Turning to the internal situation in Cuba, I was surprised to read in paragraph 9 of Mr. Heeney's telegram that the United States does "not accept that the present Cuban régime was a permanent situation." I suppose it is not, in the sense that Castro may be replaced by the older converts to communism who now seem to be in the process of taking over, but surely that latter type of government will take much longer to dislodge than the normal type of Latin American caudillo, such as Castro in many respects is. It is easy to become involved in semantics as to whether or not Cuba is now a communist state but I think that Mr. Kidd's informative despatch No. D-628 of December 16, 1961, can only lead one to believe that Castro's only hope of remaining the titular head of the government in succeeding months is on sufferance of the communists. In considering the Cuban problem it seems to me that for planning purposes we have to assume that Castro or a similar régime (given no armed intervention) will be firmly in power in Cuba for the foreseeable future.

6. This latter point assumes that the Soviet bloc will be willing to buttress the flagging Cuban economy (which I believe) in order to counter-act to a sufficient degree both the effect of the U.S. embargo itself and any success which the latter might have in getting its friends to reduce their trade, and, secondly, that it will be able to do so, to keep enough goods and loans flowing to prevent an utter economic collapse (which may be an inaccurate assumption). It seems to me that the U.S. will meet with some success, but to a degree only, in denying Cuba “the means of strengthening its economy” (paragraph 12 of Washington’s telegram) because while the Soviet bloc will make good some of the difference, there are bound to be less funds than otherwise available for Cuba to extend “its influence and subversive activity over the rest of the hemisphere.” It remains to be seen whether the U.S. will get sufficient cooperation from Latin American countries to enable it “to press forward with the Alliance for Progress” and whether whatever projects may be implemented will sufficiently and promptly enough “assist the other Latin American countries to strengthen their economies” (paragraph 6 of Washington’s telegram) to enable some of the more vulnerable governments to withstand the challenge of Castroism.

7. Since I believe that Cuba (with or without Castro) will plague Central America and the continent for some years, we are likely to find the United States if not more involved at least as much involved as at present with this additional constant threat to the political stability of Latin America. Rather than growing accustomed to the situation I would think that there is a good chance that the Americans will grow increasingly frustrated that that small island should continue to require so much attention. Their emotionalism will tend to increase and it is for this reason in my telegram I suggested that the problem was more one of Canada-United States relations than those of Canada-Cuba. In this connection I think that Mr. Rusk’s statements concerning Canada-United States relations in paragraph 13 of Washington’s telegram are of considerable significance. Here, of course, I have left my field of Ecuador but I can’t help wondering for how long the Americans will curb their emotionalism in their relations with us. It would be a different problem, I believe, if the Cubans were to relax into peaceful co-existence with their neighbours. (In so far as their relations with the United States are concerned, the fault is not all theirs.) However, as long as they are a threat to our interests – both political and commercial – in having Latin America as stable as possible and in having the United States free to devote its full attention to more vital areas, I believe we would be justified in going some little distance further to satisfy the United States (and all the countries of Latin America who at Punta del Este condemned communism in Cuba) that we, too, disapprove of the régime’s activities.

8. This could have no effect on the stability of the Cuban régime although it would get rid of Cuban propaganda (if our definition of strategic materials were broadened somewhat) that Canada was a good source for spare parts. There is always a possibility too, I suppose, that if the United States were to become sufficiently exasperated with us on the grounds that they thought we were taking advantage of their embargo to expand our trade, we might suffer in United States tourist dollars and in some of our exports. It wouldn’t take long to lose more than the, say, $6 million referred to by Mr. Rusk which he said was for items in our exports to Cuba which the United States would consider either “strategic or border-line” (paragraph 11 of Washington’s telegram). Again, if the feeling of frustration in the preceding paragraph were to grow in the United States, we might just possibly be in a position to counsel restraint, should armed intervention be again considered, if we have previously shown an increased sympathy for the problem which the United States is facing.

9. Much of this, of course, is what I take to be self-interest and in my opinion it is worth considering whether we might not therefore broaden the definition of strategic materials and make a declaration supporting the Punta del Este condemnation of communism in Cuba. One other possibility occurs to me (I don’t consider destroyers to the Caribbean or travel restrictions as possibilities) and that is the granting by Canada of some financial aid to those Latin American countries which appear to be carrying out effective reforms, to supplement to a small degree Alliance for Progress assistance. I am convinced that development linked to reforms is the only effective answer to Castroism. To help modestly in development areas not touched by the Alliance (if it starts to function effectively) would show that, even though not members of the O.A.S., we are sympathetic to the plight of the under-developed countries of this hemisphere. At the same time such a programme might help us, eventually, to expand our trade; at least we would be doing our part to try to achieve that stability on which our present trade depends.

LETTER NO. 132
CONFIDENTIAL

Rio de Janeiro, March 8, 1962

CANADA AND CUBA

Despite a few tendentious UPI reports in the press at the time of the Punta del Este Conference, and some indications of bad humour on the part of some of our American friends in their interpretation of Canada's policy in regard to Cuba, it remains that generally the press here has treated our position fairly in reporting it, and has even in some cases given it as an example of maturity in its editorials.

2. Even newspapers which lean to the fire and brimstone in regard to Cuba and to Brazilian policy in regard to Cuba, gave our rebuttal of the UPI articles a good report.

3. Two cases have come to my attention in recent times which exemplify the treatment of our position. On February 4 the Estado de São Paulo, which is not tender to the position taken by Brazil at the Punta del Este Conference and would have liked it to have been fully lined up with the United States position, reported on the imposition of the United States embargo on trade with Cuba. In its report from Washington under the byline of its correspondent James Minifie, the Estado had one section entitled "Canada's Position," which listed the rules applied by the Canadian Government in regard to Canadian trade with Cuba as made known by the Canadian Embassy in Washington: 1) that Canadian exports of arms, munitions and military equipment to Cuba had been prohibited for two years already; 2) that strategic materials were not being exported to Cuba; 3) that exports to Cuba of other products which could have a strategic importance were carefully watched and export licenses were required; and 4) that re-exports through Canada of United States-produced items had been prohibited since October 1960, when the United States had imposed restrictions on their trade with Cuba.

4. The liberal-minded Jornal do Brasil, which approved of the attitude taken by Brazil at Punta del Este and therefore looks for support abroad, had an editorial on March 2 commenting on a statement by Senator Gunnar Thorvaldson, which had already been reported in most papers.<sup>9</sup> It points out that Senator Thorvaldson is the President of the Conservative Association of Canada and a close collaborator of our Prime Minister. The Canadian position, comments the Jornal, is fully consistent. It is not a result of systematic opposition to United States ways; it stands on its own; it has majority support in Canada; and is not meant to show, obviously, any veiled sympathy with Castro's dictatorship. In one word, it is showing Canadian good sense. The same, the editorialist concludes, applies to Brazil. The Brazilian position does not mean ideological preferences or sympathies for a dictatorship. It means solely that Brazil does not desire to burn its vessels, vessels which are required in a democratic way as much to reach as to leave an island (Cuba).

5. The Canadian position is at least understood by a majority of people here, even amongst those who oppose the Brazilian Government's attitude and would like Canada to show Brazil the way back to the United States fold. It is fully appreciated in Government circles and in the bourgeois liberal press, such as the Jornal do Brasil and the Correio da Manhã. We need not expect an unpleasant press unless a campaign were mounted by some of the United States agencies independently of or helped along by suggestions or unofficial releases from United States Government sources. In such a case the manoeuvre would be quickly noticed and we could count on sympathetic support from most quarters who retain a sympathy for the "underdog."

6. Many United States businessmen locally will continue to look askance at our position: one can understand their apprehensions and lack of understanding. I have, I regret to say, a little less patience with such as former Foreign Minister Horacio Lafer, – a good friend nevertheless – who already before I left on leave last December had expressed to me his regrets that Canada were not taking a harder line on Cuba, which would help tip the scales in this area. Mr. Lafer had not shown such intransigence when he was in the seat of responsibility (until January 30, 1961), although to his credit it must be admitted that his attitude was moving towards greater sternness in the months before he had to surrender his portfolio with the termination of the term of office of President Kubitschek. It will also be remembered that he was one of the four former Foreign Ministers who earlier this year signed a letter to the present Foreign Minister expressing their regrets at the present lack of firmness of the policy of Brazil towards Cuba (our letter no. 60 of January 29, 1962†).

RELATIONS WITH CUBA

As a result of the discussions in NATO and the talk between Mr. Rusk and Mr. Heeney in Washington in mid-February, ministers will undoubtedly wish to re-examine carefully our policy with respect to Cuba.

2. The implications of our relations with Cuba, particularly in terms of U.S.-Canada relations, are complicated and far-reaching. Our policy has frequently been misunderstood and occasionally distorted both at home and abroad.

3. To simplify the re-examination of our policy and to enable ministers to focus on what seem to us to be the key issues, the problem might be divided into four fundamental questions:

- (a) Has the Government been able to implement effectively its announced policy? Do we need to tighten up our procedures?
- (b) What response should we make to the U.S. approach in NATO?
- (c) Since the U.S. clearly has in mind that Canada should go farther than what has to date been proposed in NATO, what, if any, additional measures should Canada agree to undertake in co-operation with the United States?

(d) How can we explain and present our policy more effectively both to the public in Canada and abroad and to the United States administration?

(a) Has the Government been able to implement effectively its announced policy?

4. The policy of the Government has been to prohibit the shipment of arms and military items (whether of Canadian or foreign origin) to Cuba for over two years. Although a few minor items on the COCOM strategic list may have been exported to Cuba in the past year, at the moment, in practice, the Department of Trade and Commerce are not granting export licences to Cuba for any items on the COCOM list (whether of Canadian or foreign origin). Finally, in keeping with a long-standing practice with the United States, we do not permit the shipment to Cuba of any goods of purely U.S. origin which the United States itself would not export to Cuba.

5. We are assured by the departments concerned with the enforcement of our regulations that our control with respect to arms and strategic material has been effective in practice. It is always, of course, conceivable that there may be a few instances where U.S.-origin goods are slipping through, but the authorities are watching this possibility very closely. A dozen or so cases of attempted circumventions of these regulations have already been picked up by our people. Co-operation with the United States here is satisfactory, but we might show a willingness to examine procedures jointly to ensure that there is no evasion.

6. The embargo on trans-shipment of U.S.-origin goods, however, begs the question of how to define U.S.-origin. In the light of statements that we would not permit back-door evasion, it might be fair to assume that this embargo extended only to goods imported from the U.S. into Canada with the specific purpose of re-shipping them to Cuba. However, a number of so-called Canadian items which are being shipped to Cuba probably include a varying degree of U.S. content (as is in fact true of much of our export trade of manufactured items generally). In some cases this U.S. content may be very high. While, on the face of it, it might be possible to establish a percentage for U.S. content above which the item would be regarded as of U.S. origin for embargo purposes, such a step gives rise to difficult problems.

7. It could be represented that a policy related to a definition based on content was in fact a result of pressure by the U.S. Government or by U.S. parents on Canadian subsidiaries. It would open up generally the question of whether or not Canada was able to pursue an independent policy with respect to export trade, since so much of our normal exports contain a high proportion of U.S. content. In the circumstances, it would appear to us not desirable to establish a general content rule. It might, however, be desirable to prevent the re-export of not only goods which are entirely of U.S. origin but also of goods which for all intents and purposes were manufactured in the United States and then exposed to some simple form of packaging, labelling or processing in Canada with a view to avoiding control.

(b) What response should we make to the U.S. approach in NATO?

8. When Rostow appeared before the NATO Council, he asked the alliance to join in the following measures:<sup>10</sup>

- (i) Deny arms to Cuba and forbid trans-shipment of all items of U.S. origin;
- (ii) Apply COCOM regulations to Cuba;
- (iii) Report to NATO all credits extended to Cuba;
- (iv) Assess individually the meaning of all resolutions agreed at Punta del Este and adjust their trade policies accordingly;

<sup>10</sup> Voir/See W. Granger Blair, "U.S. Bids NATO End Trade in Strategic Goods with Cuba," New York Times, February 21, 1962, p. 4.

(v) Re-examine their trade policies with respect to the whole of Latin America. (This point was not elaborated on and is probably not as important in the present context as the previous four requests.)

9. From subsequent discussions it seems that the U.S. are going to concentrate on obtaining a NATO resolution that the alliance will apply the COCOM regulations to Cuba and therefore deny all arms and strategic materials to Cuba. The views expressed by other governments so far have shown little enthusiasm for such a decision, which the United States would probably wish to make public. The wisdom of NATO extending its operations to the Caribbean has been questioned and it is difficult to assess how much support in the last analysis the U.S. will be able to muster within NATO. At your instruction we have prepared a memorandum† seeking Cabinet's guidance for the discussions in NATO with respect to a resolution concerning applying COCOM controls to Cuba.

(c) Since the U.S. clearly has in mind that Canada should go farther than what has to date been proposed in NATO, what, if any, additional measures should Canada agree to undertake in co-operation with the U.S.?

10. It has become apparent as a result of the Rusk-Heeney talks and further conversations with U.S. officials that the United States really wishes Canada to join them in a quarantine of Castro. It is reasonable to think that they will follow up their limited success at Punta del Este by pressing their OAS partners to take steps in a similar direction. Although we are outside the OAS, the direct pressures on us may be even greater. During the meeting of the U.S.-Canada Parliamentary Group, the U.S. side, time after time, stressed that they were not interested in what we did with respect to one or another item in our trade. They maintained that the struggle with Castro was a question of principle on which they expected Canada to stand with them.

11. In recent talks with U.S. officials, they have suggested that appropriate measures for Canada to take would extend well beyond the application of COCOM controls. These might include:

- (i) Denying certain items of essentially Canadian origin to Cuba which, although not on the COCOM list, have a strategic significance to the Cuban economy;
- (ii) Make stronger and more critical statements about the Castro régime;
- (iii) Deny transit and landing rights for Cuban or Bloc aircraft enroute through Canada to Cuba;
- (iv) Join U.S. in preventing export of Cuban arms to Central America by, as Mr. Rusk suggested, possibly sending Canadian destroyers to the Caribbean;
- (v) Although not mentioned specifically by Mr. Rusk, there have been indications that the U.S. would like us to break diplomatic relations with Cuba and thereby deprive Castro of any semblance of respectability which he might derive through his contacts with us.

12. With the exception of the first and perhaps the second, all these proposals are very extreme. If we adopt some of these proposals but stop short of the furthest limit, there undoubtedly will be many critics in the United States and Latin America who will give us no credit for having moved at all. If we were to go the whole or most of the way with proposals such as these, we would no doubt be credited with having belatedly joined in, but some unfortunate results would undoubtedly be produced as well. A complete disruption would, of course, occur in our own relations with Cuba and probably the door would be closed for any effective contact in the future for as long as the Castro Government remains in power. Such a drastic change in position would probably be represented throughout Latin America as Canada "knuckling under" to U.S. pressure. The spreading of such an impression would not be in our own interest nor in the interest of the United States. Such a substantial shift in our policy could make the positions of such friendly Governments as those in Argentina, Brazil and Mexico much more exposed and difficult. The OAS and the Alliance for Progress might suffer in the process.

13. Although the facts are not entirely clear, it is not impossible that U.S. economic pressure on Cuba may create chaos and destroy Castro's position. There is, however, little assurance that if Castro should come down, he would be replaced by a non-communist régime or one better disposed towards the United States.

14. If the United States intervened with force, they would probably find themselves supporting, as they have in so many parts of the world, a puppet régime which would have little appeal throughout the rest of Latin America. As long as Canada maintains the type of contacts we now have with Cuba, the existence of such links might conceivably lessen the possibility of such drastic action by the United States. This, however, to some extent will depend on how effectively we can present our case in Washington. It will also depend on presenting the facts to the public in both countries in such a way as to keep temperatures down; in particular, we cannot leave ourselves open to the charge of being insensitive to any real threat of Soviet-controlled communism in this hemisphere.

15. At the same time, in view of our interest in the orderly progress of Latin America, we should presumably help to keep the way clear for these nations to achieve changes in their own social and economic order, sometimes at revolutionary pace.

(d) How can we explain and present our policy effectively both to the public in Canada and abroad and to the United States Administration?

16. We now have before us an invitation to sit down and discuss with the United States fundamental relations with Cuba. To comment merely on the detail of various proposals put forward may avoid the fundamental question which Mr. Rusk has raised: Are we prepared to join the United States in an effort to weaken the Castro régime and to prevent the re-export of Castro's revolution to other parts of Latin America?

17. The single-mindedness of the United States to date has made it difficult to work with them on anything short of the latter promise. Nevertheless, if we take advantage of the United States' invitation to discuss these questions in a frank and co-operative manner, we would be obliged to question whether it would be desirable or possible to bring Castro down through external pressure and even if this were possible, whether a subsequent régime (and the repercussions elsewhere in the hemisphere) would be an improvement.

18. In essence, we would be questioning the fundamental wisdom of basic United States policies, both past and projected. This means that great skill would be required to avoid the impression that a small power was telling a major power how to run its affairs. Because of the particular relations between United States and Canada, we would also have to avoid the impression, particularly with the public, that our independence of view was based on a "plague on both your houses" view towards the Cold War. Finally, and perhaps most important, it would have to be clear that our policy was not calculated essentially as a mere demonstration of independence for its own sake regardless of the merits of the case.

19. If we are to engage in a frank discussion with the United States, we need to take to the conference table not only carefully-thought-out views on the points raised earlier in this memorandum but also new evidence that we were prepared to play a constructive role in hemispheric relations.

20. There are numerous ways in which the latter might be achieved. We should examine in advance any proposals which would demonstrate to both the United States Government and to the public everywhere that we were serious about decreasing tension in the Caribbean.

21. This might be done through an extension of our aid activities to other areas where Castroism may be threatening, e.g. British Guiana, West Indies. These areas have a longstanding link with Canada and development aid from us would undoubtedly be well received. To the extent that we could demonstrate to the United States that we were taking an enlightened and effective interest in the future of these areas, we would be much better placed to refute any inference that Canada was insensitive to the dangers involved in the spread of communism through the Caribbean. A Colombo plan for aid to the Caribbean of the kind which we were considering some months ago could, by excluding Cuba, be a very effective and constructive form of "quarantine." It might in fact encourage a more moderate régime in Cuba, which might be forced by economic necessity and domestic opinion to seek entry into the Aid Programme. (In a sense, it could then be said that the aid being given by us to the Caribbean area outside Cuba represented earnings from our continuing trade with Cuba. Insofar as this trade in the future will have to be based largely on the dollar income received by Cubans working on the U.S. base at Guantanamo, it could also be said that to that extent our trade with Cuba and our aid to the West Indies would be absorbing for constructive purposes the dollars which the U.S. pretty well has to put into Cuba so long as it occupies Guantanamo. From all points of view our trade and aid activities should be welcomed by the United States.)

22. Another positive act which may be forced upon us in any event by our relations with Latin America would be a more active participation in the Alliance for Progress.

23. Finally, perhaps the most positive act in the eyes of both the United States and Latin America would be Canadian membership in the OAS. The Americans could maintain that we could take an independent view of the Cuban issue and the future developments in the Caribbean even if we were members of the OAS. To some extent this contention is borne out by the Punta del Este Conference where several Latin American countries appear to have held out against the most extreme U.S. requests. Some Latin American countries may think that Canada declines membership in the OAS simply to avoid being drawn into disputes which are likely to become more prevalent in the future where members of the OAS will have to stand up and be counted.

24. To summarize, I think it should be our objective to look towards a very careful presentation of our views to the United States. We should be able to point out that there is within the bounds of our existing policy room for an adequate degree of co-operation on trade controls. You might also consider that it would be possible for us to volunteer a well-publicized statement of support for the spirit of the Punta del Este resolutions even though not subscribing to them formally. In discussing steps that go beyond this, we would be obliged to question some of the basic premises of the United States. We would be better placed to do this if we had carefully worked out our policy in advance both with respect to membership in the OAS and to the provision of additional aid to the Caribbean.

25. Several months might be required for such a fundamental re-examination of our policy. Clearly, these may be issues of such importance that the Government may not wish to act before an election. It is vital, however, not to give the impression to the United States that we are delaying deliberately. In these circumstances and in the light of any discussions which you may have on this subject with Mr. Rusk in Geneva, you might wish to suggest technical consultations on the official level in advance of any thorough ministerial discussion. Arrangements might, for example, be made for a more thorough review of the intelligence picture as both we and they see it. A joint examination might take place of the scope for further co-operation with respect to trade controls, particularly regarding evasion of existing regulations but perhaps also with regard to the possible extension of our lists. There could also be closer and more forward-looking consultation, at both the technical and policy level on the role of economic aid in the Caribbean both for its own value and as a protection against the spread of Castroism (or perhaps even as an inducement to Cubans to seek closer links again with the West). In addition, consideration could be given to the kind of public statement which might improve our appearance in the United States without losing the political advantages for ourselves and other Western countries in a continuation of relations with Cuba.

CANADIAN-CUBAN RELATIONS

As seen from Venezuela, Cuba poses a real and immediate threat to security and peaceful development of Americas. Their own proximity, ease of travel by legitimate or clandestine means, the turbulence of own extreme left which has become more violent and noisy as popular support for Fidelismo here has seemed to dwindle, explain Venezuela's concern and indeed contribution to their decision to break relations with Cuba last November. Since outbreak of terrorist activity here coinciding with second Punta del Este Conference, Government has been arresting known Venezuelan leftists who return from visits to Cuba. Yesterday Government communiqué announced discovery of guerrilla training camps in several mountain areas and arrest of 52 persons believed involved. The Venezuelan Government therefore has own good and sufficient reasons for its attitude towards Castro-Cuba, which it now fits into "Betancourt doctrine" of excluding from OAS regimes of usurpation i.e. governments not repeat not freely elected.

2. Nevertheless when I called on Foreign Minister earlier this week to present copies of my letters of credence Dr. Falcon indicated his complete understanding of Canadian position regarding Cuba and his appreciation of our willingness to continue our trade in non-strategic material. The moderate Socialists of government coalitions are not repeat not critical of our stand and opposition parties, generally farther to left, if moved to comment would probably applaud what they would regard as Canadian independence. The conservative and far right elements here currently have no repeat no party. Such criticisms as we have heard come in private conversations with members of this group and local American businessmen. Nor has Venezuelan press, some of which is centrist or inclined to the right, itself initiated any criticism of Canada's Cuban policy. Newspapers have from time to time reproduced the criticism of others. However to date we have not repeat not felt it necessary to issue locally any "defence" of Canadian policy.

3. It would seem therefore that in the terms of purely Venezuelan-Canadian relations and in present circumstances here Canada's Cuban policy is not repeat not a complicating factor. However the trend has been for government to move gradually closer to Washington lines and it may be forced to rely more heavily on support of the Venezuelan armed forces if Congressional situation deteriorates further. If a rightist dictatorship emerges here, a possibility which can never be completely ruled out, it would probably need no repeat no Washington urging to adopt a critical line toward Canada on Cuban issue.

CANADIAN RELATIONS WITH CUBA

As suggested by Mr. Bower in his telegram under reference, the time has come to review our policy towards Cuba. Castro's public profession of Marxism-Leninism on December 1, 1961, the decision of the OAS Foreign Ministers at Punta del Este to exclude Cuba from the Inter-American System, and the rebuffs met by Cuba at the United Nations are all important factors which have a bearing on our position. Something must be done to counteract the impression that Canada has sympathy for Cuba or at best is neutral in the conflict which opposes her on the one side and the U.S. and Latin American Governments on the other. The failure of the larger Latin American countries to support at Punta del Este the exclusion of Cuba from the OAS did not stem from their sympathy for Castro but was due mainly to domestic political preoccupations as well as to their concern lest the decision to exclude Cuba would set a dangerous precedent which might threaten the sovereignty of the other member states and the solidarity of the OAS. Insofar as Uruguay is concerned, it has become obvious over the last few weeks that Canada's policy towards Cuba is misinterpreted, both by those who approve of it and those who are critical of it, and that some clarification and/or modification of our public stand is required.

2. The Cuban crisis has posed a conscience problem to all Latin Americans. Basically, the average Latin American is resentful of U.S. economic and political domination or supremacy. Even those who profess to be pro-Americans are not loath to criticize the U.S. on some of its policies when it suits them. There is therefore no wonder that the vast majority of Latin Americans hailed the Cuban revolution as the forerunner of a movement of economic and social emancipation which they hoped would sweep through all the other Latin American countries. However, the excesses of the Cuban revolution, such as the mass trials and executions staged by the Castrist forces, the curbing of freedom, particularly that of the press, gradually had the effect of dampening enthusiasm in the rest of Latin America. Castro's declaration of faith in Marxism-Leninism as the only means of bringing about the emancipation of Latin America came as a severe blow to those responsible elements outside Cuba who were still hoping that the Cuban revolution would return to a democratic form of Government. By falling [into] the lap of the Soviets, Castro has also shown the difficulty for Latin America to free itself from U.S. tutelage without running the risk of becoming a stooge of the Communist world. In fact, Castro's basic mistake, as suggested to me recently by the Bolivian Ambassador Siles Zuano (the former President of Bolivia), is not to have waged a Socialist revolution, but simply "to have changed the foreign masters of his country."

3. This leads us to the heart of the problem. The Communist leanings of the Castrist régime can no longer be ignored even by those who still believe that the Cuban revolution, at least in its original form, has set the pattern for economic and social reforms in Latin America. A choice has to be made. The Communists, of course, are more than ever supporters of Castro – even more so than at the beginning of the Cuban revolution. A good many Socialists and other extreme leftists (at least in Uruguay) have become too compromised with the Castrist régime to backtrack. For others, "Yankee imperialism" remains the main threat and must be fought by all means. For the majority of former pro-Castrists, however, the choice is more difficult to make, if only because it appears to be a choice between Cuba and the U.S., or between the Cuban revolution and the U.S.-inspired Alliance for Progress Programme, in which they have little faith. It is for the latter group, which includes members of the left as well as of the right, that Canada's position towards Cuba assumes a particular importance. By making it quite clear that we disapprove of the Cuban régime as it has evolved and that we support the Alliance for Progress Programme as the only means of making orderly advances on the road to economic and social development, we could have a salutary influence on progressive elements throughout Latin America which are still hesitant. Such a reaffirmation of our policy would also reassure those conservative elements which may be in doubt as to where our sympathies lie in the Cuban issue. In either case, it would appear necessary to resolve our present differences with the U.S. on Cuba.

4. It is a matter for regret that some U.S. officials did not see fit to exert more restraint in their criticism of Canada's policy on trade with Cuba. Surely the Canadian Government, if only to preserve its reputation of independence in foreign affairs, had no alternative but to resist these undisguised attempts at dictating our policy. However, it seems that we should not allow these incidents to becloud the more important issues of our relations with the U.S. and the rest of Latin America, and of the security of the Western Hemisphere to which we belong. We must recognize that Cuba presents a different problem to us than Communist satellites in Europe. If it is admitted that Cuba, willingly or not, has become the spearhead of Communist infiltration in Latin America, we must accept the fact that it poses a more direct threat to us than, say, Czechoslovakia. And yet, we have never left anyone in doubt as to our opposition to the Czech Communist régime. The fact that we have been trading with the latter country has never been interpreted either as a sign of sympathy for its rulers. The situation is not so clear with respect to Cuba. Several Latin American countries, including Uruguay, have purposely refrained from trading with Cuba. Last year, for instance, Uruguay turned down a tempting offer by the Cuban Government to buy Uruguayan surplus rice in exchange for sugar, at a time when Uruguayan exporters were facing difficulties on the Canadian market because of the decision of the U.S. authorities to allow the export of U.S.-subsidized rice to Canada. While the average Uruguayan would probably not object to Canada's maintaining normal trade with Cuba, an attempt on our part to take advantage of the present situation to increase our sales to Cuba would certainly raise questions. One of the most important local newspapers, El Día, recently pointed out that Canada was the only NATO country which had actually increased its trade with Cuba. I am not in a position to confirm or deny this assertion, but if it proved to be true, we could expect further criticism. The Bolivian Ambassador, whose Government as you know is definitely of leftist tendencies and opposed to sanctions against the Cuban Government, told me quite frankly that Canada's trading policy with Cuba was slightly "mercantilist and opportunist." It seems, therefore, that we should pay more attention to the views of our Latin American friends on the question of trade with Cuba. This is not to suggest that we should stop trading with Cuba, but perhaps the time has come to be somewhat more selective in granting export permits and in controlling the volume of our Cuban trade.

5. It is recognized that if we wish to play a role in Latin America, we must preserve our independence from the U.S. We should also guard, however, against any expressions or appearances of sterile anti-Americanism, which could only provide comfort and encouragement to those irresponsible Latin American elements who are determined to bring about upheavals under the guise of anti-imperialism or Castrism. It seems that the best way of avoiding the pitfalls of pro-Americanism and anti-Americanism is to relate our policy on Cuba to the OAS decisions. One step which could be taken without involving us in any dispute with the U.S. and/or Latin American Governments would be to endorse the OAS declaration of incompatibility of Communism and, by way of consequence, of the Cuban régime, with the Western Hemisphere democratic system and way of life. A second step might be to indicate our willingness to support or abide by any decision taken by the OAS member states to protect against Cuban subversive activities. Could we not, for example, offer to cooperate, outside the OAS framework, with the Security Committee which has just been set up as a result of a recommendation of the last Punta del Este Conference? There are no doubt other avenues which could be explored. The important thing is to give some tangible evidence of our solidarity with the OAS in its quest for economic and social development and also in its concern for the security of the Western Hemisphere. This we can do without seeking OAS membership and while maintaining normal diplomatic and trade relations with Cuba.

CUBA – MR. HEENEY'S TALK WITH SECRETARY OF STATE RUSK

In paragraph 11 of this telegram it is stated that "President Dorticós of Cuba had boasted (at Punta del Este, I gathered) that, while spare parts had been a problem, this was no longer so since 'a daily plane' now brought them to Cuba from Canada."

2. I was not able to see Lincoln Gordon, the United States Ambassador, until Saturday March 10 from the time of my return on February 23. Until that time he had been very busy with the negotiation of Aid Agreements, the complications of the expropriation of the IT&T subsidiary in Rio Grande do Sul and some travel to Brasilia and Bahia as well as his participation in carnival festivities. We had a long chat on Saturday morning, March 10 at the end of which, he had kept the bouquet for the end, he told me that he had this little story for me. We had been discussing Cuba and Punta del Este and he gave me the story in all amity and good humour. He nevertheless would like to know, he said, what I thought of it.

3. As you may remember President Dorticós wanted to meet with President Goulart en route down to Punta del Este. President Dorticós had to detour to finally meet up with President Goulart, very briefly, on the airstrip at Florianopolis, in the south of Brazil. On the plane which took Dorticós and company to Florianopolis, they were accompanied by the Parliamentary Under-Secretary at the Foreign Office, Renato Archer. According to the report which Gordon had had from Renato Archer, the atmosphere was not of the most cordial, and the conversation, to say the least, spasmodic on this trip. Dorticós had had to run around to see Goulart. One of Archer's gambits had been to ask how Cuba looked after itself for spare parts, to which the rejoinder had been, I could not be sure whether it was from Dorticós or one of his party, it was not Raúl Rao, who kept completely silent as he later did in Punta del Este, that while there had been a problem, this was no longer so ... etc.

4. Whether the boast was repeated publicly at Punta del Este or whether Secretary Rusk used Gordon's report, I do not know, I would be inclined to believe it was the latter.

5. Lincoln Gordon's inclination was to believe that the Cuban statement was a boast with very little foundation.

6. I repeated to him what our policy was, on exports to Cuba generally and on re-exports; and added that there would be required ingenuity beyond compare on the part of the Cubans to make good their boast. I concluded my statement in the same vein as Mr. Heeney did in the last paragraph of his telegram No. 15.

7. The above will clear up a point of history. You may think, however, that Washington deserves a factual rebuttal of the Dorticós boast. If one were given there, it would be useful if I were also apprised of the line you have taken in Washington. I would like to go back to Gordon on this, and if I could draw Renato Archer on it, I could also correct the impression which he may have carried from the Dorticós boast.

CANADIAN RELATIONS WITH CUBA

Our telegram No. 24 of March 2, 1962, from Montevideo requires little elaboration. Canada's policy with respect to Cuba has not generally been a controversial issue in Latin America, whatever may have been the reactions in the United States. Judged from Buenos Aires, there appears to be waning sympathy for Castro throughout Latin America, – probably less marked in Brazil than elsewhere. This is partly due to Castro's now obvious and professed links with communism, and partly to a belief that the Alliance for Progress will succeed in improving conditions in the area more assuredly and acceptably than would be possible through closer links with the Iron Curtain countries. Punte del Este focussed attention on the unity of the area in its opposition to communism, and has led to a vague but nevertheless widespread inclination to face realities, – to admit that if a choice must be made between the U.S. and Cuba, the U.S. presents by far the sounder course. This is not to say that there are none left to write "Cuba Sí, Yanquis No" on the walls. It means that many who were sympathetic to Castro in the early days are that way no longer. This change in Latin America is similar to the one which took place in attitudes in the U.S. itself: the main difference is that it has come later here. In Argentina, for example, a pro-Castro line was largely responsible for the victory of the Socialist candidate Sr. Palacios in elections to the Senate in February 1961. Within six months, Palacios and the bulk of his followers were attacking Castro and all he stood for. During the recent Punte del Este Conference, a number of Argentine trade unions passed a resolution urging the government to take a firm stand against Cuba. Almost certainly these same unions would have backed him 18 months before.

2. While many who previously supported Castro, or were uncommitted, have swung against him, the attitudes of those traditionally opposed to him have hardened. This change has naturally produced a change in the reactions to Canadian policies, and tended to make them more critical of those aspects which "appear" to conflict with Argentine viewpoints.

3. It must be admitted that very few Argentines or Uruguayans really know what Canada's policy is towards Cuba. Nevertheless the impression is widespread that we are:

- (a) taking advantage of U.S.A./Cuban difficulties to increase our export trade;
- (b) if not supplying a full list of strategic materials, at least sending enough to seriously undermine U.S. efforts to contain the Communist threat represented by Cuba;
- (c) sympathetic towards Cuba in its differences with the U.S.A. – and with various Latin American countries as well.

4. It is true that these are false impressions, but this does not mean that they are not widely held. Dorticós' statement at Punta del Este that a regular air service between the two countries had solved an acute spare parts problem conjured up visions of the Berlin air lift. The Cuban Chargé d'Affaires here, as well as the one in Montevideo, congratulated our officers at both missions on Canada's enlightened trade policy, implying of course that it helped Cuba in its struggle against the U.S.A. Such statements seem to make much more impact (and to receive better press notice) than do our reiterations of the true Canadian policy. In our day-to-day contacts here, we encounter more criticism of the "supposed" Canadian position than we do praise, – perhaps understandable because we meet more people of centre or rightist persuasion. Such misunderstanding of the Canadian position is not doing us any harm in an economic sense in Argentina, – our trade is unlikely to suffer unless the situation gets a great deal worse. On the other hand, the "image" is not one we can be very proud of. We cannot say what the trade impact will be in other Latin American countries, but the chances are in favour of it doing us harm in the U.S. Rusk, if he didn't threaten reprisals, let it be known that public opinion in the U.S. might make them necessary. It is clear from press clippings that the average U.S. citizen misunderstands the Canadian position despite all our explanations, and resents what he believes to be the true situation. (I gather that Rusk himself doubts the effectiveness of our strategic controls.) Unless this U.S. attitude can be corrected, the consequences to Canadian trade interests in the U.S. could be very serious. For example, we have a privileged position in that market with respect to oil. This could easily be withdrawn if we should lose general sympathy in Congress because of what is generally thought to be an unhelpful policy on Cuba. Other interests of considerable importance could also suffer.

5. In their quarrel with the U.S. the Cubans can be expected to do all they can to exacerbate Canadian/U.S. relations. Similarly Cuba will do what it can to poison relations between Canada and those other American states that have taken the hard line against Cuba, – e.g. Venezuela, Peru, Colombia, etc. Those countries that feel themselves particularly threatened with Cuban Communism will be bound to resent any Canadian policy which they believe aids Cuban influence in the area. No doubt the same misunderstandings exist in these countries as in the U.S.A. with respect to Canada's Cuban policy. Because our relations with these countries are less intimate the consequences of any misunderstanding are not so serious but they could easily be worrying. These countries see a threat from Cuba which they do not sense from Russia, China, or any of the other Iron Curtain countries.

6. Our cable contained our thoughts on one line we might take. We said:

"Answer might be to announce that although not member of OAS we have no desire to do anything in the current situation which would have the effect of thwarting even in part the objectives of the majority of the members and that we would favourably consider taking whatever steps the majority took in matters relating to Cuba. This might require minor policy changes but would provide the gesture which the present situation appears to call for."

7. Such a statement would not materially affect our current policy, but should satisfy the bulk of the Latin Americans. The U.S. could hardly expect us to do more than their associates in the O.A.S. so that they too might be able to relax.

8. A notice in this morning's paper to the effect that food rationing is to be imposed on the Cuban people is complicating. It would be unfortunate in our long-term relations with Cuba if the impression were to be left that food shortages on the island were due in any part to Canadian economic pressure. However, as long as we allowed food and medicines to move freely the damage would be minimized.

DESPATCH NO. 161

Mexico City, March 14, 1962

CONFIDENTIAL

Reference: Your letter XL-68 of February 22, 1962.

CANADA AND CUBA

This despatch is our reply to your request for comments on the general problem of Canadian relations with Cuba in the light of Mr. Rusk's remarks to our Ambassador in Washington, of the result of the Punta del Este meeting, and of Canada's general interests in Mexico. Since we had already reported on the Punta del Este Conference by cable and sent two despatches on the subject,† we did not reply by cable, as we felt these previous reports, in some measure at least, had dealt with the questions you raise.

Mexican Estimate of the Cuban Threat

2. As regards the Punta del Este Conference itself, we have nothing further to add to our description of Mexican policy bearing thereon. However, we have sounded the Foreign Ministry on its views on follow-up action to the Conference; and it is clear that whereas the Ministry agrees in some measure with the U.S. appreciation of the nature of the Cuban threat it differs sharply with the views advanced by Mr. Rusk, and by Mr. Rostow in Paris as to how the threat should be met.

3. The Mexicans are prepared to agree that Cuba represents a threat to the hemisphere along more or less the same lines described by Mr. Rostow, namely:

- (a) as an agent of Communist power;
- (b) as a rallying symbol for the Latin American left;
- (c) as a base for subversion.

Acting on the basis of this assessment, the Mexican Government is taking measures to prevent Cuban agents or Cuban propaganda from entering Mexico, and does not hesitate to harass those political groups in the country which admire and support Castro. Mexicans returning from Cuba are searched at the airport, and whatever literature they may have which is regarded as suspect, even though it may have nothing to do with Cuba, is liable to seizure. Demonstrations or meetings which may be planned by left-wing groups are not infrequently subjected to controlled limitation or even banned.

4. Internally, therefore, the Mexican Government is by no means timid in taking action against certain of the more overt forms of Cuban infiltration. It is still possible, however, to voice support of Cuba in the press, particularly in the periodical press. Speakers with pro-Cuban views are in frequent demand at the National University. Occasionally, they may be heard on university radio programmes, although not on commercial broadcasts. Communist literature is available in bookstores even though publications of the Cuban government are not. Thus, in general, the Government is attempting to follow a policy mid-way between repression of left-wing opinion and activities stimulated by the Cuban example, or in some cases by Cuban agents, and complete freedom for Cuban supporters to publicize their beliefs. This is not a policy easy to implement, as the Mexican Communist party is quite legal, even though numerically small. Groups supporting Cuba, therefore, could hardly be banned if the party is not. Nor would it be easy to reconcile a more restrictive policy with the necessity of the Government's maintaining support from the left, or with the provisions of the Mexican Constitution.

Mexican Aversion to "Intervention"

5. This somewhat ambivalent attitude, to some extent at least, also affects Mexico's attitude toward her formal relations with Cuba. At Punta del Este, the Foreign Minister argued the incompatibility of a Marxist-Leninist Cuba with the inter-American system; nevertheless, Mexico's bilateral relations with Cuba continue on a normal basis in accordance with the Mexican creed that the kind of government which a country supports is its own business, and is of no concern to Mexico unless such government interferes in Mexico's internal affairs. Thus far, the Mexican Government apparently has found no reason to believe that intervention is taking place on a scale sufficiently significant to warrant modification of its formal relations with Cuba, even though, as already stated, it sometimes acts internally as though it believed that Cuba may represent a threat to Mexican political stability.

6. Exactly what constitutes intervention is, of course, one of the basic problems, but the Mexicans are more prepared to take a broader view on this aspect of the matter than some other Latin American countries because of their deeply-rooted devotion to the concept of non-intervention deriving from their history. Mexicans have suffered much from intervention and, despite their advocacy of the incompatibility thesis they fear that direct action against Cuba would establish a precedent which could be used against other countries including themselves in other circumstances in the future, with consequent undermining of the whole basis for peaceful co-existence in Latin America. On the other hand, if it could be proved that Cuba was committing actual physical aggression, as was demonstrated in the case of the Dominican Republic and Venezuela, then presumably Mexico would support more direct sanctions against Cuba.

7. Furthermore, on a purely pragmatic basis, the Mexican authorities feel strongly that policies aimed at economic strangulation of Cuba will not achieve the overthrow of the present Cuban government. On the contrary, they argue that such measures would tend to strengthen the Cuban Government's position, both in terms of domestic popular support and in support from other Communist countries, and would thus be counter-productive. They would argue that Cuba should be left alone, either because they do not believe the Cuban people will support a Communist form of government indefinitely, or because they think that Cuba, if left alone, ultimately would loosen its ties with the Soviet Bloc, and perhaps develop into a sort of western hemisphere Yugoslavia. Finally, many Mexicans are conscious of the parallel between the Cuban revolution and their own revolutionary experience, and they are by no means ready to write off the Cuban revolution as a failure.

United States Appreciation and Policy

8. All of the above is by way of background to consideration of Canadian relations with Cuba and their effect on our relations with the United States. If I correctly understand Mr. Rusk's views as reported by our Ambassador in Washington, the U.S. would characterize the Cuban development as being essentially and principally a conspiracy whose objective is the subversion of the hemisphere, or at least of the Latin American parts of it, rather than as simply a domestic revolution seeking to replace an old order with a new one. The Secretary speaks of the “Battle for the Western Hemisphere,” asks us whether or not we accept the United States appreciation of the situation, and requests our views as to the best means of dealing with it.

9. He defines the aims of United States policy as not the overthrow of Castro (this I regard with some scepticism), but as:

- (a) The isolation of Cuba;
- (b) The denial to Cuba of the means to strengthen its economy, and thus prevent or limit Castro’s domestic success;
- (c) The denial to Cuba of the means of extending its influence and subversive activities to the rest of the continent;
- (d) Development of positive steps to demonstrate that Castro is not the answer to Latin America’s problems through implementation of such projects as the Alliance for Progress;
- (e) Enlistment of the cooperation of its allies in achieving these objectives on a multilateral basis.

10. To all this, the Secretary adds that Canada, as a western hemisphere country, has a special responsibility toward the Cuban problem, and that NATO countries generally should not regard Cuba merely as another Communist Bloc country, but as a special situation which constitutes a serious threat to the western hemisphere.

11. In general, I should think that one must agree with the U.S. appreciation of the seriousness of the threat if not with the appreciation of the fundamental reasons for the seriousness. There is substantial evidence to indicate that Cuba is attempting subversion in various parts of the continent. Moreover, there is no doubt that Castro has been a rallying symbol for the Latin American left, although lately the symbol may have lost some of its original bloom. Furthermore, to some extent at least, Cuba is functioning as a proselytizing agent of Communist power.

12. Nevertheless, I do not agree with the minimizing of the importance of the domestic aspects of the Cuban upheaval. It seems to me of cardinal importance to remember that the Cuban revolution is primarily and essentially an attempt to reconstitute a society which suffered from the political, economic and social ills common to many Latin American countries. One may condemn the methods used and oppose its current international orientation, but the essence of the threat, it seems to me, lies in the degree to which the movement succeeds in achieving its internal objectives and in establishing itself as an example to other Latin American peoples in search of release from conditions of life which they regard as intolerable.

13. One agrees with, of course – and welcomes – the Secretary’s assessment that Cuba does not constitute a direct military threat to the United States (and ipso facto to Canada). It is reassuring, moreover, to note that he dismisses military action against Cuba as a possible solution on the ground that it would be costly and would be “unsatisfactory” in many ways. The adjective I would apply to this solution would be “disastrous,” both in terms of its effects on United States relations with Latin America and with the non-committed countries, and, to a lesser degree, even with her allies.

The Policy of Isolation

14. Coming now to the first three objectives of American policy, enumerated in Paragraph (9) above, namely, isolation of Cuba – and by this I take it that the Secretary means isolation achieved by positive rather than passive means – and the denial to the revolution of the means to internal success and external subversion, I would be inclined to question the feasibility of isolation as a road to these ends. It is a self-evident fact that, short of military measures which are admittedly unacceptable, the United States has not the power to isolate Cuba from the Communist world; and I would doubt whether it has the power to isolate it from the non-committed world. Furthermore, unless it succeeds in convincing its NATO allies of the soundness of its current tactic, there is doubt as to whether it can isolate Cuba from significant areas of the Western world.

15. At the moment, there is an obvious disposition on the part of some Latin American countries to follow the U.S. line, but I would question whether or not even this measure of support is likely to continue on a long-term basis. Prospects are that we shall have more upheavals in Latin America like that of Cuba, or at least that governments which represent the aspirations of the people for social justice and a higher standard of living will come to power. Such governments would be unlikely to go along with the policy of isolating Cuba for, whether or not they agreed with the forms and methods of the Cuban revolution, they would inevitably be sympathetic toward its basic objectives.

16. Moreover, I am inclined to agree with the Mexican view that it would not be wise to seek to isolate Cuba by positive means even if this were feasible. We cannot be at all sure that such a policy would lead to a new revolution in Cuba. It would not cure the Cuban "infection" in Latin America, for the very fact that the Cuban revolution has happened is what "infects." Indeed, the spectacle of continuing Cuban resistance to continuing American pressure might well tend to increase Cuba's prestige and her power to influence the rest of the Americas.

17. I would argue, moreover, that it is a somewhat naïve view of the politics of Latin America to assume that the cutting off of Cuban efforts at subversion in Latin America will substantially increase the prospects for political and social stability in the region. I would contend that, not subversion, but the conditions of life of the mass of the people and the reluctance of entrenched power groups to accept peaceful change are the primary factors behind the drive toward reform and revolt.

Constructive Counter-Measures

18. If this view is valid, then it would seem to me the prime emphasis should be placed on the fourth and fifth objectives of U.S. policy enumerated in Paragraph (9) above, namely, on measures to meet the social and economic needs, and to satisfy the political aspirations, of the Latin American peoples, together with enlistment of the cooperation of the allies of the United States in achieving these objectives on a multilateral basis. This, of course, is an enormous undertaking, fraught with innumerable difficulties, but if it is not accomplished – Cuban subversion or no Cuban subversion – the consequences are likely to be seriously adverse to the interests of the Western world. In other words, I would argue that our tactic should be one of seeking to align ourselves with the forces of change in Latin America and trying to direct their expression along channels which would achieve consequences more or less acceptable to us. This approach may well fall short of complete success but any other it seems to me, is certain to fail. And frankly, I feel strongly that Canada, not only as a western hemisphere country but as a member of the Western Alliance, should be participating in this enterprise to a much greater extent than is at present the case.

19. Meanwhile, one asks, what should we be doing about current relations with Cuba? Here, I would be inclined to go along with the Mexican view and argue that for the time being at least, we should maintain a patient but watchful attitude toward events in Cuba itself, while at the same time seeking to counteract attempts at Cuban subversion in the rest of the hemisphere by encouraging constructive counter-measures by the West in the countries, towards which such subversion is directed. In other words, our offensive should be marshalled at the point of attack, not at the point of origin. This tactic may run counter to accepted military doctrine but this is not a military problem and it would seem to me to be sound psychology to concentrate our offensive on the areas where the issue remains to be resolved rather than on an area where, for the time being at least, it has been resolved.

Trade Policy

20. I would also urge the desirability of some elements of the West keeping open lines of political and commercial communications with Cuba; although in the case of Canada, I would agree that in seeking to follow this policy we should consider the susceptibilities of the U.S. Government and its problems with U.S. public opinion.

21. I do not believe we should embargo all trade with Cuba; in fact, if I understand Mr. Rusk correctly, he is for the time being at least not asking that we should do this. I do think, however, that we should try to reach an understanding with the U.S. as to what items should be included in the strategic list, and that where there is doubt as to individual items, we might go so far as to lean towards the U.S. view. I also think that we should make certain there is no evasion of our prohibition of re-exports of U.S. goods to Cuba. There should be no possibility of doubt on this aspect of the matter. Further than this, while maintaining our position on the desirability of keeping open some channels to Cuba, we might wish to consider taking such administrative measures as might tend to limit our trade with Cuba more or less to its traditional components and dimensions. I realize this could well present administrative difficulties, and that to a great extent the success or failure of such a manoeuvre would depend on its presentational handling; nevertheless, the price might be a reasonable one if it alleviated tension with the United States while at the same time enabling us to maintain our basic policy line.

22. I should perhaps add that Canadian official statements on our Cuban trade policy have received some publicity here, but that so far we have seen no adverse published comment; rather, the opposite. On the other hand, we would not be surprised to see or hear criticism in those quarters which habitually take a strong anti-Castro line, chiefly the business community and the Church, and during the past month I myself have encountered such criticism in a few individual instances.

Conclusion

23. I would conclude from the above that, barring overt aggressive action by Cuba against the territory of some other Latin American state, it is in Canada's general interest not to alter substantially our present relations with Cuba, although as mentioned we might take a careful look at certain items in our trade. For Canada to align her policies on Cuba with those of the United States, although it might please a number of Latin American countries, would not be welcome here. Mexico rather looks upon Canada as a hemispheric ally despite our hesitations about involvement in the affairs of Latin America, and they attach importance to our capacity for exercising some influence on American policy. United States views on such matters must, of course, weigh more heavily with us than those of Mexico. But the fact that Mexico's views are shared by other important countries in Latin America and the probability that the forces of social change will triumph sooner or later throughout Latin America are also factors to which, I would argue, we should give careful thought.

Washington, March 22, 1962

Dear Norman [Robertson],

Thank you for sending me with your letter of March 13† a copy of the memorandum on relations with Cuba which was put to the Minister before his departure for Geneva.

I am attaching, in response, a memorandum of our comments thereon. You will observe that I concur heartily in the final recommendations for early joint consultations with the United States and for the long-term study of the situation "in depth." At the same time, I have a number of comments from the Washington point-of-view.

We will look forward eagerly to the decisions that may be taken.

Yours sincerely,

CANADA'S RELATIONS WITH CUBA: THE VIEW FROM WASHINGTON

The re-examination of our policy to which the Departmental memorandum on Cuban policy of March 8, 1962, is directed, and which will necessarily require the careful consideration of Ministers, is essentially what I had in mind in following up the report of my discussion with the Secretary (our Telegram No. 515 of February 19) by my message No. 627 of March 1. The memorandum itself provides a useful basis on which such a re-examination can be conducted. As it, rightly, points out, such a re-examination will take a considerable time. It must necessarily include not merely a study of our present trade policies and their administration but also the important substantive political aspects of the problem posed by a Communist Cuba in the Western Hemisphere and how best to deal with it. I agree, therefore, as the memorandum concludes, that, with this in mind, it would be valuable for us to participate in preliminary exchanges of view at the official level with the Americans.

Accordingly, I agree heartily with the final recommendations of your memorandum for early joint consultations with the U.S. and for the longer-term study of the situation in depth (paras. 24 and 25). At the same time, you will not take it amiss if I make a number of specific and critical comments on various points raised in the body of the memorandum:

Paragraph 9: I am glad to note that the guidance of Ministers is being sought with respect to the discussions in a NATO context in the possible application of COCOM controls to Cuba. While such action would not involve any substantial modification in our own policy, I believe it is true to say that the Americans attach considerable importance to action by NATO governments to deny arms and strategic materials to Cuba. For geographic and other reasons, they regard Canada as having a special concern with this problem.

Paragraph 10: It is not accurate to suggest on the basis of my talk with the Secretary (I realize there have been other conversations with United States officials in Ottawa as well as here) that the United States “really wishes Canada to join in a quarantine of Castro.”<sup>11</sup> Rusk did not say this in terms, nor did he imply it; in fact, he took care not to do either. The opinions expressed by United States Congressional leaders during the meeting of the U.S.-Canada Parliamentary Group are something else again; our concern here is with the U.S. Administration.

Paragraph 11: None of these points ((i) to (v)) were raised as requests to us by the Secretary. Indeed, Rusk was meticulous in avoiding any request other than that we review the position ourselves in its broadest aspects and as a nation in the hemisphere. Nor has any U.S. official ever raised with me the question of our continued diplomatic relations with Cuba. If these points have been put to us in the way suggested in the memorandum, it must have been in talks (presumably in Ottawa) with “other U.S. officials.”

Paragraphs 12 - 15: The problems with which this section of the memorandum deals are, of course, of great importance in the review that is contemplated. I am sure that the Department will want to give careful study to the various reports which are coming in from our missions in Latin America in response to the Department’s request of February 22 for comments on the Secretary of State’s discussion with me. We have not yet seen all of these messages here. I think it fair to say, however, on the basis of those we have seen that there is a good deal of support among our colleagues in Latin America for a more positive emphasis in Canadian policy vis-à-vis Cuba. A number of our missions share our view here (again, our message of March 1) that a clear public statement of the Canadian position, including not only our trade measures but also our attitude with regard to Communist penetration in the hemisphere, would be useful at this time.

United States policy is not based on the assumption that economic pressure on Cuba will destroy Castro, or “bring him down” (para. 13 and the reference in para. 17), but rather that it will help to prevent the Castro régime’s gaining strength at home and abroad. It is directed at reducing the capacity of the régime to engage effectively in subversion in the Caribbean area and elsewhere in Latin America. The Americans may wish that we would adopt the same policy and measures; no doubt they do. But, apart from the requests put forward in NATO, decisions have been and are left to us.

Paragraphs 16 - 25: The latter part of the memorandum is, I think, particularly helpful and constructive. Our trade arrangements with Cuba cannot and should not be isolated from the broader perspective of our role in Latin America as a whole. It is in this area, I believe, that a fruitful exchange of views could take place. The memorandum makes some useful and positive suggestions about action that might be taken to put the Cuban problem in its proper framework. These include consideration of our current aid measures in the area and, in some form, closer relations with hemispheric institutions. I am not sure that aid to the Commonwealth Caribbean countries alone would have much impact in terms of our relations with Latin America. There are, however, a number of other measures – our membership with ECLA, our export finance facilities which are being used considerably in Latin America, and trade missions in the area as a whole – all of which could profitably be brought out in any new statement of policy as evidence of the importance we attach to the principles of the Alliance for Progress.

Perhaps of greatest importance in any review of the situation would be a thorough-going re-assessment of our own relationship to the inter-American system.

This reflected particularly comments by Merchant and Achilles. A.E. R[itchie]

From the two Punta del Este meetings a number of general conclusions can, I think, be drawn:

- (i) The OAS role in hemispheric affairs has been enhanced and strengthened;
- (ii) The OAS is the chosen instrument for implementing the Alliance for Progress to strengthen the base of democratic societies in Latin America by economic means;
- (iii) Economic and social problems facing the Latin American Republics have taken on new urgency against the backdrop of Communist subversion based on Cuba and fed by Castro;
- (iv) Failure in the cooperative effort to improve the living standards in Latin America could result in the division of the hemisphere with grave political consequences for the North American countries.

In fact, there are grounds for concluding that the OAS is gaining vitality, not only on the economic side but also as a more effective political and security entity. Such developments are of significance to Canada.

So far, we have had well-founded misgivings about joining the Organization. We have been reluctant to get involved in the political turmoil which often prevails in Latin American countries. We have recoiled from the prospect of being wedged between the United States and the Latin American countries. We have also feared that participation in the OAS might cause undue strain upon our resources.

Be that as it may, I am inclined to believe that, sooner or later, mainly because of geography, but also because of our broader world interests, Canada will have to join the OAS or accept increasing criticism from the Latin American countries. At this crucial time when they are confronted with the threat of Communist subversion and economic instability, I believe that a gesture of solidarity on our part could be of considerable importance. Quite apart from views of the United States, there is reason to believe that the Latin Americans feel disappointed and mystified at Canada's unwillingness to join the Organization and to take a more active part in the problems of the hemisphere.

My own hope is that there will be a thorough and serious re-examination of our relationships to the hemisphere and to the OAS in particular. It will, I believe, be more and more difficult for us to postpone a decision on membership, and the later it is taken, the more likelihood there will be that our decision will have to be taken under pressure.

Finally, when our review is completed, careful attention should be given to the public presentation of our position both in the United States and elsewhere, particularly in the hemisphere. At the level of public, including Congressional, opinion in this country, the Cuban problem is an extremely serious one in terms of Canadian-U.S. relations. While our first attention should be devoted to developing an adequate response to the Administration's suggestions for consultation, we should follow up actively the related question of measures to ensure so far as possible that our position is not intentionally or unintentionally distorted, but is understood as widely as possible. In this last connection we should, I believe, put our attitude and policy with respect to Cuba in the broad context of our interest in, and concern for, the problems facing Central and South America and the Caribbean area.

CANADA – CUBA RELATIONS

As you know, most of our missions in Latin America were requested to send in their views on the question of Canada's relations with Cuba in the light of the Rusk-Heenev interview of February 16, 1962, the results of the Second Punta del Este Conference and of Canada's general interest in the country to which they are accredited.

2. Our missions generally recognize the validity of Mr. Rusk's contention that Cuba is a threat to the security of the Hemisphere, to the stability of Latin American governments and to the peaceful development of the area. The majority point out that the danger comes on the one hand from the exemplary value of the Cuban experiment and on the other from the subversive activities orchestrated from Havana.

3. It would appear that Canada's policy of maintaining diplomatic relations and trading in non-strategic goods with Cuba has not led to misinterpretations in the more important countries of Latin America. In particular, the policies of Brazil, Mexico and Chile are practically identical to those pursued by Canada vis-à-vis Cuba. The independent stand of Canada is also generally approved by Venezuelans and understood by the Venezuelan Government in spite of their own particular grievances against Castro. However, Canada's treatment of Cuba appears to be widely misunderstood in those Latin American countries which adopted a hard line against Cuba at Punta del Este, last January: Peru, Colombia and the Central American states. These countries seem to equate trading with Cuba with political support of the régime, or more generally with indifference to other than purely mercantile considerations.

4. None of our missions suggests that substantial changes are needed in Canada's current policy. Nevertheless, considering the general context of our relations with the United States and the recent approach of the State Department, most missions recommend that Canada should go some way towards meeting Mr. Rusk's suggestion that we should review our Cuban policy.

5. The majority emphasize the need for a clear-cut statement of Canadian policy designed to remove current misunderstanding (such a statement should contain a strong censure of Cuba). In general, practical recommendations are limited to a possible broadening of the list of strategic exports to Cuba. Two missions specify that this broadening should be in the direction of spare parts or manufactured goods, the lack of which is particularly damaging to the Cuban industry.

6. Our missions in Rio de Janeiro, Santiago and Lima refer specifically to economic and social progress as the most effective answer to Castroism or Communism in the Hemisphere, and recognize the merits of the Alliance for Progress in this connection. They suggest that even though she is not a member of the OAS, Canada should contribute aid to Latin America through the Alliance for Progress programme or through other aid media such as the Inter-American Development Bank. Mr. Tremblay suggests that a substantial contribution to the latter would constitute the simplest and most effective demonstration of our "fundamental solidarity" with other countries of this Hemisphere despite differences of view on trade with Cuba.

7. To sum up, Canada need not introduce major changes in her Cuban policy. However, it is generally felt that some gesture on our part is required if we care to avoid further antagonizing the United States, and that a shift of emphasis is indicated if we wish to correct the impression created in many Latin American circles that Canada is moved principally by mercantile considerations.<sup>12</sup>

U.S. CONTROLS ON IMPORTS WITH HIGH CUBAN CONTENT

Mr. Willis Armstrong of the United States Embassy told me at noon to-day that the U.S. government will be announcing to-morrow a ban on imports into the United States of goods from third countries which have a very substantial Cuban content. He was not certain of the proportion of Cuban content which would bring any product under the ban. His understanding was that the main items affected would probably be cigars and tinned pineapple.

2. Mr. Armstrong indicated that this action would be taken under the Trading with the Enemy Act. It would not, however, involve any attempt to apply controls to activities of U.S. subsidiaries or U.S. nationals abroad. While the legislative authority was the same as that for the Foreign Assets Control Regulations, the United States Government was not in fact taking this action under those regulations. The new decision would only affect goods which were being imported into the United States.

3. Mr. Armstrong emphasized that there is no intention of interfering in anybody else's affairs; all that was being sought was an effective method of preventing evasion of the United States embargo on direct imports from Cuba.

Dear Alfred [Pick],

I wanted to drop you a line to send you my very best wishes on your new appointment. It is certainly good to know that Latin American affairs will be in such capable hands, and I personally look forward to renewing our former association.

Seen by SSEA 31/3. R. C[ampbell]

Over the past year I have followed with interest your many reports analyzing events in Peru, as well as the accounts of your visits to Bolivia. From your valedictory despatch† I gather you are leaving Lima with some concern as to the course of future developments.

It may perhaps be useful to take this occasion to mention one or two matters related to the operation of this mission. The first point on which I should like to say a word or two is that of Canadian policy towards Cuba. When I was first posted to Havana last summer I had hoped to get some sort of policy statement from the Department on this subject. For various reasons this did not prove possible at the time, and it was therefore my hope that this gap would be filled when my Letter of Instructions was sent down. However, I gather that this document has also encountered certain roadblocks. After almost a year in Havana the Letter is no longer as essential as it first was, but a guidance memorandum on Canadian policy towards Cuba would still be most useful.

Admittedly one can glean something from ministerial statements, and clues as to the trend of thinking in the Department also appear in various official papers. This, however, does not fully satisfy our needs here, particularly as our policy has at times appeared from this vantage point to be somewhat ambiguous, and in any event the situation here has undergone a change. It would therefore be of great value to have some clear indication of the lines of our present policy thinking, even if only informally. This would help in such matters as judging what attitude to adopt when aspects of Canadian policy come up in discussions with Cuban officials, in shaping our reaction to Cuban policies, as well as deciding what public functions to attend here, which increasingly are employed by the Cubans as a propaganda forum directed against not only the United States and other "imperialist" powers but against the West in general.

I fully appreciate the difficulty of doing anything on this score during the next month, but would be grateful if you could bear it in mind for later in the summer. If you should find it possible even on a personal basis to give me an outline of how you see current Canadian policy towards Cuba and the relationship of the inevitable American shadow to this question, this would be extremely helpful.

While on this subject I was also wondering if the mission could in future receive more Departmental papers dealing with Cuba than we have been getting in the past. We have, for example, seen no Departmental memo on the results of the survey of our posts conducted following the Heeney-Rusk talks. I realize that in many cases memos going up to the Under-Secretary and/or to the Minister may be of a tentative nature or may not always crystallize fully, but it would nevertheless be useful to see these as an indication of the trend of Departmental thinking. If you prefer, I would be very happy to get such material on a "read and destroy" basis only so that it would not form any permanent part of the mission's files. Anything you feel you can do in this regard will, I assure you, be most welcome since I have at times in the past felt a little out of touch in this field.

You may perhaps have already heard from Supplies and Properties or Defence Liaison (2) that we are anxious to find new chancery premises. Our present location is not only very inadequate from a security standpoint but, like so many facilities in Cuba today, the building in which our offices are located has sadly deteriorated and it is no longer very suitable for a mission for a variety of reasons, and would be particularly vulnerable if we had to face another emergency situation again. We have a house in mind but have not yet succeeded in prying it loose from the Cuban authorities.

Finally, let me say that I should be only too happy to hear from you at any time if there is a particular aspect of the Cuban scene on which you feel the need for additional information. We naturally try to cover the waterfront within the limit of our capacities but may not always be cognizant of the special requirements of the moment.

I trust you found your charming home in Rockcliffe had been well looked after in your absence and are getting well settled into the pleasures of Ottawa life again. Lola joins me in sending Patricia and yourself our very best wishes.

Yours sincerely,

GEORGE P. KIDD

LETTER NO. 401

Havana, August 16, 1962

SOVIET MILITARY AND ECONOMIC ADVISERS FOR CUBA

In recent weeks there have been widespread rumours in Havana that Soviet troops have been landed in Cuba. These rumours were picked up by the United States and Canadian press. As you know, a State Department spokesman has said that a large number of Soviet experts, both military and economic, have been brought to Cuba during the past three weeks on five Soviet ships, but that the story of the landing of 4,500 soldiers appeared to be without foundation. The U.S. keeps a watch on shipping to Cuba and a specially equipped radar vessel was visible off Havana at the time the Soviet ships were arriving.

2. For its part, the Havana press reported that a large group of experts of "different levels" who will work in the various branches of the national economy arrived here on August 6 aboard the Admiral Najinov. They were greeted by Che Guevara and Carlos Rafael Rodríguez. A number of local reports suggest that in addition to those who came ashore openly, others may have been brought in surreptitiously at Havana itself, Mariel, Matanzas and Casilda, which is the port of Trinidad on the south coast of Cuba. Rumour also has it that 100 men, taken from a Soviet ship on the high seas, were brought into Bahia Honda at night on two small pleasure cruisers.

3. There are various stories that non-Cuban soldiers have been seen; seven groups of twenty-five men at the base near La Coloma; twenty trucks filled with troops on August 6 at Guanito near Pinar del Rio; a column of tanks and vehicles with Russian drivers on a highway leading from Mariel and Russian manned tanks participating in military manoeuvres near Trinidad. Another claimed that there were movements of tanks and artillery, starting on the 7th of August, at the San Julien Air Base near Las Martinas and that a number of Orientals were seen. The Torrens Reformatory School, near Havana, was cleared out about a month ago and turned over to the armed forces. A member of the Embassy drove by and saw a number of young men in blue shorts who did not appear to be particularly Cuban in appearance. He noticed no Negroes amongst them, but he saw at least one man who was undoubtedly Slavic. The area was guarded by Cuban soldiers and there are known to be Cuban troops stationed in the neighbourhood. The Reformatory had extensive sleeping accommodation but, nonetheless, a number of small tents had been put up.

4. We usually try to avoid wasting our time and yours in reporting unsubstantiated rumours. In the present case, however, the rumours have been both more wide-spread and more specific than usual and in some instances we have received accounts alleged to be first hand. Indeed some claim that the rumours were initiated by government sources. Like the State Department,

I discount the more far-fetched rumours; for example, that there are now 18,000 international volunteers on the island including a large contingent of North Koreans or that actual Soviet units are in the country. It seems reasonable to assume, however, that a fair number of Soviet military advisers are now working with the Cuban armed forces.

5. Given the local situation it would be a perfectly plausible development. It stands to reason that the armed forces are in as much need of technical advice as other sections of the Cuban community. If it is necessary to teach Cubans how to care for Russian tractors, the same must hold true for tanks, artillery or helicopters. Indeed, the need may be greater because the Cuban army was completely rebuilt from guerrilla forces and new recruits and as a result lacks officers and technicians fully trained to use modern equipment. It has been the local assumption that at least a few Russian and Czech advisers have been helping the Cuban armed forces for some time. It is likely that the number has now been increased and may possibly include experts in some special fields such as paratroop training. I would think that the Russians would view this as strictly a question of providing military advisers rather than stationing troops in Cuba, but if the number of advisers were to reach a certain point, there might be little difference between the two.

6. All this appears to be a part of a general stepping-up of technical assistance to Cuba. The Russians are training a group of young Cubans, who recently graduated from a fishery school, aboard five Soviet fishing vessels which are to be turned over to the Cubans when they have mastered the necessary techniques. Over 1,000 Cubans are to go to the Soviet Union for training in agriculture, farm management, and the operation and maintenance of farm machinery. This is more than went last year and they are being selected with greater care. They are to be sent over on the ships bringing in the Soviet experts. A new group of Soviet agricultural specialists are thought to be included amongst the experts that have just arrived. More Soviet technicians are apparently on the way. It was announced from Moscow this week that doctors, musicians, singers and dancers, as well as 100 Russian language professors, are to be sent here as teachers.

