CABINET DOCUMENT NO. 345-62
CONFIDENTIAL

[Ottawa], October 25, 1962

THE SITUATION IN THE CONGO

The slow progress in implementing the United Nations reconciliation plan for the Congo, together with evidence of a military build-up in Katanga has created the impression that Mr. Tshombe, the Katanga leader, may be delaying matters in the hope that either Prime Minister Adoula's Government will fall or the United Nations, for financial reasons, will be forced to withdraw its troops.

2. To discourage further delay and prevent a further increase in Katanga's military strength Mr. Adoula, with the approval of UN representatives, has requested Union Minière to stop paying to Katanga taxes and fees lawfully due to the Central Government. Mr. Adoula has asked the Belgian Government to urge Union Minière to comply with the above request and has also sought the help of the United Nations.

3. If Union Minière decides to comply with the Central Government's request it may insist that UN troops protect its installations and European personnel from possible retaliation by the Katanga Gendarmerie. This could mean that UN troops might be asked to occupy the mining towns and perhaps establish garrisons at the power stations and along the railway. An attempt to deploy UN troops in this way could lead to fighting.

4. The United Nations are continuing their efforts to persuade both parties to implement the reconciliation plan. Meanwhile U Thant has indicated that should it become obvious that Mr. Tshombe has no intention of cooperating he will ask representatives at the next meeting of the Congo Advisory Committee on 30 October for their government's approval of the new approach. At the same time he has made it clear that approval can be meaningful only if contributing governments are prepared to accept the possible consequences.

5. In determining our attitude to these new developments I think we must bear in mind first that time is running out for the U.N. in as much as no new funds have been or are likely to be authorized for the Congo operation beyond 1962 and, secondly, that it would be a very severe blow to the prestige and future usefulness of the Organization were it to fail in the Congo or to suffer a military defeat at the hands of the Katanga gendarmerie.

6. Canada's contribution to the UN military operation consists of approximately 320 men. The bulk of these (276) are army signal troops who operate the UN forces communications network, and the rest are staff and air personnel. At the moment there are approximately 40 Canadian personnel in Katanga. Because of their key role in the field of communications, administration, air control and logistics and the fact that it would be very difficult for the UN to replace them from politically acceptable countries, a decision to restrict their use in Katanga could jeopardize the whole UN operation at a crucial moment. Also any weakening of support from Canada and the other Western countries at this time would make it more difficult for the Acting Secretary-General to resist the offer of troops from certain countries who are prepared to use force against Katanga.

7. U Thant has also raised the question of seeking a new mandate from the Security Council. It would seem preferable to avoid this because the Council might fail to reach a decision; and the Soviet Union might seize the opportunity to attack the whole reconciliation plan and possibly U Thant himself. A further deployment of U.N. troops in Katanga could be justified under the existing mandate on the basis of their right of freedom of movement and their duty, if requested, to protect the European population in the mining towns.

Recommendations

8. In view of the foregoing I have the honour to recommend that the Canadian Delegation to the United Nations be authorized to indicate in the Congo Advisory Committee that the Canadian Government:

(a) approves the new approach to the Union Minière to pay taxes and fees lawfully due to the Central Government.

(b) accepts the risks involved without placing restriction on the normal use of Canadian personnel should U.N. troops within the terms of the existing mandate be called upon to protect the installations and communications of Union Minière.

(c) is not in favour of seeking a new mandate from the Security Council at this time.

SITUATION IN THE CONGO

45. The Secretary of State for External Affairs said that the United Nations faced some serious problems in the Congo as a result of Prime Minister Adoula's request to the Union Minière to stop paying taxes to Katanga which were lawfully due to the Central Government. His objective was to prevent further military strengthening of Katanga. If the Union Minière agreed to this it might insist on U.N. protection. But the U.N. did not have the necessary force. It would be serious from the military point of view to attempt it. The Katanga forces almost outnumbered the U.N. forces by 2 to 1. The Union Minière was spread out and it would be almost impossible to give it full protection. However, the only hope was for Mr. Adoula's operation to proceed. He had gone as far as he could with Tshombe. The Belgians had moved in to support the U.N., but they needed some economic pressures on Tshombe if he did not agree. They were trying to get some of the Union Minière's money payable to the Central Government. This might eventually involve putting U.N. troops in to protect the mining companies. Canadian troops operated the central signal system. There might be shooting, and it was felt that Canada could hardly refuse to support the U.N. attempt to control Tshombe.

An explanatory memorandum had been circulated (Minister's memorandum, Oct. 25 – Cab. Doc. 345/62).

46. During the discussion the following points were raised:

(a) Some said to use force would be contrary to Canada's stand enunciated in London. Others said it would only mean the use of force defensively to protect property.

(b) Some felt that Canada should never have sent troops into the Congo, and to use them in this way would be viewed with horror in the United Kingdom. Others added that the U.N. force did not have the strength to put the protective plan into effect. They had a poor command, they would have poor communications because of the widespread operation, and in general would be incapable of doing the job.

47. The Cabinet agreed that the Canadian Delegation to the United Nations should not indicate in the Congo Advisory Committee that Canada in any way approves of the proposed new approach to the Union Minière, or accepts any increased risks to Canadian personnel in the protection of Union Minière's interests, or that Canada is in favour of a new mandate being sought from the Security Council, as had been outlined in the memorandum to Cabinet (Cab. Doc. 345/62, Oct. 25).

CONGO – REQUESTS FOR MILITARY TRAINING ASSISTANCE

Attached are copies of telegrams 3229 of November 1† and 3240 of November 2, 1962, † in which our mission in Washington reported that the U.S. authorities would like to have our views concerning the possibility of providing assistance in modernizing and training the Congolese Armed Forces. The same subject was raised recently by General Mobutu in Leopoldville, as reported in paragraph 2 of our mission's attached telegram 194 of November 23 (amended copy). †

2. You will recall that the Cabinet agreed on January 26, 1962 that it was not possible to make available 20 officers with the qualifications and experience required for such a task, as requested by the Acting Secretary-General. U Thant was informed on January 30; on February 1 he replied by asking Canada to provide any number of officers that could be spared and indicated that officers who were retired, on the inactive list or in the reserve would be acceptable. You asked the Minister of National Defence to look into this revised request and on April 5 you were able to inform U Thant that it had been found that Canada could make available six or seven French-speaking officers who were not on the active list to assist in the training of the Congolese Armed Forces. The Permanent Mission informed us subsequently that the Acting Secretary-General was most grateful for our offer but that the plans for the provision of a U.N. Training Cadre had been put in cold storage on account of a difference of opinion between Prime Minister Adoula and General Mobutu.

3. We have always agreed in the past with the U.N. assessment that the modernization and retraining of the Congolese Army was one of the prerequisites of the re-establishment of peace and order in that country. We have always considered also that any military assistance to the Congo should be directed by and through the U.N. We have made this clear to the Congolese and Ghanaian leaders who have broached this subject with us in the past. This policy was based on the recommendations of the Security Council and also on our assessment that unless assistance was administered by the U.N. it would be open to criticism as a Western-sponsored move and would provide a pretext for military assistance proposals from the Soviet Bloc. For these reasons, I would be chary of openly endorsing General Mobutu's or even the U.S. "proposals" unless we had more details on the role which is envisaged for the U.N. in these schemes. In this connection I note that Washington's telegram 3229 reports that U.S. officials are contemplating the possibility of fulfilling all the requirements through bilateral arrangements rather than under the executive direction of the U.N. In a subsequent telephone conversation, however, our mission in Washington has made it clear that the State Department had no intention of bypassing the U.N. and wished simply to engage in direct negotiations with other countries in order to expedite the matter.

4. It may be that the U.N. has lost interest in assuming the executive direction of such a scheme and it must be recognized that the Congolese themselves may not be willing to accept a programme in which the U.N. would be responsible for the major share of the executive direction. You will recall that General Mobutu has expressed great misgivings on past U.N. "hodgepodge" proposals. He considered, and I believe that there is something to be said in favour of his opinion, that if an Officers' Training School was staffed by officers recruited from several countries, its efficiency would be seriously impaired.

5. I consider that the best proposal was the original U.N.-sponsored scheme which aimed at entrusting each aspect of military training to one given country which was to run a defence institution in the Congo under U.N. auspices. Canada, however, is not in a position to go back to this proposal since we have had to decline the U.N. request to provide the full staff of 20 for an Officers' Training School in the Congo. Since no other politically acceptable country has agreed to take up this task, there would seem to be some merit in discussing the U.N. "proposal" with the State Department and representatives from other countries.

6. I have brought Washington's telegrams to the attention of the Chairman, Chiefs of Staff, who has agreed that more details on the U.S. proposals are needed, and particularly on the role of the United Nations in it, before we would be in a position to say whether we could support it and participate in it. With respect to the U.S. suggestion that a representative of his Department participate in discussions in the U.S. on this matter, he stated that he preferred to wait until discussions had gone a little farther so that he could prepare definite instructions for his staff.

7. Attached for your signature, if you agree, is a telegram outlining the following position to Washington:

(i) We favour the provision of military training assistance to the Congo under U.N. direction;

(ii) From the point of view of military efficiency, it would be desirable that the Congolese Armed Forces be trained, insofar as possible, according to a fixed and pre-determined military tradition. It would be preferable therefore to recruit the Commandant and the senior officers of each institution from a single country or at least from countries sharing a common military tradition;

(iii) We are prepared to provide, for any sound training scheme acceptable to the U.N., the six or seven French-speaking officers who were the subject of our offer to the Acting Secretary-General last April.

8. Also attached for your signature, if you agree, is a telegram asking Mr. Gauvin to inform General Mobutu that we have not found it possible to provide the twenty officers who would be required under his own proposal.<sup>1</sup>

Dear Norman [Robertson]

THE CONGO

I enclose the message for the Secretary of State from the Foreign Secretary which I mentioned on the telephone yesterday. I should be grateful if this could be conveyed to Mr. Green as soon as possible. I understand he is probably not returning to Ottawa until Saturday. In these circumstances it occurred to me that it might be useful if I could call to discuss the situation with you. I am therefore asking my Private Secretary to get into touch with yours to see if we can arrange a mutually convenient time.

Yours sincerely,

When we discussed the Congo in Nassau Mr. Diefenbaker told me that he thought that it was a mistake for the United Nations to get involved in fighting in the Congo to impose a political pattern on the country.

We have recently come near to that, but it seems now that the recent round of fighting is over. I feel therefore that all our efforts should be directed towards trying to secure a settlement which this time will really stick. I am doing everything I can to get Tshombe into renewed negotiations and I think that the United Nations as a result of the weekend's events are in a more co-operative mood. I think that they would be particularly sensitive to advice from your Government, having regard to your status in the United Nations, your position on the Advisory Committee and the presence of Canadian personnel in the Congo. I believe that anything that you can do to convince them of the importance of being magnanimous and imaginative at this stage will go a long way towards making a satisfactory settlement possible.

With all good wishes for 1963.

CONGO

The attached note from the British High Commissioner to you and its enclosed message from Lord Home to the Minister were read to the Minister by telephone this morning.

2. On his instructions I phoned Mr. Tremblay to ask him to seek an appointment with U Thant today and to express to him the Canadian Government's hope that the U.N. would find a moderate solution to the current difficulties in the Congo. If Tremblay needed any pretext for seeking an interview with the Secretary-General it should be that Canada, as a member of the Congo Advisory Committee with forces assigned to O.N.U.C., had a close and continuing interest in day to day developments in Katanga, and that he was acting on instructions in seeking a meeting. Tremblay was instructed to make the above representations orally.

3. Mr. Tremblay was instructed also to treat the Congo situation as the No. 1 priority of his Mission at this time and to keep in constant contact with the Secretariat and with certain missions in New York, particularly concerned with the Congo problem – Sweden, Ireland and certain key African and Asian countries such as Nigeria, Malaya and India.

4. Mr. Tremblay later telephoned to say that he was seeing U Thant at 5:45 p.m. today and would report later by telephone.<sup>2</sup>

CONGO

Pursuant to instructions conveyed by telephone, Tremblay saw U Thant at 5:45 p.m. January 2 for the purpose of expressing the Canadian Government's hope that the United Nations would find a moderate solution to the problem of Katangan secession. Tremblay telephoned at 8 p.m. the following oral report which will be supplemented by a fuller account by telegram.

2. He found the Secretary-General relaxed and satisfied with the way things were going in Katanga. U Thant regarded the conduct of the U.N. forces as both correct and successful so far. He expressed considerable gratification that his predictions had been correct in that the U.N. was encountering no really organized resistance on the part of Tshombe's forces and

U.N. casualties so far had been slight. U Thant's reaction to the statement of the Canadian position – the need to find a moderate solution and to exercise restraint – was that this was precisely his own position as well. He confirmed that he was determined that the eventual solution should be found in political negotiations rather than in military action. Concerning political negotiations the Secretariat had already made the decision to deal with Tshombe at the right moment, not to ignore him nor attempt to crush him.

3. Regarding U.N. military plans, U Thant was reluctant to be specific. He said that there was no overall plan to occupy by force key centres in Katanga although circumstances might arise that might make this necessary. However, no such instructions to the U.N. Commander had been issued and assurances to that effect had been given to the Belgian Foreign Minister earlier in the day.

CONGO: ANC RETRAINING AND REORGANIZATION SCHEME

This morning we attended State Department Meeting at which Whitehouse of Congo Desk and Colonel Greene of USA Army<sup>3</sup> (not repeat not Air Force as previously reported) outlined further steps which had been taken towards implementation of retraining and reorganization scheme for Congolese Armed Forces. Others attending were representatives of British, Belgian and Italian Embassies and of AID. Although there was a new reference to Norway as a possible participant in scheme no repeat no Norwegian representative attended: we were told later that their involvement was a new idea and that State Department would be having initial discussions with them separately. We were also told that USA has shelved Israeli participation at least temporarily on political grounds.

2. Apart from bringing us up to date Whitehouse described purposes of meeting as (a) to alert our countries to likelihood that formal requests would be forthcoming from UN within next few weeks to participate in scheme and (b) to encourage possible participants to study the programme with a view to deciding in advance what portions they would be interested in undertaking. Meeting did not repeat not discuss recent events in Katanga but it was noted they might further delay discussions on implementation of scheme. Whitehouse also thought that trend of events seemed to reinforce need to develop ANC as a stabilizing factor. He repeated his earlier remark that the principal object of the whole exercise was to ensure that ANC would be a factor for peace and order in Congo.

3. Colonel Greene reported that he had on December 28 had discussions in New York with General Rikhye to clarify details of scheme and UN's involvement. Earlier (about December 22) Central Congo Government had sent a note to UN asking that it undertake implementation of the "proposal for modernization and training" of Congo armed forces (i.e. Colonel Greene's plan copy of which was attached to our letter 1652 November 2†) and setting forth specific first steps to be undertaken. English text giving terms of Congolese request is given in our immediately following telegram.†

4. Following Colonel Greene's discussions December 28 a positive response was sent by UN to Central Government indicating that UN will undertake full responsibility for programme and will shortly make specific proposals to Central Government on how it plans to fulfil the request. The next step will be a message from UN to Central Government giving a list of countries it proposes to invite to participate in programme. This list will include Norway, Italy, Britain, Belgium, USA and Canada. After receiving satisfactory response from Central Government Secretariat will proceed to invite countries to participate and to select portions of programme which they wish to take on. Whitehouse noted that in these further steps the list of countries might be altered but he thought it unlikely any would be dropped from present list.

5. In discussing Congolese request to UN Colonel Greene said it covered the broad first steps to be taken in implementing the scheme. He noted that reference in opening paragraph to ANC's "ultimate strength" reflected the difficulties that had arisen with Mobutu on the question of ANC's size. Mobutu was not repeat not willing to commit himself in advance to the envisaged strength of 15,000 and USA had acknowledged that in light of experience with training scheme it might be appropriate to make some adjustment in ultimate goals. Greene recalled that his proposal had been drawn up last summer and changing circumstances may have already made it outdated in some respects. He had pointed out to Mobutu that it would be possible to continue discussion over a long period searching for the perfect scheme but that it was necessary to begin somewhere and allow the scheme to develop and adjust as experience dictated.

6. Colonel Greene described the current over all operational concept of the scheme. He thought that each participating government would likely wish to have a military mission in Congo. Arrangements for these missions would be made by bilateral agreements between governments and Central Congo Government. These agreements would then (and Secretary-General had insisted on this) be passed to UN for approval and would in a sense thus become tripartite agreements involving participating country Congo and UN. There would thus be a series of small national missions (as an example Greene said USA planned a mission of seven; three officers and four enlisted men) whose activities would be coordinated by a small UN staff drawn from participating countries. The Head of UN Staff would be appointed by Secretary-General after consultation with Congo Prime Minister and General Mobutu. (Greene made the personal remark this officer should be ranked not repeat not higher than Brigadier General i.e. less than Mobutu's rank). Mobutu had insisted and UN and USA had agreed that group administering scheme be entirely separate from the present ONUC command; but UN head of scheme would nonetheless be responsible to UN officer in charge in Congo.

7. In describing proposed structure it was apparent that USA officials were using example drawn from their own requirements for a USA military mission. For legal reasons related to provision of equipment and support they would require to have USA mission on the spot and they thought that other countries might have similar requirements. For its part USA expected to establish its presence at a low level and to be occupied mostly with provision of equipment and support for scheme. Greene said also that they planned to undertake the English language training part of the scheme (item 8 in the Congolese note). On financing Greene suggested that participating governments would pay and support their national missions whereas UN would cover cost of international coordinating staff.

8. Greene indicated that USA had already drawn up lists of equipment which might be required for scheme during current fiscal year. This was based on premise that first efforts might be made in respect of the Fourth Independent Brigade and some work on airforce side. He indicated that general approach underlying their plan was to work unit by unit through the ANC providing necessary equipment as and when units became capable of using it.

9. On total numbers of training officers required under the scheme Greene indicated that initially 15 would be required for the army, seven for the naval element and six (as noted in item 3 of Congolese note) for airforce. When scheme is fully operative these numbers may rise to perhaps 80 for army and 34 for airforce element. Some 18 personnel (including eight officers) would also be required for academy.

10. In response to a question about coordination and general philosophy underlying scheme (which you had raised in your telegram DL-1740†) Greene said they thought that once scheme was operating coordination could be most effectively carried out among UN head of scheme and heads of military missions in Leopoldville with any significant differences being settled between UN headquarters and national governments. It was important in the beginning that governments should select the area which they wished to cover so that each area of training would be handled by one national group. He noted that Belgian influence has predominated in ANC and that there should be no repeat no attempt to meddle with traditions which have been well developed. Some adjustment might be required but he thought that such adjustments could be worked out smoothly on the spot.

11. In concluding meeting USA officials stressed their desire to move ahead with implementing this scheme. In fact it could move ahead only as fast as necessary steps (indicated above) were taken by UN and Congo authorities but USA hoped by keeping other potential participants informed to shorten subsequent delays as much as possible. They also hoped that in a short while (and perhaps even before formal UN requests were received) there could be a further meeting of the same representatives once governmental views had been obtained. Early indication of governmental preferences with regard to areas of scheme they wished to cover would be most valuable.

12. After the meeting Colonel Greene spoke to us separately to say that in his discussions with Mobutu the latter had stressed his desire to have a Canadian officer placed in charge of the scheme. Greene said he had mentioned this to our Chargé in Leopoldville and to Rikhye during his December 28 discussions. He also said that while they had no repeat no wish to interfere in detailed Canadian consideration of the scheme they had thought that Canada might most suitably concern itself with the establishment of the military academy.

U.N. ACTION IN KATANGA

The two attached telegrams to New York (DL-9† and 10† of January 7), repeating the text of reports from the Canadian Commanding Officer in the Congo, describe the circumstances under which the U.N. Command in the Congo reportedly decided to send troops toward Jadotville “regardless of New York’s wishes.” You will recall that this incident was also reported in telegrams from New York, Brussels and Leopoldville.

2. While this decision is understandable and may prove best in the Congo’s long-term interests, this division which has general responsibility for liaison with DND on the conduct of U.N. “peace-keeping” operations, is very much concerned about the precedent which may have been established. The chain of command between the U.N. Headquarters and the troops actually engaged in “peace-keeping” operations has always left something to be desired. In this case, if the allegation is confirmed, the local U.N. Commanders have taken a decision to proceed with military operations because of military considerations and of their assessment of the political situation in opposition to the political assessment made by the Secretary-General himself. Such a move, in our estimation, endangers the whole concept of peace-keeping operations as they have been supported consistently by Canada since 1956. It is essential, if such operations are to be successful, that troops serving under the U.N. banner be able to show greater restraint in any circumstances than could be expected from other armed forces. One may recall that in a similar situation, but a different political context, General MacArthur was asked to resign U.N. Command in Korea in 1951. At that time Canada would have strongly resented any independent move made by U.N. Commanders in the field.

3. It would seem that the Secretariat itself has appreciated the gravity of the incident and that the departure of Mr. Bunche for the Congo<sup>4</sup> may be related to it. This should help to restore the chain of authority between New York and Elisabethville. We wonder, however, whether what has already occurred may not have far reaching consequences. It may later on help to persuade Governments that to agree to the presence of U.N. troops on soil would be risky; at the very least it would induce them to insist on controlling the nationality of the local U.N. Commanders. There is no need to stress the dangers raised by this precedent insofar as it would affect the conduct of future U.N. “peace-keeping” operations.

4. I suggest that we should first endeavour to establish the facts. Even though there is little doubt that U.N. Commanders in the Congo did not fully obey orders from New York, it would be necessary to ascertain the terms of the instructions which were received from New York and how far U.N. Commanders were prepared to go against these. I suggest that the facts can best be obtained in Washington and a telegram is attached for your approval.†

5. If Colonel Hamilton's report is substantially confirmed, then we might later go on to discuss the implications for U.N. peace-keeping operations, as indicated above.

SECRET. CANADIAN EYES ONLY.

Reference: D.L. (1) Division's memorandum of January 8.

UNITED NATIONS ACTION IN KATANGA

The memorandum under reference expresses grave concern about recent events in the Congo and particularly about the ONUC advance on Jadotville apparently without proper authority from New York. The memorandum refers to two messages of January 3 and 4 from the Canadian contingent in the Congo and contained in telegrams DL-9 and DL-10 of January 7. The main concern of D.L. (1) Division is about the breakdown in the chain of command from New York to the troops in the field. The main worry of our military, as revealed in their telegrams, appears to be the chicken-heartedness of the United Nations authorities in New York in failing to exploit military advantage in Katanga.

2. D.L. (1) Division is also concerned about the "precedent" established by these recent events and about their implication on United Nations peace-keeping operations. The suggestion is that we approach the United States authorities for their "account of the facts" and their assessment of implications for the United Nations.

3. If there was a breakdown in communications and command from New York, and I understand that the Secretary-General has admitted this, it is a serious matter. If the Secretary-General's representative, Mr. Gardiner, and his military commanders in the field decided to move against Jadotville in defiance of precise orders from New York, that is also serious. It is important, moreover, that we try to establish the facts of the case in order to decide what should be done to prevent serious breaks in the United Nations chain of command in future peace-keeping operations.

4. I must confess, however, that I do not regard the most recent events as creating any new crisis in United Nations affairs or as establishing any particular precedent in relation to peace-keeping. In my experience, there have been frequent occasions when the situation in field became so confused that the United Nations authorities in New York lost touch with it. This happened from time to time in Lebanon in an operation much similar and much simpler. It has happened before in the Congo. It could happen again there. The reference to events in Korea involving General MacArthur is applicable only in the sense that it demonstrated that even a Great Power like the United States can have breaks in its chain of command, for there can be no doubt that General MacArthur's orders at that time emanated from Washington rather than United Nations Headquarters.

5. I am not condoning what happened in any of these cases. It has been very apparent in the Congo operation that the United Nations can no longer intervene in complicated political situations without great precision in its mandate, without a firm controlling command and without a carefully balanced and integrated military and civilian staff. Moreover, in a situation like that in the Congo, with the troops far flung and communications heavily burdened, there could easily be confusion in the conduct of operations even with the best organization in the world. This kind of development has happened in the course of military engagements throughout history. It is part of the “confusion of battle.”<sup>5</sup>

6. My point is that there is no reason to seize upon one or more incidents in the Congo operation and to regard them as dangerous precedents. In terms of future peace-keeping under the United Nations flag, the whole Congo operation will have to be studied very carefully for all of its implications – political, military and otherwise. There can be no doubt that it represents a turning point in United Nations peace-keeping but also in the future life and role of the United Nations. Accordingly, I am reluctant to see us embark on any premature or piecemeal inquest.

7. The United Nations and its members have many lessons to learn from the Congo experience. The chain of command is one element. The delegation of authority is another. The establishment of competent staff in New York and on the ground is yet another. The role of individual contingents raises a whole set of questions, not the least of which is whether national commanders should be free to send unvarnished and incomplete reports about difficult situations, both military and political. We have already had several illustrations of the misunderstanding and false impression which can be created from an ill-advised report through our military channels.

8. As for the source of the facts of the present case, I seriously question whether Washington would be any more help to us than London, Brussels, Leopoldville or New York. It seems highly possible to me that the advance on Jadotville was encouraged by United States authorities either in Washington or in the Congo. From personal experience, I can vouch for the acute degree of pressure which is exerted locally by national representatives on United Nations representatives in the field. I do not argue that we could not try to find out as much as we can about events in the Congo but I question whether at the present time we are likely to be any wiser after a canvass of views from the parties most directly concerned. At this critical time, they are bound to be biased in their description and interpretation of facts.

9. My own guess is that, as in the case of Dr. Conor Cruise O’Brien and of a number of other United Nations representatives who found themselves in the same difficulty, the situation at Jadotville last week was not so much a case of defiance of orders as one of interpreting ambiguous instructions in a way which best suited the situation on the ground as seen by the civilian and military officers there. I do not advance this as an excuse for what happened but as a practical suggestion as to how it happened. We shall not remedy the ills of this situation by holding inquests and assigning blame. We can only hope to improve peace-keeping operations in the future by learning the lessons of the past and by strengthening the machinery (our own included) available to the United Nations.

G.S. MURRAY

P.S. I make these comments because I believe that in this particular case DL(1) is getting a little beyond its own field of responsibility which is detailed liaison with DND on established peacekeeping operations. I hope that you will agree that UN Div[ision] is the proper one for assessing implications of UN conduct of affairs – especially when political considerations are very much involved. G. M[urray]

UNITED NATIONS ACTION IN KATANGA

According to our information the occupation of Jadotville by U.N. troops was carried out at the initiative of the Indian Commander on the spot with the reluctant concurrence of Leopoldville and against the orders of New York.

2. It seems that after U.N. troops had put two battalions across the Lufira River, New York ordered them not only not to advance on Jadotville but to withdraw back across the River. The Indian Commander pointed out to the Force Commander at Leopoldville that compliance with this order would jeopardize the security of his forces and have a serious effect on morale, and insisted that the momentum of the troops must be maintained. The Force Commander (presumably after consultation with Gardiner) replied that he did not have enough information to judge either of these factors and he must therefore leave the decision to the local commander. The latter not encountering any further resistance at this point moved into Jadotville.

3. New York's motives for ordering a halt at the Lufira River are not entirely clear, but presumably the U.N. was subject to pressure from the British and Belgians (U Thant is reported to have assured Mr. Spaak that U.N. troops would not take Jadotville) and they may genuinely have feared that a continued advance would have met with heavy resistance (and casualties) from the gendarmerie and would have provoked widespread sabotage of the mining installations at Jadotville. Neither of these fears were realized (some sabotage apparently did take place at the cobalt plant in Jadotville but not on the scale feared). It is quite evident that the Secretariat is not entirely unhappy at what happened, although they seem to appreciate the long-term disadvantage to the U.N. of the apparent civilian loss of control over the military. (We should imagine that the Indian Government is also not unhappy at the military kudos their troops have gained through the advance on Jadotville.)

4. Perhaps one lesson to be learned from the Congo experience is that once hostilities begin (or the enemy is engaged as it were) U.N. troops, being made up of national contingents with national military traditions, cannot be expected to act much differently from other soldiers in similar conditions. Thus when serious fighting is involved the civilian authority must in the interest of morale and the efficient conduct of operations be prepared to allow the military commanders a certain amount of discretion.

5. We have some doubts about the advisability of approaching the State Department at this time for an account of the facts.<sup>6</sup> For one thing, it might seem strange that Canada, who is a member of the Congo Advisory Committee and has a contingent of over three hundred men participating in the Congo operation, should have to ascertain the facts from the U.S. Also, we think it is a little early to launch into an assessment of the Jadotville episode until the final scene in Katanga has been played. We therefore share U.N. Division's reluctance to embark on a piecemeal or premature study of the implications of the Congo experience for future U.N. peace-keeping operations.<sup>7</sup>

CONGO – TRAINING OF ANC

During the week, Ivan White of the U.S. Embassy, acting on instructions from the State Department, expressed to the CCOS and myself the U.S. Government's hope that Canada would be able to respond favourably to the proposals for Canadian participation in the training of the ANC outlined to our Embassy in Washington on the basis of the recommendations made by Colonel Greene's mission to the Congo. He took advantage of the occasion to express also the U.S. Government's warm appreciation of the valuable contribution which Canada has made around the world through its participation in a variety of U.N. peace-keeping activities.

2. Air Chief Marshal Miller said that the undertaking given last autumn by Canada to furnish 5 or 6 retired bilingual officers to take part in the training of the ANC still stood in principle. There would, in his estimation, be no need to seek new government authority to contribute up to that level. He noted, however, that the contribution now asked of Canada as a result of the Greene mission – to supply the officer in charge of the training mission and to staff the proposed U.N. military academy – differed from the Canadian contribution asked last autumn, and the officers we had in mind then for the assignment might not be suitable for the new requirement. More precise information was needed concerning the rank and skills required before a further effort could be made to locate and assign Canadian personnel. White said that he would have his people make further enquiries and supply the necessary information. (Our Embassy in Washington should perhaps be so notified.)

3. CCOS agreed with the American assessment that any real prospect of phasing out ONUC and putting a final end to the commitment of contributing nations to that body, ultimately depended upon the ability of the U.N. quickly to train the ANC to take over the maintenance of the internal security of the Congo.

Given the imperatives of the Congo situation – the imminent exhaustion of UN funds & withdrawal of Indian troops, Tshombe's record of deception, etc., U Thant has had no option but to allow events to run their course, including the present military offensive. I do not think we should inject ourselves into this very delicate situation by a premature inquisition. R. C[ampbell] 14/1.

THE SITUATION IN THE CONGO

Mr. Tshombe and his ministers have returned to Elisabethville where they are currently negotiating with Mr. Ileo, Central Government Minister of State in Katanga, about the practical problems of reintegrating the province. Reports from Leopoldville indicate, however, that there are strong pressures within the Central Government to get rid of Tshombe, a move which could lead to a breakdown in the province's administration. The Central Government have also been pressing the U.N. to permit them to send a contingent of the ANC to south Katanga to disarm and integrate the gendarmerie. Meanwhile a considerable number of ANC have already arrived in Elisabethville in civilian clothes.

The Military Situation

2. The present strength of ONUC is approximately 19,000 troops. By the end of April approximately 7,200 Indians, Tunisians and Nigerians will have been repatriated. To offset this decrease, current plans call for the arrival in the Congo by the end of March of approximately 2,340 troops (Indonesians, Ghanaians, Norwegians and Danes). It is possible, however, that some of these projected arrivals will be cancelled.

3. The United Nations have not set a firm date for the repatriation of ONUC forces. However, on January 23 Brigadier Rikhye suggested to the Canadian military adviser in New York that on the basis of the present favourable conditions in the Congo it might be possible to repatriate all U.N. forces, with the possible exception of one unit, perhaps in the size of a battalion group, by August 1963. Brigadier Rikhye hoped that the Canadian Government would not move the Canadian Signal Unit in the very near future although he agreed that should the Canadian Signals Commander and ONUC Headquarters concur New York would be prepared to accept a phased reduction of the Canadian contingent.

ANC Training Programme

4. One of the most urgent problems facing the Congolese Government is the retraining and reorganization of its security forces. You will recall that quite some time ago the U.N. tried to organize a programme on the basis of a multi-national team of U.N. training officers. Canada agreed to provide six or seven officers for this programme. The programme was turned down by General Mobutu, however, on the grounds that its multi-national character would make it inefficient. Subsequently an American, Col. Greene, made a full study of Congolese training requirements. He proposed a programme in which responsibility for each major training requirement (e.g., navy, air force, NCO's, officers academy, etc.) would be assumed by a separate country. The programme would be completely separate from ONUC but would be under the general supervision of the Civilian Officer in charge of the U.N. operation.

5. This "Greene plan" has been accepted in principle by the Central Government and the United Nations, and the Central Government have officially requested the U.N. to arrange a training and re-organization programme along the lines of the plan. Meanwhile, the Americans have been consulting in Washington with countries in a position to participate in the programme. Canada has been approached by the Americans and a member of the Embassy in Washington has been attending these consultations. It has been mentioned that Canada might be asked to provide a Brigadier as director of the programme and perhaps undertake to staff the Officers Academy. However, we have not yet received an official request from the United Nations to participate in the programme. While the Department of National Defence have not considered this matter, Air Chief Marshal Miller is aware of it and has agreed that their original offer of six or seven officers still stood in principle, although the officers he had in mind originally may not be suitable for the Canadian role envisaged in the Greene Plan. More precise information will, therefore, be required concerning qualifications required before Canadian availabilities can be re-examined.

6. One difficulty lies in the fact that so far all the prospective participating countries are members of NATO (e.g., United Kingdom, Norway, Italy, Canada, Belgium). Unless some non-aligned countries acceptable to the Congolese can be persuaded to take part (Nigeria and Tunisia have been mentioned) there is a danger that the programme will run into opposition from the U.S.S.R. and the Casablanca states, as well as from left-wing elements in the Congo itself. Mr. Tremblay discussed this question with Brigadier Rikhye as reported in his letter No. 69 of January 23 (received yesterday – copy attached†). After going over the history of the training proposals, Brigadier Rikhye stated that the Adoula Government had now formally requested the assistance of the U.N. and that the U.N. had agreed to assist the Central Government in the reorganization and retraining of its forces. It is understood that the U.N. will, in the next few weeks, approach a number of governments, including Canada, with the object of getting the plan under way as soon as practicable. Morocco is to be approached by the United Nations.

United Nations Technical Assistance

7. With completion of the unification phase the emphasis has shifted to the civilian or technical assistance side of the Congo operation. In December the Secretary-General in a letter addressed to all members of the organization appealed for voluntary contributions to raise an immediate sum of $8.6 million, which with sums already on hand plus a contribution of $6 million from the Central Government, would support a $19 million programme of civilian assistance to the Congo during 1963. (We are seeking additional information before considering what response Canada should make to this appeal.) This will provide for some 1,300 international experts who will work in all sectors of the country's life with the main concentration being in the fields of education, agriculture, health and communications. U Thant has indicated his intention of taking full advantage of every opportunity for transferring components of the Congo assistance programme which are of an advisory or training character to other normal sources of international financing. In this connection he has announced that the policy of channelling all aid through the United Nations is no longer necessary and that henceforth the Congo would be free to make bilateral arrangements for technical assistance in addition to U.N. aid.

[8.] The United States who are expected to bear a large share of the cost of U.N. technical assistance are currently drawing up plans in cooperation with the United Nations for dealing with a variety of administrative and economic problems. A U.S. team headed by Harlan Cleveland is scheduled to visit the Congo next week to assess future requirements of the U.N. military and civilian programme in the Congo in order to be able to deal confidently with Congress when funds are required. (Another U.S. mission headed by Mennen Williams may also go to the Congo.)<sup>8</sup>

[9.] It is to be hoped that with the progressive revival of the Congo's economy the Congolese Government can assume a greater share of the costs of the technical assistance they will require for some time to come. However, regardless of what financial contribution we may be asked to make it seems likely that Canada will be one of the countries which may be asked to provide French-speaking technicians to assist the Congo.

TRAINING OF ANC

USA Ambassador Gullion called me this morning and showed me a telegram from State Department which stated they had a meeting with Embassy officials of various countries concerned with training scheme and that Canadian representative knew nothing about willingness of Canadian Government to appoint Brigadier to head UN Training Mission. I told Gullion that as far as I was aware our government was willing to put six to seven reserve officers at disposal of UN but that although I had mentioned to you General Mobutu's desire for Canadian Brigadier there had been no repeat no comment or decision on this specific point.

2. Gullion considers it essential that a Canadian head mission because otherwise they will be forced to appoint a Belgian which might delay further implementation of training scheme. Adoula was still reluctant to lessen predominance of Belgian contribution (although Mobutu favours it) and if head of mission were to be a Belgian Adoula would most likely find this an excuse to postpone his final agreement. Gullion also thought that in view of their past record with Force Publique Belgians did not repeat not deserve to play more than a secondary role in training. Although UN in New York and State Department appeared reconciled with this possibility Gullion thought it would be a pity to lose direction of scheme to Belgians by default. With regard to participation of countries other than European I understand that with the exception of Nigeria none of those approached showed interest in training scheme.

3. Gullion mentioned urgency of getting training underway because of eventual withdrawal of UN. It is estimated that by a year and a half from now no repeat no more than 6,000 UN troops would remain here. When I mentioned possibilities of placing ANC under UN command to fill gap (my telegram 15 January 28†) Gullion said Adoula had agreed to have ANC under command but UN Commander General Kebedde Guebre insisted that they become a UN contingent and Mobutu continues to be adamant against having ANC wear blue beret. This is situation at the moment. Gullion thought there might be an advantage in not repeat not having ANC as coloured contingent because of possible breach of discipline for which UN might have to take blame if ANC wore blue beret.

CONGO: ANC REORGANIZATION AND TRAINING

Planning for reorganization and retraining of ANC is in a state of flux. USA State Department is exercising considerable pressure on UN to move on this matter. This pressure is becoming increasingly embarrassing to Secretariat.

2. Secretariat state they do not repeat not accept Greene Plan as such and in future will not repeat not refer to it by this name. Secretariat claim that they initiated original training plan which is still acceptable to Adoula and while it will require refining in light of present and future circumstances it is still basis for retraining of ANC.

3. UN do not repeat not propose to sponsor any programme which involves bilateral agreements as envisaged by USA and believe they have talked Cleveland mission out of this proposal. UN will take a completely negative attitude if USA State Department insist on pushing Greene Plan under bilateral agreements between Congo Government and participating countries.

4. UN state Greene Plan has served its purpose in that it has obtained recognition by Central Government of necessity of reorganizing and retraining ANC. UN Secretariat also state they would discourage any direct military assistance to Congo on a bilateral basis during period UN is responsible for internal security of Congo. This stand is for obvious reasons as UN could not repeat not condone situation whereby a number of countries could be participating under bilateral arrangements and using UN as a shield. Under this circumstance any differences between Congolese and participating governments could be blamed on UN.

5. Not repeat not withstanding above UN appreciate urgency of evolving a suitable reorganization and retraining plan and for this reason Brigadier Rikhye and Urquhart are leaving for Congo on February 5. They propose to discuss this programme in detail and should return to New York approximately February 18.

6. UN Secretariat has again confirmed that any plan evolved will require participation of as many of present contributing governments as possible and particularly those which have capability both technically and from point of view of language to retrain ANC. Reorganization and retraining of ANC is of utmost importance to UN as it is only when this force is reconstituted that UN can withdraw its contingents from Congo.

7. Congo Desk Officer in USA Mission (Dickinson) who is in daily touch with Secretariat has apparently been given a different account by Secretariat. He claimed that Secretariat have fully accepted Greene Plan that they are not repeat not worried about bilateral arrangements and that their only doubt is over nationality of training groups. Secretariat have told Dickinson that Rikhye has gone to Congo to persuade Congolese to accept Greene Plan. He said Secretariat have asked USA not repeat not to press with application of plan until Adoula has agreed; in meantime they have expressed wish that USA discourage representatives of other contributors from calling on Secretariat. Dickinson said he has asked State Department to postpone any initiative for promoting Greene Plan while Cleveland is in Congo.

8. This account is completely at variance with that given us by Rikhye. Since Rikhye was equally explicit and allowed us to take notes one or two explanations may account for differences. Possibly Rikhye wrongly believes that he persuaded Cleveland not repeat not to proceed with Greene Plan whereas he did not repeat not even get Secretariat's objections across to Cleveland. Alternatively USA may be trying to limit knowledge of Secretariat objections to Greene Plan. In either case we consider that it would be unwise at this point to advise USA that we have had different version from Secretariat as presumably Rikhye has been more candid with us than with USA representatives.

CONGO: ANC RETRAINING AND REORGANIZATION SCHEME

For Tremblay: Grateful if you would seek an opportunity to speak personally to U Thant about ANC retraining scheme; to confirm information given you by Brigadier Rikhye and to make points mentioned below not covered in earlier conversation. We should like to know whether plan meets with full approval of Secretary-General.

2. You may tell Secretary-General that although we have taken part in exploratory talks in Washington, no repeat no Canadian decision has yet been taken concerning Canadian participation. Secretary-General will recall we concurred with his last year's assessment that training of Congolese armed forces was essential to re-establishment of peace and order in country. We agreed in April 1962 to make available for that purpose six or seven retired French-speaking officers and that offer has not repeat not been withdrawn. We wish some assurances concerning long-term political acceptability of current USA proposals for ANC retraining. We are concerned lest fact that all countries who have been asked to take part are from West and in particular belong to NATO may eventually give rise to criticism from Communist and unaligned countries. It may be expected that in due course political forces will emerge in Congolese politics which will be suspicious of Western motives. Presence in country of military training personnel from NATO countries only might encourage these suspicions and play into hands of anti-Western elements. We are aware that USA and other Western countries are also concerned with this possibility. On the other hand, previous UN attempt to tackle problem has shown that few if any countries outside those mentioned in reference telegram may be in a position to provide military training assistance on standards acceptable to Congolese leaders. We should like to know therefore whether Secretary-General agrees that plan is best possible under circumstances and if so whether he would envisage any modification which would enable non-repeat non-NATO countries to be drawn into it. It may be possible to ask African countries such as Nigeria or Tunisia to take associate tasks such as police or infantry training. In this connection, it should be noted that participation by non-repeat non-Western countries might help secure wider financial support in UN.