7. The flight of the Cuban middle-class and the earlier departure of American and other foreign residents has deprived Cuba of a large part of its educated, trained manpower. Soviet technical assistance is desperately needed to fill this gap. From the Soviet point of view it may be the easiest kind of assistance to provide for there may well be a greater supply of agricultural experts than agriculture produce available for export. Moreover, there is no point in sending tractors or tanks if the Cubans are going to break them after only a few months of use. It remains to be seen whether the Soviet experts can deal successfully with the technical and human problems they will run up against. Past experience would point to limited rather than complete success, for the Cuban is not psychologically disposed to view the Russians as the repository of all technical know-how and often does not take too readily to advice and direction from foreigners. In any event, it would seem that the Soviet Union is launching a greater effort both in a military and an economic field to provide the Castro government with the skills necessary for survival. I will send a further report on the latest developments in the technical assistance field when more information becomes available.

TELEGRAM 172

Havana, September 13, 1962

CONFIDENTIAL. OPIMMEDIATE.

CUBA AND USSR

This week's Soviet declaration on Cuba<sup>13</sup> came at a time when Cuban leaders were showing some signs of nervousness at strong reaction in USA over presence of Soviet military personnel in Caribbean. With limited additional Soviet military assistance predictably provoking rather than deterring USA, the Cubans were right to press USSR for a statement of support. The Castro régime knows value of USA enmity for rousing patriotic fervor but it prefers for this purpose a paper tiger, not repeat not a live one.

2. The declaration has been enthusiastically welcomed by Cuban press with one paper featuring it in a full page headline "Khrushchev to Kennedy, Rockets on USA if it Invades Cuba." Raúl Castro has commented that Cuba has no repeat no words with which to express its gratitude to USSR. Fidel Castro, however in a fiery address delivered just before declaration was released in Moscow spoke at length of threats of a USA invasion and of Cuba willing to die in resisting it but he avoided any mention of Soviet assistance in such an eventuality. Indeed he presented issue as a moral one, of a small country wishing to work out its revolution in peace which was menaced by a forceful and voracious aggressor. Perhaps he had been bluntly told that USSR would make its own statements with regard to any aid which it intended to provide or perhaps he recognized risk inherent in Cuba becoming just another Cold War question.

3. While Soviet declaration is designed for maximum propaganda advantage it would also seem to represent a new stage in Cuban-Soviet relationship. Following on the heels of recent accord signed in Moscow earlier, it represents deepest Soviet commitment yet made to Castro régime. Moreover Cuba has been placed more prominently in (group corrupt) East-West differences to be dealt with in the same context as Berlin and disarmament. Soviet prestige has also become almost as much bound with success of Cuban Communism as USA prestige with its failure. Whether or not the USSR would make good on its threat it might feel impelled to take retaliatory action of some kind in an invasion of Cuba.

4. If USSR is really accepting increased responsibilities for Cuban defence it would not repeat not be unreasonable to assume it would insist on exercising greater control over Cuban policy and centre of gravity for major Cuban policy decisions may shift even further from Havana to Moscow. It would be intolerable for USSR to be at mercy of unpredictable act of a small undisciplined ally. I doubt however that control can be fully exercised without creating friction.

5. Despite all verbal sounds and fury both USSR and Cuba seem to be proceeding in fact with some caution and to have taken note of President Kennedy's warnings. The Soviet's declaration specifically states that long-range missiles will not repeat not be installed in Cuba and Cuban authorities are being careful to avoid incidents at Guantanamo, on high seas or with

<sup>13</sup> Voir/See "Text of Soviet Statement Saying That Any U.S. Attack on Cuba Would Mean War," New York Times, September 12, 1962, p. 16.

USA planes. Despite some press reports to the contrary the Cubans have not repeat not claimed that they have received an iron-clad military guarantee from Russians and Roa in a conversation with me last night specifically denied such a guarantee existed.

6. The Cubans might easily take formal Soviet assurance of assistance as a green light for a more reckless policy in promoting Castro's Communism in Americas. For this reason alone the USSR may keep extent of their commitments ambiguous. Jingoism is in full flower among Cuban extremists and they unfortunately have inherited strange Spanish combination of preoccupation with and disregard for death, buttressed in their case by a blissful ignorance of facts of modern warfare and Cuba's intrinsic importance and strength. On the other hand there is no repeat no indication that Cuban authorities expect an early attack and security measures especially two weeks ago (see my telegram 161 August 31†) have been relaxed somewhat. If USA retains its composure the Cuban exultation should soon subside and Cuba will be face to face once more with their less heroic and very intractable economic problems. The need for Soviet economic and military aid is a confession of failure by régime but there is no repeat no reason to suppose with help [of] this aid and machinery of control at hand it cannot repeat not retain power for immediately foreseeable future.

SOVIET MILITARY ASSISTANCE TO CUBA

The presence of Soviet military personnel in Cuba was an open secret well before it was publicly acknowledged in the communiqué issued at the conclusion of Che Guevara's recent trip to Moscow. Russian soldiers could not function in Cuba without being seen, but the initial security precautions gave time for them to be landed before United States public opinion became aroused.

2. We are not equipped to secure full information on the number of Soviet troops here or the functions they are performing. The information released by President Kennedy, however, strikes us as reasonable and in accordance with such information as we have been able to gather. Convoys of military trucks driven by seeming Soviet soldiers have now been seen by many westerners here, including members of the Embassy. While the men are clad in civilian garb, sometimes wearing sportshirts which come in three or four different colours, there can be no mistaking their military bearing and Slavic physiognomy. A convoy we saw on the road from Quiebra to a small naval base in the bay of Mariel consisted of tank trucks, an enclosed canvas-covered truck seemingly for transporting personnel, and trucks pulling small square trailers, the function of which was unclear.

3. The Soviet personnel appear to be operating in self-contained units. Whether or not they are all going to be employed in training Cuban forces remains to be seen. In fact, the permanent use of Soviet supporting units would provide a measure of Soviet control over Cuban freedom of action, not altogether unwelcome to Moscow in view of the present tense situation and the Cuban penchant for irresponsible action.

4. The Russians are reputedly operating radar and other electronic equipment required for guiding MiG planes and for anti-aircraft and ship-to-ship missiles. Although such aid is essentially defensive, the Soviet Union might later try to slice the salami further, if this could be done without triggering U.S. intervention. There are, no doubt, ways that Cuba could be militarily useful to the Soviet Union (missile tracking stations, radar installations, submarine refuelling and supply depots, etc.). On the other hand, for security reasons alone, the Soviet Union might be reluctant to send its latest equipment to Cuba.

5. We assume that there were substantial military reasons from the Cuban standpoint that led to the agreement to station Soviet forces personnel in Cuba. Possibly the efficiency of the Cuban Army, its ability to use Soviet equipment and its overall capacity to prevent any exile incursions or the establishment of guerrilla beachheads was considerably lower than the Cuban Government had managed to make out. Even now it may prove difficult and prohibitively expensive to police, effectively, the extensive Cuban coastline, particularly when the three-mile limit makes it so easy for small vessels to nip in and out. (This could have an effect upon the U.S. approach to the law of the sea.) Nevertheless there have been some indications recently of a strengthening of the coastal and air defences of Havana. President Kennedy has termed this upsurge in USSR military aid as essentially defensive in character and said that it would not notably impede any action against Cuba which the United States might at some future time be compelled to undertake. If this is correct the aid would, therefore, seem destined to increase the Castro régime's ability to prevent exile-sponsored attack or subversion. A secondary objective may well be to raise the military cost of direct U.S. intervention. It is also worth bearing in mind that a strong well-trained military force in Cuba could, the U.S. permitting, send emergency help to a revolutionary régime newly established elsewhere in the Caribbean, as well as providing covert assistance and training to Latin American revolutionaries. To the extent that the aid may be designed to improve the Government's capability of controlling the population it could have serious domestic political repercussions. Even now the presence of Soviet military personnel in Cuba and the publicity given to them creates a certain impression of satellite status to the Cuban people which runs the risk of offending national pride.

6. Early this spring the Soviet Union had to decide whether to accept the likelihood of the ultimate collapse of the Communist experiment in Cuba or to try to bolster the régime by increased military and economic assistance. They obviously chose to stand by their problem child, for the present anyway. The decision must have been made around the time Kudriavtsev, the previous Soviet Ambassador, was removed. The visit of Raúl Castro to the Soviet Union this summer can be seen in retrospect to have had more military significance than we gave it originally, although in view of the time factor he can have done no more than reach final agreement on measures probably already provisionally agreed upon.

7. Our Embassy in Moscow is doubtless in a better position than we are to speculate on the motives for the Soviet action, but perhaps it is worth passing on some of the ideas of myself and others in Havana. One theory is that the Soviet Union was deliberately trying to provoke the U.S. into taking armed action against Cuba which would damage the U.S. image abroad, and particularly in Latin America, and thus allow the Russians to take retaliatory action in a part of the world of greater intrinsic value to them. I doubt myself that this is the reason for their help, but it obviously provided them with a fall-back position. In any case, from a Soviet point of view, it might have been preferable to force the marines to move in and destroy the Revolution than to see the Cuban experiment with its Communist label crumble of its own weight as a result of its domestic shortcomings. Another possibility is that the Soviet Union knew that the United States was unlikely to attack Cuba, but counted on Soviet assistance calling forth bellicose statements which would damage the United States' reputation in the neutralist world and throughout the hemisphere by presenting a picture of an Uncle Sam nasty, vicious, weak and senile. The Soviet Union could then impress the world by rattling its rockets to prevent an attack of which, in fact, there was no danger. This view, I think, is overly Machiavellian, although Soviet propaganda would naturally exploit any opportunities open to it.

8. The volume of aid now being provided and the risks which the Russians are accepting, in view of the uncertainty of what reply the United States would make, suggests to my mind that a Communist Cuba has become a matter of greater importance to them or at least that its demise at this time was too grave a blow to bear. The Soviet Union has its position as the leader of the world Communist movement to take into account. The establishment of Communism in Cuba and the aid being provided can be used to demonstrate, in refutation of Chinese insinuation, that the Soviet Union has the wisdom and generosity required of the leader of this movement. Nor should one perhaps overlook an element of revolutionary romanticism and Communist idealism in the minds of Soviet leaders. But, possibly over and above these considerations was the prospect of Cuba's potential future value in the cold war. In the international chess game Khrushchev may wish, in the words of The Economist, to say to the United States "Take my pawn in Cuba and you risk your castle in South Vietnam or your Berlin queen."<sup>14</sup> From choice the Soviet Union might have preferred to avoid a direct challenge to U.S. power in the Caribbean, but it not unnaturally took advantage of the opportunities which so unexpectedly opened up in Cuba, and it must have seemed like sweet revenge to follow precedents established by the U.S. on the periphery of the U.S.S.R. Besides, if you are preaching a religion, it is hard to refuse converts.

9. It is unpleasant for North America to have Soviet power take root in the Caribbean. There are, however, perhaps one or two minor assets in an otherwise dismal situation. Strategically Cuba is as vulnerable as Berlin; in one way even more so, since an air-bridge could not keep its economy afloat. In the same way that U.S. world-wide commitments have limited its freedom to take action against Cuba, the Soviet Union may now find its stake in Cuba politically inhibiting in Berlin and elsewhere, at least to the extent that it values the survival of the régime here. Moreover, the level of aid required by Cuba could serve as a warning of the possible economic cost to the Soviet Union of Communist advances in the underdeveloped world. If so much must be spent on Cuba, what would be required for the 70 million citizens of Brazil? The Soviet bloc has taken Cuban sugar, but could they absorb Venezuelan oil? Finally, even with aid, the long-term survival of a Communist régime in Cuba is far from assured and, indeed, the deeper Soviet involvement in the island may ultimately weaken further the popular basis of Castro's original support. A rejection of Communism by Cuba would represent a serious blow to the myth that the Communist tide comes in but never goes out.

RELATIONS WITH CUBA

The Cuban Ambassador called on me today by appointment on what was said to be an urgent matter. He wanted to know whether Canada was changing its commercial policy towards Cuba as he claimed there was some concern in Havana about this possibility. He said they had received a recent indication that Japan was about to curtail or terminate its commercial relations with Cuba or had done so. Up to now there had been a fair volume of trade between Japan and Cuba, I think mainly Cuban sugar for Japanese machinery. I told him that we had no knowledge of a change in Japan's trade policy on Cuba (we shall try to learn about this from our Embassy in Tokyo).

2. He could provide no basis for the alleged concern that we might be about to restrict our present trade with Cuba. When I mentioned the withdrawal of the commercial officer from Havana, he said that he knew of this and realized that it should not affect our trade as most of the business with Cuba is conducted through their office in Montreal.

3. When the discussion broadened and he attempted to probe into the future relations between Canada and Cuba. I took the opportunity to say there was growing uneasiness and anxiety here about the developments in Cuba's external relations. The increasing identification of Cuba with the Soviet world and the steadily worsening relations between Cuba and the United States could not but affect the outlook of Canadians on Cuba. It had been our view here that there was merit in maintaining normal diplomatic and commercial relations with Cuba as this policy might facilitate the return of Cuba to the Inter-American community where it properly belongs. However, relations had steadily deteriorated between Cuba and the United States as well as with many Latin American countries. I suggested that Cuba itself had failed to seek out sincere opportunities of restoring normal relations with the United States. The Ambassador claimed that on some five occasions Cuba had made offers to get on to a more normal basis with Washington, though I expressed doubt whether these had been very genuine attempts. I went on to say that because of Canada's very close relations with the United States in various domains, with which he was quite familiar, the very strained situation between Havana and Washington inevitably had repercussions on our own intimate relations with Washington.

4. After referring to matters which the United States had raised in NATO on relations of NATO countries with Cuba, the Ambassador asked me directly whether, if the United States requested us, we would terminate our commercial relations with Cuba. I refused to answer such a hypothetical question.

5. I think Dr. Cruz left understanding clearly we were not changing our present policy but without any real assurance as to the future. I assume that he will convey the substance of our conversation to his Government.

POLICY ON CUBA

Cuba has become an important element in the cold war in Washington and Moscow and at the United Nations. Cuba is also under consideration in NATO. In the light of the arrivals in July and August of Soviet military equipment and technicians in several Cuban ports, you may be interested in having a brief review of the situation behind the Sugarcane Curtain, an assessment of the recent Soviet assistance to the Castro régime and an examination of Canadian policy towards Cuba.

The Internal Situation

It would appear that over the past several months, the Fidelistas in the Cuban Government have been consolidating their position over their orthodox Communist allies. An outward sign of the Fidelista dominance may be the return to public prominence of "Che" Guevara, the Minister of Industries, and a relative withdrawal to the background of the orthodox Communists, with the exception of Carlos Rafael Rodríguez, the head of the National Institute of Agrarian Reform. Raúl Castro would appear to have played an important role in the negotiations which preceded the recent Soviet shipments to Cuba. Since the March purge of Anibal Escalante, there has been no report of progress in the formation of the United Party of the Socialist Revolution which is to replace both the Popular Socialist Party (Communist) and the already disorganized "26 of July" movement. Nevertheless the alliance of Fidelistas and orthodox communists, necessary as it is to both factions, seems to be functioning with some measure of smoothness.

The country is facing major economic problems. The health of the Cuban economy is greatly compromised by inefficient administration and an inability to make the adjustments required by its reorientation in the Bloc system. Whereas Cuba used to import large quantities of foodstuffs from the United States, the lack of foreign exchange limits the supply of food staples from abroad. The diversification of agriculture that has been attempted has not met with much success so far. Whereas Cuba used to obtain equipment and replacement parts from the United States, the U.S. embargo and the lack of foreign exchange imposes the total conversion to Soviet standards, specifications and tools of the whole industrial set-up from machinery of all descriptions, and spare parts for vehicles, to sugar refinery installations.

The immediate consequence is a shortage of food and other consumer items, growing dissatisfaction and a hardening of the government policies affecting industrial workers and members of the sugarcane cooperatives. Measures were decreed recently designed to introduce greater control, uniformity and efficiency in the labour field. The main stumbling-blocks of the Cuban economy have so far been widespread absenteeism in industry and the lack of manpower in agricultural activities.

It is believed that the system of vigilance represented by the 100,000 Committees for the Defence of the Revolution coupled with a trained police force and a disciplined army enable the government to meet what internal opposition there is in Cuba now. Nevertheless, the Cuban Government may have felt that massive aid from abroad was needed to prevent the opposition from endangering the survival of the régime.

Soviet Assistance

In reality Soviet assistance to Cuba dates back to February 1960 when Mikoyan visited Havana prior to the renewal of diplomatic relations between the two countries. Soviet equipment and machinery including arms have been arriving in Cuba throughout the two past years. It will be recalled that well-publicized reports of the C.I.A. indicated last February the extent of the Soviet arms build-up, including the number of MIGs and tanks estimated to have been delivered to that date.<sup>15</sup> The provision of Soviet technical assistance was embodied in the Mikoyan agreements and several hundred Bloc technicians were reported in Cuba as early as November 1960. However, Soviet aid reached unusual proportions in July and August last. Reports of landings of Russian military personnel were confirmed although there is little information on their numbers or the functions they are performing.

The whole operation appears to be part of a general stepping-up of technical assistance to Cuba. Logically the Armed Forces are as much – if not more – in need of technical advice as other sections of the Cuban community. The Cuban army, rebuilt from guerrilla forces, lacks technicians fully trained to use modern equipment. Bloc technicians are necessary to teach Cubans how to care for and handle the complex equipment supplied to Cuba.

If the Soviet military aid to Cuba is essentially defensive in character, as seems to be the view accepted by President Kennedy and his advisers, the aid would therefore seem destined to increase the Castro régime's ability to prevent or repulse attacks from abroad or subversion from within.

The United States and Cuba

The increasing attempts of the United States to contain and isolate the Cuban régime coupled with the highly emotional reactions provoked in important sections of the United States Congress and the press make it necessary for us to re-examine Canada's position on Cuba. On the whole, the United States up to the present has met with little success in seeking the co-operation of NATO allies in measures to reduce their economic intercourse with Cuba. The United States has now indicated that it will take positive action to prevent NATO shipping from participating in the movement of arms and other goods from the Soviet Bloc to Cuba. We can anticipate other proposals in NATO or unilateral actions by the United States designed to isolate still further the Castro régime with a view to bringing about its overthrow. It will be for history to decide whether the United States was itself largely responsible for putting Castro's Cuba into the Soviet camp; but there can be little doubt that it is increasingly oriented towards and identified with the Soviet world. Indeed, because something like 80 per cent of Cuba's trade is now with the Bloc countries, one may doubt the effectiveness of further United States measures in the nature of trading restrictions or even economic sanctions. There is also some uncertainty as to the extent the United States can put itself in the position of endeavouring to dominate the destiny of Cuba without arousing the latent anti-American and non-interventionist sentiments that exist throughout Latin America.

Canadian Interests

Apart from our natural and growing concern about the ever-increasing alignment of Cuba with the Communist Bloc, Canada has no direct quarrel with the Castro régime or concrete reasons for terminating normal diplomatic relations. Our specific interests in continuing normal relations with Cuba include:

<sup>15</sup> Pour un article de journal qui fournit ce type d'information sans toutefois prétendre l'avoir obtenue de la CIA, voir "Reds' Military Aid to Cuba Increases," New York Times, February 5, 1962, p. 13. For a news article that provided this sort of information, albeit without claiming to have acquired it from the CIA, see "Reds' Military Aid to Cuba Increases," New York Times, February 5, 1962, p. 13.

(a) Our trade in other than arms and strategic materials. This is of a diminishing character and it appears that this year our exports will be about only one-third of what they were last year – that is worth perhaps $12 million rather than $31 million. The prospects are that this trade will continue to decline because of Cuba's economic difficulties, increasing association with the Soviet Bloc and the drastic reduction of U.S. dollar earnings because of American trade regulations;

(b) There are in Cuba some 90 Canadian citizens, nearly half of whom are Catholic missionaries who enjoy the protection of our Embassy, as well as that of the Papal Nunciatura in Havana;

(c) The negotiations concerning the assets of Canadian life insurance companies, which are in effect in the hands of the Cuban authorities;

(d) We have an interest in the flow of information of a high and valuable character from our Embassy in Havana on the Cuban situation, and much of this is passed to the United States as well as Britain, which appreciate it.

(e) From a humanitarian point of view, our presence in Cuba is also being justified by the interventions which Canada has made in favour of Cuban prisoners. We have even been encouraged in this by the United States.

While our Embassy is a valuable source of information and, as such, is a "window on a dark courtyard," it cannot be said at this time that there is any prospect of our mission being used as a means of initiating some reconciliation between the United States and Cuba or bringing Cuba back into the hemispheric family. These possibilities cannot be excluded in the long run.

Recommendations

(a) Although concern can be expressed about the increasing identification of Cuba with the Soviet Bloc, with the implications this has for the security of the free world, there seems to be no substantial reason for terminating our present normal diplomatic relations with Cuba;

(b) Our trade policy on Cuba as explained in the past, including the Prime Minister's statement in the House of Commons last February 2 and the press release of the Canadian Embassy in Washington on the following day, does not appear to call for any basic revision or even restatement. We must be prepared, however, to have it misunderstood and misrepresented in certain circles in the United States. We should be prepared, however, to consider sympathetically any specific requests that we may receive direct from the United States or through American approaches to NATO to restrict our policy somewhat more. This might mean widening the concept of strategic materials on certain items, although our present policy appears already to be more restrictive than that of other NATO countries. We can, for example, renew assurances that government credits or guarantees are not being extended, and will not be, in any way to promote our trade with Cuba. A much more difficult problem would arise if we were asked to control in any way the transfer of funds to or from Cuba through Canadian banks. As indicated in my memorandum to you of September 26, there seems to be no good reason for giving the Cuban Government assurances that our trading policy with Cuba will remain unaltered in the future.

(c) In recent weeks, much of the discussion has turned on transport to Cuba, specifically the movement of Soviet aircraft in transit through Canadian territory and whether ships of Canadian registry or ownership are being used in the trade between the Soviet Bloc and Cuba, for the movement of persons, non-strategic goods or even arms.

It may be desirable to limit, if we can, the movement of Soviet civil aircraft through Canada to Cuba. It has not been established that any arms or military personnel have moved from the Soviet Bloc to Havana in this way, but a few recent flights have caused very adverse criticism in the United States. We should certainly enforce rules against any possible transport of arms in such aircraft. Even if Russian civil aircraft were not to move through Canada, there would still remain the problem of Czech and Cuban flights through Canada and Cuban flights to and from Canada, the latter involving, it appears, the overflying of United States territory.

It seems clear that no ships of Canadian registry are involved in the Cuban trade although there are a few ships of British registry, of nominal Canadian ownership but probably not substantial or beneficial Canadian ownership, that participate. In this domain, Canada can perhaps cooperate, at least passively, with the United States without any damage to Canadian interests. In any event, the United States by unilateral action is now going to go some distance to prevent NATO and other free-world shipping from engaging in the trade between the Soviet Bloc and Cuba.

Public Statements

It is not possible to anticipate all of the detailed and varied questions that may be asked in Parliament but it is thought that the following two paragraphs which have been tentatively included in your Handbook and are now submitted for your consideration, may be helpful to you:

MAINTENANCE OF NORMAL RELATIONS WITH CUBA

Canada wishes, without prejudicing its relations with other countries, to maintain normal trade and diplomatic relations with the Government of Cuba. It has long been Canada's practice to carry on normal relations with countries of a different outlook or constitution. The maintenance of diplomatic and commercial relations is not regarded by the Canadian Government as indicative of approval of a particular régime. The Canadian Government has not therefore joined moves to isolate Cuba. Most Western European countries maintain diplomatic, cultural, consular and trade relations with Cuba as well as with members of the Sino-Soviet bloc.

THE CANADIAN VIEW ON SOVIET MILITARY ASSISTANCE TO CUBA

The Canadian Government is concerned over the intrusion of international communism in the hemisphere. The recent arrival in Cuba of what appears to be large quantities of military equipment and important numbers of Soviet personnel does not, in the view of the Canadian Government, contribute towards the solution of Cuba's current troubles and difficulties and increases the international tension in the area.<sup>16</sup>

SHIPPING TO CUBA

You may wish to have a résumé of the recent measures the United States Government propose to take with respect to the problem of shipping to Cuba. According to the statement made by the United States Permanent Representative to the NATO Council on October 3, the United States intends to take the following measures:

1. The United States will close all United States ports to all ships of any country if any ship under the flag of that country hereafter carries arms to Cuba.
2. The United States will direct that no government cargo shall be carried on a foreign flagship if any ship of the same owners is used hereafter in Soviet Bloc trade with Cuba.
3. The United States will direct that no United States flagship and no United States owned ship shall carry goods to or from Cuba.
4. The United States will close all United States ports to any ship that on the same continuous voyage was used or is being used in Soviet Bloc trade with Cuba.

2. Our Embassy in Washington asked a State Department official whether the definition of ownership resulting in point 2 of the United States formulation given above would have the effect of depriving a Canadian flag vessel from participating in carriage of United States government cargoes if another vessel of the same owners but operating under non-Canadian flag were used in bloc trade with Cuba. The State Department official replied that the question of ownership was obviously a complex problem which would require the most thorough consideration. He agreed that the United States Permanent Representative's statement to the NATO Council was vague and imprecise on a number of points. He pointed out that these measures had not yet been formulated in executive orders and regulations or in legislation. Until they are formulated it would be impossible to say how certain potential problems might be dealt with.

3. These new United States measures will doubtless affect the Canadian-owned ships under British registry which have reportedly been engaged in Soviet bloc trade with Cuba. It is not yet certain that they will not affect ships under Canadian registry. They may indirectly affect Canadian trade with Cuba, as all carriers may now become reluctant to call at Cuban ports because of the adverse publicity they might receive in the United States.

CUBA

Congress has at last adjourned and, barring unforeseen crises, American public opinion is free to focus on the election campaign. You will be kept abreast of developments generally by the press but I should like to call your special attention to one issue, Cuba, which seems likely to be in the forefront of the campaign and which could well have an impact on Canada-USA relations.

2. We have as you know been relatively clear in recent months of direct criticism from the Administration on Cuba. Both Rusk in his conversation with you late in August and Ball in his testimony to a Congressional Committee two weeks ago have spoken understandingly of the Canadian position. While they would naturally welcome any further support or sympathy from Canada, and while concern about our general attitude lies not repeat not far below the surface, their heavy guns are at present trained on others whose cooperation could be more instrumental in intensifying the economic pressure on Castro.

3. From the Canadian standpoint this state of affairs is satisfactory as far as it goes, but it would, I think, be a mistake to take its continuance for granted. The Administration understanding of the Canadian position is one thing; the public impression is another, and perhaps just as important in prevailing conditions. It is regrettably true that both in Congress and in the press we continue to be the targets of criticism, much of it admittedly uninformed. This would be less a matter of concern were it not repeat not for the depth of the passions which have been aroused over Cuba. Unfortunately the sense of national humiliation is so pervading and the public feeling in favour of "doing something about Cuba" is so strong that it is almost impossible to exaggerate the inflammatory character of the issue. As the elections approach, the Republicans can be counted on the keep the fire burning. Toughness will become more and more the badge of patriotism. While the Administration's handling of Castro and the Moscow-Havana axis will be the focus of public judgment, verdicts will inescapably be passed on USA's allies according to what is publicly known of their respective attitudes. In this situation, every shade of outside sympathy is noted, every sign of reluctance magnified and emotionally assessed.

4. I mention these considerations because I am sure you will agree that they merit serious attention in the formulation of Canadian policy. It should, I think, also be borne in mind that, despite bitter memories of the Bay of Pigs and growing domestic pressures, the President and his colleagues, particularly the Secretary of State, are making a creditable attempt to maintain a public sense of perspective and restraint. It is very much in our interest that this attempt should not repeat not fail.

5. While there is perhaps not repeat not a great deal that we can do directly to help it succeed, I think we should recognize that the measures proposed recently in the NATO Council on shipping and overflights are in reality part of the Administration's effort to forestall the need for more extreme courses of action, e.g. recognition of a Cuban Government in exile, etc. Seen in this light, these moves are very much the lesser of two evils and deserve to be regarded, I think, as attempts at compromise solutions of problems which have neither been invented by the Administration nor repeat nor created solely by Republican political pressure.

6. In the public realm, I am impressed with the importance of our moving with special prudence on Cuban matters in the weeks to come. One has only to recall the harm which we suffered recently over the uninformed Globe and Mail report on Soviet flights through Gander<sup>18</sup> to appreciate the extreme sensitivity of American opinion. In the even more emotional mood of this moment, similar trouble could arise at any time. To the extent that we can forestall adverse comment on Canadian attitude, I think it is of great importance to do so.

7. I am not repeat not, of course, suggesting that we should distort our own judgment vis-à-vis Cuba itself or its relationship to the world situation but rather that in our dealings on this issue, we should bear in mind the benefits of doing what we can to encourage USA Administration in its attempts to assuage domestic pressures. If, for example, in our assessment of the current stage of the Cuba problem, we could suggest any constructive ways of helping in this connection, I am sure that the State Department would warmly appreciate having them. It goes without saying that our influence for moderation will be more effectively asserted with the Administration if we can show that we are not repeat not unsympathetic to them in their current difficulties. And to the extent that the USA's allies can contribute to resisting domestic pressures, the trend towards irresponsible and even dangerous courses of action may be arrested.

8. More specifically, I wonder whether it would not be wise to give serious thought to making some gesture of support to USA in the matter of transit for Soviet bloc aircraft destined for Cuba. It does not repeat not appear that we have much to lose from such action and the broader benefits might more than offset the disadvantages.

9. I would also suggest that our interests would be further served by ensuring that public attention is drawn appropriately to any moves we may make in sympathy with USA objectives.

LETHBRIDGE AND MARCH 29 TRIALS

This will confirm that you should make formal representations to the Cuban Government with a view to ensuring that trial of Canadian citizen D.N. TRIAL OF INVASION PRISONERS

I saw Foreign Minister this morning about forthcoming trial of invasion prisoners and spoke to him along lines of your telegram XL-27 March 26. Roa expressed understanding of humanitarian reasons motivating our approach and said that as with any Canadian approach the Cuban authorities would wish to take due account of our interest. He then went on to comment as was to be expected in the circumstances, that trial would of course be conducted in a fair and impartial manner. Roa concluded by stating he would be speaking to President this afternoon about approach on this subject already made by Brazilian Ambassador and Nuncio and that he would also report our concern in matter.

2. As per phone conversation with Chaput this morning, I further enquired whether it would be possible to have a member of Embassy present as an observer during some of trial proceedings. Roa replied locale of trial was not repeat not yet settled but he hoped to have this information shortly and would then let me know whether foreign observers would be able to attend.

3. I also, as authorized in above phone conversation, drew Roa's attention to Lethbridge case and am following this up with a formal note this afternoon.

TRIAL OF CUBAN INVASION PRISONERS

As you know, the Canadian Government has expressed to the Cuban authorities the hope that the trials of Cuban invasion prisoners scheduled for March 29 would be conducted in a fair and just manner. This appeal was based on humanitarian considerations. We have in addition made formal representations on behalf of Mr. D.N. Lethbridge, Canadian citizen, who is also a Cuban national. ... The Cuban Foreign Minister told our Ambassador yesterday that the Cuban authorities "would wish to take due account of our interest" in this matter. He went on to comment that the trials would of course be conducted in a fair and impartial manner.

All requests received up to now for Canadian intervention in connection with the trials have come from Cuban refugee organizations. The Canadian decision to approach the Cuban Government was announced in the House on March 27 by the Prime Minister. Requests from Cuban refugees have also been received by other Western countries, including the British and French. This matter is under discussion in NATO and also by Western and Latin American missions in Havana. In both cases it has been suggested that Western and Latin American countries make a joint diplomatic approach to the Cuban authorities once sentences have been passed. This approach might take the form of an appeal for clemency. I see a good deal of merit in this suggestion and consider that we should join in a collective démarche, in which a number of NATO and Latin American Governments may decide to participate. In view of the fact that we have already made representations on a bilateral basis, I do not think we need to take the initiative in organizing a joint approach in this case. If you agree with this course, our Ambassador in Havana and the NATO Delegation will be advised accordingly.<sup>19</sup>

LETTER NO. L-160

Havana, April 6, 1962

CONFIDENTIAL

CUBAN TRIAL OF INVASION PRISONERS

Hearings in treason trial of the 1,179 prisoners captured in the abortive landing at Playa Girón in April of last year have continued for four days in the courtyard of Principe Prison in the City of Havana, and adjourned on April 3, 1962. At the time of writing the Court has not yet reconvened to hear whatever might be the sentences to be handed down by the judges. The Court was essentially a military tribunal, presided over by Major Augusto Martínez Sánchez, the Minister of Labour, and by four other senior military officers: Majors Sergio del Valle, Juan Almeida, Guillermo García and Manuel Piñero, the latter of whom is a vice-chief of the Cuban security police. The first four named are also members of the Executive Committee of ORI. The trial has been held behind closed doors, and no members of the Western press or of the families of the accused, no lawyers offering their services to the prisoners, and no Western diplomats were admitted. Press reports have indicated, however, that "friendly journalists" (which, being interpreted, means representatives of the USSR, Chinese and East German agencies here, in addition to the local Cuban press) and certain "friendly observers" were present. The trial has proceeded through the stages of the arraignment and the pleadings by the prosecution and final addresses to the Court by the two attorneys. The Prosecution was led by Dr. José Santiago Cuba Fernández, who is Prosecutor of the Supreme Court of Cuba, while the only lawyer appearing for the Defence was Dr. Antonio Cejas, a rather nondescript attorney who is described as a Professor of Penal Law at the University of Havana and who was appointed by Cuban authorities to defend the accused.

2. Although the only information available to us is the fairly extensive reporting of the evidence of the trial in the Cuban press, part of which appeared to be a stenographic report of the proceedings, we are attempting to piece together an analysis of what happened during these

We should not get mixed up with NATO or the Latin Americans in this. H. G[reen] 30/3 four days. We must, however, underline the caveat that the only raw materials with which we have to work are the items of information made available by the Cuban Government in the local controlled press.

The Prosecution

3. The Prosecution opened by having the Secretary of the Court read a formal report prepared by the Special Investigator of the General Staff of the Cuban Armed Forces. This document, like so much of the other “evidence” introduced at the trial, seemed concerned primarily to recite a detailed account from the Cuban viewpoint of the invasion and the events leading up to it, placing particular emphasis on the Cuban charges that the invasion had been financed, trained, planned and generally organized by the United States Government and the Central Intelligence Agency. It also sought to implicate as much as possible those Central American countries such as Guatemala, Panama and Nicaragua, whose territories were allegedly used in preparing for the invasion, in addition to military camps said to be located in Louisiana, Florida and the Island of Vieques, Puerto Rico. The Prosecution’s submission went on to analyse the command structure of the military brigade which landed in Cuba and to specify the important leaders of the group.

4. Following this submission, the Secretary of the Court proceeded to read into the record of evidence transcripts of letters said to have been written by J.A. Perez San Roman, one of the principal leaders of the invading force. These letters were dated in May of 1961, shortly after the prisoners were captured. In them San Roman expressed his remorse and charged that he and his associates had been misled by the United States authorities into undertaking the landing and into misinterpreting local conditions in Cuba. He went on to urge counter-revolutionaries outside of Cuba to give up the struggle against the Revolutionary Government. A similar letter by another prisoner was also read. It is, however, impossible to tell from the records of the trial published in the Cuban press whether San Roman still stood by his earlier letters and whether he actually ratified them before the Court, or indeed whether the letter was genuine.

5. On the second day of the trial the Prosecution proceeded to have played for the Court transcriptions of the interviews which a considerable number of the prisoners had given before Cuban television cameras in that memorable week of April, 1961, when many of the prisoners were summoned before panels of Cuban journalists to answer questions about their activities. At that time it was evident that many of the prisoners were in fear of their lives, and there is no doubt that many of them then spoke very freely, and some even remorsefully, of their activities. Following the playing of each transcription, the prisoner was summoned to acknowledge that he had, in fact, made these statements. It would appear from the published accounts that at least a number of the prisoners did this. These recordings, which occupied many hours of the Court’s time, did bring out a number of points which the Prosecution was concerned to make: first, the implication of the United States Government in the invasion; secondly, the indication that the members of the force or their families were receiving wages from the United States Government for their military service. One of the most important of these recordings related to the declarations made on Cuban television a year ago by Manuel Artime Bueza, who was apparently the political leader of the military force. Artime had related in considerable detail the whole history of his activities in the months preceding the invasion, during which he had sought both inside and outside Cuba to organize counter-revolutionary activities. In connection with this particular part of the evidence, it is perhaps worthwhile to note that the Court was in fact accepting as self-incriminating evidence testimony which the prisoners had previously given in the context of television interviews about a year ago, when they were not in any formal sense on trial.

6. The Prosecution then moved to call as official witnesses a series of senior Cuban army officers who were leading members of the Cuban Armed Forces who had fought against the invasion force. By his questioning of these witnesses the Prosecutor sought to emphasize once again what he alleged was the “mercenary nature” of the invasion and the implication of the United States Government. In fact, the testimony of each one of these army officers amounted to a long speech or, in some cases, a harangue in which the invaders were bitterly denounced as traitors to their country. The Prosecutor also, rather shrewdly, sought to discredit the prisoners by eliciting from his witnesses accounts of the demoralization and disorganization which apparently existed among the invading force after they had encountered stiff Cuban resistance. With some relish one of the witnesses testified that San Roman himself, one of the leaders of the expedition, was among the first persons to surrender, even before he was actually captured. The Prosecutor also questioned his witnesses concerning what really were merely their opinions as to the degree to which the accused could be considered to have been conscious of what they were actually doing when they invaded Cuba. Several of the witnesses volunteered their own convictions that the invaders were seeking selfish, personal, material, class objectives; one witness even provided the court with a breakdown of the number of ranches, plantations, mines, banks and houses which were owned or controlled by the wealthy Cuban families from which many of the prisoners had, in fact, come. Some of the “testimony” of these official witnesses read like Marxist diatribes on the evil class interests of the accused as the scions of formerly powerful Cuban families. Others of the prisoners were denounced as “thugs” or “trash.”

7. It was particularly apparent that the interventions of the so-called Defence Attorney at this stage of the proceedings were extremely unsatisfactory and almost half-hearted. Many times he waived his right to cross-examine the witnesses, when even a non-legal mind would have thought, purely in logic, that he might have been able to discount some of the testimony which really amounted to no more than a one-sided expression of the political opinions and views of the official witnesses. Moreover, he tolerated the acceptance into the records of the trial of a tremendous amount of “evidence” and testimony casting aspersions on the character of the prisoners which might, under strict rules of evidence, have been considered inadmissible and quite irrelevant to the fundamental questions before the court. Thus, for example, one of the witnesses introduced several allegations concerning the misappropriation of Cuban official funds by Artime in the period before his defection when he had been an official of the Revolutionary Government working for INRA.

8. In his concluding address to the Court, which lasted for over two hours, the Prosecutor charged that all of the accused, without exception, were guilty of crimes against the stability and integrity of the Cuban nation, as “proven” by the documentary and testimonial evidence presented to the Court. He then drew to the Court’s attention the fact that the Cuban Social Defence Code and other relevant laws established for such treasonous crimes penalties of from twenty years’ imprisonment to capital punishment, and demanded “the most severe sentences” for these crimes. The Prosecutor did not explicitly demand that the sentence be death, perhaps because of the impossibility of demanding the execution of such a large group of prisoners. Although the Prosecution contended that the prisoners were in effect the authors of the crimes of which they were charged, he ended by claiming that the “other author” of these crimes was the President of the United States of America.

The Defence

9. The Defence Attorney did not really appear to play a significant role in the trial until his concluding address to the Court. Earlier, he had renounced his privilege of calling witnesses for the Defence, although the President of the Court was reported to have informed the defendants that each had the right to speak on his own behalf if he so wished. The Defence

Attorney explained to the Court that none of the accused had extended to him the necessary cooperation or information to permit him to call them as witnesses. Indeed, we are inclined to conclude from the limited information available to us that the prisoners did not accept the court-appointed attorney as their defender and refused to cooperate with him in any way in their defence.

10. In his final address to the Court, the Defence Attorney seemed excessively concerned with making his own position as a loyal Revolutionary performing a painful duty quite clear. He even spoke in terms of repugnance for the acts which he acknowledged they had committed. In his defence appeal he, himself, reiterated a number of the charges made against the prisoners by the Prosecutor, and referred particularly to the involvement of the United States in the invasion. He stated that he was not prepared to resort to the argument that because of the responsibility of the United States in the invasion, the culpability of the prisoners was diminished. However, he did go on to argue that the degree to which the prisoners had been "deceived" and "misled," and the degree to which their social outlook had been influenced by their environment and their class origins, should be taken into account by the Court in giving sentence. Then the Defence took a step which was doubtless not without its effect on the Court. He proceeded to read into the record of the trial passages of a speech made by the Prime Minister of Cuba himself, in a television appearance last April following the invasion during which Castro had engaged in public debate with the prisoners. The Defence Attorney placed emphasis on those remarks of the Prime Minister which suggested that the Cuban people could afford to and, being a generous people, would extend mercy to the prisoners. The Defence, then, in a long and emotional peroration, begged the Court for a sentence "which would be 'firm but just,' which would restore the peace which the invasion violated, and which would take into consideration, and make possible the future consideration of, the conduct and attitude of each prisoner so that they should not be punished forever by an extreme, lengthy or harsh sentence. Rather, he urged a decision which would grant the Cuban Revolution the necessary margin to demonstrate to the world its justice. He said that this should be done not by issuing death sentences or long prison terms, but rather by applying sentences "appropriate to individual cases."

11. At no time in the course of the trial was any reference made to the dual-national Canadian prisoner, Douglas Nelson Lethbridge.

CUBAN INVASION PRISONERS

You will already be aware from press reports that on April 14, 1962 some sixty of the 1,179 prisoners captured at Playa Girón who were recently sentenced to thirty years at hard labour were released by Cuban authorities and proceeded to Miami. This initial group was composed of prisoners who had sustained injuries during the landing. While it is not certain that the “ransom money,” fixed individually for each of the prisoners at rates ranging from $500,000 to $25,000 per head, has actually been paid for this initial group, we understand that the “Cuban Families Committee for the Liberation of the Prisoners of War, Incorporated,” which is located in Miami, has undertaken to pay their ransom to the Cuban Government, which probably amounts to some two or three million dollars.

2. We also understand that it has been agreed by the Committee, the Cuban Government and the spokesmen of the prisoners themselves that groups of prisoners should continue to be ransomed as funds are raised, starting with those at the bottom of the list, that is, those in the $25,000 category. However, we have been shown communications purporting to come from the prisoners themselves in Principe Prison indicating that they are becoming dissatisfied with the lack of progress to date in ransoming prisoners in addition to those sixty now in the United States. Although we do not know the strategy of the Committee, it is possible that they are attempting at the present time to raise sufficient funds to purchase the release of as large a group of prisoners as possible all at one time. We have heard that, to this end, arrangements are being made in New York to establish a publicity campaign to raise funds from the American public which will feature appearances by some of the prisoners already released on television programmes.<sup>20</sup> The estimated cost of ransoming all of the prisoners at the per capita figures set by the Cuban Court would be sixty-two million dollars, a very significant sum in view of Cuba’s present desperate shortage of foreign exchange. The Families Committee was said a few weeks ago to have accumulated over twenty million dollars.

3. One of the most unsatisfactory aspects of this unpleasant ransom scheme is the provision that families may ransom their relatives individually, which creates the possibility that extremely wealthy Cuban families in the United States with members among the prisoners, of whom there are more than a few, will be able to purchase their release, leaving behind, perhaps for months to come, those less well-connected. However, inequitable as this arrangement is, there are indications that it may be supported by the prisoners themselves.

NEGOTIATIONS ON CUBAN INVASION PRISONERS

Mr. Roa, the Cuban Foreign Minister, called in our Ambassador on September 1, 1962, to discuss a point that had arisen in current negotiations in Havana for the release of invasion prisoners between the United States lawyer Mr. James Donovan and the Cuban authorities. A settlement to meet the $62 million indemnification figure was being considered along lines of a small payment in dollars and the balance in food, medicines and agricultural products. Mr. Roa claimed that Mr. Donovan had proposed that settlement in kind should be carried out by purchases from Canadian firms. Before proceeding further with the negotiations, however, the Cuban government wished to ascertain the Canadian attitude. Specifically, Cuba wanted to be assured that the Canadian government would raise no objections to such purchases in Canada and would facilitate them to extent appropriate in such matters as granting export licenses and providing the Cuban Families Committee in the United States with suitable contacts with Canadian suppliers etc. The Cuban Families Committee in the United States would make the purchase directly from Canadian firms. Mr. Roa intimated that there were certain problems that could arise in direct purchase from the United States and that Canada with available supplies had been selected in order to expedite settlement. (A copy of our Embassy's telegram No. 162 of September 1/62† is attached.)

Our Washington Embassy at our request consulted the State Department on this question. They talked with Mr. Hurwitch, Deputy Director of the Office of Caribbean and Mexican Affairs, who, on September 3rd, had seen Mr. Donovan in New York, on the latter's return from Cuba. Mr. Hurwitch pointed out that the negotiations between the Cuban government and the Cuban Families Committee in the United States are still in a preliminary stage. The Cuban Families Committee still had a considerable way to go before they would dispose of sufficient funds to complete a transaction with the Cuban Government. They would have to revive their campaign for financial support.

Mr. Hurwitch also pointed out that Mr. Donovan had two lengthy conversations with Premier Castro. The basic theme of Mr. Donovan's approach had originated with the Cuban Families Committee which had seen possible merit in the idea of offering an agreed balance between cash payments and commodity purchases in exchange for the prisoners. The Committee hoped thereby to soften the ransom aspect of any transaction and place it on a humanitarian basis, which would have appeal both to the Cuban government and to the Cuban émigrés in the United States who were concerned about the economic plight of the Cuban people. According to Mr. Donovan, Premier Castro was attracted by this proposal and they had talked in tentative terms about how it might be implemented. Premier Castro had shown an awareness of the fact that it might not be politic for the Cuban Families Committee to purchase the goods in the United States for export to Cuba, and there had been some discussion of third countries which might provide commercial sources for these commodities. Mr. Donovan had mentioned Canada among other countries as a possible source. Premier Castro had reacted favourably. This exchange, Mr. Hurwitch said, had no doubt prompted Mr. Roa's approach to our Ambassador in Havana. (Copy of Washington Embassy Telegram No. 2561 of September 5, 1962,† is attached.)

I attach, for your approval, a telegram to our Embassy in Havana† which contains a reply that our Ambassador could give to Foreign Minister Roa. A reply along this line was informally suggested by Mr. Hurwitch to our Washington Embassy. It is a flexible response, which seems to me appropriate at this stage of the negotiations.<sup>21</sup>

NEGOTIATIONS ON CUBAN INVASION PRISONERS

Mr. Wershof told me by telephone this morning that N.A. Robertson had agreed that the instructions to our Ambassador in Havana, contained in the telegram referred to above, could be communicated to the State Department, pointing out that we had as yet received no report whether, or in what manner, these instructions had been carried out.

2. Mr. Wershof said that we could in fact pass the actual text of the instructions informally to the State Department, subject to the caveat mentioned above.

3. Wershof mentioned that in authorizing the instructions to Kidd, Cabinet had indicated that no further initiative should be taken without returning to Cabinet for approval.

4. Wershof referred to a "worried" telegram from Kidd, No. 165 of September 5,† which will shortly be repeated to us. Kidd was concerned about consultation with the State Department and also with the possibility that Donovan would also get to know the stand being taken by Canada. Wershof said that the view in Ottawa was that neither of Kidd's worries were justified. It is thought appropriate that the State Department should be kept informed, for obvious reasons, and that the State Department's relations with or communications to Donovan were things that we could not control, although conceivably clear understanding between the State Department and Donovan might be essential to the successful outcome of Donovan's scheme. On the other hand, at this stage there was no authority for us to let the State Department understand that we wished Donovan to be told of the nature of our reply to the Cuban Foreign Minister.

NEGOTIATIONS ON CUBAN INVASION PRISONERS

As you know, we have asked our Washington Embassy to pass on to the State Department the contents of Mr. Kidd's telegram reporting on Mr. Roa's reaction to our reply. I presume that no further action on this subject is required until we are again approached either by the United States or the Cuban Government.

2. Should these negotiations succeed, and large purchases from Canada become likely, the public relations aspect of this problem would have to be considered. It may be useful to record now our preliminary views on how this might be handled. Presumably, either the White House or the State Department would issue a statement on the settlement when it is made. We could ask the State Department if they would include in this statement the following:

(1) The Cuban authorities and the Cuban Families Committee in the United States had agreed that the purchase of the food, medicines and agricultural products could most conveniently be made in Canada.

(2) The Canadian Government had been consulted and had indicated that if the Cuban Families Committee in the United States wished to make these purchases in Canada, there should be no difficulty provided these purchases conformed to the Canadian export regulations.

3. It might be useful to set out these thoughts in a telegram to Washington Embassy which could be marked for limited circulation. Our telegram would mention our concern regarding the dangers in front of us vis-à-vis United States public opinion. Do you wish us to send such a telegram at this time or wait until we see how the negotiations progress?<sup>22</sup>

Dear Ed [Ritchie]:

In confirmation of our oral conversation this morning, this is to inform that the Embassy has received an instruction from the Department of State as follows:

James B. Donovan, a private U.S. citizen who has been attempting to obtain the release of the Cuban Bay of Pigs prisoners on behalf of the Cuban Families Committee, a private organization, informed the Department of State that he believes he has sufficient pledges from private sources to discuss the release of the prisoners with Cuban authorities. The Department of State understands that the Royal Bank of Canada at Montreal is disposed to issue a letter of credit for this transaction, but desires reassurances that existing and future U.S. restrictions on shipping and trade with Cuba will not interfere with the delivery of the goods involved in obtaining the release of the Bay of Pigs prisoners.

The Embassy has been instructed by the Department of State to transmit these assurances to the Department of External Affairs.

Dear Ed [Ritchie]:

This letter is written pursuant to recent instructions to the Embassy from the Department of State and supplements Mr. White's letter of December 17.

The Department of State understands from Mr. James B. Donovan that the Royal Bank of Canada at Montreal has sought specific assurance concerning the transfer of funds from the United States, should it become necessary, in support of a letter of credit. In this connection, the Embassy has been authorized to inform you as follows in elaboration of the information contained in Mr. White's letter of December 17 and we have been asked to express the hope that your Government would so inform the Royal Bank of Canada at Montreal as soon as possible.

The assurance contained in Mr. White's letter specifically includes that the United States will not take any action which will interfere with an American bank holding in Canada accounts in Canadian dollars, or exchanging United States dollars for Canadian dollars, where the account of the transaction is directly or indirectly in connection with a letter of credit issued in Canada in support of the Donovan mission.

These assurances are intended to facilitate the issuance of a letter of credit in satisfactory form by a Canadian bank; should such a letter of credit not be issued, these assurances would, of course, not be applicable.

The United States has no objection to the foregoing being made known to the Royal Bank of Canada, or to any other Canadian bank that may be considering the issuance of a letter of credit in connection with the Donovan mission. Nevertheless, we would prefer that the foregoing, as well as the content of Mr. White's letter of December 17, not be made public without our prior concurrence.

It seems likely that you will already have done so, but I have also been asked to express the hope that your Government will inform Ambassador Kidd in Havana of the probable involvement of the Royal Bank of Canada at Montreal to the extent of issuance of a letter of credit.

The Embassy understands that Mr. Donovan expects to arrive in Havana today in order to renew his discussions with the Cuban authorities. In the event of extreme emergency, Mr. Donovan may ask the assistance of the Canadian Embassy in Havana in order to send an encoded message from Havana via Canadian channels. Should your Government see its way clear to authorizing such use of its facilities, the Embassy would, of course, like very much to be informed as soon as possible of the receipt of any message from Mr. Donovan.<sup>25</sup>

Livingston Merchant is to call on you at 5 p.m. this afternoon as a special emissary of the U.S.A. President in connection with the latest developments concerning the situation in Cuba. The exact nature of the message he will convey is not known, but the following landmarks in U.S.A. policy on the Cuban issue will almost certainly be relevant:

(1) On September 13 President Kennedy, in a prepared statement at a press conference, said in part: "If Cuba ... should become an offensive military base of significant capacity for the Soviet Union then this country will do whatever must be done to protect its own security and that of its allies." He had prefaced his remarks however by reiterating that "these new shipments do not constitute a serious threat to any other part of this hemisphere." Full text of the President's statement of Sept. 13 is attached (Washington tel. 2665 dated Sept. 14, 1962. †)<sup>26</sup>

(2) As recently as October 3, Under-Secretary Ball re-affirmed before the Select Committee on Export Controls of the House of Representatives that "quite clearly it (the military build-up of Cuba by the USSR) does not constitute a threat to the U.S.A.." Like the President, however, he added that "if, contrary to the present evidence, should it ever appear that the USSR is succeeding in making Cuba a threat to the security of this country or this hemisphere, we are prepared to take the necessary action – whatever it may be." (Full text in Washington telegram 2883 of Oct. 4, 1962, † is attached.)

(3) Without anticipating in detail the information which Mr. Merchant will convey to you, we are aware through intelligence channels that as of October 16 the U.S.A. had satisfied itself through photographic and other intelligence media that offensive ballistic missiles with a range of between 1100 and 2200 miles were being installed in Cuba in sufficient number (an estimated 40) to directly threaten the Security of U.S.A.

(4) The fact that the U.S.A. Government took the extraordinary step at 0400 hours today to ask the Canadian Government to prohibit transit stops or overflight of Czech and Cuban aircraft at Gander strongly indicates that the U.S.A. is taking emergency action to prevent the delivery or further delivery of warheads for the newly discovered launching sites in Cuba.

2. We have been informed that President Kennedy will make an announcement of national importance at 7 p.m. today. Members of the Canadian Joint Staff in Washington are receiving high level briefings throughout the afternoon and our Ambassador in Washington has been called to the State Department later today. In the light of the firm public commitment President Kennedy has given to take preventive action to protect the security of the U.S.A. should there be a determination that the USSR had developed in Cuba "an offensive military base of significant capacity," and the present finding that such a capacity now exists, the conclusion is unavoidable that the U.S.A. is about to embark on some counter action. This could take the form of either:

(a) A naval and air blockade of Cuba, including the right to intercept and search surface ships and submarines. The execution of such a blockade could quickly lead to naval engagements at sea and ultimately to hostilities with the Soviet Union;

(b) A swift invasion and occupation of the whole of Cuba;

(c) Military destruction of the launching sites by United States military bombing;

(d) Any or all of these moves might be preceded by a warning or ultimatum to the Soviet Union accompanied by a full public disclosure by the President of the new Soviet capability in Cuba.

3. The request to prohibit Czech and Cuban overflights could be a prelude to any of the above three courses but would indicate as a minimum the intention to institute a naval and air blockade. The fact that the stoppage of overflights has been described to us as "a temporary measure” would tend to confirm that the U.S.A. foresees the situation being sufficiently clarified in the next 48 hours to render such measures unnecessary.

4. Any of these possible U.S.A. measures would probably lead immediately to counter measures by the Soviet Union in Berlin with minimum action in the form of a total blockade of the city as in 1948/49.

5. In a situation which could clearly rapidly escalate into global war, and with the United Nations in session, it can confidently be assumed that some international endeavour will be made to avert war and bring about a negotiated settlement. In this respect the situation today is analogous to that at the time of Suez, when international action to contain and put an end to the fighting was instituted almost simultaneously with the national action taken by France and the United Kingdom to protect what they considered to be vital interests. The question arises as to whether there is again a role for Canada to play.

6. The only action which could be taken in a United Nations context which might avert measures which could lead to conflict, would be a move in the Security Council to have a group of “neutral” nations – perhaps the 8 non-aligned members of the Eighteen Nation Disarmament Committee – conduct an on-site investigation in Cuba of the U.S.A. Government’s charge that that country has permitted the installation on its territory of offensive nuclear missiles. If vetoed in the Security Council or otherwise rejected by the Soviet Union and Cuba, the issue could be taken to the floor of the Assembly where an overwhelming vote in favour of such a proposal could be expected. Even if such a move failed to result in the admission of an investigation team to Cuba, it would at least have the virtue of confirming and exposing the aggressive designs which the U.S.A. maintains the Soviet Union has on North America. To be fully effective such a proposal would have to be discussed immediately with the U.S.A. Government before President Kennedy makes his announcement at 7 p.m. tonight as the possibility cannot be ruled out that his announcement may be of measures already ordered against Cuba. To ensure a hearing for a Canadian proposal of this nature, we should have to offer full cooperation in the prohibition of Czech and Cuban transit stops and overflights. Given the reluctance of the United Kingdom to support fully U.S.A. policy on Cuba (for example, in connection with the embargo on shipping) it is not out of the question that the United Kingdom might be willing to initiate some such move in the Security Council.<sup>27</sup>

Dear Mr. Prime Minister:

Seen first at meeting with Mr. Merchant and Minister 5:30 pm. Delivered to me at [home?] at 7 pm after broadcast of Pres. Kennedy. [John G. Diefenbaker]

“My Dear Prime Minister:

I am asking Ambassador Merchant to deliver to you the text of a public statement I intend to make today at 1900 hours Washington time. It is occasioned by the fact that we are now in the possession of clear evidence which Ambassador Merchant will explain to you, that the Soviets have secretly installed offensive nuclear weapons in Cuba, and that some of them may already be operational.

As you will see from my speech, I consider that the situation calls for the immediate execution of certain quarantine measures whose object is to prevent the introduction into Cuba of further nuclear weapons, and to lead to the elimination of the missiles that are already in place.

I am sending Chairman Khrushchev a personal message making it clear that these latest actions of his Government in Cuba constitute an unacceptable threat to the security of this hemisphere, and I am expressing the hope that we can resume the path of peaceful negotiation.<sup>28</sup>

I am also requesting an urgent meeting of the United Nations Security Council. I have asked Ambassador Stevenson to present on behalf of the United States a resolution calling for the withdrawal of missile bases and other offensive weapons in Cuba under the supervision of United Nations observers. This would make it possible for the United States to lift its quarantine. I hope that you will instruct your representative in New York to work actively with us and speak forthrightly in support of the above program in the United Nations.

It is most important that we should all keep in close touch with each other, and I will do all I can to keep you fully informed of developments as I see them.

The briefing was accompanied by photographic slides based on aerial photography. It was stated that there were "a considerable number" of MRBM missile bases of a mobile field type with hard earth and not repeat not concrete foundations. We were shown photos of these bases and of what were described as MRBM missiles on or near the bases. We were also informed that there was evidence of the commencement work on IRBM bases. Hilsman stated that the missiles were all designed for rpt [sic] launchings and that he was almost certain that they had sufficient missiles for this purpose. The MRBMs were stated to have a radius of one thousand miles and the IRBMs of two thousand two hundred miles. The missiles would be of a low megaton range. Hilsman said that there was no repeat no direct evidence of nuclear warheads in Cuba but they would not repeat not expect easily to detect the warheads owing to their small size. However, the missiles without the warheads "would not repeat not make sense." Hilsman stressed the very rapid deployment which had taken place saying that sites which had very recently shown no repeat no evidence of missile bases now contained them. Hilsman also reported the presence of IL28 bombers and showed photos of these being uncrated in Cuba. He referred to 24 surface-to-air missile sites and to one hundred MiG jets.

3. At the termination of the briefing, the Under-Secretary (Ball) made a few brief remarks referring to the "essential solidarity" of the governments represented and stating that the offensive nuclear capacity in Cuba represented a threat not repeat not only to USA but to the Western hemisphere. He further defined this as a threat (a) to Latin American countries and (b) to the retaliatory power of USA. He said that the steps which the President would outline in his speech were essential to the credibility of Western willingness to respond to such a challenge and essential also to the defence of Berlin.

4. At the termination of his remarks, we listened to the President's speech on TV.

CUBA: BRIEFING OF NAC

At 10 pm local time Council met to receive a report brought this afternoon from Washington by Dean Acheson and Sherman Kent, Deputy Director of CIA. Acheson explained that he had come as the personal representative of the President to brief Council on background of President's address to the nation tonight. Since President's message will be available to you by now and most of background no repeat no doubt can be furnished in detail through Intelligence net, I confine myself in this message to highlights of what Acheson said.

2. He recalled that the President had undertaken in his statement on Cuba in September to let it be known if Soviet Government introduced offensive rather than defensive weapons into Cuba.<sup>30</sup> As of October 15 USA had what Acheson described as irrefutable evidence that USSR had introduced into Cuba medium and intermediate ballistic missiles with a range of one thousand and twenty two hundred nautical miles respectively. They were thus able to cover large areas of Latin America, USA and Canada with nuclear weapons and were no longer dependent on intercontinental missiles and bombers for delivering nuclear weapons on targets in Western hemisphere.

3. The missiles observed were of the mobile field type which had been seen in Moscow May Day parade some two years ago and had been observed at San Cristobal and Sagua la Grande areas. The missiles observed were already in an operational state and must have been delivered a month or six weeks ago. In addition other missile sites had been observed which were expected to become operational before end of year.

4. Installations which seemed to represent storage facilities for warheads had also been sighted and it had to be assumed that warheads were available for the missiles now located in Cuba.

5. In addition coastal and patrol installations and vessels were being equipped with missile launchers of smaller range using high explosive warheads.

6. Main method for delivery of ballistic missiles from USSR to Cuba was thought to be the vessel Poltava which had been sighted in Cuba in July, again in September and was expected to return in November.

7. Acheson said that in the last few days the President had been in constant consultation with his advisers, civil and military, and that the course he was taking was in Acheson's judgement reasonable in view of the increased Soviet threat to the essential security interests of USA. These USA measures would include

(a) a blockade after 24 hours' notice to prevent further offensive military material entering Cuba in which all ships would be stopped and searched

(b) putting armed forces of USA on readiness to deal with the rising state of tension and risks involved in order to make it clear that USA will not repeat not tolerate build-up of a military threat in Cuba

(c) recognition that source of threat is USSR and not repeat not Castro régime

(d) reinforcement of Guantanamo Base and the removal of USA dependents there

(e) calling an emergency meeting of OAS and the invocation of Articles Six and Eight of Rio Treaty<sup>31</sup>

(f) calling an emergency meeting of UN Security Council, and

(g) calling upon Khrushchev to desist from provocative action and resume the search for peace.

8. Reference to precautionary measures by USA armed forces led to discussion as to whether or not repeat not USA armed forces were being put on the alert. At request of members of Council, SACEUR's Chief of Staff was called for and he reported that in view of President's speech SACEUR was informing all Ministers of Defence and NATO commands to take secretly certain precautionary measures appropriate to a heightening of international tension but short of a state of military vigilance. General Moore emphasized that such measures would avoid anything that might be regarded as provocative and would include such things as intelligence collection, preparation of alerts and check of equipment.

9. Acheson added that the Kennedy/Gromyko talks<sup>32</sup> were in his view disturbing in that Gromyko denied any knowledge of any offensive weapons in Cuba, apparently being unaware of USA intelligence information at that time, and was wholly unforthcoming on Berlin question.

10. In conclusion Finletter and Acheson appealed for sympathetic understanding, solidarity, as well as constructive criticism of what USA was doing and indicated that this was the start of a consultative process which would have to proceed in NATO on Cuban question in view of obvious heightened risks to all members of the Alliance arising from situation described above.

11. Participation by other members was mainly limited to questions; as discussion is expected on President's statement and Acheson's briefing shortly with appeals for solidarity, your early guidance would be appreciated.

VIEWES OF THE CUBAN AMBASSADOR ON THE CRISIS

Today, as instructed, I called in the Cuban Ambassador and told him that henceforth the Canadian authorities at Gander would be ascertaining that Cubana aircraft moving in transit from the Soviet bloc countries to Cuba did not carry any military equipment. This went well and he appeared to accept our position. In answer to a question I told him that we had received no specific complaint about the carriage of arms in Cubana aircraft. He thought they were used exclusively for civilian passengers and that all of their available weight and space would be used for personal luggage.

2. He obviously wanted to stay on and initiated a discussion on the quarantine measures being taken by the United States. He really made two points:

(a) He considered that the charges of the presence of offensive missile bases in Cuba were completely false. It was a further example of reckless Yankee propaganda against his little country. He referred to the devices of faking aerial and other photographs to provide evidence of the existence of launching sites. He had read and liked the Prime Minister's statement in the House on the previous evening. He seemed to think that the suggestion of an inspection on the spot by the eight non-aligned members of the Disarmament Committee implied that Mr. Diefenbaker himself doubted President Kennedy's assertions. I suggested that a more careful reading of the statement would indicate that our Prime Minister was not personally concerned but said that this would be "the only sure way that the world can secure the facts."<sup>33</sup> Mr. Diefenbaker's subsequent statement made about the time of our interview has cleared up this point.<sup>34</sup>

(b) He went on to say that there was no reason why Cuba, which had yielded to so many provocations from the United States, would wish to acquire such offensive weapons and encourage further aggressive action by the United States. Even the Soviet Union would have no interest in placing such weapons on Cuban soil because, as they had claimed, their intercontinental ballistic missiles could reach any target anywhere from the Soviet Union itself. When I suggested, as gently as I could, that matters were probably no longer in Cuban hands and therefore what was happening had not been determined on a basis of Cuban national interests, Dr. Cruz became quite agitated and indeed was on the point of anger. This had touched fundamental sentiments of patriotism and nationalism. As on other occasions with me, he showed he was very sensitive about any hint that Cuba was not now a really independent country and was some sort of a satellite.

CUBAN CRISIS; MISSILE BASES

1. The Prime Minister said that he had been asked by the press whether there was any doubt about the missile facilities on Cuban soil. Mr. Green, Mr. Harkness and he had been convinced that there had been no exaggeration of the situation by the President of the United States. There were, of course, political overtones in the American attitude, but the facts were as cited. The U.S. had been aware of the offensive weapons only a week ago. They had no doubt. Of course, there were those who said that the U.S. was doing wrong; among these had been Mr. T.C. Douglas. Last evening, he had been informed by the Secretary to the Cabinet that a Cuban aircraft at Shannon Airport had asked to land at Gander, Newfoundland. It had been advised that it could, but subject to investigation. The authority for investigation was in the Atomic Energy Act, and the plane would be subject to search.

2. The Cabinet noted the statement of the Prime Minister regarding the public disclosure by the President of the United States of Russian missile bases on the island of Cuba.

CUBAN CRISIS; CIVILIAN READINESS MEASURES

3. The Prime Minister said that the Secretary to the Cabinet had looked into the emergency measures to be taken. Certain departments were to have warning officers available on rotation basis. Key personnel were to be kept in Ottawa. The Emergency Measures Organization should know who those people were. Departments should also see that paperwork for emergency conditions was ready.

4. The Cabinet agreed that the various civilian departments and agencies concerned with measures to deal with an emergency be instructed,

(a) to have a warning officer available at all times by suitable rotation arrangements until further notice;

(b) to keep available, in or near Ottawa so far as possible, key personnel required for dealing with an emergency rather than permitting them to be on leave or away on business (the Emergency Measures Organization shall be kept informed as to those who will be available on short notice); and,

(c) to ensure, as a matter of priority, that the necessary paper work is made ready for dealing with emergencies in accordance with the allocation of responsibilities for emergency measures; such preparations should cover regulations that would be necessary, arrangements for allocation of responsibilities to various individuals both in the Ottawa area and elsewhere, and instructions for dealing with the various types of problems that may be expected to arise in an emergency situation.

CUBAN CRISIS; WARNING CENTRES AND ARMY HEADQUARTERS

5. The Minister of National Defence said that the manning of Army warning centres should be moved to their alternative sites and placed on a 24-hour basis. Army Central and Command emergency headquarters should also be manned. This had been done as an exercise last year when Petawawa had been manned for several months.

6. The Cabinet agreed,

(a) that the Federal and Provincial Warning Centres of the Army be relocated to their emergency sites and manned on a 24-hour basis; and,

(b) that the Army man its Emergency Headquarters on a skeleton staff basis.

CUBAN CRISIS; ALERTING OF CANADIAN AIR DEFENCE FORCES

7. The Minister of National Defence said that the U.S. segment of Norad had moved to the alertness stage known as Defcon 3. The U.S. forces, including their forces at Newfoundland bases, had been in an advanced state of readiness since last night's announcement by President Kennedy of the proposed quarantine of Cuba. Canada had been requested to place its component in the Norad force in the same state of readiness.

8. During the discussion the following points were raised,

(a) Some said they did not see why the Canadian component of Norad had to be put in readiness at the same time as the U.S. component. Others said that the forces of both countries jointly manned the same stations. Norad was a joint arrangement for mutual defence. Not to move in pace with the American forces would embarrass Canadian troops. Canada and the U.S. were allies with defence commitments towards each other and should not act differently when side by side. On the other hand, the agreement provided for independent decision to be made by the government with respect to the degree of participation by their personnel. In this instance, Canada should not appear to be stampeded. This would only intensify excitement and increase pressures. A decision to act or move into a more advanced stage of alertness could be put into effect so quickly that waiting a while would have no serious consequence. After all, the U.S. had taken ten days to be sure they were right in their decision; surely 24 hours delay would not be unreasonable for Canada.

(b) Some said that, theoretically, Canada was not automatically embroiled anytime the U.S. was. Practically, however, Canada was. However, there were great dangers in rushing in at this time. Quick action brought quick judgement, and it would be dangerous to have the present moves interpreted as offensive rather than defensive action. Furthermore, there were domestic political overtones in the U.S. decision. Canada should appear to be behaving normally and deliberately.

(c) Others said that the situation was critical. Cuba was close. Canada was a member of Norad. Canadians would not panic. They would have to be told that the situation was perilous and that appropriate action was being taken. Russia would not expect Canada to do anything else.

(d) The real emergency, some said, would come with the U.S. stopping Russian ships. Canada's position was not absolutely clear, but it had proposed that the U.N. send certain unaligned countries to go and see the missile bases in Cuba.

(e) Others said that the main point was whether, at this stage, Canada should put its forces at the stage of the alert for "delicate or strained" relations. Word had not yet been received as to the U.K.'s views on the situation. It would be worthwhile to wait for them since not only America would be involved. If need be, Cabinet could be called on short notice later in the day.

9. The Cabinet,

(a) noted the statement of the Minister of National Defence regarding the stage of alertness of the American component of the Norad forces in the present Cuban crisis; and,

(b) agreed that further consideration would be given to the alerting of the Canadian air defence forces after the reactions of other countries, particularly the U.K., to the American declaration had been ascertained.

CUBAN CRISIS; SOVIET BLOC AIRCRAFT

10. The Secretary of State for External Affairs said that five Soviet aircraft had flown over Canada on the way to Cuba since January. About ten days ago the Russians had asked permission for two more flights, three days before the intended departure. Their request had been turned down. It was becoming a habit, and as they were not members of the International Civil Aviation Organization (ICAO) this had to be stopped sometime. Cuba, however, belonged to ICAO and the Cuban airline had landing rights in Canada. It looked as though the Cubans were increasing the number of their flights. The Soviets would like to fly more personnel over and perhaps weapons. The Czechoslovakians and Cubans were seeking to land in Canada for refuelling. If they did land here, Canada had the right to examine them under ICAO for weapons of war, and if any were found they could be removed. Russian technicians could not be removed from a plane. It would be difficult to prevent Cuban or Czechoslovakian flights from landing in Canada. They could be searched and that was about all. Cubana Airlines ran a commercial non-scheduled series of flights which normally stopped at Gander.

11. During the discussion some said that there were sufficient port officers at the main eastern airports to carry out a search of Soviet bloc aircraft such as Customs, R.C.M. Police and Transport officers. Arrangements should, therefore, be made to have such searches made not only of Cuban aircraft but of all Soviet bloc aircraft. Russian planes, however, should continue to be refused permission to fly over Canada.

12. The Cabinet confirmed the decision that Russian aircraft be not permitted to fly over Canada except in special agreed circumstances and decided that Czechoslovakian, Cuban and other Soviet bloc aircraft covered by the ICAO agreement be permitted to fly over and land in Canada but subject to being searched to verify that such flights are in accordance with Canadian law (which does not permit civilian aircraft to carry firearms or explosives, nor nuclear material).

CUBAN CRISIS; TRADE

13. The Minister of Trade and Commerce stated that at the present time exports to Cuba should be restricted to food and medicine. This policy was similar to that of the United States. Over the last year the volume of trade with Cuba had dropped to around $5 million a year.

14. During the discussion it was said that there was no need to change the policy on this subject at this time.

15. The Cabinet agreed that there be no change at present in the policy governing trade with Cuba.

...

CUBAN CRISIS; TRADE

19. The Prime Minister said that the government might be asked to remove its diplomatic representation from Cuba. The mission had been very useful and a great deal had been possible because of its presence in Cuba.

UNITED STATES QUARANTINE AGAINST CUBA

You have enquired about the position under international law of a blockade or quarantine such as the United States have now imposed on all offensive military equipment under shipment to Cuba, and as to precedents to this case.

2. Although President Kennedy made a passing reference to the Berlin blockade (pointing out that even shipment of food and drugs had then been stopped), he has described the measures announced yesterday as a "quarantine." On the one hand, he has not mentioned any intentions to seize or sequester the vessels of the blockaded country but on the other hand the United States forces intend to turn back any Cuba-bound vessel of any kind – as well as airplanes, if need be – if they are found to contain cargoes of offensive weapons. There seems to be no firm precedents for such a "quarantine," which seems to go somewhat further than traditional pacific blockades (by preventing foreign ships from entering Cuban ports) but is more lenient in so far as it applies only to shipments of offensive weapons (and without any declared intent to seize certain ships).

Pacific Blockade

3. Pacific blockades – that is blockades in time of peace – have been resorted to on several occasions since the second quarter of the nineteenth century, as a compulsive means of settling international differences. All cases of pacific blockades involve either intervention or reprisals. A study of precedents tends to indicate that the present “quarantine,” in so far as it resembles a pacific blockade, is more in the nature of an intervention. For instance in 1886, Great Britain, Austria-Hungary, Germany, Italy and Russia blocked the Greek coast for the purpose of preventing Greece from making war against Turkey. Great Britain, Germany and Italy instituted a pacific blockade in 1902 against Venezuela in order to obtain payment of indemnities due to their subjects; the American Government stated on that occasion that a pacific blockade could produce no effect as regards third powers; Great Britain shortly afterwards declared that she was at war with Venezuela and that the blockade was therefore to be considered as being of a warlike character. (Oppenheim-Lauterpacht, Vol. II, 7th Ed., pp. 147-148; Colombos, pp. 403-405.)

4. Pacific blockades have been considered by practically all writers as admissible, as long as they do not extend to the seizure or sequestration of vessels other than those of the blockaded state; also the blockading state is generally held to have no right to prevent vessels belonging to third states from freely entering or leaving the ports of the blockaded state. It is only in time of war that all vessels may be prevented from trying to break the blockade. (Aircraft may play a part in such blockades.) It must be noted that Soviet ships, under this theory, would be considered as foreign ships. (Oppenheim-Lauterpacht, Vol. II, 7th Ed. pp. 146-149; Colombos, pp. 405.)

5. Furthermore, according to most authors, the traditional rules of international law – as summarized above – have been largely overtaken by Article 42 of the Charter of the United Nations. As stated by Colombos (International Law of the Sea, 4th Ed. pp. 406), “so far as members of the United Nations are concerned, a pacific blockade could only be legally imposed by them when decided on by the Security Council under Article 42 of the Charter of the United Nations.”

Self-Defence

6. President Kennedy has made clear that the quarantine now imposed is a measure of self-defence. The concept of self-defence must also be interpreted in the light of the United Nations Charter. It seems that an argument can be made in favour of the U.S. action on the basis of the right of individual and collective self-defence recognized by Article 51 of the U.N. Charter. This right authorizes counter-action which might take the form of armed reprisal. The point at issue is whether what can be done in the case of armed attack may be done in the case of a threat of attack. Some writers on the authority of Article 51<sup>1</sup> seem to rule out the plea of self-defence is such an eventuality (Oppenheim, Vol. II, 155). Others on the authority of Article 2, paragraph 4<sup>2</sup> of the Charter seem to accept it (Aronéanu, “The Definition of Aggression,” p. 94). The latter thesis seems acceptable on the understanding that in every case an assessment must be made of the imminence and effectiveness of the threat invoked.

7. In response to an infringement of rights committed to its detriment a state may take retaliatory measures or resort to reprisals. The latter are not themselves illicit, but can exceptionally be justified by the fact that they are provoked by an earlier illicit measure of which they frequently tend to obtain the withdrawal. The traditional distinction is between armed reprisals (such as naval bombardments) and unarmed reprisals (such as embargos, sequestrations or the blocking of funds). The former are prohibited to members of the United Nations by Article 2, paragraph 4 of the Charter. The most eminent writers have unanimously deduced from that Article that, apart from self-defence or the application of any enforcement measure decided by the Security Council, members of the United Nations could henceforth not resort to armed reprisals. (Guggenheim, Vol. II, p. 59; Oppenheim-Lauterpacht, Vol. II, p. 153; Higgins, para. 399; Rousseau, p. 467.) Armed intervention by U.S. forces against foreign ships attempting to break their enforcement of the quarantine would thus seem to be forbidden.

A Measure Sui Generis

8. If the quarantine imposed by the United States were a pacific blockade, its legality might be doubtful in view of Article 42<sup>3</sup> of the Charter, if not in view of traditional law. However, while having elements of a pacific blockade, it cannot be – strictly speaking – construed as one. Furthermore, in so far as the measures imposed have been taken in self-defence, they are not necessarily illegal under the Charter of the United Nations, even though there was no armed attack on the United States. (The case might be different if armed reprisals were enforced against foreign ships refusing to yield.) The quarantine decreed by President Kennedy would seem to be sui generis. In consequence, while it would not be correct to assert categorically the legality of the United States move, it is impossible as well to conclude that it is illegal. (The paper from Admiral Rayner† tends to identify the proposed “quarantine” with a pacific blockade, while noting in conclusion that its legality is ill-defined.)

9. Moreover, while the issue is thus by no means clear, the following points reflect a U.S. intention to remain within the bounds of legality:

(a) the measure has been immediately reported to the Security Council, in accordance with Article 51 of the Charter and General Assembly Resolution of November 17, 1950, and to the Council of the Organization of American States, in accordance with Article 6 of the Rio Treaty;

(b) it is meant to be temporary in nature;

(c) the enforced diversion of ships is not intended to prejudice the general interests of international trade, since only shipments of offensive weapons are to be stopped; and

(d) the operation intended will assume the nature of armed reprisal only if the ships intercepted refuse to comply either with an order to stop and be searched or to turn back with their military cargo.

H.C. G[REEN]

[Endnotes:]

(1) “Nothing in the present Charter shall impair the inherent right of individual or collective self-defence if an armed attack occurs against a Member of the United Nations, until the Security Council has taken the measures necessary to maintain international peace and security. Measures taken by Members in the exercise of this right of self-defence shall be immediately reported to the Security Council and shall not in any way affect the authority and responsibility of the Security Council under the present Charter to take at any time such action as it deems necessary in order to maintain or restore international peace and security.”

(2) “All Members shall refrain in their international relations from the threat or use of force against the territorial integrity or political independence of any state, or in any other manner inconsistent with the purposes of the United Nations.”

(3) “Should the Security Council consider that measures provided for in Article 41 would be inadequate or have proved to be inadequate, it may take such action by air, sea, or land forces as may be necessary to maintain or restore international peace and security. Such action may include demonstrations, blockade, and other operations by air, sea, or land forces of Members of the United Nations.”

CUBA

You will have received the press guidance telegram under reference setting out the Prime Minister's statement in the House of Commons shortly after President Kennedy issued his statement on the measures the USA is taking to meet the new Soviet missile threat from Cuba. Early in his statement the Prime Minister made it quite clear that Canada would want the UN to be seized as soon as possible of this serious problem. He noted in this connection that the USA would be bringing the matter before the Security Council at once but went on to say that the world will want a full and complete understanding of what is taking place in Cuba. He then made the suggestion that in order to ascertain what the facts are, a group of nations, perhaps the 8 nations comprising the non-aligned members of the 18 Nation Disarmament Committee, be given the opportunity of making an on-site inspection in Cuba.

2. In making this proposal the Prime Minister was not casting public doubt on the facts of the situation as outlined by the President in his nation-wide address. The Prime Minister has already noted that construction of bases for the launching of offensive weapons in the form of IRBMs constituted a threat to most of the cities of North America including the major cities of Canada. He had clearly stated "that the existence of these bases or launching pads is not defensive but offensive." The Prime Minister's purpose was to put in motion steps to be taken in the UNGA in the event that the resolution being submitted today to the Security Council by the USA (Permis New York Telegram 1884 October 22†) is vetoed by the Soviet Union, or if the Soviet Union denies the existence in Cuba of offensive ballistic missile bases. In that event we are assuming that the USA would carry its charge to the floor of the Assembly and at that point an initiative along the lines contemplated in the Prime Minister's statement might usefully be brought forward. If such a move were adopted and failed to result in the admission to Cuba of an investigation team, it would at least serve to confirm and expose the aggressive designs which the Soviet Union has on North America.

3. The first draft of the sort of resolution which might be used to launch this proposal is in our immediately following telegram.

4. Your comments are urgently requested. Subject to further confirmation from Ottawa, you may be asked to use the meeting of NATO representatives which has been called for 2:15 October 23 to test the reaction of the USA and our other Allies to this proposal.

For Washington

You should discuss this proposal with the State Department as a matter of urgency and let New York and Ottawa know the reaction by telephone.

The General Assembly

Deeply concerned about the grave threat to peace resulting from current developments in the Cuban crisis;

Convinced that the charges about the secret introduction of nuclear missiles and other offensive weapons are sufficiently serious to warrant immediate investigation and observation by the United Nations;

Noting that quarantine measures have been imposed around Cuba;

1. Establishes an investigation and observation group, composed of representatives of Brazil, Burma, Ethiopia, India, Mexico, Nigeria, Sweden, and U.A.R., with the following functions:

(a) to investigate fully all charges that nuclear missiles and other offensive weapons have been introduced into Cuba;

(b) to observe the quarantine measures imposed by the United States;

(c) to report as appropriate to the Security Council and the General Assembly and in any event to report its findings on sub-paragraph (a) and (b) to the General Assembly not repeat not later than December 1, 1962.

2. Further requests the Acting Secretary-General to provide qualified personnel with the necessary equipment and other means to ensure the effective discharge of the functions of the investigation and observation groups.

3. Calls upon the Government of Cuba to cooperate fully with the group according to all necessary rights of access, movement and enquiry, and any additional facilities it may require.

4. Urgently recommends that the United States and the USSR confer promptly on measures to remove the existing threat to the peace and to report thereon to the Security Council and the General Assembly as appropriate.

This is to confirm that the Minister has authorized the deletion of paragraph 1(b) of our draft resolution referring to observation of quarantine measures imposed by the USA before presenting the draft to the State Department for discussion. On the other hand he did not wish to amend the language in paragraph 4 of the draft resolution to bring it more into line with that used in the USA draft, since the general reference "to the existing threat to the peace" is less restrictive than the USA reference "to the security of the Western hemisphere and the peace of the world."

2. It should be made clear in your discussions with the State Department and USA colleagues in New York that there is no intention to have this or any other Canadian resolution in competition with the USA draft resolution. We recognize that the USA draft resolution might be presented without amendment in the General Assembly if action on it is vetoed by the Soviet Union in the Security Council. It is in circumstances in which the USA resolution might be failing to win general support or was being amended in a way which would substantially change its sense that we would envisage our draft resolution being put forward, in full consultation with the USA and other Western countries.

3. These points should be made clear in your discussions with the USA. The Prime Minister has just made a statement in the House of Commons, the text of which is being sent to you,† which deals with these and some other aspects of the suggestion he made yesterday. You may draw on his statement in your discussions.

President Kennedy sent me a message on October 22nd<sup>36</sup> outlining the action which he proposed to announce in his speech. I expect that he also transmitted it to you, and in any case your representative will have attended the briefing given by Dean Acheson to the North Atlantic Council last evening.

I thought it right to send a message straight away assuring the President of our full support in the Security Council.<sup>37</sup> Since the President has decided to take this action and has announced it, it will clearly give pleasure to no-one, except the Russians, if there were to be anything but firm support from the members of the Western Alliance.

At the same time, we cannot tell where the American action will lead us. The Russians' reply may be in words at the United Nations and so forth, or in deeds. If the Russians decided to do something, I suppose that they might send military vessels to escort their merchant ships to Cuba, thereby presenting the Americans with the awkward dilemma of having to fire first; or, of course, Khrushchev might react on some of the weaker parts of the western world, whether in South East Asia, the Middle East or Turkey. Finally it will be tempting for him to retaliate in kind by imposing a blockade on Berlin to offset the one on Cuba. I am sure that all these considerations are very much present in President Kennedy's mind, and, of course, there is a considerable danger that the various pressures to which the United States will be exposed may give the Russians an opportunity of exploiting differences of interest, or at least of emphasis, between the United States on the one hand and her American and European allies on the other. I feel certain that we must above all try to avoid any splits in the alliance of this kind.

For the rest, I do not think we can do more now than await events, but I should be most glad to have your reactions and I think that we should try to keep in close touch as the situation develops. For your private information, if the situation were to get enlarged beyond the purely Caribbean context, I should feel it my duty to take some action to try to prevent any possible escalation to war, but I certainly do not intend to take any initiative in the present uncertain circumstances.

Security Council convened 4 p.m. USA has already spoken. It is probable that following statements by USSR and Cuba meeting will be adjourned until tomorrow morning in order to give delegates time to consider problem. USA has already introduced draft resolution.

2. USA delegate agreed that resolution is certain to be vetoed by USSR. Present intention is to take issue to UNGA when this happens.

3. USA statement which you will certainly have seen in UN press release referred in general terms only to missile sites.<sup>38</sup> We expect that USA may make public information on speed and extent of Soviet missile site construction which was given in briefing to USA allies this afternoon (our telegram 19003†) to justify USA stand.

4. McCloy's principal task so far has been to explain informally USA position to sympathetic neutrals such as Austria and Sweden.

5. We have tentatively discussed with close friends approach set out in your reference telegram. UK reaction was that USA information on establishment of Soviet missile sites in Cuba was elaborate and convincing and that suggestion to carry out independent investigation was premature in that it would complicate Security Council consideration. On the other hand Norwegian representative said to us if USSR were to deny existence of missile bases number of delegations might be attracted by our suggestion. We shall be sending more comments on your suggestions.

6. At present moment attention is focussed on Security Council. Situation is entirely fluid and positions have not yet taken shape. When matter advances to next stage and is referred to UNGA I suggested that SSEA might wish to come to New York.

This morning October 23 we saw William Tyler, Kohler's successor as Assistant Secretary for European Affairs. We began by giving him a copy of the Prime Minister's statement of October 22 emphasizing, in view of questions addressed to us earlier by the Canadian Desk, that facts of situation as outlined by the President were not repeat not questioned by Canadian Government. Tyler expressed appreciation of this assurance which he said was consistent with Merchant's report of conversation with the Prime Minister, Mr. Green and Mr. Harkness.<sup>39</sup> On question of possible Canadian resolution in General Assembly, Tyler expressed no repeat no view but asked that tactical matters be explored between USA and Canadian delegations in New York. (We had not repeat not at that time received instructions in your V-104 paragraph 4.)

2. Discussing motives for Soviet buildup in Cuba Tyler said that two main hypotheses had been considered (a) that USSR were seeking to establish in Cuba a position which might serve as a counter to Western presence in Berlin and withdrawal from which might be offered as a price for Western withdrawal from Berlin; (b) the USSR might be focussing on the whole issue of USA foreign bases. Re the latter hypothesis it may, I think, be significant that Soviet authorities may have deliberately allowed their buildup to be open to air inspection, as if they were encouraging USA to raise matter of offensive bases on Cuban soil.

3. Tyler said that the decision to choose quarantine and related measures in preference to military intervention had been a key decision but had been taken rapidly and with unanimity among the departments and agencies concerned. One of its main purposes had been to demonstrate USA determination to resist Soviet pressure lest there be doubts about USA intentions in Berlin. The measures announced therefore had Alliance wide implications and USA trusted that their allies would give them all possible understanding and support. Having just spoken by phone with Kohler in Moscow, Tyler remarked that the first Soviet reaction appeared on the whole to be a "talking rather than a shooting" one. He gave the personal view however that Berlin was the area which held the greatest possibility of Soviet retaliatory measures involving a threat to peace. It was impossible to forecast the exact nature of such measures but they were prepared for harassment on the access routes in case USSR attempted to place a quarantine on Berlin. Tyler said that civilian access might be affected and added that three Western Powers regarded civilian and military access as being closely related for purposes of contingency planning.

4. Regarding action in OAS, Tyler said that the President was conscious of the desirability of showing that the Cuban situation, far from being simply a confrontation between USSR and USA, had widespread implications affecting among others all the OAS countries. USA authorities were hoping for action approving quarantine to be taken today October 23 by OAS Council.

In accordance with your instructions, I called today on Harlan Cleveland, Assistant Secretary for International Organizations and outlined to him the purpose of our suggestion along the lines of paragraph 2 of your reference telegram. I made it very clear in the terms employed by the Prime Minister in his statement to the House this afternoon (your telegram PG-194†) that there was no repeat no thought on our part that our plan would in any way be placed in competition with USA resolution. I said that the situation which we were envisaging was that in the likelihood that their resolution would be vetoed in the Security Council and then subsequently brought to the UNGA there might be considerable attraction for many uncommitted and other members of the UN in a resolution which (a) utilized the services of the eight neutrals and (b) introduced a UN fact finding element into the Cuban situation. This might particularly be the case if USA ran into difficulties in securing widespread acceptance for their own text. One could also perhaps envisage a situation in which elements of their resolution (e.g. inspection by UN team) merged with the UN fact finding role.

2. In discussing with them the text of our draft resolution (your telegram V-105) I emphasized that this was a very tentative first draft which sought to outline our general approach [but] that we were not repeat not wedded to exact terminology and were open to suggestions. I also told Cleveland that we were not repeat not proposing to show this text to anyone but themselves at this stage.

3. Cleveland began by saying that he felt there was a significant difference between the inspection role foreseen in their resolution and the fact finding role in ours. The key question was whether the object of UN action should be inspection or the supervision of dismantling. In their view the important point was to secure the earliest possible dismantling of the weapon sites. There was danger at any time that a Soviet ship might attempt to run the blockade and shooting might start. There was further danger that rapid progress would be made in completing and extending the missile sites in Cuba. In these circumstances quick action was required. They feared that a fact finding mission would spin out over several weeks or more and this was too long.<sup>40</sup> Under their resolution, the cessation of the quarantine would be exchanged for the dismantling of the bases under UN observation. In this way the bases, which are the main source of danger, could be quickly eliminated without USA feeling obliged to employ military methods.

4. Cleveland further pointed out that so far the USSR had not repeat not denied the existence of offensive weapons in Cuba but had rather taken the line in their statement of today that all Soviet weapons had a defensive purpose. While this line of argument might change it was possible that the USSR would not repeat not attempt to dispute the actual presence of these weapons on Cuban soil and that therefore a fact finding mission would not repeat not be entirely relevant to the present situation.

5. It seemed to transpire from what Cleveland said that the USA might prefer an attempt to work out some kind of a solution in the Security Council. He mentioned the possibility that one of the non permanent members might introduce some suggestion which both USA and the Russians could accept. He emphasized that any UN presence in Cuba would in practice have to be with the joint agreement of USA and the USSR. He did not repeat not seem to envisage a situation in the near future in which the issue was taken from the Security Council to the UNGA and he made the observation that deciding now on the tactics at the General Assembly stage was "jumping over" the possibility of action in the Security Council.

6. However Cleveland said that he did not repeat not entirely exclude a situation in which some fact finding element might later be combined with USA approach. He acknowledged that it would have distinct attraction in the UNGA. He said that if this stage should be reached Canada with its high standing in UN and with the uncommitted countries could be very helpful.

7. In summary, I should say that Cleveland was distinctly cool towards the fact finding element in our draft resolution although he did not repeat not altogether exclude the principle. He emphasized however that introduction of any such proposal at an early stage in the proceedings might be a very complicating factor, which he at one point said might limit the President's discretion in a situation of great danger.

CUBA

Attached is a round-up of available information on the reactions of Governments to the U.S.A. quarantine measures. † It reflects mainly the initial positions of Governments, and these are along fairly predictable lines; on the part of the U.S.A.'s principal allies, solidarity with the U.S.A. in the face of a dangerous situation precipitated by the Soviet challenge to the U.S.A. so close to home; on the part of the Soviet bloc, a condemnation of the illegality and dangerous

Yes [Auteur inconnu/Author unknown] nature of the U.S.A. measures, combined with a cautious avoidance of committing the bloc to any particular type of reaction.

2. It should be stressed, however, that these initial reactions are no sure guide to the ultimate positions of any country on this issue. Friend and foe alike have been caught unprepared by the strength and speed of the U.S.A.'s unilateral action. On the Western side, the initial solidarity may yet give way to certain doubts. The British press reaction and, for example, that of The Globe and Mail today, are perhaps significant. There is no disposition to quarrel with the facts of Soviet strength in Cuba as presented by the U.S.A. or to dispute its provocative nature. There is, however, a widespread tendency to question the legality of the quarantine measures and the precedent they may set for a general breakdown in international conduct; to ask why the matter was not taken first to the United Nations; to query the absence of prior consultation with allies; to question any real distinction between Soviet bases in Cuba and U.S.A. bases on the periphery of the Soviet Union. There have been worried references to the relevance of the U.S.A. elections.

3. If these questions are already occurring to the press in friendly Western states who do not deny the genuineness of the fear the U.S.A. feels in the face of clandestine arming of Cuba, it can be assumed that the less sympathetic neutral states will be entertaining even more serious doubts.

4. Similarly, on the Soviet side, too much reliance should not be placed on the clearly cautious nature of their initial reaction. They have been careful to avoid proclaiming the U.S.A. measures as acts of war or belligerency, and have contented themselves with a charge of piracy. While charging that the U.S.A. is taking the world to the brink of war, the Soviet Union has refrained from announcing any specific threat of force to resist U.S.A. quarantine measures. Even the news that five of the Soviet ships have turned back should not be taken to mean a final Soviet retreat in the face of strong U.S.A. action. This display of initial caution may mean no more than a desire to gain time. Soviet forces have been placed on a preliminary alert in key sectors and it is safe to assume that the considered Soviet reaction has yet to come. A counter-blockade of Berlin is one evident possibility; U.S.A. overseas bases in general are an obvious counterpart of the Cuban situation, and even if no attempt is made to do anything overt against U.S.A. bases overseas, the U.S.A. has exposed itself to a major attempt by the Soviet Union to bring about through the pressure of international opinion, the liquidation of all such bases. Premier Khrushchev's message to Lord Russell indicates that the Soviet Union may well seek a Summit Meeting with President Kennedy at which these objectives would be pursued.<sup>41</sup>

5. Even though the U.S.A. has shown in the Presidential Proclamation<sup>42</sup> restraint in the circumstances in which force may be applied, and the Soviet Union is displaying a cautious reaction, it would be dangerously premature to assume that the critical phase of the current situation has passed. There is still an urgent need for international endeavour to find a peaceful solution.

United Nations Aspect

6. The U.S.A. instituted unilateral action at the same time as placing the Cuban situation before the United Nations because they saw an immediate need to prevent deliveries of warheads to the missile facilities already constructed in Cuba. Most countries have welcomed the U.S.A. move to bring the United Nations into the question but few can have any illusions that the resolution which the U.S.A. has presented constitutes a genuine effort to achieve a peaceful solution. That resolution calls in effect for a continuation of the quarantine measures until such time as a United Nations observer corps can certify that the missile bases have been dismantled and withdrawn from Cuba. What it seeks is an international endorsement of U.S.A. action not an international solution. Similarly, the Soviet resolution which calls for a cessation of the U.S.A. quarantine measures and hands off Cuba seeks only an endorsement of their present activities in Cuba.

<sup>41</sup> Voir/See American Foreign Policy, Current Documents, 1962 (Washington: United States Government Printing Office, 1966), pp. 421-422.

<sup>42</sup> Voir/See "Proclamation 3504 – Interdiction of the Delivery of Offensive Weapons to Cuba," October 23, 1962, in Public Papers of the Presidents of the United States: John F. Kennedy, 1962 (Washington: United States Government Printing Office, 1963), pp. 809-811.

7. Neither resolution has much chance of endorsement or of leading to an agreed peaceful settlement; on the other hand, neither the Soviet Union or the U.S.A. seems in any hurry to force a vote which might transfer the centre of activities to the General Assembly.

8. The non-aligned nations have been most active in the search for a standstill. Forty such nations have been meeting in caucus during the day and have had several talks with U Thant, as a result of which the Acting Secretary-General made direct personal appeals to both the President of the U.S.A. and the Premier of the U.S.S.R. to refrain from any action which could aggravate the situation and lead to war. He appealed to the former to suspend the quarantine measures and the latter arms deliveries to Cuba for a period of two to three weeks to enable the search for a peaceful solution to proceed, and he offered his personal good offices to that end. His appeal may be backed by a formal move in the Security Council, probably to be presented by Ghana. This may appear to be a modest effort at exercising the United Nations' influence toward a peaceful solution, but it must be recognized that in a dispute involving the Great Powers, the United Nations is severely handicapped.

9. As long as the issue remains before the Security Council, of which Canada is not a member, there is little we can do. As it is not at all certain how the U.S.A. resolution would fare in the General Assembly, we should be content to let the Security Council phase work itself out. The neutral nations may yet devise a resolution which both the Soviet Union and the U.S.A. could accept and which would provide a breathing space in which direct negotiations could be pursued, without either the U.S.A. or the U.S.S.R. resolutions being brought to a vote with the consequent risk of veto.

10. If, however, the matter should be brought before the General Assembly, the Canadian proposal to have a neutral nations inspection team proceed to Cuba, or some variation of that proposal, might have a prospect of winning Assembly support, although Cuban opposition to the idea has already been expressed. The important objective should be to introduce into the situation some sort of international element which will serve to halt the further arming of Cuba and thus render unnecessary the continued application of the U.S.A. quarantine measures. As the United Kingdom seems disposed to play a peace-promoting rôle once the initial confrontation has been avoided, we may find it useful to collaborate closely with them in the United Nations.

*Memorandum from Legal Division

[Ottawa], October 24, 1962

UNITED STATES QUARANTINE AGAINST CUBA

Our memorandum of yesterday to the Prime Minister suggested the following conclusions:

(1) The “quarantine” imposed by the United States on all offensive military equipment under shipment to Cuba is a measure “sui generis,” which it would neither be appropriate to consider as illegal nor easy to construe as legal;

(2) Pacific blockades – which this “quarantine” resembles somewhat – were considered by most authors as permissible, provided foreign ships were not prevented from entering the ports of the blockaded state (which could be allowed only during blockades of a war-like character); the United Nations Charter is now widely interpreted as forbidding such blockades except when imposed by the United Nations under Articles 41 and 42 of the Charter;

(3) It is debatable (and doubtful) whether such a quarantine can be considered as a measure of self-defence under Article 51 of the Charter since there has been no overt armed attack, although Article 2(4) could be invoked against the military build-up in Cuba;

(4) There is very little doubt, however, that the use of armed force – which could be considered as armed reprisals – against foreign (including Soviet) ships would run against the Charter, unless it is done in accordance with Article 42. (See paragraphs 3-5 below.) (Authors quoted yesterday, plus: Kelsen, Law of the United Nations, p. 791; Memorandum of January 12, 1959, from the Legal Division to the Legal Adviser, on “Right of member-states to resort to armed force under the U.N. Charter.”)

You may wish to be apprised of our afterthoughts, in the light of the day’s telegrams and particularly the OAS Council approval of the resolution presented by Secretary Rusk on October 23.<sup>43</sup>

2. In his proclamation of October 23, President Kennedy states that vessels failing to “comply with directions shall be subject to being taken into custody” – that is to be seized, contrary to what was assumed in our memorandum of yesterday (paragraph 2); such seizures would make it more difficult to justify the “quarantine” decreed. (On the other hand, he stresses that “force shall not be used except in case of failure or refusal to comply with directions or with directives of the Secretary of Defence, or in case of self-defence. In any case, force shall be used only to the extent necessary.” There might therefore arise a situation when Russian ships would be immobilized by United States ships, with no party firing – while discussions go on at the United Nations.)

3. In order that they might resort legally to armed force against foreign ships refusing to halt, to be searched or to turn back from Cuba if carrying offensive weapons, it appears that the United States would need authorization to do so from the Security Council under Articles 39 and 42. Following a veto in the Security Council, they will probably seek to refer the matter to the General Assembly, possibly under the “Uniting for Peace” resolution of November 3,

1950,<sup>44</sup> on the grounds that there is a “threat to peace.” The Assembly could then make “appropriate recommendations to members for collective measures”; such a recommendation would not be binding but might be considered as providing authorization for the action recommended. This action might be the “quarantine” decreed, but might much more likely be the appointment of a fact-finding or inspection commission in Cuba. (Oppenheim-Lauterpacht, II, p. 176).

4. The Inter American Treaty of Reciprocal Assistance of 1947 (or Rio Treaty)<sup>45</sup> goes further than the Charter. Article 25 of the OAS Charter<sup>46</sup> and Article 6 of the Rio Treaty provide inter alia that, “If the inviolability or the integrity of the territory or the sovereignty or political independence of any American State should be affected by an aggression which is not an armed attack ... or by any other fact or situation that might endanger the peace of America, the Organ of Consultation shall meet immediately in order to agree on the measures ... which should be taken for the common defense and for the maintenance of the peace and security of the continent” (Article 6). Article 8 of the Treaty enumerates, “For the purpose of this Treaty, the measures on which the Organ of Consultation may agree,” which include the “partial or complete interruption of economic relations ... and use of armed force.” The meeting held yesterday by the Council of the OAS authorized the United States (after their decision was taken but before the quarantine came into force) to take the measures announced, including the use of armed force.

5. The Organization of American States is a regional organization, and the Rio Treaty a regional arrangement under Article 52 of the United Nations Charter. There seems to be some discrepancy between Chapter VII of the Charter and Articles 6 and 8 of the Treaty. With reference to the foregoing and to Articles 51 and 53 of the Charter, it would appear that the use of armed force by the American States is subject to two limitations: they may resort to it only if exercising the right of collective self-defence provided for under Article 51, or if authorized by the Security Council under Article 53. Since on the one hand there is no unanimity as to the rights granted by Article 51, and since on the other hand the Rio Treaty (including Articles 6 and 8) has been accepted as a regional arrangement under Article 52, it is not possible to conclude categorically either that the use of armed force under the Rio Treaty is permissible in the present case or that it is forbidden. However, the OAS Council should now report the action it has approved to the Security Council, in conformity with Article 54 of the Charter and Article 5 of the Rio Treaty (see Kelsen, pp. 328, 793; the point is discussed in the attached memorandum – curiously without clear attribution but which very probably issued from some U.S. source and is interesting – on “Relations between the OAS and the UN on matters pertaining to the maintenance of international peace and security.”†)

6. We tend to agree with the British Foreign Office (Telegram No. 3792 of October 23 from London†) that the legality of the United States move being at least debatable, it might be preferable to avoid discussing it – and to deal with this matter on broader political grounds.

CUBANA AIRCRAFT LANDING AT GOOSE BAY

Yesterday evening notice was received from Shannon that a Cubana aircraft was expecting to land during the night at Gander or Halifax in accordance with the normal arrangements for such flights. Around two o'clock this morning it emerged that weather conditions would not permit a landing at either of these airports and permission was requested for the aircraft to land at Goose Bay. This permission was granted by the air traffic control authorities after checking with Ottawa.

2. The aircraft and passengers have been thoroughly examined by customs officials on lines which had been worked out interdepartmentally yesterday. This examination indicates that the aircraft (a Britannia) is carrying: (a) 75 passengers (of which 9 are travelling on special Cuban passports and 2 on diplomatic passports, including one Indian); (b) 15 crew members; (c) 75 cartons of mixed cargo (2 of which contain aircraft brake lining, 49 contain stoppers for blood flasks, and the remainder consist of drugs, spare parts for trucks and cars, and spares for the aircraft itself); (d) a variety of personal luggage (including a package of blue prints in the possession of one passenger which he declared to be plans for a factory.)

3. As this aircraft is still being detained at Goose Bay it would be desirable to have a decision rather urgently on the question of whether or not it can be released. Mr. Sim, as Deputy Minister of National Revenue, and Mr. Bryce, as well as officials of this Department, would recommend that the plane be released and allowed to proceed on its way. Our regulations apply only to warlike materials. Moreover, even the United States quarantine is confined to offensive weapons and does not cover personnel or papers.

4. There have been some indications this morning that a local radio station has picked up some information concerning the movement of this aircraft through Goose Bay. According to these reports, which have been repeated to us second hand, the aircraft contained German technicians on their way to work at missile sites in Cuba. If such reports are circulating (and it is somewhat difficult to see how they could have got such information out of Goose Bay during the night), it would seem appropriate for the Government to state that we have no information to support the allegations regarding the passengers.

CUBAN CRISIS; MISSILE BASES
 (Previous reference October 23)

1. The Prime Minister said that, when the United States had briefed the Canadian government on the Soviet build-up in Cuba, they had emphasized that the substance of the photographic evidence was secret. The State Department however had revealed the evidence in detail to the press.

...

Some years ago, when the U.S.S.R. had complained about the establishment of U.S. bases ringing Soviet territory, the U.S. had responded that they had been invited to establish these bases by the countries concerned. The U.S.S.R. could now use a similar argument to justify the establishment of bases in Cuba.

He had discussed the situation with the U.K. High Commissioner, who had pointed out that it was difficult to classify weapons strictly as offensive or defensive.

2. The Cabinet noted the statement of the Prime Minister on the Cuban crisis.

CUBAN CRISIS; SEARCH OF AIRCRAFT DESTINED FOR CUBA
 (Previous reference October 23)

3. The Minister of National Defence said that a Cuban aircraft en route to Cuba from behind the Iron Curtain had landed at Goose Bay airport early that morning and had been searched. Two of the passengers were East German missile technicians who claimed diplomatic immunity, and this claim [trois mots illisibles/three words illegible].

4. The Secretary to the Cabinet said that the Deputy Minister of National Revenue (Customs and Excise) had reported that seventy-five cartons from the aircraft's cargo had been inspected and that no war matériel had been found. In the circumstances, Mr. Sim saw no ground for detaining the aircraft further.

5. The Minister of Justice said that on the previous day he had received a telephone call, followed by a letter,† from the Commissioner of the R.C.M. Police asking for confirmation of instructions he had received through officials of the Departments of National Revenue and External Affairs. These officials had referred to a “long, slow search.” He had replied orally to the Commissioner, and had written to him† giving him the substance of the Cabinet decision of October 23rd on this subject.

6. The Secretary of State for External Affairs said that the U.S. government had asked the Canadian government to stop all air flights to Cuba, but that there was no ground for taking such action at this time. The government should be careful to avoid any violation of the I.C.A.O. agreement. The Cuban and Czech governments had been given notice that their planes would be searched if they landed at Canadian airports.

7. During the discussion the following points were raised:

(a) If officials were instructed to conduct a long and slow search of aircraft, they would cause unnecessary delays in the movement of the aircraft, and this would be very aggravating to those detained. On the other hand, the search should be thorough, because otherwise arms matériel might slip through to Cuba. Cartons might be falsely labelled, or the arms matériel might be hidden below legitimate goods.

(b) Some said that the government should not have decided to search Soviet bloc planes. Now that the aircraft at Goose Bay had been found to contain no war matériel, the government was in an embarrassing position. The United Kingdom was not searching such aircraft. Others said that the Canadian people would be reassured to learn that the aircraft had carried no war matériel, and that the government would have been negligent if it had not instituted the search procedure.

(c) The U.S. government had been ill-advised to act unilaterally in this crisis, without consulting its allies. The Suez incident should have served as an object lesson, but apparently had not.

(d) The U.S. government had asked for a list of the passengers carried in the Cuban aircraft, but this should not be given.

(e) The searching of Cuban aircraft was itself a provocative action. What would Canada do if another country began to search Canadian aircraft? On the other hand, this decision had been made and announced, and should not be rescinded. No searches of Cuba-bound planes had been instituted at Shannon, but that airport was an international free port and therefore not comparable with Canadian airports.

(f) To avoid unnecessary delays, the senior customs collector at each of the eastern Canadian airports should be authorized to clear aircraft destined for Cuba if he was satisfied that no war matériel was being carried.

8. The Cabinet agreed,

(a) that authority should be given for the immediate departure of a Cuban aircraft which had landed at Goose Bay airport earlier on this day and had been searched;

(b) that the list of passengers carried in the Cuban aircraft should not be released to other governments;

(c) that the senior customs collectors at Gander and Halifax and other Eastern airports be authorized to clear aircraft destined for Cuba that may land at these airports, provided they are fully satisfied after a careful search that the aircraft are not carrying any war matériel, but not otherwise; and,

(d) that the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Ministers of Justice and National Revenue should make certain that the arrangements in their departments for the search procedure are carefully co-ordinated.

CUBAN CRISIS; ROTATION OF TROOPS IN EUROPE
(Previous reference October 23)

9. The Minister of National Defence said that the rotation of Canadian forces in Europe was scheduled to begin on this day. In view of recent developments, consideration should be given to the desirability of delaying the rotation.

If the plans were not changed, about 2,000 men and their dependents would leave for Europe between now and mid-December. In the event of an outbreak of hostilities meanwhile, it would obviously be undesirable to have part of a military unit in Canada and part in Europe. Such mixing of units would reduce their operational efficiency. Furthermore, in present circumstances it seemed undesirable to send Canadian dependents overseas.

It should be recognized however that any change in the rotation arrangements would be more noticeable to the general public than a change in the general state of military preparedness.

About 125 people were arriving in Trenton on this day, as part of the advance party bound for Europe. Many of them had given up their houses in Canada. Similarly in Europe a like number had packed their effects and were ready to return to Canada. There would be five such advance parties between now and November 5th, and then the main movement would begin.

10. During the discussion the following points were raised:

(a) Some said the rotation of the troops should be deferred but without any formal order on the subject being issued. It was important to avoid any step that might worsen the crisis or cause unnecessary alarm. Others said that the movement of the successive advance parties into Trenton would proceed unless a formal order was given to keep them in their present localities. Accommodation was not available in Trenton for more dependents.

(b) The situation in Berlin was already tense, and might become worse. In these circumstances, the government should not send more dependents to Europe, and would be criticized if it did so. Canada should avoid getting into the vanguard of war, but should take the steps necessary to safeguard the women and children involved.

(c) Dependents now in Europe might be given an opportunity to return to Canada if they so desired.

(d) The international situation might be much clearer within a few days. The immediate need therefore was to defer the beginning of the troop rotation for that period.

11. The Cabinet agreed,

(a) that members of the armed forces and their dependents who had arrived at Trenton as part of the advance party for the rotation of troops in Europe, should be retained at Trenton for the present, and that personnel and dependents who would have proceeded to Trenton in the near future for this purpose should not do so until further advised; and,

(b) that arrangements be made to facilitate the movement back to Canada, on a voluntary basis, of dependents of service personnel in Europe.

CUBAN CRISIS; STATE OF MILITARY PREPARATIONS
(Previous reference October 23)

12. The Minister of National Defence said that consideration should be given to the military measures that ought to be taken to improve the posture of the Canadian forces in case the international situation should deteriorate and war actually occur. One aspect of this question was the matter of the rotation of the troops in Europe. The more general aspect was whether Canada's NORAD forces should implement DEFCON-3 as the U.S. forces under NORAD had done. ... Such a measure would not give rise to extensive publicity.

The present crisis was the most serious since the end of World War II, and it involved the greatest danger of general conflict. The Canadian government had the responsibility of taking simple precautions, to improve the position of the Canadian forces and to protect the people of Canada. ...

13. During the discussion the following points were raised:

(a) Some said that a change in the state of preparedness was unnecessary at this time and might escalate the crisis.

(b) Others said that the Minister of National Defence would not need to announce details of the steps taken, but might merely say that steps were being taken to improve the state of readiness of the Canadian forces. He might explain that it would not be in the interest of security to state particulars of the steps being taken. Such a statement would not cause alarm.

(b) The wisdom of the selective blockade imposed on Cuba by the United States was questionable. It was arguable that even an invasion of Cuba might have had less serious international repercussions. Certain military leaders in the U.S. appeared determined to fight the U.S.S.R. Three years ago some of them had stated to the Prime Minister that the U.S. could defeat the Russians at any time before the autumn of 1962, but that the outlook thereafter was less certain. Fortunately the United Kingdom was emphasizing the need for restraint.

14. The Cabinet agreed to give further consideration, at its next meeting, to the question whether any change is required in the state of readiness of the Canadian forces.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE; CUBAN CRISIS

15. Mr. Churchill, as House Leader, said that opposition spokesmen might move on this day that the House should adjourn the scheduled debate to discuss an urgent matter of public importance, namely the Cuban crisis. The speech by a Conservative Member of Parliament on the previous day, criticizing the measures taken by the U.S. government, would make such a motion the more likely.<sup>47</sup>

16. During the brief discussion some said that if such a debate was requested it should be agreed to by the government. Only about 1½ hours would be available on this day for the purpose. Others said that a debate on the subject at this time would help only the Russians, and that a reply to this effect should be made if such a motion was proposed.

17. The Cabinet noted the statement of Mr. Churchill as House Leader on a possible motion for a debate on the Cuban crisis.

SOVIET BLOC AIRCRAFT FLIGHTS TO CUBA

We have received from the United States this morning the following two requests:

(a) United States Intelligence officials at Goose Bay have asked the Canadian Customs authorities there for a copy of the passenger list of the Cubana aircraft which landed last night.

(b) The United States Embassy asked us this morning for a copy of the regular schedule or timetable of these flights which Czechoslovak Airlines has filed with the Department of Transport. The latest such schedule was received by Transport a few days ago and covers the flights planned during the winter.<sup>48</sup>

2. I understand that Cabinet has decided that the passenger list should not be given to United States Intelligence.

3. The advance flight schedule requested by the Embassy is, of course, unclassified information. In the interests of the safety of the aircraft, we believe it would be desirable to give it to the United States authorities. However, I believe that we might go even farther and take the following steps in respect to each flight:

(a) Inform the United States in each case that a specific aircraft had been inspected, found to contain no arms or implements of war, and allowed to proceed.

(b) At the same time as giving the above assurance we would also pass to the United States the latest available flight-plan information on the aircraft's onward flight to Havana. Although this information normally reaches the United States Air Traffic Control authorities as a matter of course, additional measures might be taken to ensure that the United States authorities are fully aware of all the details.

4. While the United States quarantine of Cuba does not at present extend to aircraft flights, we should think that there is at least some risk of these Bloc aircraft being molested or even shot down when they reach the blockade zone. If this were to happen, Canada might appear to be implicated by virtue of being the last port of call of the aircraft and of having taken special search measures with respect to it. I believe that anything we can do along the above lines might therefore reduce the hazard to the aircraft. Do you agree?<sup>49</sup>

FLIGHTS TO CUBA BY SOVIET BLOC AIRCRAFT

Information contained in your reference telegrams which were both received here during the night (although your G-158 was dated October 22) was given to Foreign Office this morning. A recommendation is going forward to British Ministers today suggesting that British authorities stall on requests for unscheduled landings but no repeat no action yet taken on scheduled overflights. It is the view of officials that the British Government has no repeat no legal right to interfere with such flights and where requests are not repeat not received the only way in which action could be taken would be to force such aircraft to either turn back or land.

2. We hope to be able to inform you later today of Ministerial decision.

3. Your telegram G-158 of October 22 apparently refers to a Cubana Britannia which, according to this morning's press, passed through Shannon Airport last night en route Prague-Havana with 75 passengers, mostly young Cubans, returning from technical training in Prague and Moscow. Two [Cubans] are reported to have said they were missile technicians. Cuban tourists on board shouted "Fidel Castro – we are coming back to fight."

CUBA

Presidential Proclamation

The United States Chargé d'Affaires called on the Minister this morning to leave with him a copy of the full text of the President's proclamation of October 23, 1962. Mr. White indicated that the full text had not been made public, although he thought the operative parts might have been.

Reaction to U.S.A. Initiative

2. Mr. White said how pleased the United States Government were with the United Kingdom statement in the Security Council this morning delivered by Sir Patrick Dean.<sup>50</sup> Mr. White then said, without apparent relevance, that [the] United States Embassy in Ottawa was having to cope with two kinds of press enquiries:

(a) is it correct that the United States has not requested anything of Canada in the present crisis? Mr. White said that they had been “ducking” the question, to which the Minister replied that the Prime Minister had answered that question yesterday in the House;<sup>51</sup>

(b) is it true that the United States is unhappy that Canada has taken a position different from that of the United Kingdom and OAS? Mr. White said questions of this kind had been turned aside as mere rumour, to which the Minister did not comment.

United Nations Aspects

3. The conversation then turned to Charles Ritchie’s talk yesterday with Harlan Cleveland concerning U.N. aspects. The Minister queried how you could dismantle mobile launching sites; White said that some fixed ones were under construction. Concerning the Canadian suggestion for an on-site inspection of Cuba, the Minister played down the Canadian idea, which he said had been based on the assumption that the Soviet Union would deny the existence of offensive missile capacity in Cuba. The Minister and Mr. White both seemed to think that the Soviet Union had not made any such denial (although there was some discussion of the play made on the word “defensive” by Zorin). The Minister assured White that Canada would not press the Canadian suggestion except in consultation with the United States.

4. Mr. White said that the reason why the United States had acted before going to the U.N. was because they feared endless delays. There followed a discussion whether there was any real possibility of resolving the question in the Security Council without going to the General Assembly; the Minister read Mr. White extracts from Ritchie’s telegram indicating that the United States did not rule out the possibility of a solution being found in the Security Council, as the result of some neutral initiative which both sides could accept. Mr. White said he had not received a similar impression from the version he had received of the same conversation.

Over-flights

5. The Minister informed White that we had cleared through a Cubana aircraft after a thorough search which satisfied us that it was not carrying warlike materials. The Minister added that we had no legal authority under ICAO regulations to prevent the aircraft from continuing on its flight. Mr. White said that he had been informed of the facts by Mr. Ritchie and was aware of our interpretation of our obligations under ICAO. The Minister asked whether the United States still regarded as applicable the request that it made on October 22 of us, to temporarily prohibit such over-flights and transit stops. Mr. White said that he did not know and had asked the State Department for clarification.

6. Referring to the effectiveness of the Canadian examination of the cargo of the Cubana plane, White said that a problem of expertise arose here. He was aware that the aircraft was carrying some aircraft spare parts and he noted that spare parts for bombers were on the prohibited list under the President's proclamation. Were we satisfied that our examining officers were able to identify such equipment?<sup>52</sup>

You will have seen text of various Soviet Government declarations. I will be commenting later. Main point is that showdown on Cuba obviously faces Khrushchev with very grave and dangerous dilemma. Among Soviet public over past two years Cuba has been given widespread and emotional sympathetic build-up as symbol of gallant little island people standing up against American imperialism and as staunch friend of USSR. Khrushchev will certainly find it difficult, though I trust not repeat not impossible, to back away from public moral commitments of support.

2. As far as we can judge in Moscow immediate Soviet public reaction to declarations has been widespread apprehension at gravity of situation. Press is full of factory mass meetings expressing solidarity with Cuba. But there seems to be some effort to maintain calm.

3. Last night at supper Sobolev (Deputy Foreign Minister) mentioned to Roberts, Kohler and myself that Soviet Government did not repeat not really expect any significant results from Security Council meetings on Cuban crisis, but was attaching great importance to General Assembly, where they will make their major effort to get support for resolution demanding Americans call off blockade.

4. Meanwhile Sobolev expressed concern lest Soviet ship be sunk and situation dangerously aggravated.

5. I suggested to Sobolev that in my personal view good way out of present dilemma would be some quick and decisive progress toward disarmament agreement.

6. Before supper Drews and ourselves had been at Boris Godunov where it was surprising but somehow reassuring to see Khrushchev and most of his Presidium, with Georghiu Dej, calmly sitting through four-hour opera with an American star.

CUBA: NAC CONSULTATION

At a private meeting of Council called by Acting Secretary-General there was some discussion on how consultations on Cuba should proceed in Council. Colonna suggested that in view of critical situation and its important implications for NATO there should be continuing consultations and he was given strong support by USA, Belgium, Netherlands, Greece and Turkey.

2. I took line that while naturally Council should be kept informed about developments in Cuba affecting NATO and should consult on that basis, it should be recognized that centre of consultation inevitably was elsewhere particularly in Washington and New York. Finletter had suggested that consultation might take place on a personal basis. I pointed out that such consultation might be dangerous since governments concerned were currently communicating officially and personal remarks in the Council on an uninformed basis might be misleading especially in view of quickly changing developments. I was backed by Norway.

3. Netherlands, Greece and Turkey wanted NATO to go on record in an expression of solidarity with USA. Colonna then produced text of a communiqué which read along following lines "NAC is of course consulting in a spirit of complete solidarity on events created by Soviet aggressive action in Cuba and on consequential measures taken by USA."

4. I had already objected to the kind of misleading stories implying that Council had taken a collective position of solidarity behind USA in Cuba crisis as reflected in Don Cook's story in today's Herald-Tribune<sup>53</sup> and was given support by Norway. Norwegian representative and I objected to proposed communiqué on grounds that this was a political position which could only be authorized by governments. We were supported by UK and idea was dropped at least for moment.

5. Finletter also gave a briefing which has already been covered by report from New York particularly in telegram 1903 October 23.† If there was anything new it was indication that events were approaching a showdown with USSR but that USA would be receptive to a high level meeting with Soviets.

6. German Ambassador reported that there was nothing of special consequence in Berlin in last 24 hours and troop movements in East Zone seemed normal. This information was confirmed by representative of Standing Group.

7. Finletter denied Don Cook story that American forces in Europe had been put on alert and indicated that only basis for the story was certain precautionary measures reported in our 2454 October 22.†

8. Your comments and guidance would be appreciated.

CUBA – LEGAL AND UN ASPECTS

In view of extensive press comment on possible significance of President's use of term "quarantine," in apparent preference to the term "blockade," in his address to the nation, we raised this and related questions with Marks and Ehrlich of the Legal Adviser's staff State Department.

Quarantine

2. We were informed that use of term quarantine was deliberate and, in USA view, significant. It was intended to indicate the limited and special purpose of USA interdiction of deliveries to Cuba. It was limited in the sense that it was intended to prohibit only the delivery of offensive weapons and equipment. Its purpose was special in that it was aimed at preserving peace in the area of tension. The concept of quarantine was to be regarded as distinct, both from a "pacific blockade," because no repeat no action was expected of Cuba beyond passive acquiescence in the quarantine; and from a "classical blockade" because no repeat no effort would be made to apply direct economic pressure on Cuba under the terms of the quarantine. The quarantine measures, moreover, were not repeat not to be regarded as in the category of belligerent operations but rather to be considered as essentially defensive and aimed at preventing an escalation of tensions. In contrast, of course, would be the action necessary to comply with the request in USA Draft Resolution presented to UN Security Council for the "dismantling and withdrawal from Cuba of all missiles and other offensive weapons." If USA were to institute a blockade to force Cuba to do this such action would, of course, amount to a classic economic blockade.

3. We were told that, viewed in the foregoing light, USA quarantine action could not repeat not be regarded as a warlike act as Cuban propaganda (but not repeat not so far Soviet propaganda) had alleged. USA could not repeat not, of course, control Soviet or Cuban reaction to USA quarantine or steps taken in pursuance of quarantine such as use of force to implement it.

4. We were told that USA officials regarded distinction between quarantine and either blockade or pacific blockade as “respectable” in international law terms, although perhaps not repeat not “well established.” At any rate officials hold that USA quarantine, as described in proclamation, could not repeat not be equated with any historical precedents of either blockade or pacific blockade.

Relationship to OAS and UN Action

5. We were told that USA action to proclaim the quarantine was deliberately delayed until OAS action could be taken under the Rio Treaty to recommend (in the wording of USA Draft Resolution – our telegram 3[0]85 Oct 23†) that OAS Member States take all measures, individually and collectively, including use of armed force, which they may deem necessary to ensure that the Government of Cuba cannot repeat not continue to receive from Sino-Soviet powers military material and related supplies which may threaten the peace and security of the continent and to prevent the missiles in Cuba with offensive capability from ever becoming an active threat. (You will note that preambular portion of USA proclamation (our telegram 3094 October 23) recites the recommendation of the OAS Organ of Consultation in this regard.)

6. In USA view the effect of such a recommendation was clearly to identify USA quarantine as action taken under and in accordance with the Rio Treaty as a regional security arrangement, recognized by Article 52 of the UN Charter.

7. The significance of this step in USA view was not repeat not only to underline the essentially defensive purposes of USA quarantine, but also to facilitate presentation of USA position in UN. Two major issues to be met in UN context would be to establish (a) that USA action could not repeat not be regarded as contravening provision in Article 53 paragraph 1 of UN Charter that “no repeat no enforcement action shall be taken under regional arrangements or by regional agencies without the authorization of the Security Council”; and (b) that situation regarding Cuba could appropriately be dealt with through regional security arrangements and that action in fact taken (i.e. quarantine) as approved by the OAS was, as prescribed in Article 52 paragraph 1 of the UN Charter, “consistent with the purposes and principles of the UN.”

8. We were informed that USA officials regarded the distinction between enforcement action and other types of action aimed at preserving peace as clearly apparent in the UN Charter. “Enforcement action” under Article 41 and 42 of the UN Charter would be obligatory solely at the instance of the Security Council; whereas both the Security Council and the General Assembly could make recommendations as to the action to be taken by member states. Officials were satisfied that this distinction was “well established” and that USA quarantine was not repeat not capable of being regarded as “enforcement action” prohibited by virtue of any provision of the UN Charter.

9. Similarly, USA action was, in a real sense, rooted in the Rio Treaty because it was based on a recommendation of the OAS calling for action, individual or collective, by its members. This in turn was consistent with the UN Charter which recognized, and indeed recommended, the use of regional means of dealing with tensions; and was, moreover, consistent with the principles and purposes of the UN. Although this was obvious from an examination of the action taken and the relevant terms of the UN Charter, USA officials were satisfied that the regional security arrangements in the Western hemisphere had been specifically in mind (in the terms of Chapultepec,<sup>54</sup> as the forerunner to the Rio Treaty) when chapter eight of the UN Charter dealing with regional arrangements had been drawn up.

10. It was conceded that the involvement of the USSR in the Cuban situation could be advanced as an argument against exclusively regional treatment of the situation in Cuba. In USA view there were two counter arguments. First, USA had provided, by its approach to the Security Council, the opportunity for any necessary reconciliation between regional action and any action that might be appropriate by the UN. Second, it was USA view that philosophy of UN, in the course of its existence, had been to turn more, rather than less, to regional solutions for the easing of tensions. In this connection, mention was made of UN action to refer certain inter-Arab disputes to regional mediation and also of Security Council action in respect of Cuba itself and the Dominican Republic. (We believe latter two references were to September 9/60 resolution of Security Council on Dominican Republic;<sup>55</sup> and rejection on March 23/62 by Security Council of Cuban resolution questioning validity of Punta del Este resolutions.<sup>56</sup> We were told, incidentally, that exclusion of "the present Government of Cuba" from participation in the organs and agencies of the OAS did not repeat not, in their view, weaken the arguments for OAS action since the State of Cuba was regarded as still a member of the OAS.

11. We assume that some or all of the foregoing ideas may be aired at somewhat greater length in the Security Council debate and, indeed, officials to whom we spoke seemed rather to expect that extensive debate would be required. It may be that their anticipation on this score may be related to the indications we had from other State Department officials October 23 (e.g. as reported in our telegram 3092 October 23) that they did not repeat not seem to envisage the early transfer to the General Assembly from the Security Council of debate over the situation in Cuba.

give up on our proposal but we would be considering every other possible means of finding a peaceful solution to the Cuban crisis.

2. In this context it occurs to me that some thought might be given to suggesting that during a specific cooling-off period and as a first step toward reducing tension and terror, the United States and Soviet Union might make a solemn agreement under U.N. auspices to forswear the use of nuclear weapons or missiles while a solution of this particular crisis is being negotiated (this would be much broader than the idea of a "nuclear free" zone).<sup>58</sup> There are, of course, serious risks involved in this suggestion in that the Soviet Union might immediately advocate an extension of the ban to Berlin and to the whole international scene. But these risks must be balanced against the supreme risk of nuclear war being precipitated at any moment. Moreover, any such Soviet proposals could be rejected as a transparent attempt to divert and side-track efforts to find a peaceful solution.

3. The advantage of a temporary U.N. agreement not to use nuclear weapons in the Cuban crisis appears to favour the United States. The Caribbean is one area where the United States can bring to bear a preponderance of conventional weapons and where the Soviet Union could not effectively resist without resorting to missiles and nuclear weapons. The Soviet Union could not be expected to abide by any such agreement if its vital interests were at stake, but the Cuban crisis may not involve much more than Soviet strategic planning and prestige; and some face-saving formula will have to be found for these ingredients. It may be argued that United States Naval forces can not operate properly without using tactical nuclear weapons but it should not be necessary to use these in order to maintain the U.S. position in an area so remote from the Soviet Union if a temporary agreement of the type envisaged were concluded.

4. I advance this suggestion with great diffidence because I have not had time to think through or to discuss with others all of the implications. I am not sure whether it is ingenious, ingenuous or just impractical. I do know that we are rapidly running out of time and ideas. And despite my misgivings, I feel compelled to put the idea forward in the hope that it may contribute in some small way toward the search for a peaceful solution.<sup>59</sup>

SHIPPING TO CUBA – ATTACHED TELEGRAM 3809†
DATED OCTOBER 24, 1962 FROM LONDON CONCERNING SHIPPING TO CUBA

It is understood you wish a brief comment concerning the international law implications connected with the above referred to telegram.

This telegram touches on the status of Canadian-owned ships flying the British flag which are under charter to the Soviet Union. In particular, attention is drawn to the provisions in these Charter Agreements to the following effect:

(1) The Charter Agreements provide that the owner reserves the right to obey the orders from the Government under whose flag the ship sails.

(2) There is also contained in these Charter Agreements a War Risk Clause which provides inter alia “the vessel, unless the consent of the owners be first obtained, is not to be ordered (by the charterers) ... to any place ... which will bring her within a zone which is dangerous as the result of any actual or threatened act of war ... .”

In commenting first of all on the provision in these Charter Agreements by which the owner reserves the right to obey orders from the government under whose flag the ship sails, it may be said that the traditional international law concept is that any ship's operations are governed by the law of the state whose flag the ship is flying. This means that the British registered ships, which are nevertheless Canadian-owned, that are referred to in paragraph four of the attached telegram would, generally speaking, be subject to the laws of the United Kingdom rather than those of Canada with the result that such ships would ordinarily come under the control, for governmental administrative purposes, of the United Kingdom Government rather than the Government of Canada.

The position is reflected in the recent statement made by the Prime Minister in the House of Commons in connection with the shipping of arms to Cuba arising out of a question raised by Mr. Pearson. Set out below is the relevant extract from Hansard.

“Hon. L.B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether his attention has been called to a special report made to the State Department in Washington by the United States maritime administration on, among other things, the part being played by eight Canadian owned ships in trade between communist countries and Cuba.

“Right Hon. J.G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, this question was before the House the other day. Canada is not directly involved in this matter. We have been informed of the recent United States shipping regulations relative to trade with Cuba, but so far as I know there are no ships of Canadian registry that would be affected. Canada, as the house knows, does not permit the export to Cuba of arms or strategic materials. That is the basis of Canadian policy on this question, and it is not affected in any way by the activities of these ships to which the Leader of the Opposition has made reference and which, as I stated earlier, under maritime law and general international law are subject to the laws of the country under whose flag they operate. The eight ships in question are under British registry and, I again state, are not subject to Canadian laws or regulations."<sup>60</sup>

As regards the War Risk Clause contained in these Charter Agreements, which is quoted in part above, this provision most properly gives the owner of the vessel the responsibility for determining whether or not the vessel under charter should be permitted to proceed through a danger zone area.

Alternatively, the owner would be in a position on a contractual basis, if not as a matter of law, to insist on compliance with orders prohibiting his vessel from proceeding through a danger zone area issuing from the government under whose flag his vessel sails. Indeed, it would seem that the owner under charter may require compliance with any order issued from the government under whose flag his vessel sails, regardless of whether the order concerns a danger area or not. And it is noted from the above referred to telegram that it would appear that the owners of British registered vessels have expressed a preference in a Cuba-type emergency to have their vessels' operations regulated by United Kingdom Government order rather than to have to make decisions on their own concerning whether or not to invoke the War Risk Clause.

CUBAN CRISIS

(Previous reference October 24)

33. The Secretary of State for External Affairs said that some Soviet bloc ships bound for Cuba had turned back. It did not appear that Russia would make an issue of the present situation. It had made no move in Berlin so far. A difficult question would arise if Canada were asked its views on the proposal of the Acting U.N. Secretary-General that both the U.S. blockade and the movement of Soviet ships to Cuba be stopped for two or three weeks. U Thant's suggestion would be welcomed by most members of the U.N., because the longer the delay before any precipitate action the better would be the chance of a settlement.

In connection with the Canadian proposal for an eight-nation inspection team to visit Cuba and ascertain the facts, the difficulty was that neither the Russians nor Cuba had denied that missile bases were established in Cuba. The U.S. would probably insist that these bases be removed and the majority of the U.N. would support the U.S. Canada should also support the U.S. in its efforts to remove the bases, but it should not "rush out" and declare its position beyond what had already been said until it was asked for help.

It was for consideration whether Canada's position with respect to the U.S. action was clear to the public. There had been discussion on television and the Prime Minister had made a statement in the House, but the public did not appear to be sure whether Canada fully supported the U.S. action or whether it was neutral. This situation should be corrected.

34. The Cabinet agreed that the Prime Minister should make a statement in the House later that day outlining what steps Canada had taken already and clarifying Canada's stand in support of the U.S. action.

CUBA

Since receipt of your telegrams V-104 and V-105 October 23 and in light of subsequent developments I have been giving great deal of thought to possibilities for constructive action when and if issue moves from Security Council to UNGA. It must be assumed that before this happens it will have been demonstrated that it is not repeat not possible to develop modus vivendi in Security Council for implementing Secretary-General's proposal for cooling-off period and that various resolutions now before Council are either vetoed or fail adoption. Although today's developments are encouraging this is nevertheless very real possibility.

2. I shall deal first with Prime Minister's suggestion that eight neutral members on Disarmament Committee might be designated as inspectors to report on missile bases. Main question we have been concerned to explore is extent to which proposal addresses itself to problem as it has developed. I assume this proposal was made at an early stage when it was expected that USSR would deny existence of missile bases in Cuba. Although they have dismissed USA charges as "fabrications" they have concentrated mainly on stressing defensive character of Soviet military assistance and alleging that USA charges are intended to provide excuse for intervention. Moreover private briefings and publicity by USA have had considerable effect. Among USA allies and friends there seems to be no repeat no serious doubts about USA assertions of seriousness and suddenness of Soviet military build-up. Among Afro-Asians fact of Soviet build-up is generally accepted although many of them may not repeat not have appreciated its full strategic significance.

3. Response of three principals is also of some importance. Castro is quoted in New York Times October 24 as having stated that arms inspectors "had better come ready for combat."<sup>61</sup> Cuban Permanent Representative in Security Council on October 23 said "we will not repeat not accept any kind of observers in matters which fall within our domestic jurisdiction."<sup>62</sup> It can be assumed that this position also reflects Soviet view. I have already reported that initial UK reaction was that proposal was premature in that it might complicate USA position without achieving desired objective. Reactions which our Embassy in Washington had had from State Department make it clear USA Government shares this view.

4. Some neutrals including Barrington of Burma and Ibe of Nigeria both of whom were at Geneva have discussed suggestion with us on basis of press reports and have made point they would not repeat not wish to see put forward formally in absence of prior acceptance by Cuba and USSR.

5. In these circumstances both on grounds of practicality and of topicality I believe that while issue is still under Security Council consideration we should limit our discussions with other delegations to general terms.

6. Situation is extremely fluid and will probably remain so for some time. Nature of discussion in UNGA will be influenced not repeat not only by factors outside control of Assembly such as actions of USA and Soviet governments but also by manner in which for example Secretary-General's appeal is handled. Given this fluidity it is preferable to avoid taking public step which might limit our freedom of action in event opportunity for effective initiative emerges.

7. In considering possibility of pursuing this or other constructive ideas if issue comes before UNGA I think that we should be guided by several basic considerations which have been constantly stressed in discussions which we have had on problem with other delegations:

(a) Any solution which is to be effective will require tacit acceptance of three principals: USA, USSR and Cuba. This requirement is generally accepted by members of Assembly.

(b) Country which is likely to have greatest influence on USA at this stage is UK because their very close association over past few years has established essential basis of confidence and also because UK is most powerful of USA allies. Therefore it might be useful if we first examine informally with UK any ideas which we may wish to consider putting forward.