3. It would also be useful to know what relationship UN envisages between phasing out of ONUC operations and establishment of training scheme. Recent requests for bilingual officers to serve ANC battalions as training and administrative officers (your telegram 74 January 15+) would indicate that UN wishes to attach UN liaison officers to Congolese forces in the field. If officers performing these tasks are recruited from major participants of ONUC and incorporated in retraining and reorganization scheme, problem outlined in paragraph 2 might be partially alleviated.

4. We would also require full information on financial arrangements. Would UN for example, agree to pay special allowances, cost of transportation, etc., of instructors as it does for ONUC personnel?

5. You should also state that requests for Canadian assistance would be officially considered only if they come from Secretary-General and have been supported by Congolese Government. Requests should be specific and describe task to be performed, facilities to be placed at disposal of officers and likely duration of commitments.

6. For Washington: You may inform State Department of our approach to Secretary-General.

For other posts: Please do not repeat not discuss this matter with local authorities pending further instructions.

CONGO — U.N. TRAINING SCHEME FOR ANC

Recent telegrams from our Embassy in Leopoldville had raised certain doubts as to whether it would be possible to organize a training programme for the Congolese Armed Forces under a UN umbrella as originally envisaged by the USA mission under Colonel Greene. There were also new doubts as to whether it was still the Congolese and UN desire to have a Canadian head a UN co-ordinating staff if one were set up, or whether Canadian participation had now been reduced to bilateral assistance in training in communications. The Embassy in Washington was asked to ascertain from the State Department whether the USA Government considered that a fundamental change had come about in the proposed UN training scheme.

2. Mr. Robinson reported today by telephone that the State Department did not consider that the original plan was faltering or had undergone substantial change, and that they were anxious to move ahead with the task as quickly as possible. It was still their intention to preserve the UN umbrella in order that the USA could disengage quietly, confident that the scheme would go forward in competent hands.

3. Regarding financing, it had always been the USA view that the training contingents to be supplied by various UN members would be on the basis of national contributions paid for by the sending governments, not by the UN. The only exception to that rule in their view would be the small international directing staff, which would be paid for the UN and would be under the authority of the Secretary-General. It was for the position of officer-in-charge of the international directing staff that the USA still hoped that Canada would provide an officer of brigadier rank, who would be paid for by the UN and would be responsible to the Secretary-General. It was true that Dericoyard's letter had cast some doubt on the rôle of the UN and on whether a Canadian was wanted to head the international directing staff, but since then clarifications had been received which made it clear that the Congolese still wanted a Canadian for the job and that there was no intention to depart from the terms of the UN rôle as envisaged in Adoula's first letter.<sup>9</sup> In the UN Secretariat there were still some who were opposed to the UN assuming any responsibility for the re-training scheme, but the USA were strongly advocating the recruitment of a small international directing staff at UN expense, and were confident that they would be successful. U Thant personally is in favour and to preserve the international character of the directing staff, intends to appoint some Africans and Asians to it.

4. The USA regard it as a matter of urgency to get the directing staff appointed before individual countries proceed too far in bilateral arrangements with the Congolese Government for individual aspects of the training programme. They attach considerable importance to the early naming of the Canadian to head the UN directing staff as they believe that he will be in a position to exert considerable influence on the organization of the whole training programme.

5. Robinson believes that if Canada looked favourably on accepting the post of brigadier-in-charge and if it were National Defence's wish that he have a small supporting staff of Canadians, this would be negotiable with the UN. He also thought it might be useful to have a senior Canadian Army officer visit New York in order to obtain clarification of the key problem in connection with this appointment, viz., the precise nature of the authority which the UN directing staff would have over the national contingents making up the training units.<sup>10</sup>

what it could do to enlist our assistance in the Advisory Group. I said that Tremblay was discussing the whole problem of United Nations responsibility and the Co-ordinating staff with the Secretary-General and that before sending any instructions we would probably wish to take account of the Secretary-General's own comments.

3. I then talked with Tremblay, who had just returned from his meeting with U Thant, and who was able to confirm that there would be no meeting tomorrow. He said all signs indicated that the Secretary-General was swinging to the African-Asian point of view; or at least towards a decision in which this point of view would be the determining factor. (A delegation of six or seven Permanent Representatives from the African-Asian group was waiting to go in when Tremblay left. Yost of the Americans was also to see him later in the day.)

4. U Thant told Tremblay that the USSR had already made it clear to him that they would not accept any scheme along the lines proposed without a special mandate from the Security Council. The three Governments in the African-Asian group involved in the proposed additions to the Co-ordinating Staff had been approached, and had refused to have any part in the exercise. From his conversation with the Secretary-General Tremblay was convinced that the real stumbling block so far as the African-Asians (and U Thant himself) are concerned is the major role of the Belgians in the programme. This raises a political issue which is probably not susceptible, from the Secretary-General's point of view, to any solution based on the degree of authority or nature of the functions of a co-ordinating staff.

5. In the circumstances Tremblay is more and more convinced that on political grounds the Secretary-General will feel himself forced to wash his hands of the present training programme. Tremblay doubts, however, that U Thant will make his final decision known at next week's meeting.<sup>11</sup>

MEETING WITH MR. C. V. NARASIMHAN

Mr. Narasimhan of the United Nations Secretariat recently came to Ottawa to participate in the meeting of the National Commission of UNESCO. While he was here, he agreed to come and speak informally to officials in the Department.

2. The attached memorandum is a record of Mr. Narasimhan's views which he expressed during his meeting with Departmental officials. Most of the meeting was devoted to discussing the current plan for training the ANC in the Congo. He did, however, deal briefly with a number of other current problems. We think you will find Mr. Narasimhan's views interesting.

3. Mr. Narasimhan spoke to us very frankly and we should be grateful if you would be especially careful not to attribute to him the statements which he made during the meeting.

MEETING WITH MR. C. V. NARASIMHAN

Congo

Narasimhan confirmed Tremblay's impression that the Secretary-General is seriously contemplating the advisability of withdrawing the United Nations umbrella from the ANC training operation. He claimed that this did not represent an about-face which took place during the course of the recent meeting of the Advisory Committee. It was rather a possibility which the Secretariat had been forced to consider when it became apparent from the recent exchanges with Adoula and the press leak in Leopoldville<sup>12</sup> that the Congolese (i.e., Mobutu) intended to have the Belgians take over the lion's share of the training programme. Narasimhan pointed out that the Secretary-General must take into account the views of both the communist bloc, which is ready to exploit any evidence to support their contention that the Secretariat is a tool of the United States, and of the Afro-Asians, who are equally sensitive on the score of the United Nations being used for the benefit of the ex-colonial powers. The composition of the group proposed by Colonel Greene and Adoula to undertake the training programme did not make U Thant's position any easier, consisting as it did exclusively of NATO countries plus Israel. In itself, this would not necessarily be an insurmountable obstacle, in view of the obvious difficulty of obtaining competent instructors from any other group. When to this was added the preponderant role of the Belgians, however, bitter opposition could be anticipated within the United Nations on the grounds that the Organization had not spent $400 million and sacrificed many lives, including that of a Secretary-General, in order to bring the Belgians back. Experience of the Belgians in the Congo during the period of the United Nations effort there had convinced Narasimhan that, however, much Spaak might wish to co-operate in a genuinely United Nations oriented programme, the individual Belgians who would carry it out would find it impossible to shake off their former attitudes and aspirations. These objections would not apply in relation to any of the other countries named to take on training duties; there was no opposition, for example, on the ground of NATO membership. Narasimhan made it clear that he personally did not see the problem in terms of the nature or degree of authority vested in a United Nations co-ordinating staff. So far as he was concerned, given the contemplated role of the Belgian contingent, such authority could not be effectively exercised and any attempt to control the operation would simply result in a continual conflict of interests.

2. At the same time Narasimhan recognized that there might well be no one else who could undertake the job, and that the Americans were deeply committed to getting on with it in what seemed the most practical fashion as soon as possible. This had, in fact, been embarrassing for the Secretariat since the Americans had throughout shown a tendency to jump the gun. For example, the Greene, Cleveland and Truman missions and other similar initiatives had been undertaken without any prior consultation. He also recognized the desirability from the American viewpoint of a United Nations umbrella. In the circumstances, however, any umbrella which could be provided might well be both ineffective as a genuine instrument of United Nations policy and politically disastrous insofar as it implied United Nations sponsorship of a revival of Belgian influence.

3. The United Nations had probably over-reached itself in the Congo and in the process had tarnished the Organization's prestige. It had been lucky, however, in that the operation had ended as of now on a note of success. The Secretary-General might therefore be well advised to disengage while the record was relatively clean. The Belgians on their own could do the job, in all probability much more expeditiously than they could under any United Nations programme. This in turn might well enable ONUC to withdraw its forces more rapidly than had been anticipated, perhaps in a matter of months. Given the financial problem, this would be all to the good. Narasimhan also admitted, however, that on the financial side, washing his hands of the training programme in circumstances which opened the way to revived Belgian domination might create additional difficulties for the Secretary-General in connection with the effort to persuade the Soviet Union and others to honour their obligations with respect to the Congo operation.

4. Although Narasimhan was aware of the risks involved, he did not think that a large Belgian training mission would lead to a new "Katanga" situation. On the contrary he thought the Belgians would in fact find themselves responsible for seeing that such a situation did not arise.

5. Narasimhan said that although he preferred the above solution, he was sure the Secretary-General would welcome our views on the alternative solution of a strong United Nations coordinating group, under whose direction the military missions would train the Congolese forces. If such a group had a balanced composition, and the African-Asian states could be persuaded to accept this solution, it would, of course, ease the Secretary-General's position.

CONGO: ANC TRAINING

We agree that in Congo Advisory Committee you should take whatever line is likely to be of most help to the Secretary-General in overcoming a difficult situation. Thus if U Thant recommends at beginning of meeting exclusively bilateral arrangements for training ANC you may accept his recommendation. If U Thant does not express any views and asks for advice of members you should emphasize relationship of withdrawal of ONUC to training programme and say we would prefer UN to coordinate the programme but if this is not feasible then Congolese should be allowed to make their own arrangements bilaterally.

2. For your own information we should not lose sight of fact that how this question is settled may have an important effect on future domestic political situation in Congo. Purely bilateral arrangements with Belgians will lay Adoula Government open to opposition charges they have taken Congo into Western camp. Presumably this possibility has not escaped Soviet Union as well as Casablanca powers and other non-aligned states who may find Adoula and present leadership in Leopoldville too pro West. It is important therefore UN reaction to whatever solution is found should not be such that it can be interpreted later as tacit disapproval or objection to bilateral arrangements.

3. We agree with your assessment of the feasibility of the Ghana compromise proposal (your paragraph 6) but think we should not take a public position on the question of African states training the ANC.

DISARMAMENT PROSPECTS

Dated February 21 – I hope I am mistaken, but my impression is Soviet leaders are envisaging forthcoming Disarmament Conference in Geneva at least primarily in propaganda terms. Thus far neither I nor my principal Western colleagues have been able to find any indication that Soviet leaders are envisaging or planning serious effort to reach significant agreements on disarmament at this time. For reasons described later in this message I believe some genuine progress toward agreements in disarmament field could be very useful to USSR, and it is just conceivable that after March 5 Central Committee meeting decisions might be taken to achieve something in this direction. Nevertheless I thought I should report present melancholy indications that propaganda considerations still appear predominant here.

2. At Nepalese reception on February 19 I had a conversation with Kosygin. I asked him whether he anticipated any genuine developments at Geneva meeting. My impression from his remarks was that he did not repeat not. He made usual point that he and his colleagues always hoped for agreement, as they had for years, but he did not repeat not think West really desired it. He made standard Communist point about influence of arms industries in Western policy. He said he interpreted reluctance of Western heads of governments to go to Geneva to start off meeting as evidence West itself considered its case a weak one. I got impression that even at his Praesidium level Geneva exercise is being thought of chiefly in propaganda terms.

3. Incidentally I asked Kosygin whether Khrushchev planned to go to Geneva in mid-March even if Western heads of governments did not repeat not do so at first stage but preferred to take part later if developments justified this. Kosygin said that no repeat no decision had yet been taken on this point, but that a decision would be taken later in the light of developments. Later Gromyko told Thompson he had no repeat no information on whether Khrushchev would go if Kennedy did not repeat not. Our impression is that Khrushchev will probably not repeat not in fact go at beginning in view of replies from Western leaders and from India and Brazil.

4. Khrushchev's "I'll raise you one" reply to Kennedy-Macmillan letter looked like propaganda.<sup>13</sup> So has Soviet press treatment since then. Pravda coupled publication of exchange of letters with long article same day charging Western bad faith in disarmament questions.

5. Moreover general Soviet approach (18-Nation Summit, etc.) contrasts with serious diplomatic technique used hitherto by Soviet Government on relatively few occasions when they have genuinely sought, and in the end achieved, meaningful substantive agreements with West on major international issues – e.g. weeks or months of patient backstage diplomatic conversations which led to agreement on Trieste, on ending Berlin blockade in 1949, on withdrawal from Austria, etc.

6. Moreover Soviet Government presumably realize that genuine agreement on such sensitive and delicate question as disarmament would be facilitated by measures to reduce tension and increase mutual confidence, in other areas of international dispute. There has been no repeat no real sign of such efforts to reduce tension and reach settlements on e.g. Berlin question (except that sense of urgency has been significantly reduced in past months). Recent Soviet press attacks on USA about Cuba, Vietnam, and other questions have been very tough in tone. So have comments on Germany, for example Polyanov's article in yesterday's Izvestia, contained following sentence in conclusion: "If, on the other hand, Washington and its partners are thinking of trying their luck with a test of strength, and if they dare to violate sovereignty of DDR, they should know in advance that there can be only [one] response – and that this will be fast and annihilating."

7. Recent Soviet attempts to limit Western use of air corridors to West Berlin, and particularly last Saturday's tough note to three Western Powers asserting right of DDR to control use of this air space, has been somewhat ominous and not repeat not calculated to reduce tension.<sup>14</sup>

8. Lack of evidence thus far that Soviet side is approaching Geneva Disarmament Meeting with intention to lay aside propaganda and seek serious agreements in calm atmosphere naturally would not preclude possibility of dramatic or glamorous Soviet proposals and initiatives in this field. Presumably Soviet leaders must have had some proposals in mind which Khrushchev would put forward were he at start of conference, and which would at least look dramatic and appealing. Even if Khrushchev does not repeat not go himself at start such proposals may be made. One possibility may be revived and perhaps revised zonal proposal along lines of earlier Rapacki Plan.<sup>15</sup> There may be proposals for atom[ic]-free zones, etc. Soviet Government has already on various occasions indicated interest in various proposals along these lines, as well as in non-aggression pacts between blocs, etc. Western side will presumably be ready for proposals along these lines.

Because the Soviet Union continued using the air corridors to the exclusion of all others, on February 15 the three Western powers sent a protest to the Soviet Ministry of Foreign Affairs. For text of this note and the Soviet reply, see American Foreign Policy, Current Documents, 1962 (Washington: United States Government Printing Office, 1966), pp. 687–689.

9. On procedure it is too soon to say how Khrushchev may react to de Gaulle's counter suggestion for a nuclear Disarmament Conference limited to powers already possessing nuclear weapons or likely soon to possess them. On substance overall nuclear disarmament looks as difficult as ever.

10. On other hand there have been some indications of Soviet desire to keep open their conversation and channels with USA, FGR, and West in general, and in some cases even to improve them. For example I understand in strict confidence that arrangements for Kennedy-Khrushchev TV debate seem likely to be completed soon. Soviet disinclination to break off conversations on Berlin problem despite lack of progress hitherto is also not repeat not discouraging.

11. As mentioned above there are, in my judgment and that of other Western observers here, reasons to believe that some genuine progress in disarmament field at this time could be of value to Khrushchev. Thus he would probably see genuine economic (and hence domestic political) advantage if he could find some way if not repeat not to reduce his defence budget then at least to prevent further increases in defence spending, in order to permit increased allocation of resources to capital investment particularly for agriculture. Similarly some genuine beginning on real disarmament agreements with West might present a way out for Khrushchev in his dilemmas on Berlin problem. An agreement which included limitation on West German armaments and undertakings not repeat not to transfer nuclear weapons to West Germany (in exchange for corresponding advantages to Western side) could perhaps be presented by Khrushchev to his party and bloc as meeting some basic Soviet objectives in their drive for German peace treaty, and might thus be used, if he so wished, to help justify climb down on Berlin issue itself. In other words as Adenauer and Kroll have long urged, some solution might be found within disarmament framework to meet some Soviet objectives (or proclaimed objectives) on German question which can hardly be met within German framework itself.

12. As stated in my reference telegram I think Soviet attitude on many of these questions is probably still undecided, and probably related to decisions about their relations with China. Soviet-Chinese issue may be coming closer to head, and next few weeks may show whether rift can again be papered over or will become more open as well as deeper. While therefore hard evidence thus far available does not repeat not suggest very promising prospects for success in disarmament negotiations, it is just conceivable that Soviet thinking may take more promising turn on this question.

13. At last Monday Nepalese reception I had talk with Organov (Chairman Praesidium RSFSR Supreme Soviet), Pushkin, and a couple of marshals, partly on disarmament prospects. They did not repeat not seem optimistic. I suggested that unless genuine progress were made soon to limit spread of arms whole problem would become much more difficult and dangerous in few years when China and others got nuclear weapons. I thought their immediate agreement to this point was sincere and significant.

TALK WITH LORD HOME

I had an hour talk with Lord Home at his request shortly after I arrived. I found him hopeful about the prospects of the conference on disarmament mainly because of the degree to which USA Government was willing to take a constructive initiative which he feels the Russians will find difficult to reject. USA and UK, he said, were in close agreement both on disarmament and on nuclear tests.

2. USA were contemplating an offer (which they stress should be kept a close secret until they put it forward), of a 30 percent across the board reduction in weapons including nuclear carriers accompanied by sample inspection. Home described this USA initiative as nothing short of "spectacular." The important point in his judgment about this offer would be that it proposed in the first stage of the amended USA plan that there should be a substantial destruction of arms.

3. On nuclear tests, Home said, contrary to press reports there was complete agreement between UK and USA. They were agreed that it was not repeat not sufficient to rely on national detection systems to check the observance of a nuclear test ban treaty. They were also agreed that unless scientists can say that a national system of detection can detect the location as well as the fact of test explosions it would not repeat not be possible to accept national detection systems tests in the upper atmosphere and under the ground. UK was perhaps more inclined to think that scientists could come up with a positive answer than USA was. Home, however, was trying to explore with Gromyko how much leeway his instructions would permit in admitting international inspection teams into Russia.

4. Home stressed, however, that disagreement with the Russians over nuclear tests would not repeat not inhibit or be allowed to prejudice discussions on general and complete disarmament, especially in view of USA's expected initiative referred to above.

5. Home described his talks with Gromyko over Berlin as "rather tough." Home had told Gromyko that Soviet scattering of chaff to interfere with radar and air traffic control in the air corridors was "very nearly an act of war" and extremely dangerous. Gromyko professed ignorance about these incidents but was clearly embarrassed according to Home. Home suggested to Gromyko that he might check with the military authorities in Moscow as the allies had clear evidence as to the source of this interference and could give facts about Soviet bombers used for this activity. Home stressed that USA and UK governments took the most serious view of this kind of pressure on civilian airline traffic and it was only the reduction and virtual abandonment on this activity in the corridors today that had prevented their recommending to their governments reconsideration of the opening of the Disarmament Conference. I made the comment that postponement or interference with conference arrangements might put the West in the wrong since so many public expectations are based upon it. Home replied that in any case the discontinuance of Soviet activity had removed the need for drastic reaction for the time being.

6. As to conditions in Berlin, Home told me that he had formed the judgment from his recent personal visit that morale was good, the Western Germans were determined to support West Berlin with investment funds and other economic measures, but he did not repeat not deny the possibility of a long term decline in viability over the next ten years.

7. As to the possibility of a summit meeting of Heads of Government, Home told me that Rusk had told Gromyko that it might be possible to have such a meeting provided there were agreement at least in principle on some of the broader issues involved on the question of Berlin and Germany as well as on access. Later we were told by Kohler (USA) that so far there had been no repeat no response.

DISARMAMENT NEGOTIATIONS

Ambassador Merchant discussed this subject with the Minister when he called on him this morning.

2. Mr. Merchant was appreciative of Canada's role in the meetings. Mr. Green in turn spoke very favourably of the performance of the United States Delegation, particularly the patience displayed by Mr. Rusk and Mr. Dean.

3. Mr. Merchant indicated that the United States side were anxious to be flexible about virtually all details but were not prepared to make concessions on points of substance that really affect the security of the United States and of Western countries generally, for example they felt that they had to insist on inspection and verification for security reasons but they were quite willing to be flexible on the nature of the arrangements, even going so far as to indicate a readiness to accept random sampling techniques.

4. Mr. Merchant intimated that any dissatisfaction which the United States side had felt over the Canadian proposal regarding outer space related to the fact that the text had not been shown to them in advance (and also that the proposal included no provision for verification). The Minister insisted that the substance of the Canadian proposition was in line with agreed views of the four Western countries and in general terms had been made known to the United States side ahead of time. Mr. Green thought it was most important to attempt to reach agreement on some matter upon which there seemed to be little disagreement. It was only by recording agreements that some progress might be made towards solution of the really difficult problems. In this connection, Mr. Green spoke highly of the role of the 8 "neutrals." He thought that they were anxious to help the negotiations along. It was amazing to him that the Russians had accepted such a good list of countries. Mr. Green hoped that the United States would consider carefully any proposal put up by any member of this group. Mr. Merchant noted that the Swedish proposal presented serious danger and could not be accepted by the United States. Mr. Green re-emphasized the importance of giving a fair hearing to any suggestions from such a country as Sweden.

5. At several points in the conversation the Minister reiterated that he thought it most important for the United States to avoid initiating a new series of nuclear tests. Mr. Green thought that world opinion would be very critical of the country which first resumes tests. Mr. Merchant remarked that the Russians had already been first in starting tests after the original suspension. Mr. Green suggested that past tests were now a considerable distance behind us and that attention was now focussed on what happens from this point onward. Perhaps the United States could have got away with starting tests again if they had acted immediately after the Russian series. Now they would be held to blame if they were to start tests after the memory of the Soviet tests had pretty well faded. Mr. Green hoped that the United States would at least hold off any resumption of tests until the Russians had made another start. Mr. Merchant remarked that delay in resuming tests might impair the development of United States weapons. Mr. Green said that he did not think the delay would necessarily be very long since no doubt the Americans could commence testing in two or three weeks' time after the Russians had started.

6. Mr. Merchant returned again to the point that the Russians had been the first to resume tests. He thought it would be most unfair if the 8 neutral nations were to withdraw from the Geneva talks in the event that the United States found it necessary to start up tests again before the Russians got around to initiating their next series of tests. Mr. Green expressed the hope that the United States would not feel that it had to begin tests while there was still some chance of progress in the Geneva talks. He was certain that rightly or wrongly, a resumption of tests by the United States would have a very bad effect on the Geneva negotiations.<sup>16</sup>

NON-ALIGNED NATIONS AND NUCLEAR TESTING CESSATION

At a lunch given by Swedes on April 6 Lall, Padilla Nervo and Abdel Fattah Hassan were present besides myself and conversation was mostly about what could be done to stop resumption of nuclear testing.

2. Some doubt was expressed that nuclear powers really wanted to stop. Russians may be preparing for another test series and would like to place blame for renewed tests on Americans. Both sides may have adopted and be holding to positions on a nuclear test cessation treaty that they are sure other side could not repeat not adopt.

3. General view was that neutrals would have to intensify their efforts to bring about a compromise agreement. As representatives of world's non-aligned nations, they had this duty and could not repeat not let testing recommence by their default. They should try to get together on a definite proposal. For this purpose it was intended to have meetings of eight that night and Saturday.

4. Lall has been most active in consulting Russians. While he is not repeat not getting much encouragement, their attitude is not repeat not completely negative and he is continuing consultations.

5. Hassan suggested there was a danger that if a proposal supported by eight neutrals should be accepted by one side and not repeat not by others, neutrals would thereby incur a commitment to side accepting; therefore in some sense lose their impartial status. Others present, however, did not repeat not think that this possible outcome should prevent their acting.

6. Composition and duties of a Central International Control Organization were discussed. Consensus was that adjudicating body should be made up of non-aligned scientists of reputation; probably six whose decisions should be two-thirds majority. It should be their duty to call for explanations of events when seismic records indicated suspicion of a nuclear explosion. If no repeat no satisfactory explanation was furnished, they should request country on whose territory event had occurred to admit an inspecting team of neutrals. There should be some control stations, preferably in neutral countries, in addition to national detection systems which would supply data to Central International Control Organization. Inspections would only be needed when underground tests were suspected; those in atmosphere and under water can readily be detected by national systems.

7. We shall be keeping in touch and advising you of any further developments.

DISARMAMENT: TALKS WITH REPRESENTATIVES OF UNCOMMITTED COUNTRIES ABOUT THE FUTURE OF THE CONFERENCE

Carrying out your instructions, Mr. Ignatieff has had talks with the Ambassadors of Brazil, Mexico, Sweden and the U.A.R. and the High Commissioner for India. Each of them was told of the importance we attach to the eight neutrals coming forward this week with a concrete and carefully reasoned proposal which might serve as a compromise on the question of verifying compliance with a nuclear test ban. Emphasis was also laid on the importance of registering some initial measure of agreement at the Geneva Conference on other matters such as the drafting of the preamble on disarmament and a declaration on the prevention of war propaganda.

2. The most forthcoming with their support for our point of view were the Mexican Ambassador and the Chargé d'Affaires of Brazil. Both expressed complete agreement about the importance of the eight putting forward a compromise proposal this week which would be sufficiently fair and objective that it might have a chance of acceptance by both sides. They were both also in agreement on the importance of pressing forward with renewed efforts to reach some measure of agreement on other matters before the Conference.

3. The U.A.R. Ambassador, although entirely sympathetic to our point of view, was concerned whether his Government would be willing to take an initiative in trying to break the stalemate on nuclear tests which might be interpreted as being partial by one side or the other. When Ignatieff assured him that what was contemplated was a united initiative to put forward a compromise proposal by the eight, he was much happier about the idea and said that he would report our views to his Government and keep us informed of any views which he may receive from Cairo. We urged upon him the importance that the compromise should be clearly objective and impartial and that the eight should insist that it should not be rejected out of hand by the Three.

4. The Indian High Commissioner and the Swedish Ambassador seemed a little more pessimistic about the prospect of the eight achieving any success for a compromise proposal which might bring about agreement on a nuclear test ban. Mr. Chakravarty recalled that his Government had already sponsored an appeal to the nuclear powers to desist from nuclear testing pending negotiations on a nuclear test ban treaty in a resolution adopted by the General Assembly. It now seemed to him that the United States Government was determined to go ahead in disregard of the opinion of the uncommitted countries.

5. Mr. Chakravarty, however, called today to say that on reporting his conversation with us to New Delhi he had received word today that the Indian Government was equally concerned to prevent a deadlock at Geneva over the nuclear test talks and that the Indian Representative was engaged in both bilateral talks as well as consultations with the other representatives of uncommitted countries with a view to working out a compromise proposal on verification. He added the information that Mr. Krishna Menon was expected to go to Geneva either next week or the week after.

6. None of these representatives expressed any definite opinion as to whether or not the Geneva Conference would break down if nuclear testing were resumed, but agreed that the resumption of tests by the United States would be a serious set-back and that special efforts would be required to keep it going. Mr. Chakravarty thought that there was a real danger that the Soviet Union might walk out of the conference if the U.S.A. resumed testing.

CONFIDENTIAL

Washington, April 13, 1962

Dear Prime Minister:

I was glad that Secretary Rusk and Ambassador Heaney had a good talk on disarmament and nuclear testing last Tuesday. For some time I have had an uneasy feeling that perhaps the positions of our two countries were becoming increasingly disparate on the nuclear test question. We were therefore happy to hear your views and to have an opportunity to present ours. In this letter I would like to follow up on what Secretary Rusk said.

Nuclear testing confronts the West with a choice between two tragic alternatives. One alternative is to refrain from atmospheric testing, but this gives the Soviet Union the freedom to continue the pursuit of military superiority. The other alternative is to resume atmospheric testing, but this ensures that for a time, at least, this race for military superiority with all its inherent instability will continue and will perhaps be accentuated.

I know that this second alternative is a source of grave concern for yourself and for Mr. Green. I know that it is this concern which has motivated you in your conduct of Canada's participation in the Geneva disarmament negotiations and in your statements as reported from Canada.

No government in the world wants a nuclear test ban agreement more than the United States. I believe that during the year since March 1961 the United States, through its performance in the Geneva test ban negotiations, has demonstrated the truth of this. But the United States also has the responsibility before its own people and the people of its forty allies and, indeed, before the non-aligned countries as well, to maintain the balance of power between the Soviet bloc and the free world.

Last winter we in the United States conducted a most careful review of the situation created by the violent series of Soviet tests of 1961. On the basis of this technical and military assessment, and in full agreement with Prime Minister Macmillan, I reached a clear and firm decision that we must ourselves return to atmospheric testing unless an effective agreement could be reached with the Soviet Union. The judgment was based on the facts as I reviewed them myself; it was supported both here and in the United Kingdom, by the overwhelming weight of qualified technical and military counsel. This is not a judgment based on unreasoned response to provocation. It is a sober and measured assessment of what is needed for our common security.

So far, the Soviet Government has not given the slightest sign that it is willing to accept any form of international verification for a test ban agreement. In refusing such international verification the Soviet Government explains that its concern is with espionage and that unilateral detection systems are adequate to monitor a nuclear test ban agreement. There is no need to explain to you that the United States and United Kingdom draft test ban treaty of last April eighteenth does not support the Soviet espionage allegation in any way. What we are asking is essentially that minimum of inspection which is required on the basis of the best and most up-to-date technical advice. Our position has recently been restudied at Harold Macmillan's urging, and the advice of the US-UK first team of seismologists is unanimous: without verification we cannot know what is happening underground. The Soviet Union itself admits that there are "difficulties" in identifying underground nuclear explosions and thereby also admits that unilateral monitoring systems are not adequate to monitor a test ban agreement.

Recently there has been talk in the Geneva conference about a control system for a nuclear test ban agreement which would free the Soviet Union of any commitment to international verification. May I urge you most earnestly to join with us in opposing any such proposal. There is no safety in it for any of us, and it leads away from the only honest and workable road to arms limitation. I fully understand the sincerity and good will of those who are attracted by such proposals. But in fact they do not serve peace among nations or understanding among men.

What we must do, I deeply believe, is stand together in convincing the Soviet Union that the world cannot have disarmament without inspection and that the Soviet Union cannot conduct nuclear tests with impunity and then expect the United States to hold its hand in matters essential to the security of the West. I hope you will agree with me that Canada and the United States should stand together on this issue of vital importance to our common safety.

Sincerely,

JOHN F. KENNEDY

NUCLEAR TEST SUSPENSION AGREEMENT – NEUTRAL INITIATIVE

The non-aligned members of the Conference finally presented at this morning's meeting of the plenary their point [sic] memorandum on nuclear testing. The text is virtually unchanged from that which we saw a week ago and there have been no repeat no significant modifications. The text is given in our telegram 703.†

2. Lall, the Indian Representative, finally received authority yesterday, April 15, to associate himself with the other non-aligned members of the Committee in support of the memorandum. The group held a final meeting this morning immediately before the meeting of plenary which resulted in plenary being delayed for half an hour. We have been told in confidence that two subjects were discussed at that meeting: (A) Mexico urged that the last sentence in paragraph 4 should be changed from “could invite” to “should invite.” This proposal was not repeat not accepted. (B) There was consideration of how to present the memorandum. It was finally decided that Brazil, which had been chosen because it was first alphabetically, should read the memorandum and that there should be no repeat no supporting statements. This procedure was adopted in order to ensure that no repeat no interpretive comments were made, which might not repeat not be acceptable to all the supporters of the proposal.

3. Brief and entirely non-committal statements were made during the course of this morning’s meeting of plenary by the nuclear powers. The co-chairmen agreed that at tomorrow’s meeting the nuclear nations would be given an opportunity to put questions to the non-aligned nations in order to clarify the proposal.

4. This procedure has caused the neutral nationals some anxiety. Their proposal is extremely vague, owing to the compromises required in order to reach agreement. They are holding another meeting before plenary tomorrow in order to try to decide how questions should be answered. The preliminary view of several representatives is that they ought to decide on perhaps two spokesmen. We have heard it suggested that India and Sweden, as the two principal advocates of the proposal, might play this role.

5. It is difficult to know what USA and Soviet responses will be. It seems possible, that the amplification of the proposal will reveal that it basically accepts USA concept of verification by an international inspectorate. To the extent that this is made explicit, it may make it difficult for USSR to accept the proposal as a basis for negotiation.

6. A number of the neutral representatives are aware that their proposal has come forward at such a late date that it may not repeat not provide a basis for settlement before the present test series begins. However, it is their hope that it will remain before the Conference and provide the basis for negotiations between the two sides after they have both completed tests. We have discussed this point of view with a member of USA mission and he assures us that this possibility is recognized, and that efforts will be made not repeat not to reject the proposal outright.

NUCLEAR TEST SUSPENSION AGREEMENT – TALK WITH GENERAL BURNS

In view of the report from Geneva that the Soviet Government had accepted the formula of the neutrals as a basis for further negotiation, we spoke to General Burns to ascertain

- (a) the precise nature of the Soviet acceptance,
- (b) the nature of the U.S.A. reaction,
- (c) the intentions of the neutrals as regards further action, and
- (d) any views that General Burns might have about further action by Canada either in Geneva or Washington.

2. Nature of Soviet Acceptance

General Burns said that Zorin had read out a formal statement of the Soviet position on the 8-power formula. He later emphasized that he was ready to “adopt the 8-power formula as a basis of further negotiations.”

3. U.S.-U.K. Reaction

Godber for the U.K. said that he would like to be certain that the Soviet Union accepted his understanding namely, that the Soviet Union adopted the principles contained in the neutral formula, i.e. the establishment of an international control organization and some provision for the inspection of doubtful seismic events. Godber indicated that he found it hard to believe that the Soviet Union did accept these principles in the light of Khrushchev’s latest message to Macmillan.<sup>18</sup> If, however, they did accept them the U.K. agreed that this should be the basis of negotiation.

Dean for the U.S.A. said much the same but added that he wanted an assurance in writing of the Soviet Government’s willingness to accept the principles as a basis of negotiation.

Zorin rejected indignantly Dean’s proposal as insulting. He said that the establishment of such “preconditions” for further negotiation would be tantamount to asking the Soviet Union to accept in principle the position advanced by the other side for further negotiations. The statement he had made was the formal position of the Soviet Government, made on instructions.

After an acrimonious exchange the Bulgarian suggested that there should be a plenary meeting after lunch. Burns intervened with a counter proposal that the two co-chairmen meet privately to consider the basis of negotiation on the basis of the neutral formula, in order to avoid a propaganda debate in plenary. A third suggestion made by the Italian with the support of India proposed that the problem be turned over to the sub-committee of three (U.S., U.K., U.S.S.R.) on nuclear testing, and this was adopted. To this Mrs. Myrdal (Sweden) added that a plenary should be called later today to consider the results of the meeting of the sub-committee of three. As of the time of the telephone call, General Burns was awaiting word of the outcome of the sub-committee meeting and that Padilla Nervo the chairman of the day would name a time for the plenary.

4. The Position of the Neutrals

General Burns reported that the neutrals had decided with his encouragement that they were not going to prepare detailed replies to the technical questions posed by the U.S.A. and U.K. representatives at the plenary meeting of April 17, as they were not competent to do so. This kind of question would have to be discussed between the nuclear powers. Burns had been told by the Indian representative (Lall) that they approved the position which Canada had taken. He raised informally and tentatively the possibility that a last minute appeal might be made by Nehru, Diefenbaker and possibly Fanfani to Kennedy and Khrushchev.

5. Possible Further Canadian Action

General Burns said that the crux of the difficulty from the U.S. side was their confirmed opposition to any uncontrolled, unsupervised moratorium. Only if the Soviet Union unequivocally accepted the twin principles of international control and inspection of suspected events would the neutral basis of negotiation be accepted by the Americans. General Burns interpolated that Dean was bound by his instructions to seek no less and that in effect he was asking the Soviet Union to accept more than was in the 8-power proposal formula on these two points. It was pointed out to General Burns, however, that the vagueness of the neutral formula, presumably deliberate, enabled the U.S.A. in the process of negotiation to advance interpretations in their favour.

As Burns saw it, both sides were attempting to assert preconditions to the acceptance of the 8-power formula as a basis for further talks: the Russians were insisting on a U.S.A. undertaking not to test while negotiations were going on; the U.S.A. were insisting on the written acceptance of principles going beyond the 8-power formula as it stands. In the discussion with Burns it was agreed that if this matter came up in plenary today he might profitably suggest, if the opportunity offered, that negotiations should proceed without preconditions on either side, merely on the understanding that the formula had to be explored if it was to be made more precise.

General Burns saw no advantage at this moment in making further approaches or representations in Washington. We put this point to him in view of a suggestion made by the Minister by telephone last night that such a move might be timely.<sup>19</sup>

EIGHT-NATION MEMO – NUCLEAR TEST BAN NEGOTIATIONS

Plenary Committee held a long meeting today to hear the nuclear powers state their position in regard to negotiating on the basis of the 8-Nation memorandum. A full report will follow. Present message is an attempt to indicate briefly the position reached and the prospects for further negotiations.

2. Representatives of the three nuclear powers, after considerable argument and questioning, have all agreed to accept the 8-Nation memorandum as the basis for negotiations, though not repeat not the exclusive basis. An agreed compromise cannot result if the Soviets adhere to their position of November 28, 1961 and USA/UK adhere to their draft treaty of April 18, 1961.<sup>20</sup> It would seem that to reach a compromise the USA and UK will have to be content with considerably less control apparatus and a modification of their position on on-site inspections. This will require governmental decision and a fresh reappraisal.

3. In spite of the requests for the neutral nations for immediate negotiations on basis accepted by nuclear powers, such a negotiation, if it is to bring agreement, will undoubtedly require time.

4. Soviet Union's statement tabled yesterday states that "It is obvious that fruitful negotiations on the discontinuance of tests cannot repeat not be conducted to the thunder of nuclear explosions." Therefore, if the USA and UK commence nuclear tests there would seem to be no repeat no hope of further negotiations on this subject at this time.

5. At the conclusion of his second statement today, Zorin said that if tests were resumed, those resuming them would have to bear the responsibility for all the unfavourable consequences which could result. This, although obscure, could mean that Soviet Union not repeat not only could stop negotiating on the cessation of nuclear tests, but might possibly withdraw from the general and complete disarmament negotiations. Dean and Godber have respectively stated that USA and UK could not repeat not accept another uncontrolled moratorium.

6. Lal told me that he will be suggesting to Delhi, in view of the effect which resumption of tests would have on negotiations here, that Prime Minister Nehru might wish to consider making representations to the USA. Whether such representations would be effective, or whether representations should also be made by Canada, is probably better judged in the light of knowledge of the American government's attitude in this matter, which is available in Ottawa. As far as we can gather here, nothing has changed the intention to go ahead with tests.

[London], April 23, 1962

As you will have seen the joint statement about nuclear tests which President Kennedy and I communicated to the Soviet Government on April 9th, and my own letter to Mr. Khrushchev on the following day produced nothing but a long and argumentative reply.<sup>21</sup> I fear it is plain that the Russians are not willing at present to accept the principle of international verification. In these circumstances I have not thought it right to urge President Kennedy to postpone the series of tests on Christmas Island. The failure of our attempt to make the Russians budge on this vital issue is a great disappointment to us all. But neither the President nor I have given up hope that some agreement will be possible in the long term. For the present, however, the tests on Christmas Island must go forward. No doubt Russian tests will follow soon after.

For technical reasons it is not possible to make a final decision about the precise timing of the tests much in advance. But I would like you to know that I expect that an announcement will be made from Washington on Tuesday night about the timing of the first tests.

Thank you for your message of April 23 giving me advance warning of the decision which will be announced tomorrow to go ahead with the Christmas Island Tests.

In view of the position the Canadian Government has consistently taken on this question, I cannot conceal from you my regret that it has not proved possible to find a solution at Geneva which would have enabled you and President Kennedy to dispense with further testing with a reasonable sense of security. I realize that this must have been a very difficult decision to take in the light of the incalculable consequences it may have in terms of continuation of the nuclear weapons race and the prospects for disarmament.

I believe that the new situation we now face makes it even more imperative to persist in efforts at Geneva to create a system of international verification either on the basis of the Eight-Power proposal or some other foundation which may emerge in the course of further discussion.

NUCLEAR TESTING

On instructions from the Minister action addressees (except Disarmament Delegation) are requested to call on foreign ministers or their deputies as soon as possible and to express to them the Canadian Government's earnest wish that the delegates of the non-aligned members of the Disarmament Committee will continue to participate fully in the Conference notwithstanding the resumption of nuclear weapons tests by USA and Britain in the Pacific. Heads of Mission should stress the importance of a continuing and uninterrupted effort by all members of the Committee to find an acceptable basis for a permanent test ban agreement. The three nuclear powers have indicated their willingness to discuss the question further using the compromise proposal submitted by the eight neutral members as one, if not necessarily the only basis of negotiation. It is important to hold the nuclear powers to their undertaking in this respect. Resumption of testing is not a valid reason for abandoning or relaxing the search for an effective solution to this problem; on the contrary it should serve to underline the necessity for a renewed effort on the part of nuclear and non-nuclear powers alike.

2. When making their representations Heads of Mission should hand Foreign Ministers a copy of the statement issued by the Prime Minister to the press today.<sup>22</sup> Text of this statement is contained in our immediately following telegram.

3. Please report reaction to your representations.

BAN ON NUCLEAR TESTING

Proposal by Neutrals

You asked me to examine this proposal and see whether any of the scientific facts indicated a line which Canada could take. I don't honestly believe that, within present Government policy, there is any proposal I can make.

2. We, and the neutrals, are in fact enmeshed in our own net: using Canada as an example, our Government has consistently stressed that it is against all tests. Recently the Prime Minister has stated publicly that any test ban without provision for adequate inspection would be one-sided and dangerous. Since the Canadian Government oppose underground testing, which cannot affect public health, their policy must therefore be based, not on the health hazard, but on discontinuing nuclear weapons development.