See United Nations, Security Council Official Records, Seventeenth Year, 1022nd Meeting, 23 October 1962, UN Doc S/PV.1022(OR), p. 22, <http://documents.un.org/>.

(c) Latin American countries have most direct interest in successful solution of this problem and for historical and cultural reasons they have special connection with Cuba which may have its value if negotiations are once started. Therefore we should maintain very close cooperation with more important of Latin Americans and any ideas – such as establishment of self-policing nuclear-free zone for Central and South America, denuclearization of Cuba or unilateral undertaking by Cuba to USA similar to that recently given by Iran to USSR that it would not repeat not permit stationing of nuclear weapons on its territory<sup>63</sup> – should be carefully examined with them.

(d) As made clear in Prime Minister's statement today<sup>64</sup> (your telegram PG-204†) our role in UNGA negotiations will be based on our position as Western hemisphere country united with members of OAS in our opposition to presence of Soviet offensive weapons in Cuba. Thus role we play in UNGA will follow from close collaboration with our allies so that at appropriate moment we can exercise effective influence toward acceptance of reasonable compromises by parties to dispute.

CUBAN POSITION ON THE CRISIS

The Cuban Ambassador, on instructions of his government, called on the Minister this afternoon. He made three points at the outset:

(a) He wanted us to know and, if possible, the Americans through us, that in the event of invasion (or starvation), the Cubans will fight to the death, whatever the odds against them may be.

(b) The Cuban Government was prepared at any time to negotiate its differences with the USA, but the USA apparently continued to be unwilling to negotiate.

(c) The Ambassador welcomed the initiative of yesterday of the Acting Secretary-General calling for a temporary suspension of the quarantine measures and of the delivery of arms to Cuba, but he said it seems it had seem rejected by President Kennedy.

<sup>63</sup> Voir/See "The News of the Week," Current Digest of the Soviet Press, Vol. 14, No. 37 (October 10, 1962), pp. 16-17.

See Canada, House of Commons, Debates, 1962-63, Vol. I, pp. 911-913.

2. The discussion then turned to the arms build-up in Cuba. The Minister emphasized and reiterated the grave threat to the security of the Americas, including Canada, of these missile bases. He insisted that the weapons were of an offensive character, and, one way or another, they had to go. No one, he added, would deny Cuba's right to have genuinely defensive weapons. In reply, the Ambassador first of all expressed doubts whether such missile bases had in fact been installed (questioning the reliability of photographic evidence) but even if they did exist, he contended that they were there for defensive purposes. It was then a matter of the customary argument about defensive and offensive weapons, the Ambassador taking the line that the circumstances and intentions determined whether weapons were defensive or offensive. As Cuba was threatened by the USA, it was entitled to take all possible military measures for its protection. The Minister pointed out that the new ballistic missile installations could not be effective for targets less than 500 miles away. The Ambassador replied that if Cuba were invaded, they would then be entitled to fight back to the best of their ability. The Minister said that by having these offensive weapons on their territory they were running the risk of having their island totally destroyed.

3. The Ambassador confirmed that Castro had rejected any idea of inspection of Cuban defences by the United Nations. The Minister expressed disappointment at this and suggested that this would imply to many countries that Cuba had things to hide. The Ambassador contended that it was a matter of principle not to allow international inspection, but he could not of course be sure that under certain circumstances it would continue to be refused.

4. The Minister suggested that Cuba should come up with some suggestion in the UN. The Ambassador did not dismiss entirely the possibility of a proposal in the UN the main elements of which might be:

- (1) some satisfactory action by Cuba on the missile bases, perhaps under UN supervision;
- (2) a prior or simultaneous effective assurance that the USA would not invade Cuba; and,
- (3) direct negotiations between Cuba and the USA insofar as appropriate.

5. We do not know if more will be heard about these ideas in New York. Apparently the Ambassador's instructions covered only points (a), (b) and (c) at the beginning of this telegram.

For Washington Only:

You should discuss this telegram with the State Department indicating that the Cuban Ambassador called on the Minister essentially to make the points listed in (a), (b) and (c) at the beginning of this telegram.

CUBAN CRISIS

Further to my reference telegram you will also have seen text of Khrushchev's telegram to Bertrand Russell,<sup>65</sup> today's press articles, and other Soviet public statements. I and my principal Western colleagues have been impressed thus far with relative moderation of Soviet Government reaction to President Kennedy's speech and introduction of American naval blockade. While reiterating Soviet thesis that if war is unleashed from first hour it would become thermonuclear and global, and while emphasizing gravity of crisis and need for restraint on American as well as Soviet side, Khrushchev's statement to Russell that "as long as rocket nuclear weapons are not repeat not put into play it is still possible to avert war" seems to imply and even perhaps pave way in Soviet camp for not repeat not reacting too strongly or immediately, at least not repeat not by strategic military means, to blockade itself. This seems to me cardinal note in Khrushchev-Russell message, although point is made earlier that if American Government does carry out programme of piratic actions outlined by it Soviet side will [have] no repeat no alternative but to resort to means of defence against aggressor.

2. Khrushchev seems to be openly recognizing, by implication, that tactical advantage in Caribbean area lies with Americans since onus of initiative in escalation would have to lie on Soviet side. On other hand Khrushchev may be tempted to reflect that in Berlin situation is somewhat reversed.

3. Many explanations are possible for Soviet failure to spell out to Soviet public several points in Kennedy's Monday evening speech and his seven point demands. Lack of emphasis on presence of ground-to-ground Soviet strategic nuclear rockets in Cuba could make withdrawal easier. One consideration may be that publicity for details of Kennedy's charges and demands might make Soviet restraint or compromise more difficult.

4. Khrushchev's suggestion in telegram to Russell about desirability of early summit meeting, coupled with call for American-Soviet-Cuban negotiations as main operative clause in Soviet draft resolution at Security Council, is significant.

5. U Thant's proposal for two week standstill agreement might help if accepted. Would appreciate indication of your reaction to this.

6. Meanwhile it is worth reporting that such contacts as I and my Western colleagues have had during recent days with Soviet officials and ministers have shown latter to be impressed with gravity of situation but calm, correct and not repeat not unfriendly.

7. But main Soviet reaction to USA move is of course still to come. Soviet restraint might become very much more difficult if Soviet ship is sunk by American fleet. It would be wrong to underestimate danger of situation.

8. Incidentally there is a rumour (not repeat not in my view implausible) that on Monday October 22 Soviet leaders became suddenly alarmed that Americans had probably decided on sudden military invasion of Cuba. Rumour goes on to allege that Khrushchev and Presidium were in fact relieved by Kennedy's speech disclosing that American decision thus far was limited to imposition of naval blockade and demands. This gave Moscow time rather than facing them with immediate choice between acquiescing in loss of Cuba or launching major hostilities.

9. Incidentally it would help me to know whether in your assessment American Government is in fact likely to use military force to secure destruction of rocket bases in Cuba in event Cuba and USSR refuse to dismantle and withdraw them.

<sup>65</sup> Voir/See American Foreign Policy, Current Documents, 1962 (Washington: United States Government Printing Office, 1966), pp. 421-422.

10. American Embassy here is inclined to believe that sudden disclosure of existence of IRBMs and MRBMs in Cuba was in fact deliberately designed by Khrushchev to prove American firmness, possibly with view to determining future Soviet course in Berlin. Would appreciate knowing whether you have any confirmation of view that presence of these rockets had been successfully kept secret until about mid-October, when they were suddenly and unnecessarily displayed in such way as to make their presence unmistakably clear to air reconnaissance. If so, this would give some support to thesis of deliberate Soviet probe. Alternative hypotheses also tenable that such disclosure was designed either (a) to deter apprehended American invasion of Cuba or (b) possibly to provoke American Cuban crisis in order to strengthen Soviet case in Berlin, perhaps with view to possible Soviet or East German action against military access there, or Soviet case against American overseas bases in general.

11. To sum up situation as I see it today (a) Soviet reaction thus far relatively restrained, but it could conceivably get out of hand if ships sunk; (b) in any case main reaction still to come; (c) meanwhile Soviet emphasis on importance of UN is significant and perhaps not repeat not discouraging; (d) I think some significance (perhaps ominous) should be attached to comparatively greater Soviet support expressed in today's press for Chinese side in Sino-Indian crisis.

[Ottawa], October 26, 1962

UNITED STATES QUARANTINE AGAINST CUBA

As you will recall, the Prime Minister enquired early this week about the traditional position at international law with regard to this matter, and in reply your memorandum of October 23 pointed to the following conclusions:

(1) The "Quarantine" imposed by the United States on all offensive military equipment under shipment to Cuba is a measure "sui generis," which it would neither be appropriate to consider as illegal nor easy to construe as legal;

(2) Pacific blockades – which this "quarantine" resembles somewhat – were considered by most authors as permissible, provided foreign ships were not prevented from entering the ports of the blockaded state (this could be allowed only during blockades of a war-like character); the United Nations Charter is now widely interpreted as forbidding such blockades except when imposed by the United Nations under Articles 41 and 42 of the Charter (the texts of Articles cited in this memorandum are attached†);

(3) It is debatable (and doubtful) whether such a quarantine can be considered as a measure of self-defence under Article 51 of the Charter since there has been no overt armed attack (most authors tend to rule out the plea of self-defence except in this latter eventuality); Article 2(4), though, could be invoked against the military build-up in Cuba;

(4) There is very little doubt, however, that the use of armed force – which could be considered as armed reprisals – against foreign (including Soviet) ships would run against the Charter, unless it is done in accordance with Article 42. (See paragraphs 3-5- below);

In the light of President Kennedy's proclamation of October 23, and particularly of the OAS Council approval of the resolution presented by Secretary Rusk on October 23, the following comments may now be added.

2. In his proclamation, President Kennedy states that vessels failing to "comply with directions shall be subject to being taken into custody" – that is to be seized, contrary to what was assumed in the memorandum to the Prime Minister (paragraph 2); such seizures would make it more difficult to justify the "quarantine" decreed. On the other hand, the President stresses that "force shall not be used except in case of failure or refusal to comply with directions or with ... directives of the Secretary of Defence ..., or in case of self-defence. In any case, force shall be used only to the extent necessary."

3. In order that they might resort legally to armed force against foreign ships refusing to halt, to be searched or to turn back from Cuba if carrying offensive weapons, it appears that the United States would need authorization to do so from the Security Council under Articles 39 and 42. Following a veto in the Security Council, they might seek to refer the matter to the General Assembly, possibly under the "Uniting for Peace" resolution of November 3, 1950, on the grounds that there is a "threat to peace." The Assembly could then make "appropriate recommendations to members for collective measures"; such a recommendation would not be binding but might be considered as providing authorization for the action recommended. (This action might be the "quarantine" decreed, but might more likely be the appointment of a fact-finding or inspection commission in Cuba. Lauterpacht II, 176)

4. The Inter American Treaty of Reciprocal Assistance of 1947 (or Rio Treaty)<sup>66</sup> goes further than the Charter. Article 25 of the OAS Charter<sup>67</sup> and Article 6 of the Rio Treaty provide inter alia that, "If the inviolability or the integrity of the territory or the sovereignty or political independence of any American State should be affected by an aggression which is not an armed attack ... or by any other fact or situation that might endanger the peace of America, the Organ of Consultation shall meet immediately in order to agree on the measures ... which should be taken for the common defence and for the maintenance of the peace and security of the continent" (Article 6). Article 8 of the Treaty enumerates, "For the purpose of this Treaty, the measures on which the Organ of Consultation may agree," include the "partial or complete interruption of economic relations ... and use of armed force." The meeting held on Tuesday by the Council of the OAS authorized the United States (after their decision was taken but before the quarantine came into force) to take the measures announced, including the use of armed force.

5. The Organization of American States is a regional organization, and the Rio Treaty a regional arrangement under Article 52 of the United Nations Charter. There seems to be some discrepancy between Chapter VII of the Charter and Articles 6 and 8 of the Treaty. With reference to the foregoing and to Articles 51 and 53 of the Charter, it would appear that the use of armed force by the American States is subject to two limitations: they may resort to it only if exercising the right of collective self-defence provided for under Article 51, or if authorized by the Security Council under Article 53. Since on the one hand there is no unanimity as to the rights granted by Article 51, and since on the other hand the Rio Treaty (including Articles 6 and 8) has been accepted as a regional arrangement under Article 52, it is not possible to conclude categorically either that the use of armed force under the Rio Treaty is permissible in the present case or that it is forbidden. At any rate, it seems that the OAS Council should now report the action it has approved to the Security Council, in conformity with Article 54 of the

Charter and Article 5 of the Rio Treaty. (Fenwick p.191; Kelsen p. 328, 793 & Goodrich & Hambro & Bentwick & Martin & Sohn: under Articles 51-53)

6. The legality of the United States measure being perhaps debatable, it would seem advisable, on broad political grounds, and in line with the Prime Minister's statement last night (Hansard of October 25, p. 913), to avoid discussing the legal merits of the case. If we are asked questions about the validity in international law of the "quarantine" decreed by President Kennedy, you might therefore wish us to answer somewhat along the following lines:

"This is a complex issue which cannot be isolated from the broader policy questions now being discussed by the Security Council. While the matter is thus being debated at the United Nations, it would not be appropriate to comment on the particular aspects or considerations which may be involved.

As the Prime Minister said on Thursday night, debating the legality of the United States quarantine is largely sterile and irrelevant. We have a situation to face: there has arisen a new and immediate threat to the security of the hemisphere. We and other countries are considering this whole question as a matter of the utmost urgency and are actively seeking ways of finding a peaceful solution to this situation."

SOVIET INTENTIONS AND REACTIONS IN THE CUBAN SITUATION

Information available to us give no grounds for putting in question American intelligence about the build-up of Soviet missile sites in Cuba with a significant offensive potential directed against the Western Hemisphere. President Kennedy is therefore correct in speaking of a serious threat to the national security of the U.S.A. This paper will attempt to analyze the possible Soviet intentions in setting up MRBM and IRBM sites in Cuba; their reactions to date to the American action in imposing a quarantine and calling for the dismantlement of offensive weapons sites; and possible Soviet courses of action.

2. We can assume that the Soviet Union knew that their build-up in Cuba would be discovered quickly by the U.S.A., though they may have hoped to get close to completion of the build-up before having the facts exposed by the U.S.A. This would have presented the U.S.A. and the world in general with a fait accompli which would have raised tensions but would in the end be accepted, as American foreign bases are accepted.

3. There are, in broad terms, two possible reasons for the Soviet action, each with variants.

(a) The Strategic Reason. The U.S.S.R. suffers from a deficiency in long-range strike capability against the U.S.A. in relation to the American strike capability, both long-range and from peripheral bases, against the U.S.S.R. The U.S.S.R. seems to have yielded to the temptation of taking a short-cut towards reducing the imbalance. The net effect of the installation of medium – and intermediate – range strike capacity up close to the U.S.A. is to increase the Soviet nuclear strike capability against North America and to circumvent the North American early warning network. The U.S.S.R. can now inflict approximately double the damage it could inflict before, but the U.S.A. still has superiority over the U.S.S.R. in strategic striking power. Increased production of Soviet-based ICBM's will in time increase the Soviet strategic striking force but, barring an unforeseen technical break-through by the Russians, the Minuteman missiles will cancel out this increase and prolong the present imbalance of military power favouring the U.S.A. Nevertheless, the Cuban bases have added considerably to the credibility of Soviet ability to launch a nuclear attack on U.S. targets.

(b) The Political Reason. The Soviet Union may have intended to build up an offensive potential in Cuba

[i] as proof of its determination to back Castro to the hilt and maintain its Cuban beachhead in Latin America though of course the installation of offensive missile sites has increased the temptation on the U.S.A. to knock out the Soviet beachhead in Cuba and Castro at one and the same time;

(ii) as an extra form of pressure which could be used after four years of frustrating postponements since their original ultimatum of November 1958 in order to force Western abandonment of its stand on Berlin;

(iii) as a means of creating disunity in the Western alliance and of isolating the U.S.A. from its allies, and from the other countries of the free world in general.

(iv) as a lever to mount propaganda attacks on American bases around the periphery of the U.S.S.R. and in the disarmament context, to press for non-dissemination of nuclear weapons and elimination of foreign bases; in return for Soviet abandonment of the Cuban base;

(v) as a means of forcing a Kennedy-Khrushchev meeting in order to attempt to resolve a clearly critical situation, and at the same time, probably, to attempt a broader solution on Germany-Berlin and possibly on nuclear tests.

These two general reasons are not mutually exclusive, and the Soviet purpose may have been a combination of the several strategic and political variants.

4. From the hesitation and the relative moderation evident in the initial Soviet reaction to President Kennedy's statement, it would appear that the U.S. action probably did not come at the time nor in the way expected by the U.S.S.R. The Soviet Union may have expected, at one extreme, a new U.S. armed attack on Cuba or at least a total blockade; or at the other extreme they may have expected that the U.S.A. would either raise the matter in private discussion with the Soviet leaders or refer it to the U.N. before taking any other unilateral action. Armed attack or total blockade would have incurred heavy opprobrium for the U.S.A., regardless of the degree of provocation for the action. A straight reference to the U.N. would have given the Russians more time to complete their installations and would have allowed them to work on anti-Western and anti-U.S. sentiments in the U.N. (The latter they will no doubt still pursue.) Simultaneous reference to the U.N. and the quarantine have probably caught the Russians off-stride, for a quarantine designed to prevent only offensive military equipment reaching Cuba is per se less objectionable than a total blockade; and the demand for dismantling of bases already prepared can be fitted into the fairly widespread desire to avoid further proliferation of nuclear weapons sites.

5. The Soviet reaction to President Kennedy's announcement has, on the whole and, given the extent of the challenge to Soviet prestige, demonstrated comparative moderation and an evident desire to buy time rather than precipitate a more severe crisis immediately.

(a) The Soviet Union has said that it will not allow its ships to be subject to American search, but a number of Soviet ships en route to Cuba have been turned back while one has been intercepted and allowed to proceed. In the Security Council, the Soviet delegate has predictably called for a "cease and desist" order on the American quarantine action, but has avoided any such belligerent statement as a Soviet intention to shoot its way through the American naval cordon. It has emphasized the "piratical" rather than the "belligerent" nature of the quarantine and has harped on the illegal nature of this interference with the freedom of the seas.

(b) The Soviet Union has maintained that equipment delivered to the Cubans is of a defensive nature and has insisted that it will not take the initiative in a nuclear conflict; but it has not explicitly denied that MRBM and IRBM sites are being installed, thereby perhaps hiding behind a semantic veil of what is "defensive" and what is "offensive" and also of what has been actually delivered to the Cubans and what has been retained in Soviet hands.

(c) The Soviet Union has predictably used the tu quoque argument of U.S. bases surrounding the U.S.S.R., but has not attempted to link the Berlin situation with the Cuban crisis in any way, despite what it could have considered a provocation by Kennedy in this regard.

(d) Khrushchev has, in his message to Lord Russell, expressed willingness to consider a meeting at the highest level to attempt to resolve the crisis and has said the Soviet Union will avoid any reckless action, thereby attempting to give the impression that he is moderate and reasonable in contrast with a hasty, belligerent and unreasonable Kennedy.

(e) Khrushchev has agreed to U Thant's proposal for a temporary halt to the quarantine and a temporary halt to Soviet shipments to Cuba, but presumably in the knowledge that the U.S.A. would reject it and also in the knowledge that agreement did not prevent the continued construction on the missile bases. He has also agreed, as has Kennedy, to preliminary talks among U Thant, Stevenson and Zorin.

From these first Soviet reactions, it would appear that the Soviet Union is anxious to avoid a further heightening of tensions and presumably, therefore, while buying time and attempting to get world public opinion on its side, wants at least to look at the possibility of a compromise solution. It has been singularly imprecise in stating what it is going to do in response to the American challenge.

6. From this brief analysis of possible Soviet motivations and of Soviet reactions to date, we may conclude the following:

(a) The strategic reason is not sufficient in itself to explain the Soviet action, for the short-cut of establishing MRBM and IRBM sites in Cuba, while it reduces the imbalance in strategic striking force, nevertheless leaves the balance still strongly in the American favour. Therefore there must have been political considerations as well.

(b) The major political consideration was probably to improve the Soviet Union's bargaining capacity in future talks with the U.S.A., particularly with respect to Berlin but also perhaps, in the disarmament context, with respect to non-dissemination of nuclear weapons and elimination of foreign bases.

(c) The ancillary political considerations, or the side-benefits, were probably to create disunity in the Western alliance, to attempt to isolate the U.S.A. from its allies and from the neutrals and to provide the basis for propaganda attacks on American bases around the periphery of the U.S.S.R.

(d) The Soviet Union has acted daringly and provocatively in setting up missile-launching sites in Cuba; but in reaction to a vigorous American response it has displayed comparative moderation and has been anxious to give the public impression of a willingness to talk and negotiate, even though it has not yet indicated a line of possible compromise.

SOVIET INTENTIONS AND REACTION IN THE CUBAN SITUATION

Attached to this memorandum is a paper prepared in my Department<sup>69</sup> analyzing Soviet intentions in establishing MRBM and IRBM bases in Cuba and Soviet reactions to the USA response to this challenge.<sup>70</sup>

2. The net effect of the Soviet MRBM and IRBM sites in Cuba is to double the Soviet nuclear strike capability against North America and also to circumvent the North American early warning network. The bases in Cuba constitute a short-cut to reducing the imbalance of military power favouring the U.S.A. The U.S.A. still, however, has superiority over the U.S.S.R. in strategic striking power and can inflict more nuclear damage on the U.S.S.R. than can the U.S.S.R. on the U.S.A.

3. The existence of the missile sites was bound to become known sooner rather than later by the U.S.A. and to provoke a strong reaction. The public disclosure of their existence may have been made sooner than the Russians expected. In any event it would appear that they may not have anticipated the exact form of the American response – a quarantine (rather than armed attack on Cuba or total blockade) and a simultaneous reference to the U.N.

4. The conclusions of the paper are as follows:

(a) The strategic reason is not sufficient in itself to explain the Soviet action, for the short-cut of establishing MRBM and IRBM sites in Cuba, while it reduces the imbalance in strategic striking force, nevertheless leaves the balance still strongly in the American favour. Therefore there must have been political considerations as well.

(b) The major political consideration was probably to improve the Soviet Union's bargaining capacity in future talks with the USA, particularly with respect to Berlin but also perhaps, in the disarmament context, with respect to non-dissemination of nuclear weapons and elimination of foreign bases.

(c) The ancillary political considerations, or the side-benefits, were probably to create disunity in the Western alliance, to attempt to isolate the USA from its allies and from the neutrals and to provide the basis for propaganda attacks on American bases around the periphery of the USSR.

U.S. TALKING PAPER

My Government thought you might be interested in its current appraisal of Soviet policy with respect to the Cuban crisis.

1. You will recall that during Secretary Rusk's visit here August last he explained to the Prime Minister the long period of discussions with the Soviet Union when we explored several possibilities of a settlement of the Berlin crisis only to have the Soviets close progressively each avenue, leaving only the conclusion that the central and sole objective of the Soviet Union was to remove the Western presence from West Berlin.

2. Beginning in the middle of this summer, there were indications that Khrushchev and the Soviet Government had concluded that there was no possibility that the Soviet Union could obtain its objectives with respect to Berlin through the process of negotiation. There were also indications that Khrushchev felt too personally committed to achievement of his objectives in Berlin to retreat, as well as indication that factors, such as the situation in East Germany and Communist China pressure, were pushing the Soviet Government to a resolution of the Berlin problem and that the Soviet Union had decided that a showdown on the Berlin problem within some months was inevitable. There were also indications that the Soviet Union and Khrushchev personally had developed doubts as to whether they could win in a showdown and that alternatives might be either an ignominious retreat or nuclear war.

3. The Soviet Union privately and at a later date publicly stated that while it would insist upon conclusive discussion of the Berlin problem in a relatively short period, it would not plan to do so until after the American congressional elections. This position it maintained even though the U.S. Government made clear to them that insofar as it was concerned, elections had no bearing on the problem.

4. Assurances were given by the Soviet Government both privately and publicly that it would not arm Cuba with offensive weapons. These were not merely a dialectical discussion but, rather, specific assurances against weapons that could reach the United States. The TASS statement of September 11 said that the Soviet Union had no need to take such action and this statement, which was largely concerned with the Cuban situation, related it to the question of the German peace treaty and other international problems.<sup>72</sup>

5. When Gromyko saw the President on October 18, he made the standard but strong statement about the Berlin and German peace treaty issues and then made the following statements about Cuba: Soviet assistance to Cuba “pursued solely the purpose of contributing to the defense capabilities of Cuba,” that “training by Soviet specialists of Cuban nationals in handling defensive armaments was by no means offensive” and that “if it were otherwise, the Soviet Government would have never become involved in rendering such assistance.”

6. Khrushchev indicated to Ambassador Kohler that he had virtually decided to come to the United Nations meeting in New York in the latter part of November and Gromyko, in his conversation with the President, confirmed this, although no specific date was set.

7. When Soviet action in arming Cuba with offensive nuclear missiles became evident, it was because of developments set forth above that the U.S. Government tended to believe that Soviet action was probably primarily geared to a showdown on Berlin, and that it intended it to be timed with Khrushchev’s arrival in the United States and the completion of the installation of these missiles in Cuba.

CUBA – PROPOSAL OF LEADER OF THE OPPOSITION

Yesterday in the House the Leader of the Opposition in welcoming U Thant’s initiative indicated that it would have more chance of success if it could be supplemented by some proposal that would ensure that any obligation undertaken by those concerned would be carried out. This would present no special problem in respect of the termination of the U.S. quarantine measures, but would require some control and inspection measures if the world were to be satisfied that the Soviet deliveries were not continuing. Mr. Pearson then proposed that if the opportunity arises the Canadian Delegation might make a supplementary proposal, viz., “to set up immediately a U.N. naval inspection force to make sure that any obligation of this kind, ... was carried out.” He suggested that this would give the kind of reassurance that U.N. inspection and control has given in the past.

2. It is possible that the Leader of the Opposition regards this as a major suggestion and may ask if any steps are being taken to act upon it.

3. In the Department we have already given preliminary consideration to the idea of “a naval UNEF” but had discarded it on the ground that any proposal, to be acceptable, would have to attract the support of both the Soviet Union and the United States. While the Soviet Union would doubtless go along with the idea of a U.N. naval inspection force, it is extremely doubtful that the United States would do so. It is clearly the United States view that the necessity of preventing the delivery of nuclear warheads or nuclear equipment was of such vital and direct interest to the security of the United States that they were prepared to undertake unilateral measures of the most extreme kind, having inherent in them the risk of global war, to intercept their delivery to Cuba. It is highly doubtful therefore that they would entrust this vital task to the naval units of other countries with far less effective means of detecting, tracking and intercepting Soviet vessels, even though the forces should be under the U.N. flag.

4. The only circumstances in which they might be prepared to entertain such a suggestion would be if there were in addition in Cuba a sort of observation group that the Prime Minister proposed on October 23, to give some assurance on two points:

- (1) that the U.N. blockade was not evaded, allowing some nuclear materials to continue to arrive in Cuba; and,
- (2) that current work on launching sites was terminated.

5. In a sense therefore Mr. Pearson's suggestion is complementary to that made by the Prime Minister, but of the two, only the Prime Minister's would have any chance of standing alone.

6. Mr. Pearson's suggestion is however constructive and should be welcomed as such.

CUBA AT THE UNITED NATIONS

It is not an easy task to assess the future course of developments on Cuba at the United Nations. Much depends on the motives of the main parties, on the measures which they adopt outside the United Nations and on the tactics they prefer within the Organization. It is by no means certain that any of the parties seriously contemplate a United Nations intervention. Neither is it clear that a majority of the members of the United Nations wish to commit themselves to any particular course of action involving the United Nations. The current proceedings in the Security Council could be nothing more than a smoke-screen for a Great Power test of strength and determination outside the United Nations framework.

2. The debate in the Security Council has not done much to clarify the intention of the parties. The resolutions submitted separately by the United States and the Soviet Union seem doomed to failure.<sup>73</sup> The resolution, proposed by Ghana and the United Arab Republic and calling for an intervention by the Secretary-General, has largely been implemented by U Thant in his approaches to the three governments concerned.<sup>74</sup> None of these proposals appears to provide a sufficient United Nations umbrella to cover the withdrawal of the two principal antagonists, if this were considered necessary.

3. The main elements of the present situation appear to be the following:

(a) The Soviet Union, over a period of some weeks, has engaged in a secret and rapid build-up of powerful weapons in Cuba. This has been done despite the certainty that the United States would become aware of the build-up and could be expected to react sharply at some stage. In other words, the Soviet Union has deliberately provoked a sharp United States reaction at a time when developments in relation to Berlin were expected. It was also a time of domestic difficulty for the United States Government.

(b) The United States reaction has been swift and sharp. In the face of the arms build-up, the main United States choice was to knock out the missile bases either by bombing or invading Cuba, or by putting a squeeze on the Soviet Union as the real source of trouble. The United States has chosen the latter, probably because it is the lesser of two evils. A direct attack on Cuba would almost certainly have produced a strong reaction in the United Nations and in world public opinion. The quarantine is considered unjustified by a great many people but the friends of the United States can accept it as a necessary response to clear provocation.

(c) Neither the Soviet Union nor Cuba has denied the military build-up. It is described as defensive and as part of the inalienable right of any sovereign state; it is likened to the long-established United States bases in other parts of the world. This legally justified action is contrasted with the illegal quarantine imposed by the United States.

(d) The main United States objective is not only to halt the military build-up but to eradicate the bases. The lifting of the quarantine has been made conditional on such eradication. The United States is prepared to accept United Nations verification in this regard. The Cubans, however, have categorically rejected United Nations observation of any kind, presumably on the ground that there is no legal justification. The Soviet Union could be expected to take the same position.

(e) The Soviet objectives are not so clear. Perhaps the Soviet Government was taken by surprise by the nature of the United States reaction. So far, the Soviet Union seems disposed not only to avoid a serious incident at sea but to play the peace-lover in general. As yet, there has been no countermove on Berlin and there may not be because of a genuine worry about intensifying the risk of armed clash and because of a Soviet desire to capitalize on the United States "aggressive" quarantine. In the longer term, the Soviet Union may hope to undermine the whole United States position on overseas bases.

4. The present situation seems to be under control but the longer the quarantine continues, the greater is the risk that some incident will occur to increase the tension and danger. The Soviet Union can reasonably expect that the whole pressure of world public opinion will be for a "negotiated settlement." The United States position does not really call for any negotiation about Cuba but merely for the eradication of the missile bases. This does not mean that the two Great Powers should not confer with a view to resolving the present crisis. At some stage, this might be at Heads of Government level. It is not clear whether the Secretary-General will succeed in his present role, although he may bring about some confrontation of the parties. His appeal to the parties was one-sided to the extent that it did not really deal with the problem of eliminating the missile bases.

5. The emphasis during the next few days will probably be on the consultations involving U Thant and the two main parties. The likelihood is that the Security Council will be recessed during the period of consultation. Until the Secretary-General has reported on his efforts, there is not much to be gained from continuing the debate in the Council, although some new incident could cause it to convene. It is doubtful whether the United States is in any hurry to have the various resolutions voted upon because of the pressure which would develop, after a veto, to bring the situation before the General Assembly. In the absence of any constructive approach broadly acceptable to the parties, a debate in the Assembly might only make matters worse.

6. If the Secretary-General's intervention ends in failure and if Council action should be blocked by exercise of the veto, the Assembly will be brought into the picture, especially if this series of failures tends to increase the tension and the risk of further incident. In present circumstances, and particularly in view of the attitude of the main parties, the possibilities open to the General Assembly are few:

(a) An overwhelming majority would no doubt support an urgent appeal for further efforts at negotiation. The non-aligned members would presumably press for a draft resolution like the Ghana-UAR text submitted in the Council. In addition to putting the Secretary-General into the act, that resolution calls upon the parties "to refrain meanwhile from any action which may directly or indirectly further aggravate the situation." This call for a negotiated settlement is commendable enough but it might not have much effect in a situation in which the Acting Secretary-General had tried and failed to bring about a serious conference.

(b) The Soviet Union could be expected to press for the lifting of the quarantine and it might attract substantial support for this. In the Council, the UAR and Ghana expressed disapproval of the United States action. The United States and the West might find themselves on the defensive but they could probably defeat any resolution calling for the termination of the quarantine provided that the Latin Americans remained solid behind the United States. Nevertheless, a debate on this issue could be embarrassing for the Western powers and it would tend to divert attention from the real problem, that of eradicating the missile bases in Cuba.

(c) In the face of Cuban and Soviet opposition, it would be unrealistic to press for any United Nations investigation or observation either within Cuba or in the Caribbean around it. Besides, the present situation seems to call not so much for fact-finding as for verification that the missile bases are being dismantled. Many members of the United Nations might be prepared to support the United States in its demand for dismantlement and a resolution to that effect might be adopted in the face of a large number of abstentions but it would not be effective unless Cuba agreed to co-operate.

7. The main difficulty about taking action in the Assembly might be the disposition of the non-aligned states not to become involved on either side. Effective action might only be possible if it had almost unanimous support from the Assembly. A situation could arise, however, in which both the United States and the Soviet Union, having become too heavily committed to the courses they were following, would wish to have a face-saving device to cover their disengagement. At that stage, the United Nations might be required to provide an umbrella. It would have to be broad enough to permit the halting of Soviet shipments of offensive weapons, the lifting of the quarantine and the dismantling of the missile bases in Cuba.

8. A most obvious approach would be to establish a neutral zone in and around Cuba guaranteed by the Great Powers and by Cuba's immediate neighbours. This would involve the elimination of weapons of mass destruction and particularly the missile bases. There would have to be international verification, presumably on a continuing basis. In its present frame of mind, Cuba might resent this form of enforced neutrality.

9. A similar approach might be the one voiced by Brazil, that is the establishment of a nuclear-free zone in Latin America. This would call for the elimination of the bases under effective international control; it could be combined with a Great Power guarantee and with a non-aggression feature involving Cuba's neighbours. It would also offer an important concession to the Soviet Union for it would be the thin edge of the wedge on the establishment of nuclear-free zones elsewhere. It would be a concrete step to prevent the spread of nuclear weapons and to start on regional disarmament. It could be a pilot project for international inspection. Finally, it should pose no threat to the security of the United States or the other countries of the Americas.

10. Such a proposal would be similar to but a considerable enlargement of the Arab good neighbour policy, which was embodied in an Assembly resolution of August, 1958.<sup>75</sup> It is most important that any proposal of this kind should be initiated by the states directly concerned. In this case, the United States and all the Latin Americans have the most immediate interest. The other countries of the Western hemisphere are also closely concerned and, of course, the proposal would be meaningless unless it were fully endorsed by the other nuclear powers. The implication is that with the agreement of the United States and the other nuclear powers, the move should be initiated by the Latin American states. This does not mean, however, that after appropriate consultation on a suggestion of this kind could not be included in a statement by Canada.<sup>76</sup>

[London], October 26, 1962

I was most interested to hear your views from our High Commissioner.

I have already sent you a copy of what I said in the House of Commons today with which I hope you will agree. It seems to me that there are three points which we should do well to emphasise at this stage.

(a) If after President Kennedy had made such clear declarations about his opposition to Cuba having offensive weapons he had then done nothing in the face of the incontrovertible evidence which he received, he would have struck a severe blow at allied confidence in American declarations. This might have had quite serious effects in some parts of the world (for example, South-East Asia or the Middle East) where small countries feel themselves menaced by the proximity of the Soviet empire and rely very much on the assurances given by the United States.

(b) We should learn the lesson of pre-war period and not become so alarmed by a particular crisis that we settle it at the expense of being a point or two down in the larger struggle. This is just what we were always tending to do in the 1930's. The result was to produce a feeling of hubris in the aggressor and depression among the democracies which finally leads to a mood of desperation. Thus a weak settlement may easily do more harm than good to the long-term prospects of peace.

(c) This latest demonstration of Soviet duplicity (and the Russians seem to have been telling some particularly bare-faced lies) should finally put paid to the idea that the countries of the world have only to trust each other and all can be arranged amicably in such fields as disarmament. We shall surely have to be even more careful in the future than in the past to insist that international agreements must be adequately policed and verified. I do not know exactly what the next stage will be. I assume that the United States will probably concentrate for the moment on improving U Thant's suggestion by, for example, pointing out that while it will be clear that their blockade has been removed, there will be no proof that military supplies are not still going in unless there is some inspection in Cuba. Also the work on the missile sites may well continue secretly unless there are United Nations observers to stop it. If this is the United States line, I propose to instruct our representatives to do all they can to back it up. Thereafter there may, I suppose, be some negotiation which will perhaps go beyond the narrow Cuban question into larger issues. If such a development occurs, it will be particularly important to consult together to ensure that our own positions are properly protected. I thought I would just send you this message with these current thoughts as the situation develops hour by hour.

CUBA: SOVIET VIEWS

Activities of Soviet Ambassador during Cuban crisis may be of interest. Wednesday night he approached me at party and in a state almost of (euphoria?) asserted that not repeat not even country like Dahomey let alone USSR could accept USA blockade. Soviet ships would proceed to Cuba, if necessary with backing of Soviet navy. Later he told Brazilian Ambassador much same adding there were 300 Soviet submarines in Atlantic to back up convoy. Erofeev asked if we could keep in touch and I saw him again this morning.

2. This time he stressed Khrushchev's reply to U Thant,<sup>77</sup> reasonableness of Soviet readiness to call off shipments for two weeks, and unreasonableness of USA demand that bases be dismantled as prior condition for talks. He insisted this was impossibility and that he hoped other countries would recognize it.

3. I used usual arguments to justify USA action but he refused to agree that there was any degree of Soviet provocation or that indeed there were any real Soviet missile bases in Cuba. He kept stressing willingness of USSR to negotiate but only if USA showed equal desire for compromise. He said he was impressed by moderation of UAR statement in Security Council.<sup>78</sup>

CONDITIONS IN CUBA

There is little to report from Cuba. Country has been caught up in a situation beyond its control and realization of this is sinking in. Everyone is (elucidating?) on events: government supporters with grim determination and others with apprehension. An example is provided by exaggerated feeling of relief that spread through Foreign Ministry yesterday from Roa down when news that a Russian tanker had been allowed through quarantine was received. Not repeat not even opponents of régime have shown any noticeable signs of activity and government preventive arrests seemed relatively low.

2. News media stress that peoples of world are with Cuba including those of the West where there is opposition of government policy. Posters are appearing which promise the USSR will come through. Average Cuban is ignorant of outside world and in general draws a measure of satisfaction from government propaganda.

3. No repeat no attempt is being made to organize major public demonstrations with speeches by government leaders. There has been no repeat no official statement to people since Castro's belligerent Tuesday night address.<sup>79</sup>

4. A considerable movement of army trucks and guns is taking place in Havana area. British Embassy last night sighted a long trailer (80 to 100 feet) carrying what appeared to be large missiles followed by ancillary equipment being moved along a Havana avenue.

3. Civilian traffic is light and gas unavailable in some parts of interior. Efforts are being made to find substitute workers, including wives and mothers, for those mobilized. Most observers have doubts about how effective these hastily assembled improvised soldiers would be in combat conditions of a modern war. Professionally trained forces should stand up better.

CUBA – KHRUSHCHEV'S COMMUNICATIONS
REGARDING OFFENSIVE MISSILES

Two communications have been sent to the United States Government in the past 24 hours. The text of the first has not been made public.<sup>80</sup> The text of the second was released by Moscow before it was received in Washington (copy attached†).<sup>81</sup> It has already been stated in Washington that the two communications differ and that in particular there was in the first no reference to Turkey.

2. The communication which had been made public contains substantial proposals which undoubtedly will be regarded by many governments as warranting most serious consideration. There are objectionable passages but the tone on the whole is moderate.

3. The essence of Khrushchev's proposals is:

- (1) the Soviet Union will remove from Cuba those weapons which the United States regards as offensive provided that the United States removes similar weapons from Turkey;
- (2) both nations will pledge themselves to that effect in the United Nations;
- (3) the two parties will agree on the length of time required;
- (4) persons enjoying the confidence of the U.N. Security Council would make an on-the-spot check of the fulfilment of these pledges, subject to the authorization of the Governments of Cuba and Turkey;
- (5) the Soviet Government and United States Government will undertake, within the framework of the Security Council, to respect the inviolability of the frontiers of Turkey and Cuba respectively and to refrain from interference in their internal affairs; not to invade their territory and not to make their own territories available as a bridgehead for invasion and to restrain anyone contemplating such aggression from the territory of the Soviet Union or the United States.

4. The two references to time limits in the Khrushchev letter are somewhat unclear but he would appear to be contemplating a very short period to accomplish all these objectives – possibly two or three weeks and in any case not more than a month.

5. The fact that this is a serious proposal is evident from three features:

(a) the risk which Khrushchev is clearly running of undermining his position in Cuba by admitting that the weapons there are under Soviet control and that he is prepared to remove them as part of the deal;

(b) the choice of Turkey as the other side of the proposed deal rather than some other area which would have presented more difficulties for the United States (e.g., Berlin) would appear to reflect his special concern over areas on the periphery of the Soviet Union; and,

(c) Khrushchev's apparent willingness to entrust important functions to the person now occupying the position of Acting Secretary-General of the United Nations even though this is difficult to reconcile with the attitude the Soviet Union has taken in the past towards the role of the Secretary-General.

6. The United States, through the official State Department spokesman, has declined to comment on the first communication; and has reacted publicly in a responsible manner to the second (text attached†).<sup>82</sup> They state three conditions which would have to be met as an "urgent preliminary" to any proposals:

- (1) work on the Cuban bases must stop;
- (2) offensive weapons must be rendered inoperable;
- (3) further shipments of offensive weapons to Cuba must cease – all under effective international supervision.

7. We think the United States have not closed the door to the consideration of the substance of the Khrushchev proposal. In fact they have indicated, in respect of the call for the mutual removal of missiles, that the Western allies have long "taken the lead in seeking properly inspected arms limitation on both sides."

8. From a military point of view we understand it is the preliminary judgment of the Canadian Chiefs of Staff that the kind of exchange proposed by Khrushchev would be advantageous for the West. The loss for the West would be represented by a few sites for Jupiter missiles which are not operational and whose targets could be adequately covered by weapons located elsewhere. The removal of the considerably greater number of long-range offensive weapons now located in Cuba outside the North American warning system would thus result in a net gain for the military position of the Western powers.<sup>83</sup>

9. From an international political point of view the proposals would have to be carefully handled in order to avoid bad effects in Turkey and in Western Europe.

10. However, at least one report from our Embassy in Turkey suggests that the Turks are deeply concerned about the present situation and attach great importance to the achievement of some peaceful solution. (See attached tel. 139 of Oct. 25†). Moreover the Turks should not feel that their position is necessarily weakened since under Khrushchev's proposal they would receive an internationally sanctioned guarantee, they would continue to be allowed to maintain whatever defence forces were considered necessary and would be free to accept assistance in non-offensive forms from any source including the United States. In addition the Turks might be reconciled with this prospect if the Western countries were to increase the amount of economic aid (as the International Bank has recommended in any event).

11. The relations of Turkey with the Soviet Union have been based on suspicion and hostility which is fundamentally anti-Russian rather than anti-Communist in character. At the same time their satisfactory experience of the Montreux Convention might be regarded as preparing them for the sort of international arrangement contemplated in Khrushchev's proposals. The Montreux Convention set up an international régime for controlling access to the Black Sea, with special rights for Turkey and the Soviet Union, which has been internationally respected and scrupulously respected by both sides for the past 40 years. Even in the present situation the Turks have been unwilling to breach the Convention in order to prevent overflights of Soviet aircraft to Cuba. It therefore should not be considered that the possibility of Turkey accepting

Omit. [Le paragraphe 8 est biffé./Paragraph 8 is crossed out.] [O. W. Dier]

this sort of arrangement proposed by Khrushchev must be ruled out provided that other means can be found of buttressing their security and well-being.

12. This action could be interpreted in Western Europe as evidence that the United States is prepared to sacrifice the interests of others when its own safety is directly threatened. It would seem, however, that this risk could be reduced or eliminated if the Western European countries could be made to see that on balance no sacrifice of their interests or of Turkey's interests would be involved. It is clearly most desirable that the Western European countries should be consulted by the United States fully throughout in order to avoid any possible misunderstanding.

13. In relation to disarmament, the United States has already acknowledged that Khrushchev's proposals are not inconsistent with the approach which the United States has long been advocating with respect to arms limitation and international verification. As you pointed out in your statement in the House of Commons on October 25, the dismantling of armaments, combined with international inspection could represent "a first practical step on the road to disarmament." By confining his proposal to observation of dismantlement of the weapons the Soviet Premier's proposal leaves unresolved the question of continuing control measures to prevent clandestine reintroduction of similar weapons in the future, a problem which has already proved a serious obstacle in the Geneva discussions. These are, however, matters which could be the subject of negotiation if the main elements of the proposal are accepted as a basis.

14. So far as Canada is concerned, it would be in our interests to encourage the fullest exploration of this proposal because the alternative is probably further unilateral action by the United States which could have disastrous effects. We should, however, appreciate the problems which consideration of any moderate proposal presents for the United States (particularly before the November elections) in the face of an aroused public opinion apparently reconciled even to invasion as perhaps the only effective means of removing the missile bases. We would recommend that Canadian representatives in both London and Washington be authorized to discuss the situation confidentially with the British and United States Governments on the basis of the foregoing assessment.<sup>84</sup>

15. In addition, our Permanent Representative on the NATO Council might also be supplied with this assessment as background for any emergency meeting of the NATO Council which may be called. A copy of this memorandum might also be sent to New York for the information of our Permanent Representative to the United Nations.<sup>85</sup>

CUBA

I called on the Secretary of State on October 26 to discuss your reference telegram with him. He had with him Hurwitch, Special Assistant to the Assistant Secretary for Inter American Affairs, and Carlson of the Canadian Desk. Robinson accompanied me. The Secretary began the conversation by expressing his thanks for the Prime Minister's speech of October 25.<sup>86</sup> (Incidentally, Attorney General Robert Kennedy, whom I saw yesterday on another question, also expressed warm appreciation for the Prime Minister's speech.) I then drew to the Secretary's attention the Government's decision to search Soviet bloc and Cubana aircraft en route to Cuba and remarked that the American press had not repeat not appreciated the scope of Canada's effort. (Today's Washington Post contains a most appreciative leading article on the Prime Minister's speech, the text of which I am sending you separately.†)<sup>87</sup>

2. I then showed Mr. Rusk your reference telegram. His first reaction was to say that the State Department had been receiving similar indications from other capitals to the effect that the Cuban Government would be willing to discuss their differences with the USA through the UN. He thought that further light would be shed on this later in the afternoon when Mr. Stevenson would be seeing U Thant.

3. The Secretary drew attention to an earlier speech by President Kennedy in which the latter had marked out two points which were not repeat not negotiable: (a) the Cuban Government's military connection with Moscow and (b) Communist penetration from Cuba into the Western hemisphere.<sup>88</sup>

4. Mr. Rusk went on to say that the President had been urging calm until the discovery of the sudden missile build up in Cuba, which posed a grave strategic and international threat which would have been just as important no repeat no matter in what country it had arisen. He thought it was possible that the Cubans were now becoming more realistic about the situation in which they found themselves.

It is not clear which speech of Kennedy's Rusk was referring to. For two earlier documents that present one or both of these issues as non-negotiable, see Foreign Relations of the United States, 1961-1963, Vol. X (Washington: United States Government Printing Office, 1997), documents 212, 387.

5. The conversation then turned to paragraph 4 of your reference telegram in which there was discussion of possible terms on which the Cuban Government might be prepared to enter negotiations with the USA. The Secretary said that a similar combination of elements seemed to be appearing in U Thant's mind. Mr. Rusk said that no repeat no problem would arise if the Cubans could find a way to get rid of the missiles, and went on to say that "If the withholding of invasion becomes a requirement for getting the missiles out of Cuba, that is no repeat no problem." Before saying this he cautioned against our taking this as a precise formulation of the USA position but the sense of his statement appeared to be that if the Cubans would eliminate the nuclear missile bases, the USA would not repeat not be forced to think in terms of further unilateral action.

6. Returning to the discussion of your reference telegram, Mr. Rusk said that there might be some advantage in attempting to probe the actual Cuban position through the Canadian Ambassador in Havana. He wondered if any opportunity arose for Mr. Kidd to see Castro alone and suggested the possibility of some social occasion. He went on to say that one could not repeat not always be certain that Castro was a total instrument of Moscow (although he characterized this as a chance in a thousand). He said for example that on the issue of prisoners the USA had information that "the bearded one" had taken a different position from the "Communist apparatus." The former had been attracted by the possibility of securing drugs and other commodities in return for the prisoners whereas the Communist apparatus had opposed release of the prisoners. He said it would perhaps be unwise to assume categorically that Castro would always react in direct response to the Moscow line, but his tone implied scepticism as to the likelihood of the Cubans acting independently on major issues.

7. Hurwitch then intervened to say that it would be helpful if Mr. Kidd could do some probing in Havana. The Secretary reacted to this by saying that Castro might usefully be told that he was on a losing wicket and that the real question was the elimination of the missile bases.

8. I then asked Mr. Rusk how he thought matters would develop in the UN. He replied that he foresaw that all formal action would be in abeyance pending U Thant's discussions. He remarked in this connection that he hoped that U Thant would see the Cubans separately from the Russians. I then recalled my conversation with Harlan Cleveland (my telegram 3092 Oct 23) in which I had explained the purpose of the statement made earlier in the week by the Prime Minister regarding the possibility of a UN fact finding team proceeding to Cuba. I said that assuming that UN supervision of the dismantlement of the missile bases was an essential part of the USA approach, I thought it might be possible to foresee a stage in which the "fact finding" element might merge with the UN supervision of dismantlement. I pointed out that Zorin in his statement in the Security Council on October 25 had denied the authenticity of USA evidence regarding the existence of the missile bases.<sup>89</sup> I said that I thought a proposal which gave the UN some responsibility for establishing the facts for themselves, perhaps in conjunction with a supervisory role over the dismantlement of the bases, might have a greater appeal for many member countries in the UN. Mr. Rusk replied that the USA had not repeat not been attracted by a fact finding mission as a first and preliminary step. Two weeks of fact finding, Mr. Rusk said, could only result in what had already been made public in photographs. After re-emphasizing that the Canadian Government was not repeat not considering the introduction in present circumstances of a proposal for a fact finding mission, I remarked that much depended on the timing involved in UN processes. Mr. Rusk replied that from USA point of view the UN operation had to work very fast. It was essential to get UN representatives onto the sites and to keep the sites non operational, and this must be done in the next few days. It appeared to me that the Secretary was not repeat not much concerned with further steps in the Security Council or the UNGA but was concentrating his attention on the outcome of the negotiations with U Thant which should, in his view, result in the very earliest despatch of a UN team to supervise the actual dismantlement of the bases.

See United Nations, Security Council Official Records, Seventeenth Year, 1025th Meeting, 25 October 1962, UN Doc S/PV.1025(OR), pp. 15-16, <http://documents.un.org/>.

9. Reverting to the evidence of the existence of offensive weapons in Cuba, Mr. Rusk said that while the USSR was now denying their existence in the Security Council "We were told by the Russians that there are not repeat not now in Cuba and will not repeat not be missiles that can reach USA." He asked me specifically to pass on to you this Soviet statement. He did not repeat not specify whether it had been made by Foreign Minister Gromyko to the President or by the Soviet Ambassador here.

10. I did not repeat not get the impression that the Secretary of State was much interested in the possibility of exchanges with the Cubans proving fruitful in the present situation. His references to the possibility of our Ambassador in Havana probing Cuban views were not repeat not at all emphatic or precise. He kept reverting to the absolute necessity for the earliest destruction of the missile bases and seemed to place all his emphasis on the U Thant negotiations in New York. Failing a successful outcome of these negotiations, I was left with the strong impression that the USA would be faced with the early alternative of taking action on their own.

11. Prior to our conversation with Mr. Rusk, Hurwitch spoke to me with some interest of the possibility of creating a "nuclear free zone" in Latin America.

CUBA – SOVIET MOTIVES

We spoke October 26 with Lewis Bowden of State Department Office of Soviet Affairs to obtain an assessment of motivation behind Soviet offensive buildup in Cuba and subsequent Soviet moves. Bowden gave us a frank appraisal but cautioned that these were working level assessments and that the final assessments on which USA action will be based are being made at the highest level: the White House exercises direct and complete control. Since Bowden is his office's representative on Departmental "War Games" Study Group, which has lengthy daily sessions and which thoroughly canvass all alternatives, we assume views he gave us reflected a general appreciation within Department of State.

2. After preliminary warm remarks about Prime Minister's statement October 25, Bowden first told us of background briefing Secretary Rusk had given October 25 to journalists. Rusk had sought their cooperation in dispelling the euphoria which appeared to be coming over USA public opinion on crisis consequent on moderate Soviet initial response. He had pointed out that apparent Soviet moderation did not repeat not mean that a substantially different response could not repeat not come later and went on to describe grave threat to USA that would result on completion of Soviet missile installations in Cuba. Rusk also pointed to dangers that would ensue if USA public concern were to abate further, much time were lost through fruitless negotiations and drastic action then became essential. Bowden said that Secretary, by reviewing possibilities for settlement through negotiation or through a general disarmament scheme, both of which were unacceptable unless missile installations were removed, had said nothing which would dissuade his audience from drawing a conclusion that an invasion might become necessary. In reference to our passing remark about Joseph Alsop's column October 26,<sup>90</sup> Bowden said that Alsop had obviously been "very well briefed," implying something beyond briefing referred to above.

3. On Soviet motives, Bowden said accepted conclusion was that USSR's primary intention was none other than to establish in Cuba a means by which they could so impair USA nuclear retaliatory capability that they could demand every concession. Officials were no repeat no longer thinking of such motives as have been mooted, i.e. that Russians wished to have a counter to use during further negotiations on Berlin (our reference telegram) or as a pawn in a general negotiation on dismantling of foreign bases. Bowden rapidly dismissed remarks we made along these lines, suggesting that all but the maximum Soviet motive have been discarded by USA officials. Bowden's view was that although the operation entailed enormous risks for USSR, prize they sought was so great that risks were justified.

4. Bowden said officials had in their studies speculated on Soviet planners' assessment of possible USA reaction to their offensive buildup in Cuba. In their view, Russians must have concluded first that USA would not repeat not immediately launch a nuclear war on USSR. The next lower reaction on the scale, i.e. an attack on or invasion of Cuba was probably open to some question in Soviet analysts' minds. Here Bowden thought Russians might have been motivated by their general contempt for weakness of USA bourgeois leadership, which had been reflected in certain of Khrushchev's recent private utterances, but that even if they concluded that this kind of response was possible they were willing to accept risks, since USA could be portrayed as aggressor, and likelihood of escalation was not repeat not great. Bowden thought most likely USSR conclusion had been that USA reaction would be at about level it has thus far held. This would, if the operation were carried out swiftly, allow them to spin out international discussion of issue and to mobilize world opinion against USA while essential operation was completed.

5. Bowden expressed view that first USSR response (which he thought was too quick and too pat not repeat not to have been prepared or at least thought through in advance) and their tactics thus far at UN and at quarantine fitted this assessment. Way USSR had played crisis publicly suggested they wished to adopt an outwardly reasonable approach and help portray USA as aggressor. He noted USSR had not repeat not been very successful so far in persuading neutral opinion of this thesis, and that Soviet press reports of "wave of world wide indignation against USA policy" had become less confident as days passed. (He remarked that absence of Krishna Menon "on other business" had deprived USSR of advocate among uncommitted group in New York.) In contrast USA reports suggested that allied opinion was firmly supporting USA stand and neutral opinion was neutral but understanding of USA position. Evidently this was about best USA officials had hoped for, and Bowden remarked that this might possibly sustain through such further USA unilateral action as became necessary.

6. In rehearsing background of Soviet motivation he described, Bowden recalled that such nuclear equilibrium as had existed until this week had favoured USA. It had been more closely equal earlier before USA had introduced Polaris and before Soviet production of missiles had entered its gap period, i.e. the period before their new more accurate long range missiles were in full production. It had appeared to USA officials that Khrushchev realized significance of this sort of equilibrium which was tipped against him, and that this had been fundamental reason why there had been very little forward movement by USSR in past year on any of many fronts (he pointed to internal pressures in investment and other fields, continued difficulties within Bloc and especially with China, their acceptance of a negotiated settlement in Laos, their reverses in some parts of Africa and inactivity in others, and their utter failure to make headway over Berlin). Khrushchev had not repeat not been able to overcome the restrictions imposed on his policy in all fields by his lack of decisive power, and saw in the establishment in Cuba of decisive offensive bases the means of extricating himself from these circumscriptions. Bowden agreed it was uncharacteristic of Khrushchev to act incautiously, but again referred to great prize Cuban operation could bring, and to Khrushchev's desire to advance Communist objectives during his lifetime. Recalling that lull in Soviet domestic and foreign affairs had been noted widely over past year, Bowden said they now thought it significant that about six weeks ago Khrushchev had begun to make challenging statements; this would have occurred well after decision had been taken on Cuban operation and when it was on way to fulfilment.

7. We broached with Bowden question posed by Lippmann in his column October 25<sup>91</sup> about failure of Administration to raise this matter in private with Gromyko during conversations October 18 with President and Secretary.<sup>92</sup> It was his firm opinion that there had been "communication" during Kennedy's talk with Gromyko. According to his information, President had very deliberately asked Gromyko for confirmation that Soviet military buildup in Cuba was defensive and had received reply to which Kennedy referred in his address October 22. Nonetheless it was clear that Gromyko knew what President was getting at.

CUBA: NAC CONSULTATION

In accordance with the procedures agreed in the Council that on Cuban crisis Permanent Representatives would meet at any time at the request of any delegation, the Council met this morning at the request of USA Representative to receive briefing on USA Government's latest appraisal of Soviet policy in Cuban crisis and to hold an exchange of views which it was recognized could not repeat not be fully governmental at this short notice. In mid-September USA received indications that Khrushchev was too much committed politically to retreat and that there were factors within Soviet bloc which increased his need to find a solution such as the situation in East Germany and pressure from Communist China. USA believed that Khrushchev had come to the conclusion that a showdown was inevitable within a few months and that he feared being placed in a situation where the only alternatives were retreat or thermonuclear war. USA had become suspicious at the point where USSR insisted on postponing further negotiations over Berlin until after the Congressional elections. There was then a description of recent assurances from USSR that there were no repeat no offensive weapons being installed in Cuba and a notation that the TASS report of the delay in further pressure over Berlin was linked with Cuba.<sup>93</sup> It was the series of assurances together with the intended delay which made USA think that Cuban installations when they were detected were related to Berlin crisis and Khrushchev's projected visit to New York. Finletter then referred the Council to a number of basic documents: (a) a White House statement issued at noon October 27 about the continuation of the build up in Cuba;<sup>94</sup> (b) Kennedy's message to Khrushchev released last night;<sup>95</sup> (c) the statements of USA Secretary of Defence on continued surveillance of Cuba and the call-up of reserves<sup>96</sup> and (d) Khrushchev's letter to Kennedy received on the night of October 26 which was full of polemics but seemed to offer the withdrawal of offensive weapons in exchange for an assurance that Cuba would not repeat not be invaded.<sup>97</sup> We assume that the texts of all these items will be available to you from public sources. Continuing his account of USA Government's assessment Finletter noted that Khrushchev's public offer to U Thant to keep ships out of the quarantine area seemed at first to be hopeful but the new condition about the withdrawal of US missiles from Turkey destroyed this appearance. Finletter said USA wanted a solution within the framework of Cuba alone. Khrushchev appeared to have rejected this framework but it was a firm USA position. In USA view time was growing shorter. USA was combining diplomatic offers with military pressure but the construction of missile sites was continuing and more missiles were now believed to be ready.

2. Finletter went into further detail about the construction of missile sites to indicate the speed with which they were going up and the fact that speed has evidently been considered more important than concealment. Until the shooting down of USA plane announced today Cuban policy had not repeat not been to fire on USA reconnaissance planes even at low attitudes. One item which was noticeably missing was the fourth IRBM site and USA was inclined to believe that the equipment for it may have been en route when the quarantine was instituted. USA believed that all ships with contraband had probably been turned back by USSR including those which were in the Black Sea. Tankers were however proceeding normally. USA was not repeat not willing at the moment to risk an incident in the air by forcibly interfering with Soviet flights to Cuba. It was considered however that the major purpose of the quarantine had been achieved in that ships had turned back and that the world was alerted to Soviet duplicity and the danger of the situation. In USA view it was essential to maintain the momentum of negotiations to secure the removal of existing missiles. USSR's aim however is evidently to stabilize the situation and try to equate USSR missiles in Cuba with USA missiles in other places. It is USA assumption that the successful completion of missile sites in Cuba would appreciably interfere with SAC capabilities and must have been undertaken because USSR considered its own ICMB capabilities would not repeat not be adequate by the end of 1962. The missile sites in Cuba constituted a threat to the free world deterrent and the question arose what to do if Cubans flatly refused to remove the missiles together with suitable inspection arrangements. USA answer would be to remove them by "other means." For the moment USA noted no repeat no significant troop movements within the USSR nor any reduction in general Soviet shipping activities abroad. USA sought the support and solidarity of its allies.

3. In response to questioning Finletter said that in spite of the promises to U Thant Soviet vessels are continuing towards the quarantine area and the first of them will probably arrive in contact today, Sunday. An incident might occur. USA might find it necessary to take measures to remove the threat to the Western hemisphere. While USA wanted the matter settled within the framework of Western hemisphere USSR had tried to link it with NATO defences and this Soviet position increased the possibility of some Soviet move against NATO.

4. In the discussion which followed I made use of the Prime Minister's statement (your telegram PG-204 October 25+) indicating our general solidarity with USA and Canadian measures of preparedness but making it clear that I would seek instructions on developments since October 25.

5. UK Permanent Representative read British Government's assessment of the situation in the following terms. In UK view USSR linked Cuba and Berlin but were probably not repeat not sure how to use this linkage. UK thought there were four main possibilities:

(a) A Lull Over Berlin. Cuban situation might keep Khrushchev too busy to permit him to plan forays in Berlin and he might therefore leave the city alone for the time being.

(b) Measured Retaliation. USSR might react to USA interference with shipping on a tit-for-tat basis by interfering with military traffic to West Berlin. USSR could cause a good deal of delay and damage without actually stopping Western access to the city. Less probable than interference with military traffic was interference with civilian traffic. Such action would be likely to detract from plans of USSR calling for a free city of West Berlin. Also considered improbable was barring Western access to East Berlin because retaliation against Soviet access to West Berlin would be too easy.

(c) A Major Berlin Crisis. Khrushchev could announce the imminent intention to sign a separate peace treaty and might launch a campaign to get those non-committed countries which were critical of USA action over Cuba to sign it. Another form the major crisis could take would be a total blockade of Berlin. A major Berlin crisis was considered improbable because of the risks involved.

(d) A General Occupation of West Berlin. This was also considered unlikely because it would lead to war. On the whole the Foreign Office was inclined to believe that course (b) was the most probable especially as Khrushchev had already distinguished between non-nuclear clashes at sea and the possibility of general war. UK Ambassador in Moscow when invited to comment on this assessment questioned the immediacy of the link between Cuba and Berlin suggesting that there was a more indirect one. Roberts also estimated that Khrushchev did not repeat not always foresee the outcome of crises which he precipitated, relying on his general ability to make the most out of any confused situation. Roberts therefore thought that Soviet aims in precipitating the crisis over Cuba had been more general, not repeat not specific and included advantages in the field of disarmament as well as Berlin. USSR had not repeat not been prepared for the severity of USA reaction over Cuba or for the support USA had received in Latin America and Europe. Khrushchev had been improvising ever since with the main aim of avoiding a head-on collision while extracting the utmost propaganda advantages. Roberts thought that the four possibilities mentioned above had already been overtaken by the offer of a deal in the disarmament field over Cuban and Turkish bases. Roberts doubted that this deal had been thought out or was seriously intended. What Khrushchev wanted from the crisis was not repeat not only a good propaganda position but the possibility of personal negotiations. Roberts therefore doubted that there would be more than pin pricks in Berlin especially as he regards USA as "trigger happy" at this point. Roberts therefore viewed the lull as the most probable outcome in Berlin not repeat not because of lack of energy on Khrushchev's part but because Khrushchev wants a deal, and also wants USA to alienate its position in the uncommitted world if it shows itself to be rigid.

6. The other principal item which came out in the discussion was one launched by Belgian Permanent Representative and carried on particularly by Norwegian, Danish and Netherlands Permanent Representatives. Belgian Permanent Representative insisted on links between the removal of the Soviet bases in Cuba and further negotiations particularly in the disarmament field. He several times mentioned that the removal of the offensive weapons in Cuba was a necessary first stage. Speaking with the authority of Mr. Spaak he could not repeat not agree that the outcome should be a policy of stagnation as suggested by the French. It must be one of negotiation on the basis of a general confrontation on East-West issues. Norwegian Permanent Representative carried this a step further speaking with the authority of his Foreign Minister saying that he recognized that it was impossible to negotiate under blackmail but that on the other hand his government expected that direct physical action would be avoided in favour of negotiation. Physical action might be successful in the short term but it was impossible to foresee the outcome. Danish Permanent Representative thought that it was important to recognize that a deterrent was designed to avoid war not repeat not to start one. He wondered whether there would be a difference in the degree of risk of world war between pin point bombing and general invasion. Netherlands Representative thought there was general agreement with Norwegian position of desiring to avoid violence. He pointed once more to the direct involvement of NATO and emphasized that he thought the position was that we were all ready to continue discussions with Russians after the threat which the bases constitute had been removed. He hoped we would all be as anxious to negotiate as before Cuban crisis but not repeat not more anxious because if the latter were true USSR could continually gain points of advantage by stimulating crises. At the end of meeting Belgian Permanent Representative returned to the points he and others had raised by asking if a decision were reached in Washington either to invade Cuba or bombard missile sites whether the USA would act without NATO consultation or without informing UN. Finletter said that he could not repeat not be categorical because he could foresee situation in which USA might be compelled to act alone as at Pearl Harbour.<sup>98</sup> He thought that the present consultation showed the desire of USA to consult its allies but he could not repeat not promise them more.

7. In the discussion all delegates spoke including the Icelandic in statements of more or less solidarity with USA.

8. Prime Minister's statement of October 25 enabled me to improvise remarks in support of USA actions up to October 25. I am in the position now of participating in Council consultations on Cuba without the guidance requested in my telegram 2454 October 22. The Council has been informed by Turkish representative that he may be asking for a meeting as soon as he receives a further message from Ankara and the Council is in any case on notice to meet at the request of any delegation. Any comments on the appreciation of possible developments in Cuban crisis given above would be helpful in the present circumstances especially on the basis of the useful analysis provided by UK authorities and British Ambassador in Moscow.

CUBA CRISIS

You will have seen Khrushchev's telegram of yesterday afternoon (Moscow time) to Kennedy offering to trade withdrawal of Soviet rockets in Cuba against withdrawal of American rockets in Turkey; President Kennedy's reply; and Khrushchev's subsequent message to Kennedy broadcast an hour ago stating, without apparent conditions, that he has ordered dismantling of Soviet rockets in Cuba under UN supervision and their return to USSR. This message was delivered about 5:00 p.m. this afternoon to USA Embassy here.<sup>99</sup>

2. We must still keep fingers crossed and eyes wide open for tricks, or perhaps for early Soviet action elsewhere to re-establish face and save something from what appears to be wreckage of calculated and dangerous Khrushchev gambit. Nevertheless this looks to me here at the moment like a complete Soviet climb-down. This is also impression of American Embassy this evening. It remains to be seen how this will in fact be implemented, but at moment it looks like major American victory, and genuine Soviet retreat. We appear to have won not repeat not mere innings, but ball-game, though not repeat not yet World Series.

3. My tentative and preliminary assessment, subject however to cautionary provision that it looks too good to be taken yet as certainty, is that Khrushchev has felt it necessary to beat hasty retreat when faced with unexpected suddenness and firmness of American unilateral action, unexpected solidarity of support for American action by Canada, Latin American governments, European NATO governments, and Japan, and perhaps also by apparent gravity of Chinese/Indian crisis. Apprehended imminence of American military action against Cuba lent urgency to Soviet dilemma.

4. My guess is that Khrushchev has intended, by sudden strategic nuclear rocket breakthrough in Caribbean made under cover of bland and misleading assurances, to achieve one or more of following three objectives:

(a) enhanced threat and hence greater Soviet bargaining power for possible show-down later this autumn on Berlin;

(b) alternatively, if this failed through premature disclosure and strong American reaction, to probe American nerves and firmness;

(c) additionally, or alternatively if disappointed in both above objectives, there may have been original hope of bargaining withdrawal of Soviet rockets in Cuba against NATO rockets in Turkey or elsewhere.

In any case, this gambit was tried yesterday. An additional Soviet objective, and possible alternative fallback position, may originally have been attempt to force formal Western recognition of geographic status quo where Communist regimes now exist.

5. However this may be, it appears as of this evening that when ante has been raised high by Kennedy, Khrushchev has folded, and has abandoned ploy of Soviet nuclear potential in Cuba.

6. If this retreat turns out to be genuine Khrushchev will have problem of saving face in view of potentially far reaching Cold War defeat. I do not repeat not anticipate that Khrushchev will have serious difficulty in this regard from Soviet public itself. On contrary Khrushchev's popularity may be enhanced at home with public by their undoubted relief, and by using domestic propaganda media to play up Khrushchev's image, carefully fostered during past few days, of statesmanlike willingness to make all possible efforts to save peace despite outrageous American provocation. Khrushchev will also be able to claim that by his Cuban gambit he has for first time succeeded in extracting promise from Kennedy not repeat not to invade Cuba and not repeat not to allow invasion of Cuba from any other quarter.

7. But by tonight's message to Kennedy it seems inevitable that Soviet prestige will be seriously lowered in Cuba and among other Latin American left wing circles, within important elements in Communist bloc, and in other Communist parties abroad. It will probably be damaged also among some important elements within CPSU itself. He will of course have laid himself open to renewed charges of cowardice and incompetence from Chinese Communist leaders. After first wave of domestic relief this may strike some chord also at home.

8. Presumably some elements in Soviet defence forces in particular will be disillusioned and unhappy at results of Cuban affair.

9. I think it important that West should avoid becoming dizzy with success, even if (as from here at present appears probable) present Soviet backdown proves quite genuine. It is also desirable to avoid excessive gloating. Too sudden and too excessive loss of face by Khrushchev could prove dangerous. We may have to expect in due course, and perhaps soon, some Soviet efforts to re-establish their gravely damaged prestige. Khrushchev has so acted, apparently, as to earn at home some of first flush popularity Chamberlain earned immediately after Munich. If Soviet leaders feel too humiliated there could be a second stage psychological reaction, e.g. in some future crisis, whether by Khrushchev or by other elements in Soviet ruling circles, which could be dangerous.

CUBA

I called on Tyler, Assistant Secretary for European Affairs, today to get first State Department reactions to the Khrushchev message of this morning offering to dismantle the bases under UN supervision in return for a guarantee that there would be no repeat no USA attack on Cuba.<sup>100</sup>

2. Tyler said that Secretary of State was at that moment at the White House discussing developments with the President and that therefore any views that he (Tyler) expressed must be regarded as tentative first impressions. He began by referring to the fact that the private message from Khrushchev to the President of October 26<sup>101</sup> had been succeeded by yesterday's public message including the reference to Turkish bases<sup>102</sup> and that this had now been succeeded by Khrushchev's last message. He said that, as a matter of speculation, it might be thought that Khrushchev had drafted the original private message to the President personally and that thereafter some other influences in the Kremlin, perhaps military, had induced him to put out the tougher message seeking the inclusion of the elimination of the Turkish bases and that finally, seeing how near he was coming to the brink of catastrophe, Khrushchev had reverted to his original offer. Tyler said that it was possible that USA reaction and their firm defensive posture and refusal to accept compromise over the Cuban missile bases had helped Khrushchev to stand up to pressures in Moscow.

3. Tyler said that as late as 12:30 am last night USA authorities had felt that the situation was very dark and critical and the shooting down of what he described as an "American U-2" over Cuba had accentuated this feeling. (Had it not repeat not been for the most recent Khrushchev message received today, what he described as grave decisions were to have been taken at 10:00am this morning including armed aerial surveillance of Cuba.) The President's reply of October 27 to Khrushchev<sup>103</sup> (which I have telegraphed to you separately †) had been drafted in a carefully matter of fact tone which was designed to lower tension. As a matter of tactics, the President had linked his reply to the private communication he had received from Khrushchev and not repeat not to his public message of October 27.

4. Meanwhile negotiations with U Thant had been proceeding but Tyler said that speaking confidentially, he could tell me that State Department had been quite disturbed by the non comprehension on the part of U Thant and his assistants, and particularly General Rikhye, his military adviser, of the elements of USA position and particularly of their insistence on the elimination of missile bases.

5. In the changed situation created by the receipt of Khrushchev's message, Tyler said that he hoped that there would not repeat not be a mood of euphoria in which public opinion expected the easy solution of problems all around the world as this would be self-deluding. I agreed but said that the impetus given by the crisis might well be utilized to open up wider negotiations, perhaps covering some of the questions which he had mentioned to me yesterday (my reference telegram) such as nuclear free zones, arms limitations, etc. and I referred to the passage in Khrushchev's latest message in which he speaks of the [regularization?] of "relations between NATO and the states of the Warsaw Treaty." I assumed that the Russians would be interested in an early summit meeting.

6. Tyler was guarded in his reply. He said that certainly there was the possibility of such wider negotiations to which the President had referred in his letter but that one would have to proceed very carefully, stage by stage. He took this opportunity to add that the swap deal over Turkish bases was in itself totally unacceptable to USA and would be "lethal" to the North Atlantic Alliance.

7. Tyler then turned to public reactions in this country and in the West generally. He said that he personally hoped that it would be possible for the President to go on the air very shortly in order to establish the sober and responsible American reaction to the present crisis. He was worried lest the press should greet this as humiliation for Khrushchev and should crow over his setback. He was also worried lest certain extremist elements in this country might react in a somewhat belligerent way to the present situation.

8. Turning to the text of Khrushchev's latest communication, Tyler indicated that the effectiveness of the supervision over the dismantlement of the bases was of cardinal importance and would have to be very carefully scrutinized. He added that the offensive weapons in Cuba, in the American interpretation were not repeat not limited to missiles but included the IL-28 bomber planes and probably MiG fighters.

9. He said that the reference in the second paragraph of Khrushchev's message to "previously issued instructions" appeared to be an attempt on Khrushchev's part to save his own face as USA authorities were not repeat not aware of any previous Soviet instructions regarding the cessation of the build up of weapons in Cuba.

10. Tyler also drew attention [to] Khrushchev's reference to the need to "liquidate the breeding grounds where a dangerous situation has been created." He took this to be an indication that USSR could be counted on to attach importance to Berlin in any wider negotiation.

11. As a general indication of probable USA reaction to Khrushchev's latest message, Tyler said that USA Government intended to take it seriously and to welcome its positive features.

We now have additional information on the preliminary discussions which have taken place in New York and Washington between ourselves and the United States concerning the possibility of the latter making available F-101 reconnaissance aircraft to the United Nations for the verification of dismantling, with Canadian pilots doing the flying. The Minister has instructed the Embassy in Washington to make a firm offer to the United States of Canadian pilots provided that the arrangement would be acceptable to the United Nations.

2. The United States has apparently been conducting most of its surveillance of Cuba by means of camera-equipped F-101s based in the United States. The aircraft they are using are specially outfitted for the task, and the United States wishes to continue to have the dismantling operation supervised by the same effective means. I have just been informed in confidence by New York that the United States Mission has confirmed that for the time being reconnaissance operations have been suspended.

3. The United States have sent to New York a team of very senior people, including Ball, McCloy, Kilpatrick<sup>104</sup> and the Under-Secretary of the Air Force, Joseph Charyk, to work out the air surveillance arrangements in cooperation with U Thant and ourselves. Kuznetsov is seeing U Thant at this moment. Stevenson is to see him immediately thereafter and then to see the Minister. As yet there is no confirmation that U Thant would be interested in this combined United States/Canadian offer and, of course, no assurance that it would be acceptable to Castro or the Soviet Union. We may have to await U Thant's visit to Havana for further word.

4. If acceptable, the United States have in mind four aircraft which would be painted white and bear the United Nations insignia.

5. Our Mission is to meet with Charyk to obtain more precise details. I have spoken to Miller and, at his request, have asked the Mission in New York to obtain clarification of the following points:

- (1) where would the aircraft be based? There is some suggestion that to avoid the complications of a base in either the United States or Cuba, Jamaica might be used.
- (2) how many pilots and navigators would be required? As Miller sees it, the number and composition of air crew would be affected by the following factors:
  - (a) how many sorties are to be flown per day;
  - (b) are the aircraft to be ground-controlled throughout? United States surveillance flights have been ground-controlled from Florida, thus enabling them to dispense with navigators. One pilot has operated both aircraft and the cameras. In the absence of ground-control, navigators would probably be required. The RCAF normally fly such aircraft with pilot and navigator. We have 60 or 70 such trained crews available but all are engaged on other duties from which they would have to be released.

(3) where would the maintenance be done and by whom? Would Canada provide maintenance personnel?

For the Minister:

Following is text of self-explanatory letter we have just received from USA Chargé d'Affaires concerning proposed institution of worldwide clearance system for ships proceeding to Cuban ports or transitting quarantine area. We are examining legal and other implications of USA proposals on an urgent basis and hope to let you have our recommendations later today.

Ottawa, October 29, 1962

Dear Mr. Under-Secretary:

With reference to the transmittal to the Department of External Affairs of the text of the President's Proclamation of October 23, I have been instructed to notify your Department of a world-wide clearance system that has been instituted in order to avoid unnecessary delays and other difficulties arising out of the stoppage, inspection or possible diversion of ships in the quarantine area. In the absence of objection by your Government, the system will be applied to Canada.

Under the procedures established in this system the ship's agent or other officer may obtain a clearance at the last port of call before entering the quarantine area from an American Consular officer or his authorized representative. This system may be applied to any foreign vessels that transit the quarantine area destined for a non-Cuban port and to those vessels destined for a Cuban port with cargo which contains no offensive weapons or associated materiel. It is available to vessels of any flag including those of the Sino-Soviet Bloc. In unusual circumstances it may be necessary to stop, inspect or divert a ship despite the fact that it has clearance.

Copies of the clearance forms that would be made available at the United States Embassy and Consulates in Canada are attached. A clearance certificate (Clearcert) will be issued after inspection of the ship by an individual authorized by a U.S. Military Attaché and a determination by him that no offensive weapons or associated materiel, as defined in the Proclamation or designated by the Secretary of Defense pursuant thereto, are on board. The application for the clearance certificate may be approved by a Consular officer, or if no such officer is available at the port, the designee of the Service Attaché on behalf of the Consular officer.

In the absence of objection by your Department, the Embassy may issue the following statement:

“In connection with the quarantine of shipments of offensive weapons and associated materiel to Cuba proclaimed by the President of the United States on October 23, 1962, a clearance system has been instituted to avoid unnecessary delays and other difficulties arising out of the stoppage, inspection or possible diversion of ships. This system applies to foreign vessels that transit the quarantine area destined for a non-Cuban port and those destined for a Cuban port with cargo which contains no offensive weapons or associated materiel. It is available to vessels of any flag including those of the Sino-Soviet Bloc. A clearance may be obtained at the last port of call before entering the quarantine area from an American Consular officer or his authorized representative for the purpose of facilitating the movement of vessels. In unusual circumstances it may be necessary to stop, inspect or divert a ship despite the fact that it has clearance. Clearance forms are available at American Embassies and Consulates.”

Minister saw Stevenson this afternoon and in accordance with understanding reached with him we have informed UN Secretariat that Canada would be prepared to provide aircrew for photo reconnaissance operations over Cuba utilizing F-101 aircraft with UN markings but made available by USAF. Secretariat said that they would consider this offer in context of forthcoming discussions with Castro.

2. We have also had discussions with military representatives of USA Mission and of Secretary of Defence. They envisage requirement for two sorties per day and estimated that this would require four aircraft. They considered three possibilities regarding basing of aircraft (a) Jamaica (b) Cuba (c) USA. They took it for granted that aircrew required would be pilots and radar operators. They were uncertain as to possible duration of operation but thought that 30 days sounded like a reasonable estimate. Servicing of aircraft camera equipment and processing of film could be handled by UN contract with appropriate civil agencies.

3. What happens next will hinge on success of Secretary-General's discussions with Castro. We will keep you informed of developments.

REPLY FROM PRIME MINISTER TO PRIME MINISTER OF UNITED KINGDOM

I fully endorse your action in suggesting to Chairman Khrushchev that a satisfactory resolution of the immediate situation in Cuba will open up broad possibilities for the solution of outstanding East-West differences. The world has been brought close to disaster in the past week but out of the recognition of that fact has come an opportunity for a major advance towards lasting peace. Your message to Khrushchev is therefore most timely.

I am convinced – as I have already warned the Canadian people – that we cannot allow a sense of complacency to develop in the wake of any final solution to the immediate problem of Cuba which may be worked out over the next few days.

Clearly the reason that international tension mounted to such a danger point in the Cuban situation was that the Soviet move to introduce offensive missiles into the Western hemisphere threatened to upset the precarious military balance in the world. It is, however, not enough simply to restore that balance and have the world return to a condition of chronic instability. This fact has been recognized in the correspondence between President Kennedy and Chairman Khrushchev. The most immediate consideration is to ensure that the impetus to broaden the area in which settlement can be sought will not be lost. Nuclear testing and disarmament are two such areas, but I would not exclude others. With respect to those issues which might properly fall in the field of disarmament, I believe that the Eighteen Nation Disarmament Committee should resume its work at the earliest opportunity so that the uneasy and dangerous balance of armed force might be replaced by stable international agreements.

I can assure you that the Canadian Government share your view that we should try to build better world relations upon a settlement of the present crisis.

CUBA AND THE UNITED NATIONS

You will already be aware of most of the developments yesterday in relation to Cuba. However, you may wish to have this report from me on activity by the Canadian Delegation during the Minister's visit to New York. In any event, this memorandum will serve as a record for file.

2. Shortly after his arrival in New York on October 28, the Minister met with most members of the Delegation to discuss various subjects. Principal among these was the Cuban situation. The announcement about U Thant's visit to Havana had been made during our flight to New York and, in view of the early departure of the Acting Secretary-General's party, the Minister wished to assure U Thant that Canada was ready to render assistance in providing some form of United Nations inspection for the dismantling of the missile bases in Cuba. The Minister ascertained from Colonel Moore (attached to the Permanent Mission) that qualified personnel were available in Canada.

3. During our evening meeting, the Minister had telephone conversations as follows:

(a) Mr. Charles Ritchie reported from Washington on latest developments in the Cuban situation on the basis of information he had obtained from the State Department. The Minister asked Mr. Ritchie to inform the State Department that Canada was ready to assist in providing personnel for the United Nations team. Mr. Ritchie later reported that State Department officials had warmly received this information.

(b) The Minister spoke with the Prime Minister about offering assistance to the United Nations.

(c) The Minister informed U Thant that Canada was ready to give whatever assistance the Acting Secretary-General might consider appropriate. U Thant expressed gratitude for this offer.

4. It had been arranged that the Minister would see Mr. Adlai Stevenson on October 29. This meeting took place about 2:45 p.m. Although I was not present, I understood that Mr. Stevenson explained to the Minister the United States scheme for conducting an aerial surveillance of Cuba under United Nations auspices. The four aircraft to be provided by the United States were to be flown by Canadians, who were the only others considered qualified to do so. It was expected that the aircraft might operate from Jamaica. There was some question whether navigators and flight control officers would be required as well.

5. As I understand it, at the time of Mr. Stevenson's conversation with the Minister, the United States had not raised this possibility with the United Nations. As one United States official put it to me, "We'll sell it to U Thant after Canada has bought it." It is my impression that Mr. Stevenson hoped that the Minister would have some success in persuading the Acting Secretary-General to accept this scheme. In the event, however, the Minister was unable to see the Acting Secretary-General or Brigadier Rikhye on October 29. Mr. Tremblay and Mr. Barton met with Flight Lieutenant (?) Harrison, an R.C.A.F. officer currently serving on Brigadier Rikhye's staff, to discuss the plan. He undertook to inform Brigadier Rikhye.

6. Because I was anxious to know something about the Secretary-General's attitude toward offers of assistance, I visited Mr. Omar Loutfi early in the afternoon of October 29. I explained to him Canada's willingness to help if its help seemed appropriate. Before seeing Mr. Loutfi, I had heard the press story to the effect that Sweden had been approached by the Secretary-General and that the Swedish Government had responded favourably.<sup>108</sup> I had also heard that the Secretary-General's thinking was that the Swedes might do the job alone, with the assistance of a few Secretariat personnel.

7. Mr. Loutfi informed me that U Thant was considerably embarrassed by the press report about his approach to Sweden. While it was true that the Secretary-General had been making some informal soundings, U Thant did not wish this to become known in Havana. He assumed that Premier Castro was in a highly emotional state and that he would be very sensitive about any suggestions concerning outside intervention. The Secretary-General had made no firm plans about observers or inspectors of any nationality. This was a question which must be fully explored in Havana to see what the traffic would bear. Mr. Loutfi recalled to me the difficult negotiation in 1956 between Dag Hammarskjöld and President Nasser, whose frame of mind then was probably much like that of Castro today.

8. Mr. Loutfi said that the Secretary-General was travelling to Havana on October 30 and would return to New York on October 31. He intended to leave some of his party in Havana. I confirmed later that Brigadier Rikhye and some technical personnel were to be left in Havana, presumably to keep contact with the Cuban government and to set up the administrative side of the proposed United Nations presence. In addition to Brigadier Rikhye and Mr. Loutfi, U Thant has taken with him Mr. Tavares de Sa, a Brazilian Under-Secretary in charge of the Office of Public Information. About 30 people are included in the Secretary-General's party.

9. If the Secretary-General is expecting to complete his business in Havana in one day, there is some suggestion that he already has an indication that Castro's reaction will be favourable to a United Nations presence. This conclusion is sustained by the fact that U Thant is planning to leave some of his party in Havana. Perhaps he is planning only to make initial contact in this first visit, leaving Brigadier Rikhye to work out the details. We are well aware that U Thant prefers to delegate authority. Besides, he is needed in New York to deal with pressing Congo affairs. The meeting of the Advisory Committee on the Congo, scheduled for October 30, had to be cancelled, partly because of the Secretary-General's absence but also Dr. Bunche had not returned from the Congo.

<sup>108</sup> Voir Thomas J. Hamilton, "U.N. Chief Confers," et "Sweden Offers Observers," New York Times, October 30, 1962, pp. 1, 14; "U Thant Asks for Observers for the U.N. Peace Mission to Cuba," Times (London), October 30, 1962, p. 11. Il n'a pas été déterminé de quelle source de nouvelles Murray aurait entendu ce rapport le ou avant le 29 octobre, mais le rapport initial semble provenir d'un journaliste suédois.

Peace Mission to Cuba," Times (London), October 30, 1962, p. 11. It has not been determined from what news source Murray would have heard this report by October 29, but it appears that the initial report was issued by a Swedish journalist.

10. The Secretary-General's side of the operation seems to be progressing well. I wonder whether the United States project for aerial surveillance may not complicate matters. It is difficult to see in what circumstances Castro or the Russians would accept the substitution of Canadian pilots under the United Nations flag for regular United States Air Force observers. This kind of air photo reconnaissance, moreover, seems very elaborate for the job to be done although I can readily understand why the United States would wish to make the verification system as fool-proof as possible.<sup>109</sup>

11. Many observers at the United Nations seemed to accept that the sending of Mr. Kuznetsov to New York meant that the Soviet Government genuinely wished to clean up this Cuban mess quickly. Before we left New York, he had already seen U Thant and had emerged "smiling," according to the New York evening papers. The fact that he smiles regularly whenever peace is breaking out, was not noted however.<sup>110</sup>

Dear Mr. White,

Thank you for your letter of October 29 notifying me of the institution of a world-wide clearance system for ships entering the quarantine area around Cuba. I note that the procedures described in your letter are being adopted in order to avoid delay and other difficulties which would result from stoppage and inspection of ships, and may be applied to vessels of any flag entering the quarantine area.

I am authorized to confirm that the Canadian authorities have no objection to the application of these procedures to vessels of Canadian or other registry in Canadian ports. I hope, however, that there will be close co-ordination between the Embassy and this Department concerning the timing of any statement which may be issued by the Embassy. The wording suggested in your letter is quite satisfactory from our point of view, but we should like reasonable advance warning in case the Government wishes to make an announcement in the House of Commons.

Yours sincerely,

CUBA

The Minister called in the Cuban Ambassador this morning to explain to him the importance which Canada attached to the success of the U.N. observer operation which U Thant would be discussing today with Premier Castro and to let the Ambassador know of Canada's readiness to contribute in any way possible to its success. In the Minister's opinion it was no less in Cuba's interests to cooperate.

2. The Minister went on to explain that the benefits of a successful U.N. observer operation in Cuba would not be confined to the Cuban situation only. He described the improved international atmosphere which had been so apparent in New York and which marked a complete reversal of the shock and depression which had characterized the atmosphere in New York as recently as Saturday last. The relaxation of tension brought with it great possibilities for progress in issues such as testing for there was wide-spread revulsion to the prospect of nuclear war which the Cuban crisis had brought to a head.

3. So far, the United Nations generally, and U Thant in particular, had come out of the current crisis well. U Thant had shown great wisdom and initiative and had earned the wide-spread respect of member states. The result was a renewal of faith in the United Nations even by countries such as the United Kingdom, which had a justifiable cause for complaint over the attacks to which they were being subjected in the 4th Committee. The recent crisis had shown that the United Nations was the principal hope of maintaining peace and Canada fully endorsed that view.

4. The Cuban [Ambassador] did not dispute the Minister's assessment of the U.N. role or the hopes which the crisis had engendered for the future. He expressed the hope that some good could come out of the recent events. Specifically, he hoped that Cuba could obtain a guarantee that the United States would not attack Cuba. The Minister commented that such a guarantee had been already promised by President Kennedy, who, on the whole, had handled himself well throughout the crisis in the face of many internal demands for stronger action. Indeed, the three leading personalities on the United States side, Kennedy, Rusk and Stevenson were not warlike men, had consistently shown a determination to work out peaceful solutions and were the voices of moderation in United States policies.

5. The Cuban Ambassador noted in reply that these same three Ministers were those who had adopted a policy of isolating Cuba economically and politically in the Western hemisphere and, judging by this morning's newspapers, apparently intended to continue that policy. Cuba had offered repeatedly to discuss their differences with the United States but had been rebuffed. The question was, would they be prepared to do so now.

6. The Minister did not reply directly, other than to say that the present offered an opportunity for progress in a number of directions. There was a general will to reduce tensions. Even Berlin and other broad issues might now be capable of resolution. The drastic change in the atmosphere in the last few days had greatly altered the outlook for peace.

7. The Cuban Ambassador said that he would report the views expressed by Mr. Green to his Government.

THE SOVIET UNION AND THE CUBAN CRISIS

In any analysis of Soviet objectives in creating the conditions for the latest Cuban crisis, a number of basic considerations must be kept in mind.

(a) Khrushchev is essentially a cautious man who is fully aware of the dangers of thermonuclear war and of the present strategic superiority of the USA. He therefore would not willingly run the risk of a major confrontation with the USA except where the vital security interests of the USSR were at stake.

(b) At the same time, Khrushchev is an impatient man who loathes inactivity and needs successes. He felt compelled to demonstrate that his policy of "peaceful coexistence" pays dividends, be it something as intangible as a meeting with the President of the USA or something as concrete as a settlement in Laos. He likes to keep things moving and nothing had been moving, satisfactorily for him, for many months: Berlin talks had brought no progress, a disarmament agreement seemed as far off as ever, no significant Soviet advances were being made among the neutralists, and Western Europe integration and economic progress were moving ahead in marked contrast with Marxist assumptions and the Soviet bloc's economic problems.

(c) Khrushchev is also a proud man who is determined that the Soviet Union be accorded a status and a respect which he feels is due, but not widely enough acknowledged, to a great power and to him personally as the leader of that power.

2. The psychological explanation of his decision to establish offensive missile sites in Cuba probably lay in his desire to stir things up, to get them moving, to act dramatically, to be noticed, to be able to point to successes. But in his caution he knew that he must not let the pot boil over, and this was amply demonstrated in his careful handling of the crisis once President Kennedy had made his speech of October 22.

3. Khrushchev's objectives, put in logical terms, were many and complex. The end of the operation he himself probably could not predict until he saw how events developed.

(a) By a rapid build-up of offensive missiles in Cuba he might be able to effect a short-cut to reducing the strategic imbalance favouring the USA, circumventing the North American early warning network and covering off a number of SAC bases which are still a vital part of the American superiority. Even if American reconnaissance spotted the build-up quickly (and he probably knew it would), he could safely assume that the USA would not attack the Soviet Union in retaliation for the mere establishment of bases in Cuba. If the USA responded precipitately by attacking Cuba, Khrushchev would gain by being able to brand the Americans as aggressors.

(b) If he was able to get away with the build-up before effective counter-action was taken, Khrushchev would be in an improved posture to call for a discussion of Germany-Berlin, American bases on the periphery of the USSR, disarmament (nuclear tests, nuclear-free zones, non-dissemination of nuclear weapons, etc.) or any other point of conflict with the USA. His enhanced bargaining position at the conference table would stem less from the crude fact of a Cuban dagger pointed at the heart of the USA (even with this, the Americans could impose an unacceptable level of damage on the USSR) than from the fact that the Soviet Union had been able to seize the initiative and act in a decisive way while the USA fumbled and hesitated about its response. The chances of pulling it off may well have been recognized as slight, but the dangers were not thought to be critical and the possible advantages justified the gamble.

(c) Should the Americans call, say, on the United Nations to stop the build-up before its completion, Khrushchev might still get ahead with the build-up while the United Nations machinery came into play. And in any event, such an initiative would be almost sure to lead to discussion and negotiation in which sooner or later Khrushchev would find himself face to face with Kennedy discussing the whole range of disputed problems. This would be better than interminable diplomatic exchanges and might even bring some solutions.

(d) If the Americans took forceful enough action to stop the build-up and insist on dismantlement, Khrushchev could count on getting some quid pro quo, perhaps the removal of a few American bases, at least some sort of guarantee for the territorial integrity of Cuba. Even this latter would be a gain. First of all, it would eliminate any obligation to go to the defence of an island much too far away from the Soviet Union for effective support, and secondly, it would be a tacit admission of the right of a Soviet-oriented régime to exist in the Western Hemisphere.

4. If one considers that Khrushchev seriously counted on achieving his maximum objectives, the Cuban gambit would be a serious defeat for him and one in which his personal prestige and that of the Soviet Union suffered a heavy defeat. But if one accepts that Khrushchev is a realist, and a cautious one; that essentially he was probing the Americans to see what he could get away with; and that he was from the outset willing to accept even the minimum objective as worth the gamble – then his defeat is only a relative one. The Soviet leader has at no time during the crisis looked as if he were acting in panic and such indicators as troop and naval movements and the orders to cargo ships not to test the American quarantine do not suggest that he was planning or expecting a major confrontation with the USA. The Soviet Union has undoubtedly suffered a loss of prestige as a result of the quick, determined and measured response of the USA. But it has not been a rout. Khrushchev has set himself up quite skilfully as the man of peace who would not be provoked into rash action by an impetuous young Kennedy. And the chances are at least even that he will soon have a meeting with Kennedy at which Khrushchev can bill himself as co-star (perhaps stealing the show?) in the settlement, or at least the direct discussion, of the major problems of the world.

5. Some of the consequences which may flow from the latest Cuban crisis must be examined, though with the usual caveat about the dangers of prediction where the Soviet Union is concerned.

(a) If the analysis of the previous paragraphs is correct, there is no reason why Khrushchev's internal position should suffer seriously, or perhaps at all. He is not likely to have embarked on such a venture as this without considerable discussion within the top leadership and therefore they are probably as much committed to it as he.<sup>111</sup> We know of no coherent body of opposition to Khrushchev within the Soviet Union and even if there are some grumblings of discontent, Khrushchev, a consummate politician, is capable of making partial success or even minor defeats appear as great successes.

(b) The Chinese leaders will probably more than ever conclude and imply that Khrushchev has no right to be the leader of the Communist world after what they may consider a great loss of face before the imperialists. The Cuban episode will probably lead to a further deterioration in Sino-Soviet relations, but it would appear that Khrushchev has for some time determined to follow the course of action which he deems necessary for the Soviet Union almost regardless of the reactions of the Chinese. The recent public expressions of Soviet support for the Chinese position in the Chinese-Indian border dispute may serve as minor compensatory fence-mending, though the Chinese will feel that they should have received this support, and much more longer ago.

P.M. questioned this. [O. W. Dier]

(c) In Cuba, the minimum result will be to remove the bases and to guarantee the territorial integrity of Cuba against attack. Even this latter will give the Castro régime some standing and the Soviet Union some relief from worry, while the former removes the major American concern. A further proposal might be the neutralization of Cuba, with the removal of Guantanamo proposed as a swap for the removal of even the defensive installations, and with Cuba assuming the role of a neutral Moscow-oriented though less Moscow-dominated. In the rest of Latin America, the consequences are difficult to predict, though the Cuban episode may make some of the Latin American countries a little more chary of supping with the Soviet devil and the Kremlin's attempts at penetration a little more difficult.

(d) On Germany-Berlin, Khrushchev has probably satisfied himself by the Cuban probe (if indeed he was in any doubt before) that the Americans will stand firm on the essentials of their Berlin position and that therefore a show-down with direct confrontation is to be avoided. He could not reasonably impose a blockade on Berlin as the equivalent of the quarantine of Cuba, for demonstrably Berlin represents no military threat to the vital interests of the Soviet bloc. And in any event the strategic balance which has in part deterred him from taking action on Berlin has been restored by the decision to dismantle the Cuban bases. There may be some new harassment on the corridors, but it would appear more likely that Khrushchev will hope for, and perhaps work for, a new series of talks and especially a direct Kennedy-Khrushchev meeting on Berlin.

(e) In the disarmament field, the solution arrived at over Cuba may set some precedents. There is agreement to dismantle bases, to de-nuclearize an area and to inspect the proceedings. The Cuban crisis has already led to one proposal on dismantlement of Turkish bases in return for dismantlement of Cuban bases and it would be surprising if there were no further Soviet suggestions in this vein, plus perhaps a new attempt to set up nuclear-free zones.

(f) Certain quarters in the West may draw the conclusion from Kennedy's skilful handling of the Cuban crisis that a consistently hard and forward line should be adopted in all dealings with the opposition. Some hard liners in the East may feel that Khrushchev should have held firmer against American pressures. But the Cuban episode has demonstrated to more responsible statesmen, including the American Administration, that the present "balance of fear" is precarious and that a more reliable status quo should be sought.

6. We cannot say for certain what were the Soviet objectives in establishing missile bases in Cuba nor what will be the consequences of their agreement to dismantle the bases. We have probably not yet seen the full Soviet reaction to the Cuban crisis. After a short period in which it is confirmed that the Cuban settlement is honestly adhered to, President Kennedy may take advantage of the present momentum to propose a meeting with Khrushchev to try to come to grips with a range of outstanding problems like Germany-Berlin and disarmament which have so far eluded solution.<sup>112</sup> This would<sup>113</sup> be a good moment to discover whether Khrushchev put things in motion with a view to finding solutions rather than just trouble-making and whether he is ready for serious negotiations.<sup>114 115</sup>

MEDIATION OFFER

At his request I called on Foreign Minister tonight. Roa said he wished to give me Cuban Government's answer to offer made by Government of Canada to use its good offices in mediating between Cuba and US in order to find a pacific solution to present situation. Cuban Ambassador in Ottawa had indicated our hope for an early reply and (2 groups corrupt) let us have Cuban decision as promptly as possible.

UNITED NATIONS ACTIVITIES: CUBA: NUCLEAR TESTING
(Previous Reference October 25th)

40. The Secretary of State for External Affairs said that during the recent Cuban crisis it was clear that Mr. Khrushchev had been convinced that Cuba would be invaded. His first move to get out of the impasse created by the U.S. stand had been to put up reasonable terms. His military people then began to switch things around and have the terms include the removal of U.S. bases from Turkey. When it was later found that President Kennedy would not accept this Mr. Khrushchev wrote to him and dropped the condition. The real danger was not Khrushchev himself but rather the possibility of his being undermined or overruled at home. This was one of the reasons why President Kennedy was anxious that there be no American gloating or bragging.

The resolution calling for a moratorium on nuclear testing was due to be discussed at the United Nations. On Sunday, the Canadian Delegation had decided to draft a brand new resolution which would cause the U.N. to send the question of disarmament back to the Committee on Disarmament. The idea had been to take advantage of the present atmosphere of relief and reality. The draft resolution was taken up with the U.S. representatives, who were delighted with the idea. The United Kingdom and the United States had earlier been trying to get others to vote against the moratorium. This would get them "off-the-hook." The Italians were also pleased with the new draft. The Canadians met with six of the eight unaligned countries on the Disarmament Committee, who agreed to the Canadian proposal. It had also been shown to the Russians, who said that they wanted to look it over. The Poles were quite pleased and had been asked to act as co-sponsors with Canada. If the Russians agreed, this would mean that the question of nuclear testing would go back to the Committee at Geneva. There was a real chance that nuclear testing might be brought to an end. There would be great relief in the U.N. if Canada could succeed in its efforts. Of course, if the Russians did not agree to it then the matter would have to be dropped. After Canada's stand at Geneva, it would not be possible to vote against a moratorium on nuclear testing. The same was true of Norway, the Netherlands, Denmark and others. The U.K., on the other hand, had been trying to force Canada's hand to vote against it, but strangely enough the U.K. representative at the U.N. only yesterday had tried to get Canada to simply abstain from voting. They intended approaching the U.S. with the same end in mind, should Canada agree. The Canadian resolution would get everybody "off-the-hook."

Yesterday, the U.S. representatives had been told by the Canadian Delegation that it was vital that Canada get into Cuba as one of the observer countries. This view was checked with Mr. Rusk to see if there were any objections. On the contrary, he was delighted and anxious to see it happen. The Prime Minister had approved an offer of Canada's services in this regard being made to the Acting Secretary-General. Mr. U Thant was very pleased to receive it and intended asking Premier Castro if he would agree. Castro would have the last word in this matter. Some other countries felt that Canada should not be in as being a member of NATO. The action taken by Canada at the beginning of this week, if successful, would bring a real contribution towards peace and would raise the prestige of Canada among the nations.

OFFICIAL REACTIONS TO CRISIS

The pace of events has been so fast and unexpected and probably not repeat not fully understood by Cubans with result that it has had a stunning effect on public opinion at all levels. In the circumstances, I have hesitated until now to send a report on reactions and even now my assessment must be tentative.

2. Fidel Castro will speak Thursday after his talk with U Thant. The official Cuban line will not repeat not be known until then. Raúl Castro said on Sunday night that they were waiting orders from Fidel. There is a widespread rumour that Castro is furious about Russian retreat and the way he was relegated to the role of a second class puppet. Castro usually reacts violently when his ego is wounded. Today's newspapers show evidence of disappointment with Russians. The leading editorials in morning press make no repeat no mention of USSR. Revolution, however states that in Cuba nobody trembled, nobody turned coward and nobody retreated. The suggestion is that elsewhere somebody did.

3. The Cubans must also be rather disappointed by reactions in Latin America. Their effort to promote sabotage and rioting throughout continent were in accordance with their dream that Latin America would burst into the flames if USA invaded Cuba, but Castro's plan did not repeat not envisage sorry stage setting provided by events of past week.

4. Fidel Castro will want to prove to Cuba, the world and himself that he is nobody's puppet. His 5-point demands issued on October 28 represents his first efforts to climb back into the driver's (seat?).<sup>117</sup> In effect it insists that USA guarantees must include abandonment of a policy of unrelenting hostilities and it also contains highly unrealistic demands for immediate return of Guantanamo. USA refusal to meet these five points could be used to demonstrate that USA is still (Cuba's ?) enemy. Hatred of USA provides fuel to run Castro including régime and perhaps is own psychological system.

5. On the other hand the five points represent Castro's first reaction directed as much against USSR as designed for domestic consumption. First reaction however need not repeat not be a final position. Castro cannot repeat not easily prevent dismantling of bases and withdrawal of Soviet offensive weapons under UN inspection. Indeed he may decide to switch his line and try to take credit for preventing a war desired by "Yankee imperialism." The visit of U Thant has provided an opportunity for Castro to regain some lost prestige and Cubans are playing it up as a Cuban negotiation with UN on their relations with USA rather than a discussion on modalities of UN inspection of Soviet missile withdrawal.

6. I will comment further on official reactions after Castro's speech. A report on unofficial Cuban reactions† will be sent later today.

CUBAN CRISIS – AFTERMATH

We have just lived through another ten days that shook the world. Indirect results also may be widespread and important, but may take some time to work themselves fully out. Assuming (it is too soon yet to be certain) that Khrushchev's Sunday promises are in fact implemented, sudden resolution of crisis will raise new dilemmas for Moscow leadership which may lead to further important developments here. Some tentative speculation about possibilities as they appear to me from here may perhaps be helpful.

2. It is important to assess as accurately as possible just what thinking, motivation and forces lay behind Soviet leadership's action first in attempting installation of strategic nuclear rockets in Cuba and then agreeing to withdraw them at American insistence. Significant details will no repeat no doubt continue to emerge only gradually, possibly over long period. Meanwhile Soviet propaganda machine will presumably try to obscure and misinterpret facts. But it seems to me fairly clear, and (if I am correct in this) important for Canadian and other governments to appreciate that Khrushchev's main motive, as suggested in my reference telegram, was to prepare by sudden strategic breakthrough for major diplomatic showdown, certainly on Germany and possibly on other questions, which would be based on another round of thermonuclear blackmail.

3. Khrushchev tried ruthlessly and shamelessly to scare Western countries in summer and autumn of 1961. His blatant threats then failed to crack nerve of European NATO members as he had anticipated. Lesson Khrushchev drew from this was not repeat not sensible one of abandoning his dangerously false assessment of Western political and psychological reactions, but merely to postpone crisis while he took steps to increase his offensive military capacity at cost chiefly of Soviet consumers (30 percent higher meat prices last spring, etc.). It seems to me clear that Khrushchev was telling Kroll substantial truth about his intentions when in September (my telegram 672 September 15†) he promised crisis showdown with Kennedy for late autumn of this year. I think last week's events should be read in light of these earlier disclosures of Soviet leader's psychology.

4. It seems clear Khrushchev was preparing in Cuba for second diplomatic showdown with West, this one to be direct confrontation of Kennedy and major thermonuclear threat against North America, rather than merely against European NATO allies. Probably Khrushchev's reference in September 11 declaration of willingness to wait until after November 6 elections was designed not repeat not merely as cover for developing offensive rocket bases in Cuba, but also as hint to Kennedy that Khrushchev would be careful to save Kennedy's face in anticipated American breakdown, by letting Kennedy get congressional elections out of way first.<sup>119</sup> Probably Khrushchev also planned to offer some face-saving concessions, e.g. on nuclear test bans.

Not rec'd in Comcentre 10:00 hrs 7/11/62.

5. Although I believe West would be very wise not repeat not to cause too sudden or too much public loss of face by Khrushchev, particularly until after removal of rockets from Cuba and possibly for some time thereafter, it is nevertheless important that key governments and societies should not repeat not misread ominous lessons of Soviet duplicity and of Khrushchev's ruthless and repeated readiness to use thermonuclear threat in blackmail effort to gain political advance in Europe.

6. Events of past ten days have I think clearly demonstrated importance of maintaining and consolidating Western Alliance and of cherishing good Western defences and deterrent capacity until some dependable disarmament arrangements can be agreed and implemented.

7. Sunday's sudden disclosure to all senior CPSU personnel and also to intelligent and thoughtful sections of Soviet public of far-reaching recklessness wickedness and bankruptcy of Khrushchev's foreign policy toward West, will almost inevitably create some real domestic political problems in this country. If Khrushchev can save his internal position, and my guess is that he can, this will illustrate both his political nimbleness, and extent of his personal hold on key elements of Soviet power. I would anticipate that in any case some political heads here will have to roll, though this may take some time.

8. There is already some evidence in last week's events of uncertainty, and probably of fundamental differences of judgment and readiness to gamble, within leadership here. Furtseva mentioned at reception yesterday evening that decision to withdraw was a very near thing and that war had been very close. There were signs of Soviet nervousness, and search for acceptable way of backing down, last Thursday and Friday. You have probably had report of Soviet Chargé Loginov in London asking Thursday to see Lord Home, and in effect requesting British to help Moscow find compromise way out.<sup>120</sup> Reportedly Home scolded Loginov for Soviet duplicity. Loginov did not repeat not demur. Kohler tells me that on Friday Khrushchev sent message to Kennedy suggesting compromise deal solely on Cuba. Soviet (and as far as I know world) press had not repeat not yet published this message. Before Kennedy could reply Khrushchev sent Saturday afternoon message drastically stiffening terms by suggesting withdrawal from Cuba in exchange for American rocket withdrawal from Turkey. 24 hours later, faced with clear evidence that Americans were determined to take early military action against rocket bases in Cuba unless Moscow withdrew them, Khrushchev climbed down.

9. It seems to me almost certain that some members of Presidium must have disapproved rocket gambit in Cuba, and that as crisis deepened they and presumably others favoured withdrawal, while presumably some still wished to hold on to get better terms even at risk of vastly graver dilemma for Moscow if USA acted militarily in Caribbean. In due course such people may be too dangerous or distasteful after climb-down costs become clearer for Khrushchev to leave in positions of power. Probably too some elements in Soviet military leadership, which may or may not repeat not include Malinowski, favoured trying strategic rocket breakthrough in Cuba. These elements too may provide scapegoats.

10. Tentatively (I am by no repeat no means sure) I would anticipate that Khrushchev's best method of saving face and restoring his prestige at home and possibly also with most of European satellites and neutrals, would be to build further on image, already being assiduously tried out here, as savor of peace. It seems to me quite possible that Khrushchev may find it necessary or desirable to take further action to give substance to this pose. He may prove more ready than thitherto to negotiate seriously for nuclear test ban and possibly for some disarmament measures. It is conceivable that he may try to get agreement on reduced arms budgets which would allow him to gain domestic popularity and perhaps restored political influence abroad by giving higher priority to economic development at home and perhaps to some increased foreign aid.

11. I am inclined to think that this would be Khrushchev's best line of defence. If so, it would be difficult for him simultaneously to adopt alternative course, to which he may also be tempted and which doubtless some forces here will press on him, to be as tough or tougher than ever on Berlin problem. He may feel impelled to proceed with signature of Berlin peace treaty, but if access is guaranteed this probably need not repeat not in itself be unacceptable to West. Sword of Damocles is less dangerous once it has dropped without disaster. I am inclined to doubt that Khrushchev would relish idea under present circumstances of a further showdown with USA, at time when prospect of Western climb-down must surely seem to him dimmer than ever, and when he can hardly afford to risk another personal failure.

12. We cannot repeat not exclude dangerous possibility that Khrushchev may seek, perhaps even in some desperation, to gain genuine political victories to offset his humiliation, even by running grave risks. But I am inclined at present to think it more likely that Khrushchev may decide to cut his prestige losses with Mao Tse Tung and such tough forward elements as there may be in European bloc and within Soviet political and military leadership, and to concentrate instead upon developing further his role of statesmanlike man of peace. A great deal of Khrushchev's political doctrine and prestige, at home and abroad, has long been committed to this course, based genuinely on one side of his complex nature. His very real and substantial achievements domestically in liberalizing and loosening monolithic inheritance of Stalinism show this is not repeat not mere pose.

13. I would hope (but am by no repeat no means sure) that if Khrushchev does decide to follow this immediate course of diminishing tensions, he would also forego temptation to plot secretly for third attempt at nuclear blackmail perhaps only in some years' time. But Khrushchev may draw from last week's failure chiefly the superficial but dangerous lesson he drew from 1961 failure, i.e. that he needs still more hardware. He may now concentrate on fastest possible further development of ICBMs and Polaris-type nuclear submarines. There may be an important debate here during next few weeks or months on this question. Doubtless some elements in Soviet leadership, smarting under humiliation, will be tempted to follow this course. If so, this will inter alia involve sharpened dilemma and strain on allocation of resources within Soviet economy.

14. For all these reasons and others it will I think be useful for West to seek some early and genuine progress in disarmament and easing of tensions. Danger of influencing Soviet leadership to decide on necessity of third showdown [and] try later by crash arms programme would also suggest that it might be wise for West to avoid excessive or too rapid exploitation of our recent triumph in such a way as to rouse justified and serious fears in Russia. It might I think therefore be wise for West to be forthcoming and indeed conciliatory insofar as genuine and legitimate Russian and Soviet interests are concerned.

15. I would hope however that quietly but effectively, after present dust has settled, efforts will be made by appropriate Western diplomatic and press means to help governments and peoples in Latin America and in non-aligned countries throughout world to attain just appreciation of recent crisis, how and why it was caused, and how resolved. It will I think be very important that events of this magnitude be properly interpreted.

16. Presumably we can in any case expect (a) shattering loss of confidence in Khrushchev by Castro (b) perhaps some loss of confidence in Castro by thoughtful Cubans appalled at revelation of desperate gamble to which he lent himself and danger involved for Cuban people (c) some loss of Soviet prestige in other left wing circles outside bloc (d) opportunity for more realistic assessment of real nature of Soviet policy by leaders in non-aligned countries (e) some exacerbation of Chinese-Soviet relations (f) greater confidence in American firmness and reliability on part of West Germans and French (g) greater cohesion by NATO (h) stronger world-wide movement for rapid progress toward nuclear disarmament. All these tendencies will of course create new problems for Soviet Government, and new dilemmas on which they will have to take decisions.

THE SOVIET UNION AND THE CUBAN CRISIS

Following is the text of a memorandum prepared in the Department.<sup>121</sup>

2. This paper is an effort at analysis which should not be taken as representing official Canadian view. We find it difficult to accept the reasoning in paragraph 5(a) concerning the effect on Khrushchev's internal position. Some of us feel that what could be considered at best a very partial success for Khrushchev's venture in putting missile bases in Cuba would be found to have a detrimental effect on his internal political position.

3. There is also within the Department a view that in committing so much of Soviet prestige and such a heavy investment outlay in establishing missile bases in Cuba, Khrushchev must not only have hoped but even expected to get something more substantial than a guarantee for Cuba against attack. Those who hold to this line of thinking would therefore conclude that the blow to Khrushchev's prestige is greater than this paper suggests.

4. Bearing in mind these comments and reservations, you may use the line of reasoning in this paper in discussions in Council tomorrow. Please make clear that it is inevitably a speculative piece on which we would welcome the comments of other delegations.<sup>122 123</sup>

CONVERSATION WITH ROA

After receiving message reported in my reference telegram, I took opportunity to seek Roa's reactions to recent developments over Cuba. While he was unable or unwilling to respond officially to many of my questions, he periodically offered comments on a personal basis. In succeeding paragraphs I am summarising main points of interest arising out of this conversation.

2. On talking with Secretary-General, Roa said only one preliminary two-hour session had been held that afternoon (October 30), in which Cuba had presented its case. In accordance with terms of Castro's invitation to U Thant Cuba was prepared to discuss its differences with USA as well as cooperate with UN to solve present crisis, provided there was complete recognition of Cuba's sovereignty. He insisted that Castro's five points were a sine qua non for any easing of situation. When I asked about question of UN supervision of Soviet missiles' withdrawal, Roa replied that matter had not repeat not been discussed. He declared this was not repeat not purpose of visit as far as Cuba was concerned, and added in his view UN inspection in Cuba was unthinkable since it would be a violation of Cuban sovereignty. Radio and press coverage of Secretary-General's visit has been subdued and a somewhat pessimistic line taken on initial meeting.

3. Roa was extremely vague on modalities of Soviet missile withdrawal. He commented personally that this was essentially something agreed upon in an exchange of letters between Kennedy and Khrushchev. Cuba was an independent state and had not repeat not committed itself in this regard. He declined to say how removal would be effected, asserting that real point at issue was USA aggression against Cuba, not repeat not missiles which were but defensive weapons to protect a small state against a voracious neighbour. Cuban rights, including right of self defence, had been consistently disregarded by Americans, and even their photographic surveillance was a flagrant violation of Cuban sovereignty. At one point he did briefly give vent to his unhappiness at Soviet action when he explained Russians did not repeat not run this country.

4. Roa seemed almost oblivious of the fact that Canadians might be concerned about Soviet missile installations here. The missiles had been introduced to defend Cuba against USA aggression and would never be used against a friendly country.

5. In connection with Castro's five points I asked Roa frankly if he really thought USA could, at this time, agree to vacate Guantanamo. He said he personally recognized difficulty Washington faced in this regard, but that this was not repeat not Cuba's problem. A foreign base in this country was unacceptable not repeat not only to Cuba, but to much of world opinion. Certainly Cuban propaganda suggests Castro's colours have been nailed to mast on these five points.

6. Much of our talk was taken up with Roa's reiteration of Cuba's catalogue of America's misdoings in contrast to Cuba's own virtuous position. I had distinct impression Roa had been somewhat disillusioned by alacrity with which the USSR came to terms with USA, and particularly the Russian proposal to trade off Cuba against Turkey. Nevertheless his deep feeling about USA seems to remain as strong as ever. Further, I suspect he sees an opportunity through UN of regaining lost ground that must be fully exploited. In this way too, Cuba may hope to dispel image in Latin America of Castro as a Soviet puppet.

I was distressed to receive your telegram under reference which reveals a serious misunderstanding on the part of the Cuban Ambassador arising out of my conversation yesterday with him. At no stage was the question of Canadian mediation between Cuba and the USA raised at all. My purpose in calling him in was to stress the importance which Canada attached to the success of the UN observer operation and to encourage the Cubans to regard Canadians as acceptable for some of the functions involved if the Secretary-General considered them desirable. My real purpose was to impress upon the Cuban Ambassador that it was in Cuba's interests to cooperate.

CUBAN CRISIS – MIKOYAN

This is to confirm that at 2300hrs last night I received urgent note from MFA requesting visas for Mikoyan and party who planned to fly to Havana via Canada November 1 on Ilyushin 18. MFA informed us by phone that request for overflight permission with necessary details, was being submitted to you through Soviet Embassy Ottawa. MFA note stated list of names of Mikoyan's party and passports, and list of crew members, would be sent to us today and we expect them shortly.

2. Webster phoned you my recommendation that providing you decide to authorize overflight we be authorized by phone to grant transit visas for party without usual delay.

3. I do not repeat not have sufficient information here to make firm recommendation whether overflight should be authorized. As you know, Mikoyan is often used as trouble shooter in crises, e.g. Guinea last winter, Hungary 1956. Assuming USSR is in fact proceeding with dismantling rockets in Cuba as promised, Mikoyan's mission is presumably to try to save as much as possible of Soviet prestige and influence with Cuban régime. There may also be important differences between Khrushchev's and Castro's policies and Mikoyan's task may be to bring Castro round. Alternatively it is I suppose still conceivable that Russians might try some dangerous trick. Without access here to up-to-date American intelligence assessment whether dismantling has begun or even whether construction has been suspended, I am not repeat not in position to recommend whether or not repeat not prudence would dictate thorough search of Soviet aircraft if repeat if you do authorize its overflight.

4. Junior Foreign Ministry official last night remarked that Mikoyan's quick trip to Cuba via Canada was part of implementation of agreed settlement, and asked that I recommend Soviet Embassy request for overflight permission. We gave no repeat no commitment on this. This morning Lavrov has phoned me to say he has been instructed to request our favourable and speedy consideration of overflight as well as visa request "in view of very special international situation." I said question already referred to you despite our slow communications.

5. It seems to me refusal by Canada could be made to look bad, and might be difficult. So could thorough search of plane carrying Soviet Deputy Prime Minister. But basic consideration should be prudence in light of current responsible assessment of developments in Cuba.

6. Please keep us informed whether you decide to grant overflight, and if so whether you consider it necessary to search plane or would rely on assurances (which I assume you will require) that no repeat no weapons carried. Lavrov has orally given me such assurance.<sup>125</sup>

In the case of the British this means that the aircraft would land at Prestwick at 5 a.m. tomorrow.

Ottawa, November 1, 1962

CUBA

At 9 p.m. last night, the U.S.A. Chargé d'Affaires sought an interview with you on instructions from his Government. As you were not available Mr. Campbell saw Mr. White at the East Block.

2. Mr. White was bringing the information, since made public, that Premier Castro had refused any form of verification by the United Nations or under United Nations auspices of the removal of offensive weapons from Cuba in spite of the U.S.S.R.'s willingness to proceed as agreed. In the light of the new situation this created, Mr. White was under instructions to ask the Canadian Government to intervene strongly with the Cuban Government and threaten to break off diplomatic relations if Cuba's "defiance continues." The United States Government suggested that the line which could be taken by Western countries still maintaining diplomatic relations with Cuba would be to point out that "practically the whole world had welcomed the Kennedy-Khrushchev agreement to avert the possibility of nuclear war which the presence of offensive nuclear weapons in Cuba presented." If we do not feel able to threaten an immediate breach of relations, we might wish to strongly protest Cuban intransigence and point out to Premier Castro that his desire to thwart current efforts to settle the crisis and to impede the United States desire to do so, if continued, would make it difficult to maintain normal relations with his régime.

3. The United States message added that it was hoped that any action taken as a result of these United States representations would be factual in presentation and would not appear to be the result of United States pressure.

4. Mr. White thought that a similar message was being delivered to the Foreign Ministers of other Western countries still maintaining diplomatic relations with Cuba.

5. Commenting personally on the outcome of the U Thant mission (information of which was based on a report from New York), Mr. White said that United States quarantine and surveillance measures would be resumed November 1 on expiry of the 48 hours suspension. U Thant's failure to persuade Premier Castro to accept United Nations verification of removal confronted the United States with a most serious dilemma. Because of the deception that the United States had suffered at the hands of the Soviet and Cuban regimes over the installation of the missiles in the first place, it was not enough to have assurances that these installations were being dismantled and removed; there had to be positive proof under international supervision. Although there was a wide-spread belief that the visit of Mr. Mikoyan to Havana was to bring pressure to bear on Premier Castro, the United States could not be certain of the degree of collusion which still might be present in current Cuban-Soviet manoeuvres. It was for these reasons that the United States Government was taking these prompt measures to have pressure brought to bear on the Castro Government to accept the United Nations role as agreed between the United States and the U.S.S.R. Mr. White thought Canada was particularly well placed to exert such pressure because we had throughout managed to maintain some sort of influence with Castro. The conversation you had had with the Cuban Ambassador on October 25 would make a convenient point of departure for any such representations, since the Cubans at that point had seemed to be inviting a settlement with United Nations participation. Mr. Campbell informed Mr. White that you had had a further conversation with Ambassador Cruz on October 30 which in a sense amounted to the sort of representations that were now being requested by the United States Government, since they were designed to impress upon Cuba the need to cooperate with the United Nations. Mr. White was also informed of the misunderstanding which had arisen as a result of the second meeting with the Cuban Ambassador and the steps which had been taken to correct it.<sup>126</sup>

CUBA

As I mentioned to you last night, Ross Campbell gave me by telephone some background to the exchange of telegrams between Ottawa and Havana on the Minister's conversation of October 30 with the Cuban Ambassador. The Under-Secretary wished us to know that the story had been given to the United States Embassy in Ottawa in case Cuban sources might make public a misleading account of what had transpired. I gathered that the Department

? [Auteur inconnu/Author unknown]

hoped that we would take steps to reinforce Ivan White's reports clarifying the Minister's position.

2. The basic point is that the Minister did not make an offer of mediation. His purpose in talking to the Cuban was to let the Cuban Government know that we were anxious to pave the way for the acceptance of the United Nations inspection operation in Cuba and that we thought it would be in Cuba's interest to support that operation and to have Canada participate in it.

3. As Ross Campbell gave it to me the Minister pointed out that if the United Nations operation in Cuba were a success it was not just Cuba that would benefit; a general reduction of international tension could well result.

4. The Minister expressed the view that the Secretary-General of the United Nations had conducted himself skillfully and enhanced the standing of the United Nations. Messrs. Kennedy, Stevenson and Rusk, the Minister said, were all men of moderation (in speaking to Ivan White, Ross Campbell had added the words "and firmness"). The Cuban Ambassador had said to the Minister that these same American leaders were the ones who were isolating Cuba and that the Cuban Government needed a guarantee. The Minister said they already had a guarantee from President Kennedy but the Ambassador made it clear that something much more airtight, United Nations backed etc., was needed. The isolation of Cuba had to stop. The Cuban Government had often said that it would like to talk with the United States but it had always been rebuffed. The great issue was: were the United States ready to talk now. In reply to this the Minister simply said that we should try to get one thing settled at once, meaning try to make the United Nations inspection process a success and if that could be done further possibilities might open out.

5. The foregoing is not necessarily a comprehensive account of the Minister's conversation with the Cuban. I emphasized to Ross Campbell that if we were to speak to the Americans here it was extremely important that we should be supplied with a record of the conversation in order that there be no discrepancy between our explanation and Ivan White's report. Ross Campbell seemed rather uncertain of being able to get permission to send us the record although he said he would try.

PERSONAL AND CONFIDENTIAL

Washington, November 1, 1962

Dear Norman [Robertson],

It will perhaps be of interest to you in piecing together the developments of the past ten days to learn of some remarks made to me recently by Scotty Reston and Walter Lippmann with regard to the question of Turkish bases as an element in the Cuban crisis.

Reston told me yesterday that "earlier this year" President Kennedy had made some attempt to persuade the Turkish Government to agree to the removal of nuclear missiles from Turkey.<sup>127</sup> I had not heard of this before, and a review of the files here reveals nothing very precise, although there are a number of indications from the Embassy in Ankara which suggest that the question of the missile bases in Turkey has been under fairly active discussion with the NATO and US authorities during the past nine months or so. If, indeed, the US authorities have been working towards the withdrawal of missiles from Turkey their efforts do not appear to have met with the desired response. As far as one can tell from the papers available here, the trend of Turkish policy seems to have been rather in the opposite direction, e.g., to evince an interest in getting more advanced missiles and, more generally, to obtain assurances that the NATO authorities did not exclude nuclear retaliation on the USSR in the event of a Soviet attack on Turkish bases. Against this there is the personal comment of a Turkish official (Ankara telegram No. 139 of October 25†) that removal of the missiles from Turkey in exchange for similar action in Cuba might be acceptable to Turkish Government and opinion.

Whatever may have been the real story of these exchanges, Reston's remark is interesting in the light of a comment made to me the other night by Walter Lippmann. He was talking about his column of October 24 in which, among other things, he said that the bases in Turkey and Cuba could be dismantled without altering the world balance of power. I gathered that he had checked the text of this column with someone highly placed in the Administration and had not been discouraged from publishing it.<sup>128</sup>

The possibility of a direct swap of Turkish and Cuban bases, in the terms of Khrushchev's public message of October 27, did not as you know have any attraction for the Administration

Our preliminary reaction to the United States suggestion that a strong protest including the threat of breach of diplomatic relations should be presented by our Embassy in Havana is that such action at this stage would be self-defeating. Over the past two years of deteriorating United States-Cuban relations, the maintenance of a Canadian Embassy in Havana has frequently proved valuable. The reasons which have prompted us to maintain those relations in the past are no less valid in the present critical situation and to change the policy at this stage would imply that the maintenance of relations had been mistaken. As government spokesmen have frequently stated, our past policy was based on the principle that diplomatic relations do not reflect approval or disapproval of the régime in power. Already it is clear that in the days ahead the Canadian Embassy may be called upon to play an important part, particularly if Canada is associated with any United Nations observation operation. For similar reasons even to hint at the possibility of breaking relations would be inadvisable and would, of course, destroy any possibility of Cuba's accepting Canadian participation in a United Nations operation.

2. On the other hand there is something to be said for our taking action now to impress upon the Cuban Government the urgent necessity of their making possible the United Nations role, without which the present United States-U.S.S.R. agreement for resolving the crisis cannot be fully carried out. Failure to achieve satisfactory inspection could revive the prospect of further unilateral measures by the United States.

3. In the circumstances you may wish to consider asking our Ambassador in Havana to deliver a message along the attached lines to the Cuban authorities. Such action on our part would be a logical follow-up to your conversation of October 30 with the Cuban Ambassador and would come appropriately from Canada in the light of our offer to make a contribution to the United Nations observer operation.<sup>130</sup>

INSPECTION OF REMOVAL OF MISSILE BASES IN CUBA

Because of the failure so far to get Cuban agreement on supervision of the dismantling and removal of ballistic missile bases, we would like you urgently to present a note to the Foreign Minister along the following lines:

2. Begins: Canada with all other peace-loving nations of the world, has followed with concern and anxiety the current crisis which has threatened the security of all countries, including of course both Cuba and Canada. Canada therefore welcomed the understanding reached that the long-range weapons facilities would be dismantled and removed from Cuba and that Cuba would receive a solemn guarantee against invasion of its territory.

3. It is clear that attainment of these purposes would be greatly assisted by an effective system of verification under United Nations or other auspices.<sup>132</sup> In this regard Cuba has a most important contribution to make toward resolving the immediate crisis and strengthening the peace-keeping authority of the United Nations.

4. Within recent years international inspection has come to be generally accepted as a necessary instrument in certain dangerous situations. Canada and a number of countries have on several occasions offered, within a UN context, to have international inspection applied to their territory. The Canadian Government earnestly hopes that as a matter of urgency the Cuban Government will agree to verification and will thereby make a decisive contribution to the peace and security of the world. I thought I should let you know that Campbell reports that Basil Robinson says that stories are all about Washington and may be reflected in the House today to the effect that NORAD has been a failure when it was put to the test because:

1. Canada failed to respond to the request from NORAD to go on DEFCON 3 Alert when asked.
2. The U.S. requested and were refused the right to put nuclear warheads at their bases in Canada (presumably Harmon and Goose).
3. The U.S. requested and were refused the right to move U.S. fighter planes to Canadian bases.

I knew of No. 1 and I assume that Mr. Harkness will be prepared to answer that if it arises in the House.

I assume that No. 2 refers back to the request of two or three years ago<sup>133</sup> which has never been met because of the desire to get agreement first on having warheads here for Canadian forces.

I did not know of No. 3 but Miller told me this morning on the phone that there had been one such request. I assume Mr. Harkness dealt with it himself, either on his own or in consultation with you, or perhaps with Ministers at a private meeting.

I suggested to Miller that he better warn Mr. Harkness to be ready for a question on this matter in the House this morning.<sup>134</sup>

VERIFICATION OF SOVIET MISSILE REMOVAL

I saw Foreign Minister late this morning and presented first person note to him stressing urgency with which you viewed matter. Note employed text given in paragraphs 2, 3 and 4 of your reference telegram with routine opening and closing paragraphs added.

2. Roa commented that we were of course aware of position which Cuban Government had taken in opposition to any UN verification of Soviet missile dismantlement and removal. He promised however to bring note to attention of President Dorticós and Prime Minister Castro at once. This is probably as satisfactory a response as we can expect for the moment.

3. Castro reaffirmed his refusal to permit UN verification in Cuba during his address evening November 1<sup>136</sup> on which I reported in my telegram 224 November 2. † It would be interesting to know nevertheless whether Secretary-General felt door had been slammed shut or not repeat not. Cuban attitude could also be influenced by discussion held with Mikoyan. In this connection Soviet Counsellor told me that Mikoyan will probably be in Havana for about a week.

Dear Bob [Farquharson]:

Rather than wait for the regular forwarding of clippings, I am enclosing three dealing with the present Cuban situation in which Canada is mentioned, in fact in two of them, Canada is the whole subject. You may have seen these, as one is U.P.I. and the other one date-lined Montreal. The third one is date-lined United Nations.

My complaint is the fact that somehow or other the International Press deliberately or otherwise, failed to understand the significance of the Canadian Government's action in respect of the Cuban crisis. Apparently they cannot add two and two together and get four, but then this is to be expected. Surely they must have understood when it was announced that the Canadian Government had already refused over-flight privileges to Russian planes and had imposed inspection of aircraft of other nationalities landing in Canada for refuelling en route to Cuba many hours prior to the President's Statement, that there was no hesitancy on Canada's part – if anything, the contrary. Of course what they will never understand in this country, and we don't seem to be doing anything to make this fact clear, is that being informed and being consulted are not one and the same thing.

I hate to be unreasonable, but I am very much concerned about the apparent inadequacy of our public relations output. The information in most instances, must originate in Ottawa, and if you think it might do any good, I am prepared to write along the same lines to our Department, suggesting that something be done to improve the situation as regards the supplying of information that is so vital to our maintaining a proper relationship with the people with whom we are dealing in our respective areas.

SOVIET MISSILES' DISMANTLEMENT AND REMOVAL

During past few days there have been a number of indications that USSR is withdrawing some military personnel and equipment from Cuba.

2. In Havana area we have observed several small convoys of heavy trucks moving towards Port Mariel, in which there are at present three Russian ships. Equipment on trucks was fully covered by tarpaulins and could not repeat not be readily identified.

3. Considerable movement of military transports was seen over weekend along Central Highway in Pinar del Rio Province in general vicinity of missile sites and apparently proceeding in direction of Mariel. Transports observed carried Soviet personnel, camp equipment and equipment of electronic nature. Many trucks gave appearance of having been hastily loaded.

4. In Mariel yesterday we saw convoy of ten trucks towing 50-to-60 foot trailers. Each trailer carried tarpaulin-covered equipment. While equipment could not repeat not be identified clearly lengthy trailers suggested missiles. Trailers were being loaded complete on to one of Soviet ships.

5. Russian ship Nikolaevsky left Havana today with Russian military personnel aboard. This ship whose normal complement is about 350 passengers appeared to be well filled according to British Embassy.

NORAD: CONSULTATIVE ARRANGEMENTS

In addition to the statement in the 1957 NORAD Agreement on “the importance of the fullest possible consultation between the two Governments on all matters affecting the joint defence of North America”<sup>137</sup> there was also a secret exchange of notes in 1959 dealing with consultation prior to increasing the state of readiness of NORAD in a period of international tension.<sup>138</sup> There was also a supplementary arrangement defining how such consultation should be initiated. (Copy of these exchanges is attached.)<sup>139</sup>

2. Under his terms of reference CINC NORAD is authorized to “specify the conditions of combat readiness, to include states of alert ...” of forces assigned to his operational control. The supplementary Exchange of Notes was intended to clarify this provision. Thus the relevant provisions of the secret exchange of notes provide:

(1) “CINC NORAD is authorized to increase the operational readiness of his forces as set forth in sub-paragraph 10 (i) of his terms of reference and pursuant to paragraph (2) below.

(2) “CINC NORAD is not in a position to assess all the political factors available to both the Canadian and United States Governments; therefore, it will be the responsibility of the Chiefs of Staff of Canada and the United States, in consultation with their respective political authorities, to reach agreement for increasing states of readiness of NORAD forces during periods of international tension when factors of overriding political significance are involved. In these circumstances, parallel consultations will be carried on between the political authorities of our two countries prior to reaching such an agreement. CINC NORAD will be provided continuously with the best information concerning the world situation to assist him in anticipating any requirements for increased or decreased NORAD operational readiness.

(3) “In the event that agreement should be reached on a decision to authorize CINC NORAD to order an increase in the state of readiness of his forces as a result of such consultation, agreement will also be reached on the desirability of making any public announcement and the terms of such an announcement.”

3. Thus the concept of consultation at the diplomatic, as well as the military level, in appropriate circumstances, is specifically provided for in the agreements governing NORAD.

4. The information given to the Canadian Government on the United States intentions vis-à-vis Cuba does not seem to have constituted consultation as provided in these arrangements, as we had understood them. In fact it seems that the United States took a deliberate decision not to consult any of its allies in order to achieve maximum surprise and impact on the Soviet Union. The question arises for Canada whether the existence of NORAD presupposes special obligations which entitle Canada to special treatment over and above that accorded the other allies of the United States.

Washington, January 11, 1960

Dear Mr. Willoughby,

The agreement concerning increased states of readiness for NORAD incorporated in an exchange of correspondence between the Ambassador and Mr. Murphy dated September 20 and October 2, 1959 respectively provides that "it will be the responsibility of the Chiefs of Staff of Canada and the United States, in consultation with their respective political authorities, to reach agreement for increasing states of readiness of NORAD forces during periods of international tension when factors of overriding political significance are involved. In these circumstances, parallel consultations will be carried on between the political authorities of our two countries prior to reaching such an agreement."

It is considered that it would be desirable to establish some procedure to implement the provision for consultation. As far as can be seen, no new machinery, formal or informal, would be required.