3. Logically, therefore, we should be pressing for a detection system which will expose all violations it is possible to detect (and this implies on-site inspection) and for a programme of research and development to make this system more and more sensitive. Instruments will only record what they will record, and no amount of talking round a table in Geneva will alter this. Nor does the fact that the Swedes have detected some underground explosions in USA mean that they can guarantee to detect every one.

4. This brings us right back to the position at the Geneva talks of 1958,<sup>23</sup> neglecting the USA “big hole” theory,<sup>24</sup> which was always mathematically unproven. The modifications which have taken place since then have been essentially political – the substitution of a “sampling” technique for on-site verification, for example.

5. It seems to me that any compromises must be in the political field. If Canada and the neutrals, for example, could accept the fact that explosions under an agreed detectable limit don’t matter anyway, then there would be a basis for compromise. But I cannot believe that they could now say this; and I am not sure that USA and UK would accept it – certainly USSR would not unless the neutrals did.

6. USA and UK have now compromised so far on the original proposals that the scientific basis of the proposals has now almost lost its integrity. To push them any further would be to destroy it entirely and, I’m afraid, to subscribe to the philosophy of the baseball coach who said “nice guys finish last.”

7. Any possible solution lies in the political, not the scientific field.<sup>25</sup>

CONVERSATION WITH SOVIET AMBASSADOR ON MAY 9

The Soviet Ambassador came to see me at his request on the 9th of May. He had asked to discuss the situation at the Disarmament Conference at Geneva with me before I left for the NATO Ministerial Meeting in Athens. The conversation was mainly concerned with the Geneva Conference. However, not unexpectedly, the Soviet Ambassador started the conversation by fishing for information on the NATO Meeting. I merely drew his attention to the communiqué which he had read and pointed to the emphasis which the communiqué contained on continuing the negotiations on disarmament, nuclear tests and collateral measures at Geneva and the exploratory talks on the Berlin question at Washington. He observed that the Soviet Union would be troubled by the references in the Athens communiqué to the sharing of nuclear information. This seemed to indicate a further dissemination of information about nuclear weapons and what he described as a threatening attitude, which would be regarded as provocative by his government. I said that there was no evidence from the communiqué or any other source that further dissemination of weapons was involved in the decisions taken at Athens; as for the question of “threatening attitudes” there was no evidence of that either in the Athens communiqué. I also recalled that the Soviets had broken the moratorium on nuclear tests and made threatening statements over Berlin.

2. This led Aroutunian to state that the main reason why the Soviets had undertaken the resumption of nuclear testing was to counter President Kennedy's measures of military mobilization and strengthening of NATO defences after his interview with Khrushchev in Vienna last year. As Aroutunian put it, nuclear explosions were much more effective as a deterrent than the moving of USA tanks into Berlin.

3. I recalled to the Ambassador that the Canadian Government was against the continuation of any testing and hoped that the Soviet Union would continue efforts at Geneva to achieve agreement on the basis of the compromise proposals put forward by the eight uncommitted Powers. The Soviet Ambassador said that it was his impression that while the Soviet Government had accepted the Eight Powers proposal as a basis of further discussion, the Western powers had not. I told Aroutunian that Zorin had entered such reservations and interpretations as to make it questionable whether the Soviet Government had accepted the Eight Powers formula as a basis of negotiation or not, but we still hoped that further discussions in the Committee of Three might serve to clarify the respective positions and to bring about agreement. I recalled that the Soviet Government had previously associated themselves with the Committee of Experts report at Geneva and then reversed their position; their views on verification were, to say the least, confusing if not incomprehensible.

4. I went on to say that it was our hope that the Conference could register some agreement, not only in the analysis of the two plans on General and Complete Disarmament, but also on one or other of the collateral measures. I also explained to Aroutunian why we were particularly anxious that there should be no break whatever in the discussions at Geneva. The Ambassador seemed to agree with my argument that if the Geneva talks were suspended, it might be more difficult to resume discussions.

5. In this conversation, as in previous conversations, I got the impression that Aroutunian obtains very little information and direction from his own government and relies pretty heavily on newspapers. In concluding the interview he observed that he personally appreciated the efforts that the Minister was making in trying to promote agreement in Geneva.

DISARMAMENT

Yesterday afternoon (June 12) I paid my first call on William Foster, Director of Disarmament Agency, Adrian Fisher, his Deputy, was also present and I was accompanied by Rae and Nutt. I found Foster to be, on the whole, not repeat not pessimistic as to the future prospect for the disarmament negotiations. He believed that progress was being made, if so slowly as to be almost imperceptible. It was encouraging for instance that there was in fact a proximity of views evident in the two plans. The Canadian initiative in drawing attention to these had been most helpful. Immediate substantial results could not repeat not be expected considering that since World War II over a trillion and a half dollars had been spent in the arms race. We had to be prepared, he was convinced, for a very long haul. Nevertheless, in the long run, taking account of the Western economic pressures and the potential pressures from the East, the Russians were bound to become interested in eventually reaching agreement. This when combined with the Western resolve that the arms race must be stopped and reversed and a similar desire on the part of the neutrals augured well for the future.

2. Foster said that USA had been “pleasantly surprised” at the general behaviour of the “eight.” By and large they had done their homework well and were already well on the way to mastering the subject. In particular, the performance of the Nigerian, UAR and Swedish delegations indicated a high degree of sophistication with respect to this knotty subject. The Burmese had perhaps not repeat not lived up to expectations but this arose more from distractions in Burma than from lack of interest in the subject matter. The Ethiopians had been, on the whole, rather disappointing and Lall of India did not repeat not seem to be following a strictly neutral course between the two sides. Nevertheless, all told, the addition of the eight to the disarmament negotiations was proving to be helpful and worthwhile.

3. Meanwhile, as we knew, the Geneva Conference would recess for a month on Friday (June 15). Our own hope that a recess might not repeat not have been necessary was appreciated by Foster. For its part USA would have at least preferred that the recess be postponed so that they might, in the meantime, have gone more fully into USA plan before the recess. Nevertheless, the recess would provide an opportunity for the Western members of the Committee to review the course of the Conference thus far and to consider future courses of action. To this end Foster said that it had been suggested at a meeting of the Four on June 12 in Geneva that the Western Four might foregather in Washington during the week before the resumption of the Conference in Geneva for the purpose of exchanging views. (I interjected that I believed you would welcome this proposal.) It had not repeat not been specified at what level these meetings might take place but it could be at Heads of Delegation meeting or at such other level as the other three might wish. In any event, Foster said that he himself and also Arthur Dean would be available to attend.

4. On the substance of general disarmament, Foster doubted that USA would be in a position to make any far reaching modifications of its existing proposals. Further studies were being made of verification which was at the crux of the East-West difficulties. USA was confident that, given Soviet willingness to negotiate seriously, it would be possible to reach agreement on a scheme of verification which would not repeat not involve serious intrusion, with which the USSR appeared to be obsessed. USA might also have some suggestions to make concerning the transition and foreign bases. In general, he thought USA would not repeat not be in a position to do much more than “shine up” existing proposals. He added, incidentally, that USA would take advantage of the recess to call a meeting of the President’s Civilian Advisory Committee on Disarmament including among others John J. McCloy, Kistiakowsky (formerly President Eisenhower’s Scientific Adviser) Roger Blough (President, USA Steel Corporation) and Herman Phleger (former State Department Legal Adviser).

5. On the possibility of a nuclear test ban, Foster thought there was some prospect of reaching agreement. The proposal of the eight neutrals had resulted, he said, in some narrowing of the gap which had previously existed between the two sides. At least the Russians now had accepted the general idea of an “international umpire” in the event of suspicious events being detected. There was still, of course, a major reconciliation involved between the Soviet view that verification process in a nuclear test ban should be permissive and USA position that the process should be automatic and obligatory. Foster confessed to some doubt as to Soviet intentions regarding resumption of nuclear testing. It had been thought that USSR definitely intended to resume testing when the USA resumed and resumption had been anticipated before now. It was possible that Soviet resumption of tests was being delayed by the need to assimilate data gained from last fall's series of tests, but Foster said that on the basis of the latest estimates, there was now uncertainty as to whether in fact the Russians intended resuming testing in the near future. I thought Foster displayed some sensitivity on the score of Soviet criticism of the proposed USA high altitude tests. By way of justification, he pointed out that the Russians themselves had conducted high altitude tests last fall. He also drew a measure of reassurance from the fact that the neutrals were not repeating or voicing any great concern over the proposed tests. Foster implied that after the recess, USA would return to the conference to make renewed efforts at reaching a test ban. The President was convinced that a test ban was in the best interests of the West, not to mention the world community, and this view was fully shared by both the Pentagon and the AEC. USA was still prepared to negotiate a test ban even if this should happen to involve suspension of the present USA test series.

6. With regard to the resumption of the Conference in July, I asked Foster if any thought had been given to the possibility of ministers returning to Geneva for the reopening of the Conference. He replied that some thought had been given to it though on the whole there did not seem to be much advantage to be gained at this juncture by raising the level of discussions. I got the impression, however, that USA authorities were not entirely dismissing the possibility that the ministers might attend, and thought this question might be considered by the Four (see paragraph 3). I said that I believed that you yourself would be prepared to attend if it were thought that the presence of ministers would be helpful, and that we saw a number of real advantages in such a course. (This discussion was held before receipt of your telegram N-234 June 12+ on basis of which I shall make a further approach to the State Department.)

7. Foster said that they had received some reports that Kuznetsov might be replacing Zorin. They have been unable to confirm this but were hopeful that it might be true since Kuznetsov was less argumentative than Zorin and more inclined to "build on facts." Foster added that USA had heard rumors that USSR might come up with a new plan after the recess. They had, however, been unable to confirm these reports.

8. In conclusion, Foster said that he would be pleased to see me at any time and that his staff would always be available, as in the past, to discuss disarmament questions with the Embassy.

DISARMAMENT: 17TH UNGA

Thank you for your reference telegram. We look forward to receiving your comments on preparations for the 17th UNGA. Following paragraphs give our views on procedure and tactics for the Assembly and related problems.

Report to the UN Disarmament Commission and Inscription of UNGA Item on Disarmament

2. It is clear from discussions in the ENDC that it is generally assumed there will be a second progress report to the Disarmament Commission and that this and the earlier report will be made available to the UNGA. As to the form of the report, it will be important to avoid (as we were able to do with the first report) a dispute which could disrupt the last two weeks' work in the Committee and impair the chances of constructive debate at the UNGA. Accordingly I wish you to try to head off any debate over the inclusion in the report of controversial issues in dispute between the two sides, and to press for a report which would give a straightforward account of progress since July and emphasize that the Committee will resume its efforts in November to reach agreement on a disarmament programme.

3. With regard to the best way of transmitting ENDC reports to the UNGA there appear to be two main possibilities:

(a) The UN Disarmament Commission could meet and agree to transmit the reports to the Assembly;

(b) Padilla-Nervo himself could, after consultation by letter with the members of the Commission, request the Secretary-General to circulate the reports as Assembly documents. The second alternative would be simpler and would avoid the possibility of a debate in the Commission which would anticipate prematurely the discussion of disarmament which is expected in any case at the 17th UNGA. Moreover, it might be difficult to arrange for a meeting of the Commission in the brief period between the adjournment of the ENDC and the start of the Assembly. As a result of these considerations, I consider it would be best to follow the second alternative, unless you and your colleagues can see an advantage in a meeting of the Commission. If it were later decided that there would be some merit in convening the Commission, we might suggest that a brief meeting be held as soon as possible after the UNGA begins and before the commencement of the disarmament debate in the first committee.

4. There is also a procedural question which arises in connection with the discussion of disarmament at the 17th UNGA. As your reference telegram points out, although there are items on the agenda dealing with nuclear weapons tests and prohibition of use of nuclear weapons, there is no item on disarmament proper. Accordingly, in discussing procedural problems with your colleagues, I also wish you to raise with them the best means of placing this subject before the UNGA. The least controversial approach might be to suggest in the Committee that the 17 states represented at Geneva jointly request the Secretary-General to include a supplementary item on the Agenda on the basis of the two ENDC progress reports. By following this procedure we might also hope to head off submission of separate items by other countries, particularly the Soviet bloc which would probably attempt to slant UNGA discussions in its favour by the description of the item and wording of the accompanying explanatory memorandum.

5. You should continue to pursue the line that the only hope of achieving real progress on disarmament lies in ensuring that detailed negotiations are resumed in Geneva at an early date, if possible before November 12. This consideration suggests that Canadian representatives should take an active part in trying to limit propaganda exchanges in the UNGA, and in directing the debate towards providing a clear mandate for the resumed negotiations in the ENDC. Although numerous proposals will probably be discussed at the UNGA (e.g. those mentioned in your reference telegram), our best policy will be to continue trying to concentrate on securing the passage of one major resolution which would take account of suggestions made during the debate and refer any resolutions which may be adopted to the ENDC for detailed consideration. Our telegram No. N-275† gives the text of a draft resolution designed to achieve this purpose which I wish you to discuss with your colleagues when putting forward the above views.

6. While our main effort should still be along the above lines we recognize that in view of the agreement on a recess there is likely to be a full debate on disarmament at the UNGA as in recent years. As a result, it would not be feasible to pursue the policy which we suggested before the recess was agreed, namely, that Western delegates abstain pro forma on resolutions affecting Western security, without any commitment on their substance, on the grounds that they involve questions which would be best considered in the ENDC. Instead, it seems probable, as your reference telegram suggests, that we will be obliged to take a stand on a series of resolutions which may be put forward by neutral delegations as well as representatives of the Communist bloc.

7. As you are aware from discussions in NAC, the USA has argued that NATO delegations should agree in advance on the attitude to be adopted toward resolutions involving "nuclear issues," and, where possible, on counter-resolutions which would be supported by the Western Powers. In opposition to this proposal, our NATO representative has taken the stand that NATO-sponsored resolutions or a firm "NATO line" on resolutions submitted by other delegations would be unlikely to command wide support and could be self-defeating in that they would divert attention from the overriding need to resume negotiations in Geneva. I wish you to continue to urge this point in discussions with your Western colleagues. In addition, now that the circumstances in which we had envisaged the possibility of pro forma abstentions no longer obtain, you should explain that Canada will have to consider resolutions submitted during the disarmament debate on their merits. You should also remind your colleagues of our long-standing view that the West must be careful to avoid appearing to adopt a consistently negative attitude toward proposals sponsored by the neutrals, especially those which reflect the views of a wide selection of UN members.

8. For NATO Paris. In elaborating our position on tactics for the 17th UNGA at the next Council discussion of disarmament, you should base your remarks on the points set out in paragraphs 5-7 above.

9. For London, Washington, Rome, Paris. Please seek comments of the Foreign Ministry on tactics at the 17th UNGA discussed in paragraphs 5 to 7 above, and on the draft resolution given in our telegram N-275.

DISARMAMENT: 17TH UNGA – MEETING OF WESTERN FOUR

Western Four met today under chairmanship of Godber (UK) in order to consider a number of questions re 17th UNGA. Following topics were discussed: report of ENDC to UNDC; method of transmitting report to UNGA; placing general disarmament item on UNGA agenda; tactics re disarmament at 17th UNGA. Discussion of nuclear tests ban is reported in separate telegram.

2. Report of ENDC to UNDC was generally agreed that report should give a straightforward and factual account of developments since June. USA circulated text of a draft USA report along such lines which Dean plans to discuss with Kuznetsov today (text set out in our telegram 1446 August 30†). As report adopts a non-controversial approach, USA was hopeful USSR would find it generally acceptable. The meeting agreed with my suggestion that it was important to emphasize in the report that Conference will resume its efforts to reach agreement on November 12. In order to provide this emphasis, Dean suggested that section i(a)(4) be made into a new section i(b)(1) and entitled "Date of Resumption of Work on Conference."

3. Method of transmitting report to UNGA and of placing general disarmament item on its agenda. It was recognized that these two questions were closely linked. USA draft report specifies in paragraph 1 that ENDC report is being transmitted to UNDC and 17th UNGA. I pointed out that in order to ensure that a general disarmament item would be placed on agenda, either of the following two procedures might be followed:

(a) ENDC could in a letter covering its report to UNDC ask Acting Secretary-General to transmit the Committee's two reports to UN members and its second report to Chairman of UNDC and to place item on UNGA agenda. This would have advantage of making all members of ENDC in a sense co-sponsors of agenda item.

(b) Chairman of UNDC could be asked in the report or covering letter to place item on agenda and submit ENDC reports to UNGA. As there appeared to be no repeat no hard and fast procedures governing his function, it could be left up to him to consider whether it would be necessary to consult members by letter. In our view, meetings of UNDC would probably not repeat not be necessary. Dean said that he had discussed this matter with Padilla Nervo who seemed anxious to avoid a situation where it might be necessary for him to consider having to convene UNDC. Both Dean and Godber therefore thought best approach would be along lines of our suggestion (a). In order to make clear that ENDC was not repeat not a UN body reporting to its parent, USA delegation thought covering letter could be from the 17 members of ENDC rather than ENDC itself. It was also thought that actual request for inscription of item would probably have to be done by Permanent Representatives in New York but that this would present no repeat no difficulty if members of ENDC were agreed on this general procedure. It was agreed that USA delegation would suggest a general procedure along these lines to USSR at the next Co-chairmen's meeting.

4. Regarding the name of the agenda item to be inscribed, I suggested and it was agreed that a general title along following lines would be appropriate: General and Complete Disarmament; Reports of ENDC.

5. Tactics re Disarmament at 17th UNGA. In order to try to ensure that the ENDC would resume its work on November 12, it was agreed that consideration should be given to ways in which the disarmament discussions might be expedited (without in any way curtailing the debates). The chairman summed up the discussions on this point as follows: it did not repeat not appear to matter whether the general disarmament item were taken up in the Assembly before the nuclear tests item or vice-versa so long as these two items were the first to be considered by the First Committee. Perhaps discussions could be expedited if the debates on each were "interweaved," i.e. meetings devoted to either one or other of the topics could be taking place during the same general period. In this way consideration of both items need not repeat not be unduly delayed while instructions were being waited for by various delegations or for related reasons.

6. It was also generally agreed that it would be useful for Western delegations to have in readiness a draft resolution along lines of that set out in your telegram N-275† and UK draft set out in our telegram 1432 August 24.† With regard to timing for submission of such a resolution, I made the points contained in paragraph 3 of your telegram N-276 August 29 about the danger of submitting a draft resolution before we were assured of wide support. There was no repeat no consensus of views on this point as USA, UK and Italian delegations all believed that it might be desirable to submit the resolution early in the debates in order to steer discussions in the direction of the resolution and possibly discourage some other resolution from being submitted.

7. The meeting studies both Canadian and USA drafts and I made the points regarding UK draft contained in your telegram N-276 August 29 as well as several other observations on its wording. As a result a composite draft resolution was drawn up (set out in our telegram 1444 August 30) which used UK draft as a basis but which incorporated the main points contained in Canadian draft. It was the general view that this composite draft might be of some assistance to Permanent Missions in New York in their consideration of tactics for the disarmament debates in the UNGA. It was also concluded that further consideration of the general question of tactics would probably have to be pursued in New York since ENDC session was now drawing to a close.

8. At the conclusion of the meeting I raised the question of tactics with regard to various resolutions which might be put forward on nuclear tests and disarmament I put forward the points contained in paragraph 7 of your telegram N-274 August 25, stressing the importance of each resolution being considered on its merits by Western delegations. Due to the lateness of the hour this matter did not repeat not receive detailed consideration but it was agreed that it would be desirable for Western delegations to keep in close touch with each other in New York, and to consult as much as possible on resolution in the disarmament field.

DISARMAMENT: 17TH UNGA

Following paragraphs comment on points raised in the Western Four Meeting of August 30 on above subject (your reference telegram).

Report on the UN Disarmament Commission and Submission of UNGA Item on Disarmament

2. The text of the USA draft of the second ENDC progress report is in line with our desire to see a non-controversial account of the Committee's activities and is generally acceptable to us. As to the procedure for submitting it to the UN Disarmament Commission I think it would be preferable to follow the precedent set by the first report, i.e., to have the Co-chairman of the ENDC transmit it to the Chairman of the Disarmament Commission on behalf of the ENDC. The covering letter to the Chairman of the Commission could then ask that both reports be circulated as General Assembly documents. (These suggestions would require alterations to the opening paragraph of the present USA draft.)

3. With respect to the UNGA item on disarmament, I would agree that if it could be arranged the best procedure would be for the 17 members of the Committee to request the Acting Secretary-General, through their permanent representatives in New York, to include a supplementary item on the agenda with a title such as that suggested in your reference telegram.

4. I agree that items on disarmament and nuclear tests should be considered as a matter of priority by the First Committee in order to permit early completion of the debate on these and related questions and the resumption of work in the ENDC. I am inclined to doubt, however, that it will prove possible for debates on these two subjects to be "interweaved" as the UK representative has suggested (paragraph 5 your reference telegram). In my opinion there will likely be pressure for a separate debate on the Indian item on nuclear tests, and probably also some desire on the part of UN members to discuss this question first as the matter of greatest urgency.

5. On the question of the timing of submission of a general resolution on disarmament, it is not clear to us whether your colleagues are thinking in terms of an essentially Western resolution for early submission. If so, it is my opinion that these tactics are unlikely to succeed. As I emphasized in my telegram N-276 August 29, I believe that the success of any general resolution on disarmament depends in large measure on obtaining active support from a broad selection of UN members, particularly the neutrals represented in Geneva. In the absence of such support, a purely Western resolution could be resented by other UN members and might result in the submission of competing resolutions by other delegations (i.e., the opposite of what we wish to achieve). Accordingly, I wish you to re-emphasize to your colleagues the importance we attach to obtaining wide backing for a resolution before going ahead with its submission. In making this point you should explain that these tactics need not involve a decision now as to exactly when the resolution would be submitted, since if broad support is forthcoming at an early stage we would of course agree to submission of a resolution at that time.

6. The composite draft resolution, text of which is given in your telegram 1444 August 30, incorporates the main points referred to in my telegram N-276 and is satisfactory to us for the most part. I believe, however, that it should give a more forceful presentation of the need to resume negotiations in the ENDC and to continue there until concrete results have been achieved. As a result I would like to see amendments along the following lines included in a revised draft:

(a) An additional paragraph, to be inserted at the beginning of the operative section, in which the UNGA would “endorse” or “welcome” the decision of the ENDC to resume work on November 12. This addition would give direct UNGA approval to resumed negotiations and in addition might help to head off possible Soviet manoeuvres to delay the resumption of work in the ENDC.

(b) The addition of an operative paragraph along these lines would remove the need for the present preambular paragraph merely “noting” that ENDC negotiations will be resumed. In place of this paragraph I think it would be useful, following the draft text given in my telegram N-275, for the UNGA to recognize the importance of “continuing and uninterrupted” negotiations in the ENDC. This would follow logically from the preceding paragraph which speaks of the work done so far. It also serves to underline our main preoccupation which is to achieve the clearest possible endorsement of continued work in the ENDC, a point which I believe is not brought out strongly enough despite the reference to it which is now included in operative paragraph 2.

(c) It would be desirable in the third preambular paragraph for the UNGA to take note of the progress reports of the ENDC rather than merely recognizing the “useful work” done in Geneva in general terms as this paragraph now does.

7. With respect to continuing discussion of UNGA tactics I agree that the main centre for consultation will shortly have to shift to New York when ENDC representatives leave Geneva after the recess. In the meantime, however, I wish you to put the above points to your Western colleagues and to keep in close touch with them regarding further developments which may effect choice of tactics in the UNGA.

8. For London. Reference your telegram 4144 August 31, † please convey to Foreign Office the additional views on the draft general disarmament resolution which are given above together with relevant points made in my telegram 276 August 29.

LETTER NO. 37

Geneva, September 10, 1962

CONFIDENTIAL

Reference: Our Telegram No. 1430 of August 23, 1962.

DISARMAMENT: POSSIBLE DEVELOPMENTS AT UNGA

The following are our views on the course which the discussion of general and complete disarmament might take at the General Assembly, and the position which the Canadian delegation might adopt. Unless an agreement has already been reached on the cessation of nuclear tests, this subject, on which we have commented separately (our telegram No. 1539 of September 7+), will be given absolute priority by most of the non-nuclear and uncommitted members of the Assembly and is likely to consume most of its time in the early stages of the session.

2. For some time both the USSR and the USA, in the light of the tightening deadlock in the ENDC, have appeared to want to bring their case before the General Assembly. The USSR seems confident that its plan, by placing the accent on nuclear disarmament and on the elimination of the threat of a nuclear war, will have a greater appeal to world public opinion than the USA plan. The USA, on the other hand, seems to believe that it will be able to expose the essentially unrealistic and propagandistic character of the Soviet plan, and to hope that the General Assembly will come to recognize that its own plan is more honest, more realistic and more workable.

3. It may be assumed that the USSR and USA statements in the UNGA will not dwell primarily on the points of similarity between their plans but on the very fundamental differences of principle and approach separating them which have emerged. This would not necessarily be bad. The Assembly could exercise a constructive influence by squarely facing up to the basic differences between the plans and by suggesting compromises which might help gradually in removing the road blocks which now stand in the path of an eventual agreement.

4. The Soviet delegation is likely to emphasize the following main themes which, in one form or another, have been repeatedly developed since the opening of the Disarmament Conference in all of the major statements made by Gromyko, Zorin and Kouznetsov in Geneva in contrasting the Soviet and USA positions (see in particular ENDC/PV56 pp. 32 and 33):

(a) General and complete disarmament cannot be achieved without a treaty containing firm obligations, a definite time limit, and a guarantee of uninterrupted transition from stage to stage. The United States is unwilling to conclude a single treaty on general and complete disarmament containing firm and binding obligations. Its plan does not provide for a definite time limit for the whole process of disarmament. The United States wishes to reserve to itself the right to arrest the process of disarmament at the end of each stage.

(b) There can be no general and complete disarmament without the complete elimination and prohibition of nuclear weapons. The Soviet plan has the paramount virtue of making a nuclear war impossible in two years by eliminating all the means of delivery of nuclear weapons in the first stage of disarmament. The USSR is even willing to eliminate nuclear weapons in the very first stage also. By contrast, the USA plan will not eliminate the threat of a nuclear war until the very end of the disarmament process, if ever. The USA is not prepared to accept a definite commitment to prohibit the use of nuclear weapons and is contemplating placing such weapons at the disposal of the UN Peace Force.

(c) Agreement will not be possible if one of the parties seeks military advantages for itself, and attempts to preserve until the final completion of disarmament not only the means of nuclear attack but also foreign bases for the purpose of aggression.

(d) Agreement on verification will not be possible if it infringes the security of states and provides intelligence on existing armaments, rather than simply ensuring that agreed disarmament measures are being carried out.

(e) Agreement on measures for the maintenance of international peace and security will not be possible if they violate the provisions of the UN Charter and invade the sovereign rights of states.

5. The United States delegation is likely to emphasize the following main themes in conformity with the position which the USA and its Western allies have taken in the ENDC:

(a) The USA plan, by providing for gradual and percentage reductions of armaments from the beginning to the end of the disarmament process, has been so designed as to preserve the present military balance and relative degree of mutual security until the ultimate objective of general and complete disarmament has been achieved. By contrast the Soviet plan, by eliminating the means of delivery of nuclear weapons and foreign bases in the first stage would leave the USSR and its Warsaw Treaty partners with a marked preponderance of conventional strength and strategic advantage in Europe. This would decrease international security and might make war not less but more likely. The United States plan aims not only at eventually eliminating the threat of a nuclear war, but at preventing any war whether nuclear or conventional, during the process of disarmament.

(b) The Soviet claim that its proposal for the 100% elimination of nuclear weapons delivery vehicles will eliminate the threat of a nuclear war is a delusion; since it will always be possible to use improvised means of delivery, such as rockets and planes retained for civilian purposes, in the event of a war emergency. This would be true even if the destruction of the nuclear weapons themselves were to be included in the first stage, as there would be no sure way of ensuring that some of these weapons had not in fact been retained.

(c) The USA plan provides for verification commensurate with the disarmament being carried out. The progressive zonal inspection scheme is the most promising and the only practical method which has been suggested so far, to achieve this objective. The Soviets have never shown how their proposals to eliminate all nuclear weapon delivery vehicles in the first stage, and all nuclear weapons either in the first or the second stage, could be adequately and satisfactorily verified.

(d) Disarmament will not necessarily eliminate the use of force as an instrument of national policy unless it is accompanied by adequate measures for the maintenance of international peace and security and the settlement of international disputes.

6. One tactical line which the Soviet delegation might follow is to submit a substantive resolution which would embody in general terms some or all of the five fundamental concepts outlined in paragraph 4 above. Alternatively, it might encourage the neutral countries to submit resolutions which would deal with one or the other of these five points. For instance, the Indian delegation in the ENDC has generally agreed with the Soviet point of view that there should be a single treaty containing firm obligations and a definite time limit which should be as short as possible. Ethiopia could be encouraged to re-submit in a modified form its resolution of last year on the prohibition of nuclear weapons. A group of uncommitted countries might be found to sponsor a resolution stipulating that measures for the maintenance of international peace and security in a disarmed world should not violate the provisions of the UN Charter and infringe the sovereign rights of states.

7. How could the West counter such Soviet tactics? If the Assembly begins to discuss and compare the fundamental concepts of the Soviet and USA plans, a purely procedural resolution enjoining the ENDC to resume its work and renew its efforts might prove an insufficient answer. The West might have to be ready to submit a counter-resolution on substance which would reflect its own interpretation of the principles which underlie the USA outline of a treaty on a general and complete disarmament in a peaceful world.

8. It is most doubtful that either a purely Soviet or a purely USA resolution on substance would stand a chance of being accepted, since the vast majority of the uncommitted countries would probably not wish in the end to pronounce themselves unequivocally in favour of either the Soviet or the USA positions, in the knowledge that such a judgment would not advance but retard progress in the ENDC. At this point the procedural resolution which the Western countries, and in particular the UK and Canada, have in mind, would have its best chance of success. Nevertheless, it might be that the submission of resolutions reflecting essentially the Soviet and the USA approaches might constitute a first step in the process of working out mutually acceptable compromises which might lead to future progress in the ENDC.

9. As regards neutrally-sponsored resolutions on specific aspects of general and complete disarmament, their merits should be assessed in the light of whether or not their adoption would be likely to promote or hamper the work of the ENDC in negotiating a treaty on general and complete disarmament. It might be that, on these grounds, they should be discouraged and opposed altogether, unless they should prove to be acceptable to both the USSR and the USA.

10. The members of the ENDC, and particularly the uncommitted, will have a special responsibility to discharge in the Assembly. It is known that the eight non-aligned members of the ENDC are planning for continuing consultation during the Assembly. This is a fact which the Canadian delegation will obviously wish to keep in mind in its attempts to influence the eight and, through them, the other non-aligned members of the Assembly. It might also be desirable during the Assembly to hold ad hoc meetings of the members of the ENDC to exchange views on the implications of developments in New York on the future course of negotiations in Geneva.

11. The line to be taken by the Canadian delegation should presumably emphasize the importance of the preliminary but necessary work of clarification and elucidation of the Soviet and USA plans on which the ENDC has been engaged until now. The points of similarity between the two draft treaties before the Conference have already been covered in the two statements of the Minister of March 19 and July 24 at Geneva and this line could be again repeated.<sup>26</sup> It would be naïve, however, not to recognize the fundamental differences in the approaches of the USSR and the USA. To the extent feasible, we might offer suggestions and comments which might help in bringing the two sides closer together.

12. We will presumably continue to press for a nuclear test cessation treaty, if one is not already concluded; and action by the Committee of the Whole on the subject of

(a) non-dissemination of nuclear weapons;

(b) measures for the prevention of war by accident, miscalculation or failure of communications;

(c) exclusion of weapons of mass destruction from outer space.

13. It is possible that the non-aligned members of the ENDC will take the position that neither the USSR nor the USA drafts, nor the plans on which they are founded, should be considered as the basis of the treaty on general and complete disarmament to be produced by the ENDC. (Instead, the ENDC should work out a plan embodying the articles upon which both USA and USSR plans agree, with compromises in the areas of disagreement.) We could support this generally.

14. We should continue to press the USA (with, we hope, the support of the other Western members of the ENDC) to improve their negotiating position on time limits, nuclear weapons, nuclear weapons vehicles; the eventual prohibition of the use of nuclear weapons, including use by the UN Peace Force, and "foreign bases."

15. Most of the points briefly outlined above have already been included in the Canadian Memorandum of June 27, 1962, submitted to the United States Disarmament Agency.†

16. In conclusion, it seems to the Canadian Delegation to the Eighteen-Nation Disarmament Committee, that the consideration of disarmament in the General Assembly could have a useful impact on the work of our committee if we can manage to channel it along the right lines. On the other hand, a purely propaganda and irresponsible debate in the Assembly could do a great deal of harm to the negotiations in the ENDC and retard progress by several months. We should therefore work, mainly through the non-aligned members of the ENDC, and other neutrals with whom we have friendly relations, for the adoption by the Assembly of a resolution which would give some measure of satisfaction to both the USSR and the USA and might provide a new impetus to the negotiations in the ENDC.

DISARMAMENT: 17TH UNGA – POSSIBLE NEUTRAL INITIATIVES

I had a conversation today with Lall, Leader of Indian Delegation to ENDC. He is going to New York. It is not repeat not yet certain whether Krishna Menon will go also.

2. Lall was supposed to have been drawing up a plan which would be a compromise between USA and USSR draft treaties. Today he told me he had made an attempt to do so, but he apparently had little favourable response from non-aligned here. Barrington, he told me, had said it was too Western.

3. Lall thinks that subjects on which negotiations here have got stuck are (a) elimination of nuclear weapons vehicles, (b) elimination of nuclear weapons, (c) foreign bases,

(d) verification. He is still thinking of devising some middle-of-road formula which would enable two sides to move from their present incompatible positions. I suggested that maybe non-aligned could best exercise influence, not repeat not by putting forward a definite plan, but instead, suggestions as to principles and methods of work in order to break deadlock in these areas, and later intervene to keep things moving in negotiations between two sides. Whether he takes this suggestion or not repeat not, it seems likely that India will be active in trying to promote a compromise of some sort in forthcoming UNGA.

4. Lall remarked that reports of latest Pugwash Meeting (held in Cambridge last month) were interesting in that members of Conference which included many top level scientists from both East and West gave indications of ways in which compromises could be reached both in general disarmament, especially verification, and on a nuclear test cessation treaty. It would be desirable for Canadian delegation at 17th UNGA to have as full information about these reports as possible.<sup>27</sup>

My dear Colleague:

Canada may find it necessary in the near future to take a stand on inspection in the nuclear test ban issue, now that the first Committee is in session.

There is a strong indication that a resolution will be tabled in the UN first Committee along the lines of the proposals made by Burma and India, calling on the nuclear powers to accept an uninspected moratorium on underground tests. The United States have made it quite clear that they will oppose any such resolution. However, it is equally clear that they will be subjected to increasing pressure to concede.

There would be grave risks to Western security in its acceptance. Responsible Western scientists are agreed that they cannot distinguish in all cases between earthquakes and underground explosions, by any known scientific means, and the Soviets have refused repeatedly to provide any evidence that they have this capability. There are possibilities that scientific identification might be possible at some future date, but the United States could not be expected to prejudice its security based on a mere possibility.

Whether a significant strategic advantage can be gained by clandestine testing cannot be stated precisely, but those who are competent to make an assessment agree that there is a considerable risk involved. For these reasons, it seems clear that a viable treaty must include provisions for on-site inspection.

Apart from the security implications of this issue, acceptance of a declaratory solution would be certain to prejudice disarmament negotiations, particularly with relation to inspection. I would therefore urge that Canada oppose any resolution which does not provide for adequate verification.

UNGA – 1ST COMMITTEE – NUCLEAR TESTING

Non-aligned draft resolution was tabled late this afternoon. Resolution is co-sponsored by 8 non-aligned members ENDC plus Algeria, Afghanistan, Bolivia, Cambodia, Ceylon, Chile, Cyprus, Ghana, Guinea, Indonesia, Iraq, Jordan, Laos, Liberia, Mali, Nepal, Somalia, Sudan, Syria, Tanganyika, Venezuela and Yugoslavia. Lall told us further co-sponsors expected Monday. We understand Austria, Finland and Ireland have declined to co-sponsor. Final text is that contained in reference telegram with minor changes. Contrary to report in paragraph 1 reference telegram (which was erroneous), preambular paragraph referring to agreement in 3 environments remains in preamble. We will send later final text of resolution received by Secretariat together with definitive list of co-sponsors as of late today.

2. USA have been making emphatically clear to non-aligned that resolution is unacceptable to them. Lall told us that this afternoon Godber and Dean told him that they would abstain on resolution. USA tried unsuccessfully today to persuade non-aligned members to postpone tabling resolution until Monday. USSR delegation is stating privately that resolution is unsatisfactory because it does not repeat not go far enough. However, it is widely believed that USSR will support resolution.

3. Approximately 40 countries are on 1st Committee speakers list for next week. Chairman envisages 2 meetings daily on most days and expects draft proposals will be discussed towards end of week.

4. We have just learned from UN Secretariat that USA and UK have tabled their draft resolution. Resolution was submitted shortly after non-aligned resolution. We believe text of USA-UK resolution is same as that set out in our telegram 1646 October 2.† We will confirm this on receipt of official text.

17TH UNGA – 1ST COMMITTEE – ITEM 77 – NUCLEAR TESTING

Tabling of neutral resolution on nuclear testing has ended possibilities for influencing sponsors to change text and corridor talk is focussing on possible amendments. It is recognized even by some of sponsors that although resolution may be unexceptionable on moral grounds, it is open to criticism from tactical standpoint, in that it inclines toward Soviet position, is unlikely to help negotiations forward, and thus unlikely to result in cessation of nuclear testing.

2. Discussion is centering around suggestions which have been made in a number of statements including those of several of sponsors of resolution. Themes most frequently considered are either (a) to propose banning separately tests in outer space, underwater and in atmosphere (b) to introduce idea of convening scientific conference or establishing on interim basis of International Scientific Commission to which information on detection and identification of underground nuclear tests would be furnished by those states having expertise on subject. Main aim of both these additions is to distinguish between tests in 3 environments on which there is no repeat no dispute over identification, and underground testing over which there are differences and to concentrate Assembly's attention on area in which dispute lies.

3. Since neutral resolution calls for report to UNGA by December 10, there is likely to be another debate in Assembly at that time. Object of amendments would be to focus attention during later debate on area where further negotiations necessary if agreement to be reached.

NUCLEAR TESTING

Lord Amory said that his Government, and he understood the USA Government also, were concerned that Canada might support an "unpoliced moratorium on underground tests," such as the 8-Power resolution in the UK view, called for. He said that the United States and the United Kingdom had taken the position that they cannot accept a cessation of tests without adequate inspection provisions until such time as their scientists are able to say that all testing can be monitored by remote means. Lord Amory said that it was his Government's belief that Canadian support of the 8-Power draft as they now understood its text would put Canada more in line with the Soviet position than with the Western position adopted in Geneva last August, which they thought Canada supported. He also said that it would put Canada close to the present position of the neutrals who, despite a long history in Geneva of growing appreciation of the Western position, seemed to have leaned toward the Soviet Union in formulating their present draft.

2. Lord Amory thought that to agree to cease testing without binding the Soviet Union to an inspection formula in advance would remove the only incentive that the Soviet Union had to continue to negotiate towards a treaty. The whole Soviet record had been one of adamantness and progressive retreat whenever near-agreement was reached.

3. The Minister, in reply, informed Lord Amory that he understood the Eight had now agreed on a final text and that judging from the statements by the various speakers in the General Debate in the United Nations, they could probably count on the overwhelming support of the United Nations' membership for their resolution. The Minister then read out to Lord Amory the operative paragraphs of the agreed 8-Power draft. He noted that all three of the major nuclear powers were agreed on all essentials which would permit support of the 8-Power resolution with the exception of the conditions under which they could agree to cease small underground tests. The area and the nature of the disagreement was not worth putting themselves in a position of opposition to the overwhelming membership of the United Nations. The Eight had not "suddenly gone Communist" – their draft contained something for both East and West but upheld their principal objective – that tests should cease not later than the 1st of January.

4. The Minister noted that insofar as Canada was concerned we were already faced with a high level of radiation in this country, as the figures announced recently in the House by the Minister of Health and Welfare had shown. We were not prepared simply to sit back and do nothing about continued testing, which was a menace to all mankind.

5. Lord Amory complained that the 8-Power resolution was not impartial in that it ignored the two alternatives which the Western Powers had put forward in August, one for a limited treaty covering tests in the atmosphere, underwater and in outer space and the other for a comprehensive treaty including underground testing with on-site inspection.<sup>28</sup> The Minister noted that this kind of argument would have no public appeal; that world public opinion demanded an end to all testing and in particular to those in the atmosphere which cause the greatest harm to mankind. He doubted the military significance of the small underground tests that were now standing in the way of Western acceptance of a final cessation of all testing. He made it clear to Lord Amory that Canada could not line up against the 8-Power resolution.

6. The Minister suggested that the United Kingdom should try to do something to bridge the small gap that now exists between the United States and the Soviet Union. He reminded Lord Amory that the British record in Geneva had been one of continuously prompting the United States to be more realistic and forthcoming and that this rôle had produced some useful results in the past. Lord Amory conceded that on occasions the Americans had been too aggressive and too dogmatic in the way they had approached the testing question but that on this occasion they had British support on the position they were taking. British scientists were making good progress on the perfection of seismological equipment for identifying the origins of earth tremors but until they could report conclusive findings, the United Kingdom were not prepared to push the United States towards a cessation of testing without on site inspection. In reply to a question, Lord Amory confirmed that the United States and United Kingdom were keeping in close contact in respect of these representations to Canada that he had been in touch with the <sup>28</sup> Voir/See Documents on Disarmament, 1962 Vol. 2, July-December (Washington: United States Arms Control and Disarmament Agency, 1963), pp. 791-807.

USA Chargé d'Affaires before making this call. He expected we would be hearing from the USA as well.