The question of CINC NORAD's right to increase the state of readiness of his command in an emergency not being in question, there would normally be sufficient time for consultation to be carried out in the normal way through the appropriate diplomatic and military channels. As regards consultation between the Department of State and the Department of External Affairs it is suggested that the Embassy in Washington be the channel on the Canadian side, and that in a more urgent situation direct telephonic consultation between the Departments could take place at such a level as would be deemed appropriate.

Aside from political consultations provided for in the above-mentioned agreement, it is envisaged that, if time and circumstances permit, a special meeting of consultation could be held between our two governments during periods of international tension, which would be devoted to the general international situation and could also consider the question of increasing NORAD's state of readiness.

Which method of consultation might be used would be determined in the light of existing circumstances. It would be for either government, in its discretion, to initiate consultation.

Yours sincerely,

S.F. RAE

Washington, January 14, 1960

Dear Mr. Rae,

I refer to your letter of January 11, 1960 with regard to the exchange of letters dated September 30, 1959 and October 2, 1959 between Ambassador Heeney and Secretary Herter concerning the question of increasing the state of readiness of NORAD forces during periods of international tension when factors of overriding political significance are involved. Your letter deals with the matter of establishing a procedure to implement the provisions for consultation under numbered paragraph 2 of Ambassador Heeney's letter.

As you state in your letter, there will presumably be sufficient time to carry out the political and military consultations required by this agreement through appropriate diplomatic and military channels, since the matter of CINCNORAD's right to increase the state of readiness of forces under his operational control is not in question. For its part, the State Department anticipates that the political consultations will normally be carried out with your Embassy by the Bureau of European Affairs or at such higher level as may be deemed appropriate.

It is recognized that there is a possibility of a situation being so serious as to warrant direct telephonic consultation between the State Department and the Department of External Affairs. The State Department therefore, does not regard the above-mentioned channel as being exclusive and agrees that in a more urgent situation both Departments should feel free to consult telephonically at such level as would be deemed necessary.

The State Department also recognizes that aside from the consultation provided for in the above-mentioned agreement, a special meeting of consultation could be held between our Governments, if time and circumstances permit, which would be devoted to the general international situation and could also consider the question of increasing NORAD's state of readiness.

Sincerely yours,

CUBA: NATO CONSULTATION

After this morning's regular meeting of Council USA representative read out extracts from telegrams of instruction he had received dealing with Cuba under a number of headings.

2. USA Policy. There was good evidence that missile bases in Cuba were being dismantled but there was no repeat no evidence as to what was being done with equipment or missile sites. Assembly of bombers was continuing and work might be proceeding on a submarine tender base. USA surveillance continues without any assurance for safety of aircraft involved. USA requires dismantlement of all offensive weapons of Soviet bases in Cuba and this is USA understanding of what Khrushchev-Kennedy exchange calls for. USA sees two possible courses of development from here. Under first it should be possible to establish removal of Soviet offensive weapons and that they have not repeat not re-entered Cuba. This would include missiles and their equipment and bombers and their equipment. This course of development would require air surveillance and ground inspection to verify export of missiles and other weapons which might have to be counted on ships at sea. Other possible course of development would be that agreement made would be "re-interpreted" by USSR and implementation of bargains fudged. USA has some evidence that this latter process may be beginning. If events follow first course USA will lift quarantine and give an assurance against invasion of Cuba though this latter assurance will not repeat not prevent USA from continuing to cope with Cuban aggression or subversion in Latin America. If second course is established it will be unacceptable to USA. Without appropriate verification and inspection, air surveillance and quarantine will continue and if offensive weapons are not repeat not removed USA will have to consider action. There cannot repeat not be uncertainty and Soviet assurances will not repeat not be enough. USA will make it clear throughout to USSR that it requires that agreements be properly carried out, that there is a clear choice between verified removal and USA action but no repeat no middle ground. USA hoped that it would be able to count on allied support.

3. Analysis of Situation. In USA view USA had almost all military advantages on its side in Cuban crisis. There was no repeat no reason to believe that USSR would have withdrawn so quickly if crisis had occurred in Berlin or in some other area closer to USSR. It could not repeat not be taken for granted that Soviet retreat over Cuba would be duplicated. USA continued to believe that correct attitude was a firm but moderate posture but this posture would be possible only if backed up by an adequate level of force and an adequate range of weapons choices. In relation to Cuba USA had had a wide choice of weapons. Lesson to be drawn from this was that in relation to problems nearer to USSR Alliance should accelerate its efforts to build up "spectrum of responses." In addition successful USA reaction over Cuba was result of detailed contingency planning. USA therefore thought that it would be wise to apply this procedure to Berlin by keeping plans up to date and improving state of military readiness of Alliance.

4. USA hoped that other NATO Governments were undertaking continuous studies of Cuban crisis and its aftermath with object of contributing to profitable exchange of views. USA thought that this study should be carried on both in individual capitals and in Council to [deduce?] political implications of crisis and plan steps to be taken if Cuban problem were properly settled. Finletter added that USA representatives in New York had been instructed not repeat not to discuss with Russians issues other than dismantlement and withdrawal of offensive weapons but in their conversations with Kuznetsov and his staff they were on lookout for clues as to further Soviet intentions.

5. Official and Public Reactions in Latin America. State Department thought that both of these were generally extremely favourable. Pro-Castro and pro-Communist responses in Latin America had fallen short of expectations in spite of nature of USA action over Cuba which had given good opportunities for anti-USA demonstrations and difficulties for local governments. State Department thought that this outcome was to be explained by at least four factors: (a) Communist organizations in Latin America had been thrown into disarray by promptitude of USA action and unanimity of OAS support. This disarray was accelerated by Soviet reaction to USA firmness and ignoring Castro. (b) Crisis provided unimpeachable evidence of Soviet intervention in hemispheric affairs. (c) Latin American Governments had taken steps to restrain hostile demonstrations, and (d) there had been a considerable over-estimate of strength of Castroism in Latin America. State Department thought that if agreement with Russians was carried out USSR would redouble their subversion efforts in Latin America in near future. Finletter then read out a long list of offers of help from various Latin American Governments to illustrate extent of Latin American assistance and said that he hoped that this list would increase. You have already received this information from Washington.

6. UK Permanent Representative then read out what he called a preliminary assessment of whole field of latest crisis including Soviet motives and future actions. He said that USSR anxieties about nuclear imbalance in favour of USA had been heightened by Kennedy's requests in March and May for additional appropriations for nuclear weapons especially for Minuteman. Soviet anxieties over imbalance had led to an increase in Soviet military expenditures from 1960 to 1962 of over 40 percent. Foreign Office thought that USSR feared that even this rate of expansion could not repeat not overcome imbalance. In addition Khrushchev needed to take action to enable him to put on greater pressure over Berlin and achieve a personal success. It was for these reasons that he had agreed to establishment of missiles in Cuba. He was also seeking to undermine allied confidence in USA if it should turn out that USA did not repeat not react firmly. Foreign Office thought that it must be assumed that plan had been exhaustively studied and approved by Praesidium. Khrushchev had seen risks involved and may have been against plan at first but may have agreed to it on being assured that risks were not repeat not great. Foreign Office thought that Khrushchev might have held view that period of greatest danger was that during which missiles were being landed in Cuba rather than period of construction of missile sites. USSR must have expected that USA would take no repeat no violent action but would take case to UN where USSR could count on neutrals to overcome any USA tendency to take action. UK thought all this had been arranged during Raúl Castro's visit to Moscow earlier this year and that TASS statement on Cuba was meant as a warning to USA.<sup>140</sup> USA action in imposing a quarantine, taking case to Security Council and naming USSR rather than Cuba as responsible party must have caught USSR off balance. Khrushchev had then become anxious to avoid a head-on clash. One incident which had not repeat not been satisfactorily explained was unpublished Khrushchev letter of October 26<sup>141</sup> which Foreign Office thought might have been sent either by Khrushchev on his own or after consultation with Praesidium. October 27 letter,<sup>142</sup> however, had represented second thought of a dangerous character in that they appeared to cast doubts on Khrushchev's good faith. Khrushchev might have sent this second letter against his better judgement and have been brought back to his original offer by prompt USA rejection.

7. Mason continued that since Cuban crisis USSR had issued no repeat no statement about Berlin or given any indication of possibility of a riposte in Berlin in spite of ample opportunities to do so. Foreign Office had noted that Soviet officials had not repeat not used opportunities presented by farewell calls of Sir Frank Roberts to say much about Berlin. One conclusion might be that they were reconsidering their position. It would be prudent to assume that Khrushchev would seek to extract advantages from crisis by claiming that there was a clear USA commitment not repeat not to attack Cuba and would also pursue line that Khrushchev was a man of peace. A weakening of Soviet authority within Communist bloc and of Khrushchev's authority within USSR could not repeat not be ruled out. Events in Cuba might be considered to support Communist China's claims about inadequacy of Soviet leadership. USSR must also expect credibility of its military threats in future crisis to be somewhat reduced. Nevertheless it should not repeat not be assumed that Soviet retreat in Cuba means that there would be an equal readiness to retreat where vital Soviet interests were involved. Mason concluded by welcoming Finletter's plea for a joint effort to exchange assessments, saying that what was badly needed was an exchange of many assessments not repeat not simply those of USA and UK.

8. I opened my remarks by referring to Prime Minister's statement of November 5<sup>143</sup> (PG218 November 5†) and particularly to that portion which linked solidarity with consultation. I also referred briefly to Canadian efforts to urge acceptance of proper verification on Cuban Government. After a reference to information contained in your telegram S-410† I spoke at some length on basis of your telegram S-425 November 6.†

9. Netherlands Representative commented on several specific points. His authorities thought that terms of proposed USA guarantee not repeat not to invade Cuba were so general as to be likely to cause difficulties in future in that USSR would try to broaden interpretation so that almost any change in USA policy could attract a charge of back-sliding. Netherlands authorities also feared that assurance of a promise of no repeat no invasion from other Latin American Governments amounted to giving Castro a life insurance policy while he continued his subversive activities. Netherlands feared that USA and Latin American reactions to Cuban subversion would be limited by guarantee and that any action against subversion emanating from Cuba would be interpreted as aggression by neutrals as well as USSR. On supervision and control Netherlands Permanent Representative drew attention to terms of Khrushchev's letter of October 27 connecting Cuban and Turkish bases and saying that authorization of Cuban and Turkish Governments would be needed for inspection. Netherlands thought that this might indicate that USSR envisaged using Castro to get out of its pledges as far as possible once danger of nuclear war receded. Netherlands doubted that any precedent would be set in Cuba for inspection in relation to disarmament. On conflict between USSR and Castro and especially over five points, Netherlands thought that USSR while not repeat not changing its attitude completely might have modified its attitude so as not repeat not to accept principle of international inspection of nuclear armaments and that question of control would therefore be as difficult as ever. In Netherlands view Khrushchev had expressed willingness to have UN play a role because he feared that a bilateral agreement between USA and USSR would not repeat not in itself be enough to guarantee against USA military intervention in Cuba. USSR had therefore used idea of UN inspection as a temporary shield between USSR and USA to protect Cuban bases against immediate USA action. On degree of Castro's independence Netherlands authorities thought that Mikoyan's first task was to explain change in Soviet tactics to Castro and assure him that political, military and economic assistance would continue. Netherlands thought there was a secret defence treaty between USSR and Cuba and that Castro would accept inspection only after all missiles had been withdrawn so that international inspection would reveal nothing of importance. Netherlands thought their morbid fear of spying would keep USSR from letting others see their nuclear weapons or their sites and that weapons would be removed from public view very quickly but Netherlands wondered whether study had been given to possibility that some of weapons had been placed in storage or warheads for them had been stored. In general Netherlands saw no repeat no reason to expect a diminution in Soviet intransigence. There was no repeat no reason to expect a period of reduced tension because it would be difficult for USSR to accept this setback and there would be a search for counter moves which would be more difficult for West to cope with. While there had not repeat not yet been any signs of Soviet countermoves directed against Berlin, Netherlands thought it was as urgent as before to give highest priority to study of political measures. He pleaded for information about studies being undertaken by Committee of Ambassadors in Washington and asked that their plans be discussed soon so that differences could be ironed out. There had been a tactical change of course but no repeat no fundamental change in Soviet line. Consultations were therefore needed in face of a Soviet counter move.

10. De Staercke said that Spaak agreed with USA and UK analyses. He would also agree that Soviet intentions were as hostile as ever. It might be true that Soviet initiative in Cuba had been result of a Praesidium decision but now that it had failed it might well be that new trends or cliques would be developing within Praesidium and we must not repeat not give weapons to extremists. Belgians thought Khrushchev had put himself in a difficult position over Berlin because if he were now to be aggressive there after failure in Cuba he would risk appearing in eyes of neutrals to be a man who continually jeopardized peace. In Belgian view therefore Praesidium would have to take a certain amount of time to reconsider its position over Berlin and decide what to do. He agreed to idea of exchanging analyses and approaching in common question of what to do next but countries like USA, UK and France had better sources of information than most and therefore should take lead in discussion of future action. He referred once again to Kennedy's letter of October 27<sup>144</sup> with its reference to the "first component" and called it "charter for future action." He thought we should be ready to consider within Alliance questions like a détente between NATO and Warsaw Pact, disarmament, nuclear weapons tests and Germany and Berlin. On latter Alliance should press ahead rapidly with its political contingency planning. We had waited for a long time to see results on work of ambassadorial group but perhaps Council should embark on its own on a study to elaborate a dynamic doctrine for West so that Kennedy would know views of Alliance if he had a personal meeting with Khrushchev.

CUBA: BRIEFING BY USA

Stevenson and McCloy gave briefing to large group of allies on present state of negotiations on Cuban question. Briefing had been given two days previously to Latin American group. No repeat no comments are to be made to press.

2. Stevenson prefaced his comments by reporting that USA had become increasingly concerned as they realized extent of Soviet offensive buildup in Cuba which he termed "enormous and ominous." He said that Soviet build-up of atomic capability in Cuba represented largest concentration of offensive power in any comparable area in world and directly affected retaliatory power of USA deterrent and endangered security of hemisphere. He made it clear that this and not repeat not electoral considerations guided USA and therefore that there would be no repeat no change in USA policy now election was over.

3. USA was insisting on removal of missiles and warheads, bombers and nuclear bombs and verification that removal had taken place. USA was not repeat not insisting on removal of surface to air missiles, anti-tank missiles etc (even though these were operated by Soviet technicians) nor were they requiring removal of latest MiGs and of Soviet forces. Pedersen of USA mission told us privately that it was quite possible some more advanced equipment might later be withdrawn by USSR since withdrawal of missiles removed need for more sophisticated equipment. He expected if this were done it would be done gradually to minimize offence to Castro.

4. Stevenson reported on state of negotiations under following headings:

(a) Quarantine and Inspection of Incoming Ships

5. There had been protracted discussion on categories of ships to be inspected, flag of ships to carry inspectors etc. Agreement had been reached on all questions except when inspection would end with USSR pressing for November 12 and USA unwilling to set any date. Red Cross inspectors had been accepted but Red Cross was insisting that all countries affected should give agreement including Cuba and country under whose flag ship sailed. USSR was undertaking to secure agreement from all countries whose ships it had chartered but would not repeat not approach other Soviet bloc countries. Additional problem had arisen in that Red Cross claimed if inspection were to end by November 12 it was not repeat not worth making arrangements to start. Date for termination was connected with unresolved question of withdrawal of bombers. USA suspected USSR might be drawing out discussions until all missiles had been removed.

(b) Inspection of Outgoing Ships

6. Agreement has been reached on arrangements for inspection at sea. USSR will provide schedule of ship departures and agree on rendezvous. Arrangements for one rendezvous have already been made for today and eight other ships were to leave yesterday or today. USA ships will draw along side and take photos from ship and possibly from helicopters. Missiles have been taken on board ship directly on their carriers and are covered with tarpaulins. Enough of missiles will be exposed to permit USA to make certain identification. USA does not repeat not regard this as substitute for ground inspection but it provides adequate confirmation of fact of removal of weapons. USSR has admitted to having about 40 missiles in Cuba which conforms closely with USA intelligence estimates. There have been no repeat no arrangements made for inspection of missile warheads. USSR has refused to discuss question as separate issue. They have not repeat not denied they are in Cuba but have limited their statements to assertions that everything connected with missiles will be removed.

7. No repeat no progress had been made on problem of removal of bombers. USA took view Il-28s were included in agreement since USA had referred to bombers as offensive weapons from first and USSR agreed to remove weapons which "USA deems offensive." Most of bombers had not repeat not yet been uncrated as of few days ago and uncrating was continuing after missiles being dismantled. Pedersen told us privately he believes uncrating has now stopped. Nevertheless USSR has not repeat not yet agreed to withdraw them. In subsequent discussion possibility was raised that USSR faced problem that title for bombers had been transferred to Cubans unlike missiles which remained Soviet property. Stevenson stated USSR had never taken this position in negotiations but admitted it might be one of problems which Mikoyan was facing. Cubans certainly had technical capacity to fly planes; on other hand planes were capable of carrying nuclear weapons and on one-way flight could reach as far as Montreal and deep into Latin America. For this reason USA would continue to insist on their removal. Even if USSR were to agree now to do so another two weeks would probably be required for their withdrawal whereas missile withdrawal might be completed in few days.

(c) On-Site Inspection

8. USA considered ground inspection was essential particularly because of difficulty of arranging for inspection of warheads which are small and for which no repeat no arrangements for at-sea inspection had been made. Privately Pederson admitted that latter arrangements might never be made which was further reason for ground inspection to ensure no repeat no missiles had been concealed. Until ground inspectors were arranged USA had no repeat no alternative but to continue aerial inspection. Stevenson recognized that USSR had its problems with Castro. But USA [was] not repeat not prepared to give undertaking on no repeat no invasion until they were sure all missiles bombers and nuclear weapons had been removed and this required ground inspection.

9. Even if there was immediate on-site inspection USA recognized that danger of reintroduction of weapons existed and therefore desired continuing inspection. For present they had no repeat no other thought than to accept Soviet promise given in Security Council. However USA was giving thought to schemes for regional denuclearization. Several members of USA mission have told us that Brazilian resolution could serve this purpose and USA is very interested in it. (See our telegram 2104† for Dean's comments on changes which USA is seeking to have Brazil make in resolution so that USA could support it.) Members of USA mission however fear that Castro will be unwilling to cooperate in scheme for regional inspection even though proposal would have attraction that it would include Castro once again in a regional organization. This however is long-term question.

10. Stevenson acknowledged in answer to question that principal hold which USA had over USSR was withholding undertaking not repeat not to invade. Until USSR had this undertaking Khrushchev could not repeat not point to any gain from installation of missiles and was therefore domestically vulnerable. Pedersen admitted privately that for its part USA could not repeat not give undertaking on-site inspection [sic] until inspection had taken place. This requirement arose more from political than from military reasons. Administration's insistence until October 22 that no repeat no offensive weapons had been introduced into Cuba in spite of Republican charges and many refugee reports made it necessary for administration to be able to point to inspection as guarantee that no repeat no nuclear weapons remained in Cuba or were being clandestinely reintroduced. Pedersen ventured private opinion that unless Mikoyan unexpectedly secured Castro's agreement to on-site inspection there was serious possibility that there would be no repeat no on-site inspection and therefore no repeat no undertaking by USA not repeat not to invade. This would mean there would be no repeat no final settlement of Cuban question. Instead there would be residual bitterness on both sides which would mean Cuban situation instead of becoming starting point for settlement of problems between USSR and USA would be added source of controversy.

(d) Security Council Meeting

11. USA took view that Council meeting should only take place once all elements of agreement had been carried out. Meeting would merely record USA guarantee against invasion and USSR guarantee not repeat not to reintroduce nuclear weapons. USA was not repeat not insisting on any particular form of undertaking. They thought it unwise to hold any Council meeting until all problems had been privately settled to avoid danger of public debate worsening situation.

12. Stevenson undertook to hold another briefing session next week.

DESPATCH NO. 521

Havana, November 13, 1962

CUBA AND SOVIET MISSILE BASES

The recent Cuban crisis has quite naturally directed renewed attention to the aims and purposes of Soviet policy in the cold war. One feature of this review has been an assessment of the motives which led the Kremlin to establish medium and intermediate range missile bases in Cuba. This offensive build-up represented rather a major shift in Soviet policy towards Cuba from that of providing various forms of political, economic and military assistance for the Revolutionary Government to the use of the island as an advance military outpost. As has been pointed out by several commentators, the Russians were in effect seeking to alter the balance of power by neutralizing the second-strike capability of the United States in a global conflict, as well as to use Cuba more blatantly for anything from nuclear blackmail to straight horse-trading in East-West negotiations.

2. One facet of the analysis of Soviet motivation that warrants some consideration is the extent to which Cuba played a role in the decision to establish the missile bases. In the absence of hard evidence on this subject at the moment it may be useful in this context to examine the course of recent Cuban-Soviet relations and attempt to discern the Cuban attitude towards and interest in the decision to accept these offensive weapons under Russian control.

3. At the outset one can, I think, say with reasonable confidence that the Cubans showed not the slightest degree of unhappiness in possessing the missiles on their soil, and were quite prepared to regard the weapons as part and parcel of their military arsenal. Indeed, they have displayed marked unhappiness over their subsequent dismantlement and removal. Viewed in retrospect, some of Castro's remarks just before the crisis broke out concerning the repulsion of a United States invasion of Cuba suggest that the knowledge that the missiles would soon be available strengthened his confidence in believing he could deal with such a contingency, and consequently his intransigence.

4. It has been my belief, as mentioned in several previous reports, that the Cubans have for some time been attempting to draw the U.S.S.R. into a formal commitment to guarantee the security of the Revolutionary Government. By his strong declaration of faith last December<sup>145</sup> and his subsequent demonstration this Spring that in the final analysis the régime could not survive without him, Castro succeeded in getting his Communist credentials generally accepted by the Russians. This was a fundamental step in paving the way for increased military and economic assistance this Summer. However, it is doubtful whether this really satisfied the Maximum Leader. Despite what amounted to associate status within the Bloc, he still remained in a rather exposed position far from the home base of Communist strength. Moreover, the apparent Cuban rejection of the Rapacki efforts to moderate both the external drive and the anti-American dynamism of the Revolution<sup>146</sup> was followed by a rising crescendo of oral sparring with the United States when the upsurge in Soviet assistance prompted the inevitable public reaction in the United States. Cuba retorted by sharpening the image of an island threatened by imminent invasion. Then developments only served to increase the need for a Soviet military guarantee in Castro's mind.

5. My Yugoslav colleague is of the opinion that the Cubans made a strenuous effort this Summer to be accepted into the Warsaw Pact.<sup>147</sup> This is certainly conceivable, although it was probably a non-starter with the Russians since it would have represented too open a political challenge to the United States without the means of backing it up. The supply of additional military hardware, including IL-28 bombers, and in particular the establishment of Soviet missile bases in Cuba under the control of Soviet military personnel, would have been a respectable substitute and gone a long way in meeting Castro's demands for a military guarantee. Indeed, the presence of Soviet operational units in Cuba was in itself almost tantamount to a guarantee of Soviet military aid in an emergency. Castro no doubt also assumed that, once established, he could exercise a measure of direction over the use of the missiles, for Dr. Roa intimated to me in one conversation that Cuba considered the missiles had been provided for their use and that the Russians were essentially operators of Cuban weapons. In any event Castro could certainly, by his actions, have had the power to exercise indirect control over their employment. Finally, and this point should not, I consider, be overlooked, the idea of being able to bring down devastation on the United States is something that seems to appeal to Castro and some members of his entourage. The possibility of rockets from the Soviet Union raining down on the United States, should an attack be launched against Cuba, was attractive enough – as shown by the warm Cuban reception to the TASS statement this September raising the spectre of such a possibility.<sup>148</sup> However, the thought of being able to unleash this type of vengeance directly from Cuban territory appears to have been even more heady wine.

6. The disadvantages from a Cuban standpoint of locating Soviet missiles on the island are readily apparent. Not only did it represent a Soviet strategic move in the pursuit of Soviet rather than Cuban interests, which could react detrimentally to the latter, but it was hardly calculated to improve Cuba's standing in the hemisphere, particularly with important states such as Brazil and Mexico, which continued to adopt a tolerant attitude towards Cuba. These are, however, not points which in my view the Cubans would properly grasp. In September, before the construction of the missile bases had begun, I suggested to Dr. Roa in a dinner conversation one night that it seemed to me Cuban policy ran the danger of transforming the country into a pawn which the Soviet Union could employ in international chess gambits. The Foreign Minister reacted somewhat warmly to this suggestion, declaring that, unlike the typical self-interest which underlay Western policy, the Soviet Union, in providing military and economic support for Cuba, did not have ulterior motives. Nonetheless he is intelligent enough that my point did not completely escape him. However, the belief in Soviet altruism which he expressed is to a greater or lesser degree evident in many supporters of the Revolution even though recent events have sullied the shining armour of Moscow somewhat. Again, the thought of the added military power which the missiles would give to a country which already maintains the strongest military organization in the Americas, outside of the United States, would far outweigh with the Cubans any arguments of adverse repercussions in Latin America. They would see this development as a means of enabling them to dictate terms to states on the continent that took an antagonistic attitude. From an ideological standpoint they may well, too, have thought that fear would drive many elements of the Latin American left, and particularly those who accepted the "better Red than dead" thesis, to the cause of Castro Communism. The possession of missiles could therefore be construed as facilitating the ultimate revolution throughout the hemisphere, for which Castro conceives of Cuba as being the vanguard. Furthermore, that the United States would not tolerate Soviet missile bases in Cuba and the Russians might in turn back down over this question never, I am sure, entered Cuban thinking.

7. All this is not to argue that the Cubans succeeded in persuading the Russians to establish missile bases in this country, but rather to point up my contention that the Cubans were not averse to the idea when it was put forward. The basic decision on so important and far-reaching a question was obviously taken by the Soviet Union, but it does seem to me that little persuasion was required to convince the Cubans to go along with the idea. It represented at the very least the closest military tie yet secured with the U.S.S.R. Essentially the decision had appeal to both Moscow and Havana for different reasons and there was a convergence of national interests, as each party conceived of its interest.

8. The most likely time when the decision was taken would appear to have been during the visit in July of Raúl Castro to Moscow. This visit now appears to have been considerably more significant than it looked to us here at the time. It will be recalled that the Cuban Minister of the Armed Forces went to the Soviet Union at the invitation of Marshall Malinovsky, the Soviet Defence Minister. Moreover, the younger Castro was accompanied by a retinue of senior Cuban military commanders and spent most of his time in military circles, including lengthy discussions it seems with Soviet military chiefs. This, in the absence of any communiqué to explain the purpose or results of the visit, would fit in with this thesis. One Cuban semi-official source has told us that there was some question on the Cuban side about the Russian insistence on maintaining full service and control over the missile establishments, but that this was sweetened by promises of increased economic aid. Che Guevara's subsequent trip to Moscow, at the end of which further economic and military aid was made public, would also tie in with this account. In addition I have heard from another Cuban semi-official source that the Russian military further convinced the Cubans of the desirability of proceeding with despatch on the arrangements for the missile sites by allegedly showing Raúl Castro and his party intelligence reports of a planned United States invasion of Cuba in the Fall. Whatever the real facts of these Soviet-Cuban discussions this Summer, I think it is not unfair to say that the proposal to establish missile bases in Cuba would not have fallen on unreceptive ears.

9. In the event matters have not worked out as planned, and the dismantlement of the missile bases and the removal of all known Soviet missiles from the island has undoubtedly left a legacy of suspicion and distrust in Cuban-Soviet relations, with potentially serious consequences for the long-term future of the Revolution. The Cubans have had some of their most cherished illusions shaken, and they now must realize that there are distinct limits to the extent to which the Soviet Union is prepared to protect the Revolution, the initiation of nuclear warfare being one. In the process Castro has suffered a loss of prestige and the image of Soviet disinterestedness has been tarnished. However, it is too early to see exactly where all this leads in Soviet-Cuban relations. The immediate resentment experienced in Havana in the wake of the Kennedy-Khrushchev agreement seems to have subsided, and Castro has managed to recoup some of his losses. His inability to turn elsewhere clearly compels a degree of cooperation, a feeling presumably also shared by the Soviet Union unless it is prepared to accept the immediate loss of prestige likely to ensue from letting the Revolution founder. The outward indications of Mikoyan's visit so far suggest that the Russians are willing to take their time in having their way and are further ready to go to some lengths in assuaging Castro's ruffled feelings.

10. While much will depend on the manner of the subsequent resolution of the crisis created by the missile bases, the whole affair seems to mark a major setback in the onward march of the Revolution in the hemisphere. Such plans as Castro may harbour of becoming a 20th-Century Bolivar have also received a rather rude shock.

CUBA

I called November 9 on Llewellyn Thompson who has throughout the Cuban Crisis been one of the small inner circle responsible for advising the President. In the course of a long conversation the following main points emerged.

Possible Solutions

2. Stressing that he was giving his personal views, Thompson analyzed present stage of crisis as possibly developing towards a situation in which neither the USSR nor repeat nor USA would be able fully to carry out their mutual undertakings embodied in the exchanges between President Kennedy and Khrushchev. Although the Russians were from all indications complying with their undertaking to dismantle and remove offensive missiles from Cuba, they had thus far been reluctant to take similar action to remove the IL-28 bombers which USA had unequivocally included within the category of offensive weapons. Furthermore, there was no repeat no sign yet that Mikoyan would be able to persuade Castro to agree to inspection of Cuba to confirm the absence of offensive installations. USA undertaking to provide assurances against invasion of Cuba and to remove the naval quarantine were both conditional on the removal of the bombers and on the establishment of adequate inspection arrangements. He could not repeat not forecast the outcome on the bombers but thought that the inspection arrangements as originally envisaged by the President would not repeat not be attainable. Hence it was possible, depending on how much influence Mikoyan could exert on Castro, that USA undertakings would not repeat not be required to take effect.

3. Thompson pointed out that an undertaking not repeat not to invade Cuba (which he thought the Russians would wish embodied in a formal document) would considerably limit the freedom of action of USA to comply with its obligations under the Monroe Doctrine and the Rio Pact. Incidentally, he expressed the view that the central reason for the Soviet decision to agree to withdraw its offensive weapons from Cuba was that the Russians had satisfied themselves through their own intelligence that USA was both willing and in a position to invade Cuba unless USSR were prepared to withdraw. Thompson also pointed out that whilst President Kennedy agreed to give assurances against an invasion of Cuba, he had before and throughout the crisis made it entirely plain that the Castro régime's military ties with USSR were not repeat not negotiable. Finally an obligation not repeat not to invade Cuba would create difficult problems in USA relations with some Latin American states and also, unless there were adequate verification arrangements, with USA public opinion.

4. At the same time Thompson thought that the indefinite maintenance of USA precautions such as the quarantine and aerial surveillance of Cuba would not repeat not be entirely satisfactory. Continued interference with Soviet or chartered ships would be an irritant to good

USA-Soviet relations whilst the aerial surveillance of Cuba would always carry the risk of Cuban counter action against the surveillance aircraft and a corresponding risk of escalation.

5. It seemed, therefore, to be Thompson's view that means should be found of avoiding a stalemate. He seemed interested in exploring arrangements which would provide a pretext for international inspection of Cuban territory, thus satisfying the demands of USA public opinion. Under this concept, which he termed a Caribbean peace zone, international inspection might be undertaken within all territories bordering the Caribbean, including, for this purpose, some parts of USA such as Florida. The establishment of such arrangements would permit an initial inspection of Cuban territory on terms which might be more acceptable to Castro than those currently required under USA-Soviet bargain. Thompson thought that USA, for its part, would find it possible to permit inspection of certain parts of USA territory since such inspection would produce nothing that could not repeat not be ascertained by normal means in an open society such as existed here. The point, of course, would be to demonstrate that USA was not repeat not mobilizing Cuban refugees or exiles for an invasion of Cuba.

6. Thompson also mentioned the Brazilian proposal for a Latin American denuclearized zone. In his view the Brazilian proposal would take time to negotiate in detail; would not repeat not include USA territory (although USA might be guarantor of the scheme); would have to rest on initiatives taken by the Latin Americans themselves; and would have to be considered in the light of the precedent it might create, especially by African states (which had earlier been mentioned in the Brazilian draft resolution in the UN).<sup>149</sup> Though not repeat not expressing opposition to the Brazilian proposal per se, and, indeed, attracted by the idea that it might bring Cuba back into relations with Latin America, Thompson clearly viewed it as a longer term scheme which might not repeat not meet the immediate USA objective of achieving early international inspection of Cuban territory.

7. I did not repeat not have time to explore these ideas more fully with Thompson but it seems clear that there is a good deal of thinking going on here and in New York about the possibilities of finding a way out of any stalemate that Castro's intransigence might be able to impose, while at the same time preserving a degree of freedom of action for USA to pursue its anti-Castro policies.

Soviet Policy During the Crisis

8. Thompson made a number of interesting points about Soviet policy, including that mentioned above regarding the basic reason for the Soviet decision to withdraw offensive weapons from Cuba. He made it clear in relation to all these points that Western observers could not repeat not, of course, be certain of their analyses of Soviet motives and tactics.

9. However, subject to that caveat, Thompson thought Khrushchev had decided on an uncharacteristically daring gamble to establish offensive capability in Cuba. Thompson was satisfied that a reason for Khrushchev's decision was related to the Soviet posture over Berlin. He had personally obtained from Khrushchev several clear indications that Berlin occupied a central place in Khrushchev's thinking. Khrushchev had said, for instance, that Berlin was the only major issue between USA and USSR, relegating even problems like disarmament to a less critical category. Khrushchev was, moreover, personally involved in the development of Soviet policy on Berlin. He had clearly wished to make progress on this problem but had been at a loss how to proceed. It seemed likely, therefore, that Khrushchev had for some time been building up for a "poker game" with USA in New York at the end of November or beginning of December, in which he would hold some really high cards. A master stroke in Cuba would, of course, provide the basis for this.

10. Thompson assigned a fairly influential role in this decision to the Soviet military. He did not repeat not think that they had advised Khrushchev to take the gamble involved but had more likely pointed out that the policy he wished to pursue (i.e. over Berlin) postulated certain military requirements which USSR could not repeat not fulfil unless some strategic advance such as the establishment of offensive nuclear capacity in Cuba were attained. The net result, therefore, seemed to have been that Khrushchev, in the face of such advice, had decided to take the risk involved. Thompson reflected on the deceptive tactics employed and in this connection drew particular attention to Khrushchev's expressed willingness to delay further action relating to Berlin until after the November elections. He also mentioned the Soviet pretensions that their military assistance to Cuba was purely defensive as another factor.

Implications of Crisis for Soviet Policy

(a) Internal

11. Thompson was not repeat not inclined to take the view that Khrushchev's internal political position was immediately at stake as a result of the setback over Cuba. Although one could not repeat not, of course, be sure, Thompson thought that any internal shake-up as a result of the Cuban crisis would take some time to emerge. However, he thought it was of interest that Voroshilov had been called out of retirement and speculated that part of the purpose was to keep the Soviet military in line.

(b) Intra-Bloc Relationships

12. Thompson thought that the situation would be quite otherwise within the Communist bloc as a whole. Khrushchev's decision to withdraw offensive capacity from Cuba had already brought down the wrath of the Chinese Communists, as indeed, had Soviet line in relation to the Sino-Indian dispute

(c) External Policy Implications

13. As regards relations with the West Thompson thought that the situation was not repeat not yet clear. However, he thought that there would probably be a period of reassessment by Soviet leaders before any serious pressure were applied on the Berlin problem. He was rather inclined to think that the Soviet leadership would prefer to concentrate on broader issues such as disarmament and similar problems, although he remarked that on nuclear testing Soviet tactics had not repeat not yet provided any basis for optimism.

CANADA-UNITED STATES DEFENCE QUESTIONS

I thought it might be useful to summarize the information I received during my conversation with Jim Nutt yesterday.

Acquisition of Nuclear Weapons

2. A memorandum was sent to the Prime Minister on October 26 from the Minister<sup>150</sup> recommending that:

- (1) in the light of developments during the Cuban crisis, a review should be made of the Canadian position on the acquisition of nuclear weapons for Canadian forces in Canada and in Europe
- (2) the basis of the Canadian position should be “a stand-by arrangement” whereby the weapons would be made available to Canadian forces when hostilities appear to be imminent
- (3) the Department of National Defence be requested to determine the precise physical arrangements which would be necessary to bring the weapons into Canada from United States bases, and to make them available for Canadian forces in Europe from United States stockpiles, and the time which would be required to implement such arrangements
- (4) necessary amendments should be made to existing documents which were prepared earlier in consultation with the Department of National Defence.

3. Mr. Nutt was not aware whether the Prime Minister had commented on Mr. Green’s memorandum. He understood that a memorandum recommending the acquisition of nuclear weapons on the basis of the documents worked out earlier was sent to Cabinet by Mr. Harkness.† Mr. Nutt had not seen this memorandum to Cabinet and he was not aware whether it had been discussed by Ministers. As a matter of interest, the file copy of the memorandum to the Prime Minister from Mr. Green has Ross Campbell’s name as drafting officer.

Defence Production Sharing – United States Position at Halifax Meeting

4. A memorandum went forward to the Minister recently summarizing the results of recent discussions in the Panel on the Economic Aspects of the Defence Questions.† The memorandum reviewed the line taken by United States officials at the Halifax meeting. It pointed out that Canadian efforts to obtain clarification of the McNamara directive (and tying our concern to our balance of payments problems) had resulted in an exposition by United States officials of the various areas in which they felt Canada was not fulfilling its defence commitments. In the circumstances, the consensus in the Panel, as recorded in the memorandum to the Minister, was that it would seem inadvisable to make any further approach for the time being to the United States, either at the official or ministerial level, for the purpose of clarifying the McNamara directive. The opinion of the Panel was that there was as yet no evidence that Canada’s special position was being substantially affected as a result of the McNamara directive.

Cuban Crisis – NORAD

5. Jim Nutt’s information was that Cabinet considered on October 23 CINC NORAD’s request, received through military channels, to place the Canadian elements of NORAD in an increased state of readiness. It was agreed to turn down the request.<sup>151</sup> Mr. Harkness then went to the Prime Minister and succeeded in obtaining his consent to comply with CINC NORAD’s request the following day. It appeared also that Ministers considered the United States request to move nuclear weapons to SAC bases in Canada and to disperse United States fighters from the United States to Canadian bases.<sup>152</sup> Ministers were not prepared to grant these requests.

<sup>150</sup> La note en question pourrait être le document 230, bien que la discussion qui suit ne soit pas un résumé très précis du contenu de la note.

The memorandum in question may be document 230, although the discussion below is not a very exact synopsis of that memo’s contents.

6. My impression was that D.L.(1) Division was as much in the dark about developments as we were down here. The information regarding the crisis and United States request relating to NORAD was restricted to relatively few officials in the Department. The view in D.L.(1) is that NORAD procedures for consultations at the political level were not complied with. They think there is nothing wrong with the procedures and tend to explain developments which took place in the light of what appeared to be a deliberate policy decision by the United States not to consult any of its Allies. The Division is reluctant, however, to come to any firm conclusions in this regard because they do not know what transpired when Mr. Merchant saw the Prime Minister in the late afternoon of October 22. It is quite possible, they think, that he may have brought to the Prime Minister's attention the need to place NORAD forces in a state of increased preparedness.<sup>153</sup>

SOVIET POLICY: CUBA, BERLIN, DISARMAMENT

Following is an account of a two and one-half hour interview by the departing UK Ambassador in Moscow with Khrushchev on November 12, checked with UK notes.<sup>154</sup> Gromyko was present during the interview. Khrushchev appeared in good form and in complete command of all the matters he discussed.

2. After giving an account of USSR's growing economic strength and prospects, Khrushchev turned to nuclear tests and disarmament. On nuclear tests he said that his experts had insisted a new scientific method must be tested. This would delay the ending of Soviet tests beyond November 20 but they would be concluded early in December or at any rate before the end of the year. All big nuclear tests had been completed. This meant USSR had completed tests on warheads for all existing rockets and those to be created. Khrushchev assumed that USA and UK testing needs had been met as had those of USSR. A treaty prohibiting tests in three environments could be signed now but USSR would like underground testing included. He suggested that verification of underground tests was possible through the use of black boxes. He was prepared to admit "international personnel of inspectors" to USSR to supervise the functioning of these boxes. Such personnel would be flown to the boxes stationed in USSR in Soviet aircraft. At this point Gromyko interjected that, of course, this would be with certain precautions. Khrushchev continued that he thought this offer went half-way to meeting USA requirements on inspection and he hoped that USA Congress could accept a test ban treaty covering all environments.

3. Disarmament, however, was the big question he said. The West had not repeat not answered Gromyko's proposals and there were no repeat no intermediate problems. (Comment: UK delegation could not repeat not explain this remark further.) In 1955 USSR had advanced proposals against surprise attack involving the inspection of airfields, communications centres, etc. Cuban crisis showed the need for more attention to this question.

4. Khrushchev went on to say that the following questions were ripe for decision:

- (1) NATO-Warsaw Pact agreement
- (2) Taiwan questions
- (3) German question.

5. After brief references to (1) and (2), Khrushchev said German question was the most important. It was necessary to recognize the fact that there were two Germanies. There was no repeat no advantage for either side in the present situation. In Berlin the outstanding point was the stationing of Western troops. Khrushchev said Allied garrisons could stay temporarily in West Berlin but the important thing was to end the concept of a NATO military base and occupation régime. This might be accomplished by placing Western forces under UN flag to give them an international appearance. He did not repeat not mention his previous proposals to place Soviet or Warsaw Pact troops in Western Berlin but did say that the composition of the garrison need not repeat not be a subject of dispute. It was important to achieve agreement soon in order to avoid a collision more dangerous than Cuba. He would prefer Western signatures on a peace treaty but would not repeat not insist. UK Permanent Representative said Sir Frank Roberts did not repeat not have authority to enter into full details concerning Berlin and Khrushchev did not repeat not elaborate on UN function in Berlin. Khrushchev said, in relation to the existence of two Germanies, that a peace treaty would be prepared but he realized he could not repeat not propose the signature of half a peace treaty. His proposals on Germany and Berlin were not repeat not very clear but there was no repeat no element of a threat in his remarks.

6. Referring to Cuba, Khrushchev called it a reasonable compromise. USSR had fulfilled its obligations by withdrawing its rockets and nuclear warheads. USA should now end the blockade and respect Cuban sovereignty, the latter being confirmed in a document with UN authority. There were still Soviet experts in Cuba but they would be withdrawn when the need for their presence was past. Khrushchev was against foreign military bases and stationing troops in foreign countries. He said the Soviet proposals contained no repeat no political or material damage for any country. He reiterated that Cuba was a compromise and an example of peaceful co-existence, but there were still idiots on both sides who did not repeat not understand. When Roberts asked about Soviet bombers in Cuba, Khrushchev replied that the IL28s were obsolete and ready to be scrapped when his marshals suggested they be sent to Cuba in direct response to Kennedy's call-up of 150,000 USA reservists. The bombers were not repeat not a serious issue and USSR had fulfilled all its obligations to President Kennedy. Khrushchev confirmed once again that all nuclear warheads had been withdrawn.

7. In the very brief discussion which followed, Belgian Permanent Representative pointed to the similarities between this conversation and the Spaak-Khrushchev conversation a year ago.<sup>155</sup> I pointed to the new emphasis in this exchange on the closeness of the two sides to war over Cuba, to the absence of a timetable for Berlin from the foreground of discussion and to the attempt to creep forward on nuclear testing. The new element on the black boxes seemed to me to be the prospect for admitting international personnel of inspectors. Norwegian Permanent Representative suggested that Khrushchev's proposals about Western troops in Berlin might bring forth an analogy with the way Western troops had fought in Korea under the UN flag.

8. The concluding intervention was made by French Permanent Representative on the basis of a circular letter sent by French Foreign Office to posts abroad in the light of French prior knowledge of the Roberts-Khrushchev conversation. French Permanent Representative said French Government wanted to underline that the important thing for USSR was that the status of Western forces in West Berlin should be changed and that from the moment such a change in status occurred, we knew enormous consequences would follow. This is what France had always resisted. USSR was trying to hoodwink us. Khrushchev wanted to show that there was neither a winner nor a loser in Cuba but, in fact, USSR had been severely defeated even if USA did not repeat not want to emphasize that defeat. Reading from the concluding paragraph of French despatch, he said that in French view, the suggestion Khrushchev made to Roberts was the very one he had intended to put forward in New York if he had succeeded in establishing his missiles in Cuba. He must, therefore, now expect his proposals to meet with more resistance.

THE CUBAN POSITION – MIKOYAN'S VISIT

In publishing Castro's latest letter November 19 to U Thant<sup>156</sup> the press has been careful not repeat not to draw attention to issue of IL28s. Castro's consent to withdrawal of bombers now referred to as Soviet property would seem to be a result of Soviet pressure to recognize facts of life. His rather defensive denial that Cuba is blocking negotiations for a solution to crisis also suggests USSR has in fact been accusing him of doing just this. Castro perhaps significantly makes no repeat no mention of “five points” in this letter.

2. Castro is doubtlessly in earnest however in his intention to shoot at any planes within range of his anti-aircraft weapons. He would lose prestige with his own troops if he backed down. Moreover Foreign Ministry stated yesterday that all commercial air flights have been cancelled for military reasons. If USSR has kept control of its advanced anti-aircraft missiles this might not repeat not interfere with U2 surveillance.

3. I would imagine Castro’s continued opposition to introduce, albeit in somewhat less than all-embracing form, “unilateral inspection” in two recent letters to Secretary-General<sup>157</sup> is based on an emotional and absolute rejection of anything which would wound dignity or sovereignty of Cuba. On the other hand it is also possible that he may have or thinks he has something to hide. Reliable local reports we have received as well as those published abroad would indicate that Cuba has underground arms storage facilities and defences.

4. It is only logical to relate any Cuban concession to Mikoyan’s prolonged visit here which has prevented his return to Moscow for first his wife’s funeral and now opening meeting of Central Committee of Communist Party. We were told by a junior member of Soviet Embassy (applying for Canadian visas?) that he would probably be leaving by Saturday November 16. The dinner Thursday November 14 given by Soviet Ambassador for Castro and other members of Cuban hierarchy looked like a farewell occasion. Castro’s sharp somewhat admonitory letters to U Thant the same day appeared to be his own violent communiqué to mark end of his conversations with Mikoyan. While publicity about visit has been both spasmodic and sparse with no repeat no indication that talks were being held in a cordial atmosphere it seems the two men held a series of personal talks in Havana, during trips to collective farms, at Veradero Beach and elsewhere.

5. In (any?) event Mikoyan stayed on and press disclosed that he had had long visit with Guevara and then Rodríguez. Sunday night Dorticós gave a return dinner which neither Fidel nor Raúl attended, a fact which newspaper Revolución made very obvious to its readers. To force Castro to soften his stand Mikoyan may have had to show there were teeth behind Soviet smile and to have lobbied with other members of Cuban innermost circle.

6. A refusal to compromise was doubtless popular with young extremists at university and elsewhere whom Castro seems to regard as his real constituents. Castro followers blame Russians for taking away missiles rather than him for letting them in. A children’s ditty making rounds goes “Nikita, you pansy, you do not repeat not take back what you have given away.” The latest poster to go up reads “Together Fidel” and “Cuba is not repeat not the Congo.” The Cubans are now busy holding demonstrations of solidarity with Venezuelan revolution in what is termed the heroic people against tyrant Betancourt; this would not repeat not disclose any intention to mute the revolutionary call in Latin America.

7. On the other hand Fidel may find that he has made a mistake in buying short-term domestic advantages through a policy of intransigence which Cuba has not repeat not the power to maintain thus giving USA a series of diplomatic victories instead of sweeping crisis under carpet as quickly as possible and trying to move back from military field where USA enjoy such overwhelming advantage to political. Even Castro has had to swallow the proud boasts uttered when missiles were still here and admit Cuba cannot repeat not withstand a USA attack.

8. Not repeat not all Cuban leaders appear to share Fidel's death wish and their views combined with USA pressure and Soviet persuasion may force him to make further concessions. Concessions however damage image he has created of superman who could stand up to and trounce USA.

TALKING PAPER

The following is a summary of the Cuban situation as viewed by Washington at 9:00 p.m. last night.

The United States has as yet been unable to obtain satisfactory performance from the U.S.S.R. with regard to the withdrawal of the IL-28 bombers.

Nor have adequate arrangements been made for ground inspection in Cuba and adequate safeguards against the presence and reintroduction of offensive weapons.

Recent reconnaissance has confirmed the presence in Cuba of organized Soviet military units with the most modern field equipment. These cannot be dismissed merely as "Soviet technicians."

Castro has now announced that he intends to fire on United States reconnaissance planes. Continued U.S. reconnaissance is essential action authorized by the OAS resolution.

Since the United States must continue surveillance, there is serious possibility of an incident against which the United States is determined to take retaliatory measures.

Noted. [N. A.] R[obertson]

The situation is fluid and may take one of several courses. The Soviets may act against Castro or in any event may not support him in exchanges that might follow his interference with U.S. reconnaissance. On the other hand, they may provide military support for Castro. The nature of the future U.S. action will naturally depend upon which options the Soviets select.

The continued refusal on the part of the U.S.S.R. to withdraw the IL-28 bombers or active Soviet military participation in action against necessary military surveillance might well require the reestablishment of the quarantine and its extension to petroleum products.

The President intends to make clear to the nation and to the world on Tuesday afternoon the present posture of affairs and to indicate that an early resolution of the remaining problems must be achieved. This approach would, of course, be altered materially if a favourable answer were received from Khrushchev on the IL-28s before the press conference.

The United States expects to be able to count on the full cooperation of its allies in the event it becomes necessary to reimpose the quarantine – with or without an expanded prescribed list – or to take other appropriate action to deal with the situation.

The United States is calling a meeting this week of the Organ of Consultation of the OAS so that we can make a full report on the measures taken under the resolution of October 23 which authorized all appropriate action including the use of armed force.

The U.S. Permanent Representative to NATO will call for a special meeting of the NAC Tuesday afternoon, November 20, to inform his colleagues of the foregoing.

NON-ALIGNED COUNTRIES AND THE LESSONS OF CUBA

I have given some thought to Mr. Smith's suggestion that efforts could be made in due course by Western diplomatic and press means to help governments and people in Latin American and non-aligned countries to attain a just appreciation of the recent Cuban crisis on the grounds that this provides an opportunity for a more realistic assessment of the real nature of Soviet policy by leaders of these countries. In this context I think we should also include the lessons to be drawn from the Chinese attack on India.

2. My tentative conclusion is that Western diplomats would be unwise to press these points in non-aligned countries. There is to start with a natural reluctance to admit miscalculations on the part of the non-aligned leaders and I think it would be unrealistic to expect any early application of these lessons or indeed any modification in that rather vague concept "non-alignment."

3. At the same time there is little doubt that the more intelligent among the neutralists have been giving most serious consideration to both Cuba and the Sino-Indian dispute and I am sure the lessons have not repeat not been lost upon them. No repeat no doubt because of their basic bias in most cases against the West they will resist drawing the natural conclusions as long as possible but I do not repeat not think we would hasten this process by any prodding on our part. I think we are more likely to secure the desired results by letting the neutrals work this out for themselves.

4. Yesterday, for example, the Foreign Minister Dr. Fawzi told me that the lessons to be drawn from Cuba were: (a) the world cannot afford very many more approaches to the brink of the abyss (b) the Russians engaged in a very dangerous game of duplicity, (c) there must be adherence to the rules of International Law. When I suggested that another conclusion was that Cuba had betrayed the non-aligned camp by permitting itself to be a mere pawn in the hands of the Soviet bloc, he simply refused to be drawn into a discussion on this subject.

FLIGHTS TO CUBA BY SOVIET BLOC AIRCRAFT

President Kennedy's announcement late yesterday that the United States naval "quarantine" of Cuba would be lifted immediately<sup>159</sup> introduces a new factor into the problem of overflights and landings in Canada by Soviet bloc aircraft en route to Cuba. We could soon be in a situation – if we are not already in it – where Canada and other NATO countries would be applying more rigorous measures than the United States itself.

2. Two questions would seem to be raised by President Kennedy's announcement:

(a) Whether we should continue to search Soviet bloc aircraft at Canadian airports. The purpose of these searches has been the same as the U.S. naval "quarantine" at sea, i.e., to prevent the introduction of military equipment into Cuba. The legal analogy is not so close in that Canada is legally entitled to search aircraft, whereas the legality of United States action on the high seas was certainly doubtful.

(b) Whether to allow the three Ilyushin 18 aircraft, which Cubana has applied to ferry from Moscow to Havana, to transit and land in Canada en route.

The Question of Search

3. Since the outbreak of the Cuban crisis, and to some extent even before that, the United States Government has urged very strongly both in NATO and bilaterally that its allies do everything possible to prevent or to make it difficult for Soviet bloc aircraft to operate on routes to Cuba. It was in response to a United States request that we deny overflight and transit privileges to all such aircraft that Canada decided to (a) withhold permission for Soviet flights on the grounds that the Soviet Union was not a member of ICAO, and (b) search other flights which for legal reasons could not be prevented.

4. As late as yesterday the United States was continuing to urge this policy on its allies in the NATO Political Advisers Committee. We do not yet know to what extent the United States will modify the line it has been taking as a result of President Kennedy's announcement. Generally speaking, however, the United States has been basing its requests to its allies on the extreme delicacy of the Cuban situation and on the argument that until the Soviet offensive capability had been removed from Cuba, the most rigid precautions were justified. It seems to follow from the United States decision to lift the quarantine that they now believe that this threat to their security has been substantially removed. At all events, NATO members who continue to search aircraft – as many are now doing – could be construed as taking more rigorous measures than the United States itself.

5. To search aircraft of countries with whom we maintain diplomatic relations and common membership in ICAO is an extraordinary measure, even if legal. While we should perhaps avoid a sudden decision to call off the searches, I believe that we should aim to do so at an early date after prior consultation with the United States.

The Three IL-18 Aircraft

6. The Cuban authorities have now provided information which leads to the conclusion that these three aircraft are properly registered Cuban civil aircraft and legally entitled as such to the ICAO privilege of overflying and transiting Canadian territory. Specifically, the Cuban authorities have told us that:

- (a) The aircraft are civil passenger/cargo types.
- (b) They were purchased from Aeroflot and are now the property of Cubana Airlines.
- (c) The aircraft are Cuban-registered under proper authorization of the Cuban authorities and bear Cubana's markings painted on them at the factory.
- (d) The captain and first officer of each aircraft on these proposed flights will be Cuban citizens. The other crew members will be Soviet citizens, who have been authorized by the Cuban aeronautical authorities to assist on these ferry flights because Cuba itself lacks enough qualified personnel to operate this type of aircraft.
- (e) The only passengers carried will be officials and technicians of Cubana Airlines and the only cargo will consist of spares for the aircraft themselves.
- (f) The purpose of the flights is to deliver the three aircraft to Cuba.

The reliability of this information is borne out by a report from Canada House that the British Foreign Office is convinced that the flights are bona fide.

7. If we similarly accept that the aircraft are bona fide Cuban aircraft – and there seems no reason to doubt this – our legal position is clear. We could not refuse overflight and transit privileges without breaching our ICAO obligations.

8. As of yesterday the British Government had decided to allow the aircraft to overfly Britain subject to landing at Preswick where they will be searched. The Belgian Government, although it has not yet reached a final decision, will probably do likewise. The Irish and Icelandic Governments have not made up their minds, but will probably be guided by what the others do.

9. Here again it is not clear whether United States objections to these IL-18 flights have been softened by the President's announcement. I believe, however, that as we have consistently maintained over a considerable period of time that we would not lightly breach our ICAO obligations except in an extreme emergency, we should continue to adhere to this basic line of policy and permit the flights to take place. Prior consultation with the United States would be desirable before reaching this decision and the flights, if permitted, might or might not be searched as circumstances seemed to dictate. As it seems probable that these aircraft will be used on the Prague-Havana route in replacement of Cubana's present Britannias, we might also inform the Cuban Government that while we have no objection to reasonable replacement of equipment on this route, we would not look with favour on any augmentation of regularly scheduled air services between Eastern Europe and Havana if they contemplate sending such flights through Canada.

Recommendations

10. If you agree generally with the course of action proposed above, I recommend that we inform both the Political Advisers Committee of NATO and the United States Government in Washington of our thinking and invite comments. This would meet the need for prior consultation with the United States before taking a final decision. It should, however, be made clear, especially to the United States authorities, that we believe our legal obligations must take precedence in the situation which now exists as a result of President Kennedy's announcement.<sup>160</sup>

11. Incidentally, the USA Embassy has just informed us that they are discontinuing the "pre-clearance" procedure instituted some time ago to facilitate passage through the quarantine of ships bound for Cuba. This seems to indicate that they are moving rapidly to dismantle all quarantine measures.

12. A telegram to Washington and NATO Paris is attached for your signature, if you approve.<sup>161</sup>

SOVIET MOTIVES IN PUTTING MISSILES IN CUBA

I dictated my reference telegrams hastily right after Soviet agreement to withdraw missiles from Cuba, because I had been impressed by inadequacy and potential danger of some preliminary assessments I had heard here from some representatives of neutral countries and one or two of our lesser European allies, about what had really happened and why, and what implications could be expected for future. I thought you might find it useful to have my assessment from here quickly. Since then there have been a number of developments in various parts of world and a number of important speeches and other remarks in Moscow by Soviet leaders. None of these have given me reason to change the views I expressed in my reference telegrams. These now seem to be shared by my most important Western and neutral colleagues.

2. In particular it seems to me virtually certain that on question of motives Khrushchev had hoped that he would achieve in good time a strategic breakthrough which would make possible a diplomatic showdown with USA on Berlin and possibly at same time on other questions, in which Americans would have to take decision directly under the threat of a greatly enhanced Soviet strategic thermonuclear capacity against USA itself. I think that Khrushchev hoped and expected that in circumstances USA would back down, with some face-saving formula for Kennedy. This is compatible with his expectation in 1961 that a thermonuclear threat against our European allies would cause them to force a NATO backdown, and with what he had told Kroll in September this year.<sup>162</sup> I think it would be naïve to expect that if, as he hoped, Khrushchev had actually secured such a backdown, he would not repeat not have gone on to use this thermonuclear threat from time to time in future for other advances. His motive in seeking strategic breakthrough was probably not repeat not limited to Berlin. (I suspect Khrushchev regarded breakthrough as desirable “pour toutes fins utiles”). But attributing to Khrushchev any lesser motive than Berlin showdown seems to me wrong and dangerously optimistic. While Khrushchev’s primary target was Berlin (and therefore breakdown in NATO cohesion in general and particularly in confidence in Anglo-Saxons among public opinion of FGR), there would have been other objectives later on. It seems to me unwise and unsafe to interpret this Cuban ploy in any minor or too comfortable way.

3. On contrary, it is possible to build a thesis more disquietening than that which I have been putting forward. As you know I was impressed and disturbed last spring and summer by what I considered dangerous irresponsibility of charges by Malinowski and others (including at one stage Khrushchev himself) that USA was planning a preventive war and that Kennedy himself had explicitly indicated that USA might adopt such policy.<sup>163</sup> This talk, when coupled with fact that type of first generation strategic rockets installed in Cuba were entirely vulnerable to easy attack and would thus be of no repeat no conceivable military use except as first strike weapons, fired before Americans could destroy them, could have sinister implications. Personally I do not repeat not believe that Khrushchev himself has envisaged, even for distant future, launching of preventive war. As you know last spring I tended to explain Malinowski’s charges of American preventive war plans in terms of Soviet Defence Ministry’s desire to maintain and even increase their budget in face of pressure on Soviet resources for improvement of agriculture and chemical industry. I still think this interpretation probably correct, but it is not repeat not inconceivable that some military men, possibly including Malinowski, may have envisaged eventual desirability in certain circumstances of launching first strike. On other hand under present circumstances at least I do not repeat not believe Soviet military leadership is by any means sufficiently influential to swing Soviet Government policy on such basic issues.

4. It also seems to me wrong to interpret Cuban gambit, as some circles in West and a few representatives in Moscow (e.g. notably at first Swedish Ambassador) suggested here, as meaning that Khrushchev was reluctantly pushed into dangerous Cuban-missile base adventure by Red Army leadership. Doubtless he must have had some encouragement or acquiescence from military leaders, but in my judgement whole thing is directly in line with Khrushchev's own previously demonstrated psychology, and his propensity to seek advances by threats.

5. I also see no repeat no evidence of a forward "war party" inside Soviet leadership. Existence of an element more cautious than Khrushchev, and more ready to concentrate on domestic development of the economy than on foreign policy adventures, is in my judgement more likely.

6. If, as I would think probable in due course (but perhaps not repeat not too quickly since this would imply a loss of face for the régime itself) there is some reshuffling in personnel in Headquarters, this may imply something about the sort of advice given to Khrushchev. But if as I think almost certain Khrushchev keeps his own position, this will not repeat not imply those who lose power were primarily responsible for gamble, but merely that they are serving the role of scapegoat, and perhaps also that in view of advice given during the crisis about terms on which a retreat would be acceptable, their continuation in top positions could prove embarrassing or dangerous. Moreover we have passed through a time in which men are tested, and it would seem normal that in due course revelations thus afforded should have influence on selection of individuals for continuation in or promotion to key posts. Soviet diplomats and others who contributed to false Soviet assessment of probable psychological reactions of President Kennedy and USA Administration and public may now suffer some loss of confidence: but here too I think the main mistake was Khrushchev's own; as was his error in estimating reaction to his threats against our European allies in 1961.

CASTRO AND THE MIKOYAN VISIT

The extended sojourn of Anastas Mikoyan in Cuba leads me to suspect that his objectives may be somewhat broader than were at first generally imagined. It has been my supposition that the Russian Vice-Premier's mission was probably a three-fold one. First, there was the need to ensure that the agreement with the United States over Cuba was carried out to the extent that Moscow wished to see it implemented and to ensure that Cuba would not throw up any roadblock in this regard; second, there was the desire to restore some of Castro's lost prestige and soothe his aggrieved feelings by sending a high-ranking emissary to Havana to explain Soviet policy in the crisis; and, third, there was the necessity of demonstrating continued support for as well as of shoring-up a faltering satellite, particularly after the stresses and strains of weeks of remaining on a war footing, by providing new economic aid. However, four weeks should have provided ample time to complete these tasks.

2. Now that the United States has placed limits on the extent of Soviet penetration in the hemisphere that it is prepared to accept and trammelled, or at least put restraints on, the degree to which the Soviet Union can employ Cuba as a pawn in the cold war, the Russians will presumably over the next few months have to take a hard look at their policy vis-à-vis Cuba. Indeed, they may well be going through a process often termed in such a situation as “agonizing reappraisal.” It is surely not unreasonable to expect that in the meantime they would wish to ensure that Castro cannot get them involved in future difficulties or confrontations with the Americans not of their own choosing. One can, for example, hardly believe that Moscow welcomes the continuing reiteration in the press and on the radio of Castro’s threat to shoot down any United States plane that comes within reach of Cuban anti-aircraft fire.

3. The Soviet reaction to Fidel Castro’s extreme demands, as contained in his so-called Five Points, has hardly been over-enthusiastic. Mikoyan, while paying lip-service to this document, has talked of these points here as a useful basis for peace in the Caribbean but given no indication that the U.S.S.R. stands solidly behind the demands. At the same time the Soviet Union has to strike a nice balance between satisfying minimum United States requirements and leaving its Cuban protégé in too exposed a position.

4. The Russians face a real problem in dealing with Cuba since two facets of the Revolution, its Messianic drive for hemispheric revolution and its militant anti-Americanism, are almost bound to lead to further trouble with Washington if not kept in check. And yet these very same characteristics have in the past year become almost the essential dynamic forces of the Revolution, seemingly more important than the construction of a viable Marxist-Leninist society on the island which, judging by Cuban statements, is a distant future goal rather than a current policy calling for full and undivided attention. Indeed, in long-range terms I believe that unless the Cubans can be persuaded to give up the active pursuit of these two policies, the Revolution faces bleak prospects. Only as a neutralized Communist state in the Caribbean does it seem to me that the Revolution stands any chance of survival. Otherwise the United States cannot really be expected to tolerate its existence indefinitely and desist from working towards its ultimate downfall. The likelihood of Castro recognizing this and playing under such ground rules does not seem bright and, given the manner in which these policies have become the fuel with which the Revolution functions and almost the principal purpose of its being, one can only be pessimistic of such a compromise solution.

5. Nevertheless to some extent the Cuban cat has to be belled. From the Russian standpoint Castro must at least learn some of the realities of international life and cease to view the world solely through a Havana periscope. Ideally, I suppose the Russians would like to reorganize the Cuban Government to effect a form of collective leadership that was in the making until the Escalante affair this Spring.<sup>164</sup> Since then, however, all the evidence suggests that Castro has regained his old position of dominance. Despite the importance of old Communists in many fields, the new Communists – and specifically among the close associates of Fidel Castro – hold the real reins of domestic power, the army, the militia, and the security police. One hears little today of the National Directorate of the O.R.I., which was designed to be the political governing body of the country, or of the foundation of the United Party. The ruling circle seems to have boiled down to a group of about six or seven men in which the orthodox Communists are a distinct minority (the Castro brothers, Guevara, Dorticós, Aragones, Rodríguez, and perhaps still Blas Roca), with the Maximum Leader very much the final decision-maker. The crisis has only served to bring this into sharper focus. While the Russians possess the economic thumbscrews necessary to bring pressure on Castro, there is a danger that in so doing the Cuban investment could blow up in their faces. The stick has presumably to be exercised judiciously and intermixed with offer of a carrot. A forced reorganization of the Government would not be an easy operation even though some members of the hierarchy might not be averse to an enlargement of the power base in Cuba.

6. The other alternative is perhaps a process of indirect undercutting of Castro's leadership by a combination of persuasion and straight talk to those around him. There is some indication that this may be going on, from the individual discussions which Mikoyan has recently been holding with Guevara, Rodríguez and Aragones at a time when the press has made no mention of direct Castro-Mikoyan talks and created the impression that Castro is not altogether on good speaking terms with the Soviet leader. The same thought was also put to us recently by a Foreign Ministry official in an off-the-record remark. My Yugoslav colleague is of the opinion that the Russians are determined to re-educate the Cubans to the need to think in world terms in framing their policy as well as the need to follow the Russian line on peaceful co-existence, rather than to emulate the bulldozer tactics of Peking. To these ends he believes that Mikoyan is prepared to remain in Havana as long as is necessary.

7. For his part Castro obviously is having to do some deep brooding (he now apparently is spending much of his time at the University, even sleeping there, in this frame of mind) if not thinking. He has to face up to the fact that the Russians have clearly demonstrated that they are not prepared to engage in a global war over Cuba. His horizons are no longer unlimited. Any wild dreams he harboured of bringing the United States to its knees or of igniting a hemispheric fire have been pulled up short. He has a nation still almost fully mobilized for a threat that, if not non-existent, is certainly not imminent, and yet must find a justification for returning to some semblance of normality. There are signs that the food situation is becoming more pinched and that sectors of the economy are feeling the effects of the crisis. Harvesting of the country's main resource, sugar, is approaching. Castro must, therefore, shortly come to some modus vivendi with his patron unless he is bent on suicide. And, politically, he still no doubt hopes to obtain some concession from the Russians which he can use to show the Cuban population that he still calls the tune on Cuban affairs.

8. For the moment Castro has not come to terms with Mikoyan. Indeed, the rather hasty denial this week of an A.P. story apparently obtained from reasonably reliable sources in the Ministry of Industries that a new economic agreement was about to be signed<sup>165</sup> suggests that he is most anxious not to give the impression to the Cuban public that he is being bought off. Some ground has admittedly been gained by Mikoyan, as in the acceptance of the removal of the IL-28's for which there is some reason to believe that these planes had been consigned to Cuba by the Russians, even though they in turn may have been making the most of the point as a bargaining counter with the Americans. Castro retains one very important trump card in any negotiations with Mikoyan and that is the knowledge that without Castro at the helm, at least nominally, the Cuban Revolution would at this time stumble if not collapse.<sup>166</sup>

CUBA AND MIKOYAN VISIT

The three and a half weeks' visit of Mikoyan to Cuba ended today without any communiqué having been issued. Instead both sides made statements separately, Mikoyan's in form of a radio and TV address last night,<sup>167</sup> and Cuba's in a declaration published in this morning's press<sup>168</sup> and described as their answer to President Kennedy's press conference November 20.<sup>169</sup>

2. Mikoyan's address announced as "a few farewell words to the Cuban people" was only carried on one of the two TV channels and without benefit of any Cuban leaders present. Technically it was an unhappy performance with Mikoyan and his interpreter repeatedly speaking in unison. The statement itself was not repeat not of a sort to fire Cuban revolutionaries. There was a judicious mixture of praise for revolution, comments on difficulties of creating a Communist society, promises of Soviet support for Cuba and (reminder of?) need to avoid global warfare. At one point he seemed to be suggesting that in Cuban-Soviet partnership, the Cubans must heed the words of Khrushchev. There were also indirect references to collective leadership and while due respect was paid to Fidel Castro his name was frequently linked to Cuban leadership in general.

3. The Cuban statement was drawn up at a joint meeting of National Directorate, ORI and Council of Ministers with stated purpose of informing Cuban people and world of position of both party and government on crisis. This is first time for many months that ORI has been formally listed as taking part in a policy decision and indeed its first public appearance since crisis began. The re-emergence of party organization in this manner even though Castro is its Secretary-General may indicate that Mikoyan has succeeded in some measure in clipping the wings of its leaders.

4. First new point in statement is a further elucidation of Cuba's stand on inspection. In place of its former rejection of inspection Cuba now asserts it will not repeat not accept UN inspection unless USA agrees to inspection on its territory in Puerto Rico and in other locations training camps for mercenaries spies saboteurs and terrorists centres of subversion and bases for pirate ships [sic]. Although Cubans have found a formula other than outright objection by (raising?) such conditions' net effect is tantamount to continued rejection. In this connection it is alleged also that at no repeat no time did Cuba offer its territory for verification of disarmament and withdrawal of Soviet offensive weapons. USSR had complied with its part of agreement in this regard and Kennedy was employing verification as a pretext for not repeat not completing his part and insisting on maintaining a provocative and aggressive policy against Cuba. While catalogue of America's sins is repeated, the threat to fire on USA planes over-flying Cuba contained in two letters to Secretary-General is notably absent.<sup>170</sup>

5. The second new point is acceptance of Moscow line, albeit with some reservations, on peaceful coexistence. Cuba now believes in possibility of avoiding war and that war is not repeat not inevitable. The statement also implicitly recognizes that immediate danger of war between Cuba and USA has declined. This also is being translated into action by demonstration of militia unit which has been going on over week-end and elimination from radio and TV of propaganda piece on the theme of a nation at war ready to repel invaders.

6. There is of course a reiteration of five points which are said to be indispensable for a final solution of crisis plus a further demand that means must be found for effective control of USA activity covered by these five points. Mikoyan's rather lukewarm repetition of his remarks (at university?) that these five points represent logical programme for peace in Caribbean which USSR supports as just does not repeat not suggest Russians consider presence as essential element in resolving crisis.

7. While reaffirming Marxist-Leninist direction of revolution in Cuba statement is silent on the question of its relation with USSR. It would seem that ties of friendship have been strained even though partnership continues.

POLISH DEPUTY MINISTER FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS ON CUBA

I had an interesting talk on Cuba last night with Deputy Minister Winiewicz, Vice-Chairman of the Polish Delegation, at a private reception. A journalist in Poznan before the war, Mr. Winiewicz was Ambassador in Washington from 1947 to 1955 at which time he took up his present position in Warsaw. There was only one other person who shared in the conversation last night, our host, Mr. Price Erichsen-Brown, our Consul in New York. Mr. Winiewicz whom Mr. Erichsen-Brown and myself knew while we were in Warsaw felt, I think, that he could talk fairly freely.

2. I asked him what he thought could be done at the present time in relation to the Cuban problem and particularly whether he felt that a three-nation setup along the line of the International Commission in Indochina could not be envisaged as a mediation team and perhaps inspection unit in Cuba. Mr. Winiewicz did not seem attracted by the idea. He said that at the present time he was convinced from his talks with the Cubans here in New York that they were craving for the initiation of conversations with the Americans. He claimed that the Cubans were almost desperate for some form of direct dialogue with Washington. He said that as far as the Poles were concerned, they were encouraging this trend and were desirous of being helpful in the context of their relations with the United States, the pattern of which they were very anxious to preserve. He said that when Foreign Minister Rapacki had been invited to pay a visit to Cuba last summer, he was rather concerned about the reaction that such a visit might cause in the United States. The Poles did not want their relations with the Americans to suffer from what might appear as an effort to get closer ties with Cuba. Mr. Rapacki decided to accept the invitation all the same. From Mr. Winiewicz' comment the implication was that there were some pressing problems in Cuba concerning relations between Polish experts and technicians there and the Cubans. Mr. Rapacki spent seven days in Cuba in July. Mr. Winiewicz claims that Mr. Rapacki's stay had a restraining effect and that the Cuban propaganda campaign against the United States slowed down afterwards.

3. I asked Mr. Winiewicz if Poland had many experts and technicians in Cuba. He said that they had had more than they have now. There had been conflicts between some of the Polish technicians and the Cubans, particularly in the field of fisheries. He said that because some Polish advisers wore holy medals and attended Mass they were considered by the Cubans as counter-revolutionaries. The situation apparently came to a head and the Polish advisers were withdrawn at least as far as fishing operations were concerned. Mr. Winiewicz said that now they had only mining technicians in Cuba.

4. On the question of the Cuban fishing port which is being built by the Soviets now, he said that the construction of the port had been open to any nation on the basis of bids. In fact the Japanese bid had been accepted by the Cuban Government. However, under pressure from Washington the Japanese had later withdrawn their offer. Castro then turned to socialist countries and sounded out Poland. Poland could not afford to finance the undertaking as it was already involved in the building of a harbour in Cyprus. Eventually the Soviet Union had decided to take over the project.

5. I said I imagined it must not be too easy to act as adviser to the Cubans as they appear to be a somewhat undisciplined lot. Mr. Winiewicz said that it was not so much that as a case of a revolutionary zeal. He compared the Cubans to the Chinese in this respect. Throughout the conversation, in fact, he made reference to the Chinese and the Cubans as the somewhat unruly immature sectors of the socialist world. He made it clear that Poland was siding with Soviet Russia in this conflict. At one time, for instance, he referred to a visit made by the President of Poland, Mr. Zawacki, to Peking a year or more ago. The latter had inquired when he could call on Mao Tse-tung. One morning he was awakened at 4:00 a.m. and told that the Chinese leader would see him in an hour's time, that is at 5:00 a.m. The Polish President was offended and declined politely the appointment. Later on he was offered another more convenient time with enough notice.

6. Mr. Winiewicz said that in the course of his talks with the Cubans and through other information sources, he was told that there are two countries in America which the Cubans would consider as being acceptable in any mediation job with the United States. They were, in this order, Brazil and Canada. When I said that Canada's selection surprised me a little in view of our membership in NATO, he said that the Cubans were, of course, aware of that but that nonetheless they placed a high trust in Canada's objectivity, disinterestedness and devotion to peace. However, in the present conflict between the United States and the U.S.S.R. over Cuba he was of the opinion there was nothing much the secondary powers could do. He felt that the leading countries of the world towered so high above the others that they alone had the means to prevent a situation such as the Cuban one from quickly degenerating into war.

7. Mr. Winiewicz on the whole remains confident that the United States and the U.S.S.R. will work out their differences and that relations between East and West are bound to be normalized over a period of years. He expressed himself clearly in favour of not allowing the Chinese or the Cubans to interfere in any process of rapprochement between the Soviet world and the West, particularly between the U.S.S.R. and the U.S.

CONVERSATION WITH KHRUSHCHEV: ROCKETRY AND SOVIET MOTIVES ON CUBA-BERLIN AND DISARMAMENT

At various points in my long conversation with him Wednesday morning Khrushchev spoke of rockets in terms which I think throw some light on his motivation, and his tactical and strategic thinking regarding his actions on Cuba, Berlin, and disarmament.

2. Khrushchev said he had put rockets into Cuba as a deterrent. He did not repeat not explicitly qualify this merely as defence against American attack on Cuba (as he had done with Sir Frank Roberts, to my mind so unconvincingly.<sup>171</sup> On contrary Khrushchev said that since Americans had got so upset about deployment of rockets in Cuba, he had agreed to withdraw them, because “it is not repeat not really a matter of much importance to me just where our rockets are located.” Khrushchev immediately developed this theme by claiming that he had plenty of submarines which could fire Polaris type missiles against USA, and also had plenty of ICBMs in Russia which could reach USA. Khrushchev said that problem of redeployment therefore did not repeat not seriously matter from his point of view.

3. Khrushchev’s remarks about strategic irrelevance of geographic location of IRBMs and MRBMs are I think obviously untrue at present in view of Soviet paucity of nuclear missile firing submarines and of ICBMs. But I did not repeat not think it necessary to challenge Khrushchev on this point, since probable effect if any of such challenge would merely have been to reinforce his inclination to press ahead with buildup of more Polaris type missiles, nuclear submarines and ICBMs. However I thought Khrushchev’s remarks on this subject instructive, as tending to reveal his realistic concept of the indivisibility of Soviet deterrent capacity, especially when considered in conjunction with Khrushchev’s remarks on a different point in conversation (reported in paragraph 3 of my telegram 863 November 28)<sup>172</sup> about his local tactical and strategic superiority in region around Berlin, which would make it possible for USSR to take unilateral action there which would place squarely on West onus of choosing between acquiescence in Soviet fait accompli or escalation to major hostilities and probably to global nuclear war.

4. To my mind this conversation tended to confirm the line of analysis of Khrushchev’s motives in Cuban plot which I suggested in my telegrams 778 October 28 and 785 October 30.

5. Also relevant is Khrushchev’s statement to me, mentioned in my telegram 863 November 28 (paragraph 3 (b)), that for practical purposes no repeat no disarmament agreement could be expected prior to settlement of Berlin problem. Khrushchev immediately added that disarmament and Berlin questions were quite distinct, but that they nevertheless were related in time because in practice no repeat no man could be expected to disarm if he anticipates that he may have to fight. “It is for this reason that Berlin problem must inevitably be settled by agreement first.”<sup>173</sup>

6. I commented to Khrushchev on this that in my opinion prior agreement on and partial implementation of disarmament would remove danger of upsetting strategic balance, and thus would enormously facilitate for both sides mutual concessions and agreement on problem of Berlin, of peace treaties with Germany or Germanies.

7. But comment I wish to make in this message is that Khrushchev’s statement that disarmament is impossible prior to Berlin settlement seems to me to suggest that he is still toying with idea that he can achieve Berlin settlement by threat of unilateral action backed up by sufficiently strong military deterrent force. It seems to me probable that it is Khrushchev’s continued adherence to this earlier concept which goes far to explain his relative disinterest in getting disarmament agreement first.

8. If there is anything in this line of analysis, it seems to be possible that if only we could somehow disabuse Khrushchev of idea that he can somehow get Western backdown on Berlin by threat of force, then once this idea was genuinely abandoned Khrushchev might be much

CUBA ON THE EVE OF CHRISTMAS

As the second Socialist Christmas in Cuba draws nigh, it may be useful to take a general look at the state of the country and the way in which it has emerged so far from the recent crisis. Such an assessment must inevitably be tentative at this stage – some views more sensed than based on hard fact – for all the implications of the events set in motion in late October, but still not yet fully unfolded, are far from clear.

2. The over-all impression one gains at the moment is of a rudderless vessel drifting in a becalmed sea, drifting for lack of any political direction from the top and without any readily available chart to enable it to get back on course. The crisis itself was obviously a traumatic experience for the revolutionary leadership. Cuba became the centre of an East-West controversy but yet the subsequent decisions were taken largely without the benefit of Cuban participation. Much to the chagrin of Castro, the settlement of the immediate crisis created by the introduction of Soviet offensive weapons on the island became the subject of negotiations between Moscow and Washington. To be sure, Castro attempted to inject himself into the picture with his intransigent stand on on-site inspection, with his Five Points, and with his maintenance of a state of “war alert” long after any danger of military action by the United States had passed. Nor have these forays on his part produced any tangible results to date, and if the crisis runs down to the point where there is a final stand-off between the two major powers, with the “no invasion” pledge set aside and air reconnaissance continued in the absence of adequate verification and safeguards on the weapons issue, the clock will then have been turned back for Castro, leaving him in a more exposed position. The Cuban Government may well face increased diplomatic and economic pressures from the United States at a time when the Soviet ability to underwrite the political future of the Revolution has been sharply circumscribed. Moreover, Castro’s own ability to control the situation has been reduced by lines drawn as a consequence of the crisis. For the nonce, at any rate, he seems uncertain of what course to adopt and is keeping his own counsel.

3. Added to this are indications that certain political manoeuvrings are going on behind the scenes. Whether they stem from Soviet pressures to place some limitations on the Maximum Leader’s freedom of action, or whether the Fidelista Communist group is seizing the opportunity to consolidate its position among the power elite of the Revolution, or whether dissatisfaction, accompanied by some disillusionment, in ruling circles is bringing about a reorganization of the Government, or whether again Castro is simply brooding while he decides what changes he would like to make in his court, one cannot say with any confidence at present. Suffice it, however, that something appears to be going on.

After Cuba this sh[ould] not appear too difficult. [Auteur inconnu/Author unknown]

4. Fidel Castro himself has not spoken to his people since he took to the air just prior to the arrival of Mikoyan. This is six weeks ago, an unusually long period of silence on his part for a nation used to hearing from him regularly. Furthermore, since he appeared last in public almost two weeks ago at the funeral of the air crash victims, he has been out of the public view. Even the press has been silent about his activities. Indeed, we seem almost to be going through a period somewhat similar to that of the political in-fighting prior to the demise of Anibal Escalante this spring. Rumours are naturally beginning to pile on top of one another. He is said to be back in the Sierra Maestra; he has been in an automobile accident; he is making a grass-roots tour of the country. The net effect, however, when the personification of the Revolution drops out of sight, whereas his is customarily an ubiquitous presence, is to create uncertainty and despondency. The dynamism has temporarily gone out of the Cuban body politic and the country does not know in what direction it should turn. Ergo listlessness prevails.

5. In my view Castro blundered when he declined so strongly to go along with any sort of United Nations inspection. Admittedly by adopting a firm stand on this matter and by bringing out his Five-Point programme so closely on the heels of the Kennedy-Khrushchev exchange of letters, he recaptured a measure of initiative and regained some lost prestige to the extent that he was able to reassure his supporters and to convince the people that he was not a complete puppet of the Kremlin. Nevertheless, in so doing he sacrificed potential long-term gains for a short-term advantage. Through the acceptance of inspection, which he could readily have trammelled and made considerably less than effective in practice, he could have transferred the Cuban issue from the bilateral network on which it was being dealt to the multilateral United Nations forum. Here he could have muddied the waters more successfully and employed the resolution of the offensive weapons question to extract some political benefits. In this atmosphere he could have counted on a more congenial audience among the large block of non-aligned states and, after all, once his ability to commit the USSR to engage in nuclear war to preserve his régime was weakened there was all the more need to secure some political guarantee, however limited, from the United States. This the Americans might have found embarrassing not to accept at least in part in the world organization.

6. Instead he played the role of the petulant child. He laid down conditions and made demands that he did not have the power to back up. Indeed, if it turns out that he finally comes out of the crisis empty-handed politically, his tactics would seem to have been counter-productive. His failure to agree in some degree to cooperate with the United Nations may well have antagonized sections of neutral opinion. The need to demobilize quietly and without having explained the whys and wherefores of the whole operation has already left the Cuban people with a certain feeling of wasted purpose, particularly after the exhilaration created by the national response to his patriotic appeals at the time the crisis began. If, on top of this, his quinque-partite programme also gets nowhere, he again faces the charge of having failed to have achieved anything. That the Cuban authorities may be beginning to realize this was suggested to me when, in a conversation the other day with the Foreign Minister on the general subject of the crisis, Dr. Roa said somewhat plaintively at one point that if only the Americans would agree to discuss the future of Guantanamo this would be considered satisfactory in lieu of the immediate return of the base.

7. There is little doubt that Castro has lost prestige domestically and is in danger of losing more as the months go by, if he no longer appears to be able to dominate the scene and can offer no more than a further round of belt-tightening. At the same time, one should appreciate that to some extent he has been able to lay the public blame at the door of the Soviet Union. Moreover, he so towers above other figures in the Government that it is highly doubtful if the Revolution could carry on without him. A stray bullet could, I suspect, still change the whole course of Cuban history. While there would probably be little aversion on the part of Fidelistas, and certainly not on the part of the old-line Communists, to see a broadening of the power base, there is general recognition within both groups of the essential need to have Castro serve as the front man.

8. That the crisis has taken additional starch out of the waning enthusiasm for the Revolution among the Cuban people seems apparent. As far as those who have opposed the régime in the past are concerned, this is not too important since recent events have only confirmed their beliefs. At the other extreme, the Government supporters probably remain for the present staunchly behind the régime even though there are indications from some private conversations we have had that at least members of the intelligentsia now entertain doubts. Essentially, however, this group cannot afford to relax their support very far, since the fall of the Government would spell the end for them. In the middle, where lies the vast majority of the population, passive, generally apolitical, and thinking largely in terms of the necessities of life, there has been underlying unhappiness for a long time. The bulk of such people want to enjoy their life peacefully and without regimentation. In broad terms, they care little about ideological issues or the complexion of the Government as long as it provides the means of obtaining three square meals a day and does not enter into their lives too deeply. Their dissatisfaction stems largely from the stomach rather than from the head, and it is dangerous to equate discontent of this type with anything constituting real opposition. Their morale has, I think, suffered a further drop from the crisis. One reflection of this is the way in which many members of the Committees for the Defence of the Revolution appear to have become less assiduous in carrying out their duties. There are also some signs that people are beginning to reason a little more about the defects of the Government. For the first time I see the glimmerings of this change but it is not something I would be prepared to document just yet.

9. At bottom, the economic situation is still the Achilles' heel of the Government. The crisis cannot but have had adverse effects in this regard even though in the first flush of the call to arms there was a special crisis effort put into economic operations with, for instance, absenteeism in particular declining temporarily. There have, however, been not only the manifold dislocations of mobilization but the disruption of the normal supply channels to the island. A member of the Inspection Service of the Ministry of External Commerce told me this week that almost no food had entered Cuba since the crisis began. A two-month gap in these supply lines from the Communist Bloc is going to be hard to repair without a major effort on the part of the Soviet Union, even granting the fact that good reserves of some staples such as wheat are reportedly on hand. The forthcoming months are likely to show increasing strains in the economic field.

10. The Government is undoubtedly conscious of this, and particularly its effect on the public at the yuletide season. This is evident from the efforts currently being made for a sort of organized gaiety for this period. Increased rationing arrangements have been instituted for Christmas in an endeavour to improve, or give the appearance of improving, the food situation during the holidays. However, in the case of the beef ration it appears to be essentially a question of doing without one week in order to have extra the next week. Moreover, the additional quantities of turkey, chicken and pork promised by the Government are somewhat indefinite. No specific amounts have been mentioned and it is doubtful if there is sufficient supplies of these foods on hand or if small farmers can be persuaded to cooperate at the low official purchase prices so that the added rations can be provided on a nationwide basis. Even assuming the Government is able to place more in the larders for Christmas, it is likely to be at the expense of normal rations in January and February. Knowing the Cuban fondness for the pastime of dancing, the Government also appears to be intent on providing many outlets for this activity, even including impromptu street affairs.

11. Unless there is some dramatic breakthrough on the international political front for Cuba the prospect would seem to be gloomy at best. But this need not necessarily mean the end for the Government. Several times in the past I have commented on the absence of any alternative to Castro in Cuba. This is still true today. There is nothing to fill the vacuum resulting from Castro's loss of prestige and popularity. No leader is on hand, no organization, and no programme around which people who wanted a change might group themselves. The sporadic and limited counter-revolutionary activity which has occurred throughout the year has, since the crisis began, almost disappeared. Also, given the resources which the Government possesses for enforcing its will, as well as the means of ferreting out potential opponents, active opposition, if such existed in any real sense of the word, would have difficulty in gathering momentum.

12. There is another fundamental factor, too. Cubans are wont to tell you in the same breath that they have never concerned themselves with the colour of the government-of-the-day in the past and complain about what they now have, and see no relationship between the two points. While admittedly there are many exceptions, the average Cuban is not cut from the cloth from which freedom-fighters are made. He essentially hopes that somebody, preferably Uncle Sam, or something, will eventually bail him out. In the meantime he is prepared to grumble but wait it out. Conditions exist in Cuba today which could produce an ultimate change of government and the normal safety valve of emigration has for the present been removed. However, unless there is a crack at the top, a revolt within the officer corps of the Army, or external circumstances bring about a change, conditions in Cuba will have to deteriorate further before the seeds of opposition sprout on the potentially fertile ground here.

EDUCATIONAL ASSISTANCE TO FRENCH-SPEAKING AFRICAN STATES

The External Aid Office in co-operation with this Department is currently engaged in planning allocations for the 1962-63 fiscal year under the Canadian Programme of Educational Assistance to French-Speaking States of Africa. In accordance with your instructions sent from Geneva† these plans are based on the original annual amount of $300,000 decided upon by the Government last year.

2. It is considered that an important factor for the success of this scheme is to consult closely regarding its operation with the extra-governmental bodies in Canada on which the Government must rely for assistance. As you know at a meeting held last July the Advisory Committee established to assist in the programme's development agreed to set up a working group drawn from organizations represented on the main committee to undertake preparatory work for the committee as circumstances required. The working group in question was to consist of appropriate representatives of Federal Government Departments, of Provincial Governments with particular emphasis on the Province of Quebec, of representatives of the Canadian universities (through the Canadian Universities Foundation) and of representatives of Canadian French language educational organizations. As neither this group nor the main committee have been called together since last July, and as plans for the programme's operation for the next fiscal year are now under way, it is the intention to call an early meeting of the smaller working group in order to inform them of progress so far achieved and to consult with them regarding plans for the future. This meeting of the working group could be followed at a later date by a plenary meeting of the Advisory Committee.

3. As you know, Mr. Marcel Cadieux who is Chairman of the Advisory Committee and who has been most closely associated with the programme at the Under-Secretary level, will be absent from Ottawa from April 19 to July 9 while attending meetings of the International Law Commission in Geneva. As his presence at meetings of both the working group and the Advisory Committee is considered essential, plans have been made to convene the working group in Ottawa on Wednesday, April 11 before Mr. Cadieux's departure. The principal reasons for calling such a meeting are as follows:

(a) To elicit the goodwill and co-operation of educational bodies and provincial governments (especially those of Quebec) whose co-operation is required for the successful execution of the programme. In order to achieve this co-operation it is considered important to keep these groups fully informed of progress and to solicit their advice and assistance for future projects relating to the programme.

(b) To determine how best to apply the amount of $300,000 per year to the needs and requests of receiving countries consistent with relevant practical and political considerations.

4. If the question of increasing the size of the programme and of seeking additional funds for its extension is raised by members of the working group, they could be informed that consideration of this possibility should be postponed until such time as the existing programme is implemented to the full and its value can be properly assessed.

5. In placing proposals before the working group for the programme's operation during the next fiscal year, it will be necessary to point out that a portion of the funds available are actually already committed. As you know a total of seven teachers are now on assignment in Africa (six in the Cameroun and one in Mali) and their contracts call for them to remain there during the whole of 1962-63. Approximately $16,000 will be required from the 1962-63 funds to finance each of these seven assignments making the total requirement in this connection about $112,000. As the total programme provides for expenditures of up to $300,000 per year this would leave an amount of about $188,000 for additional assistance. Officials of the External Aid Office in consultation with this Department have considered what form this additional assistance might take and the following three courses appear the most desirable:

(1) The Provision of Additional Teachers and Educational Advisers

Considering that seven teachers will continue on assignment during the next year and that their maintenance will need to come out of the 1962-63 allocation it has been estimated that the remaining amount of $188,000 would suffice to finance fourteen additional teachers for assignment in the autumn of 1962. However, in view of the fact that the Government is already committed to provide at least two teachers to Tunisia and one film adviser to the Ivory Coast provision would remain for the supply of eleven persons yet to be allocated. It is considered that as a first priority an effort should be made to assign an additional eleven teachers. Their assignments would be based on the needs and requests of receiving countries as reported by Canadian representatives who have visited the areas, and on other reports, and also on practical and political considerations.

(2) Training of Africans in Canadian French Language Institutions

It will be recalled that this possibility was rejected for 1961-62 because there was not sufficient time to make arrangements for this type of training before the commencement of the 1961 academic year. Moreover, as many of the eligible African countries have expressed the view that better and more economical use could be made of the available funds by sending Canadian teachers and advisers to Africa and as there are other difficulties connected with the adaptation of students from under-developed countries in Canada, it would seem advisable to concentrate efforts on the provision of teachers or certainly to limit any training programme in Canada to a very few students at the post-graduate level.

(3) Provision of Educational Equipment and Materials

A variety of proposals were received during 1961-62 for assistance by providing educational equipment and building materials for educational purposes. A serious difficulty with this type of assistance is that many of the items required cannot be manufactured in Canada with a satisfactory Canadian content, and are therefore excluded. Moreover many items in this class are relatively expensive and the limited funds available would not go very far if they were devoted to this purpose. It would seem therefore, that this type of assistance might be placed low on our priority list but that requests which seem to have exceptional merit should be given consideration if they can be met.

6. After definite proposals for the programme's operation during the 1962-63 fiscal year have been formulated, they will of course be submitted to you for approval.

CONFIDENTIAL

[Ottawa], April 2, 1962

AID TO FRENCH-SPEAKING AFRICA

Attached is the background memorandum on "Aid to French-Speaking Africa" revised in accordance with your instructions passed to us by Information Division. The revision affects only pages 4 and 5 where we have given added emphasis to the growing number of states eligible under the present programme, and particularly to the early emergence of Algeria as an independent state, and where greater stress is put upon the connection between this question and the problems of Canadian national unity and Franco-Canadian relations.

2. The External Aid Office declined at this time to comment on the background memorandum because of the absence of Mr. Moran. We pointed out that Mr. Moran had already agreed to the shorter paper, sent by telegram to the Minister in Geneva,† and that he understood (according to his letter of March 16 to you†) that the longer paper was but a more detailed presentation of the shorter paper. Nevertheless, the External Aid Office preferred to withhold comment, apparently with the intention of reopening the whole question of increased aid to French-speaking Africa with Mr. Moran, when he arrives in Ottawa April 6.

3. Also attached is a covering memorandum for the Minister. After referring to the exchange of telegrams during his stay in Geneva,† we have attempted to put the background memorandum in its proper context. We have explained (mostly in Mr. Moran's own words to you in his letter of March 16) the reasons why the programme of aid to French-speaking Africa lacked effectiveness during its first year of operation. Thereafter, we have pointed out that there is good reason to expect that many of the difficulties encountered will disappear with the imminent establishment of direct diplomatic relations with all but two of the countries eligible to benefit by this programme.

4. If the revised background memorandum and the covering memorandum meet with your approval they will be prepared in final form for the Minister without delay.<sup>1</sup>

CONFIDENTIAL

[Ottawa], March 30, 1962

AID TO FRENCH-SPEAKING AFRICA

You suggested from Geneva that the programme of Canadian aid to French-speaking Africa should be discussed with you on your return with particular reference to the fact that appropriations allocated to the programme have thus far not been fully utilized. Before raising the question of a possible increase in the present programme, which is dealt with in the attached memorandum, it may be useful to make some introductory remarks.

2. With respect to the apparent lack of effectiveness of the programme thus far, you may be interested in the observations Mr. Moran put forward before this subject was raised with you in Geneva. He noted that it is normal that the first year of operation of any programme is the difficult one. The common experience of all countries is that only limited financial expenditure can be made during the first year because time is required both for the receiving countries to assemble the necessary data for proposed projects and also for the donor country to examine the proposals and determine whether they are within its capabilities. For example, in the first year of the Colombo Plan no expenditure was made from the $24.4 million appropriated except for the purchase of wheat. Less than fifty per cent of the funds appropriated were spent in the first two years of the Plan. The Special Commonwealth Aid for Africa Programme initiated last year is following the same pattern. A large portion of the current year's appropriation will lapse although commitments already undertaken are sufficient to use all of next year's anticipated allocation.

3. In addition to this general difficulty the External Aid Office was also hampered in this particular programme by the lack of a channel for direct contact with the governments to which assistance is being provided. As you will recall, it was necessary this year for Mr. Beaulieu to visit these countries in order to obtain sufficient information for the programme to be put into effect. The imminent establishment of diplomatic relations with all of the states eligible under this programme, except Mali and Mauritania, will provide the necessary direct contact. Henceforth, accredited Canadian representatives will make periodic visits to practically all of the eligible states and will be able to perform on a regular and continuing basis the tasks carried out by Mr. Beaulieu on his visit. It is conceivable, therefore, that many of the specific problems encountered with this programme will be eliminated or diminished in the very near future.

4. For the foregoing reasons, the relative ineffectiveness of the programme for aid to French-speaking Africa would seem to be a temporary problem. (Mr. Moran may wish to comment

I think that we should await Mr. Moran's return and submit if possible an agreed presentation to the Minister. M. C[adieux] further on this upon his return.) Moreover, as the attached indicates, this problem may be matched or even surpassed in its importance by the growing urgency, for political reasons, of re-examining the whole question of aid to French-speaking Africa. Two examples from the memorandum serve to demonstrate this situation. Algeria is likely to become independent within a short time. As Morocco and Tunisia are already entitled to benefit from the present programme, Algeria presumably will also be included. It is likely, therefore, that we shall run an even greater risk than before of difficulties in our international and bilateral relations with the French-speaking states since it will be necessary to spread $300,000 among nineteen African nations, including this new and important one, in place of eighteen. This in turn may have implications in terms of the delicate yet exceedingly important domestic factor. On the other hand an increase in the allocation for this programme would be consistent with the Government's expressed intention of fostering greater national unity through encouragement of French-Canadian interest and participation in Canada's external policies.

5. The programme for French-speaking Africa for 1963-64 should be established within the next few months if it is to be applied effectively. The Advisory Committee must be convened during the summer if adequate time is to be allowed for the full implementation of its recommendations. The concern of the Department is that the programme should be geared on the one hand to the rapidly evolving situation in Africa and on the other hand to the needs of the External Aid Office for sufficient time to carry out its administrative functions.

6. Bearing this in mind, the attached memorandum was prepared in order to examine the general problem of aid to Africa and to reduce this problem to the specific issues of greatest importance to Canada at this time. As pointed out in the telegram sent to you in Geneva, current aid to the French-speaking states of Africa is at an exceedingly low level relative to that available to Commonwealth Africa. In addition, six African states are not eligible for Canadian bilateral assistance. We concluded that the most satisfactory way to begin to correct the imbalance among present aid programmes would be to plan for an increase in the assistance to French-speaking Africa. For this reason, it was decided to seek your views on whether in principle an increase in assistance to this area might be considered provided that the Advisory Group comes forward with sufficiently attractive proposals to warrant such an expansion.

Memorandum

CONFIDENTIAL

[Ottawa], March 29, 1962

AID TO AFRICA

There has been increasing evidence over the past year of both public and governmental interest in Canada in our relations with the new states of Africa. This has taken such forms as visits by African delegations, activity of private organizations, press comments (especially in Quebec) on the state of these relations, and cooperation in the United Nations (notably with the French-speaking states).

2. The African states, encouraged by this cooperation and in need of new external assistance, have turned to Canada to draw upon our experience as a developing nation in their search for solutions to and help with their own internal problems.

3. Moreover, within the past year and a half eighteen new states have been created. For Canada, therefore, the problem of aid to Africa has become of substantial concern, and because of changing circumstances, both the magnitude and the nature of the problem have altered greatly since Canada's existing aid programmes for Africa were established.

Background

4. There are now twenty-nine independent African states. The number continues to grow. In spite of attempts to federate these states, and despite more limited efforts to develop joint economic planning, there is no likelihood of any reduction in the competition among them for available external assistance. Nor has foreign aid to Africa, probably $1.4 billion per year, reached a level which nearly satisfies their needs. External aid has become a mark of foreign confidence and domestic prestige, as well as a means to national improvement. Perhaps most important to every African government, aid is the key to domestic political power because economic progress is the prerequisite to this power. As time passes, the need to demonstrate progress grows sharply, especially as the relative success of neighbouring states becomes evident.

5. The expanded number of donor countries and the introduction of new multilateral and bilateral aid programmes are indicative of the growing international interest in Africa generally and of the increasing competition in the aid field among non-African countries. While donors usually emphasize that their aid is disinterested, quite naturally for most international objectives provide an important reason for the increase in the flow of assistance to Africa [sic]. Meanwhile, the greater availability of aid and the greater number of potential donors make it proportionately more difficult, particularly for donor countries of limited resources, to achieve their international objectives.

6. Finally, one of the most important and yet elusive factors involved in the question of aid to Africa is the role of Communist propaganda, and in more general terms the competition in Africa between East and West. The problem of direct competition in specific projects, which it is generally agreed should be avoided by the West as an unworthy and unprofitable game, is less complicated than that of indirect competition. In the latter, Communist propaganda portrays all Western aid as evil and tied with political strings. This propaganda is spread on fertile ground. Any isolated failure by the West is magnified and the whole of Western aid or investment can be discredited, it seems, at a single stroke while the West's accomplishments often are looked at by at least some Africans with scepticism. The Communists have met with some success in their efforts to convince the African people that the present state of underdevelopment in Africa is the fault of colonialism, that Western aid is neo-colonialist inspired, and that such aid should be avoided or only accepted on terms the West cannot agree to. Also effective is the argument that the capitalistic West, dependent upon colonial profits for its success, has no examples worth following in developing a modern, dynamic African economy; and that only Communist techniques provide practical solutions for the under-developed world.

7. Therefore, partly as a result of the distinctive characteristics of the African states and partly as a result of the level of sophistication reached in international competition among donors, the problem of aid to Africa has taken on new and complicated proportions. Aid is not only a political matter of first importance on the African plane but also a political weapon of the Cold War; aid and foreign policy are inter-related and the possibility of isolating the former from the latter becomes more remote every day.

8. The implications of this situation are of utmost importance. The African countries are in a vulnerable economic position and this can be exploited easily by the Communists. These two considerations need to be taken fully into account in order to ensure that an aid policy, no matter how rational from a Western viewpoint, does not fail.

Types of Aid

9. African countries gradually are improving their economic planning and development administration. Increasingly, they not only know what they want and need, but also have the specifications worked out. Yet in any event and whether their planning is good or bad, more and more individual projects constitute part of a national policy. For example, railroads or ports, radio stations or airlines, oil refineries or shoe factories will be built even if they are mainly symbols of independence, even if their economic justification in isolation proves difficult, and even if little forethought is given to the problems of operating and maintaining them in an efficient fashion.

10. Without suggesting that tendencies towards prestige or other non-productive spending should be encouraged in the more limited fields to which Canadian aid is usually directed, it is not unreasonable to suggest that some account should be taken in the allocation of Canadian aid of the fact that the pursuit of a national policy is a justifiable and even a necessary objective for African governments. Particularly in the light of the prevailing competitive aid situation, consideration might be warranted of the inclusion under bilateral aid programmes of projects whose main justification is that they form an integral and possibly an important part of a national policy. This is especially true when it is apparent that support of such projects is not and should not be forthcoming from organizations like the World Bank whose purposes would be defeated if their standards were altered to permit such aid.

11. If such a change were introduced it would also be worth examining other ways and means of adding flexibility to Canada's aid programmes, in order to facilitate administration, to increase to the greatest possible extent the advantages accruing to Canada, and to minimize any possible friction arising out of the pride of African governments in displaying their independence, economic and financial as well as political.

Quantity of Aid

12. The two hundred and twenty million Africans are grouped within what are likely to emerge as some forty separate states. Together, they will constitute, by far, the biggest group within the United Nations. Yet each will have an average population of only five million and an economy with a national income averaging well under $1 billion a year. In actuality, the states involved range from Nigeria (with 35 million people) and Congo (15 million) to such states as Gabon (1/2 million) and Togo (1 million). The sheer number of countries makes it virtually impossible to give substantial assistance to all. In selecting those to be helped at any given time, however, we should bear in mind both the relative importance of the country concerned (e.g. Nigeria) and the relative impact of a small amount of aid (which would be greater in Togo than in Nigeria).

13. The most serious quantitative shortcoming in Canada's present aid programme is the imbalance between aid available to four Commonwealth African states ($3,000,000 per year)* and that available to eighteen French-speaking states ($300,000). Finally, six states do not qualify for direct aid under any existing programme. (The twenty-ninth independent African state is South Africa.)

14. Canada has developed its relations with the newly independent states on a pragmatic basis. Canadian policy has been based upon sympathy, goodwill and comprehension towards all these states. Our aid programmes have tended to develop along lines already established before independence. It has been quite natural, therefore, that aid should have been directed primarily to the members of the Commonwealth and that it was to them that large-scale aid was first made available.

15. Both the changing situation in Africa and the growing complexity of the problem of aid to Africa referred to earlier raise the question of whether it is not time to attempt to correct the imbalance in Canada's existing aid programmes. For a number of reasons it would appear most reasonable to begin by re-examining the programme for French-speaking Africa.

16. The French-speaking states have a natural interest in Canada because of our bilingual facilities and background. The development of close cooperation at the U.N. has been particularly successful with these countries. On the private level, especially in Quebec, there is widespread genuine interest in the establishment of contacts with these countries. Already an organization has been set up to foster these contacts. A Canadian business group is visiting West Africa and the French-speaking representatives at the U.N. have been invited to attend a meeting in Montreal. Cultural and economic relations are developing rapidly and the expansion of Canadian assistance to French-speaking Africa could be of particular benefit and importance to our own country. French-Canadians are going through a period of intense nationalism. In their present mood they are critical of the degree of influence that they have in national affairs and in particular in the field of external affairs. If a scheme of aid for African states were to be developed in such a fashion as to provide an outlet to the French-Canadian interests in French-language states in Africa, the results in terms of national unity might be quite substantial.

17. (In this respect, however, it should be recognized that an increase in the programme of aid to the French-speaking African states would not automatically result in the creation of a French-language version of the Commonwealth Educational Programme. To achieve this result, it would be necessary, as a supplement to expanded aid to Africa, to consider a programme of cultural relations with France; the latter might be very significant and hold great attraction.)

18. A new factor which will have to be taken into account in the near future is the imminent independence of Algeria. Tunisia and Morocco are already to benefit from the present programme of aid to French-speaking Africa and presumably Algeria will also do so. This means that a nineteenth state, and an exceedingly important and large one, will be added to the eighteen among which the sum of $300,000 must be allocated. The difficulty of reassuring African Governments that Canadian assistance will be made available to them at a future date although impossible immediately will therefore become even greater. Only a substantial increase in the funds available will alleviate this situation.

19. The amount required to bring Canadian aid to the French-speaking African states up to the present level of per-capita aid to independent Commonwealth African states would be in the order of an additional $3 million per year. To increase Canadian aid to the per-capita level available to countries receiving Canadian assistance under the Colombo Plan would require still more. These yardsticks, while indicative, are not necessarily the right ones. The objective presumably should be to put Canada in a position to be able to respond to a reasonable number of requests more or less on an annual basis from a substantial number of these states.

Conclusion

20. The greatest hindrance to the development of successful relations with the newly emerging states of Africa is their internal political effervescence. All are passing through a social and economic transformation that because of its speed amounts to a revolution.

21. The ideal solution for non-African states is to be sufficiently clairvoyant to aid in this transformation without becoming entangled in it, thereby nullifying the effect of assistance offered out of goodwill or sympathetic understanding of the problems of the African states. The West is not out to shape the African revolution after the image of its own past. Nevertheless, we are anxious to thwart Communist attempts to influence the course the Africans take, and particularly the efforts of the Communists to prevent African leaders from seeking their own independent solutions. In practical terms, Canada, like other Western nations, wishes to avoid a situation in which the African states might consider themselves without reasonable access to Western assistance and forced to rely on the East.

22. This means, in particular, the provision of substantially greater aid to French-speaking Africa. Not simply by chance, a special and mutual affinity exists between this area and Canada which makes it particularly appropriate to concentrate greater Canadian assistance on the French-speaking African countries. In practice it may be necessary to broaden the possible uses to which aid can be put. With additional resources and greater flexibility, however, Canada's programme of aid should be better prepared to withstand the effects of the rapid evolution of Africa.

LAW OF THE SEA: POSSIBLE COURSES OF ACTION

It will be recalled that there are a number of memoranda under consideration by Cabinet dealing with the separate but related issues of:

- (a) implementation of the straight baseline system for the delineation of the line from which Canada's territorial sea may be measured;
- (b) ratification of the four Law of the Sea Conventions and Optional Protocol signed in Geneva in 1958; and
- (c) extension of Canada's territorial sea and/or exclusive fisheries zone.

2. The purpose of this memorandum is to summarize the various recommendations on these questions contained in the various papers under consideration by Cabinet, and to correlate them with developments which have occurred since their submission to Cabinet.

(A) IMPLEMENTATION OF THE STRAIGHT BASELINE SYSTEM

3. In a memorandum to Cabinet on Arctic Sovereignty dated February 1, 1960 from the then Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources it was recommended:

- (a) that no claim be made to the waters and ice of the Polar Basin on the basis of the sector theory, but that the sector theory be held in reserve by Canada and not repudiated in case it might prove useful at some future date should it be deemed desirable to claim sovereignty over any permanently fixed or floating ice of the high seas of the "Canadian Sector";
- (b) that a decision be reached in principle to lay claim to sovereignty over the waters of the channels of the Arctic Archipelago, formal announcement to be postponed until after the second (1960) Conference on the Law of the Sea; and
- (c) that appropriate government departments be cautioned against any action which might compromise a Canadian claim not only to the waters of the channels in the Arctic Archipelago but also to the waters of the Arctic ocean and the Gulf of St. Lawrence.

4. At its meeting on March 8, 1960 Cabinet gave preliminary consideration to these memoranda and requested additional information on the legal basis of Canada's claim to sovereignty over the islands of the Arctic Archipelago and on whether Canada had ever made a formal claim to these islands.

5. In a supplementary memorandum dated June 27, 1960 from the then Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources these questions were discussed in some detail. The conclusion outlined in the memorandum was that Canada has asserted its claim to sovereignty over the Arctic islands since the 1860s [sic] and published the limits of its claim as early as 1895; no protest by other nations has been received apart from that of Norway in 1930 and that was settled; and that apart from such formal assertions of sovereignty, Canada has made so many displays of the effect of sovereignty in so many respects, and for so long a period, as to establish its title to all of the islands in the Arctic Archipelago upon the doctrine of effective occupation in conformity with international Law. (The paper did not discuss the basis of any Canadian claim to the waters of the Arctic Archipelago.)

Subsequent Developments

6. (1) The 1960 Law of the Sea Conference did not reach agreement on the breadth of the territorial sea and contiguous zone but further efforts by Canada to achieve an agreement on it made it necessary to continue to withhold formal announcement of Canada's claim to the waters of the Arctic Archipelago.

(2) The Antarctic Treaty, which had been signed, on December 1, 1959, after fifteen months [of] negotiation, by Argentina, Australia, Belgium, Chile, France, Japan, New Zealand, Norway, South Africa, the Soviet Union, the U.K. and the U.S.A., entered into force on June 23, 1961. It had been thought that the terms of the treaty or the circumstances under which it was concluded might have had some implications for Canada's claim to the Arctic (should, for instance, the treaty have attempted to lay down principles of general application to polar areas), but this did not occur. The Advisory Committee on Northern Development has therefore been giving consideration to the advisability of Canada acceding to the Antarctic Treaty. The preliminary conclusion of the Committee has been that there would seem to be no compelling reason for acceding to the Treaty, provided the results of the research being carried out in the Antarctic can be obtained by other means. This latter question is being followed up through our missions in Washington, London, Canberra and Wellington.

(3) Since the submission of the two memoranda to Cabinet previously referred to, two requests have been received from the U.S.A. (through service to service channels only), for Canadian concurrence in the passage of U.S.A. nuclear submarines through the waters of the Arctic Archipelago.<sup>1</sup> The nature and circumstances in which these requests have been received would seem to indicate a desire on the part of the U.S.A. to show an awareness of the Canadian interest in these waters, while neither conceding nor disaffirming Canadian sovereignty over them; hence there would seem to be no reason to assume that the U.S.A. attitude has altered from that outlined in the two memoranda to Cabinet.

7. In a memorandum of the Cabinet Committee on Territorial Waters to Cabinet dated February 7, 1961 on "Problems Connected with Implementation of the Straight Baseline System" it was recommended:

(a) that approval be given to the implementation of the straight baseline system for the delineation of the line from which Canada's territorial waters may be measured; and (should this recommendation be accepted),

(b) that instructions be given as to the way in which the straight baseline system should be implemented with respect to the Gulf of St. Lawrence, the Newfoundland Bays and the Bay of Fundy on the East coast, Hudson Bay, Hudson Strait and the Arctic Archipelago in the North and Hecate Strait and Dixon Entrance on the West Coast, and (should it be decided to close off some or all of these areas by means of the straight baseline system),

(c) that informal discussions be held beforehand with the U.S.A., the United Kingdom and France; and

(d) that publication of the straight baseline system (and the holding of discussions concerning it with the U.S.A., the United Kingdom and France) be deferred until such time as it is clearly evident that such action would not prejudice the chances of a multilateral convention, but not, without prior Cabinet approval, longer than one year from the date of ratification by Canada of the Geneva Conventions on the Law of the Sea.

Subsequent Developments

8. (1) From the Spring of 1960 until the Fall of that year Canada had attempted, without success, to persuade the U.S.A. to join in efforts to obtain agreement on a multilateral Convention on the Breadth of the Territorial Sea and a Contiguous Exclusive Fisheries Zone on the basis of the joint Canada-U.S.A. "six-plus-six" Geneva Formula. It was decided, in the light of the failure of these efforts (see memoranda to Cabinet of May 13, August 10 and September 27, 1960), to propose to the British that a joint confidential survey be carried out by Canada and Great Britain to determine the extent of support for the proposed convention, with a view to using the results of such a survey to persuade the U.S.A. to take part in the project. The British agreed to this proposal and in the months of February, March and April of 1961 a confidential survey of eighteen countries was carried out. The results were deemed sufficiently encouraging to warrant an approach to the U.S.A. requesting U.S.A. participation in the second phase of the confidential survey, during which a further number of countries would be approached. The Canadian and British representations to the U.S.A. were made on May 15 and May 16, 1961 respectively. On March 8 of this year our Embassy in Washington was informed that it had been decided by the U.S.A. that our invitation to participate in this project had to be declined due to opposition from the U.S.A. Defence and Fisheries Departments.<sup>2</sup> This decision has since been discussed with the British and they have indicated their concurrence in the Canadian view that it has effectively eliminated the prospects for the proposed multilateral convention. No action has yet been taken, however, to so notify the 18 countries approached during the confidential survey.

(B) RATIFICATION OF THE LAW OF THE SEA CONVENTIONS

9. In a memorandum of the Cabinet Committee on Territorial Waters to Cabinet dated February 7, 1961 on "Desirability of Ratifying the Conventions on the Law of the Sea" (and submitted at the same time as the memorandum of the same date on the Straight Baseline System), it was recommended:

(1) that a resolution be introduced in both Houses of Parliament during the then current session approving ratification of the five instruments on the Law of the Sea signed by Canada in Geneva on April 29, 1958, with a reservation that such ratifications shall not be construed so as to affect or impair the application of the "abstention principle" as defined in paragraph A 1 of Document A (Conf. 13/6.3/L.69 of the Official Record of Proceedings of the said Conference), and

(2) that the required amendments to existing legislation be prepared and introduced in Parliament when the various instruments are about to come into force.

10. At its meeting of February 14, 1961 Cabinet decided in principle to ratify the Law of the Sea Conventions, but to defer doing so until certain amendments to the Fisheries Act had been made.

Subsequent Developments

11. (1) The relevant amendments to the Fisheries Act have since been passed by Parliament and on April 24, 1961 the Prime Minister notified the House of the Government's intention to ratify the Law of the Sea Conventions.

(2) Subsequent to Cabinet's decision to ratify the Law of the Sea Conventions and the Prime Minister's announcement of the Government's intention to do so, the latent dispute with B.C. over off-shore mineral rights has come again into prominence, and with it the possibility of a reference to the Supreme Court of the questions in issue. Ratification of the Conventions has therefore been withheld pending study of the advisability of proceeding with ratification prior to settlement of the B.C. dispute. Consultations have been held between the Departments of Justice and Northern Affairs and National Resources on this question. The Department of Justice has indicated that while the legal situation is not clear and is one in which there can be differences of opinion, which is why a reference to the Supreme Court is being considered, there seems no necessity for Canada to delay ratifying the Convention on the Continental Shelf and on the Territorial Sea and Contiguous Zone on the ground of doubts as to the position of the Crown in right of Canada in the dispute with British Columbia.

(3) A separate legal question touching on ratification of the Conventions has been raised very recently by the Norwegian Ambassador, in informal discussions, namely, whether the collective provisions of the 1958 Conventions on the Law of the Sea preclude a signatory state from extending its exclusive fisheries zone to 12 miles. The question in issue (to which the Interdepartmental Committee on Territorial Waters is still giving consideration), is whether, bearing in mind that one Convention does not include fisheries amongst the kinds of control which may be exercised in a contiguous zone of the high seas while two other conventions specifically provide for freedom of fishing on the high seas, these provisions taken together preclude a claim to a contiguous exclusive fisheries zone. The preliminary conclusion of the Interdepartmental Committee is that sufficient doubt exists on the question to warrant a reservation being made when the Conventions are ratified which would leave it open to Canada to claim exclusive fishing rights in a contiguous zone similar to those exercisable in the territorial sea.

(4) Of the twenty-two countries required to bring the Conventions into force, twenty have now ratified the Convention on the High Seas, sixteen have ratified the Convention on the Territorial Sea, fifteen have ratified the Convention on the Continental Shelf, eight have ratified the Convention on Fisheries, and one country has ratified the Optional Protocol. (The question of ratification of the Optional Protocol, which provides for compulsory settlement of disputes arising out of the Conventions through submission to the International Court of Justice, would seem to depend in part on whether or not Canada files a new Declaration of Acceptance of Compulsory Jurisdiction of the International Court. While the commitment contained in the Optional Protocol could be accepted whether or not a new and more liberal Declaration is filed, it may be that the possible implications of ratification of the Optional Protocol should, in the light of the possibility of future disputes with the U.S.A. and other countries on law of the sea matters, be brought again to the attention of Cabinet, as suggested below in paragraph 15).

(C) EXTENSION OF CANADA'S TERRITORIAL SEA AND/OR EXCLUSIVE FISHERIES ZONE

12. In a memorandum of the Cabinet Committee on Territorial Waters to Cabinet dated January 4, 1962 various recommendations were made, some of which have since been overtaken by events. In large part, however, the issues discussed in that memorandum are identical to those outlined in the Draft Memorandum to Cabinet of March 9. Both memoranda discuss the advisability of unilateral action, the only difference being that a U.S.A. negative response has been received since the date of the earlier memorandum, and hence the recommendation that a further approach be made to the U.S.A. after consultation with the U.K. is no longer applicable.

13. At its meeting of February 1, 1962 Cabinet decided to defer consideration of these questions for a period of three months.

Subsequent Developments

14. (1) As mentioned above, on March 8 the negative reply of the U.S.A. was received to our request for U.S.A. participation in the second phase of the confidential survey. In the light of this development the memorandum to Cabinet dated March 9 was submitted recommending:

(1) that the United Kingdom and the other countries involved in the preliminary survey be told that the multilateral approach had failed due to lack of U.S.A. support and that Canada reserves her freedom of action concerning other possible solutions to the problem; and, simultaneously with this action,

(2) that the U.S.A. be informed of Canada's intention to take unilateral action extending Canada's exclusive fishery zone to 12 miles and implementing the straight baseline system for the delineation of the line from which Canada's territorial sea and exclusive fishery zone may be measured and of Canada's willingness to negotiate related questions prior to the implementation of this decision;

(3) that negotiations on these questions be opened with the U.S.A. as soon as possible thereafter, and simultaneously with the opening of negotiations;

(4) that a public announcement be made of the failure of the multilateral approach and the opening of negotiations with the U.S.A., but no mention [be] made of the intention to take unilateral action;

(5) that the decisions on whether to extend Canada's territorial sea to 6 miles and on which areas should be included in the implementation of the straight baseline system be deferred until an appropriate stage in the negotiations on these questions with the U.S.A.; but in any event,

(6) that the results of the negotiations with the U.S.A. be reviewed by Cabinet three months after their commencement with a view to determining whether unilateral action should be implemented, postponed or abandoned.

Related Developments

15. Since the date of the memorandum to Cabinet of March 9, some further considerations have arisen which seem to suggest the advisability of adopting a different approach, at least for the time being, on the various Law of the Sea questions under consideration by Cabinet than that recommended in that memorandum. These considerations may be summarized as follows:

(a) the division of public opinion in Canada which recently became apparent on the advisability of making Law of Sea claims which might result in retaliatory action from the U.S.A. affecting Canada's fisheries markets;

(b) It is apparent that Canada will need the close cooperation and support of the United States on a number of vital issues in the future affecting our international commercial and financial relations. In particular these include the Common Market negotiations and the continuing negotiations which we can expect to have in the IMF and in the GATT with respect to our balance of payment corrective programme. Additionally, Canadian oil and lumber exports to the United States, especially in view of the sharpening of competition as a result of the change in our exchange rates, have been under some criticism recently and it would be unwise to take steps which might increase the pressures now existing in the U.S.A. for restrictive measures against these important exports.

Summary of Conclusions

16. It can be seen that the questions of (a) ratification of the Law of the Sea Conventions, (b) implementation of the straight baseline system, and (c) the claim to an exclusive fisheries zone are closely related matters, and action on these questions should be co-ordinated. In the light of the considerations outlined in paragraph 15 above it would seem advisable to defer for the time being the opening of negotiations with the U.S.A. on question (b), particularly since, for the most part, Canada would be requesting substantial concessions and offering little in return (except the lessening of the extent of our claims in certain cases).

17. With respect to question (a), ratification of the Law of the Sea Conventions, it would seem inadvisable for a number of reasons to ratify them at this time, firstly, since in so doing we would be obliged to give some indication of our intentions on these other matters through the reservations we might have to make to the conventions; secondly, as pointed out in the memorandum to Cabinet of February 7, 1961, it would be inadvisable to ratify the conventions without being in a position to take action shortly afterwards implementing the straight baseline system, if that course of action is ultimately intended; thirdly, it might be inadvisable to ratify the Optional Protocol providing for compulsory submission of Law of the Sea disputes to the International Courts of Justice without having regard to the possibility of potential law of the sea disputes with the U.S.A., while to refrain from ratifying the Optional Protocol when ratifying the other conventions might be to act inconsistently with the proposal still under consideration by Cabinet to accept the compulsory jurisdiction of the International Court unconditionally. The fact that Canada may not be amongst the 22 countries bringing the conventions into force would seem to be a relatively minor matter when balanced against these other considerations.

Recommendation

18. It is recommended:

(1) that Cabinet should defer action on the various Law of the Sea matters at this time. The nature and degree of Canada's economic cooperation with the United States should be kept under continuous review in order to determine to what extent this should be taken into account in determining what action should be recommended with respect to Law of the Sea matters.

(2) that the eighteen countries canvassed in the confidential survey be informed that we have discontinued the operation because in the opinion of some countries approached (which we do not necessarily share) the essential support of a number of countries was not likely to be forthcoming.

(3) that the Cabinet Committee on Territorial Waters keeps the situation under continuous review and that these various Law of the Sea questions be raised again with Cabinet when, in the opinion of the Cabinet Committee on Territorial Waters, the time is propitious for the opening of negotiations with the U.S.A.<sup>3</sup>

LAW OF THE SEA: PROPOSED COURSE OF ACTION
 (Previous reference August 23, 1962†)

16. The Secretary of State for External Affairs said that Canada should assert jurisdiction over the Bay of Fundy, the Gulf of St. Lawrence, Hudson Bay and Hudson Strait, Hecate Strait and Dixon Entrance. Other matters relating to the law of the sea should be deferred, but negotiations should be held with the United States and with France, seeking cancellation of their treaty rights and a tapering-off of the historic fishing rights claimed by them in these "special areas." Until Newfoundland had become part of Canada, this country could not validly have asserted jurisdiction over the Gulf of St. Lawrence.

Recently, when Soviet trawlers had entered the Bay of Fundy the Canadian government had contended that the Bay was part of Canada's territorial waters. A protest from the United States might have followed, but the U.S. took no action, perhaps because they did not wish to appear to be helping the Russians. The trawlers had withdrawn from the area.

The Cabinet Committee on Territorial Waters considered that eventually Canada should seek implementation of the straight baseline system for the determination of the line from which Canada's territorial waters might be measured. Canada should also assert a formal claim to the waters of the Arctic Archipelago, extend Canada's territorial sea belt and exclusive fisheries zone, and take various other measures, but all of these proposed actions should be deferred until after the matters of the jurisdiction over the special areas and the treaty and fishing rights of the U.S. and France in those areas had been satisfactorily resolved.

An explanatory memorandum had been circulated (Minister's memorandum, Dec. 14 -Cab. Doc. 418/62†).

17. During the discussion the following points were raised:

(a) If Canada asserted jurisdiction over the special areas it would be important to state clearly that this assertion did not in any way prejudice any Canadian claim to any other area not specifically designated at that time.

(b) The Cabinet Committee had studied a proposal that Canada should base its claim to Arctic waters upon the "apex" or "sector" theory. This would involve a claim to a sector of the Arctic Ocean extending to the North Pole. The Committee had recommended that no such claim should be made.

(c) Government spokesmen had recently declared that Canada should not act unilaterally in questions relating to the Law of the Sea. An assertion by Canada of jurisdiction over the special areas would therefore expose the government to the accusation that it was violating its own precept.

(d) Before making any public assertion on this subject, the government should consult the U.S. If that country was going to oppose such a step, there would be advantage in knowing this in advance. For many years the U.S. had contended that the Bay of Fundy was part of the high seas. If Canada acted unilaterally, the U.S. might take reprisals.

(e) If Canada delayed in asserting its claim, and if meanwhile the ships of other nations appeared in the special areas, it would become increasingly difficult to assert such a claim. There had been some suggestion, for example, that France might be planning to use St. Pierre and Miquelon as a base for greatly extended fishing operations.

(f) The present proposals did not involve the unilateral widening of Canada's territorial sea or of Canada's exclusive fishing zone, but merely the formal claiming of jurisdiction over areas which Canada had always regarded as her own.

(g) Some said the U.S. might be prepared to support such a claim by Canada because of considerations of defence. Others said that if Canada consulted the U.S. in advance, it might thereafter prove impossible for Canada to assert its formal claim. Canada did not need U.S. approval to take the proposed action.

(h) The Maritime provinces would be seriously affected if the U.S. market for Canadian fish should be lost or interrupted. Furthermore, the Canadian government in recent months had issued various policy statements and taken forms of action (e.g. on oil policy surcharges on imports, magazines, etc.) that had irritated the U.S. government. No further irritants should be added at this time if they could be avoided.

(i) Shortly after the Russian trawlers had left the Bay of Fundy, a Russian trawler had asked for permission to transfer fish to another vessel in the Gulf of St. Lawrence. The Canadian government had replied that such transfers were prohibited "in Canadian territorial waters," and the trawler had apparently accepted this as effectively prohibiting such transfers in the Gulf.

(j) Some said that the waters of the Arctic Archipelago should be included in the proposed declaration. Others said it would be unwise to include too many areas at the one time.

(k) Next week the Fisheries Council would submit a brief on this whole subject to the Cabinet. A final decision should be postponed until after the Brief had been received and studied.

18. The Cabinet noted the recommendations of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, concurred in by the Ministers of Fisheries and Northern Affairs and National Resources (Cab. Doc. 418-62 Dec. 14, 1962), on a proposed course of action relating to the Law of the Sea, and agreed:

(a) that the government of Canada should consult with the government of the United States before taking action to assert jurisdiction over any special bodies of water as proposed; and

(b) that the recommendations would be considered further by the Cabinet after the meeting between Ministers and the Fisheries Council to be held on January 28th.

LAW OF THE SEA

Please speak to appropriate USA officials at highest level considered appropriate along the following lines: The USA Government is aware of Canada's strenuous efforts to bring about an international agreement on the Law of the Sea before, during and after the 1958 and 1960 Geneva Conferences on the Law of the Sea. The Canadian Government is mindful of the cooperation and assistance of the USA in these efforts. It will be recalled, however, from our discussions on this question at various times in the past three years that it has been the considered opinion of the Canadian Government that in the light of the failure of the last Geneva Conference to reach agreement on the joint Canada-USA "six-plus-six" proposal, the proposed multilateral convention offered the best possibility of removing some of the resultant uncertainty in the Law of the Sea and at the same time arresting the disturbing drift towards wider territorial seas.

It was the earnest hope of the Canadian Government that the Government of the USA would come to share these views. Indeed, with this in mind, the preliminary survey of 18 countries was carried out by Canada and Great Britain from February to April 1961 with the primary purpose of amassing sufficient evidence of support for a multilateral convention to persuade the USA Government to join in the second phase of such a survey. It was the agreed assessment of the Canadian and British governments that the results of the preliminary survey were sufficiently encouraging to warrant proceeding with the second phase, during which a second group of countries were to have been approached.

2. It will be recalled that these views were made known to USA Government in mid May/61, when Canadian and British governments requested that USA Government participate in the second phase of the survey. The response of USA Government to these representations was then awaited, and in the meantime no repeat no further steps were taken in the survey. In these circumstances the decision of USA Government, communicated to Canadian Government on March 8/62, not repeat not to participate in the second phase of the confidential survey was received with considerable regret.

4. Canadian Government has given careful consideration to the implications of the decision of the Government of USA not repeat not to join in the confidential survey. Canadian Government had recognized from the outset that the support of USA would be vital to the success of a multilateral convention and has concluded, therefore, that the decision of USA Government not repeat not to take part in the project may be taken as having eliminated the chances for such a convention; and that consequently there would be little purpose in pursuing the project further; and that those countries involved in the survey should be so informed.

5. In the view of Canadian Government the resultant situation is extremely unsatisfactory. The recent operations off Canada's East Coast of the Soviet fishing fleet, whose size has increased tremendously over the past five years, have raised serious security implications for Canada. The probing activities of these trawlers in waters considered by Canada as internal render it imperative that action be taken to prevent further incursions. Moreover, while Canadian Government remains desirous of achieving a rule of law on these important questions, public opinion in Canada strongly favours action to protect the livelihood of Canadian fishermen and future development of Canada's coastal fisheries industry. Ships of a number of other nations have begun to make new encroachments upon Canada's East Coast fisheries, and recent developments indicate also an increasing threat to Canada's West Coast fisheries from Japanese and, perhaps, Soviet fishing fleets. In the light of these circumstances and in the face of the failure of efforts to bring about an agreed rule of law on the territorial sea and contiguous fishing zone, firstly through a universal UN convention and secondly through a multilateral convention, Canadian Government has decided after careful consideration to take the following action in order to protect Canada's security and fisheries interests:

(a) to enclose the waters of the Bay of Fundy, the Gulf of St. Lawrence, Hudson Bay and Hudson Strait, Hecate Strait and Dixon Entrance and Queen Charlotte Sound by the straight baseline or headland to headland system (in accordance with customary international law and the 1958 Geneva Convention on the territorial sea) and to proclaim the straight baseline system as the basis for the delineation of the line from which Canada's territorial sea and exclusive fisheries zone may be measured;

(b) to suggest to USA that it join with Canada in taking the initiative in convening a new international conference on the Law of the Sea under UN auspices for the purpose of bringing about international agreement on a rule of law on a six-mile territorial sea and a further six-mile contiguous exclusive fishing zone, on the basis of the joint Canada-USA Geneva "six-plus-six" formula.

6. Canadian Government intends to make a public announcement shortly of these decisions, and to implement these decisions within a reasonable period thereafter. In deciding on this course of action, however, Canadian Government has been mindful of its possible broader implications, as well as its possible effects on USA fishermen. For these reasons, and in the light of the long and harmonious relations between our two countries in these fields, Canadian Government is prepared to discuss with USA Government such questions which the latter may wish to raise in connection with this action, particularly questions touching on USA treaty and "historic" fishing rights, in the hopes of reaching agreement on mutually satisfactory arrangements. Canadian Government would welcome the holding of such discussions in Ottawa in due course.

Following for Embassy Paris: Please speak to French officials along lines similar to foregoing, except that we are not repeat not at this time requesting France's support for a new UN conference on the Law of the Sea. In paragraph 6 substitute "French fishermen" for "USA fishermen" and "French Government" for "USA Government" etc. as required. Following for London only: Please transmit information to UK officials for their information.

LAW OF THE SEA

Alexis Johnson Deputy Under-Secretary of State for Political Affairs asked me to come in this afternoon to receive initial reaction to the Canadian decisions in your telegram L-30 February 26. He had with him Yingling Assistant Legal Adviser for Special Functional Problems (which includes Law of Sea questions), Taylor Deputy to Harrington Special Assistant to the Secretary of State for Fisheries and Wildlife and Hubbard of the Canadian Desk.

2. At the end of our discussions Johnson summed up the State Department reaction by saying that our informing the State Department of the Canadian decisions was appreciated; but that it was earnestly requested that the decisions be reconsidered since they could not repeat not be helpful to our relations at the present time. He also emphasized that USA officials would be more than happy to enter into discussions with Canadian authorities on all aspects of the Canadian position. He and his advisers also raised several specific questions about details of the Canadian position.

3. To start off the discussion Johnson said that as we well knew both USA and Canada were facing increasing pressure from our fisheries interests in respect of the Japanese pressure for opening up halibut fishing areas on the West Coast. If action were taken by Canada at the present time to close off further substantial areas of the sea that were of interest to USA West Coast fishing industries then this would create a very difficult problem for USA Administration. USA fishery interests were influential and would probably suggest retaliation of some kind against Canada in respect of such action. Johnson was unsure of what form of retaliation they might propose although he supposed it might be to restrict Canadian access to markets in USA.

4. Johnson went on to express regret at the Canadian decision when the West Coast fisheries had so long been a model of joint USA-Canadian cooperation in the development of fisheries resources. Furthermore we were both facing the imminent termination of the first period of the Northwest Pacific Fisheries Convention and it was felt that our mutual cooperation and our joint cooperation with the Japanese would be jeopardized by the Canadian decisions.

5. Describing the foregoing as broad considerations Johnson went on to speak of what he thought might be called technical and legal considerations although both aspects were intermixed. On the technical and legal side Johnson said it was felt very strongly that the type of action in contemplation should not repeat not be handled unilaterally by one government. This was especially so because of the national defence interests of both our countries. USA had vigorously protested actions by Soviets and others that were detrimental to the freedom of the seas. Action by an ally which would encourage the further disregard of freedom of the seas would be most unfortunate. USA would find it impossible to acquiesce in the Canadian decision and if proclaimed would have to take a public position against our extension of Canadian internal waters by reference to the straight base line concept. Under this rule very large areas of the sea on both the East and the West Coasts would be closed.

6. I told Johnson that I would of course report these views fully to the Canadian Government. However I said I wished to make several observations. I emphasized the long period of cooperation with USA in seeking to avoid the development of a chaotic situation in the Law of the Territorial Sea. I mentioned again our cooperation in respect of the two Geneva Conferences on the Law of Sea. I emphasized that we were still anxious to go ahead on the same basis of cooperation as our suggestion for a further conference under UN auspices showed. From the point of view of both our security and our fisheries interests we were most anxious to avoid a situation which was becoming increasingly difficult. We were facing tremendously increased incursions into the waters which we sought to enclose. As regards our national resources Canadian fishing interests were extremely concerned. As to our national security interests I wished to point out that Russian trawlers were becoming an increasing source of worry and recited some of the recent activities of Russian fishing vessels which seemed to indicate that USSR regarded waters adjacent to Canada as more or less of a no-man's land in which they could undertake intelligence activities with impunity. On the other hand I noted that on the international level efforts to avoid a chaotic situation in the Law of Sea had apparently ground to a stop. All these developments were a growing source of concern to Canada. Furthermore I thought that USA authorities should be alive to our joint long term interests in relation to both our Eastern and Western coastal waters especially in relation to the pressures that were being applied to us by both the Japanese and the Russians. Johnson pointed out at this juncture that USA Administration had of course been under considerable pressure from the authorities of Alaska to take action to extend USA territorial waters for the particular purpose of excluding Japanese and Soviet trawlers but that the Administration had firmly withstood these pressures.

7. I further pointed out that Canadian authorities were as we had indicated willing to have discussions with USA authorities in regard to both our bilateral and multilateral treaty obligations as well as USA "historic" rights. I emphasized that we wished to work out mutually satisfactory arrangements. Johnson immediately stated willingness of USA authorities to have discussions with us. He pointed out however that the central question of course would be whether these discussions would precede any public announcement by the Canadian Government. He also wished to emphasize that USA very much desired to continue to coordinate and cooperate in respect of our joint interests in the Northwest Pacific fisheries.