7. There followed a general discussion of the tactical disadvantage to the Western Powers if the Soviet Union voted for or abstained on the 8-Power resolution and the United States and the United Kingdom voted against. One suggestion that was tentatively discussed was that since the 8-Power resolution, in addition to asking countries to cease testing by January 1, also asked them to resume their search for agreement and report back to the Assembly by December 10, there was no real reason why the United States and Western countries should not take the position that the resolution was acceptable on the understanding that its main purpose was to call for an intensified negotiation over the next four weeks. The United States would be at liberty to reserve its position as to the stand it would take if no agreement were forthcoming by December 10 and to make this plain in advance. For Western countries to take such a position would preserve something of their relations with the neutral members of the Eighteen Nation Committee, whose goodwill and support would be needed in future disarmament discussions. The Eight had obviously tried to incorporate in their resolution elements of both the Soviet and Western positions and doubtless hoped to avoid an outright rejection of it by either side. Like their earlier 8-Power Memorandum, their efforts were bound to result in an ambiguous text, and the Western Powers should recognize the limitations within which the Eight had to operate.

8. Lord Amory undertook to report the views of the Canadian Government as expressed by Mr. Green.<sup>29</sup>

CONFIDENTIAL

Ottawa, October 20, 1962

My dear Prime Minister:

I have been instructed to transmit to you the following text, which I have received by telegraph, of a message from President Kennedy:

“Dear Mr. Prime Minister:

To my distress, I have learned that your Government intends to support in the General Assembly this year a resolution co-sponsored by the eight new members of the 18 Nation Disarmament Conference and others and calling for an unverified moratorium on nuclear weapons tests. As I wrote you on last April 13, I am convinced that there is no safety in such a proposal and it leads away from the only honest and workable road to arms limitation.

I realize that last year your Delegation to the United Nations voted for a resolution calling for such a moratorium. And I can understand your concern about nuclear weapons testing. As you know, I share that concern and decided that the United States must go forward with its tests only after the most careful and considered weighing of all the factors involved.

Revised at SSEA's request. [Ross Campbell]
Seen. [N. A.] R[obertson]

This year there is a difference in the situation. The United States will have no alternative but to oppose such a moratorium and oppose vigorously, as we did last year. The Soviet Union, on the other hand, with its complete lack of moral scruples will, I am told, not vote against a moratorium this year. Thus a vote for a moratorium, which might have been considered as "a plague on both your Houses" last year, would this year be clearly directed at the United States and those allies who stand firm against the moratorium proposition. Furthermore, we are prepared this year to accept without controls an end to above-ground testing. Your Delegation has strongly supported at Geneva the two test ban treaties we tabled there. These represent substantial forward movement in a sincere effort to find a safe way of ending tests. The Soviet Union, on the contrary, has continued adamantly to oppose any on-site inspection requirement, although we have reduced these requirements to what we sincerely believe to be the minimum tolerable limit. We had hoped that these proposals would receive your support as a member of the Western Alliance.

The Canadian Delegation at Geneva has wholeheartedly supported the Western position on this subject, as the best way to put pressure on the Soviets to change its position. We do not by any means rule out the possibility that the Soviets will once more reaffirm the position they took from 1958 until late 1961 that on-site inspection was a necessary element of a control system.

Should Canada cast its vote in favour of a moratorium this year, it will be tantamount to Canada's abandoning the Western position at Geneva on this issue. This will be seen by the Soviet Union as a successful breach of the Western position. In this event, what hope can we hold for pressures on the Soviet Union to take the extremely reasonable step we have proposed? Or to agree even to the limited treaty covering the testing environments of greatest concern, i.e., the atmosphere, outer Space and the Oceans.

I can assure you most strongly, Mr. Prime Minister, that the United States will not agree to end tests unless we have reasonably adequate assurance that the Soviet Union will not carry out such tests. A mere Soviet promise is not satisfactory either to me or to the American public. There will, in short, be no end put to testing by another moratorium resolution in the United Nations.

As I wrote in my letter of April 13, what we must do is stand together in convincing the Soviet Union that the world cannot have disarmament without inspection and that the Soviet Union cannot conduct nuclear tests with impunity and then expect the United States to hold its hand in matters essential to the security of the West.

Mr. Prime Minister, I cannot overemphasize my concern in this matter, and for the reasons I have advanced above, and in the interest of a vital Western solidarity on this testing issue, I hope you will reconsider this decision to cast an affirmative vote for a resolution which can only damage, and damage seriously, the Western position on an essential issue of Western security.

Sincerely,

JOHN F. KENNEDY"

I am informed that the White House does not plan to publish the foregoing letter. Furthermore, I am informed that the signed original of the letter is being pouched, and upon its arrival it will be immediately transmitted to you.

Sincerely,

IVAN B. WHITE

CONFIDENTIAL

[Ottawa], October 26, 1962

My dear Prime Minister:

As you know there are two resolutions before the General Assembly dealing with the suspension of nuclear tests. The first is a USA/UK resolution calling for a comprehensive treaty with on-site inspection of a proportion of suspicious underground events, or, failing this, suspension without inspection of tests in the atmosphere, underwater and in outer space. The second resolution is the so-called neutral resolution which calls for, in effect, an uninspected moratorium upon all tests including underground ones. The latter is, of course, the Soviet position.

On 17 October, I wrote to the Minister of External Affairs recommending that Canada should not support the neutral resolution which had not then been formally tabled. My argument was based upon what I conceive to be the merits of the case and the nature of major Canadian national interests. Present methods of seismic detection do not permit one to distinguish between earthquakes and underground nuclear explosions. With regard to the possible strategic advantage which could be achieved by clandestine underground testing by the USSR, one cannot be quite so definite. However, the consensus of qualified experts is that an uninspected moratorium which would be respected by the USA and might not be respected by the USSR would involve definite risks to US security and therefore to Western security. This includes Canada since, like all other Western countries, we depend upon the US nuclear umbrella.

I cannot see that it would be in Canada's interests to place pressure upon the Americans to accept an agreement which would be contrary to the essential requirements of US security and therefore of Canadian security. This being so, I suggest that it is inadvisable to place a major strain upon our diplomatic credit in Washington at a time when important Canadian interests are at stake in relation to the European Economic Community and other matters. Recent events in Cuba have, of course, provided further evidence of what a Soviet promise is worth.

I have now received a reply from the Minister of External Affairs.† He points out that Canada has taken a strong and consistent stand that nuclear tests must be brought to a halt and that we have also supported a cut-off date of 1 January, 1963. Although he does not say this in so many words it seems evident that he considers that he is bound to vote in favour of the neutral resolution.

I am fully aware of the statements which have been made by the Minister of External Affairs and by General Burns upon his instructions. And in common with all members of the Government I have viewed with pride and admiration the work of the Minister of External Affairs on behalf of disarmament. Nevertheless, I am still very strongly of the opinion that it would be inadvisable and contrary to essential Canadian interests for Canada to support the neutral resolution at this time.

I think it is fair to say that by so doing we will not effectively serve the cause of disarmament since the USA and UK will not accept the neutral resolution regardless of how many votes it may get in the General Assembly. I do not believe that we are committed by previous statements to support the neutral resolution since we have also consistently maintained that a viable agreement must contain appropriate arrangements for verification. I believe that we must also recognize that by supporting the neutral resolution we should be abandoning this vital principle of disarmament.

Consequently, I continue to believe very strongly that Canada should not vote in favour of the so-called neutral resolution. In my judgment this has become even more inopportune in view of events in Cuba. I would welcome an opportunity to discuss this matter more fully with you, or, should you consider it appropriate, to discuss the question in Cabinet. Since the matter may come to a vote in the First Committee in the very near future, this consideration is urgent.

I am sending a copy of this letter to the Minister of External Affairs for his information.

Yours sincerely,

DOUGLAS S. HARKNESS

CONFIDENTIAL

[New York], March 14, 1963

ITEM 77: THE URGENT NEED FOR THE SUSPENSION OF NUCLEAR AND THERMONUCLEAR TESTS

Summary

This item was proposed by the Delegation of India. During the period since the sixteenth session of the United Nations General Assembly, little progress had been achieved at the Eighteen-Nation Disarmament Conference in Geneva. Both the United States and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics were, at the time of the debate in the first Committee, still in the course of conducting large-scale atmospheric tests. There was wide-spread feeling in the General Assembly that this item was of the greatest urgency and importance. The debate was a long one and for most of the time, there were intensive behind-the-scenes negotiations on what proposals should be submitted. In these discussions Canada played a leading role. There were two resolutions submitted: one resolution was sponsored by 37 non-aligned countries including the eight members of the Eighteen-Nation Disarmament Committee in Geneva. The second resolution was tabled by the United States and the United Kingdom. The non-aligned resolution, in its original form, condemned all nuclear tests and asked the nuclear powers to stop all nuclear testing by January 1, 1963. The United States-United Kingdom resolution urged the Eighteen-Nation Committee to conclude a treaty with effective and prompt international verification prohibiting tests in all environments. Canada submitted amendments to the non-aligned resolution, the most important of which provided for a ban on testing in the atmosphere, outer space and under water if a comprehensive treaty was not reached by January 1, 1963. The Ghanaian Delegation submitted a sub-amendment to the Canadian amendment which Canada modified (with Ghanaian concurrence) and accepted. The sub-amendment, as incorporated in the Canadian amendment, provided that the ban in three environments should be accompanied by an interim arrangement suspending testing underground, taking as a basis the memorandum of the eight non-aligned countries submitted to the Eighteen-Nation Committee and taking into consideration other proposals. The United States and the United Kingdom submitted a sub-amendment to Canada's amendment, as revised, providing that the interim agreement covering underground testing should include adequate assurances for detection and identification of seismic occurrences and events by an international seismic commission.

In the voting in Committee, all proposals were adopted. The USA-UK sub-amendment was adopted by a vote of 65 in favour (Canada) to 11 against (Communists) with 28 abstentions. The Canadian amendment referred to in the previous paragraph (and incorporating the Ghanaian sub-amendment) was adopted by a vote of 62 in favour (Canada) to 11 against (Communist countries) with 31 abstentions. The resolution as a whole was then adopted by a vote of 81 in favour (Canada) none against with 25 abstentions. The United States and the United Kingdom dropped from their resolution shortly before voting a proposal for a partial ban in the three environments where fallout occurs. As revised, the USA-UK resolution was adopted by 50 in favour (including Canada and India), 12 against (Soviet bloc) with 42 abstentions. The 37-power resolution was adopted in plenary session by a vote of 75 in favour, none against with 21 abstentions. The USA-UK resolution was then adopted by 51 in favour, 10 against and 40 abstentions. The countries abstaining on the non-aligned resolution were on the one hand the Communists and on the other hand the United Kingdom and the United States and some other NATO countries. A large proportion of the countries abstaining on the USA-UK resolution were the Africans and their attitude was influenced by their view that this resolution was less positive than the 37-nation resolution calling for cessation of all nuclear tests.

Debate

At the outset of the discussions there was no firm indication about what type of resolution the eight non-aligned members of the Eighteen-Nation Committee wished to see adopted. The Brazilian Delegation was particularly active and submitted to the other non-aligned members of the Geneva Committee a draft resolution of a moderate nature which endorsed the eight-nation memorandum as a basis for negotiations and urged the nuclear powers to conduct negotiations in a spirit of compromise and mutual consent with a view to reaching agreement by January 1, 1963. However, as discussions among the non-aligned members proceeded, it became more and more clear that this resolution would not go far enough to satisfy a large number of non-aligned countries which wished to recommend in a more emphatic way the termination of tests by January 1, 1963. The representative of Mexico, Padilla Nervo, was instrumental in making the resolution more emphatic in this respect. At the Eighteen-Nation Committee, in May 1962, Mr. Nervo had suggested that January 1, 1963 be set as a target date for conclusion of a treaty prohibiting all tests. In plenary session of the General Assembly, he read into the record, but did not formally propose, a draft resolution providing for ending all tests by January 1, 1963. This proposal differed from his suggestion in Geneva because it involved a cut-off date for all testing rather than setting a target date for ending all tests by treaty. The United Arab Republic and Burma were also in favour of strengthening the Brazilian draft proposal. So far as we were able to determine, the Indian Delegation were not particularly active at this stage of the negotiations.

Towards the second week of the debate, a joint draft resolution (A/C.1/L.310) was submitted by thirty non-aligned members including the eight non-aligned participants in the Geneva Conference. Subsequently seven other co-sponsors were added. This resolution provided for condemnation of all nuclear weapons tests; asked that such tests cease immediately and not later than 1 January 1963; endorsed the eight nation memorandum as a basis for negotiations; called on the parties concerned, taking this memorandum as a basis, to negotiate and reach agreement urgently; and requested the Eighteen-Nation Disarmament Committee to report to the General Assembly not later than 10 December. Immediately after this resolution was tabled, on October 19, the United Kingdom and the United States tabled their draft resolution (A/C.1/L.311) which urged the Disarmament Committee to conclude a treaty with effective and prompt international verification prohibiting all nuclear weapons tests in all environments and which also provided that if such an agreement was not reached expeditiously, the Disarmament Committee should conclude a treaty prohibiting testing in the environments where radioactive fallout occurs.

At this juncture it became more and more apparent that the position of the non-aligned countries as expressed in their resolution was very close to that of the Soviet Union which favoured an unpoliced moratorium on testing underground pending negotiations on a comprehensive treaty banning all tests.

Both the Indian and Swedish Delegations made statements in Committee explaining that the request for an end to all testing by January 1 was not a proposal for an unpoliced moratorium but the expression of a wish that the nuclear powers would be able to achieve this end by that time. Nevertheless it was clear that the resolution as a whole favoured the Soviet position and would, if adopted, have caused very serious embarrassment and difficulty for the United States in the Sub-Committee on the Discontinuance of Nuclear Tests and in the Eighteen-Nation Disarmament Committee. Both the United States and the United Kingdom Delegations were obviously troubled by the draft resolution and the United States officials privately expressed considerable apprehension about the difficulty of trying to negotiate with the Soviet Union for a treaty with effective verification against the background of a General Assembly resolution which appeared to endorse the idea of an unpoliced moratorium.

Canadian Position

In the Canadian intervention in the First Committee on October 10, the Canadian Representative, General E.L.M. Burns, emphasized that Canada opposed all nuclear weapons tests and wished to see an end to all testing by January 1, 1963. He explained that as a first step in achieving this there should be a ban on nuclear testing in those environments where fallout occurs. Secondly, there should be negotiations for a treaty banning tests in all environments. The Canadian position was thus clearly for the achievement of an end to all testing by agreement among the nuclear powers. However, some delegations interpreted the Canadian position as being in favour of an unpoliced moratorium. This interpretation of the Canadian position was dispelled when Canada submitted the amendments described in the following paragraph.

An opportunity for avoiding the adoption of the non-aligned resolution in a form favourable to the Soviet position was presented by the exchange of letters of October 27/28 between Chairman Khrushchev, President Kennedy and Prime Minister Macmillan arising out of the Cuban crisis. The Canadian delegation proposed to the Western countries and to the non-aligned countries that neither the non-aligned nor the United States' resolution should be put to the vote, but instead that a resolution should be adopted welcoming the recent statements of the heads of governments concerned and urging the governments represented on the Sub-Committee on the Discontinuance of Nuclear Tests to settle the remaining differences between their countries on this subject and to issue instructions to their representatives on the Nuclear Tests Sub-Committee to achieve this end.<sup>30</sup> While reaction to this resolution was favourable among the eight non-aligned and Western countries, the Soviet Union refused to agree to support it as a substitute for the non-aligned resolution. In view of the Soviet Union's attitude, the non-aligned countries were themselves not willing to withdraw their resolution and to support the suggested Canadian resolution. Accordingly, on October 31, the Canadian delegation as a way out of the impasse, submitted a series of amendments (A/C.1/L.313) to the 37-Power draft resolution. These amendments were patterned after the draft resolution which Canada had suggested shortly prior to the tabling of the Canadian amendments but contained in addition a new and important operative paragraph (paragraph 6) which recommended that if against all hope the parties concerned did not reach agreement on the cessation of all testing by January 1, 1963, they would enter into an immediate agreement prohibiting nuclear weapons testing in the atmosphere, under water and in outer space. The amendments also proposed the resumption of the 18-Nation Conference not later than November 12.

The submission by Canada of these amendments had the immediate effect of re-opening the 37-Nations resolution. Mauritania and Madagascar then submitted a sub-amendment (A/C.1/L.315) (subsequently withdrawn) to our new proposed operative paragraph 6 which would have added it to a proposal for an unpoliced moratorium on underground tests. The Ghanaian delegation also submitted a sub-amendment (A/C.1/L.314) to the same Canadian amendment which provided that the ban in three environments should be "accompanied by a limited interim arrangement suspending all underground tests on the basis of the 8-Nation joint memorandum and taking into consideration the proposals presented to this effect at the seventeenth session of the General Assembly." This amendment was based on ideas suggested in debate by Cyprus and the United Arab Republic. The representative of Cyprus had proposed an agreement suspending underground tests for a limited period, setting up the International Scientific Commission on an interim basis, and the adoption of an arrangement whereby if a country refused to issue invitations to inspect its territory to determine if nuclear explosions had taken place, the parties concerned could abrogate the treaty.

The Canadian delegation obtained the agreement of the Ghanaian delegation to revise the wording of its amendment in a manner which made it more satisfactory. In its revised form, Canada accepted the amendment and it became part of the proposed new operative paragraph 6 (A/C.1/L.315 Rev. 1) which then provided that the ban in three environments should be "accompanied by an interim arrangement limited in time suspending all underground tests taking as a basis the Eight-Nation joint memorandum and taking into consideration other proposals presented at this seventeenth session of the General Assembly." In addition, the Canadian delegation, in its revised draft, inserted in paragraph 2 of the non-aligned resolution the words: "by January 1, 1963." This helped to make clear that the January 1 date was a target date for an agreement to end all testing and not the date for the beginning of an unpoliced moratorium. Shortly before voting took place, the United States and the United Kingdom submitted a sub-amendment (A/C.1/L.316) to the Canadian amendment which provided that: "Such limited interim agreement shall include adequate assurance for effective and on-site inspection of unidentified seismic events by an international commission." Mr. Lal of India (who, although not playing a particularly active role, was having a constructive behind-the-scenes influence) immediately approached the United Kingdom and the United States delegations in order to suggest a more widely acceptable wording for this amendment. Taking into account some of Mr. Lal's suggestions, the United States and United Kingdom immediately revised their sub-amendment so as to read as follows: "Such limited interim agreement shall include adequate assurances for effective detection and identification of seismic events by an international scientific commission," (A/C.1/L.316 Rev. 1). At the further suggestion of India, additional changes were subsequently made in paragraph 6 of the Canadian amendment and the United States and United Kingdom sub-amendment which involved deletion of the references to "limited in time." (These words had originally been included by Canada at the suggestion of the United Arab Republic which had thought that this wording would help make the paragraph more acceptable to the nuclear powers. However, it is believed that India insisted on the deletion in order to make the amendment more acceptable to the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics. In the event, the USSR voted against Canadian operative paragraph 6 as sub-amended.) The Canadian operative paragraph 6 as amended and sub-amended read as follows: "Recommends that if against all hope the parties concerned do not reach agreement on the cessation of all tests by 1 January 1963, they enter into an immediate agreement prohibiting nuclear weapons tests in the atmosphere, under water and in outer space, accompanied by an interim arrangement suspending all underground tests, taking as a basis the eight-nation joint memorandum and taking into consideration other proposals presented at the seventeenth session of the General Assembly.”

The voting on the main proposal is summarized in the second paragraph of this report.

As requested by resolution 1762 (XVII), the 18-Nation Disarmament Committee reported on December 7 on its efforts to negotiate a treaty to ban nuclear tests. This report was circulated as Document A/5338. Since the verbatim records of all the meetings of the nuclear tests sub-committee were attached, the document amounted to over 1,000 pages in length. The difficulty of translating and printing a document of this length delayed circulation of the report until the last week of the General Assembly.

The Burmese Ambassador who had attended the 18-Nation Disarmament Committee meetings explored the possibility of sponsoring a draft resolution calling upon the 18-Nation Disarmament Committee to continue to give priority to negotiations on the nuclear test problem. He eventually decided that even a non-controversial resolution would provoke a lengthy debate in Plenary. As an alternative, Ambassador Barrington suggested to the President of the General Assembly that he make a statement concerning the report. The President did so, noting the receipt of the report, expressing gratification that the 18-Nation Disarmament Committee had considered the problem of nuclear testing as a matter of urgency, and urging the 18-Nation Disarmament Committee to continue to give its principal attention to the problem and to report to the Disarmament Committee and to the General Assembly periodically as had been the practice in the past. No other statements were made and Plenary passed to the next item.

Recommendations for Future Action

One of the most important aspects of the resolutions on the cessation of nuclear tests adopted by the General Assembly at the seventeenth session was that, unlike resolutions adopted at the sixteenth session, they were consistent with each other in that both recognized the need for negotiations to reach an agreement to end all testing. The non-aligned resolution, in the form adopted by the Committee in plenary session, was significant because, unlike non-aligned resolutions adopted at the sixteenth session, it not only underlined the wish of the members of the United Nations to end tests but also suggested how this might be achieved. Thus, the resolution endorsed the Eight-Nation Memorandum; called on the parties concerned to negotiate on this basis in order to reach agreement urgently; recommended that if there is not comprehensive agreement by January 1, 1963, there should be an agreement on testing in three environments, to be accompanied by an interim arrangement suspending underground tests based on the Eight-Nation Memorandum and taking into consideration other proposals; and that this interim agreement should provide adequate assurances for effective detection and identification. There is thus a number of ideas contained in the non-aligned resolution to provide some guidance to the 18-Nation Committee and the Sub-Committee on the Discontinuance of Nuclear Weapons Tests. Furthermore, due to the initiative of the Canadian delegation, the resolution is probably as impartial as any resolution on the subject can be expected to be. The fact that it endorses neither the USSR nor the USA position is reflected by the fact that the Communists voted against one paragraph of the resolution (operative paragraph 6) while the United States, the United Kingdom and some Western countries voted against operative paragraph 2. Its impartiality was also shown by the fact that while the resolution as a whole was supported by the great majority of members, including most non-aligned countries, both the Communist countries and a number of Western countries (including the USA and the UK) abstained on it.

There are no particular recommendations for future action in respect of the resolutions adopted by the General Assembly on this subject. Canada's active role in the First Committee in connection with the adoption of these resolutions should place Canada in a favourable position to contribute towards further developments in this subject.

EIGHTEEN-NATION DISARMAMENT CONFERENCE – CESSATION OF NUCLEAR WEAPONS TESTS

Attached for your consideration is a paper giving a suggested basis for negotiations on the cessation of nuclear weapons tests. It has been discussed with General Burns who is in agreement with the suggestions and comments set forth in it. The paper has also been reviewed with officials of the Defence Research Board and Department of Mines and Technical Surveys, and they are in general agreement that the proposals are feasible from the technical point of view.

2. It will not be clear until the Conference resumes whether the United States or the Soviet Union will have new ideas to put forward on this subject. If, however, it appears that the negotiations are not moving forward, I would recommend that General Burns approach other interested delegations to determine whether a system such as that suggested in the attached paper would facilitate further progress.

3. If you agree, you may wish to approve the attached telegram to our Disarmament Delegation instructing them in the above sense and forwarding the text of the paper.<sup>31</sup>

SUGGESTED BASIS FOR NEGOTIATIONS ON THE DISCONTINUANCE
OF NUCLEAR WEAPONS TESTS

1. The nuclear powers would agree to discontinue all nuclear weapons tests in the atmosphere, outer space and underwater.

2. In addition, while negotiations were undertaken with the aim of developing a mutually acceptable system for verifying compliance with an international treaty which would include the prohibition of underground nuclear weapons tests, the nuclear powers would agree to an interim arrangement with respect to underground nuclear tests. The duration of the interim arrangement would be, initially, six months, to be extended by further periods of three months by agreement among the nuclear powers. The terms of the interim arrangement would be as set forth in paragraph 3 below.

(Note: Paragraphs 1 and 2 follow from paragraph 6 of General Assembly Resolution 1762 (XVI[I]), Part A. They may, however, be unacceptable to the Soviet Union which might contend that they provided in effect for a permanent ban on nuclear tests in the three environments but only for a temporary suspension of underground tests which could lapse and thereby leave the USSR at a disadvantage. As a result, it may be necessary, as a fall-back position, to allow for the possibility that the interim arrangement would be applied both to tests in the three environments and to underground tests.)

3. The nuclear powers would agree to suspend underground nuclear weapons tests with the following arrangements for verification of compliance with this measure:

(i) An Interim International Scientific Commission would be established, to be composed of qualified experts from each of the members of the Eighteen Nation Committee on disarmament;

(Note: This composition would be desirable in that it makes use of a body which is already functioning and that it would probably make it easier to establish the Commission without delay. It would also have the advantage of ensuring that the nuclear powers would have a say in matters affecting their security.)

On the other hand, the neutral memorandum of April 16, 1962 suggests that the members of the Scientific Commission should compromise a "limited number of highly qualified scientists, possibly from the non-aligned countries." They might argue that the Interim Commission should also be so composed rather than involving the nuclear powers and their allies as well. There are additional difficulties if the nuclear powers and their allies are included: first, it might be thought that the scientific representatives of the nuclear powers would not be objective but would be obliged to bring in findings consistent with the policy of their governments; second, the Commission might be thought, in general terms, to be more "political" than scientific if the nuclear powers and their allies were included; third, it might look as if the Eighteen Nation Committee were trying to usurp the rights of other states if it decided that its own membership should form the Interim Commission. If it is considered necessary to alter the composition of the Interim Commission to meet these objections, the following slate of neutrals (listing them in order of their technical competence in this field, as suggested by our own experts) might be put forward: Japan, Sweden, India, Chile, Mexico, Switzerland, UAR, Indonesia, Austria and Nigeria.)

(ii) States would report to the Interim Scientific Commission all seismic events which they judged to be “doubtful” in nature, i.e., all events not identifiable by them as earthquakes or other natural phenomena, non-nuclear explosions, etc.;

(iii) The Interim Scientific Commission would undertake an investigation to determine the nature of the “doubtful” event, making use of all agreed means at their disposal including a request, upon a decision by a majority of the members of the Commission, for an on-site inspection at the reported locale of the event in question;

(iv) Should the request for an on-site inspection be refused, the state in whose territory the “doubtful” event had occurred would be required to demonstrate to the satisfaction of two-thirds of the members of the Commission that it was not a nuclear test;

(v) In the event that the state in question failed to demonstrate to the satisfaction of the Commission that the event was not a nuclear explosion, other parties to the interim arrangement would be free, upon notice of __ (days/weeks) to withdraw from the arrangement.

(Note: It may be argued that this system has the disadvantage of giving the eight neutral members of the Commission a decisive role in judging whether a violation has been committed, which the nuclear powers might be reluctant to accept. If this difficulty were considered likely to block agreement, it could be provided simply that any state would have the right to withdraw if it was not satisfied that another party had established that a “doubtful” event was not a nuclear explosion, or, as a further alternative, that the arrangement would terminate automatically if two such events had occurred and no satisfactory explanation had been provided. However, there are also disadvantages in these approaches: first, if only one unexplained event were required, it might be thought that it was being made “too easy” for states to withdraw from the arrangement; second, if two or more unexplained events were required, it would be very difficult politically, after one “suspicious” event had already occurred, for a nuclear power to remain a party to the arrangement in the absence of any assurance that another party had not violated it.)

4.(a) The Interim Scientific Commission would examine and make recommendations with respect to the extent and composition of the permanent network of detection and identification stations needed for the collection of data on and reporting of all events which could be suspected of being nuclear weapons tests, and for making positive identification of the nature and origin of such events, wherever possible.

(b) The Commission would also make recommendations as to the eventual composition of the Permanent International Scientific Commission, its procedures, and the standards of instrumentation necessary for the operation and coordination of all elements of the system provided for in sub-paragraph 4(a) above.

(Note: There would appear to be no reason why the Interim Scientific Commission should not make the technical recommendations referred to above; some of the functions set out in paragraph 4(b) may be considered, however, to be essentially political and outside the proper competence of the Interim Commission.)

5. If, after the expiry of the initial period of six months, no agreement enabling the signature of a comprehensive treaty had been reached, and in addition there had been no agreement to extend the interim arrangement for a further period of three months, a special session of the United Nations General Assembly would be convened to review the progress of the negotiations and to make recommendations concerning future negotiations.

6. If agreement was reached on a mutually acceptable system for verifying compliance with an international treaty including the prohibition of underground nuclear tests, a comprehensive treaty banning nuclear tests in all environments would be opened for signature by all states.

At the moment I plan to intervene at an early stage in the resumed negotiations and am thinking tentatively of timing my opening remarks for the meeting on Wednesday morning November 28. It would seem appropriate that the main theme of our initial intervention should be the necessity for the ENDC over the coming weeks to make a renewed all-out effort to obtain agreement on a test-ban and to regard this as the first task for the resumed session. The details of my statement will of course depend on the substance of the positions adopted by the nuclear powers in their opening speeches and in private discussions, as well as on the attitude taken by the neutral members; I plan to wait until at least some of the latter have spoken before intervening.

NUCLEAR TEST BAN – SUGGESTED BASIS FOR NEGOTIATIONS

After careful consideration of paper in reference telegram in light of situation as it appears to be emerging at resumed negotiations in the ENDC, I agree that your proposals develop a basis for a settlement consistent with the ideas in resolution 1762 XVII Part (A) particularly those contained in operative paragraph 6 of that resolution. However, having heard the opening positions of the major powers as expounded in the Conference and in private discussion as well as the preliminary views of some of the other members, I have the following observations on the paper. These would involve some modification in the details of the initial proposal which we might be authorized to discuss with other delegations. I believe that this modified position would be a better starting point and would give more promise of facilitating eventual agreement.

2. The main difficulty I see is that some of the proposals in the paper are slanted to overcome probable Soviet objections and tend to ignore objections which the Western nuclear powers have to anything which could be construed as an “uncontrolled moratorium.”<sup>32</sup> It has become evident that USA unwillingness to sacrifice requirement for a limited number of on-site inspections<sup>33</sup> has been stiffened by the Cuban experience. In these circumstances, the suggestions in reference telegram for the steps the International Commission would be empowered to take to verify a suspicious event, would be open to vigorous objections from the Western nuclear powers.<sup>34</sup> Specifically the provisions that on-site inspection could take place only with the concurrence of the state on whose territory the event occurs would probably be regarded at the moment by USA as an unacceptable surrender to Soviet position.<sup>35</sup>

3. Regardless of whether the procedure suggested in paragraphs 3(iii), 3(iv), and 3(v) would in fact yield sufficient assurance of compliance with the agreement,<sup>36</sup> it is questionable whether a proposal aimed at breaking the present deadlock by means of an interim arrangement should specify a procedure which the Western nuclear powers could, with some justice, claim would set a precedent for the final accord.<sup>37</sup> For the interim arrangements to be truly interim, the major function of the interim International Commission during the transitional period should surely be an objective investigation of what is actually needed to verify compliance with a permanent agreement. Hence I believe it would be preferable as an initial proposal to suggest a very limited number of obligatory inspections perhaps accompanied by additional inspection by invitation during the interim period.<sup>38</sup> Throughout this period the Commission would continually review its procedures, examine ways of improving the detection network, etc., with the aim of formulating a recommendation whether under the final agreement obligatory inspections were or were not repeat not indispensable.<sup>39</sup>

4. Admittedly at the moment there is little evidence USSR would accept on-site inspection on these terms. However, in present circumstances I believe this idea should be pursued and might possibly be acceptable to the Russians if it could be agreed that the composition of the International Commission would give its neutral scientists the deciding voice concerning whether or not repeat not in the light of actual experience during the interim period the provision for obligatory on-site inspection should be retained.<sup>40</sup>

5. I should be grateful for your early reaction concerning the advisability of modifying on the above lines the suggested settlement which Canadian delegation would work for behind the scenes.<sup>41</sup> Tsarapkin's statement in the sub-committee this afternoon as well as neutral interventions in plenary may provide further indications as to the most promising approach. In the meantime the outline of the remarks I now plan to make at Friday's plenary follows in a separate message† and your early comments on it are requested.

POSSIBLE MEETING WITH KHRUSHCHEV

On basis of past experience we suspect that in any interview with Khrushchev the Premier will control course of dialogue. Should the opportunity present itself there are, however, a few matters which I hope you will have opportunity to raise.

2. The major question which we wish you to discuss with Khrushchev is disarmament and cessation of nuclear tests. Subject to your judgement as to trend of the conversation, you should base your remarks on the points set out below:

(a) As Khrushchev is aware, the Canadian Government, like his own, considers disarmament and a permanent cessation of nuclear tests to be among the most important questions facing the world at the present time. The urgency of achieving this goal has been made more apparent by the recent experience in Cuba because it brought to the surface the fact that one of the principal causes of continuing international tension is the reliance placed on military strength rather than stable international agreements. We believe that both Khrushchev and Kennedy have drawn the correct conclusion from the crisis situation in emphasizing the need for disarmament and settlements in other areas of East/West dispute.

(b) It is clear that there is now a greater need than ever for firm evidence that disarmament negotiations are not an empty series of verbal exchanges and that real progress is possible. This is fundamentally a psychological problem – if governments and ordinary citizens are to sustain their efforts toward the goal of disarmament, they must have some concrete indication that it can in fact be realized in the foreseeable future, and is not merely an aim piously proclaimed by governments for their own reasons.

This is a very strange line of thinking. [K.D. McIlwraith?]

Try to gain British support first. [K.D. McIlwraith?]

(c) The crux of the problem at this time is nuclear weapons tests. It has become increasingly clear that, if the nuclear powers cannot resolve their differences over this issue, no real progress can be expected in the immensely more complex task of working out a system of general disarmament.

(d) The United States and Britain have, over the past year, agreed that on-site inspection is not necessary for atmospheric, underwater and outer space tests. Moreover, they have indicated a willingness to reduce to a minimum any requirement for on-site inspection in the field of underground tests. Some reference has been made in the Soviet press to the possibility of using the system of unmanned seismic stations ("black boxes") which was discussed at the recent Pugwash Conferences as a substitute for on-site inspection, but the scientists who presented this idea (including three Soviet scientists) themselves recognized that it would "substantially reduce the number of necessary on-site inspections" not eliminate the need for them.

(e) We do not deny that there may be risks involved in signing a test ban treaty – for both the Soviet Union and the Western nuclear powers. We have made plain in our statements to the U.N. that no such agreement is likely to meet all the preoccupations of the parties to it. What we do insist upon, however, is that the risks to national security which may be involved in signing a nuclear tests treaty should be weighed against the immensely greater risks which the international community as a whole continues to run so long as no agreement is reached.

(f) In the light of all these factors, we would again urge the Soviet Government, and Premier Khrushchev personally, to take the few remaining steps which seem necessary to achieve an acceptable compromise on the cessation of nuclear weapons tests. Agreement on a test ban would be of immense significance for it is the first move in the direction of disarmament which is psychologically the most important. There is every reason for believing that agreement could be achieved now, and we cannot believe that the Soviet Union will allow this opportunity to slip by.

3. Without mentioning Roberts' recent interview you might seek clarification of Khrushchev's comments on acceptability of retaining Western forces in Berlin under aegis of U.N. You might also attempt to obtain further comments on German problem generally.<sup>42</sup>

4. At suitable opportunity you should express Canadian satisfaction at the lessening of tension in Cuba. Any comments you could elicit on Mikoyan-Castro talks would be useful as we have little hard information of the course of the conversations which have been subject of highly speculative but perhaps unreliable reports in Western press.

5. While expressing our desire to improve Canadian-Soviet relations you should impress on Khrushchev that in our opinion bilateral relations cannot be completely divorced from East-West relations generally. Therefore a substantial improvement in our relations can only be brought about by a general lessening in East-West tensions. Your comments along these lines might help to clarify the Soviet misinterpretation of our understanding of "relations" as revealed in your conversation with Lavrov (your telegram 815 November 12).<sup>43</sup>

6. If Khrushchev raises subject of trade negotiations recently held in Moscow you should note that consultations were useful and that subject of renewing agreement in new year now under consideration by Canadian Government.

7. There would be no objection to your discussing proposed trip to Soviet sub-Arctic. A promise of Khrushchev's cooperation would probably enhance your chances of visiting areas which have been inaccessible to Westerners for a number of years.

10. We would prefer discussion at your initiative be limited to foregoing topics.<sup>44</sup>

ENDC – NUCLEAR TESTS

I have considered the amendment to our paper giving a proposed basis for further negotiations on cessation of nuclear weapons tests (our telegram N-311 November 22) which is referred to in your reference telegram. However, for the following reasons I do not consider it desirable to make substantive amendments to the paper at this time:

(a) Your reference telegram suggests that the procedure we have recommended would be unacceptable to the USA. Given the firm stand on principles taken by each side (one insisting on obligatory on-site inspections, the other refusing to accept them) it is exceedingly difficult to devise a position which would not be open to some criticism. However, in drafting our proposal we have tried to take account of both sides' main preoccupations. Our basic objectives have been (i) to protect essential Western interests and at the same time (ii) to draft a scheme which would have some chance of acceptance by the Soviet Union.

(b) To meet the first of these requirements we incorporated a number of protective features: (i) the arrangement is temporary, and would not last beyond six months if the USA felt its security was threatened; (ii) other possibilities for settling the nature of a "doubtful" event, short of on-site inspection, are allowed for; (iii) while a state could refuse an on-site inspection, strong pressure is put on it not to do so, since if it did, it would in effect be branded as "guilty" and required to prove the contrary to the satisfaction of 2/3 of the Commission, failing which other parties could opt out of the agreement.

Not sent. The Ambassador saw Khrushchev before this could receive final approval. Approved in draft.

For Smith's conversation with Khrushchev, see documents 54, 197-200, 439, 742.

(c) On the other hand, "A very limited number of obligatory inspections" is precisely what the USA insists on, and what the USSR refuses to accept, and inclusion of this requirement in our proposal would mean that it was no longer a realistic compromise basis for negotiation.

(d) It is also suggested that our procedure would be construed by the Western nuclear powers as setting "a precedent for the final accord." The same objection could be made by the USSR if the proposed basis called for obligatory on-site inspection, but the point to be emphasized is that the arrangements we are suggesting are temporary and without prejudice to the nature of the permanent system. Our approach is also designed to find a system which would provide reasonable assurance of compliance with the arrangement.

2. I do not consider that it would be desirable merely to substitute the Western position for the arrangement we have suggested. If we cannot achieve agreement on the present basis, there are two suggestions which may be of some assistance:

(a) To alter slightly the procedure for initiating an on-site inspection by removing the words "a request ... for ..." in paragraph 3(iii) and "the request for" in paragraph 3(iv). This is essentially only a drafting change, but might make the text more acceptable.

(b) As a less satisfactory but possible fall-back position we might consider removing altogether the references to on-site inspection which occur in paragraphs 3(iii) and 3(iv). This would weaken our proposal and make it more open to conflicting interpretations, and should not be introduced unless the negotiations are deadlocked.

3. Before making any substantive amendments it seems to us desirable to make a forceful presentation of our views as they stand to the Western Four. I therefore wish you to give the text of our paper (omitting the explanatory notes, but incorporating the amendment referred to in paragraph 2(a) above) to your Western colleagues and request an early meeting to discuss it. Further instructions will be sent you when we have an indication of their reactions. In the meantime you should not discuss these ideas with any other delegation.

NUCLEAR TESTS

During our talk yesterday Khrushchev referred to nuclear test ban talks, and said that if West was ready to sign an agreement, he was ready. He had indicated willingness to accept "some element of international control" on Soviet territory. This concession had been made not repeat not because Khrushchev considered on-site controls necessary, but in order to make it easier for American Government to agree, and particularly to make it easier for President Kennedy to get a treaty through Congress. He said that this concession was to allow a few automatic stations "two or three of them" to be installed on Soviet territory with foreign scientists being permitted to install and inspect them, using Soviet planes and with “certain other measures of precaution.” Khrushchev hoped this concession would allow agreement to be reached at last.

2. On disarmament itself Khrushchev said he had nothing new to say beyond Soviet position put forward by Gromyko. Earlier in conversation, when talking on Germany, he had said that disarmament would not repeat not be possible prior to agreement on Germany and explained why (my telegrams 863 November 28 and 868 November 29).

NUCLEAR TESTS: CANADIAN POSITION

It has become clear that USSR is strongly opposed and that USA and UK have serious objections to an interim arrangement as suggested in the ENDC by Sweden, India, Mexico and Canada.

2. The motives of the nuclear powers are difficult to assess, but it seems possible that their delegations in Geneva might be under some general instruction to maintain existing positions while a full assessment of the consequences of the Cuban crisis and of the Sino-Indian dispute on East-West relations is taking place in Moscow, Washington and London. While the two sides have made some references to the more favourable circumstances under which the ENDC was resuming its work, neither of them has so far made any concrete move on the nuclear test issue. Some delegations seem to be placing hopes in the forthcoming Macmillan-Kennedy talks in the Bahamas and in the reports now emerging from Washington that USA might be willing to resume its bilateral contacts with USSR on Berlin and disarmament even before definitive solution of the Cuban situation, leading perhaps to a Summit meeting early in the New Year. There is growing doubt that the two sides really intend to isolate the nuclear test problem for a separate and early agreement.

3. USSR seems to be very concerned lest the concept of an interim arrangement should gain further ground in the ENDC because its main proponents, Sweden, India and Mexico, have all advocated some measure of on-site inspection as a necessary element of it. Thus Soviet delegation denounced the genesis and intention of paragraph 6 of General Assembly Resolution 1762 and has instead stressed the importance of paragraph 2 which asks for the cessation of all tests by January 1, 1963, in Tsarapkin's words, whether or not repeat not an agreement has been reached by that time. USA and UK speculate that USSR might, by the end of the year, make a unilateral declaration expressing their intention to cease all tests on January

1 in accordance with paragraph 2 of the General Assembly Resolution,<sup>45</sup> hoping thus to force the West, under pressure of world opinion, into another uncontrolled moratorium applying to all tests. However, the current emphasis being placed by Soviet delegation on paragraph 2 of the General Assembly Resolution may be no repeat no more than a tactical device designed to gain time until a general unfreezing of the present situation takes place.<sup>46</sup>

4. USA and UK, while less opposed in principle to the idea of an interim arrangement, see serious faults in the specific suggestions which have been advanced so far by Sweden, Mexico and India. These, as we have reported separately, relate essentially to the nature, composition and functions of the International Scientific Commission, to its function in regard to establishing additional observation posts, and most importantly to the imprecision of the neutral proposals concerning the obligatory character of on-site inspection. USA and UK now seem most unlikely to accept an arrangement, to be applied on an interim and experimental basis, which would offer less guarantee than contained in their comprehensive draft treaty.<sup>47</sup>

5. What the non-aligned members of the ENDC will do in the circumstances is difficult to predict. We suggest that the most effective role that Canada could play at the present time would be to assist the non-aligned members of the Conference behind the scenes to develop their ideas further and press them vigorously in the Conference, taking into account as far as possible the objections expressed by the nuclear powers.<sup>48</sup> To this end, it would be useful to us to receive your early guidance on the modifications that might be made to Canadian proposals in the light of the comments offered by our Western partners at yesterday's Four-Power Meeting.<sup>49</sup>

6. We propose in the meantime to approach some of the neutrals in confidence, and in particular Sweden, India, Mexico, the UAR and Burma and to urge them to give further thought to their varied suggestions in an attempt to formulate a jointly agreed interim arrangement as provided for in paragraph 6 of General Assembly Resolution 1762. In order to reach such an accommodation of their views, the neutrals would presumably need to consider the following elements:

(a) In determining the character and composition of the International Scientific Commission greater account should be taken of the administration functions that it would be called upon to perform, and of its function of selecting within a quota<sup>50</sup> which events need explanation or inspection – essentially a political decision. Probably both USSR and USA will insist on a Commission made up of governmental representatives,<sup>51</sup> whether within the framework of an interim or a permanent agreement. Some thought might also be given to the idea of a two tier commission<sup>52</sup> to deal separately with the scientific and political aspects of its work.

(b) The functions of control to be exercised by the Commission during the duration of the interim arrangement and powers of recommendation that might be assigned to it in relation to the conclusion of a permanent agreement should be more clearly distinguished and defined than has been done until now by the main advocates of an interim solution.

(c) In regard to control, the nature of the network to be established for reporting events should be more precisely specified.<sup>53</sup> The obligations regarding on-site inspection and methods of putting it in operation in relation to the other procedures for identifying doubtful events, should be given greater precision. The consequences of the failure of a party to accept on-site inspection should also be more clearly stated than has been done until now by Sweden and India.<sup>54</sup> Mexico, on the other hand, has treated such a refusal as a definite breach which would render the treaty null and void. It would be desirable to emphasize that the interim arrangement would not repeat not prejudice the essential interests of the nuclear powers in a permanent treaty.<sup>55</sup>

(d) The interim Commission should have the right to make recommendations on the establishment of additional observation posts, on improvements in detection and identification facilities, and on the need or otherwise for on-site inspections on a permanent basis, in the light of its own experience in administering the interim arrangement.<sup>56</sup>

7. We propose to try to direct the thoughts of the neutrals along the above lines without, however, making specific suggestions until we have received your further views on Canadian proposals. It is our judgment that direct Canadian intervention at this stage would be unhelpful;<sup>57</sup> that the neutrals are in the best position to establish the delicate balance of interests that may lead to an interim agreement; and that it would therefore be our best course to assist them behind the scenes in achieving that objective. In the light of the neutral reactions it can be decided what further action can be taken by Canada at a later stage.<sup>58</sup>

ENDC – CESSATION OF NUCLEAR WEAPONS TESTS

The following paragraphs review some questions relating to the above subject which we would like to have an opportunity to discuss with you preparatory to the drafting of further instructions for the Disarmament Delegation.

2. The United States view (apparently shared by the British), as it emerges from reports of Western Four discussions and conversations in capitals, seems to be that the time is not right now for a move on a test ban; that the Cuban problem remains to be settled and assessments of its implications need to be completed; and that the USSR is unsure of its position on nuclear tests and is still thinking things over. As the Disarmament Delegation has reported, the delegations of the nuclear powers at Geneva “might be under some general instructions to maintain existing positions while a full assessment of the consequences of the Cuban crisis and of the Sino-Indian dispute on East-West relations is taking place in Moscow, Washington and London.” All this apparently indicates to our major allies, as our Embassy in Washington has put it in reporting an American official, that “in the circumstances it would be in the Western interest to exercise a degree of patience.”

3. What are the implications of this position for the test ban negotiations? There is to be a report to the General Assembly by December 10, i.e., in five days' time, and it will be virtually impossible to achieve any real progress by that date. Probably all we can expect is a report on the number of meetings held; perhaps a reference to some of the suggestions made by the neutrals (though this is doubtful because the Russians apparently disagree with them); and a statement that negotiations are continuing. As for the January 1 deadline for stopping tests there is also little ground for optimism – unless there is a significant change from the present position – that very much can be accomplished. There is already talk in the corridors (so the British here have told us) about a Christmas recess which may last throughout the holiday period, i.e., from about Friday, December 21 to Monday, January 7. This will leave only about two working weeks after the end of the present week in which to achieve some progress.

4. Where do we stand as a result? It is unlikely that we will be able to budge the USA from its stand on obligatory on-site inspections in the little time remaining, and, if we cannot, there is perhaps little point in putting forward any Canadian proposal publicly. On the other hand, it is difficult simply to sit tight, in view of the General Assembly resolution which called for action by January 1 either on a complete test ban or, “if against all hope” that were not possible, on a partial ban and an accompanying suspension of underground tests. Moreover, it is not yet clear what will be the neutrals' attitude. Will they be content to let the great powers carry the ball – or rather not carry it? Or will they become more concerned as time goes by and demand decisive action?

5. General Burns suggests in his telegram No. 1898 of December 4 (copy attached) that we should not intervene publicly, but that our role should be to encourage the neutrals behind the scenes to develop their ideas and to press them vigorously at the Conference. This is probably sound so far as it goes, and it is certainly desirable that they should carry forward their April 16 memorandum and try to devise an interim arrangement consistent with paragraph 6 of resolution 1762, part A. But the question remains to what extent the Canadian Delegation should encourage them to work along certain lines, and how we could accomplish this if we cannot put forward any of our own ideas outside the Western Four. In any event, the series of general points which telegram 1898 suggests might be raised with them appears to be satisfactory as a start, except for the suggestion in sub-paragraph 6(a) that we should be encouraging them to think in terms of “a quota” of events to be inspected or explained. As you know our own proposal would not be compatible as it stands with the quota idea. The suggestion in this paragraph that there might be a “two tier Commission” also seems to raise difficulties and complications, and should probably be played down.

6. Supposing we do follow the approach recommended by General Burns so far as the neutrals are concerned, it remains to be decided what we would do with our own paper. That is to say, we would have to decide whether to stick with it more or less as it now stands, or to introduce amendments to meet what would appear to be American views. The latter course of action is not easy, because we have had no clear suggestions as to precisely how we would need to amend it; and some of the questions raised by the American Delegation appear more likely to prolong the discussion than to assist in drafting a useful paper. (This last difficulty is reinforced by a comment made to our Embassy in Washington to the effect that “a special working group” might be set up in Geneva to examine our paper.) If in fact, as our Disarmament Delegation reports, the “USA and UK now seem most unlikely to accept an arrangement, to be applied on an interim and experimental basis, which would offer less guaranty than contained in their comprehensive draft treaty,” then further discussion of our paper at this time is not likely to produce a viable compromise.

7. Our own conclusion would be that, so far as the Western Four [are] concerned, we should attempt to clarify our paper as much as possible, but we should not agree to any fundamental modification such as the inclusion of obligatory on-site inspections on a quota basis. If, however, our allies show a real interest in developing a proposal in terms similar to those we have suggested, we might agree to modifications along the lines of some of the suggestions contained in the notes to the original version sent to DISARMDEL. As for the neutrals, we might agree that General Burns pursue the general line he has suggested (with the exceptions mentioned above) subject to further instructions in the light of consideration of our paper in the Western Four and other developments in the Conference.

NUCLEAR TESTS CESSATION – CANADIAN PAPER ON A SUGGESTED BASIS FOR NEGOTIATIONS

Following is a further elaboration of certain points in our paper on above subject in response to questions raised at the Western Four meeting. (Paragraph references are to our paper.)

2. Paragraph 3(ii). In clarifying intent of this paragraph you might reiterate point made in your reference telegram to the effect that it was intended to allow the nuclear powers (particularly the Western nuclear powers) to bring before the Commission any event which they had not identified to their satisfaction as a natural phenomenon, non-nuclear explosion, etc. In effect, this paragraph is designed to protect Western interests by giving them an opportunity to challenge the Soviet Union, in the case of any event they consider doubtful, to demonstrate that it was not a nuclear explosion. Dean's rejoinder to you that data would have to be coordinated from "several different stations which might be situated on different national territories in order to arrive at a conclusion regarding the nature of a given event" is not entirely relevant for two reasons:

(a) in the case of the USA, for example, national experts would already have evidence from more than one station to aid them in making their decision before requesting the Commission to undertake a further investigation; and

(b) in order to place it before the Commission, it would not be necessary to reach a firm conclusion concerning the nature of the event – it would be sufficient that the state concerned should be doubtful about its nature.

3. With respect to general point raised in connection with this paragraph, we have tried to avoid prejudging the question whether or not it would be possible "to decide on scientific grounds alone" which unidentified events would require inspection. Events to be referred to the Commission would be decided by national states themselves; and events which would require an on-site inspection would be, under the terms of the arrangement, those which the Commission decided by majority vote demanded such further investigation. In practice, this system might well provide greater protection against "cheating" than a small quota of on-site inspections agreed in advance, since it would permit the Western nuclear powers to put the onus of the Soviet Union to prove that no violation had occurred in the case of any event about which they were doubtful.

4. Paragraph 3(iii). The word "agreed" was inserted in this paragraph only because it was assumed that all procedures and methods under the arrangement would have to be "agreed" among the parties if they were to be put into operation. However, if it appears to weaken the proposal insofar as the requirement for adequate inspection is concerned, it could be deleted.

5. Paragraphs 3(iii), (iv) and (v). Procedure suggested in our paper was not intended to correspond in all details to the wording of the neutral memorandum for two reasons:

(a) the neutral memorandum was presumably discussing the nature of a permanent scientific Commission as part of a comprehensive treaty, whereas our proposal relates to an interim Commission (e.g., a permanent Commission might involve a much more elaborate organization which would monitor all seismic events, whereas we have proposed reports to the Commission only in the case of doubtful events);

(b) the neutral memorandum was intentionally vague in a number of respects and we have tried to draft a more precise proposal.

There is, however, no essential inconsistency between our paper and the neutral memorandum and the procedure set out in paragraph 5 of the latter document could, for example, be employed by the Commission under our proposal before a decision was made that an on-site inspection would be necessary. In any event, it was assumed in drafting our paper that the Commission would not decide that an on-site inspection was necessary unless it was unable to satisfy itself by other means as to the nature of a doubtful event which had been placed before it. If an on-site inspection were refused after the Commission had so decided, we would expect that in practice it would not be possible to satisfy the Commission by producing evidence from other sources but we have nevertheless felt it desirable to allow for this possibility (e.g., to take account of the unlikely circumstance that a state could show by other means that a doubtful event had in fact been a large chemical explosion). This point is also relevant to the comment at the bottom of page 2 of your reference telegram with respect to paragraph 3(v) of our paper.

6. Paragraph 3(iv). The notion that a state in which an unidentified event had occurred would have to satisfy two-thirds of the Commission that it was not a nuclear explosion is of course the heart of our proposal insofar as it places the onus on the "accused" party to prove that it is "not guilty" and thereby makes it very difficult to refuse an on-site inspection. We recognize that this formula underlines the importance of the membership of the Commission, but we would hope that a composition such as that suggested in the paper would protect essential Western interests.

7. With regard to paragraphs 4(a) and 4(b) of the paper (paragraphs 2 of your reference telegram) we are open to suggestions as to additional functions which might be appropriate for the interim Commission. It would be worth bearing in mind, however, the point raised in our note on these paragraphs, that care should be exercised not to suggest functions which might appear to be outside the competence of such a body.

8. The intent of paragraph 5 of the paper was to provide for a review by the UNGA before allowing the negotiations to lapse. (It would of course not repeat not apply if these had been any violation of the arrangement.) In reply to Dean's question, it was not our intention that the nuclear powers would commit themselves in advance to be bound by any decision reached by the UNGA in these circumstances.

9. Please pass above comments to your Western colleagues, making any drafting changes you may consider necessary to make them suitable for transmission to them.

NUCLEAR TESTS: CANADIAN POSITION

You will already have received our telegram N-318 December 5 giving a further elaboration of our suggested basis for negotiations on cessation of nuclear tests. Following paragraphs deal with question of tactics in the Western Four and in your discussions with the eight non-aligned delegations.

2. I agree with assessment in your reference telegram that the most useful role Canadian delegation could play at this time would be to encourage non-aligned members to give greater precision to their ideas (especially on the nature of an interim arrangement) and to press them vigorously in the Conference. We would particularly like to see a concerted effort on their part directed toward the establishment of appropriate international arrangements, including an interim scientific Commission, which could begin functioning even if the nuclear powers cannot reach full agreement now on suspension of underground testing.

3. I also agree in general with list of points you have suggested might be put to the neutrals. There are, however, two points in paragraph 6(a) of your reference telegram which I believe you should not raise in your discussions with them;

(i) A "quota" of events which would require inspection. This concept is not in line with our own proposal which suggests that all "doubtful" events would be investigated by the interim Commission and that a decision would be taken by vote as to which ones required on-site inspection, and for the time being at least I do not think you should raise it with the non-aligned delegations.

(ii) The idea of a "two tier Commission," part dealing with scientific and part with political questions, may raise unnecessary complications in working out the organization of an interim Commission; accordingly, I believe it should be played down unless the neutrals themselves are already thinking in these terms and there is some indication that it might be considered useful by the nuclear powers.

4. With regard to discussions in the Western Four, I think the best approach is to continue where necessary the elaboration of our proposal, and to clarify any points on which questions are raised by our allies. The latter should be assured that we do not intend to present our ideas publicly at this time unless there is agreement among the Four. At the same time we do not believe it would be wise to agree to fundamental modifications in the paper, such as the inclusion of on-site inspection on a "quota" basis, since this would be likely to remove any chance of making use of the proposal as a basis for negotiations at a later stage. However, provided that your Western colleagues share our view that it is desirable to develop a compromise approach, we would be prepared to consider modifications along the lines of those set out in the notes transmitted with the original version of the paper (our telegram N-311 November 22).

NUCLEAR TEST BAN

A. Neutral Proposals

Following Sweden's lead, all the representatives of the 8 non-aligned countries have now submitted suggestions in the ENDC for breaking the deadlock in the test ban negotiations. In summary form, their statements have been annexed to the report the conference was required to submit to the General Assembly on December 10.

2. Although the suggestions of the 8 vary in precision and also occasionally on matters of detail, all aim at translating the terms of Resolution 1762A into a concrete basis for a test ban agreement; most of the proposals are particularly inspired by paragraph 6 of that resolution (i.e., a ban on all tests for the three fallout environments, plus an interim arrangement to halt underground tests including adequate assurances of compliance with such an arrangement).

3. The basic elements in the Swedish proposal are:

(a) an immediate final agreement prohibiting tests in the three environments where no control problem exists;

(b) an interim arrangement to stop underground tests while a final agreement is being negotiated;

(c) the establishment of an interim international scientific commission to administer the arrangement in (b) above. The interim ISC according to the Swedish proposal would have the following functions:

(i) to "provide the conference (i.e., the ENDC which would give the interim ISC its mandate) with pertinent technical and scientific information and undertake certain investigations." This would presumably involve further objective scientific study with a view to formulating recommendations as to whether distant instrumentation is sufficient to detect and identify underground nuclear tests;

(ii) to "assist in the elaboration of the detection and data exchange system" and

(iii) to perform the functions the 8-power memorandum envisages for a permanent commission. (These functions are set forth in paragraphs four and five of the neutral memorandum of April 16 which provide that the scientific commission should process data received from the agreed system of observation posts, report on suspicious events, and receive all the facts necessary to establish the nature of such events which parties would be under an obligation to furnish. In the event the commission could not reach a conclusion on the nature of a significant event, the party concerned, in accordance with its obligation to provide the necessary clarification, "could invite" the commission to conduct an on-site inspection.)

4. The proposals of the UAR, Mexico and Brazil all endorse the Swedish suggestion outlined above. The Indian, Burmese, Ethiopian and Nigerian proposals, although less explicit on matters of detail also follow this general line. Mexico has expressed the view that "refusal to invite the scientific commission shall, ipso facto release the other party from obligations under the interim arrangement." The UAR has also stated that failure to invite the commission and to furnish it with a convincing explanation of such a failure would "free the states concerned from the heavy moral obligations undertaken by all parties." India has suggested that the two sides could agree on a small quota up to which invitations would be issued for the first year of the interim arrangement and that any state guilty of breaches of its obligations would "by such breaches free the other parties" from the agreement. If the view of the Mexican representative were accepted, the proposed interim arrangement would to all intents and purposes make on-site inspection, if requested by the commission, obligatory.

B. Comparison of Neutral Proposals with Canadian Suggestion

5. The Canadian paper is consistent with the Swedish proposal and those of the other non-aligned countries in its main outlines; it provides for a final cessation of tests in the three fallout environments and for the establishment of an interim ISC responsible for supervising an interim arrangement for the cessation of underground tests while a final comprehensive treaty was being negotiated. The three main differences between the Canadian paper and the non-aligned proposals are

- (1) our paper is not consistent with the 8-nation memorandum since it does not envisage as do all the neutral suggestions the processing by the interim ISC of all data received from a coordinated network of detection stations but only for the examination of doubtful events reported to the commission by parties to the agreement;
- (2) our paper makes specific suggestions regarding the composition of the interim ISC and also for voting procedures. In formulating their suggestions the neutrals have left these matters vague and there is obviously some advantage in not being too specific on such points at an early stage;
- (3) unlike the Indian suggestion, our paper does not include the idea of a quota system which would limit on-site inspections to a number which might possibly be acceptable to the Russians.

C. Comments

6. The neutral proposals which we have warmly supported have placed the Soviet Union in a very awkward position since they represent a clear challenge to state whether an interim arrangement is acceptable. So far the Russians have adopted a negative attitude but this has clearly irritated the non-aligned group since their proposals are entirely consistent with their memorandum of April 16 which the Soviet Union has repeatedly said it accepted as a basis for negotiation. It seems clear that the main reason for the negative Soviet position to these suggestions is that they tend to highlight the obligation of parties to give the interim ISC adequate assurances concerning the nature of a doubtful event, including the right to conduct on-site inspection if necessary. The neutrals have stressed this obligation in stronger terms than in their memorandum of April 16. However, under the neutral proposals the Soviet Union would not be saddled indefinitely with arrangements it regards as unsatisfactory and during the interim period the Soviet Union would have the opportunity to demonstrate to the ISC the validity of its claim that it can distinguish all underground nuclear explosions from earthquakes by national detection systems alone.

7. As for the Western nuclear powers, they have taken a more flexible position with respect to the possibility of an interim arrangement while at the same time they have insisted that such an arrangement should provide the same measure of guarantee against violation as would a permanent ban. The USA seems to be coming to the view that the necessity for obligatory on-site inspection has been incorporated in essence in at least some of the formulations advanced by the neutrals. Its main concern about the proposals thus far put forward centre chiefly on the character of the interim ISC (the USA believes that its members should be responsible directly to governments and not be composed of independent scientists) and also relates to how an on-site inspection would be "triggered off." On the latter point the USA has insisted that if only a very small number of on-site inspections are to be involved, the nuclear powers must have the opportunity to select which events would in fact be inspected. It maintains that if only objective scientific criteria are to be used in determining the need for on-site inspection, a very substantial number of inspections would be needed to which there is no chance the Soviet Union would ever agree.

8. The Western nuclear powers have concluded that the best tactical approach at the present moment is to keep the heat on the Russians to modify their opposition to the principle of on-site inspection. They believe that the neutral proposals have been useful in exerting additional pressure on the Russians in this respect. Until some sign from the Russians is forthcoming that they are willing to compromise on this crucial issue, the USA has decided that it would be unwise to alter significantly the proposals contained in its present draft treaties, although it will continue to express a readiness to enter into an interim arrangement which includes satisfactory safeguards.

DISARMAMENT: THIRD SESSION ENDC

Since the recently concluded session of the ENDC was brief and we have reported at length on the issues dealt with, it does not repeat not seem necessary to send you a detailed review. However, we have a few general comments, especially on the situation which we are likely to face when the Conference resumes on January 15.

2. It is clear that in the wake of the Cuban crisis and of the Sino-Indian conflict, neither USA nor USSR were prepared to negotiate effectively on disarmament when they returned to Geneva November 26. More time was needed before the implications of the changed international situation could be more fully assessed in Washington and Moscow. Delegations of both of the great powers were obviously under instructions to maintain their previous positions until the end of the year. The statements which Tsarapkin made at the opening and at the closing of the third session were almost identical in placing the emphasis on general and complete disarmament as the primary objective of the conference, and in playing down the urgency and flexibility of an agreement on the cessation of nuclear tests and adopting collateral measures. USA held to its well-known positions and made no new moves except to submit its paper on the reduction of the risks of war by accident, stimulated perhaps by the Cuban crisis. USA delegation eventually said they were willing to consider an interim arrangement on the cessation of underground tests, as advocated by the non-aligned members, but it did so with marked reserve and only after it had become clear that USSR was not repeat not prepared at this time to agree to anything other than a final comprehensive treaty on its own terms. This negative attitude of the two great powers left the non-aligned members feeling frustrated and helpless, and they were saying so more openly on the eve of the recess.

3. Nevertheless, there were encouraging circumstances. USA and USSR delegations throughout the session kept in close and continuous touch with each other. The tone and the atmosphere at the meetings were correct and on the whole exempt from recriminations. The co-chairmen agreed to resume the Conference on January 15 although they may have preferred a later date. Even if the Gromyko proposal for the retention by USA and USSR of a minimum deterrent until the end of the second stage of disarmament was not repeat not clarified, it was expounded energetically by Soviet delegation and when the Conference resumes will still be on the table for further examination. Furthermore, USSR, in recognizing that international scientific observers could play a role in the installation and operation of the so-called "black boxes" seem to have eased their rigidity on verification in this context, and it may be a significant step towards the conclusion of a test ban agreement. By clarifying their joint memorandum of April 16 in relation to the possibility of an interim arrangement, in a sense which recognizes the need for some form of on-site inspection, the eight non-aligned members may also have set the conditions for progress when the international situation becomes more propitious.

4. One may hope that when the Conference resumes in mid-January USA and USSR in their reassessments of the international situation will have decided to follow a policy of détente and that their delegations will return to Geneva with a renewed determination to negotiate effectively on disarmament. Perhaps, the situation will remain substantially as it is now. On the other hand, the reassessments might result in decisions by either USSR or USA, or by both, to increase their military preparedness with a consequent negative effect on serious disarmament negotiations. It seems probable however that the implications for the disarmament conference of the eventual decisions of the great powers would become apparent only gradually, possibly not repeat not until March. If no repeat no firm decisions have been taken by USA and USSR at the time of resumption the attitudes of UK, Canada and the eight non-aligned members may exercise an important influence on the formulation of those decisions and on the future of the conference.

5. With these considerations in mind, we intend during the recess to review positions on various aspects of our work.

(a) No repeat no doubt you have had under review the memorandum to Cabinet of February 13/61, which constitutes our basic instructions, to see if it still fully meets the present requirements of the conference.<sup>59</sup> We shall also be thinking of this, and may offer comments later.

(b) In view of the General Assembly Resolution 1762, which calls for a cessation of all nuclear tests by January 1/63, we anticipate that when the Conference resumes the non-aligned members will register protests and continue to insist that this subject should be given first priority. We shall try to think of the best way to encourage and assist the non-aligned members in reaching our common objective.

(c) In their concluding statements before the recess, several of the non-aligned members and in particular Sweden, Brazil, Nigeria, emphasized the importance of collateral measures and of the need to revivify the committee of the whole. Four main areas have been mentioned: the reduction of the risks of war by accident; non-dissemination; outer space; and nuclear free zones. At present each subject presents some difficulties. USSR is apparently not repeat not prepared to separate the question of the reduction of the risks of war by accident from the other measures contained in the first stage of its disarmament plan. It will not repeat not in any case agree to discuss this "Western" subject in the committee of the whole unless an "Eastern" subject, such as nuclear free zones, were to be taken up at the same time. As for non-dissemination, USA and USSR seem to be agreed to reserve it for bilateral negotiations. USSR maintains the position that it will not repeat not consider the question of outer space apart from that of foreign bases, to which they claim it is organically linked. Finally, USA is very reluctant to discuss nuclear free zones, fearing introduction into the conference of the Rapacki plan<sup>60</sup> or other disengagement schemes. Nevertheless it seems to us that collateral measures still offer the best prospects of early progress. We intend to examine our established position on these subjects, and try to think of ways to get negotiation on them moving again.

(d) As regards general and complete disarmament the Conference is likely to continue its consideration of the various items listed on its agenda (ENDC/52 of July 24). We therefore propose during the recess to continue our study of these various items and in particular of items 5(d) nuclear disarmament; 5(e) military bases; and 5(f) armed forces, keeping in mind their relation to items 5(b) nuclear weapons delivery vehicles, and 5(c) conventional armaments. We should appreciate in this regard receiving the views of DRB on UK paper entitled "The Technical Possibilities of International Control of Fissile Material Production" (ENDC/60) which we transmitted to you at the time of its submission last August.

6. We would appreciate your comments and advice on the views outlined above and the immediate objectives and tasks that we have set ourselves. Pending your further instructions, we shall be commencing work as indicated.

DISARMAMENT: THIRD SESSION OF ENDC

Thank you for your useful commentary on the present state of negotiations in the ENDC and your assessment of the probable situation when the Conference resumes on January 15. I agree with your appraisal and share your view that, despite the evident lack of progress during the third round, there are a number of circumstances which suggest that a further narrowing of differences may be possible in resumed discussions. Much of course depends on the attitude of the major powers, but you should continue to press for early agreement on the cessation of nuclear weapons tests and other collateral measures not only for their intrinsic value but as a means of developing a climate conducive to progress on a general disarmament treaty. I would welcome any suggestions you may have for expediting agreements on nuclear testing and on other collateral measures which the co-chairman have already accepted for consideration in the committee of the whole.

2. The Cabinet memorandum of February 13, 1961, has been reviewed in the department in light of developments in the negotiations since it was approved. However, I consider that it still reflects the government's overall policy on disarmament and the relative importance we attach to specific measures of disarmament including verification and peace-keeping provisions. Although in 1961 we believed that measures for restricting the spread of nuclear weapons, for reducing the risk of war by accident, and for prohibiting mass destruction weapons in outer space "should be included in the first stage of disarmament," this view has been modified only to the extent that we now regard such collateral measures as suitable subjects of separate agreements for implementation before final agreement is reached on the first stage of a disarmament programme. This is more an extension of than a substantive change in the policy approved by Cabinet, and would not therefore call for any formal amendment.

3. The Cabinet memorandum of February 1961 was prepared and approved before the nuclear test talks had been merged with the disarmament talks. The government's position on testing is however sufficiently well established that new Cabinet authority is not considered necessary.

4. I agree that you should continue to give special study to the items listed in your paragraph 5 relating to a general disarmament treaty and you might also bear in mind that the subject of peacekeeping is currently receiving intensive study in the department.

5. We have asked DRB for comments on the UK paper concerning control of fissile material production.

DISARMAMENT: RESUMPTION OF ENDC

Following for General Burns from SSEA:

It will be of the greatest importance to make a concerted effort from the outset of the resumed session on Tuesday to bring about rapid progress in the ENDC. This is a decisive stage in the life of the Conference when the negotiations could well stand or fall on what can be accomplished in the next few weeks. Moreover, it is of the utmost importance in Canada that the ENDC demonstrate its ability to reach concrete agreements, particularly on a test ban, if continued support for the negotiations is to be maintained.

2. I therefore wish you to take the initiative, both in private and in meetings of the Committee, to bring maximum pressure to bear on the nuclear powers to reach agreement on cessation of tests. You should also use every opportunity to encourage non-aligned delegations to present a forceful and united position which will leave no doubt as to the reaction of world public opinion if the nuclear powers should fail to reach agreement without delay. It is our considered opinion that the technical basis for a treaty already exists, and that what is required now amounts simply to a final, essentially political, decision to reach complete agreement. I believe that our role in these circumstances is to focus and guide the efforts of those who share our views in a way which will accomplish this result as soon as possible.

DISARMAMENT: CESSATION OF NUCLEAR WEAPONS TESTS

PERSONAL for General Burns from SSEA:

Your statement on above subject at Friday's meeting (your telegram 50 February 22+) was very valuable in further underlining the great importance of early agreement on a test ban. I wish you and other members of the delegation to take every opportunity to maintain and increase the pressure you have brought to bear up to now, both in your private conversations with Western, neutral and Communist delegations, and by continuing to emphasize position set out in paragraph 2 below in your statements to the Committee.

2. You should in particular impress upon your colleagues two key points which we believe must be recognized if negotiations on this subject are to produce rapid agreement:

(i) that differences between the two sides have already been reduced to such an extent that there is no technical barrier which could not be removed by a willingness to compromise on details;

(ii) that unless a final effort is made to achieve complete agreement on this problem, there can be no hope of progress on general disarmament and the Conference as a whole will be likely to degenerate into a profitless debate ending in the realization that the ENDC has not been capable of fulfilling the tasks given it by the United Nations.

If we are to get these points across I believe that you must play a leading part in pressing all delegations to realize frankly that tactical and political considerations which have affected their attitudes to date cannot be allowed at this juncture to stand in the way of an agreement which is within the grasp of the Conference and which is vital to its continued existence as a forum for realistic negotiations on the whole range of disarmament questions. The remaining differences of view between the two sides – particularly the “numbers game” on which so much time has already been spent – will never be resolved unless and until all concerned face up to the extremely grave consequences of failure. At this crucial stage in the Conference, it is our role to bring home to all the participants that without early agreement on a test ban the survival of the Eighteen-Nation Conference would be placed in jeopardy.

3. In your private conversation with Foster and Godber you should also draw on additional considerations set out in the following paragraph addressed to Mr. Drew.

4. FOR LONDON (PERSONAL FOR MR. DREW). I would like you to speak to the Foreign Secretary along the above lines as soon as possible, making use of General Burns’ latest statement to the Committee (DisarmDel telegram 50 February 22) for further background. You should impress upon Lord Home the fundamental point that absence of a test ban will mean renewed testing and all that this would imply for the further proliferation of nuclear weapons (as mentioned by President Kennedy in his press conference February 21 and reported in Washington telegram 598 February 22†),<sup>61</sup> as well as sacrificing the possibility of a world wide verification system major elements of which are already agreed. Moreover, it is my conviction that unless a breakthrough can be achieved at this time on a test ban, the possibility of progress on disarmament would be put off indefinitely and the West might suffer a serious set-back as a result of what could be interpreted by public opinion as insistence on a degree of inspection not warranted by technical requirements. You should make plain to him that in my view these are the main considerations which now have to be weighed in the balance in determining the Western attitude to the question of on-site inspection.

DISARMAMENT: CESSATION OF NUCLEAR WEAPONS TESTS

Today I have seen Foster and Godber and have put to them your views on necessity for early conclusion of a nuclear test ban. Godber thought that the situation was not repeat not unfavourable but that we must give Russians a little time to reconsider their position i.e. to move from their present insistence that two to three on-site inspections and three automatic seismic stations is as far as they will go. He said the Soviet decision-making apparatus does not repeat not usually work very rapidly. Foster stressed the difficult political situation in USA. His conversations last week with various senators and congressmen in key positions were not repeat not all encouraging. The climate could hardly be worse for additional "concessions" by USA in view of confused and disturbed feelings about the Cuban situation and difficulties over defence matters with European NATO allies. Nevertheless the President is still determined to press for a nuclear test ban and hopes that a treaty could be got through the Senate provided essential requirements for verification can be made. Foster hoped that given a little time the process of educating opinion in this matter in the Congress and Senate will be effective. If Kuznetsov does not repeat not return soon, Foster may decide he could work more effectively at this in Washington and will leave Stelle to lead the delegation here.

2. I suggested to both Godber and Foster that the West should make a clear statement in plenary of their requirements as to composition of inspecting teams, procedure for deciding on events to be inspected, area to be inspected, and other essential features of an agreement aside from actual number of on-site inspections and automatic seismic stations. This would enable Conference and especially neutrals to judge reasonableness of these requirements. Foster said he intended to do this, probably Friday.

3. I also said that it would be important to give as clear evidence as possible refuting Soviet claim that all repeat all underground nuclear tests had been and could be identified. Foster agreed this would be useful and USA delegation will see whether such a statement can be prepared.

4. I also saw today Lall, Hassan, Imru (Ethiopia), and Obi (Nigeria), and talked over possibilities for moving negotiations forward. Non-aligned had had a meeting this morning but had not repeat not decided on any concerted action. On the whole they were encouraged by the "numbers" now having reached the position of three to seven and hoped that with a little time, and continued pressure, agreement would be reached. They agreed that statements from the West on the lines I suggested to Foster would be helpful.

DISARMAMENT: CESSATION OF NUCLEAR WEAPONS TESTS

Following for General Burns:

Secretary of State for External Affairs was concerned to note from your conversations with Godber and Foster (your reference telegram) that UK and USA delegations are satisfied for the time being simply to await further developments in the Soviet position on the above subject. The Minister was also disturbed at any suggestion that Foster might leave Geneva at this critical time.

2. Secretary of State for External Affairs wishes you to reiterate to Godber and Foster the overriding need at this time for a concrete demonstration of their determination to resolve outstanding differences on key problems of inspection, particularly numbers of on-site inspections. They should be left in no doubt that in our view the time factor is of extreme importance, and that any further delay would greatly endanger the future work of the ENDC and give rise to other consequences outlined in paragraph 4 of our telegram N-26 of February 25.

3. Secretary of State for External Affairs assumes you will also be in touch with other non-aligned delegations in addition to those mentioned in paragraph 4 of your reference telegram.

DISARMAMENT: CESSATION OF NUCLEAR WEAPONS TESTS

As instructed in your reference telegrams I put to Mr. Foster the views and considerations set forth in them. He said USA authorities appreciated that agreement on a nuclear test ban was important both intrinsically and as a symbol of progress towards disarmament. This was the reason for the continued USA flexibility. The Administration had gone beyond the point where they could be assured of the Senate's support for a treaty based on their position. Foster thought the Senate could hardly accept further concessions on the USA side. It is essential that there should be sufficient safeguards in any treaty to convince the Senate that it would be serving the interests of the USA. Senators feel the USSR has not repeat not conceded very much. Khrushchev's speech on 27th reaffirmed rigidity of their position.

2. Foster appreciated your concern that he should remain at the ENDC, but he felt that in the absence of any Russian move he could do more useful work in Washington trying to convince those who are opposed to present USA position and even more opposed to any further bargaining moves. He is prepared to return on short notice. He indicated at today's meeting that his departure is temporary and necessitated by urgent duties in Washington.

3. I later saw Mr. Godber and went over the same arguments with him. He appreciated the Canadian viewpoint but felt that the West had shown its flexibility and that it was prepared to compromise if only the USSR would make some move and show willingness to negotiate. He did not repeat not see, however, how the West could move beyond its present position. USA could not repeat not possibly accept USSR offer of two or three on-site inspections. There would be no repeat no justification for this. If USSR would explain how they identify underground tests which they claim to be able to do, this might create a new situation but up to now they have firmly refused to do so.

4. In Wednesday's meeting Godber quoted Dean's denial in General Assembly on October 26/62,<sup>62</sup> of USSR claim that all underground tests have been identified. Godber said he had urged USA to amplify Dean's statement, with more documented evidence, if possible. He agreed that it was unfortunate that Foster was leaving the Conference, but felt there was not repeat not much that could be done to change the decision. He said that he had had a conversation with Kuznetsov before he left urging flexibility in Russian position but had not repeat not received any encouragement.

5. I also saw Roshchin and Usachev, numbers two and three on USSR delegation now, and explained the Canadian position as set forth in the reference telegrams. I regret that they merely repeated certain of the arguments which they have brought forth in plenary meetings, i.e. they said that what was required now was a "political act" i.e. that USA should agree to their offer of two to three on-site inspections and three automatic seismic stations. They reiterated their claim that Dean and others had given them to understand that such an offer as they had made would bring agreement. They felt they had been deceived when USA negotiators asked for eight or ten on-site inspections. Any more inspections than two or three could only be inspired by intention to spy. They referred to Khrushchev's election speech of February 27<sup>63</sup> and pointed out that what he said there was exactly in accord with their positions as stated in the ENDC (which it was).

6. We hope that some results will come out of the three meetings on nuclear test ban scheduled for next week and will keep up pressure on other members of Conference as directed.

NUCLEAR TEST BAN – FAILURE OF NEUTRAL COMPROMISE

I saw Melo-Franco on April 16 and he gave me some details of how the neutral effort to find a compromise between Soviet and Western positions on the nuclear test ban broke down. All non-aligned delegations here were agreed on their memorandum and it was decided as a matter of form to get government authorization to place it before the Conference. However, somehow there was a leak of the provisions to the Great Powers. (Our previous telegrams will have told you that the provision about numbers especially had leaked out.) Both USA and USSR began to apply pressure at neutral capitals not repeat not to include any reference to the numbers in the memorandum; USSR pressing for no repeat no number higher than two or three and USA for no repeat no number lower than 7. Melo-Franco said that the Brazil Foreign Minister received such representations but ignored them as he did the representations of “another friendly nation” (Italy?). However, when the eight met to report on their governments’ instructions, Sweden and India declared they could not repeat not support the memorandum if it contained a reference to specific numbers. Sweden went further, and when some of the other neutral representatives proposed to put forward the memorandum without the participation of Sweden or India, Sweden said that in such a case they would be obliged to introduce an amendment deleting the numbers. After lengthy argument, it was apparently concluded that no repeat no memorandum could be tabled.

2. The Brazilian Government had supported the memorandum relying heavily on the Swedish technical expertise in seismology, the Swedes having been the most active in promoting the memorandum in the first place. When Sweden, under pressure, changed its position, Brazilian Government felt unable to continue its support.

3. Melo-Franco is returning to Brazil. He said that his government felt that some gesture of protest was necessary; that it was inconsistent with their dignity to continue as before when the Great Powers appeared to ignore neutral opinion and even to block its expression. He also told me that Padilla Nervo, who had returned to Mexico, was in the same position. Mrs. Myrdal has returned to Sweden and it is understood, does not repeat not propose to return to the negotiations here unless there is some real prospect of agreement. It would seem she does not repeat not agree with the Swedish Government’s decision in this matter and she is talking of making a speech in the Senate about it. I said I hoped that Melo-Franco would return to the Conference and put to him the importance of the role of the neutrals here and that while the present political situations, both between the two major powers and their own internal conflicts, might preclude any effective agreement for the near future, the situation could change and the preparatory work being done here at the Conference could then be fruitful.

MONITORING ATMOSPHERIC RADIATION

Memorandum by United Nations Division*

RADIATION

Since its establishment in 1955, Canada has been an active member of the United Nations Scientific Committee on the Effects of Atomic Radiation (UNSCEAR) which submitted to the seventeenth session of the United Nations General Assembly its second comprehensive scientific report on the effects of atomic radiation on human health.<sup>64</sup> Moreover, Canadian Delegations to the General Assembly's sessions have often played a leading role in focusing world attention on the harmful effects of radiation in securing the adoption of proposals designed to encourage international co-operation and stimulate scientific research into the effects of atomic radiation at the international level; in facilitating the exchange of information and in pressing for the creation of a system for monitoring and reporting data on radioactive levels in the atmosphere on a world-wide basis.

At the fourteenth session Canada was largely responsible for the adoption of a resolution which, among other things, invited technologically advanced countries to offer to countries not as adequately equipped to analyse the radioactive contents of food, soil and bone samples collected in the latter's territories.<sup>65</sup> Some fifteen other countries and Specialized Agencies were later to follow Canada's lead in making such offers of scientific and technical assistance. Four countries, Burma, Ghana, Malaya and Pakistan initially expressed the desire to take advantage of Canadian laboratory facilities in having samples collected in their respective territories analyzed in this country. Ghana has since acquired its own monitoring facilities, but samples from Pakistan and Burma have been collected and despatched to Canada. Samples from Pakistan are being regularly analyzed in the laboratories of the Department of National Health and Welfare.

The sixteenth session of the General Assembly in the fall of 1961, coincided with the resumption of nuclear testing in the atmosphere by the Soviet Union. The Canadian Delegation then sponsored and promoted the adoption of a resolution designed to reflect the world anxiety provoked by this Soviet action. The resolution was unanimously approved. It enunciated the principle that "both concern for the future of mankind and the fundamental principles of international law impose a responsibility on states concerning actions which might have harmful biological consequences for the existing and future generations of peoples of other states by increasing the levels of radioactive fallout.” It also requested the World Meteorological Organization to consider the feasibility of expanding its present meteorological reporting system to provide for monitoring and reporting, at regular and frequent intervals, data gathered on atmospheric radio-activity.<sup>66</sup>

Since then the World Meteorological Organization has made considerable efforts through a world-wide network of stations, in consultation with UNSCEAR and the International Atomic Energy Agency, in preparing a draft reporting scheme to implement the General Assembly’s proposal. This scheme reached the final stage of completion and was submitted in draft form to the seventeenth session of the General Assembly in a progress report prepared by the Secretary-General of the World Meteorological Organization. UNSCEAR, which was to hold its twelfth session in Geneva in January, 1963 was then expected to give its final comments on the proposed scheme which would have facilitated final approval by the World Meteorological Organization and the early implementation of the scheme in the form which had been given to it in the Report of the Secretary-General of WMO.