8. Johnson, Yingling and Taylor then further commented on the legal basis for our decision the gist of these comments being to doubt the applicability of the straight base line concept to the areas which were designated in the Canadian decision. Yingling in particular contrasted the geographical configuration in Norway which had been at the root of the ICJ decision of 1951 and the geography of the Canadian coast lines East and West. Johnson again said that he hoped USA-Canada discussions could take place in order to provide a full understanding of relevant technical questions. He would for instance be happy to have Yingling go to Ottawa to discuss these questions with Canadian authorities. They also raised the following specific questions:

(a) Was it the Canadian intention to define the limits of its territorial waters as extending beyond the straight base lines by three miles or by six miles?

(b) What was the width of the intended contiguous fishing zone? and

(c) What were the base line points which it was intended to adopt under the straight base line formula?

9. We said that we would ask you to consider whether we could provide precise answers on the foregoing specific questions.

10. I stressed once more as I had yesterday to Tyler Assistant Secretary of State for European Affairs our strong desire that the Canadian decision should not repeat not prematurely become public. Johnson fully agreed upon the desirability of avoiding premature public disclosures and said that certainly every effort should be made to avoid a public controversy over the Canadian decisions which he was sure would be the case if the decisions were made public. He said candidly that this was merely the statement of a fact of life in view of the undoubtedly strong reaction of USA fisheries interests particularly on the West Coast. I said that I could not repeat not of course state officially when it was intended to make the Canadian decisions public although I thought that as an unofficial estimate this would not repeat not take place before two or three weeks and that in any event the implementation of the Canadian decisions would take up to six months or a year. Johnson said that of course it was the announcement of the decisions rather than their implementation which would trigger a public reaction in USA.

11. I also said that I hoped to be able to inform the State Department in advance of a Canadian public announcement. Johnson welcomed this and said of course that USA authorities heartily reciprocated our desire not repeat not to say anything immediately.

12. In further explanation of the Canadian position I reiterated my belief that the government had come to its decisions reluctantly. We had striven at the two Geneva conferences to develop a coherent position on the territorial sea and as he knew had lost by such a narrow margin as one vote. We had come back to USA with proposals for a multilateral convention as he well knew. I thought that USA authorities must be aware of the very difficult prospect which this had placed before the Canadian Government.

13. Johnson once again referred to the determination of the Administration not repeat not to give in to pressures from Alaskan interests although he conceded that perhaps they were not repeat not as important proportionately as the Canadian interests bringing pressure to bear on the Canadian Government. Nevertheless he felt he must reemphasize that unilateral decisions by one of our two governments was not repeat not the way to proceed. He illustrated this by pointing to the disadvantageous position that would develop if USA were to acquiesce in the Canadian decisions. He pointed to the extension of the territorial sea if Indonesia and the Philippines should attempt to apply the straight base line concept in the way which Canada was proposing. He and Yingling drew attention to the fact that USA had already experience of incidents in these waters as well as in purported territorial seas off USSR. Yingling was particularly emphatic in pointing out the capacity of USSR to exploit Canadian decisions in relation to several large bodies of water off the Soviet coast. USA would be in their view in an extremely poor position to protest Soviet expansionism of this kind if USA were to acquiesce in the action contemplated by Canada "as a neighbour, friend and ally."

14. To conclude our discussion we agreed that there was nothing further that either of us could say immediately. I expressed my appreciation for the prompt way in which the State Department had given us their initial reaction. Johnson reiterated his willingness to arrange for further discussions.

15. Johnson and the officials with him at no repeat no time adopted a truculent or threatening attitude. At the same time they made no repeat no effort to hide their concern and agitation at the consequences which they saw flowing from our decision. I believe our efforts should now concentrate on emphasizing our concern on the security aspects of the Soviet incursions into North American waters and our concern for the interests of the Canadian and in the long term American fisheries industries. I would recommend therefore that, before any public announcement is made, we explain as fully as possible to the State Department the broad purposes of our decisions as well as answer the specific questions that were raised (paragraph 8 above).

16. In giving this initial statement of their views neither Johnson nor his colleagues directed any specific comment whatsoever towards the suggestion in your telegram L-30 that USA join with Canada in an initiative for a new international conference on the territorial sea under UN auspices. Their concern seemed to be focused solely on the decision to enclose waters off our coasts.

LAW OF THE SEA

Mr. Green has not seen the attached telegram 672 of March 1, 1963, from our Embassy in Washington, which outlines the initial United States Administration substantive comments on the recent decision of the Canadian Government to claim certain bodies of water as internal Canadian waters, and to suggest a new international conference to determine the breadth of the territorial sea and fishing rights in the contiguous zone. Mr. Green was, however, given the gist of the message over the telephone, and he directed that departmental comments be sent to you immediately. (A copy of this Memorandum is also being sent to him in Vancouver at his request.)

2. As you will note, the United States reaction has been not only faster, but more vigorous and more negative than had been expected. It has always been recognized that the establishment of these claims is to a very large extent dependent upon United States acquiescence in them. An adverse public United States reaction to an announcement of these claims would not only undermine the whole legal basis of certain of the claims, however, but could have serious repercussions in the financial field. This would almost certainly create a new area of controversy in Canadian-United States relations, which could affect firstly, fisheries exports from Canada to the United States, and could also extend to other important items, such as oil and lumber. It is even possible that the whole basis of our trading relations could be adversely affected, at a time when they are particularly important and sensitive.

3. The United States reaction seems to make clear also that the United States is not willing to acquiesce in the Canadian claims even if substantial fisheries concessions were made, since their main objections are on other and broader grounds. In these circumstances, it may be important to convey to the United States very soon the willingness of the Canadian Government to review the matter in the light of the United States views, in order to head off a deliberate leak by the United States Administration. This could result in an adverse public reaction in the United States, which would seriously weaken our claims, even if it were decided not to press them at this time. . . .

4. Bearing in mind, therefore, the probable repercussions from a public statement by Canada concerning our claims, I would urge again that the whole matter be reviewed in the light of the United States comments, and I recommend that you authorize us to take the following steps:

(a) to instruct the Embassy in Washington to inform the United States that their reaction will be considered carefully by the Canadian Government before any further steps are taken;

(b) to instruct our Embassy in Washington to stress in discussing the matter with United States officials that action contemplated by the Canadian Government will not disregard United States interests, and that it is proposed to negotiate with the United States with a view to reaching mutually agreed arrangements;

(c) to instruct our Embassy in Washington to say, in respect to the specific questions raised in paragraph 8 of the attached telegram, if you agree, that there is no intention to take action at present extending Canada's territorial sea or fishing zone, but that it is hoped that these matters might be settled by an international conference along the lines of the Canada-United States proposal at Geneva in 1960, and that the question of specific base lines can be discussed in the proposed negotiations.

5. If the Government is prepared to review this matter, and in the event that it should become necessary to make a public statement, the Embassy in Washington should be instructed to request prior United States agreement to say that the two Governments are discussing the whole range of problems in this field with a view to developing mutually satisfactory arrangements. This would be consistent with your last statement on this subject in the House of Commons, and it might avoid divergent and premature public positions being taken.

LAW OF THE SEA
(Previous reference February 8th†)

22. The Acting Prime Minister said that a telegram had been received from the Canadian Embassy in Washington describing the U.S. reaction to the Canadian government's recent decisions to claim certain bodies of water as internal Canadian waters, and to suggest a new international conference to determine the breadth of the territorial sea and fishing rights in the contiguous zone. The U.S. reaction had been "not only faster, but more vigorous and more negative than had been expected."

The Deputy Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs had reported that an adverse public U.S. reaction to an announcement of these claims by Canada would not only undermine the whole legal basis of certain of the claims, but could also have serious repercussions in the financial field. It could affect fisheries exports from Canada to the United States, and possibly also other important items such as oil and lumber. It seemed clear that the U.S. was not willing to acquiesce in the Canadian claims. The Canadian government should take early action to show its willingness to review the subject in the light of the U.S. views in order to head off a possible deliberate leak by the U.S. administration. Certain of Canada's claims had doubtful legal validity and would have little chance of being recognized without U.S. acquiescence.

23. During the brief discussion the following points were raised:

(a) Some said that, in view of the U.S. reaction it would now be folly to adhere to the terms of the Cabinet decision of February 9th, or to take the risk of a premature leak in Washington.

(b) The U.S. government should be informed that the Canadian government would give careful consideration to their reaction before any further steps were taken. It would be unnecessary to state, as the Under-Secretary had suggested, that Canada would not disregard U.S. interests and would negotiate with the United States in order to arrive at mutually acceptable arrangements. Canada should offer, however to consult the U.S. before taking any further steps.

24. The Cabinet agreed that the Acting Prime Minister should convey to the Prime Minister the recommendation of the Cabinet

(a) that no further action should be taken at this time on the decision of the Cabinet meeting of February 8th on the Law of the Sea; and

(b) that the Canadian Embassy in Washington be instructed to inform the U.S. government that their reaction would be considered carefully by the Canadian government, and that they would be consulted before any further steps on this matter would be taken by the Canadian government.

Note: The Acting Prime Minister informed the Prime Minister and Secretary of State for External Affairs of this decision. They agreed among themselves that it should be modified and pending the preparation and approval by the three of a revised message, the instructions in (b) above would not be given.

USA NUCLEAR-POWERED SUBMARINES IN ARCTIC WATERS

Consideration was given at the interdepartmental level to this recent exercise with regard to its possible implications for Canadian claims to sovereignty in the Arctic. It was noted that one of the two vessels concerned, the USS Skate, had effected passage in both directions through the waters of the Arctic Archipelago, informal notification of such passage having been received through service channels. Compared with the June 1960 voyage of the USS Sea Dragon, when Canadian concurrence was requested,<sup>1</sup> notification in this case was merely "for your information." While notification is all that can be required under the agreed clearance procedures between Canada and the US for passage of warships through territorial waters, it was given for the return voyage on August 17 i.e. one day after the trip had actually begun. No reply was sent at the time by the RCN to either message.

2. It was noted further that the subsequent press release reported in your telegram made no mention of prior consultation with Canadian authorities and was thus likely to give the impression that the waters of the Arctic Archipelago are international waters not subject to Canadian jurisdiction or control. You will recall (your telegram 2217 of September 1, 1960) that a similar difficulty arose over the Sea Dragon and that we made clear our desire at the time to be consulted at all stages concerning public announcement of such voyages.

3. As a result of this study the Minister has directed that the following reply to the messages from the US Navy should go forward:

"It is noted that in contrast to the passage of USS Sea Dragon in August 60, when concurrence was requested six weeks ahead of time, notice of the proposed passage of USS Skate was much shorter, and in the case of the return voyage was not received until the day after the voyage had begun, contrary to the agreed clearance procedures, paragraph 5(d) of which provides for a minimum 24 hours' notice.

"Request you point this out to COMSUBLANT and ask that minimum possible notification of future nuclear submarine transits be given in order that the required clearances for such passages may be obtained."

It is understood that this message will be sent today from Naval Headquarters to CANCOMARLANT information CANAIRHED.

4. Moreover, the Minister has agreed that you should take up separately with the State Department the matter of the press release. It is preferred that you follow strictly the line which you took in 1960, namely state, as in the case of the USS Sea Dragon, that we expect to be consulted concerning such releases. . . .

5. We suggest that you wait about one week before making this démarche in case the RCN message filters up to the State Department. Any initiative taken by latter in raising the subject in the meantime might provide a suitable opening for introducing the matter of the press release.

USA NUCLEAR-POWERED SUBMARINES IN ARCTIC WATERS

We conveyed yesterday October 18 to Carlson (OIC Canadian Affairs) the main points contained in paragraph four of your reference telegram emphasizing in particular our wish to be consulted in respect of any future releases concerning such operations in the Arctic.

2. Carlson took note of our position and undertook to take the matter up with USA authorities concerned. He appreciated our desire to be consulted in respect of such releases and observed that possibly the difficulties we experienced last August could be avoided in the future if there were some clearer understanding as to the channels and procedures to be used for clearing any press announcements. You may wish to give some thought to this aspect of the problem in consultation with DND. . . .

SOVIET FISHING ACTIVITIES IN THE PACIFIC OCEAN

On October 4, 1961, our Ambassador in Moscow delivered a Note to the Soviet Union expressing concern about the possibility of an expansion of Soviet fishing activities in the North Pacific Ocean, in view of the development of the halibut fishery in this area by Canada and the United States through strict conservation measures. The Note concluded:

“The Government of Canada is aware that the Government of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics is sympathetic to the objectives of conservation programmes for marine resources. It is hoped, therefore, that if the Soviet Government decides to proceed with a further expansion of its trawl fishing operations in the Pacific Ocean or with experimental fishing for halibut, the Soviet Government will take into account the considerations outlined above. Accordingly, the Canadian Government hopes that any such expansion of Soviet fishing operations will take place in areas other than those in which conservation measures are being undertaken by the International Pacific Halibut Commission.”

A similar note was delivered by the United States Ambassador in Moscow.

2. The Japanese abstain from fishing halibut in the same area under the terms of the International Convention for the High Seas Fisheries of the North Pacific Ocean, signed by Japan, Canada and the United States in 1952. The abstention provisions of this Convention have never been popular with the Japanese, who could, under the terms of the Convention, give a one year notice of termination in June, 1962. You will recall that the Japanese sent a trawling fleet into the area this winter to fish for species other than halibut and salmon. They would not agree to postponing this operation until the problems could be discussed within the framework of the International North Pacific Fisheries Commission (Canada, Japan, U.S.A.). This caused considerable concern to Canadian and United States Fisheries officials. We had previously informed the Japanese of our efforts to discourage the expansion of Soviet fishing activities in the same area.

3. The text of the Soviet reply to our Note of October 4, 1961 is given in the attached telegram no. 104 of February 27 from Moscow.†

4. Briefly, the Soviet Government rejected, fairly vigorously, any suggestion that its rights to fish in the High Seas can be affected by a bilateral agreement between Canada and the United States. However, it states that U.S.S.R. “always proceeds from the need for international cooperation between States in the matter of the rational conduct of fisheries ...” and concludes:

“At the present time, Soviet fishing organizations are not conducting large-scale halibut fisheries in northern part of Pacific Ocean. For the time being, these operations are limited to the study of the reserves, the habitat, and the seasonal migration of the halibut. If in future Soviet Government decides to begin the commercial catching of halibut in the above-mentioned region, it will be ready to cooperate on a just and equal base with Governments of Canada and of United States of America in the protection of halibut reserves and in the regulation of its catch."

5. In March our Ambassador in Tokyo asked whether he could give a copy of the Soviet Note to the Japanese Government Fisheries Agency. After discussion with the Deputy Minister of Fisheries we sent the following reply on April 9:

"Although we appreciate need to encourage cooperative attitude Japanese Fisheries Agency our preliminary reaction is not to show them Soviet reply to our Note on this subject for fear of stiffening Japanese position on the same subject. In any event Clark wishes to discuss with Herrington of State Department before making final decision."

"For your own information Clark hopes to be able to provide Japanese within a few weeks with analysis of special investigation by Canada-U.S. Halibut Commission referred to in ourlet X-132 of Dec. 20, 1961. He would prefer to withhold Soviet Note at least until this material has been given to Japanese. We will follow up when Clark has discussed with Herrington."

6. Mr. Clark telephoned us today to say that the Second Secretary of the Japanese Embassy has requested a copy of the Soviet Note on instructions from Tokyo. Mr. Clark has therefore reconsidered the matter and after discussing it with Mr. Herrington of the U.S. State Department recommends that the text of the Soviet Note be given to the Japanese on a Confidential basis.

7. Mr. Clark pointed out that since April the parties concerned have agreed to hold an interim meeting of the International North Pacific Fisheries Commission in August to discuss the halibut fishing in the light of the results of the special investigation by the Canada-U.S. Halibut Commission and of the results of the Japanese trawling expedition in the area this year, referred to above. He, therefore, considers that on balance the Japanese request for a copy of the Soviet Note should now be met.

8. Incidentally, the fact that we have received a reply from the U.S.S.R. was made public by Mr. Clark at a recent fisheries meeting in Vancouver when he apparently gave the substance of the concluding paragraph of the Soviet Note. A clipping from the New Canadian is attached.<sup>1</sup>

9. We have discussed the matter with the desk officers of European, Far Eastern and Legal Divisions. The consensus is that we should accept Mr. Clark's recommendation. If you agree we suggest that Mr. Clark should give a copy to the Second Secretary of the Japanese Embassy and that we should inform our Ambassador in Tokyo so that he may make a copy available to the Japanese Government Fisheries Agency.<sup>2</sup>

CONFIDENTIAL

[Ottawa], May 18, 1962

FISHING ACTIVITIES OF FOREIGN NATIONS – PROBABLE EFFECT ON PACIFIC HALIBUT FISHERY

Background

(1) At its Meeting of March 19, 1962, the Cabinet referred to Treasury Board for report the recommendation of the Minister of Fisheries that his Department be authorized to include in its 1962-63 Estimates an amount of $200,000 for the continuation of research into the effects of Japanese and Russian fishing activity on the Pacific halibut fishery.

(2) The Board, at its Meeting of April 12th, took the view that, while the conclusive results which this work would provide were desirable, the cost was too great to be borne during the current fiscal year. The Chairman of the Board reported this decision to Cabinet in a document dated April 17th.

(3) At its Meeting of May 12th, the Cabinet referred this report back to the Board for review and further report in light of further information and argument to be submitted to the Board by the Minister of Fisheries.

Letter to the Minister of Finance by the Minister of Fisheries

This letter dated May 11, 1962, is as follows:

“The attached Memorandum to Cabinet was considered and referred to Treasury Board since it involved a matter requiring the provision of funds in Supplementary Estimates for the fiscal year 1962-63.

It was not possible because of early preparation and submission of the Main Estimates, in view of the lack of sufficient information at the time, to include an amount for the Canadian share of the important and urgent investigation set out in some detail in my submission to Cabinet. I understand that Treasury Board considered that it could not approve the funds requested. I appreciate, of course, the position faced by Treasury Board when my submission was referred to it by Cabinet. I must point out, however, that my request is an urgent one requiring extraordinary consideration.

I have critically re-examined the situation and I am strongly convinced that the Canadian share of the dividends from the North Pacific fisheries in the future will depend on the state of our knowledge of the quantitative and qualitative distribution of bottom fishes off the coasts of British Columbia and Alaska. This information is required to prepare the Canadian position for international negotiations early in 1963.

The following are some of the urgent and extremely important considerations:

(1) Both the Japanese and USSR fishing fleets have been carrying out exploratory fishing in the Gulf of Alaska for some time and both fleets plan to trawl for many species of bottom fish which are not sought by Canadian or United States fishermen in that area.

(2) Canadian and United States halibut fishermen fish throughout this area but are prohibited from using otter trawl gear under the International Pacific Halibut Commission regulations because of possible damage to small and immature halibut.

(3) The results of the special trawl survey carried out over the last 12 months show large numbers of small, immature halibut are taken in trawling operations.

(4) Other results of the trawl survey indicate that it should be possible to delimit the areas where damage to halibut stocks resulting from trawling operations for other species would be minimized.

(5) The trawl survey in 1961-62 covered the area south of the Alaska Peninsula between 165° West Longitude and 153° West Longitude and from shore to the 250 fathom contour. It is essential that similar data be obtained during 1962-63 to the east of this study area where major halibut spawning and nursery areas are known to occur.

(6) Since the International Convention for the High Seas Fisheries of the North Pacific Ocean may be terminated in 1963, Canada must assemble as much information as possible before that date to strengthen her position in negotiations dealing with the continued abstention by the Japanese fleets from fishing halibut in the Eastern Pacific Ocean and, equally important, in any negotiations which may have to take place with the Soviet Union with regard to the North Pacific fisheries.

As I have pointed out, I am strongly of the view that this matter is a most urgent one and I sincerely hope, in the Canadian interest, that Treasury Board will grant the funds requested. An immediate decision is required because suitable vessels must be chartered and the expedition organized to get under way this month.

Perhaps, because of present circumstances, the required funds could be provided meantime from the Department of Finance Vote Number 50 "Miscellaneous Minor and Unforeseen Expenses."

Board Decision

At its Meeting of May 17, 1962, the Board approved the proposal subject to the Department delaying other programs so as to effect an offsetting decrease in expenditures. The Board's approval included a commitment of $200,000 against the Department of Finance – Vote 50, the "Unforeseen Vote," and approval of the inclusion of an item in Supplementary Estimates to recoup this Vote. The Supplementary Estimates item and the "Unforeseen" commitment are required, even though offsetting delays in other programs are to be made, because these delays will affect votes other than the one in question.

If the Cabinet concurs in the Treasury Board decision, and if the Department is still prepared to undertake the work, the Department should submit an amendment to the Classification of Expenditures to reflect the offsetting reductions in programs. Once this is done, allotments from the Unforeseen Vote may be made as required.<sup>3</sup>

IMMIGRATION REGULATIONS
(Previous reference November 2)

12. The Minister of Citizenship and Immigration stated that only one basic change had been made in the proposals which were originally put to the Cabinet and approved in principle in November, 1961. The form, however, was substantially different as the regulations now being submitted for approval were prepared by the Department of Justice. The previous draft had sought to establish equality of treatment for all categories of close relatives from all parts of the world, and to achieve this had proposed somewhat more generous treatment for the less preferred countries, mainly in Asia and Africa, while reducing to some extent the categories of close relatives to be admissible from the traditional sources in Europe. The new sub-paragraph (d) to section 31 restored the provisions by which it had been possible for sponsoring relatives in Canada to apply for adult or married brothers or sisters, sons or daughters, male fiancés or unmarried minor orphan nephews or nieces, provided the persons applied for were citizens of a country of Europe (including Turkey), the Western Hemisphere, or Egypt, Israel or Lebanon. Moreover, the provision contained in the previous draft regulations relating to a literacy test had now been deleted.

The new sub-section 31 (d) was the only part of the Regulations containing any preferential treatment or discrimination in favour of European and Western Hemisphere countries. This discrimination could have been removed only by introducing restrictions and withdrawing privileges which had been enjoyed for a good many years by close relatives and sponsors from European and Western Hemisphere countries. It was considered preferable to move the less favoured groups forward by progressive steps to a position of complete equality by withdrawing privileges from more favoured groups. In general, the effect of Section 31 was to improve the position of nationals of all countries without worsening the position of any.

An explanatory memorandum had been circulated (Minister's memorandum, Jan. – Cab. Doc. 24-62†).

13. During the discussion some said that the change back to a preference for Europeans would perpetuate the discrimination against people from the less preferred countries. These complaints, others said, would be less serious than those which would arise from restricting Europeans. With Canada's many ethnic groups of European extraction, depreciating the rights of Europeans in favour of Asiatics and Africans would engender numerous and bitter complaints within the country. This aspect of the new regulations had been mentioned by the Minister very briefly in Caucus but discussed at some length with Messrs. Maloney, Martini and Kucherepa who favoured the change made by 31(d).

14. Mrs. Fairclough drew to the attention of the Cabinet Part II of the Regulations relating to Inquiries and Appeals and said that they did not require the approval of the Governor in Council but could be made on the authority of the Minister under Section 62 of the Immigration Act.

15. The Cabinet,

(a) agreed with the recommendation of the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, pursuant to Sections 49 and 61 of the Immigration Act, that the Immigration Regulations made by Order in Council P.C. 1954-1351 of September 17th, 1954, as amended, be revoked and new Immigration Regulations Part I substituted therefore, effective February 1st, 1962; and,

(b) noted that the Minister would, by separate order under Section 62 of the Act, give effect to Part II of the Regulations bringing into force new regulations with respect to Inquiries and Appeals.

(An order in council in respect of (a) above was passed accordingly; P.C. 1962-82, Jan. 18).

EXCHANGE RATE AND EXCHANGE RESERVE FUND

1. The Secretary to the Cabinet reported that this meeting had been convened to enable Ministers to consider the exchange situation and the action, if any, that should be taken by the government at this time.

At the time of the Budget, in June 1961, the government had decided that the Canadian dollar, which then stood at a premium of about 4 per cent in terms of U.S. dollars, ought to move to a somewhat lower level. During the succeeding months the exchange rate had moved downward, partly as the result of the public statement then made by the Minister of Finance, and it had proved unnecessary to purchase U.S. dollars to force the rate down. Indeed between June and October 1st, 1961, about $60 million of U.S. dollars had been sold from the Exchange Reserve Fund to prevent too sharp a fall in the rate. During October this trend was reversed, and U.S. dollars were purchased, but since that time the Fund had been selling U.S. dollars. In the month of January 1962 these sales had amounted to $134 million, in February $175 million and in March $38 million. The market had been relatively stable during the first week of April 1962, but, thereafter, it had again been necessary to sell increasing quantities of U.S. dollars from the Fund. On April 27th, the sales for the day had amounted to about $35 million, on April 30th about $20 million, and on May 1st about $36 million.

On April 27th, the Minister of Finance had met with his Deputy and with the Governor of the Bank of Canada to discuss this situation. A further meeting had been held on the following day, the Secretary to the Cabinet being present on this occasion. The Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs had also been consulted. On April 29th the Secretary to the Cabinet had reported orally to the Prime Minister on the situation and on alternative courses of action.

The recent developments in the exchange situation reflected movements in the balance of trade. The balance had improved last year as compared with the previous year; but this year, although exports had risen, imports had been rising more quickly. The international balance on non-trade items had been worsening by something over $100 million per annum. On the whole, therefore, it appeared that the deficit this year in the balance of payments would be $1.2 or $1.3 billion. The discount on the Canadian dollar had helped the situation to some extent, but not enough.

The inflows of capital from the United States had been shrinking during the past year or so. Foreign investors were buying less Canadian securities in the marketplace than during the earlier period, and municipal and provincial financing was now being done, for the most part, in Canada.

In summary, since October 1961 the Exchange Reserve Fund had lost about half a billion of its exchange reserves, or about one-quarter of its reserves. The subject had not been noted in the press until May 1st when the New York newspapers had referred to a weakening of Canadian exchange.<sup>1</sup>

On May 1st the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance had discussed the exchange situation, and the Minister had then reviewed the matter with officials. Four alternative courses of action had been given serious consideration.

One possibility would be to continue to support the Canadian dollar at the current rate of 95 cents in terms of U.S. currency. This however, would involve further depletion of exchange reserves and might not produce a real solution.

A second course might be to support the Canadian dollar, and to announce that the government intended to hold it between 93 and 97. The Minister of Finance had at first been inclined to favour this course but later had concluded that, if the rate should fall to 93, it might then be necessary to use up substantial amounts of reserves to prevent a further decline.

A third possibility might be to fix the par value of the Canadian dollar at .95 U.S. dollar, and to seek the agreement of the International Monetary Fund. This however would involve the risk that the government might have difficulty in defending a fixation at this level.

The fourth proposal, favoured by some officials, would be to fix the par value of the Canadian dollar at .90 U.S. dollar. The market would probably regard this valuation as reasonable, but such a drop in the exchange rate would have a more severe effect upon domestic prices than the alternative measures, and the government might be accused of manipulating the exchange rate in order to obtain an advantage in international trade.

After considering the alternatives, the Minister of Finance had proposed, and the Prime Minister had signed, a recommendation that the par value of the Canadian dollar be fixed at .92½ U.S. dollar for the purposes of the Agreement for an International Monetary Fund. There had been no fixed par value of the Canadian dollar since 1950, although the order in council of 1949 was still nominally in effect.<sup>2</sup>

The Minister of Finance had wished to await reports on the exchange market of this day before action was taken on the recommendation. On this day it had again been necessary to sell considerable sums of U.S. dollars. Accordingly, it was proposed that the concurrence of the I.M.F. be now obtained and that an order be passed later on this day to fix the par value of the dollar as recommended. The Minister would make an announcement immediately after the passing of the order.

2. During the discussion the following points were raised:

(a) the proposed course was the best alternative available, and its advantages outweighed its disadvantages. The government would be able to capitalize on it by presenting it as a deliberate step to encourage Canadian exports.

---

(b) The position of exporters would be improved as a result of the proposed order, but complaints would probably be received from importers. In a few months' time, the price on imported goods such as automobiles and farm machinery might rise by an amount of up to 5 per cent.

(c) On the whole, the proposed step would be popular in Canadian financial circles, and the I.M.F. would welcome it as being in conformity with normal practice.

(d) The government might be criticized because of the reduced inflow of capital from abroad and on the ground that the lower value of the dollar reflected declining prestige. Such criticism, however, would not be very damaging because the Canadian public favoured a reduction in foreign influence upon the economy.

(e) Any increase in exports would help to strengthen the position of the Canadian dollar in international exchange. All reasonable steps should also be taken to stimulate the tourist industry in Canada.

(f) The Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance had considered this matter in detail, and their recommendation should be supported.

3. The Cabinet agreed that the concurrence of the International Monetary Fund should be obtained, and authority be given for the fixing of the par value of the Canadian dollar, for the purposes of the Agreement for an International Monetary Fund, at one Canadian dollar equals 92½ U.S. dollar.

(An order in council was passed accordingly; P.C. 1962-659, May 2).

[Ottawa], June 10, 1962

At noon yesterday I was able to reach Mr. Fleming by telephone and bring to his attention two very serious developments. He asked that I should make available to the Prime Minister the information and suggestions which follow. (In the matter I am, of course, acting on behalf of the Deputy Minister, Mr. Taylor, who had to be absent from Ottawa this weekend.)

In the first place, as I told Mr. Fleming, the drain of our reserves of gold and foreign exchange in the past few days has, once again, been increasing ominously and sharply as it did late in April and early in May. The loss of reserves required to support the Canadian dollar at its lowest permissible level during the 7 business days since the last public announcement has amounted to $93 million; last Friday sales of $35 million were required. This brought the total decline in reserves since January 1st to over $650 million or about one third of the reserves we held at that time. Our present reserves are approximately $1,400 million, but this includes $86 million which represents in effect the short-term borrowings from the market made in April and May through forward sales of foreign exchange and gold for which we received the spot exchange; these will have to be repaid within the next few months. We cannot go on using up reserves at this rate; urgent steps are needed to restore confidence in the Canadian dollar.

It now seems clear that a substantial and increasing part of these sales of reserves has been required as an offset to withdrawal from Canada of foreign capital; this is a most disturbing development. We know that, on Friday, such withdrawals were feeding on rumours in New York that the Canadian Government could not (or would not) maintain the fixed exchange rate of 92½ cents U.S. or, alternatively, that the Canadian Government was about to impose foreign exchange restrictions in a last-ditch effort to defend that rate. In either eventuality, capital would have a strong incentive to escape from Canada while it was still free to do so at the current exchange rate.

In the second place, I drew to Mr. Fleming's attention a Canadian Press report, carried in yesterday's papers, of an interview with the Minister of Agriculture. It appeared on the front page of the Globe and Mail under the following headline: "Dollar at 90 Cents Urged by Hamilton." The report read in part as follows:

Vancouver, June 8 (CP) – Agriculture Minister Alvin Hamilton said today he favors a further devaluation of the dollar to 90 cents in terms of U.S. funds.

Mr. Hamilton told a press conference the present level of 92½ cents is in effect a compromise between Government members. He said some were in favour of 95 cents while others wanted it at 90 cents.

The 90-cent level, he said, is a "natural peg which is defensible with our negative trade balance."

Even before this report was published, growing demands on the exchange fund had raised the possibility that if a serious outward movement of capital developed the Fund might not be able to meet all the demands made upon it in defence of the fixed exchange rate. In other words, it was not inconceivable that we would be faced, before June 18th, with a major financial crisis involving the possibility of a breakdown of the policy decided upon by Government and announced on May 2nd or the need to go asking for emergency financial help abroad wherever this could be obtained. The danger of such developments is, of course, much increased by a newspaper report indicating a serious cleavage within the Cabinet regarding the basic exchange rate policy.

A clarification of the Government's position will inevitably be sought. Such clarification can now only come from the Prime Minister. Moreover, a firm statement by him may help to avert a flight of capital, and the breakdown of policy that it might precipitate. Mr. Fleming requested that we should draft a statement for consideration by the Prime Minister. Following his request we have produced the following draft:

Draft Statement by the Prime Minister

I have been asked whether the exchange rate for the Canadian dollar, which was fixed at 92½ cents in U.S. funds on May 3, is to be regarded as definitive.

I wish to make it clear beyond question that the rate of 92½ cents in U.S. funds is definitive. We chose this rate after careful consideration of our balance of payments outlook. It has been legally established by the Government with the concurrence of the International Monetary Fund. No other rate and no other exchange system is being considered or will be considered by the Government.

We are determined to maintain the 92½ cent rate against pressures of any sort. The very extensive financial resources available to the Government will be used to defend it. The Government is fully aware that its financial and economic policies basically determine the value of the Canadian dollar and the Canadian people can be assured that these policies will be of a character which involves no further reduction in the exchange value of the Canadian currency.

If any such statement is to be issued, it should be issued today (Sunday) – i.e. it should be available to the public, at home and abroad, before foreign exchange markets and security markets open for business tomorrow (Monday).<sup>3</sup>

While such an announcement seems very desirable, indeed necessary, it can at best postpone the time at which events may invite, indeed require, action in addition to announcements. In the very nervous and apprehensive atmosphere which now surrounds the Canadian dollar, a constructive statement by the Prime Minister may help to prevent a serious outflow of capital during the coming week. However, in the weeks ahead, both Canadians and foreigners with funds that can be transferred into or out of the country, will no doubt be seeking some firm basis, in the realm of Government action, relating to the future of the Canadian dollar. It seems clear that the regular announcement of our reserve position at the end of June will again show a very substantial fall in reserves; indeed the decline may well be the largest on record. This would be a blow to confidence. I know that there have been discussions between Mr. Fleming and Mr. Taylor and Mr. Rasminsky of steps affecting Canada's balance of payments and financial position which might be urgently required in such a situation but I do not know whether it has as yet been possible to convey the gist of this discussion to the Prime Minister.

I am sending you enclosed a note on the Exchange Crisis.

I need not point out to you the political implications and difficulties of all this, on which I have of course been brooding. Naturally you will be vilified for this abrupt change of course, necessarily made without any warning during the campaign. Yet it seems inescapable.

In the circumstances I think the best approach would be to act promptly, decisively, and without compromise; to be clearly dealing strongly with a serious emergency which necessarily transcends normal priorities and policies.

POLICY RE EXCHANGE CRISIS

You asked this morning to have a memorandum on the action to be taken on the exchange crisis and I shall see what I can get for you tomorrow. Rasminsky and Finance are still working on their proposals. In the meantime I shall give you in outline the essentials of what we officials have been proposing to put forward. I have participated in the discussions over the past fortnight.

The essence of the problem is that we need a large inflow of capital to Canada, nearly a billion dollars a year, to meet our large international deficit on current (i.e. income and expenditure) account, and we also need to keep the capital we have in Canada that can move out, both foreign and domestic. Our current balance can be and should be reduced as time goes on, but to do it quickly would take very severe measures and cause serious shortages of imported goods. Our "exposure" to the danger of outward movement of capital is enormous – there are billions of dollars of foreign capital invested here and billions in Canadian-owned investments that could try to get into foreign investments. To set up exchange control quickly would be impractical – and very undesirable from a long-term viewpoint. Our exchange reserves are very modest by comparison – now, I suppose, just a bit over $1200 million. We have thought that $1000 million was the minimum to which they should be allowed to fall before we took emergency action (things can always get worse!). They are apt to be below that level by the end of this week – and could be much lower. They could vanish within a month or two, leaving us at the mercy of the market from day to day.

The essence of the problem is to regain the confidence in the Canadian dollar of foreign and Canadian investors. It now seems evident that they have lost confidence in us – in our economy in some measure – and in our governmental behaviour particularly. They feel we are not paying enough attention – any of the parties – to "sound" financial policies of various kinds. Whether they are right or wrong is no longer the point – they are the ones whose opinion is important now and if we are to regain their confidence we have to demonstrate convincingly our intention to balance our budget within a reasonable time and to improve the balance of our international income and expenditure, so that we are not so dependent on imports of capital.

Consequently what officials are proposing consists essentially of three elements. The first is to demonstrate our ability and will to move toward a balanced "respectable" budget, now that our unemployment situation is substantially better and improving. The second is to demonstrate our intention to correct our balance of payments by taking emergency action to reduce imports while the slower more desirable measures take effect. The third is to get some temporary loans – or promises of loans – to get us over the low point and convince the market that we can see the business through. (I have emphasized to the others that we should make our own strong decisions on the first two aspects before seeking loans, so there will be no question of others imposing terms on us.)

To move toward a balanced budget we propose action both on expenditures and taxes. Expenditures should be reduced moderately – perhaps about $175 million over a full year – about $60 or $70 million this fiscal year. Much of this can be accomplished by deferring construction and purchases – a bit can be done by cutting out or down on some subsidies, etc. – for example the gold mining assistance. On the revenue side, we should act strongly enough to be convincing – and dramatically. After much discussion we have reached the conclusion the main effort – for reasons of equity and economics – should take the form of a temporary surtax on income tax – an addition of 1/6 to everyone's tax which would yield about $300 million a year. (The prospective budget deficit this year is now somewhat over $800 million.)

There are other tax reforms which Finance has in mind but I have urged them to be simple and obviously fair in what they put forward to meet this emergency.

On the balance of payments side, we propose temporary taxes on a wide range of imports, rather than quotas. It is proposed that some imports be taxed at 5% (in addition to present tariffs) and others, less essential, at 15%, while those that enter importantly into costs of production be free from this emergency tax. We think other countries with whom we have trade agreements (e.g. members of GATT) will accept these emergency limitations on our imports as required for balance of payments reasons – few countries have had so dramatic a case and such action is provided for in the GATT Agreement. Finance officials have found legal devices by which these can be introduced by Order in Council, pending consideration of them by Parliament, so that we can avoid budgeting by radio, as in 1947.<sup>4</sup> In addition we propose that Parliament be asked to suspend, during the emergency, the tourist exemptions of $100 worth of purchases every four months.

In the third field – borrowing – we propose that we seek about $300 million from the International Monetary Fund. Of this about $170 million should be easy – it is just borrowing back the gold we contributed. The next slice – say $130 million – should not give rise to much difficulty or delay if we are acting to correct the situation. Beyond that, the Directors of the Fund (representatives of other countries) would want more time and convincing argument. In addition Rasminsky hopes he could borrow $100 million from the Federal Reserve Bank of New York, and perhaps $250 million from insurance companies, etc., in New York by a privately placed bond issue. If possible this should all be arranged and announced by the end of the week along with the various budgetary decisions. As you can see this will take prompt and decisive action if we are to accomplish it all before our reserves get so low as to imperil the whole effort to regain confidence.

We feel that these emergency plans should be put before the new Parliament at the very first opportunity – which will be July 25th, the date on which it has been summoned on a pro forma basis. This prompt summoning of Parliament for what would be in effect an emergency mid-summer session (presumably short – to be adjourned until October) would be part of the effort to show the seriousness with which we are tackling our emergency. We propose the measures be incorporated in a single Emergency Financial Measures Act.

EXCHANGE CRISIS

1. In accordance with your request to Mr. Rasminsky and myself, we have met this afternoon with the other officials who have been working on the dollar crisis (with the exception of Mr. Roberts who has to be in Montreal today). We have looked at our proposals in the light of the election results and the problems which confront you.

2. We feel we should start from the memorandum which we prepared yesterday<sup>5</sup> and which I attach hereto, as it gives you the background and the essential principles which he feel it is necessary to have in mind in approaching the problem.

3. We feel that, in accordance with your desire, it would be possible to defer Parliamentary action on this programme until late September or October (when you will have to meet to get supply) if an adequate programme is announced promptly within the next few days.

4. We believe that a positive programme along the general lines which we have described, with some kind of endorsement by Parliament, either through support or abstention on the part of other parties, will be necessary to meet our emergency dollar problem over the next six to nine months.

5. It would be possible to make some changes in emphasis in the programme suggested as long as the general effect on confidence in the financial markets at home and abroad is retained. It must be recognized, however, that confidence of the financial markets cannot be secured under present conditions with a programme that is an easy and comfortable one or one that is confined solely to import measures.

6. We feel that we should not try to borrow abroad whether from the International Monetary Fund or public authorities in other countries or from the market without having an adequate programme to announce along with the announcement of such borrowing.

7. If it is not going to be possible to have an adequate programme that will restore confidence we believe it would be pointless and imprudent to dissipate our reserves in defence of a fixed exchange rate which we would be forced to abandon very shortly.

8. I should again emphasize the extreme urgency of action on this matter.

FOREIGN EXCHANGE

1. The Minister of Finance, on behalf of the Cabinet, informed the Secretary that the matters under discussion at these meetings were related to the measures to be taken to deal with the foreign exchange situation, and that the principal decisions of these meetings were embodied in the statement issued by the Prime Minister on Sunday, June 24th.<sup>6</sup> The measures agreed upon were the following:

(a) "A temporary, graduated surcharge on certain classes of imports ... Approximately one-half of all imports will be exempted from any surcharge," and other imports will be classified in three categories subject to surcharges of 5, 10 or 15 per cent.

(b) "A second temporary measure designed to conserve foreign exchange relates to the tourist exemption under which Canadians travelling abroad are allowed to bring into Canada, duty-free, one hundred dollars' worth of goods once every twelve months .... Under the temporary order, returning tourists will be allowed to bring back to Canada, duty free, $25 worth of goods three times a year or, in the case of overseas visitors, $100 once a year."

(c) "The Government had decided on a programme involving reductions in expenditures amounting to $250 million in a full fiscal year."

(d) "The Minister of Finance will earmark Canadian dollar cash balances equivalent to the sales of exchange reserves during this fiscal year, to be used only for the purpose of financing increases in our reserves."

(e) "Canada is exercising its borrowing rights with the International Monetary Fund and is drawing $300 million in foreign exchange. The Government has arranged a line of credit of $400 million from the Export-Import Bank in Washington. The Bank of Canada has entered into a reciprocal currency arrangement with the Federal Reserve System of the United States in the amount of $250 million, and has made a comparable arrangement with the United Kingdom in the amount of $100 million."

FINANCIAL SITUATION

The State Department called us in early this morning to discuss the actions announced June 24 by the Prime Minister. We spoke first to Weiss, Director Office of International Trade and Finance and later to Griffith Johnson, Assistant Secretary for Economic Affairs. Weiss had with him Goldstein, Chief of the International Finance Division; Lewis, Chief of the Commercial Policy and Treaties Division; Hays of the Canadian Desk and Hollis, Deputy Assistant Legal Adviser for Economic Affairs. Johnson and Weiss showed a clear and sympathetic understanding of Canada's financial and exchange rate problems, but they were concerned about the effect the measures announced were likely to have on USA Trade Expansion Bill<sup>7</sup> which is due to be debated in the House of Representatives Tuesday and Wednesday of this week. We were told that Under-Secretary Ball had spoken on Sunday to Representative Mills, Chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, and that Johnson had spoken today to Representative Byrnes, the leading Republican on the same Committee, in an attempt to explain the Canadian government's actions and to damp down the expected reaction on Capitol Hill. We gathered that neither Mills nor Byrnes have been too difficult, but Johnson was careful to point out that it was still early to judge how severe the reaction in Congress and the business community might be. Johnson said that in his conversation with representative Byrnes he had sought to explain that the Canadian measures were temporary only, even though no repeat no terminal date had been mentioned in the Prime Minister's announcement. Johnson was concerned that protectionist interest might well suggest that USA should adopt similar restrictive measures to improve its balance of payments.

2. Weiss expressed surprise that Canada had chosen to impose variable import surcharges; he and Johnson agreed that from the point of view of the GATT and USA trade program, import licensing and QRs would have been preferable. Weiss thought the GATT aspect of the question was bound to raise difficulties with congressmen who were likely to adopt the usual line about foreign countries failing to meet their international commitments. He thought this line of criticism would be very difficult to answer.

3. Weiss told us that John Evans, USA Representative in Geneva, had reported the Canadian government's intention to seek an Article 25 waiver at the next session of GATT Contracting Parties. Weiss said that presentationally this was unfortunate since it implied that the Canadian temporary measures would remain in force at least until October and probably later. He suggested that it would be helpful if Canada could reemphasize the temporary and emergency nature of the measures.

4. Weiss said that Evans in Geneva had been asked by Wyndman White to seek urgently USA Government's reaction to the suggestion that a meeting of the GATT Council should be called to discuss the emergency measures announced yesterday. Weiss reminded us that even for actions consistent with the GATT, the Council normally would be convened ten days after the action took effect. He thought it would be appropriate to apply the same timing with respect to actions which were not repeat not consistent with the GATT. Weiss was convinced that it would be useful to USA (particularly to the prospects of their trade bill) internationally and to Canada if we were to take the initiative in calling a meeting of the GATT Council as soon as possible, allowing time, however, for the IMF to arrange to have a representative attend the meeting. Johnson added that the result of the Council meeting was almost certain to be an endorsement of the Canadian Government's action; such an endorsement could be expected to contribute to the restoration of confidence which the Canadian Government was seeking.

5. The State Department would like to know not repeat not later than June 26, tomorrow, your reaction to the suggestion that Canada convene a meeting of GATT Council.

6. Other points that emerged from this morning's conversations were:

(a) At the press conference held June 24 by USA Treasury, the question had arisen whether USA would seek compensation from Canada, but the point apparently was not repeat not pursued. USA officials are apprehensive that this possibility may be raised from other quarters.<sup>8</sup>

(b) USA officials are concerned about the reference in the Prime Minister's statement to surplus capacity in Canada and alternative products produced in Canada which might be used to meet demands previously supplied by imports.

(c) It was made clear that in GATT USA would seek to obtain firm commitments about the temporary character of the import measures and would explore the possibility of alternative measures such as internal taxes applicable to domestic as well as imported goods.

7. In response to Weiss and Johnson we based ourselves on the Prime Minister's statement, the information provided in G-100 June 24† and the background briefing provided by Plumtre on Sunday. We emphasized the overall objectives of the emergency program and the legislative limitations which made it necessary for the government to use the authority in existing legislation. We urged that in any public reactions the broad issues should be emphasized.

DESPATCH NO. O-156

Paris, July 19, 1962

CONFIDENTIAL

CANADIAN ECONOMIC EMERGENCY MEASURES:
STATEMENTS BY THE CANADIAN DELEGATION TO WORKING PARTY 3 OF THE ECONOMIC POLICY COMMITTEE

The following is a record of the statements made by the Canadian Delegation at the outset of the discussion of the Canadian situation in Working Party 3 of the Economic Policy Committee on July 17. Mr. Plumptre and Mr. Lawson have approved this record. They will be preparing a report† on the discussion which followed.

2. Mr. Plumptre expressed appreciation to those countries and persons who had collaborated in providing emergency support for Canada in June. He included those who had offered help which in the end had not been needed, as well as those whose help had been used. The latter group included the IMF, which had extended a credit of $300 million, the Federal Reserve System with a credit of $250 million and the Bank of England with a credit of $100 million. These credits totalling $650 million had actually been added to the Canadian reserves. In addition, a stand-by credit of $400 million had been arranged with the Export-Import Bank, making a grand total of $1,050 million. The emergency had arisen suddenly in a period of great political uncertainty; the Canadian authorities appreciated not only the help provided but also the fact that it had been provided so quickly.

3. The way in which it had been possible to take quick action to meet the emergency illustrated the usefulness of Working Party 3. It had been fortunate that officials of Treasuries and central banks in all of the important countries concerned had been well informed of the Canadian background through previous meetings of the Working Party, since there would have been no time for detailed discussion and briefing. The Secretariat's familiarity with the background was also well illustrated by the paper which was put forward as a basis of discussion (CPE/WP3/62.24). The patterns of assistance which had been the subject of previous discussions in the Working Party had proven their usefulness in the emergency. The Canadian Government appreciated in particular the initiative which the French Government had taken in making an accelerated [war loan] debt repayment of $67 million early in July.

4. As to the actual reserve movements and balance of payments developments in 1962, the level of the reserves had fallen from $2,050 million at the beginning of the year to $1,100 million on June 22. This loss of $950 million had occurred in three stages. In the first quarter of 1962, there had been a fall in the reserves of $350 million; in April and up to May 2 (when the fixed exchange rate was announced), there had been a further loss of $220 million; and in June, a loss of $380 million which had begun just at the time of the last meeting of Working Party 3 and very rapidly increased shortly before June 24. In the first quarter, there had been a deficit of $14 million on merchandise trade account and a deficit of $349 on non-merchandise account. On capital account, instead of the normal inflow, there had been an actual loss of $1 million. Thus the total exchange loss in the first quarter was $364 million. For the second quarter, statistics were most incomplete. The merchandise account had probably shown another small deficit. Together with "invisibles," the current account deficit was probably about $350 million. Thus, in view of the loss of reserves ($600 million to June 22), the net capital outflow had probably been $250 million. However, from the announcement of the emergency programme on June 24 to the end of June, there had been an improvement of some $50 million in the reserves over and above the $650 million borrowed. The Canadian authorities hoped and believed that the July figures would show a continued improvement over and above the $67 million of advance debt repayment by the French Government.

5. As for the emergency programme, its fundamental purpose was to restore confidence at home and abroad, and in particular to maintain and defend the newly-established parity at 92.5¢ U.S. In order to restore confidence, it was necessary to determine what had been in the minds of those who had moved money out of Canada. Contacts with traders and investors at home and abroad made it clear that they had two preoccupations, the continuing deficit of $1 billion a year on international current account and the continuing deficits of $3/4 billion to $1 billion on budgetary and fiscal account. It followed, that if confidence was to be restored, both these elements had to be dealt with as effectively and expeditiously as circumstances would allow. These were the two main features of the programme, to which a third was added: it was natural and appropriate in the circumstances that there should be an increase in interest rates.

6. Meeting on June 20, two days after the general elections, the Cabinet decided that, in view of the indecisive election results, and the extent and immediacy of the emergency, an emergency programme should be introduced immediately and it should not in any way depend upon new legislation. In any case, Parliament could not legally be called together for a full month. This had implications in two fields: (a) in regard to the balance of payments, the use of existing powers resulted in action that had many anomalies and inconsistencies (thus increasing the likelihood of domestic pressures to get rid of the measures as soon as possible); and (b) in regard to fiscal affairs, only those increases in revenues and economies in expenditures were possible which were under government control; fiscal economies could not be considered in respect of payments made on a statutory basis – for example, social security payments – and no new tax legislation was possible.

7. As to measures affecting the balance of payments, the only “invisible” item which could be immediately reduced was the tourist exemption, which had been very liberal by international standards. The exemption of $100 every three months, which applied largely to Canadian visitors to the United States, was reduced to $25. This was expected to have the effect of reducing the incentive which had previously existed for Canadian tourists to make buying trips in the United States. The exemption of $300 which applied only to Canadians making overseas visits had been reduced to $100.

8. The introduction of a system of graduated surcharges on imports had the double purpose of generating additional revenue and conserving foreign exchange. The system was correctly outlined in the Secretariat note, which had been based on the Prime Minister’s statement, but the impossibility, in the circumstances, of introducing a system which was altogether neat and consistent deserved emphasis. (Mr. Plumptre then explained how the surcharges were built up, item by item, from the differences – if any – between the “general tariff” rates and the rates for most-favoured-nation countries and for British preferential countries.)

9. Several other important features of the surcharges deserved to be stressed. Existing margins of tariff preference had been retained unchanged. No change in commercial policy was involved; as the Minister of Finance had stated on June 29, “the temporary application of these surcharges should not be interpreted as signifying any change whatsoever in the long-term commercial policy of the Canadian Government. The Government will continue to seek the reduction of trade barriers of all kinds, enlarged opportunities for Canadian exports and the expansion of world trade on a multilateral and non-discriminatory basis.”<sup>9</sup> The surcharges were known to contain anomalies and to create difficulties both at home and abroad; the Canadian authorities considered that the system be eliminated as soon as appropriate improvements in the balance of payments situation justified such a course.

10. So far as fiscal measures were concerned, the revenue increases from the import surcharges would amount to $200 million on an annual basis and proposed reductions in government expenditures would amount to $250 million on an annual basis. The total of these changes, which could amount to something like $450 million, had to be compared with the announced budget deficit of $750 million, which on the basis of more recent estimates might have been somewhat larger. In any event, the effect of the fiscal measures should be to cut the budget deficit by at least half.

11. There were also measures affecting the Bank rate and the use of cash balances from exchange sales, dealt with separately by Mr. Lawson (see below).

12. In commenting on the general background and outlook, Mr. Plumtre said that Canada’s basic problem, from the international point of view, had been for the past three or four years, and continued to be, the heavy current account deficit in a situation in which the economy was not stretched and in which it could be argued that Canada ought not to be drawing on the world pool of scarce capital to cover its international deficit. The problem was aggravated by the exceptionally rapid growth of the labour force which was relatively a greater problem in Canada than in perhaps any other developed country. Despite these difficulties, the Canadian authorities had reason to believe that progress was being made.

13. The question whether the level of Canadian reserves was steady or fluctuating (which was raised in paragraph 3 of the Secretariat paper) was in fact a secondary and relatively superficial matter. With the move to a fixed exchange rate, the level of the reserves could not be expected to show the same stability it had in the previous decade. While these fluctuations might represent a more dramatic expression of Canadian problems, the underlying difficulties were the same as they had been for some years. Canada’s economic position and balance had properly been the concern of other countries even in a period when the reserves were steady; the combination of substantial underemployment of Canadian resources with unnecessarily large inflows of capital was a matter of continuing concern to the free world generally.

14. He said that some continuing capital inflow would be desirable, referring to paragraph 7 of the Secretariat note, and that the Canadian authorities would maintain a “hospitable climate” for foreign capital. In the short run, there were problems of interest rate policy which would be dealt with in detail by Mr. Lawson; how much inflow (and corresponding current account deficit) would be appropriate in the longer run depended on many factors at home and abroad. If a new “resource boom” like that of 1955-57 developed, substantial capital imports and corresponding current account deficits would be appropriate and in the general interest of the free world. However, the Canadian authorities did not consider developments of this sort likely in the near future. They were anticipating a period in which there would be a substantial lessening of imported capital requirements and corresponding current account deficits, representing a continuation and an acceleration of trends already evident in recent years. Theoretical studies which had been done in connection with the work of Working Party 2 on economic growth indicated that, on certain hypotheses, there was likely to be a persistent improvement, when cyclical and special factors were eliminated. Indeed, it would be remarkable if this were not the case. Canada was basically a very rich country and the variety of exploited resources had been greatly improved over the past 10 or 15 years. The efforts of the Government and others concerned would be to work with this basic improvement and to accelerate it. The new stable exchange rate would play a very important role; at the same time, prices and costs would have to be kept under control in order to take the fullest possible advantage of the new exchange rate. So far as the Government's long-term programme was concerned, appropriate measures were being given urgent consideration. However, these measures had not been considered by Ministers. It would therefore be premature to discuss them.

15. In the meantime, it was clear that the interim measures, especially the graduated surcharges on imports, should be supplanted as soon as possible by constructive measures to improve the balance of payments. In judging how soon this would be, it was necessary to take account of the inter-related problems of improving the current account and restoring confidence to the point where a more or less permanent restoration of the level of the reserves to an appropriate level had been achieved. The danger was that, under internal and external pressures, the interim measures would be dismantled too soon, with adverse effects on confidence. At the same time, the new exchange rate ought to represent a sufficiently large advantage to the Canadian business community that "protectionist" pressures in favour of a permanent retention of the additional advantage conferred by the surcharges should be minimized.

16. Dealing with recent financial developments, Mr. Lawson drew attention to the considerable change in interest rates which had taken place in the period since the end of April. At the end of April the yield curve for Government of Canada securities rose from about 3% on 91-day Treasury Bills to 4.85% on long-term bonds. This pattern was only a little different from the pattern at the end of 1961. By contrast, the present curve was almost horizontal at about 5½% with a slight bump at the short end.

17. Through 1961 and in early 1962, the Government of Canada has conducted its debt management in a manner designed to contribute to relatively easy credit conditions. The Government had had substantial cash requirements, both to cover its cash deficit and for refunding purposes, but its borrowing had been confined almost entirely to the short end of the market. There had been only two relatively unimportant exceptions to this, the occasional small mid-term issue and the normal annual issue of Canada Savings Bonds. Since January of 1962, the Government had not gone to the market for any new money. New money requirements had been financed from the Canadian dollar proceeds of sales of foreign exchange reserves, which under Canadian law were held by the Minister of Finance.

18. Since the development of the foreign exchange emergency, there were two important changes in the Government's financing practices to report. The Minister of Finance had earmarked the Canadian dollar balances from the sales of foreign exchange reserves since March 31 for the purpose of financing increases in the reserves, and these funds would not be used to meet ordinary Government expenditures. Second, the Government had ceased to confine its financing largely to the short end of the market. The Minister of Finance had announced on July 16 a new issue of Government bonds totalling $200 million, open as to maturity between:

- (1) 7 year 2 month 5½% non-callable bonds due October 1, 1969 at a price of 99% to yield about 5.67% to maturity, and
- (2) 18 year 5½% non-callable bonds due August 1, 1980 at a price of 98% to yield about 5.68% to maturity.

In addition, $85 million in 366-day Treasury Bills were to be sold by competitive tender on July 30.

19. In the field of banking, the outstanding feature of the past year had been a strong demand for bank loans. Bank loans had been rising at an annual rate of 10% in the second half of 1961, and this trend had been accelerating during 1962. In 1961, monetary policy had been such as to allow the banks to accommodate the increase in loans and to add at the same time to their liquidity; since January 1962 the policy had been to allow the increase in the demand for loans to lead to progressive tightening in the banking system. This trend had proceeded very rapidly in recent weeks, with the banks making heavy sales of Government of Canada securities in order to meet the loan demand. By June 24 the floating bank rate had risen to 5.17% – and on that date the bank rate was fixed at 6%. The Bank of Canada continued, however, to stand ready to provide credit to money market dealers who had lines of credit with the central bank on the former basis of the current Treasury Bill rate plus  $\frac{1}{4}$  per cent.

20. At present, monetary policy was directed primarily towards achieving and maintaining a level of interest rates sufficiently high to permit the current account deficit to be financed and the foreign exchange reserves to be restored, as a result of capital imports. Within this framework, the monetary authorities wanted to do what they could to maintain credit conditions conducive to the internal economic adjustments which were required in order to produce a basic improvement in the current account balance. It was not possible to say what this policy was likely to involve in terms of monetary expansion; it might mean that there would be no monetary expansion for a time. It was almost certain to mean that the banks would not be able to accommodate increases in their loans at anything like the recent rates. The restraints which the banks were finding necessary to moderate the rate of loan expansion were being undertaken. At the same time, there were reasons to be hopeful that the banks were tackling the problem in a way designed to maintain the availability of credit throughout the Canadian economy. Apart from some speculative activity, there was not much economic activity in Canada which one would wish to see reduced; on the contrary, an increase in economic activity was desirable, particularly in export-oriented and import-competing industries.

21. In the present circumstances, one of the most useful things the banks could do would be to push larger borrowers into the new-issue market. Activity in the new issue market had in fact been somewhat lower than normal; to a degree this was the counterpart of the increase in demands for bank loans. One source of difficulty in this connection was the statutory 6% maximum on bank lending rates, which was tending to make bank loans one of the cheapest sources of credit. Although this provision was under examination by the Royal Commission on Banking and Finance, no early action could be expected. Therefore, deliberate and conscious efforts would be required if the diversion of borrowers to the new issue market was to be achieved. More use of the security market would help the market to do its job of finding the terms on which residents and non-residents were prepared to hold the flow of new securities necessary to finance the economy.

The discussions were held in Mr. Roosa's office and ran from 9:30 a.m. (through lunch in the Treasury) to 2:30 p.m. Mr. Dillon joined the group for 20 minutes or so before lunch. (Messrs. Dillon, Martin and Rasminsky had previously had a talk together at a dinner given by Mr. Martin on July 21. There had also been discussion between Mr. Roosa and the Canadians at dinner at his home on July 22.)

The meeting began with a review of Canadian developments by Mr. Rasminsky, supplemented later by Mr. Plumptre. The principal points that emerged in discussion were the following:

1. On the Canadian emergency program Mr. Roosa commented that there were "two schools of thought in every government" and he attributed the opposition to the Canadian import surtaxes in the U.S. administration to concern about the passage of the U.S. administration's trade legislation and to concern in principle that a "leading member of GATT" had had recourse to measures of this character. He noted the advantages that would flow from the early formulation and announcement of longer-term measures of a non-protectionist character. Mr. Plumptre commented on some of the factors which will influence the timing and the nature of the longer-term program.

2. On the underlying Canadian balance of payments position there was general agreement with the Canadian view that our current account deficit should over time be greatly reduced. Mr. Roosa seemed to feel that there must be much more to come from the change that has occurred in our exchange rate and he recognized that the increases required in U.S. exports would have to be achieved in other areas. He said that U.S. opinion was to some extent sensitive to the way in which the case for reducing the Canadian current account deficit is put and hoped that statements with a protectionist flavour could be avoided.

3. On the flow of capital from the United States to Canada, the U.S. officials confirmed that there were no official reservations of any kind about access by Canadian borrowers to the New York capital market. Mr. Roosa said that the efforts of the administration to increase the awareness of the public of the U.S. balance of payments situation may be a factor contributing to some of the views one encountered, and that there was a practical limit to how far U.S. government people could go in explaining the need for free movement of capital to Canada without creating confusion about other balance of payments matters. When people came to him he tried to make the administration's position clear. Mr. Hayes said that when people had come to him he had told them that he was aware of no official reservations about exports of capital to Canada.

4. On the Canadian foreign exchange rate there appeared to be full agreement with the view expressed by Mr. Rasminsky that the defence of the present rate is clearly in the interests of both Canada and other countries.

5. On the Bank of Canada – Federal Reserve swap both Messrs. Hayes and Martin made it clear that the swap was renewable and that they were happy that it should remain outstanding as long as it increased our comfort to have it. There are no plans on either side to use the proceeds of the swap. Mr. Coombs reported that there is some tendency to shift Federal Reserve swaps to a standby basis – the Dutch swap and part of the Swiss swap were now on this basis. It was made clear that the relevance of this to the swap with us was that when the time came that we felt we could relax and were ready to retire the swap in whole or in part we might wish to consider a standby arrangement.

6. On Canada's drawing from the I.M.F., Mr. Rasminsky said that we were not thinking of asking for a larger drawing either to repay other credits or for other purposes, and this position was not questioned. There was some discussion of the form of repayments to the Fund but it was recognized that any Canadian repayment was too far off to make any discussion of its form useful at this time.

7. On the adequacy of Canadian foreign exchange reserves there was agreement with the view expressed by Mr. Rasminsky that with a fixed exchange rate the Canadian target ought to be a level of reserves higher than the $1,800-$2,000 millions that we had kept with a floating exchange rate. The movements in our gold holdings were reviewed, and Mr. Roosa welcomed Mr. Rasminsky's observation that one important reason that we had been happy to sell gold to the Federal Reserve in June at $35, rather than elsewhere for a slightly higher price, was that we knew that we could buy gold from the Fed at $35 whenever we wanted. Mr. Rasminsky repeated what he had told the Americans when we started selling gold to them that we would have no inhibitions about buying gold from them to maintain a normal gold proportion in reserves and this statement was well received on the U.S. side. He said that he believed that Canada would not for the time being be selling any more gold.

SURCHARGES ON IMPORTS; FURTHER REVISIONS
 (Previous reference November 6†)

16. The Minister of Finance re-affirmed that he was prepared to recommend a second step toward the removal of surcharges on imports. Canada's foreign exchange reserves had continued to improve, and representations on the surcharges had been received from Canadian producers and consumers as well as from other countries.

Most foods and agricultural and fisheries products should now be freed of surcharges. The exceptions were wines, beers, spirits, cigars and cigarettes and a short list of luxury goods. The loss of revenue would be about $10 million in a full year, or about $4 million in this fiscal year.

The surcharges on refrigerators and carpets should be reduced to 10 per cent. The surcharges on certain items of printing machinery and equipment, and on ambulances and hearses, should be removed.

An explanatory memorandum was circulated (Minister's memorandum, Oct. 29 – Cab. Doc. 350-62†).

17. During the brief discussion some said that few undertakers in Canada were likely to be in urgent need of hearses, and that the inclusion of this item at this time would invite ridicule.

18. The Cabinet agreed with the recommendations of the Minister of Finance that Treasury Board approval be sought, and an order in council be issued,

(a) to remove the import surcharge on all agricultural, fisheries and food products, except those specified in the Minister's memorandum (Cab. Doc. 350-62 of October 29th), and amend tariff item 23a to remove the surcharge on cocoa presscake;

(b) to reduce the surcharge on refrigerators (tariff item 415a) and carpets (tariff item 572) from 15 to 10 per cent; and,

(c) to remove the surcharge on printing machinery and equipment covered by tariff items 412b and 412d.

19. The Cabinet also agreed that the surcharge on ambulances and hearses should not be changed at this time.

EXCHANGE FUND – FURTHER DEMOBILIZATION OF EMERGENCY SUPPORT

The following proposals are put forward after consultation with Mr. Rasminsky and with his concurrence.

We suggest that the time has come to take two further steps towards the demobilization of the emergency support for our Exchange Fund as announced by the Prime Minister on June 24th.

You will recall that the emergency support was made up as follows:

	$ million (U.S.)
(1) Drawing from the International Monetary Fund	300
(2) Reciprocal deposit arrangement with the Federal Reserve Bank of New York	250
(3) Similar arrangement with the Bank of England	100
(4) Standby with the Ex-Im Bank	400
	1,050

When these arrangements were made, it was understood that if the Government was forced actually to use any of these emergency funds it would have recourse first to the monies supplied by the International Monetary Fund, second to the monies supplied by the two Central Banks and, third, as a last resort, to actual borrowings from the Ex-Im Bank. Due account has been taken of these priorities in the demobilization which has taken place so far.

The present position of the four items is, accordingly, as follows:

	$ million (U.S.)
(1) Drawing from the International Monetary Fund	300 (Unchanged)
(2) Reciprocal deposit arrangement with the Federal Reserve Bank of New York	75 (The amount paid off, $175M, has been replaced by a stand-by arrangement.)
(3) Similar arrangement with the Bank of England	25 (No stand-by has been arranged with the Bank of England.)
(4) Standby with the Ex-Im Bank	150 ($250M of this stand-by was released in September in connection with the successful placement of a Canadian Government loan for that amount with New York insurance companies.)

We believe that the time has now come when we should demobilize the remainder of items (2), (3) and (4), leaving only item (1) – the IMF drawing as a contribution to our Exchange Fund.

In detail our proposals are as follows.

The stand-by with the Ex-Im runs for quarterly periods and the present period ends on December 24th. We pay a commitment fee of  $\frac{1}{4}$  of 1% per annum on the outstanding amount. We propose that arrangements should now be made for the complete cancellation of the stand-by on December 24th. However, no announcement would be made until January 3rd (see below).

The present reciprocal deposit arrangement with the Federal Reserve Bank of New York and the similar arrangement with the Bank of England run until December 26th. Mr. Rasminsky intends to allow them to terminate on that date. As before, he would arrange for a stand-by with the Federal Reserve Bank of New York equal to the amount of the reciprocal arrangement that is terminating, i.e. $75 million (U.S.).

December 26th falls on a Wednesday and the Bank of Canada publishes its weekly figures on that day. Hence, Mr. Rasminsky would announce that day the termination of the reciprocal currency arrangements and an additional stand-by with the Federal Reserve Bank of New York.

We would suggest that on January 3rd you should issue an announcement covering the following points:

- (a) the official holdings of gold and foreign exchange as at the end of December,
- (b) the fact that the remaining stand-by with Ex-Im Bank had been cancelled, and
- (c) the fact that on that day the Exchange Fund was receiving $125 million (U.S., this being the second half of the bond issue placed with the New York insurance companies which is payable to us on that day).<sup>10</sup>

It is of course not possible to forecast as of today what the month-end total for our official reserves will be. The latter part of December is normally a time of some outflow of dividends; on the other hand, there are indications that the capital inflow is still being maintained and the Exchange Fund made substantial purchases today. All in all, one can be reasonably confident that the showing will be satisfactory, particularly if the month-end figure is announced in conjunction with the receipt of an additional $125 million (U.S.) on January 3rd.

You will note that the proposals that we are making would mean that by the end of the year the Exchange Fund would have paid off all of its emergency support except that which had been obtained from the International Monetary Fund. This would, I believe, suggest a firm and confident posture with which to enter the new year.

May we have your concurrence or otherwise at latest by lunch time on Thursday (December 20th)?