At the seventeenth session of the General Assembly the Canadian Delegation as a follow-up to the initiative of the previous year promoted a resolution which attracted 42 other co-sponsors and was unanimously adopted by the General Assembly by a vote of 85 in favour, none against, with 11 abstentions. The resolution had a twofold purpose, first it acknowledged and called attention to the main conclusion of the second comprehensive report prepared by the Scientific Committee on the Effects of Atomic Radiation; secondly the resolution acknowledged the progress report from the WMO on the action taken in pursuance of the General Assembly’s proposal for the world-wide monitoring and reporting of data on atmospheric radioactive levels. The resolution in effect went on to recommend that WMO complete the preparation of its reporting scheme with a view to implementing it at the earliest possible date. It was Canada’s hope that WMO would soon be in a position to initiate the implementation by member states of the reporting scheme as formulated in the report submitted to the seventeenth session of the Assembly.<sup>67</sup>

Since the conclusion of the seventeenth session of the Assembly, UNSCEAR has held its twelfth session in Geneva during the course of which a statement containing comments on the draft scheme was prepared for transmission on to WMO. That statement was formulated by UNSCEAR on the basis of its own terms of reference only which relate exclusively to scientific research on the qualitative effects of radiation. Since the purpose of the General Assembly proposal and the WMO draft scheme are not related directly to UNSCEAR’s terms of reference but pertain to improve the present state of public information on the incidence and pattern of distribution of atmospheric radioactivity, UNSCEAR's statement fell short of giving approval to and even affirmed that the implementation of the scheme would not prove useful to UNSCEAR.

CONFIDENTIAL

In view of this a number of countries represented at the World Congress of WMO which was held in Geneva from April 1 to 28, were reluctant to support Canada's efforts in having the Congress give its approval to a final revision of the scheme which would faithfully reflect the intent and purpose of the General Assembly's proposal. A number of these countries including Australia, Britain, the United States and the Soviet Union had never been fully convinced of the usefulness of the General Assembly's proposal, although they had not voted against it. As a result the Congress of WMO adopted a resolution which recommended the implementation of a scheme following further consultations with UNSCEAR, with such modifications however that will essentially alter the nature of the initial proposal of the General Assembly. The resolution of the Congress specifies that contrary to the initial proposal the telegraphic network of WMO should not be used to transmit the data collected but that the latter be exchanged by airmail between countries interested and only upon request. This would remove from the original proposal its main provision which called for automatic, periodical, prompt and world-wide telegraphic exchange of the information monitored by participating states.

As an active member of UNSCEAR, Canada has made a useful contribution to the Committee's second comprehensive report which had been in preparation since 1960. In the view of the Canadian Government, the second comprehensive report of the United Nations Scientific Committee on the Effects of Atomic Radiation constitutes the most complete and up-to-date review and assessment of the exposure of mankind to all sources of radiation and of the harmful effects on human health which may result from various degrees of exposure. The report fully reflects the present stage of scientific understanding of this question as well as the need to pursue efforts to broaden and deepen our present knowledge of radiation's harmful effects. The resolution adopted by the General Assembly at its seventeenth session calls particular attention to the following conclusion of the Committee's report:

"... the exposure of mankind to radiation from increasing numbers of artificial sources including the world-wide contamination of the environment with short- and long-lived radio-nuclides from weapons tests, calls for the closest attention, particularly because the effects of any increase in radiation exposure may not be fully manifested for several decades in the case of somatic disease, and for many generations in the case of genetic damage."

WORLD FOOD PROGRAMME

The first meeting of the Intergovernmental Committee will convene in Rome for about a week beginning February 12 "to develop detailed procedures and arrangements" for the World Food Programme, as instructed by the FAO Resolution of November 24 which was endorsed by UNGA Resolution 1714 (XVI). As you know, Canada is one of the twenty member countries of that Committee.

2. The Canadian Delegation to the Rome meeting will be led by Mr. A. Turner, Director of the Economics Branch, Department of Agriculture, who will be accompanied by Mr. K. MacLellan, First Secretary of our Embassy in Rome, Mr. D.B. Dewar of the Privy Council Office, Mr. P.M. Reid of the Department of Finance, and Mr. J. MacNaught, Second Secretary (Commercial) at our Embassy in Washington. These officials have been closely concerned with past negotiations leading to the adoption of the Resolutions on the World Food Programme and are thoroughly familiar with Canadian interests and objectives.

3. For the guidance of the Delegation, and for possible sponsorship at Rome, officials of the interested departments prepared a draft Charter for the World Food Programme, a copy of which is attached.† This was approved at a Meeting of the Interdepartmental Committee on External Trade Policy under the Chairmanship of the Secretary of the Cabinet on February 1, and it was agreed that these general instructions to the Delegation were generally consistent with the Cabinet's decision on a World Food Bank last August 9<sup>68</sup> and that further guidance from Cabinet was not required at this time; the departments concerned are, however, reporting to their respective Ministers on this subject.

4. It is intended that immediately following the Rome meeting Cabinet will be asked to consider the Intergovernmental Committee's draft Charter for the Programme so that appropriate instructions may be issued to the Canadian Delegation to the FAO Council meeting, which is to be held in New York next April concurrently with the 33rd ECOSOC for the purpose of approving that draft. Cabinet will also have to consider at some stage the question of Canada's position at the pledging conference to be convened sometime this summer since we have offered "up to" $5 million towards a $100 million programme, but it does not now appear likely that this target figure will soon be reached.

5. Between now and the Rome meeting our Embassy in Washington will be holding discussions with the Americans to enlist their support, if possible, for the attached Canadian plan. We have also given copies to the Australian and New Zealand High Commissions, and are referring copies to Rome and to Permis New York.

6. You will note that the substantive questions of how the resources of the Programme should be allocated, and when it should start, have not been spelled out precisely in the attached draft. This recognizes the fact that the exercise in Rome will involve a good deal of compromising and reconciling of conflicting interests. The Canadian Delegation will have as its primary objective the adoption, if possible with unanimous approval, of a realistic and workable draft Charter which would be acceptable to the Canadian Government and at the same time command widespread support of potential donor countries. As you know this World Food Programme, if and when it comes into being, can be attributed, in considerable measure to Prime Minister Diefenbaker's initiative at the Fifteenth General Assembly and for that reason it has come to be very closely identified with Canada in the eyes of other countries. Canada, therefore, has an important stake in the success of this idea, and we are encouraged by the progress that has been made in the past year to hope that the World Food Programme will become a reality by perhaps the beginning of next year.

6. There is a point concerning estimates to which I should draw your attention. When the Cabinet considered this matter last August 9 it was contemplated that the World Food Programme would be a continuing operation, once it started. Such was the resistance (largely from Argentina and New Zealand at the Sixteenth General Assembly) to the idea of taking its success for granted, that the Programme is now envisaged purely and simply as an initial three-year experiment. Country pledges will, therefore, be limited to obligations stretching over three years, and there will be no provision at all for replenishing the resources of the fund as they are exhausted. Accordingly, although Cabinet approved replenishment contributions up to an additional $5 million over and above the initial Canadian $5 million pledge, should these have been needed, it will not now be necessary to consider this for at least another two years. The sum of $5 million will appear in the first supplementary estimates of this Department for 1962-63, as a non-lapsing vote.

WORLD FOOD PROGRAMME

I wish to report the successful outcome of the first meeting of the Intergovernmental Committee of the World Food Programme (WFP) which was held in Rome from February 12 to 20. This Committee, of which Canada is a member, comprises twenty countries, half of which were elected by the FAO Council and the other half by the Economic and Social Council last November and December. The purpose of this first meeting was "to develop detailed procedures and arrangements" for the WFP, the establishment of which had been authorized by two mutually complementary resolutions passed by the FAO Conference and the General Assembly on November 24 and December 19. The recommendations of the Intergovernmental Committee will next be considered and approved by the FAO Council (of which Canada is a member) and the Economic and Social Council which will be meeting concurrently in New York for this purpose next month. There will follow a pledging conference, perhaps as early as May or June, after which the programme will get under way, assuming that sufficient support is forthcoming from the potential donor countries.

2. While the WFP Charter drafted in Rome last week did not in all respects conform to the original Canadian proposals for a World Food Bank, the preliminary reports we have received indicate that a substantial measure of success was achieved by our Delegation in attaining its major objectives. However, one outstanding issue of importance, which we hope will be resolved in New York next month by the FAO Council and ECOSOC, is the question of how much should be pledged to the WFP by donor countries before operations commence. The Director-General of the FAO had pressed vigorously for agreement to start when $50 million is pledged. The majority of the twenty member Intergovernmental Committee favoured acceptance of this but the Canadian Delegation, fearing that unless a higher target were set the multilateral aspect of the programme would be impaired, urged the postponement of a decision on this until next month in the hope that a figure perhaps nearer $60 million can be agreed upon. So far only three countries have made firm offers, the United States last April offered $40 million in surplus commodities, Denmark last November offered $2 million in cash and commodities, and at the FAO Conference in November the Minister of Fisheries offered up to $5 million on behalf of Canada towards a $100 million programme. It will be seen that a $50 million target figure could perhaps be reached with only four or five contributing countries, and it will be for consideration whether a programme in such circumstances would satisfy the Canadian requirement that it be multilateral.

3. If you should wish to make some reference to these recent developments in your forthcoming speech in Edmonton, I would suggest that your remarks might cover the following positive points:

(1) At the Fifteenth General Assembly (on September 26, 1960) you proposed to the United Nations the creation of a Food Bank as a first step in a joint and worldwide attack on the problem of hunger and malnutrition.

(2) The United Nations speedily passed a resolution at the Fifteenth Session supporting this proposal and calling for urgent studies to be carried out.

(3) At a series of meetings held under United Nations and FAO auspices last Spring and Summer considerable advances were made in developing specific ideas and proposals for a World Food Bank. By the Fall major attention was being given to a suggested $100 million programme to be devoted partly to emergency relief and partly to economic development projects using surplus food stuffs.

(4) The Eleventh Session of the FAO Conference in Rome passed a resolution (November 24) authorizing the establishment of a World Food Programme, subject to the concurrence of the United Nations. The Canadian Delegation led first by the Minister of Agriculture and second by the Minister of Fisheries played a leading role in securing the adoption of this resolution.

(5) Shortly afterwards the United Nations General Assembly passed a resolution of its own (December 19) concurring in the FAO recommendations, thus clearing the way for the final steps to be taken. The Canadian Delegation (Mr. Gordon Aiken, Spokesman) again played an active part in getting a resolution passed.

(6) An Intergovernmental Committee of twenty countries which was elected half by the FAO Council and half by the ECOSOC met in Rome (February 12 to 20) to implement the mandate in the FAO and United Nations resolutions to draft a Charter or blueprint for the World Food Programme. Canada was represented at that meeting and our Delegation, as before, played a prominent part in its work.

(7) The recommendations on preparatory measures and studies to be undertaken, and the proposed general regulations for the establishment and operation of the WFP will shortly be submitted for consideration and approval to concurrent meetings of the ECOSOC and the FAO Council to be held in New York next month.

(8) There will then follow a pledging conference of interested countries to be convened sometime this Summer, following which the WFP should commence operations.

[Ottawa], March 30, 1962

WORLD FOOD PROGRAMME

The Prime Minister's proposal made to the UN General Assembly in September, 1960, for the creation of a World Food Bank, to provide surplus food to countries in need, has been further advanced by Canada in meetings of the United Nations and the Food and Agriculture Organization since that time. On August 9, 1961 (Cabinet Document 286-61)<sup>69</sup> Cabinet agreed that Canada should continue to support the creation of a UN food bank with a fund for the first three years of $100 million in cash, commodities and services underwritten on a broad multilateral basis. It was envisaged that the Bank should be devoted primarily to meeting emergency food needs, with a limited use of resources in selected pilot projects involving the [use of] food as an aid in social and economic development. It was also a Canadian objective that the activities of the UN food bank should not damage the commercial interests of countries exporting food.

2. At the session of the FAO Conference in November, 1961, the Canadian Delegation led first by the Minister of Agriculture and then by the Minister of Fisheries took the lead in sponsoring and securing unanimous acceptance of a Resolution approving the establishment of a joint UN/FAO three-year experimental World Food Programme (WFP) with an objective of $100 million in contributions. Immediately afterwards the Canadian Delegation to the UN General Assembly co-sponsored a complementary Resolution which was supported by all member countries except the Soviet Bloc, which abstained. Attached as Annex "A" is a copy of the UNGA Resolution 1714 (XVI)† which incorporates the FAO Resolution setting out the purposes and principles governing the WFP. These Resolutions also established an Intergovernmental Committee (IGC) of twenty countries, to which Canada was elected, to provide governmental control and guidance on policy, administration, and operations of the WFP.

3. The first session of the IGC was held in Rome from February 12 to 20, 1962, for the purpose of drafting the conditions and procedures for the establishment and operation of the WFP. The report of this meeting will be considered and approved by concurrent sessions of the FAO and the Economic and Social Councils in New York (April 16-19). There will follow, probably this summer, a pledging conference to be convened jointly by the Secretary-General of the UN and the Director-General of FAO, after which, on the authority of the IGC, operations will commence for the initial three-year experimental period.

4. The detailed proposals of the IGC for the functioning of the WFP are contained in pages 6 to 13 of the report to ECOSOC and the FAO Council, which is attached as Annex "B".† It is provided that the WFP will give assistance for emergency food relief, preschool and school feeding and pilot projects using food as an aid to social and economic development. Countries will pledge commodities (f.a.s. port of exit), services (such as shipping) and cash to the programme, and projects will be initiated only at the request of countries in need. After investigation, the WFP will call up the commodities needed for an emergency or a pilot project. The WFP may use cash to purchase commodities as well as services, including shipping, when the types required are not available as contributions. Assistance to recipient governments will be in the form of grants, but when the food is used in economic and social development projects the conditions of its use (for feeding of workers and children, or for sale for local currency to be used on a designated project) will be governed by a project agreement between the WFP and the recipient government. Safeguards are provided for the commercial interests of food exporting countries and the developing economies of recipient countries.

5. It is also provided that the WFP will be administered by a joint UN-FAO unit in Rome headed by an Executive Director who will submit to the IGC for approval annual budgets and programmes of work, including projects. Initially at least, IGC approval will be required for economic development projects but not for provision of assistance in emergencies.

6. The proposals of the IGC, while not meeting all the original Canadian objectives, represent the best compromise arrangement that the Canadian Delegation was able to secure at the first session of the IGC. In the light of the decision of Cabinet on August 9, 1961, however, attention is drawn particularly to the following features of the IGC report:

(a) Paragraph 25 on page 13 of the report envisages the beginning of commitment of funds, commodities and services as soon as $50 million has been pledged, provided that "country participation and the distribution of the pledged amounts as between commodities and cash are such in the opinion of the IGC in consultation with the Secretary-General and the Director-General as to justify such commitments." Since the United States has already offered a contribution of $40 million in commodities and may offer an additional cash contribution of $10 million, and since Canada has announced (at the FAO Conference in November, 1961) a contribution of up to $5 million in cash and commodities, it is quite probable that under this formula operations might commence before the Canadian objective of broad multilateral support for the programme has been fully achieved. Denmark and Sweden have each announced offers of $2 million. Confidential reports indicate that the Netherlands may contribute $1.5 million, Norway $.5 million and Germany $3 million; France, Australia, and New Zealand are also understood to be contemplating contributions and a number of developing countries may make some contributions.

The Cabinet decision of August 9, 1961, envisaged that substantial support from a number of the important developed countries besides the United States would be desirable before operations started to assure the WFP of broad multilateral underwriting. Britain will be a late starter if she contributes, the size of the probable French contribution is unknown, the intended German contribution is small, the Japanese may not make an offer, and Italy's intentions are uncertain. The Canadian Delegation to the IGC urged that commitments from the WFP should commence only when a significantly higher threshold of pledges than $50 million had been reached, but found itself alone in taking this position. All other countries on the IGC favoured a prompt start and took the view that adequate multilaterally-contributed resources were in prospect to justify a start being made this year. The Canadian Delegation entered a reservation on this point (paragraph 18 on page 4 of the Annex "B").

(b) Nearly all members of the IGC, except Canada and Australia, emphasized the role of the WFP in providing assistance for economic and social development projects and their desire to place a limit on the resources to be set aside for meeting emergency needs. It can only be determined by experience whether this limit of 25% agreed to for the first year will meet the Canadian objective to have adequate resources provided for emergency relief. Canada did, however, obtain provision that the Intergovernmental Committee will review this figure at the end of the first year of operation.

7. Although it is doubtful that the views of most other members of the IGC on these points of difference with the original Canadian position will change significantly, the provisions that a further decision by the IGC is required before commitments from the WFP commence, and that the IGC will review after the first year the amount of resources to be set aside for emergency relief, suggests that there will be some opportunity for Canadian representatives to try to attain the original Canadian objectives in future IGC meetings. In the light of this consideration, and because of the leadership Canada has assumed concerning the World Food Programme, it is recommended that the Canadian Delegation to the forthcoming special session of the FAO Council be:

(a) Instructed to take the lead in securing the adoption of the "Draft General Regulations or Recommendations on Arrangements and Procedures for its Operation" contained in pages 6 to 13 of the report of the Intergovernmental Committee to the FAO Council and ECOSOC;

(b) Instructed to lift the reservation concerning commencement of operations made by the Canadian Delegation to the IGC meeting, while at the same time emphasizing the importance that Canada attaches to the World Food Programme being supported by as many countries able to make contributions as possible.<sup>70</sup>

WORLD FOOD PROGRAM (WFP)

The attached Memorandum to Cabinet on the subject of the World Food Program has been prepared interdepartmentally and will, we understand, be submitted to Cabinet in the near future. As the Memorandum points out, the proposal for a U.N. Food Bank (now referred to as a World Food Program) has been through several processes of international consideration and negotiation since Cabinet last considered the subject in August last year. The outcome, which goes before a joint session of ECOSOC and the FAO Council next week for approval, falls in some respects short of the original objectives envisaged by Canada. However, it is agreed among the Departments concerned that the principles underlying this program and the conditions and procedures now envisaged for its establishment and operation are generally acceptable as a basis for launching an experimental three-year program. The proposals being presented to ECOSOC and the FAO Council reflect with a considerable degree of success the efforts of Canadian representatives during international negotiations to retain as far as possible the original Canadian objectives. We would hope that Cabinet could endorse the general recommendation of the Memorandum.

Originally, Canadian objectives envisaged that a new international program would as a first priority assume responsibility for all miscellaneous requests for emergency relief arising through international channels. There has developed, however, strong international support for concentrating efforts on developing effective ways of using food for economic development purposes. The program continues to provide for meeting emergency situations but, if use of food for economic development purposes proves successful, it is possible that additional requests for food in meeting specific emergencies will not be entirely eliminated. It was perhaps also envisaged that a new international program would use some of its cash resources to buy food from countries such as Canada. It is considered more likely, however, that the cash resources of the WFP will be used to meet administrative expenses, to provide for shipping, and to purchase commodities from underdeveloped countries. The need to ensure that the operations of an international food program do not damage or distort normal commercial markets has been very much in the minds of Canadian and other representatives of food exporting countries in the negotiations and are reflected in the proposed arrangements and procedures. It is, however, difficult to devise in advance detailed safeguards and regulations in respect of an experimental program; these will be worked out and supplied as the activities and operations of the program are developed. Canadian officials have not yet considered what would be the most appropriate commodity composition of Canada's contribution to the program. Prior to the pledging conference later this year FAO will draw up a tentative list of eligible commodities. Interdepartmental consideration should be given to this matter prior to the pledging conference.

At the Rome meeting of the Intergovernmental Committee, the Canadian delegation reserved its position on the question of when the program should go into operation in order to emphasize the importance that Canada attaches to the program being broadly multilateral in character through the support of as many contributing countries as possible. Although so far few countries have indicated firm intentions to contribute, it is to be hoped that the situation will be much improved by the time a pledging conference is convened. In order to permit plans to move forward, it is felt that Canada should not retain a formal reservation on the point, but should continue to emphasize the importance we attach to achieving a program which is truly multilateral in character and to take whatever effective steps are possible to encourage broad support for the program.

On August 9, 1961, Cabinet decided that Canada should be prepared to contribute $5 million in commodities, services and cash, of which one-third might be in cash, provided the Canadian contribution did not exceed one-tenth of that of the U.S. The Cabinet Memorandum on which the above decision was based noted that the size of the Canadian contribution might also be dependent upon the contributions of developed countries other than the U.S. and Canada, of the order of 40% of the total fund. Last fall at FAO the Canadian delegation announced that Canada was prepared to contribute “up to” $5 million, at least one-third of which would be cash.

It will probably be several months before the pledging conference is convened, at which time Canada and other countries will be expected to make firm pledges. Canadian representatives along with others should make the best use of this period to encourage other potential donor countries to make contributions commensurate with the level envisaged by Canada. In continuing to pursue this objective, tactics will have to be adjusted to suit events as they develop. It would seem important, however, that the Canadian reservation should be removed in a manner which does not appear to be a weakening of the Canadian position. In this connection, it would be good tactics for Canadian representatives to continue to leave the impression that the level of the Canadian pledge may be influenced by the pledging intentions of others.

WORLD FOOD PROGRAMME: FAO COUNCIL

FAO Council met in special session in New York April 16 to consider report of Intergovernmental Committee of 20 on World Food Programme (Document E/3594).<sup>71</sup> Report was approved unanimously without vote at suggestion of Canada seconded by Denmark and Ceylon. Resolution embodying acceptance of IGC report including “Draft General Regulations or Recommendations” will be submitted to FAO Council today in context of FAO Council report. Way will then be open for ECOSOC to consider IGC report and take similar action April 18.

2. In course of paragraph by paragraph consideration of IGC report Canadian representative lifted Canadian reservation on commencement of operations. Deputy Minister Agriculture pointed out that Canada’s views remained unchanged on need for truly multilateral programme but since report represented carefully balanced compromise negotiated over period of 18 months Canada would support all proposals contained in regulations and recommendations.

3. Lifting of Canadian reservation prompted French delegation to reiterate French reservation on subject of WFP accounting based on world market prices. After extensive debate it was agreed that WFP should as recommended utilize single accounting procedure based on world market prices but that annual report of Executive Director should contain tables indicating not repeat not only world market price equivalents of commodity pledges but domestic price equivalents as well. Council also agreed that IGC should keep accounting methods under continuous review.

4. In debate on General Regulations (pages 6 to 13 of IGC report) 20 delegations participated. Most delegations merely reiterated positions already put forward in FAO forums but following highlights of debate may be of interest. Italian delegation indicated that Italian Government had decided in principle to contribute to WFP. (We learned in confidence that Italy is thinking in terms of a contribution totalling approximately two million dollars. Breakdown into cash and commodity components has not yet been agreed upon.)

5. Pakistani representative proposed that in addition to guideline list of acceptable commodities to be circulated to member countries in advance of Pledging Conference Executive Director should draw up and circulate to recipient countries a list of commodities actually pledged so that recipients might plan future requests.

6. Australian delegation which had received fairly stringent instructions to secure changes in report were dissuaded by other delegations from reopening substance of report in form of amendments. Instead Australian representative made his points as observations in course of statement. He laid particular emphasis on need for a strong IGC with more clear-cut control over programme operations. (Australians are quite unhappy about existing relationship between Executive Director IGC and Director General of FAO.) Australians also thought that provisions for emergency needs were skimpy if not repeat not inadequate and would have preferred larger percentage allocation for emergency requests.

7. Most delegations on Council shared to a greater or lesser extent Australian preference for strong IGC in control of operations. Indian delegation thought there was even greater need for authority to be delegated to Executive Director to implement programme and projects "on his own." Indian delegation hoped that underdeveloped countries would be in a position to contribute commodities. He questioned language in paragraph 4 (d) of Regulations which states that currency contributions by developing countries should be in "currencies readily usable in programme." While India would have preferred terminology "other currencies" he urged that existing wording be interpreted in flexible manner.

8. Dr. Bernardo of Argentina who<sup>72</sup> had led opposition to WFP in 2nd Committee of 16th UNGA supported objectives of programme and specific recommendations contained in IGC report on understanding that report represented a compromise acceptable to all and that WFP was to be regarded as purely experimental. Argentina particularly favoured malnutrition programmes and continued to have reservations about development projects. Argentine approval was conditional on three points: inclusion of guarantees for traditional commercial exporters; adequate attention to problems arising from agricultural development of recipient countries; and acceptance of purely experimental nature of programme.

9. UK representative was cautiously non-committal reiterating usual caveats about normal channels of trade. UK wished to ensure that any country in emergency food situation would be able to get aid from WFP. French representative took opportunity to suggest that problems being met by WFP were only one aspect of larger problem concerning stabilization of world commodity prices at higher levels.

10. Only sour political note was struck by Cuban representative who suggested that WFP had admirable objectives but would become in effect another tool of USA imperialism in which economic bondage would be disguised as aid. USA representative (Tetro) who spoke immediately after Cuban delegation made no repeat no direct reference to Cuban statement.

11. Several delegations in course of statements indicated appreciation for Canada's accommodating approach. All delegations believed that IGC report represented effective compromise and that operations could begin without further difficulties.

WORLD FOOD PROGRAMME; CANADIAN CONTRIBUTION
 (Previous reference April 14†)

35. The Secretary of State for External Affairs said that Canada had taken a leading part in arranging for a multilateral world food bank. The Cabinet had approved in 1961 a Canadian contribution of up to $5 million, of which at least one-third was to be in cash, provided the Canadian contribution did not exceed one-tenth of the U.S. contribution. Pledging by the participating countries was important to the achievement of a fund which would be one-third cash, so that commodities and services which were not contributed might be procured. It appeared that most developed countries outside the Soviet bloc would make pledges, and that at least $80 million U.S. in cash would be pledged. It had not been stated whether Canada's contribution would be in Canadian or U.S. funds. The Canadian dollar had been at a premium when the decision was made. It was desirable that the commodities offered should be listed and it was suggested that Canada should pledge dairy products, wheat and dried or canned fish.

An explanatory memorandum had been circulated; (Minister's memorandum, Aug. 23 – Cab. Doc. 264-62†).

36. The Cabinet approved the recommendation of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, concurred in by the Ministers of Agriculture and Fisheries,

(a) that Canada pledge the equivalent of U.S. $5 million of which one-third will be in cash and the remainder in appropriate commodities as indicated in para. 9 of the Minister's memorandum (Cab. Doc. 264-62, Aug. 23);

(b) that the Canadian Delegation to the Pledging Conference of the World Food Programme at the United Nations Headquarters in New York on September 5th, 1962, be headed by the Minister of Agriculture; and,

(c) that the Canadian delegate be authorized to make the Canadian pledge at the Pledging Conference on behalf of the Canadian government and to sign the Final Act of the Conference which would set out the pledges of the participating countries.

PLEDGING CONFERENCE FOR THE WORLD FOOD PROGRAMME

I think you may be interested in the results of the first Pledging Conference for the World Food Programme which took place on September 5 in New York. It resulted in firm commitments from 31 countries of contributions amounting to $85.91 million while a further nine countries indicated their intention to make concrete pledges at a later stage. Although the cash component at approximately $16 million fell short of the recommended one-third of total contributions, it was sufficient to cover the United States' reservation that their proposed $6 million cash contribution should not exceed 40 per cent of total cash contributed.

2. As you know, Canada's contribution amounted to $5 million (U.S.), of which one-third is in cash. The United States contribution is approximately $50 million of which $6 million is in cash, $40 million in commodities and approximately $4 million in shipping to carry at least one-half of the commodity contribution. Other major contributors were Germany – $8 million, Britain – $5 million, France – $3 million, Sweden and Denmark – $2 million each, Norway – $1.7 million, Italy and Australia – $1.5 million each. The only Soviet Bloc contributors were Rumania whose pledge was in unconvertible currency for the training of specialists and Cuba which offered 5,000 tons of sugar in 1964.

3. Mr. Hamilton's statement announcing the Canadian contribution was among the first made and was well received, particularly the emphasis on emergency relief and reference to the earthquake disaster in Iran. Later statements, particularly those of the British, Scandinavian and some other Western Europeans showed strong opposition to the United States policy of tying some of their contribution in the form of shipping services. They indicated that although net providers of shipping themselves, they were making cash contributions on the grounds that procurement of shipping services should be on a freely competitive basis; several reserved the right to convert their cash contribution into a tied shipping contribution if they considered that the necessary marine transport for WFP commodities was being secured non-competitively.

4. In spite of this rather acrimonious exchange and some disappointment at the level of cash contributed, it seems clear that the World Food Programme is off to an encouraging start and that Canada's active role in this endeavour has received wide recognition.

A NEW CANADIAN DECLARATION ACCEPTING THE COMPULSORY JURISDICTION OF THE INTERNATIONAL COURT OF JUSTICE WITHOUT RESERVATIONS

The International Court of Justice is a juridical organ of the U.N. and it functions in accordance with its Statute which forms an Annex to the Charter of the U.N. The Court was established mainly to settle disputes of a legal character between State parties to the Statute according to the principles of international law. The Court's competence in this regard, however, depends on the consent of these states; in other words no state is obliged to accept the court's jurisdiction unless it voluntarily elects to do so. Thus the states parties to the Statute may at any time under paragraph 2 of Article 36 declare that they recognize as compulsory in relation to any other state accepting the same obligation the jurisdiction of the Court in some types of legal disputes (See para 2, sub-paras (a) to (d) of Article 36, in Annex "A") subject to such reservations as these states may see fit to impose. The Court only recognizes a compulsory jurisdiction in regard to the states that have filed with the Registrar of the Court such declarations and then only to the extent permitted by these declarations.

2. Many states including the U.S.S.R. have elected not to submit to the compulsory jurisdiction of the Court by refraining from filing declarations of this kind, even though all members of the United Nations are ipso facto parties to the Statute of the International Court of Justice. The vast majority of states which have filed declarations accepting the compulsory jurisdiction of the Court, including Canada, have as already indicated, made their declarations subject to a number of conditions or reservations. Only two states, namely Haiti and Nicaragua, have filed declarations in absolute terms that they accept unconditionally the compulsory jurisdiction of the Court. Paraguay has also filed a declaration which has essentially the same effect, expressed however in more cautious terms. Other states, including the Dominican Republic, Panama and Uruguay, have filed declarations recognizing the compulsory jurisdiction of the Court subject only to the condition of reciprocity.

3. The reservations to which Canada made its acceptance of the compulsory jurisdiction of the Court, in brief, are as follows:

(1) The Condition of Reciprocity. This means that Canada's acceptance of the compulsory jurisdiction was made only as between Canada and other states similarly accepting the compulsory jurisdiction of the Court.

(2) The Condition Relating to Disputes Arising Prior to July 28, 1930. Canada's acceptance excluded from the jurisdiction of the Court disputes arising prior to July 28, 1930, the date of Canada's ratification of its original declaration of acceptance, there having been two declarations, one in 1929 and one in 1939.

(3) The Condition Relating to Other Methods of Peaceful Settlement. Acceptance excluded disputes concerning which the parties agree to some other method of peaceful settlement.

(4) The Domestic Jurisdiction Condition. The acceptance excluded disputes with regard to questions which by international law fall exclusively within the jurisdiction of Canada.

(5) The League of Nations Disputes Condition. Acceptance excluded disputes under consideration by the Council of the League of Nations.

(6) World War II Condition. Acceptance excluded disputes arising out of events occurring in World War II.

(7) British Commonwealth of Nations Condition. Acceptance excluded disputes with the government of any other member of the League of Nations which is a member of the British Commonwealth of Nations.

4. The question has been under study as to whether there are still reasons of particular importance which would prevent Canada from withdrawing these reservations. It has been made clear by Canadian policy statements in the United Nations General Assembly and elsewhere that the advancement of the rule of law amongst nations is a cornerstone of Canadian foreign policy and that in the Canadian view this process would be noted by more frequent use of the International Court. At the same time, in putting forward these principles Canada has been in a somewhat equivocal position because of the number and extent of her reservations to acceptance of the compulsory jurisdiction of the Court.

5. It should be noted, however, that Canada's present position is not seriously out of line with that of other countries. As I pointed out to the Standing Committee of the House of Commons on External Affairs, March 10, 1960:

"Canada's acceptance of compulsory jurisdiction of the Court is more far-reaching and generous than the acceptance of many other states. In fact, the Canadian declaration is generally less restricted than those of the major Western powers. Indeed there is no member of the Commonwealth whose acceptance is more liberal than that of Canada ... Although Canada has a number of reservations these are largely of a minor character, some merely reiterate articles of the Statute itself and none unduly derogate from the jurisdiction of the Court."

I concluded, however, that:

"It is our intention that the reservations will be deleted at such time as it is considered that the deletion of one or more is justifiable and usefully enhance the authority of the Court."

(a) It must be borne in mind, also, that the I.C.J. is not a judiciary organ in fully the same sense as a national court (i.e. in the sense of having power to enforce its judgments).

Furthermore, in its composition and decisions, it can never be entirely divorced from the political realities of the international scene. The corollary to this proposition is that the practice of international law in its present state falls short in many respects from the ideal of the rule of law among nations. In accepting the jurisdiction of the Court without reservations, therefore, Canada would be submitting to the application of international law as it is and not as it might ideally be.

6. On the other hand, the withdrawal of the reservations would imply no more than the possibility of having to appear before the Court in cases where we might not now have to do so; it would not pre-suppose adverse judgments. It seems clear, in any event, for the reasons given in Annex A, that the only two reservations which continue to have real significance are those relating respectively to reciprocity and to Commonwealth disputes.

7. As regards the reciprocity reservation, the weight of legal opinion seems to be that reciprocity protection is a built-in protection contained in Article 36 itself of the State [sic] of the Court. This interpretation is by no means free from doubt (for a full discussion of this question see paras 5 and subsequent of the background paper contained in Annex A) and the fact remains that only two states have in absolute terms filed declarations accepting unconditionally the compulsory jurisdiction of the Court. A number of others with obviously the same objective in mind have taken the precaution, since the wording of Article 36 is sufficiently ambiguous to lend itself to more than one interpretation, to make their acceptance of the jurisdiction of the Court subject expressly to the condition of reciprocity. (The following states have accepted the jurisdiction of the court on condition of reciprocity only: China, Colombia, Denmark, Finland, Honduras, Japan, Panama, Philippines, Switzerland and Thailand.)

8. The reservation regarding Commonwealth disputes raises a policy rather than a legal issue, by virtue of the fact that there may not be unanimity on this question among members of the Commonwealth. When their governments were consulted by us on this subject in 1946-47, nearly all were reluctant to eliminate the reservation; none, however, officially objected to Canada making a fresh declaration without a reservation as to intra-Commonwealth disputes. As a result of these consultations, Cabinet decided at the time that no further declarations should be made by Canada, there being no reason strong enough to overcome the status quo. (See in this connection discussion contained in paragraphs 26 and subsequent of background paper herewith.)

9. Other members of the Commonwealth may continue to have persuasive reasons for retaining the status quo as far as they are concerned. However, there is not enough information available at this time to make an accurate assessment as to their probable attitude (particularly that of the new members) and it seems advisable to consult them anew to allow Canada to make a re-assessment of the situation before adopting any definite course of action.

10. In the event that the other members of the Commonwealth should show themselves unprepared to withdraw their own reservation on Commonwealth disputes, these consultations would bring to light any difficulty which unilateral withdrawal on Canada's part could cause. Assuming, however, as well may be the case, that such a step would not be detrimental to intra-Commonwealth relations, it may be said that the only other reservation about the withdrawal of which doubt may subsist is that relating to reciprocity. All the others, by and large, have lost their significance.

11. The spelling out of the reciprocity condition in a new declaration might (in view of the situation mentioned in para 7) represent some protection, but its retention might detract to some extent from the impact on the world at large of our gesture of withdrawing the Canadian reservations. In these circumstances, an acceptable formula might be to couch our declaration of acceptance in the terms used by Paraguay which appear to offer some protection – although their import cannot be stated with complete certainty to be equivalent to the express condition of reciprocity. A suitable alternative which would perhaps be an improvement on the Paraguay Formula has also been put forward in the course of the discussion in this matter in Annex "A". (See paragraph 14 of Annex "A" hereto.)

12. The question seems to resolve itself therefore to make a determination whether the advantages of proceeding with the plan calling for Canada's unconditional acceptance of the compulsory jurisdiction of the Court would be in Canada's interest. The possible advantages would seem to lie well beyond the mere addition of one more state to the list of those few prepared to accept the compulsory jurisdiction of the Court unconditionally. As a symbolic gesture for world peace, as a possible example for others to follow, and as a dramatic affirmation of Canada's convictions on the question, its value could be considerable. Apart from all other considerations, however, there seems to be a question of principle at stake as to whether or not Canada is prepared to back up her oft-repeated statements in support of the rule of law with concrete action designed to help bring it about.

Recommendations

In view of the above, I recommend:

(i) that subject to the results of the consultations referred to in recommendations (ii) here below, a decision be made in principle that Canada should withdraw all the reservations to which her acceptance of the compulsory jurisdiction of the International Court of Justice are now subject, or that such withdrawal be made in such terms as would retain only a reservation based on the Paraguay-type formula or, even better, on an improved version of this formula as referred to in paragraph 11 above;

(ii) that – advantage being taken of the presence of their representatives at the current U.N. Assembly – the governments of other members of the Commonwealth be approached informally with a view to finding out whether they would object (particularly in view of the Commonwealth reservation clause) to Canada proceeding on its own to making new declarations accepting the compulsory jurisdiction of the International Court of Justice, either in the context of the proposed resolution on "Friendly Relations" in the Sixth Committee of the United Nations, or at some other time;

(iii) that the Cabinet be apprised of the results of such approaches with a view to recommending what course of action should be taken regarding the withdrawal of Canada's reservations.<sup>73</sup>

ANNEX "A" TO MEMORANDUM TO THE CABINET DATED MARCH 8, 1962
CONCERNING A NEW DECLARATION ACCEPTING THE COMPULSORY JURISDICTION OF THE INTERNATIONAL COURT OF JUSTICE WITHOUT RESERVATIONS

Introductory Remarks

All members of the United Nations are ipso facto parties to the Statute of the International Court of Justice, which forms an annex to the Charter of San Francisco (1945)<sup>74</sup> and each member is required to comply with the decisions of the Court in any case to which it is a party. However, the Court only exercises a compulsory jurisdiction in regard to states that have filed declarations with the Court in pursuance to Article 36 of the Statute, which reads:

1. The jurisdiction of the Court comprises all cases which the parties refer to it and all matters specially provided for in the Charter of the United Nations or in treaties and conventions in force.
2. The states parties to the present Statute may at any time declare that they recognize as compulsory ipso facto and without special agreement, in relation to any other state accepting the same obligation, the jurisdiction of the Court in all legal disputes concerning:
  - (a) the interpretation of a treaty;
  - (b) any question of international law;
  - (c) the existence of any fact which, if established, would constitute a breach of an international obligation;
  - (d) the nature or extent of the reparation to be made for the breach of an international obligation.
3. The declarations referred to above may be made unconditionally or on condition of reciprocity on the part of several or certain states, or for a certain time.
4. Such declarations shall be deposited with the Secretary-General of the United Nations, who shall transmit copies thereof to the parties to the Statute and to the Registrar of the Court.
5. Declarations made under Article 36 of the Statute of the Permanent Court of International Justice and which are still in force shall be deemed, as between the parties to the present Statute, to be acceptances of the compulsory jurisdiction of the International Court of Justice for the period which they still have to run in accordance with their terms.
6. In the event of a dispute as to whether the Court has jurisdiction, the matter shall be settled by the decision of the Court.

See Charter of the United Nations and Statute of the International Court of Justice (New York: United Nations, 1945).

2. Canada's acceptance of the compulsory jurisdiction of the International Court of Justice dates back to 1929,<sup>75</sup> when – for the first time – we filed a declaration of acceptance of the compulsory jurisdiction of the Permanent Court of International Justice (the predecessor in effect of the I.C.J.) which had been established in 1920 under the covenant of the League of Nations. In so doing, Canada acted like most of the other members of the League, which at the time seemed desirable. – On December 7, 1939, shortly after the outbreak of the Second World War, Canada made a new reservation relating to events connected with the War.<sup>76</sup>

Note: Declarations of Acceptance of the compulsory jurisdiction of the Permanent Court of International Justice are deemed by virtue of paragraph 5 of Article 36 of the Statute of the (present) International Court of Justice to apply to the former Court as well. The reservations made by Canada in 1929 and 1939 are therefore still in effect.

3. The Declarations (For text see pages 236 and 237 of I.C.J. Yearbook 1959-60) contain reservations:

- (1) Designed to ensure reciprocity as between Canada and other states accepting the optional clause (although this may not be strictly speaking a reservation);
- (2) Excluding disputes
  - (a) arising prior to July 20, 1930;
  - (b) for which another forum of settlement has been agreed peacefully;
  - (c) relating to questions which by international law fall exclusively within the jurisdiction of Canada;
  - (d) under consideration by the Council of the League of Nations;
  - (e) arising out of events which occurred during World War II;
  - (f) with members of the British Commonwealth of Nations.

Analysis of Reservations

4. It is now proposed to review each of the conditions in turn to which Canada has made her acceptance of the International Court of Justice subject, with a view to determining whether Canada can, without any real prejudice to her legal position, file a new declaration with the Court accepting this jurisdiction unconditionally, or if not unconditionally, then at least on the basis that one or more of the present conditions to which its acceptance is made subject can be dropped.

CONDITION OF RECIPROCITY

5. Canada's first reservation is that its acceptance of the compulsory jurisdiction of the Court is on "condition of reciprocity," i.e. only as between Canada and other states similarly accepting the compulsory jurisdiction of the international justice of the Court.

6. The question of reciprocity is closely related to the interpretation of paragraphs 2 and 3 of Article 36 of the Statute of the International Court of Justice (quoted on page 1 above). The weight of legal opinion, taking into account certain statements contained in judgments of the International Court of Justice and its predecessor and based on the views of publicists, appears to be that the condition of reciprocity mentioned in Article 36<sup>(2)</sup> applies absolutely and in connection with any dispute before the Court regardless whether it is repeated in one or both of the declarations of the states concerned by virtue of which application has been filed with the Court.<sup>(1)</sup>

7. This interpretation implies also in effect that paragraph 3 of Article 36, when speaking of declarations being made “unconditionally or on condition of reciprocity on the part of several or certain states or for a certain time,” means that these provisions are always subject to the built-in condition set out in paragraph 2 of Article 36, which no declaration, no matter what its terms, has the power to modify.<sup>(2)</sup>

8. The present text of the Article, however, which does suffer from some ambiguity, lends itself to more than one interpretation and some writers have supported interpretations which are not in accord with the majority view;<sup>(3)</sup> they contend that the language of paragraph 2 of Article 36 permits the states to accept quite unconditionally the jurisdiction of the court if they so wish, and that therefore paragraph 2 of Article 36 could not be made to apply to declarations of this type.

9. The right-to-make-an-unconditional-reservation argument bases itself in part anyway on the theory that paragraph 3 of Article 36 modifies paragraph 2 of Article 36. However, the text of these two paragraphs does not support this argument, but rather the contrary view discussed above. Paragraph 3 of Article 36 is careful to state that the type of declaration to which it is referring is the type of declaration defined in paragraph 2 of Article 36, thus clearly making the terms of paragraph 3 of Article 36 expressly subject to the terms of paragraph 2 of this article.

10. The history of paragraph (3) of Article 36 of the I.C.J. Statute is significant in this connection: this provision of the Article of the new Statute repeats in identical terms the wording provision of Article 36, paragraph (3) of the old Statute. The origin of this paragraph shows that its text was not intended to provide for “reciprocity.” It can be seen from its language that it simply authorizes states to accept the optional clause for limited periods and to make their liability to jurisdiction having also been accepted by a particular number of other states or by particular named states. The provision was included at the insistence of the Brazilian delegate,<sup>(4)</sup> and although more than one country<sup>(5)</sup> has taken advantage of the opportunity to make its declarations “for a certain time,” only Brazil actually made her reservation subject to a condition of reciprocity “on the part of two at least of the great powers.”<sup>(6)</sup> This form of condition would not seem to be really a condition of reciprocity at all, therefore, but rather a condition that the declaration is not to be enforced unless and until a certain number of states or certain named states have accepted the compulsory jurisdiction of the Optional Clause.

11. The foregoing discussion suggests that any state desiring protection of the condition of reciprocity should rely for this protection on the provisions of Article 36(2) of the Statute of International Court of Justice, irrespective of the terms of paragraph (3) thereof. Nevertheless, as has been already indicated, the subsisting uncertainty has prompted a number of states to include in their declaration of acceptance, to be on the safe side, an express reservation of some kind concerning reciprocity<sup>(7)</sup> with the exception of Haiti, Nicaragua and Paraguay. Haiti and Nicaragua in effect have filed declarations in absolute terms that they accept unconditionally the jurisdiction of the court. Paraguay’s declaration is to the same effect, except it avoids using that same express language. It relies rather on the words of the statute to do this. Paraguay’s declaration thus provides:

12. In considering the means of overcoming the doubt over the reciprocity question that has arisen largely from the fact that the wording of Article 36(2) and 36(3) is sufficiently ambiguous to lend itself to more than one interpretation, the wording of the Paraguayan declaration becomes important. It contrasts strikingly in form to the complete and conditional acceptance of the jurisdiction of the Court contained in Nicaragua's declaration, which states:

13. As already indicated, the Paraguayan formula appears to have been designed to combine the unconditional acceptance feature of the Haiti and Nicaragua declarations as well as the full protection acquired by retaining the reciprocity condition without the declaration being made expressly subject to such a condition. If so, however, it could have perhaps been expressed in clearer terms, from a legal standpoint, since it does not attempt to solve the contentious question whether the statute of the Court, of and by itself, provides for reciprocity even in the case of a completely unconditional acceptance.

14. The Paraguayan approach might nevertheless be incorporated into the Canadian declaration, – along the following lines:

“In accordance with Article 36(2) of the Statute of the International Court of Justice, Canada hereby accepts as compulsory the jurisdiction of the International Court of Justice in relation to any other state similarly accepting this Court's jurisdiction.”

RESERVATIONS OF DISPUTES ARISING PRIOR TO JULY 28, 1930

15. There is no particular significance to this cut-off date<sup>(9)</sup> since this condition was not aimed at protecting Canada against any particular dispute brought before the Court. It was merely a customary one providing against litigation of disputes arising prior to acceptance of the Court's jurisdiction.

16. It is probably true that the withdrawal of this reservation would open the way to situation where Canada would be obliged to submit to the jurisdiction of the Court in regard to disputes arising prior to July 28, 1930. Indeed, for example, the disputes concerning the Gut Dam claims or Hecate Strait might qualify as pre-July 28, 1930 disputes and the United States might wish to avail itself of the opportunity provided by the withdrawal of this reservation to have these disputes referred to the International Court of Justice.

17. Actually, however, the practical consequences from withdrawing this reservation would appear to be innocuous; any dispute with another country which has significance to Canada will sooner or later have to be arbitrated or settled in some fashion or other if it is important enough to either country and the International Court of Justice should be as desirable a forum as one could normally expect. Another important reason for withdrawing this reservation at this time is that it would be difficult for Canada to insist on this reservation in the face of Canada's declared policy that as great a use as possible should be made of the Court.

RESERVATION OF DISPUTES CONCERNING WHICH THE PARTIES AGREE TO SOME OTHER METHOD OF PEACEFUL SETTLEMENT

18. This reservation seems redundant because Article 95 of the Charter provides that nothing “shall prevent members of the United Nations from entrusting the solution of their differences to other tribunals by virtue of agreements already in existence or which may be included in the future.”

RESERVATION OF DISPUTES RELATING TO QUESTIONS WHICH BY INTERNATIONAL LAW FALL EXCLUSIVELY WITHIN THE JURISDICTION OF CANADA

19. This reservation appears to be unnecessary because Article 2(7) of the United Nations Charter provides that “nothing in the Charter shall authorize the United Nations to intervene in matters which are essentially within the domestic jurisdiction of any State, or request members to submit such matters to settlement ...”

20. However, Article 2(7) of the Charter leaves open the question as to who decides when a matter is essentially within the domestic jurisdiction of a state. Perhaps the only effective way to cure this weakness would be to adopt the kind of reservation contained in the U.S.A. declaration which reserves to the U.S.A. the right to determine whether the particular issue is one of domestic jurisdiction or not. However, as pointed out by Mr. Justice Read (then the Canadian member of the Court), in a recent case, such a reservation is inconsistent with the whole notion of acceptance of compulsory jurisdiction.

RESERVATION OF DISPUTES UNDER CONSIDERATION BY THE COUNCIL OF THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS

21. The United Nations is not a successor to the League of Nations and by the same token, the International Court of Justice is not a successor to the Permanent Court of International Justice.<sup>(10)</sup> For these reasons the weight of authority indicates clearly that this kind of reservation specifically referring to organs of the League cannot be deemed to apply to organs of the United Nations and must therefore be considered as having lapsed. Moreover, there would not seem to be any merit in including a reservation providing similar protection respecting disputes while they are being debated in the United Nations. No other state has filed a reservation of this kind for the reason that such a reservation is not considered necessary in the context of the United Nations.

RESERVATION OF DISPUTES ARISING OUT OF EVENTS OCCURING
DURING WORLD WAR II

22. This is the reservation introduced separately in 1939 at the outbreak of World War II. It could have saved Canada from embarrassment had the Polish Art treasures<sup>77</sup> dispute, which has now been settled, been brought before the Court. Because of the constitutional issue which would then have been involved, the dispute was a matter of direct concern to the Province of Quebec and the fear had been that, if the Court rendered judgment requiring implementation by Canada, the Federal Government could have been unsuccessful in persuading the Province of Quebec to live up to the judgement had the Provincial Government not wished to do so.

23. The only other known dispute at present debarred by this reservation is a money claim against Canada by “La Compagnie Française des Mines d’Or du Canada” founded on alleged improper action by the Custodian of Enemy Property. However, this case does not carry the constitutional difficulties associated with the Polish Art Treasures dispute, and, if it should be referred to the Court, no special constitutional problem which would require the retention of this reservation would arise. There would thus seem to be no reason why this reservation could not be withdrawn.

24. In considering in general the constitutional position of Canada in this context, it should be pointed out that our reservations to the acceptance of compulsory jurisdiction were never given per se to protect the Canadian Government from the dilemma it would face if it were required to implement a Court decision involving the co-operation of a province where the Provincial Government concerned refused to give this cooperation. In the Polish Art Treasures case, this constitutional question did threaten to arise and had it in fact arisen, the reservation would have provided a certain measure of protection for Canada. This happened, of course, not because the reservation in question related to the Canadian constitution but because by accident a constitutional question arose incidentally in connection with another type of dispute.

25. No other state had made a reservation designed to seek special protection in relation to constitutional problems and Canada might indeed from every point of view, be raising more problems than it would solve were it to attempt to consider introducing a reservation of this kind.

RESERVATION OF COMMONWEALTH DISPUTES

26. When we consulted in 1946-47 as to the possibility of Canada making a new declaration without reservations, the United Kingdom, Australia, New Zealand and South Africa, which all possessed similar reservations, indicated that though not prepared to eliminate their own, they would not object at Canada making a fresh declaration without a reservation of this kind.

27. This reservation has been criticized as being incompatible with the basic principle of acceptance of compulsory jurisdiction, in that to exempt such a large group of important and influential countries is inconsistent with the independent status of the members of the Commonwealth and because disputes between members of the Commonwealth (such as that between Pakistan and India over Kashmir) are unquestionably international disputes. These arguments suggest that intra-commonwealth disputes should be made subject to the jurisdiction of the Court.

28. On the other hand, there may be a feeling amongst other Commonwealth countries that this reservation is in keeping with the Commonwealth notion and that its removal might lessen Commonwealth ties. With these considerations in mind, the Government of the day decided on March 20, 1948 that the time had not yet arrived for the withdrawal or for Canada to make any further declaration, – indicating that the movement for change was still not strong enough to overcome the status quo position.

29. The following members of the Commonwealth have made their acceptance of the compulsory jurisdiction of the Court subject to the Commonwealth reservation: United Kingdom, Australia, Canada, India, New Zealand. Pakistan, the only other member of the Commonwealth to have filed a declaration accepting the compulsory jurisdiction of the Court, has expressly omitted the Commonwealth reservation. Thus, were Canada to withdraw the Commonwealth reservation it would be following the precedent established by Pakistan.

30. The foregoing discussion would suggest that there are really no valid reasons from a legal standpoint as to why this reservation should not be withdrawn. However, before taking this decision it would seem appropriate that each of the other Commonwealth countries should first be consulted again.

The following comment by Hudson in this work, on p. 456 is particularly relevant: “Every declaration made under para. 2 of Art. 36, whether it is made by signature of the optional clause or otherwise, has this characteristic impressed upon it. It is not a reservation made by the declarant; it is a limitation in the very nature of the declaration which operates under or is made 'in conformity with' para. 2 of Art. 36." See also an article on the Optional Clause by H.W. #### RUANDA-URUNDI

The agenda for the resumed session of the United Nations General Assembly includes the question of the future of Ruanda Urundi. The main document to be considered is the Report of the United Nations Commission for Ruanda Urundi which was headed by Ambassador Dorsinville of Haiti (the other two members were from Iran and Togo).<sup>78</sup> The Report was submitted at the end of November but discussion in the Fourth Committee was deferred at the request of the Belgians who at the time were engaged in talks with the political leaders of Ruanda and Urundi in Brussels.

2. The main task of the Dorsinville Commission was to follow the progress of events in Ruanda Urundi, to supervise the elections and the preparatory measures preceding them, and to assist and advise the Administering Authority (Belgium). As regards the elections themselves and the referendum on the future of the Mwami in Ruanda, the task of the Commission involved reporting on (i) whether the pre-electoral atmosphere was such as to permit political workers and leaders to resume normal democratic political activity and (ii) whether the organization of the actual voting was such as to provide for a secret ballot and an accurate count of the vote.

3. In contrast to the Commission's Interim Report of last year which was sharply critical of Belgium, the final Report submitted in November commends the cooperation and assistance of the Belgian administration. In this connection the Report states that the Commission's task "was most fortunately understood by the Belgian Government which abandoned the policy of the previous government and displayed a general willingness to appreciate what was being aimed at and to act in a spirit of comprehension and sincere cooperation which deserves the Commission's gratitude." Thanks to this cooperation, the Report states, the Commission was able "to persuade and assist the Administering Authority to implement the Resolutions of the General Assembly and in organizing the most effective possible system for supervising the elections."

4. As regards Urundi, the Commission at first expressed concern that the Administration's electoral law in the territory might have opened the way to electoral fraud but it concluded that all political parties were in fact able to express their opinions "freely and calmly." The polling had taken place with no serious incident and the final results had been a resounding success.

5. As regards Ruanda, the Commissioners were divided on whether an atmosphere which permitted normal democratic political activity had, in fact, been achieved. They therefore decided, after drawing attention to the existence of tribal violence and cases of local intimidation, to leave it to the General Assembly to form its own judgment on the basis of the facts. The Report itself is therefore partially inconclusive, but the Chairman of the Commission, Ambassador Dorsinville, expressed the personal view that, although the atmosphere prevailing before the elections was not exactly what the UN General Assembly had in mind, "it would be in the higher interests of the peoples of Urundi and Ruanda for the fact of the elections to be accepted so that these peoples may be given the status of legitimacy necessary to their accession to independence."

6. At a meeting in Brussels between Belgian officials and political leaders from Ruanda-Urundi it was agreed that, beginning early in January, the two territories would be given local autonomy and be administered separately, each from its own capital (Kigali and Kitega). They would, however, continue to cooperate on a number of common services such as customs, post office, aerodromes, etc. As Administering Power under the Trusteeship Agreement, Belgium would remain responsible for foreign affairs, defence and the maintenance of law and order. The Resident-General, who had overall responsibility for the whole of the territory, would be replaced by two Residents, one located in each of the two capitals. According to the Belgian Foreign Ministry these arrangements, which we understand are now in force, reflect the wishes of the Prime Ministers of Ruanda and of Urundi as well as the other elected representatives of the two territories present at the Brussels meeting.

See Report of the United Nations Commission for Ruanda-Urundi, UN Doc A/4994 and Add.1; Official Records of the General Assembly, Sixteenth Session, Annexes, Addendum to Agenda Item 49 (November 30, 1961), <http://documents.un.org/>.

7. No target date for independence was mentioned in the Dorsinville Commission's Report or in the official documents of the Brussels meeting. However, the political leaders of Ruanda and Urundi have indicated privately that it might be possible to terminate the Trusteeship sometime during the first half of 1962. The Belgians, for their part, seem to be willing to accept any date agreeable to the African leaders.

8. At a recent meeting of the NATO Ad Hoc Committee on Africa the Belgians reported the results of the Brussels negotiations and asked for the support of their allies when Ruanda Urundi is discussed at the United Nations. The French and Dutch offered their full support, while the British, Portuguese, Danish, and Italians promised a sympathetic and friendly attitude.

9. It seems likely that discussion in the United Nations will centre around some or all of three main questions:

- (1) The Dorsinville Commission Report;
- (2) A target date for independence of the territory;
- (3) Whether, on independence, the territory should become one state or two.

10. So far as the Commission's Report is concerned, it would seem that the directives contained in the General Assembly Resolution have been carried out as far as could be expected under the circumstances prevailing in the territories and that, as recommended by the Chairman, the elections and governments formed in the two parts of the territory should be accepted by the General Assembly. In view of the Belgian co-operation with the Commission there would seem to be a good chance that the General Assembly will accept, or perhaps simply note, the Commission's Report, although it is always possible that some of the Casablanca powers will accuse the Belgians of unfairly influencing the elections and the referendum on the Mwami in Ruanda where the pro-Belgian Hutu party defeated the minority Tutsi group who were supported by the Soviet bloc and the Afro-Asians at the 15th Session of the General Assembly.

11. As regards a target date for independence, it would seem that the leaders of Ruanda and Urundi are undecided and may wish to avoid setting a specific date. Dorsinville himself is understood to hold the private conviction that independence should be delayed because of the obvious unreadiness of the territories for this step. The State Department would be willing to support a proposal to delay independence but it seems unlikely that Dorsinville or any of the Afro-Asians would be willing to make such a proposal publicly. Discussions of this question may, therefore, hinge on the attitude taken by the leaders of Ruanda and Urundi who, we understand, will attend the debate in New York.

12. The question of whether the territory should become one state or two is complicated by the fact that, although the Dorsinville Commission's Interim Report submitted last year recommended one state, the political leaders of the territory seem to favour two states. It may be, however, that this question can be avoided during the present discussions.

Instructions for the Delegation

The present instructions in the Commentary are that it will not be necessary for the Canadian Delegation to make any intervention in the debate but they should be prepared to vote for any moderate resolution contributing to Ruanda-Urundi's peaceful evolution towards independence. If an extreme resolution is submitted to the Assembly the delegation should consult the Department for instructions. It is recommended that the Delegation be instructed in addition to support any reasonable resolution accepting or noting the Dorsinville Commission Report which does not contain derogatory references to Belgium. It is assumed that the Delegation will keep us informed of any further developments in order that additional instructions may be provided as required.<sup>79</sup>

COMMONWEALTH MEETING JANUARY 18 – ANGOLA AND RUANDA-URUNDI

Commonwealth meeting held January 18 began with Angolan item. Discussion was limited by fact that Afro-Asian group had still not repeat not agreed on a resolution and also by absence at time of representatives of some of the African members of Commonwealth. They turned up later. Australian representative opened discussion with a suggestion that Assembly ought to avoid taking action which would close door to any possibility of cooperation from Portugal. Indian and Malayan representatives agreed with validity of approach, but wondered how Portugal could be persuaded to comply with a UNGA resolution. It was doubt about Portugal's willingness to cooperate which caused the countries concerned about problem to turn to more drastic measures. Malayan representative suggested that UK, USA and Brazil could "do a lot to make Portugal accept fact." UK representative reminded Committee that both bilaterally and through NATO UK had done its best and would continue to do so. While Portugal was in no repeat no doubt as to opinion of UK, it had not repeat not yet chosen to follow UK's advice.

2. Meeting then turned to question of Ruanda-Urundi. Australian representative said debate on this item had just commenced in Fourth Committee and it appeared that a choice would have to be made between: (a) immediate independence or (b) delaying independence in order to make some attempt to unify the two states. Indian representative (Jha) said that it would be necessary to wait for views of African states on this question. In principle, India believed it would be disastrous to create two small states out of what was formerly one trust territory.

3. Ghanaian and Nigerian representatives made it clear that they would prefer to see some sort of union between Ruanda and Burundi. Ghanaian representative indicated that before reaching any firm conclusion his delegation would wish to hear views of petitioners. He seemed to attach more weight to opinions which petitioners might voice than to views held by newly elected governments in the two states. Nigerian representative (Ifeagwu) expressed opinion that it was most important to work for the formation of a loose federal union between Ruanda and Burundi. It would help a great deal if Belgian government would exert pressure in that direction. He said that Nigerian delegation had discussed this with the petitioners (presumably UNAR petitioners who represent opposition in Ruanda) and thought they would be amenable to a solution on these lines.

4. I raised problem of maintaining public order and security after Belgians left, saying that our info indicated that there was a grave danger that local police forces in Ruanda and Burundi would be inadequate to maintain order if new disturbances should break out. In that case we might be faced with another Congo situation. Nigerian representative agreed that this was a real problem. He said that here attitude of Belgian government became all important. If Belgium had not repeat not taken a final position in favour of granting immediate independence then one might work for some arrangement under UN auspices by which Belgian forces could continue to train local Garde Territoriale and maintain order.

5. In the ensuing discussion it became clear that Nigeria and Ghana favoured delaying independence for Ruanda and Burundi in the hope that some form of union could be worked out. Nigerian representative was also worried at prospect of creating two small states which would be very weak economically and a source of concern to other African states. He appealed to white Commonwealth countries to use their influence to persuade Belgium to encourage formation of a federal union between Ruanda and Burundi.

6. Sir Hugh Foot (UK) commented that this was an instance where two guiding principles seemed to conflict with one another. On one hand there was principle that unity was to be favoured over division, and on other, principle that wishes of people should prevail. Cypriot representative (Rossides) seemed to be in favour of a referendum to ascertain wishes of people of Ruanda and Burundi on issue of unity. Later in day he broached this proposal in Fourth Committee but New Zealand representative believes that he has now convinced Rossides that a referendum would destroy any hope of forming a federal union because the overwhelming majority of the people would undoubtedly vote against it.

7. Meeting closed with a very brief résumé by Sir Patrick Dean of USA-UK talks in Washington.

RESUMED 16TH UNGA – ITEM 49; RUANDA-URUNDI

Although UN Commissioners for Ruanda-Urundi agreed on their report and facts contained therein, they were unable to reach agreement on a subjective evaluation of elections in Ruanda (paragraphs 3 and 4 our reference telegram). In presenting report of Commission, Chairman Dorsinville expounded his viewpoint. Other two members of Commission were then invited by Guinean delegation to give their personal views to Committee; they complied with this request on January 19 and 22 and, as a result, Committee has a somewhat clearer perspective of issues involved.

2. For Commissioner Ernest Gassou (Togo), pre-electoral period in Ruanda was such that results of elections and of plebiscites cannot repeat not be considered as expressing mind of electoral body. He blames burgomasters and local civil service administration for atmosphere of fear and violence which prevailed in many parts of territory before election day and suggests that choice of many electors was vitiated at very start. In his view there are three courses of action open to Assembly.

(a) To refuse to validate results of elections and hold new ones. Under present administrative structure, he fears a repetition of 1959-60 disturbances if UNGA adopts this course;

(b) To validate results of elections and grant separate independence for two states as already envisaged. In this case he predicts that certain tribal minorities will resort to violence;

(c) To accept the "de facto" state of affairs and attempt to remedy defects of present situation in Ruanda.

3. Brilliant exposé of Commissioner Majid Rahnema (Iran) contained a profound and sober analysis of factors involved in present situation. Rahnema explained that deep-rooted Hutu emancipation movement which culminated in 1959 disturbances had been deflected from its main course when odium of both feudalism and colonialism had been directed against Tutsi, thereby discrediting them completely and undermining authority of Mwami, who had to flee the country. ParmeHutu (Parti du mouvement de l'émancipation Hutu), abetted by Belgian administration, had then created a new power structure based largely on their control of local administration. Tutsi opposition parties had tried to rely on UN in order to improve atmosphere but ParmeHutu and local Belgian administration had conducted an extensive propaganda campaign against UN.

4. Change of government in Brussels had brought about a completely new Belgian policy on Ruanda-Urundi, based on a sincere attempt to cooperate with UN. However, given excellent Belgian cooperation, Rahnema stated that within time limit specified in 15th UNGA resolutions, it had been impossible to break up administration pyramid then in existence and, consequently, Hutu were exposed only to electioneering propaganda of ParmeHutu Party. Thus "legal framework which had been set up had not repeat not seemed to be sufficient to allow full freedom of expression for opposition in interior parts of territory." Nevertheless final decision on validity of election in Ruanda rested with UNGA and not repeat not with UN Commission.

5. For same reasons given by Gassou, Rahnema rejected idea of holding new elections. On question of union between two territories he urged Assembly not repeat not to impose a theoretical solution in opposition to present political realities and against wishes of inhabitants of Urundi, clearly expressed by their government which has an "unquestionable mandate" to speak on their behalf.

6. In conclusion, Rahnema outlined five factors which should govern final decision of Assembly: (a) question of validity of elections; (b) question of whether independence should be granted immediately, despite all problems involved; (c) question of unity; (d) means and resources at disposal of UN in discharge of its duties on territory. He suggested that Assembly might wish to study possibility of having UN take over administration of territory in part or as a whole. In this eventuality, would member governments be ready to pay for cost of this UN presence? (e) attitude of administering power. In Rahnema's view Belgian policy and efforts remain key to future of territory.

7. 4th Committee now seems to have before it most of facts it needs. Questioning of representative of Urundi and of Ruanda has not repeat not added greatly to Committee's knowledge and it is not repeat not expected that questioning of petitioners (which is to start today) will provide much fresh food for thought. Mood of Committee can best be described by comment made to us by Yugoslav delegation that "it is evident that these people do not repeat not have sufficient political maturity to be granted independence." In minds of many delegations, problem of unity between two territories seems to have been left in abeyance until more pressing problem of timing of, and readiness for, independence is settled. While Rahnema protested that he did not repeat not wish to suggest any solution, he seemed inclined to favour some sort of UN presence in Ruanda. We believe that this idea is gaining adherents within Committee. However, complexity of these questions is such that Afro-Asians have not repeat not yet evolved a unified line of action.

RUANDA-URUNDI

You asked for our comments on the suggestion that Canada promote the idea of Ruanda-Urundi gaining its independence as one state rather than two; one advantage being to avoid two additional votes at the United Nations. Since then you will have seen Permis New York telegram No. 111 of January 22, 1962 (attached), which indicates that the majority of Commonwealth countries and presumably the Afro-Asian Group in general would also prefer to see Ruanda-Urundi become one state. Also, as you will recall, both the Trusteeship Council and the General Assembly in earlier resolutions have gone on record as recommending a single state.

2. Throughout its history, the division of Ruanda-Urundi has been recognized in one way or another. During the period of German rule Ruanda and Urundi formed districts 13 and 14 of German East Africa. When the Belgians took over the territory after the First World War they continued to recognize the separateness of the two kingdoms, while setting up a common administrative centre in Usumbura.

3. The main problem for the future of Ruanda-Urundi apart from the tribal one lies in the fact that the territory is very poor and densely populated. Also it lacks both an adequately trained gendarmerie to maintain law and order and a competent cadre of civil servants. This means that the territories will require outside financial and technical assistance for some time to come. (This is also a reason for preferring a single state.) The doubt about the territory's economic viability raises the question of whether it would not be better off in the long run if it joined one of its neighbours.

4. Although Ruanda-Urundi once formed part of German East Africa and has maintained contacts with Uganda and Tanganyika, culturally the territory is closer to the Congo, particularly through the use of the French language. If the Congo crisis had not occurred there would probably have been strong pressure for Ruanda-Urundi to join the Congo. Soon after declaring Katanga's secession, Tshombe is understood to have tried to interest the Ruanda-

Urundi leaders in joining a confederation or economic union with Katanga, Kivu and Kasai. This idea was rejected, however, and it seems unlikely that the present governments of Ruanda and Urundi would be interested at the moment in joining the Congo.

5. The possibility of the territory joining Tanganyika has been suggested privately at various times. We understand that Nyerere has indicated that he would have no objection to Ruanda-Urundi joining Tanganyika. The Belgian Foreign Ministry has, also, indicated to our Embassy in Brussels that the Belgians would not be averse to a merger of either or both of the territories with Tanganyika. Another possibility is that the territory might become part of a greater Federation of East Africa which would also include Tanganyika, Uganda and Kenya, but this, of course, would not provide an immediate solution to the problem.

6. The desire of the other African countries to see Ruanda-Urundi remain one country presumably stems from:

(a) their recognition that two small countries would be less economically viable and a potential source of political trouble;

(b) their general dislike of balkanization tendencies in Africa; and,

(c) their belief that partition is really Belgian inspired, and that in a union the influence of the pro-Belgian Government in Ruanda would perhaps be partially offset by the more nationalist government in Urundi.

7. Perhaps the best that could be hoped for in the present circumstances is that the two territories extend their present customs and economic union to form a loose confederal union in which they would enjoy separate political autonomy with responsibility for foreign affairs, defence and trade, etc. vested in a central authority.

8. According to latest reports from New York there is a growing feeling in the Fourth Committee in favour of delaying independence for Ruanda-Urundi. This would have the advantage of postponing the controversial question of whether the territory should become one state or two and would allow more time to prepare the territories for full sovereignty.

9. It would be very difficult for any Western country to suggest in public that independence for Ruanda-Urundi should be delayed. Any such suggestion would have to come from the other African countries themselves and preferably with the prior concurrence of the leaders of Ruanda-Urundi.

10. Attached for your signature, if you agree, is a telegram to New York outlining our views of the main issues under discussion in the Fourth Committee.<sup>80</sup>

RESUMED 16TH UNGA – ITEM 49: RUANDA-URUNDI

Following are some preliminary views which you may use as appropriate in discussions with other delegations.

2. UN Commission's Report: It would be a great mistake in our view if the UNGA were to refuse to validate the elections in Ruanda and hold new ones. Even if new elections were held it would be unrealistic given the existing tribal animosities to expect that the results would be materially different or that the Mwami could be reinstated. Moreover as pointed out by the commissioners, new elections could well lead to a recurrence of bloodshed and a further legacy of hatred. The main problem here seems to be to find some way for the Tutsi to be given representation in the Government of Ruanda. This would seem to depend on the Hutus being persuaded by the Belgians and friendly African states of the long term advantages of including some Tutsis in the government.

Timing of Independence: We are inclined to agree that the territory is probably not ready for independence (in this connection we fully agree with the fears you expressed at the Commonwealth meeting). On the other hand the argument of unpreparedness has been rejected in other contexts and we doubt that the leaders of Ruanda-Urundi would agree to postpone independence beyond 1962. Certainly any suggestion for a delay in independence say by a reference to the Trusteeship Council meeting in May or 'til the 17th UNGA would have to come from African delegations and preferably after consultation with the leaders of Ruanda-Urundi.

Question of Unity: On balance we would prefer to see the territory become independent as one state rather than two. This would presumably give them a better chance to develop economic viability and they would thereby also gain the benefits of common overhead administrative expenses; moreover the outside financial and technical assistance (including UN assistance) which the country will require could in our view be more easily and efficiently provided to a single state.

3. We should be grateful if you would continue to keep us informed of developments in the Fourth Committee particularly as regards the growth of any sentiment for a UN presence in Ruanda-Urundi. We would also like to be kept informed of Belgian views on developments including their reaction to what seems to be the majority preference for one state rather than two.

RUANDA-URUNDI

You will note from the attached telegram† that Mr. Spaak has asked Canada, along with a number of other Western countries to co-sponsor a draft resolution on the future of Ruanda-Urundi.

2. This resolution would create a special five-member U.N. Commission for Ruanda-Urundi which would go to the territory for the purpose of assisting and advising the administering authority and the local governments during the transitional period before independence. The Commission would assist in such matters as the proposed economic union, technical assistance programs, resettlement of refugees and, where possible, use its good offices to encourage a reconciliation amongst the political parties. The Commission would not, however, report back to the General Assembly and the two territories of Burundi and Ruanda would become independent as separate states within an economic union on June 25, 1962.

3. The resolution has the backing of the U.S., British and French, but apparently has not been discussed with the Afro-Asian group. It seems very unlikely that it would receive support from the Afro-Asian group who are meeting on Monday to draft a resolution of their own. Indeed, it would seem from the situation described by our Delegation in the attached telegram 192† that there is no serious expectation that the resolution would be adopted and that its chief purpose would be to serve as a counter-weight in the event that the Afro-Asian group put forward an extreme resolution.

4. We understand from New York that the Swedish Delegation has been authorized to co-sponsor the draft on the understanding that Canada and the others approached (e.g. Mexico, Greece, Italy) as well as the moderate African states are also prepared to do so. Mexico has refused to co-sponsor and is thinking of suggesting a constitutional round table of all political parties in the territory followed by a referendum on the question of one state or two. The Italian and Greek delegations had not yet received instructions but felt sure that their Governments would not agree to co-sponsorship on the grounds that the resolution would not enjoy wide support including the Afro-Asian group. The Greek delegation calculated that the resolution would not obtain more than 25 affirmative votes.

5. In view of the fact that an Afro-Asian draft is pending we think it would be desirable to see both draft resolutions before deciding to co-sponsor one of them. If you agree, therefore, a telegram to New York in this sense is attached for your approval.†

6. Also attached for your approval is a telegram† to New York containing a Canadian statement on Ruanda-Urundi which Mr. Asselin proposes to make in the Fourth Committee tomorrow (February 6). This statement is basically a shortened version of the draft submitted by the Delegation in their telegram 206† copy of which is attached.<sup>81</sup>

This is to confirm that the Minister does not want Canada to co-sponsor the Belgian draft resolution, and has so informed Senator Brooks by telephone. He would, however, like a telegram of confirmation send to New York.

RESUMED 16TH UNGA – RUANDA-URUNDI

West Asian draft resolution on future of Ruanda-Urundi will come to a vote tomorrow morning in Fourth Committee. Explanations on behalf of cosponsors have helped to clarify text in several respects, e.g. it has been made clear that Belgium retains full responsibility for territory under our paragraph 3 until granting of independence. In case of high level conference called for in our paragraph 4 cosponsors have said that UN Commission can request Belgian representatives to participate in talks if Commission thinks this would be desirable.

Tels signed by SSEA 5/2. R. C[ampbell]

2. One crucial problem which remains is the wording of our paragraph 3(e) which as presently drafted, states expressly that replacement of Belgian military forces must be completed before date of independence. Until today there was ground for hoping that cosponsors would accept some slight change in wording which would remove categorical and mandatory deadline for removal of all Belgian military forces. However after several meetings cosponsors were unable to agree on any change in text of this paragraph.

3. Belgians have told us that they regard it as absolutely essential that wording of paragraph 3(e) be modified. They accept the basic aim of this paragraph, namely that all Belgian military forces should be removed as soon as possible but they are very worried about consequences which would follow if they were adopted with paragraph 3(e) in its present form. Belgians say that one immediate result would be a mass exodus of Belgian civilians from Ruanda Urundi. These civilians who form backbone of the administration would be fearful of a breakdown of law and order if all Belgian military forces were to withdraw before independence. Apart from withdrawal of officers and troops serving in Belgian armed forces in Ruanda Urundi, Belgian officers serving in a training capacity with the local national guard and police forces would also wish to leave territory once they learned that a deadline as of date of independence had been fixed for replacement of all Belgian military and paragraph 2 military forces.

4. In course of today's debate very strong opposition developed to categorical wording of paragraph 3(e). Sweden, Ireland, New Zealand and USA expressed grave concern over situation which could develop if all Belgian forces were forced to withdraw before independence and no repeat no one could be found to take their place. On instructions from Washington USA representative told Committee that if paragraph 3(e) remained in its present form USA could not repeat not support resolution as a whole. He said that it would not repeat not be possible for governments of Ruanda and Urundi to assume full responsibility by July 1 for maintaining law and order. As it stood paragraph 3(e) was "asking for another Congo." It was absolutely categorical in asking for withdrawal of Belgian troops before July 1 and completely ignored views of two governments who had not repeat not asked for withdrawal of Belgian troops before independence.

5. Irish representative in putting forward amendment to paragraph 3(e) by his delegation and Sweden said that with tragedy of Congo fresh in mind UN could not repeat not contemplate creating a vacuum in maintenance of law and order in Ruanda Urundi. While sympathizing with principle that no repeat no country could be truly independent if foreign troops remained on its territory, Ireland attached even greater importance to maintenance of law and order. Neither Government of Ruanda nor that of Urundi had asked for withdrawal of all Belgian forces. Irish representative said that his government felt very strongly that if paragraph 3(e) remained in its present form and if disorder should break out in Ruanda Urundi following premature withdrawal of Belgian forces then UN would have failed lamentably.

6. Secretary-General is also very concerned about possible consequences if paragraph remains unchanged. He told some of Afro-Asian cosponsors this afternoon that UN had "neither money nor men" to fill vacuum which would be left by complete withdrawal of all Belgian military forces before independence. U Thant intends to speak again to cosponsors tomorrow morning in an effort to underline seriousness with which he views this situation.

7. Latin Americans are also worried. In an effort to find a compromise wording for the paragraph Mexican representative (speaking for Mexico, Argentina and Brazil) suggested following revision of Irish-Swedish amendment to paragraph 3(e):

“Change of paragraph 3(e) to read as follows: “Arrangements for training of indigenous forces with help of experts or training missions provided by UN in order to achieve without delay progressive replacement of Belgian military and IAR military forces according to a plan which would be submitted to UNGA before independence and in which modalities and target date for final withdrawal of all Belgian forces would be established.” Ireland and Sweden have accepted this revision of their amendment. Since this amendment will have support of all Western countries and Latin Americans it stands a fair chance of being adopted if a number of Afro-Asians vote in favour or abstain when it is put to a vote.

8. If Mexican revision of paragraph 3(e) is carried there will be no repeat no problem in voting on resolution as a whole. If it is not repeat not adopted and paragraph remains in its present form Belgium will either vote against or abstain on resolution as a whole. Following countries will abstain on resolution as a whole if paragraph is unchanged: USA, UK, Denmark, Ireland, Netherlands, New Zealand, Australia, Italy, Sweden and in all likelihood Austria. France will vote with Belgium. As of this afternoon following friendly Western countries were prepared to vote for resolution as a whole, whether or not repeat not any changes were made in paragraph 3(e): Norway, Finland, Canada, Turkey and Greece. Greece is anxious to vote with Afro-Asians because a Greek national was implicated in murder of Prince Rwagasore, Prime Minister of Urundi.

9. In his phone call to delegation tonight Minister confirmed that if there is no repeat no change in text we should abstain on paragraph 3(e) and vote for the resolution as a whole.

10. Since speaking to Minister we have been told by Norwegian delegation that after weighing pros and cons they have recommended to Oslo that Norway should abstain on resolution as a whole if paragraph 3(e) remains unchanged. Norwegians have been influenced by views held by Ireland and Sweden. These views as explained to us today by Poland are that countries such as Ireland, Sweden and Canada who have contributed heavily to Congo operation ought not repeat not to go on record as voting for a resolution with an irresponsible element in it which seems bound to lead to serious trouble if it is carried out and could conceivably produce another Congo situation. Ends.

RUANDA URUNDI

Operative paragraph 3e of the Afro-Asian resolution on the future of Ruanda Urundi provides for the departure of Belgian military forces before independence and their replacement by indigenous forces and a UN training mission.

2. Although the Belgians originally indicated that they could accept this provision albeit reluctantly, they have now changed their minds and say it is unacceptable because it would lead to a mass exodus of civilians from the territory and make it more difficult to recruit civilian technicians. As a result of the Belgian position and because of misgivings of their own a number of Western countries led by the United States have also taken the position that they cannot support the Afro-Asian resolution as a whole if paragraph 3e remains unchanged. If, therefore, the resolution comes to a vote in its present form the following Western countries will abstain: United States, United Kingdom, Denmark, Netherlands, and probably Ireland, New Zealand and Sweden. Norway and Finland would still vote for the resolution.

3. Our present instructions to the Delegation are that they should vote for the resolution even if no changes are made. These instructions were based on the Delegation's own recommendations and were made at the time they thought the Belgians could accept the resolution unchanged. In view of the new situation the Delegation have asked whether their instructions could be made flexible enough to permit them to abstain along with the majority of other Western Delegations. Do you agree that the instructions may be changed in this way?

4. Even with the above abstentions, the resolution would of course obtain sufficient favourable voters to be adopted.<sup>82</sup>

16TH UNGA: RUANDA URUNDI

The Minister has spoken by telephone to Senator Brooks, Mr. Ritchie and Mr. Asselin this morning concerning the Canadian voting position on the Afro-Asian draft resolution. He had before him Candel telegram 319 of February 20.†

2. His voting instructions were as follows:

(1) On a paragraph by paragraph vote, the Delegation has discretion either to oppose or abstain on paragraph 3(e), although the Minister himself doubts the wisdom of voting against this paragraph as it would be generally construed as a vote in favour of the retention of Belgian forces in Ruanda Urundi after independence.

(2) On the resolution as a whole, the Delegation is authorized to abstain.

(3) The Delegation is to make an explanation of vote in respect of its stand on paragraph 3(e) and on the resolution as a whole, explaining the need, in the Canadian view, to avoid language which might lead to a U.N. military commitment in Ruanda Urundi similar to that which the U.N. was compelled to undertake in Congo as a result of the breakdown of law and order following independence. The Delegation is to stress the inability of the U.N., in terms of both manpower and finances, to take on another commitment of this magnitude.

RESUMED 16TH UNGA: RUANDA-URUNDI

Resolution on future of Ruanda-Urundi (text as amended given in our reference telegram) came before Plenary Friday afternoon February 23. It was adopted by 88 in favour (Canada) to none against, with 11 abstentions (Soviet Bloc plus Iraq). No repeat no roll call was taken in Plenary but apart from one additional vote in favour of resolution, result was identical to that in Committee. On this issue Cuba deserted Communist camp to vote for Afro-Asian resolution. 5th Committee recommendations on financial implications (A/509) were approved by 86 (Canada)-0-11.

2. Before vote in Plenary Soviet Representative (Morozov) complained that revised resolution adopted by 4th Committee was even worse than original draft. He attacked Belgium in violent language, expressed disappointment at Afro-Asian compromise and said USSR would abstain on these grounds:

(a) resolution allowed Belgian troops to remain in Ruanda-Urundi after independence;

(b) only Security Council had right to decide on question of military assistance to Ruanda-Urundi; and

(c) only if Security Council considered question could USSR "be tied by financial implications of resolution." Morozov even went so far as to assert that UN Secretariat intended to "organize" situation in Ruanda-Urundi in such a way that it would be to advantage of Belgium. This may have been intended as an oblique criticism of Secretary-General U Thant, whose pressure forced Afro-Asian co-sponsors to amend operative paragraph 3(e) and issue a revised resolution (L730/Rev1) on afternoon of February 21.

3. Spaak immediately took rostrum to reply to Soviet Representative. Speaking forcefully and earnestly, Belgian Foreign Minister said that Belgium's policy in Ruanda-Urundi was being attacked by a country which had been chased out of League of Nations and condemned for aggression. USSR, he went on, had left its troops in free and independent countries for years and had systematically refused to carry out all UN resolutions when they seemed to run counter to its interests. Truth was that USSR could not repeat not fail to hide its disappointment that a compromise had been reached without its participation, a compromise that ran counter to Soviet policy of fomenting chaos in Africa. In concluding, Spaak praised Afro-Asian delegations for efforts they had made to draft an honourable compromise. 4th Committee had given an example, during six difficult weeks of discussion, of will to understand and true UN spirit. Belgium would respond in kind. Spaak said compromise reflected in Afro-Asian resolution would be implemented with goodwill on part of Belgium. He hoped that when Assembly reconvened in June proof of this would be evident and this would be best answer to slanders of USSR. Spaak received a spontaneous ovation at conclusion of his statement.

4. Selection of five members of UN Commission for Ruanda-Urundi gave rise to some difficulty. It was agreed first of all by Afro-Asians that members of existing UN Commission (Haiti, Togo and Iran) should participate in expanded Commission. For remaining two seats there were three candidates (Morocco, Liberia and Ivory Coast), none of which would withdraw to produce an agreed slate. In order to ensure election of Ivory Coast, French Representative proposed in Plenary that number of members should be raised from five to six. Ghana and Guinea asked for a recess so that co-sponsors could consult on the amendment proposed by France. When Slim refused, insisting that voting had begun, Indian Representative raised question of additional financial commitment which would be involved if Commission were increased to six members. At this point, when it had become clear that his amendment was likely to reopen whole question of compromise embodied in resolution, French Representative withdrew his amendment. French move hurt chances of Ivory Coast (Ambassador Usher). When ballots for election of UN Commission were tabulated result was Togo 93, Iran 88, Liberia 67, Haiti 66, Morocco 64, Ivory Coast 53 and a scattering of votes for other candidates. Accordingly members of new Commission are Togo, Iran, Liberia, Haiti and Morocco. Individual representatives appointed by these States are expected to be Gassou (Togo), Rahnema (Iran), Miss Brooks (Liberia), Dorsinville (Haiti) and Skalli or Sidi Baba from Morocco.

5. Final moves to find an acceptable wording for operative paragraph 3(e) dealing with withdrawal of Belgian troops were made in morning and afternoon February 21. In morning U Thant met with key co-sponsors of Afro-Asian draft and made it very clear to them that UN could not repeat not hope to find personnel to replace all Belgian troops before independence, let alone finance such an operation. Japanese tell us that Secretary-General spoke very firmly and it was his personal intervention which compelled co-sponsors to find a compromise wording.

6. By afternoon February 21 compromise version of paragraph 3(e) had appeared as part of a revised draft resolution (L730/Rev1). It read as follows: "(e) Arrangements for training of indigenous forces with help of experts or a training mission provided by UN; and rapid withdrawal of Belgian military and paramilitary forces, to be completed before independence, with exception of such personnel whose retention in view of Commission, in consultation with authorities of Ruanda-Urundi and administering authority, may be considered necessary as an interim measure"; this was coupled with addition of a new sub(c) to operative paragraph 6 which read: "and (c) as to timetable for withdrawal of personnel, if any, retained as an interim measure under operative paragraph 3(e)";

7. New paragraph 3(e) was generally regarded as an improvement over Mexican revision of Irish-Swedish amendment (our telegram 324 February 20). Ireland and Sweden immediately withdrew their revised amendment and way was open for a quick vote. At this stage, however, Iraqi representative (Pachachi) protested new wording of paragraph 3(e) and withdrew his delegation's cosponsorship. It seems that after participating in meeting with U Thant, Pachachi drew up his own revision of paragraph, which was passed over by other co-sponsors in favour of text given above.

8. As overwhelming majority of Afro-Asians were not repeat not prepared to pander to Pachachi, they were ready to vote for revised draft and to support a motion for closure made by Bolivia. However Bingham (USA) decided that some clarification was needed of wording in operative paragraph 2 and objected to closure although he had been asked by Sweden not repeat not to do so since any further discussion would only reopen wording of crucial paragraph 3(e). Foolishly and unwisely, Bingham objected to closure; debate continued, and in an effort to meet Pachachi's objections India suggested inserting following words after "administering authority" in paragraph 3(e): "and without prejudice to sovereign rights of future independent Ruanda-Urundi and subject to latter's subsequent ratification." India then consulted with Ghana and Guinea and latter announced that this change had been accepted by co-sponsors. None of other 27 co-sponsors of Afro-Asian draft were consulted before this announcement was made and many of them were greatly annoyed, more so because addition did not repeat not in end secure Iraq's support. Change was mere verbiage, however, only stating obvious, and it made no repeat no difference to votes which Belgium, Afro-Asians and Western countries had already decided to cast on revised draft resolution.

9. Before voting in 4th Committee, which took place late in evening February 21, Cameroun Representative withdrew his amendments (L731). Soviet Representative tabled two revised amendments (L736/Rev1) to operative paragraphs 3(e) and 6. First Soviet amendment, to paragraph 3(e), was rejected by 45 (Canada) to 12 (Soviet bloc, Burma and Cuba) with 30 abstentions. Second, affecting paragraph 6, was rejected by 46 (Canada) to 13 with 27 abstentions. Previously another Soviet amendment (L734) had been rejected. This was designed to introduce a final preambular paragraph reading: "Considering that all Belgian military and paramilitary forces should be withdrawn from trust territory before Ruanda-Urundi attains independence." Vote on this amendment was 24 in favour (Soviet bloc, Burma, Cuba, Ghana, Guinea, India, Mali, Iraq, Ethiopia, Yugoslavia) 50 against (Canada, West Europe and Latins, Malaya, Iran, Ivory Coast, Japan, Pakistan, Syria, Sudan, Sierra Leone, Tanganyika) with 24 abstentions (remaining Afro-Asians).

10. USA amendments (L732), which were aimed at confining June resumed session to sole question of Ruanda-Urundi, passed handily since co-sponsors had agreed to accept them. They were supported by almost all Afro-Asians, vote being 80 (Canada) to 11 (Soviet bloc, Cuba) with 3 abstentions.

11. A Bulgarian request for voting by division on parts of resolution was rejected by an overwhelming vote and second revision of Afro-Asian draft (L730/Rev2) as amended by USA, finally came to a vote in 4th Committee at 11:00 pm on February 21. As reported earlier, resolution as a whole was adopted by 87 (Canada) to none, with 11 abstentions.

12. Result of debate on Ruanda-Urundi must be considered to be highly satisfactory in that over space of six weeks a compromise was finally found which Afro-Asians and Western countries could support, leaving Soviet bloc in isolation. Negotiations in Afro-Asian group were extremely difficult and protracted but on this occasion Afro-Asians as a whole must be given full credit for displaying patience and willingness to seek an agreed compromise acceptable to all responsible members of Assembly.

RUANDA-URUNDI: UN REQUEST FOR ASSISTANCE

We have received a request for assistance from UN Secretariat in connection with implementation of resolution on future of Ruanda-Urundi adopted by UNGA on February 23.

UN would be grateful if Canada could provide two French-speaking advisers in police field to go to Ruanda-Urundi for approximately six weeks to survey situation and prepare recommendations for the Commission on organization training and administration of indigenous police forces in territory. Advisers should be persons who have had experience in organizing and administering a police force.

2. El Haj of UN Office of Personnel said UN Secretariat believed two advisers should preferably come from one country and hoped very much that Canada could meet this request for assistance. If possible advisers should be in New York not later than March 12. Their mission would last from mid-March to June 1 when resumed session on Ruanda-Urundi begins.

3. Payment could be arranged in either of two ways: (a) advisers could obtain leave of absence from their department or police force and UN would then pay everything including expenses and salary, or (b) advisers could be detailed or seconded from their present duties in which case UN would pay subsistence and travel allowance and department or police force concerned would later bill UN for their salaries. On whole UN would prefer second arrangement.

4. Resolution in question asks Secretary-General to provide UN Commission for Ruanda-Urundi with experts and military observers for purposes envisaged in operative paragraphs 3(d), 3(e) and 4 of resolution. El Haj said that two police advisers requested from Canada would be sent to territory for purpose of advising on arrangements for maintenance of law and order by African police forces under paragraph 3(d) of resolution. Advisers in military field are being sought from other countries.

5. As you know much of discussion on Ruanda-Urundi at resumed session centred on need for making adequate preparations for maintaining law and order in territory after it attains independence probably on July 1. Accordingly UN places great importance on securing proper advisory personnel to assist UN Commission in carrying out tasks assigned to it. We hope therefore that it may be possible for Canada to meet present request.

6. We understand that Secretariat has already spoken informally to External Aid about this question. Accordingly if it is decided that Canada should endeavour to meet this request for two police advisers would you please let us know as soon as possible and also notify External Aid so that they can fill request.

RUANDA-URUNDI: UN REQUEST FOR ASSISTANCE

The Minister agreed yesterday that we should try to meet the Secretary-General's request for two police advisers to assist the Commission recently appointed by the Assembly to supervise the orderly accession of the trust territory of Ruanda-Urundi for independence.

2. We have now asked External Aid Office to follow up this matter with the RCMP with all possible despatch.

3. We take it that we are right in assuming that the UN Secretariat will keep directly in touch with External Aid Office regarding all arrangements connected with the police advisers' tour of duty in the territory.

Dear Mr. Robertson:

I received yesterday afternoon your letter of March 2, † concerning the request from the Secretary-General of the United Nations for two French speaking Canadians to act as advisers in Ruanda-Urundi in the police field. This request was telephoned to us some days ago, and I can advise that with the full cooperation of Commissioner Harvison it has been possible to secure the services for the required period of two R.C.M.P. personnel, who will proceed to Ruanda-Urundi as soon as the necessary administrative arrangements can be made.

Yours sincerely,

[Ottawa], May 26, 1962

RUANDA-URUNDI

The Sixteenth Session of the General Assembly will resume on June 7 to consider the future of the trust territory of Ruanda-Urundi.

2. You will recall that on February 23 the General Assembly approved a Fourth Committee resolution setting up a five-nation commission, headed by Miss Brooks of Liberia, to cooperate with the Belgian and local authorities in a programme designed to assist in preparing Ruanda-Urundi for independence. The programme included the reconciliation of various political factions, the return and resettlement of refugees, the maintenance of public order, and the training of indigenous forces so that Belgian troops (with certain exceptions to be agreed by the Commission in consultation with the Belgian and local governments) could be withdrawn before independence. In addition, the Commission was to convene (in Addis Ababa) a high-level conference of the governments of Ruanda and Urundi with a view to finding a mutually acceptable formula for the creation of the closest possible form of political, economic and administrative union. The Commission was to submit to the General Assembly before June 1 a progress report together with recommendations concerning: (a) the arrangements for the final transfer of power, and (b) the assistance which the United Nations could provide to deal with local, social and economic problems. The resolution envisaged the final date for independence as July 1, 1962, subject to the approval of the General Assembly in the light of the Commission's report.

3. Although the Commission has not yet submitted its report it seems likely on the basis of the information so far available that the main problems facing the General Assembly will be:

- (a) the provision of economic and technical assistance to the territories,
- (b) whether any Belgian troops will remain in the territories after independence and
- (c) whether the territories should become independent on July 1.

4. On the first question there seems no doubt that the two territories will require substantial financial and technical assistance for some years to come. (One estimate is that some 25 million dollars a year will be required to ensure economic stability.) The United States has informed the two local governments that they would not be prepared to underwrite a large bilateral assistance programme or support a large-scale UN technical assistance programme. (The reasons for this attitude are, first, that the State Department does not wish to give aid to Ruanda-Urundi on a scale which would be out of proportion to what they are giving other African states and, second, because they fear a large-scale UN programme might run into Congressional opposition.) The US would, however, be willing to support a modest UN assistance programme. The Belgians are willing to furnish technical and financial assistance provided they do not have to assume the whole burden and that adequate measures are taken to preserve law and order which in their view means the retention of some Belgian forces in the territories after independence.

5. The most difficult question will be how to ensure law and order after independence in view of the present inadequacy of the local gendarmerie. You will recall that at the NATO meeting in Athens Mr. Spaak said that if all Belgian troops were withdrawn before independence between two-thirds and three-quarters of the Belgian technicians would leave and his government would not, therefore, be able to implement its programme of technical assistance. The Belgians suggested to the UN Commission that they should keep on approximately 350 troops in each territory after independence. Meanwhile, however, the two local governments, under pressure from some members of the Commission, have informed the Commission that they do not wish Belgian troops to remain after independence. (On this point Ruanda was less categorical than Urundi and may be prepared to allow Belgian forces to phase their withdrawal over a period of some three months. In Urundi the Mwami (King) was willing to retain Belgian forces but the government refused.)

6. The Acting Secretary-General has made it clear that the UN has neither the men nor the money to undertake a police operation in Ruanda-Urundi. Yesterday he told Mr. Murray that as a matter of policy United Nations troops could not be placed at the disposal of the governments concerned because of the danger that the troops would be used to suppress political opposition in the two countries. He did say that a United Nations training unit of about 200, all ranks, could be installed in Ruanda and Urundi but they could not be used directly to deal with the security situation and they might be prevented from performing their training role effectively if internal security could not be maintained. U Thant is understood to favour retaining some Belgian troops in the territories after independence but he cannot, of course, take this position if the two local governments say they do not wish Belgian forces to remain.

7. As regards the date for independence, it is generally expected that the commission's report will either recommend the termination of the trusteeship agreement on the 1st of July, 1962, or make no recommendation at all, leaving it to the General Assembly to form its own judgement. In the latter event, it would be difficult for the General Assembly to postpone independence beyond July 1, 1962, even though there is a real danger of chaos and violence once the Belgians withdraw.

8. One other question concerns whether the territory should become independent as one state or two. During the debate last February a number of the African countries held strongly to the view that Ruanda and Urundi should form a political union. Although the UN Commission pressed this view on the two governments at the Addis Ababa conference the most the latter would accept was a customs and economic union. It seems evident, therefore, that the territory will become independent as two separate states.

9. It will be seen from what has been said above that the General Assembly is faced with a very difficult and complex problem in Ruanda-Urundi. Although the territories are clearly not ready for independence it would be very difficult for anyone to suggest a postponement at this late date. Similarly, if the governments of Ruanda and Urundi maintain their demand that Belgian troops withdraw, it will not be easy to find an alternative means of ensuring minimum security. Moreover, if all their forces withdraw it seems unlikely that the Belgians could provide the technical assistance, which, in the absence of large-scale UN assistance, is crucial to the future development of the country. In this situation it has been suggested that the best hope lies in some understanding between the governments of Ruanda and Urundi, the Belgian Government and Secretary-General U Thant which would enable a certain number of Belgian military personnel to remain after independence in the guise of training cadres under a United Nations technical assistance umbrella. However, in the light of the Secretary-General's stated view in paragraph 6 above there is some doubt whether he would accept such an arrangement.

10. Until the UN Commission's report is available it is difficult to prepare precise instructions for the Canadian Delegation. We should, however, give them some general idea of our views on (a) the date of independence and (b) the retention of Belgian troops after independence especially since it is possible the UN Commission will not make specific recommendations on these two key questions.

11. On the first point there seems little possibility that independence could be postponed for more than a few months and it is doubtful that the security situation in the territories would be any better at that time. Moreover, a postponement could lead to a further deterioration of relations between Belgian officials and the local governments, perhaps to the point where it would be impossible for any Belgian technicians to remain after independence.

12. It should perhaps be recognized that since Ruanda-Urundi is a trust territory the United Nations has a basic responsibility to see that it becomes independent in the most favourable circumstances. For this reason we agree on the desirability of a UN presence in Ruanda-Urundi.<sup>83</sup>

13. With reference to security arrangements the Secretary-General's ideas are restrictive of the UN's role but sound in principle. In any event we would not wish to support a proposal which would involve the UN in heavy expenditures such as, for example, a UN police operation in Ruanda-Urundi.

No. [H.C. Green]

14. These suggestions so far do not resolve the security problem which appears to require retention of some Belgian security forces with the consent of the two governments. We must hope that they can be persuaded to cooperate in this sense. At the same time we would not wish to take a position against Afro-Asian opinion whereby we would appear to insist on the presence of Belgian troops in the territory against the wishes of the local governments.<sup>84</sup>

15. If you agree, we would propose to send this memorandum to the Canadian Delegation for their guidance and for use in consultation with other delegations.<sup>85</sup>

The Minister has, at our request given further consideration to the rather categorical instructions he had issued on first reading the memorandum dated May 26, where he had indicated that because any U.N. involvement in Ruanda and Urundi after independence would quickly lead to a call for security forces, Canada should not support even a U.N. presence.

2. He has now agreed that we may support a U.N. presence, and specifically the 200 strong training cadre of which U Thant has spoken, although he maintains his position that Canada should oppose the creation of a U.N. Security Force on the Congo model.<sup>86</sup>

I believe that some Belgian troops will have to stay or else U.N. troops will have to go in and we cannot urge the latter. H.C. G[reen] 27/5

CANADIAN MILITARY OBSERVER IN RUANDA-URUNDI

Attached for your signature, if you agree, is a telegram asking our Permanent Mission in New York† to approach the U.N. Secretariat at a relatively high level in order to protest against the selection, without prior consultation with us, of a Canadian officer serving at ONUC Headquarters to act as Military Adviser in Ruanda-Urundi.

2. We have been told informally that this officer is a Major M. Kolesar. In March 1962, while serving in Leopoldville, he was asked by the U.N. Commander to accompany the U.N. Commission which, under the chairmanship of Miss Brooks of Liberia, was proceeding to investigate the situation in Ruanda-Urundi. One Indian and two Moroccan officers were also detached from ONUC Headquarters for that purpose. It is not clear to us what precise duties they were asked to perform in these territories but it is certain that they remained in the area after the departure of the Commission in order to be in a position to report on military developments. Insofar as we know, these officers are still there.

3. It is unusual that the Canadian Government was not informed officially of this change of duties. We are told that even the National Defence Headquarters were informed only indirectly, a few weeks after Major Kolesar's departure from Leopoldville, when a periodic report from the Canadian Commanding Officer in the Congo on the location of the Canadian personnel mentioned that this officer was serving in Ruanda-Urundi. This rather important development was not brought to the attention of this Department. The information given above was volunteered by a comparatively junior official of National Defence, in response to an informal enquiry.

4. The presence of a regular member of the Canadian forces in Ruanda-Urundi was first mentioned to us in New York's telegram 1056 of June 29.† In a previous telegram (1036 of June 27†) our mission had reported that U Thant was considering seeking approval of the Canadian authorities for the secondment of six Canadian officers from the U.N. forces in the Congo for this purpose. No official request along those lines has yet been received. If and when such a request comes about, it will have to be considered on its merits and the matter will be submitted to the Minister.

5. Meanwhile, we believe that the lack of previous consultation is a serious matter. When in 1960 we informed the UN that we would provide personnel to ONUC, it was mentioned specifically that the decision had been approved by the Parliament and the Government of Canada. Presumably the earmarking of this personnel for a different task would require prior approval by the Canadian Government only when Parliament is not in session.<sup>87</sup>

INSTRUCTIONS TO THE CANADIAN DELEGATION TO THE SEVENTEENTH SESSION OF THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY

The seventeenth session of the General Assembly will open on September 18. The provisional agenda lists 79 items and a few supplementary items can be expected before the Assembly convenes. Many of the items are recurring and some are routine. This memorandum deals with those which have important implications for Canadian policy at the United Nations.

General Remarks

2. The Assembly will face a situation of continuing uncertainty for the United Nations. It is still heavily committed in the Congo, both politically and financially, and much may depend on the present plans for bringing about national reconciliation in that country, which the leaders of Katanga and Central Congolese Governments have now both accepted. While there is no agenda item on the political situation, the 17th session will be required to provide for meeting the Congo expenses. The Acting Secretary-General, has been pressing for an early solution which will permit him to reduce the size and scope of the United Nations military operation in the Congo. His own future as executive head of the Secretariat may depend to some extent on whether this can be accomplished soon. If he decides to run, U Thant seems assured of full support, including that of the Soviet Union, for re-appointment for a five-year term.

3. During U Thant's visit to Moscow, it emerged that Mr. Khrushchev will not attend the opening of the Assembly but the possibility remains that he might visit the United Nations during the session. He apparently gave no indication to U Thant that the Soviet Union intends to raise the German and Berlin problems as a regular agenda item.

4. Some of the principal economic items relate to world trade and to the flow of capital and technical assistance to the developing countries. This pressure for increased assistance must be considered in relation to the heavy commitments which the United Nations is facing as a result of peace-keeping operations. Economic and financial questions will loom large this session.

5. The African-Asian majority will continue their pressure to accelerate the granting of independence to dependent peoples, particularly in Africa, and to eliminate racial discrimination. This may take the form of proposals for drastic measures, like diplomatic and economic sanctions and even the expulsion of states (South Africa and Portugal) whose policies have remained rigid in the face of past exhortations from the General Assembly. The British may be subjected to heavy pressure as well and they will be looking to their friends to assist them.

Admission of New Members

6. The Security Council has unanimously recommended the admission of Burundi and Rwanda and the applications of Jamaica and Trinidad will be considered in September. Others expected to apply shortly are Algeria, Kuwait (vetoed last year by the Soviet Union) and Uganda (becoming independent on October 9). Canada should support the admission of all states recommended by the Security Council and may co-sponsor Commonwealth applicants if this seems desirable.

Elections

7. For the Presidency, Canada will support Sir Zafrullah Khan of Pakistan, who appears to have a substantial edge over his opponent, Dr. Malalasekera of Ceylon. In accordance with the Assembly resolution on the composition of the General Committee, the Vice-Presidencies are likely to be by acclamation in favour of the following candidates: Australia, Belgium, Haiti, Colombia, Jordan, Sierra Leone, Malagasay (preferred over Guinea) and Czechoslovakia. The Chairmanships are following established pattern, although one candidate remains to be named: First Committee, Adeel (Sudan); Special Political Committee, Benites (Ecuador); Second Committee, Lewandowski (Poland); Fourth Committee, Avendano (Guatemala); Fifth Committee (Western Europe); Sixth Committee, Eustathiades (Greece). As for the appointment of Secretary-General, Canada should give U Thant full support.

8. The elections to the Security Council are complicated by the large number of candidates from the African-Asian group, including that of Nigeria which seeks the West European seat now occupied by Ireland. For this seat, Canada is committed to support Norway, whose prospects are reasonably bright, and to support Brazil as the candidate for the Latin American vacancy. The third seat, now occupied by the United Arab Republic, is being contested by a number of African and Asian candidates but of the main contenders, Morocco and Mauritania, the former probably has the best chance of being elected. Subject to further developments in relation to Nigeria's candidature, Canada should be prepared to support Morocco. As for the Economic and Social Council, the following seem assured of election: United Kingdom, Soviet Union, Austria, Argentina and Czechoslovakia. The sixth seat involves the re-election of Japan in competition with other Asian states (Afghanistan, Burma, Iraq and Nepal). Canada has pledged its support to Japan and should support the various candidates listed for the other five seats.

Representation of China

9. All the indications are that this subject will be discussed in much the same terms as it was at the 16th session. The United States is apparently relying on the resolution adopted then, requiring a two-thirds majority for any change in the representation of China. Canada should continue to support the Assembly decision to that effect and should vote against attempts to have communist China seated at the expense of Nationalist China.

Outer Space and Radiation

10. It is unlikely that much will be found in the report of the Outer Space Committee, which met during the summer, to attract special interest, although the spectacular new advances in the exploration of space may add a greater sense of urgency and importance to the General Assembly's consideration of this question. The hope is that the Committee, with the assistance of the Specialized Agencies involved, will produce a non-controversial report which can serve as the basis for constructive developments in the whole field, in accordance with the groundwork laid in the Assembly resolution of the 16th session. Canada should work toward this constructive end and oppose efforts, expected mainly from the Soviet Union, to inject into the debate propaganda issues such as high altitude testing and military reconnaissance in outer space. Canada should be fully associated with any move designed to stimulate the work of the Outer Space Committee.

11. On radiation, the Assembly will have before it the second comprehensive report of the United Nations Scientific Committee on the Effects of Atomic Radiation. Last year's resolution initiated by Canada also calls for a report by the World Meteorological Organization on the feasibility of establishing a world-wide system of reporting on radioactive fallout. If, for technical reasons, WMO is unable to submit this report to the 17th session, the Assembly will presumably wish to call for such a report at the earliest possible time. In view of the resumed testing since the last Assembly, Canada should work with like-minded states to encourage the maximum international action designed to keep a close watch on levels of radiation and the possible health hazard resulting therefrom.

Disarmament and Nuclear Tests

12. A recess in the work of the Eighteen-Nation Disarmament Committee having been decided, there is expected to be a full debate on disarmament at the 17th session of the General Assembly. The overriding concern of the Canadian Delegation should be to ensure that the disarmament debate is directed toward providing a clear endorsement by the Assembly for continuing negotiations in the Eighteen-Nation Committee. In supporting the desirability of early resumption of negotiations in Geneva, the Canadian Delegation should try to obtain the adoption of a general disarmament resolution which will give a renewed mandate to the Eighteen-Nation Committee and take account of suggestions made at the General Assembly. A draft of a resolution along these lines is now being considered by the Western delegations primarily concerned. Canadian Representatives should take the position, once a suitable draft has been worked out, that it will be essential to the success of the resolution to obtain the active support of as many delegations as possible, particularly among the uncommitted countries before going ahead with its formal submission.

13. On questions related to general disarmament, the United Nations agenda so far includes an item only on the convening of a special conference to sign a convention on the prohibition of the use of nuclear weapons. The Canadian Government's reply to the Acting Secretary-General's enquiry pursuant to the resolution on this subject adopted last year indicated that Canada did not consider it desirable to convene such a conference, since the problems concerned would best be dealt with in the Eighteen Nation Committee. With regard to other special questions, such as the prohibition of the wider spread of nuclear weapons and "denuclearized zones," the Delegation should seek instructions from Ottawa when the specific terms of proposals which may be put forward in these fields are known.

14. Canadian opposition to all forms of nuclear weapons testing has been maintained at past General Assemblies and in the Eighteen-Nation Disarmament Committee. In addition, Canada has recognized the need for an effective and binding international agreement in this field, and has urged the nuclear powers to reach a satisfactory compromise on the problem of inspection which remains the major cause of disagreement. India has submitted an item which suggests by its wording that a resolution may be introduced calling for the suspension of all nuclear weapons tests pending the achievement of a binding international agreement. Canada voted in favour of a similar resolution at last year's session. The Delegation should request further instructions when draft resolutions in this field have been submitted.

African Questions

15. The perennial South African items, in particular apartheid, raise the possibility of renewed pressure from the African members for diplomatic and economic sanctions against South Africa and even of its expulsion from the United Nations. Undoubtedly the main effort for the Western powers will be to exercise the maximum moderating influence in order to head off proposals for drastic action. As in the past, while leaving no doubt about Canada's complete disapproval of apartheid policies, the Canadian Delegation should oppose moves to expel South Africa from the United Nations and should not support proposals for other kinds of sanctions. On the question of South West Africa, other considerations might be relevant if the International Court should rule against South Africa in connection with its administration of the mandate. The Court's ruling is not expected before 1963, however, and if possible the Africans should be restrained from any action which would prejudice the outcome.

16. Similar pressure may be exerted on Portugal because of its repeated refusal to heed past Assembly resolutions. There has been little sign of any real change in the rigid policies applied in the Portuguese territories in Africa. While it may be difficult to contain African pressure for stringent measures, the Canadian Delegation should use its influence in favour of moderation and counsel against proposals which can only result in the hardening of international attitudes and increase tensions locally. The expulsion of Portugal should be opposed.

17. The recommendations of the Special Committee of Seventeen (established to watch over the implementation of the Assembly Declaration on colonialism) particularly those concerning British administered territories, may well lead to protracted debate and demands for accelerated decolonization. British Guiana, the High Commission territories, Zanzibar, the Rhodesias and Nyasaland are cases in point. Because of uncertainty about the action to be proposed at the 17th session, the Canadian Delegation will be required to seek detailed instructions on these various questions as they arise. In general, the Delegation should try to assist the British in persuading African-Asians to be moderate in their approach to the delicate and difficult situations in the territories concerned.

Soviet Imperialism

18. Canada is approaching some twenty or more countries, representing moderate opinion in the main geographical areas, to have their reactions to a working draft resolution on this subject. The suggested tactics are to introduce this resolution at the appropriate time in the plenary debate on colonialism. Although it may be regarded as a diversion by some African-Asians and as a cold war move by others, and although counter-attacks can be expected regarding the position of Canadian minorities, the Canadian intention is primarily to expose the false claim of the Soviet Union to be the champion of freedom and self-determination for subject people. The resolution and the tactics may be modified once reactions of other governments become known. While sympathizing with Canadian aims, many governments have expressed doubts about proceeding by resolution in the absence of assured support of its adoption. The Delegation should continue to explore the various possibilities carefully and seek further instructions on the exact nature of the move.

Economic Questions

19. At previous sessions of the General Assembly, the Canadian Delegation has been able to take useful initiatives in the Second Committee, because Canada has been in a position to back up such initiatives with financial support. This year, however, owing to the Canadian budgetary position, it seems unlikely that Canada will be able to make any additional funds available for United Nations programmes in the months ahead. Consequently, the Delegation should not take any initiatives which are likely to involve additional or new commitments for Canada. The Canadian Delegation can, however, play a constructive role in the Second Committee by trying to ensure that such initiatives as are taken by other countries are realistic and useful.

20. The Second Committee will be concerned with trade and aid with the emphasis probably on the former. In the aid field, the Delegation should continue, with likeminded donor countries, to refuse to support proposals for the channelling of capital aid through the United Nations. Concrete proposals for the United Nations Development Decade may also be advanced. On the trade side, it now seems likely that the major concern will be to carry forward proposals initiated at earlier sessions and subsequently discussed by other United Nations bodies: for example, an international trade conference; commodity problems and compensatory financing. The Delegation should follow these questions closely with a view to seeking further instructions made when more information is available on the implications of the various proposals.

21. There is an item on the provisional agenda dealing with population growth, and there are indications that the Second Committee may give increasing attention to this important question and its impact on economic development of less-developed countries. The Delegation should keep in close touch with Ottawa on this matter.

Social Questions

22. The most difficult items in the Third Committee may be the draft international covenants on human rights, the Convention on Freedom of Information and the Report of the High Commissioner for Refugees. The debates on the first two will probably revolve around efforts by the Soviet bloc and non-aligned delegations to impose restrictive provisions of the appropriate instruments. Western powers, including Canada, may find it difficult to prevent moves of this kind and, in seeking to do so, they should press in unequivocal terms the case for maximum freedom in relation to human rights and rights of expression, assembly and an unfettered press.

23. As regards the renewed mandate of the High Commissioner for Refugees, efforts may be made, particularly by the Africans, to enlarge the High Commissioner's responsibility for refugees in other parts of the world than Europe. This could involve increased financial commitment which the main contributing countries would be unwilling to bear. For this reason, it is desirable to confine the new mandate as far as possible to activities which the High Commissioner has pursued in the past, mainly to allow him to use his good offices in dealing with non-European refugee problems. Canada is consulting with the other contributing countries and with the High Commissioner with a view to submitting an appropriate resolution defining the new mandate in that sense. If sufficient support is forthcoming, this initiative should be pursued.

United Nations Financing

24. The main problem will be related to the International Court's advisory opinion concerning Congo and UNEF expenses; the bond issue, with particular reference to repayment through the regular budget; and the continuing financial crisis resulting mainly from the heavy costs in the Congo. As well, there is likely to be a sharp argument with the Soviet Union about its regular assessment which was recently increased. Canada, working with like-minded states, should make strenuous efforts at the 17th session to ensure that the Court's advisory opinion is strongly endorsed in order to provide firm political ground for methods of financing peace-keeping operations on a basis of collective responsibility and for exerting pressure on member states in default of their assessed contributions. In particular, Soviet bloc attempts to avoid their financial responsibilities should be firmly resisted. Any proposals involving substantial increase in Canada's contributions should be referred to Ottawa for further instructions.

Legal Questions

25. The Soviet bloc is expected to seek support mainly from the African-Asians for its promotion of new standards of international law. They are advocating that friendly relations and co-operation among states should be regulated on the basis of peaceful co-existence and the termination of colonialism. Their aim is clearly to make political capital as well as to upset established concepts of international law. The Western powers will be required to meet this challenge firmly. Canada has been consulting with close friends about the tactics for dealing with the Soviet threat. The Canadian Delegation should participate fully in efforts to maintain established principles of international law.<sup>88</sup>

SOVIET COLONIALISM AT THE UNITED NATIONS

There has been increasing interest in this subject since the Prime Minister's speech in Toronto to an audience representing the ethnic groups.<sup>89</sup> Some Missions have begun to comment on the possibility that Canada would show a more active interest in the matter at the 17th session of the General Assembly and might introduce a draft resolution, if there appeared to be sufficient support for such a move. There has been other correspondence with organizations in Canada, through which the ethnic groups usually express their point of view.

2. For the time being, the planning of any United Nations initiative in this regard will be largely a matter of tactics. We shall be required to consult with some of our close friends about the possibility and to consider among other things whether the question of Soviet colonialism should be raised under a general item on colonialism or under a separate item. Initially, there should be a position paper re-examining all the relevant factors.

3. African and Middle Eastern Division, European Division and United Nations Division are concerned with this subject. After consulting with them and with Mr. Robinson, I am recommending that, for the time being at least, the subject should be dealt with by United Nations Division which will initiate action and co-ordinate the views of others. Later on, it may be desirable to modify this arrangement. If you agree with the recommendation, I shall make arrangements to have the correspondence and other documents routed to United Nations Division for action.<sup>90</sup>

CONFIDENTIAL

Cairo, December 26, 1961

WESTERN OFFENSIVE AGAINST SOVIET COLONIALISM

I have read the notes for the Prime Minister's speech in Toronto on November 22 with very great interest. Since the subject of Soviet colonialism is one with which I have been preoccupied for many years, perhaps a few comments might be permitted.

2. First, I think it is high time we stopped letting the Russians get away with the impression that they are the greatest champions of the independence and freedom of colonial peoples. In the past, perhaps, there was something to be said for avoiding raising a new issue between Moscow and the West if there was a chance of improving relations. But since the Russians are determined to push their anti-Western, anti-colonial policy, and will continue to do so even if a détente is worked out in Europe, I see no reason why we should not hit back at any weak spot in the Soviet body politic. As the East-West struggle becomes more and more concentrated in Asia and Africa, it becomes increasingly important for us to go over to the offensive against the Russians on the issue of colonialism. But to do this we must be absolutely sure of our ground.

3. The two superficially weak spots in the Western case are (a) the fact that the former colonial countries of Africa and Asia are obviously not interested in Soviet domination of other European peoples and do not consider this colonialism properly speaking; and (b) the difficulty in presenting the case for the freedom of the non-Russian subject peoples when Moscow can always claim they are freely constituted members of the Soviet "commonwealth," and very few legitimate free representatives of these peoples still exist and can present a valid case against the U.S.S.R.

4. With regard to the first point, I think we should make a clear distinction between the European expansionism of the U.S.S.R. and its colonial domination of Asian and Caucasian peoples. In order to make a more effective attack in the U.N. and to gain the sympathies of the large Afro-Asian bloc, I suggest that the attack on Soviet European imperialism should take the form of a formal challenging of the credentials of the Ukraine and Byelorussia.

I agree. G. I[ggnatieff]
Agreed. [N.A.] R[obertson] 22.12.61

5. These two “countries” were admitted to the U.N. in San Francisco because of the tactics of Molotov who, if I remember correctly, traded them against the admission of Argentina; and because of a feeling that the U.S.S.R. was distinctly outnumbered in the U.N. at that time, and perhaps deserved a couple of extra votes. However, the U.S.S.R. is no longer outnumbered and I think it is time we insisted either that the Ukraine and Byelorussia demonstrate some of the attributes of sovereign statehood, or be expelled from the organization. In this connection it might be possible to turn back on the Russians some of the arguments they have used in vetoing the application of Kuwait, for example. There might be a danger of the U.S.S.R. then pressing for the expulsion of Nationalist China, but the cases are sufficiently different not to deter us, particularly as the anti-Formosa campaign is going to be exploited anyway.

6. It is in this context that we could make most effectively our onslaught on Great Russian domination of the Ukraine, Moldavia, Byelorussia and the Baltic states. I have not seen any reaction from the U.S.S.R. as yet to the Prime Minister’s speech, but I recall noting in November last year the violent reaction in the Ukraine to Mr. Diefenbaker’s speech in the U.N. General Assembly in October, 1960.<sup>91</sup> This reaction (reported in the Neue Züricher Zeitung of November 20, 1960) showed that possibilities do exist for putting the U.S.S.R. on the defensive by well-publicised criticism of Soviet rule, and that the Russians are highly sensitive about these problems.

7. To pass to the question of Soviet colonialism in the Caucasus and Asia, I have for years thought that we were neglecting an obvious chance of putting the Russians off balance and countering their championship of Afro-Asian colonial peoples by not trying to focus attention on Soviet colonialism in these areas. The Afro-Asians do not care one iota what happens to the Letts, the Ukrainians and other “whites.” They only consider colonialism in the context of the exploitation of non-European peoples by Europeans. And they have failed, most of them, to apply the lesson to Soviet Central Asia and the Caucasus because, first, they have been hypnotised<sup>92</sup> into thinking of the Western powers alone as colonialists; second, because of the association of colonialism with territories removed by sea from the “exploiting” country; and third, because of clever Soviet propaganda which has taken advantage of these tendencies and played on the pro-Soviet sentiment of most Afro-Asian intellectuals.

8. In this connection, I remember often in Moscow being mystified by the way Asians would visit Tashkent and Alma-Ata and return full of praise. Full of praise, of course, for the material progress, the kind of material progress which Britain brought to India and France to Algeria. Bemused, I suppose, by the myth of Soviet communism, and usually leftist-inclined, these Asians seemed oblivious to the fact that Central Asian culture had almost been extinguished except as a kind of tourist attraction, the ancient social system destroyed, the language disappearing, and the religion discarded. The individual Turkman or Uzbek is possibly better off materially than his father, but he has to all intents and purposes become a Russian, and even then he very seldom succeeds in reaching a top job in his own country.

This is presumably a reference to a speech Diefenbaker made in late September, not October, 1960. See United Nations, Official Records of the General Assembly, Fifteenth Session, 871st Plenary Meeting, 26 September 1960, UN Doc A/PV.871, pp. 108-112, <http://documents.un.org/>.

Most of them experienced it first hand ! [Auteur inconnu/Author unknown]

9. These are precisely the complaints of the Africans and Asians against Western colonialism. "Better starve in liberty..." etc., as Sekou Touré says. Is it not possible for us to turn this against the Russians, to make the Asians and Africans realize what utter hypocrisy the Russians have used? I fail to see any basic difference between French action in Algeria and Russian action in Central Asia except that the Russians, by their ruthless suppression of the local culture, religion and social systems, have been more successful in stamping out opposition.

10. And then, there is now in addition the problem of Soviet-Chinese relations, and the eventual struggle for Central Asia. There has always been a strong Soviet-Chinese rivalry for the allegiance of the Mongul and Turkish peoples of Central Asia. In present circumstances I suspect this could flare up again at any time. Just the threat of a real attack on Soviet colonialism in Central Asia would in my opinion be a strong trump card in our hand.

11. The Russians will, of course, reply either that questioning of the legitimacy of Soviet rule is interference in Soviet internal affairs, or else that the Asian and Caucasian republics are freely associated with Moscow. In both cases I think we could use many of the arguments advanced in the U.N. against the Portuguese, the argument that their colonies are integral parts of Portugal. If we are not prepared to accept the word of the Portuguese as to what are, or are not, parts of their metropolitan territory, then why should we accept the Russian word. And in addition Portugal has owned its colonies far longer than the Russians their colonies, acquired mostly in the nineteenth century.

12. I do not suppose we could accomplish much at the first go at this, but if we kept it up year after year, we might in the end succeed (a) in countering some at least of Soviet anti-colonial propaganda and dispelling the image in Africa and Asia of the U.S.S.R. as the great champion of colonial rights; and (b) throwing the Russians off-balance and gaining at least some measure of the offensive in the U.N. I think the most effective way to do this would be in the context of future debates on the subject of the granting of independence to colonial countries and peoples.

13. But our case would have to be carefully prepared and documented, and we might have to be ready to withstand Soviet counter-attacks. This will be easier, and our propaganda advantage will be greater if we make a clear distinction between the Soviet colonial empire in Asia and the Caucasus, and the problem of domination of Eastern Europe.

14. I should be grateful for your comments on these suggestions.

UNITED NATIONS GENERAL ASSEMBLY
SOVIET COLONIALISM

In your speech to the ethnic groups on November 22 you indicated that a resolution on Soviet colonialism might be put forward at the seventeenth session of the General Assembly if there were sufficient international support for it. If you agree, letters similar to the attached draft† will now be sent to our Missions in Washington, London and Paris. Once we have reactions from those capitals we shall be in a better position to assess the prospects for a Canadian initiative, for none could succeed in this field without their active support. Each is capable of influencing significant voting strength when willing to make the effort.

2. Even with vigorous assistance from the three major Western powers it is not certain that the necessary two-thirds majority could be obtained to focus public attention specifically on Soviet colonialism. It is even more doubtful that a condemnatory resolution, or one asking for investigation by, say, the Committee of Seventeen could be forced through the Assembly.

3. This is so because Soviet colonialism is not a reality for those 51 out of 104 members of the United Nations which belong to the African-Asian group. They are pre-occupied in a very single-minded way with the racial connotations of white ascendancy over coloured peoples, of which they have had recent and sometimes bitter experience.

4. Moreover, African and Asian members value Soviet bloc support for their anti-colonial resolutions and they are most reluctant to do anything that would jeopardize this. They are especially wary of assuming positions in what they regard as "cold war" issues.

5. However justifiable it would be to expose the U.S.S.R., a number of members would feel this to be an exacerbation of tensions within the Organization. Many would also fear that a move against the Soviet Union would open nearly every other member to comparable criticism. (A Canadian initiative could, for example, provoke a rebuttal aimed at exploiting the position of our Indians and Eskimos and the existence of a secessionist minority in Quebec.)

6. Of those prepared to join in exposing Soviet colonialism, some would no doubt insist on drawing a distinction between Eastern European satellites, like Poland, and parts of the Soviet Union of states, like the Ukraine. Others might be willing to consider only the cases of Latvia, Lithuania and Estonia.

7. The Assembly of Captive European Nations has suggested in its letter of December 18 that it may be desirable to focus attention on Soviet colonialism whether or not a formal proposal were ultimately to suffer defeat. The people in the Eastern European countries and the minorities within the Soviet Union itself would no doubt take heart if they were to learn that their plight had not been forgotten in the United Nations. It would also be of value if the balance of the debate in the United Nations could be more evenly struck between the shortcomings of our Western "friends" and those of their Eastern "accusers."

8. On the other hand, a sharp defeat of a deliberate move against the U.S.S.R. would be a grim disappointment to the "captive" peoples. Moreover, it might be interpreted in the United Nations as absolving the U.S.S.R. from all blame. Such a result would be especially regrettable if it were to lead to further public disillusionment in the U.S.A. and the United Kingdom about the efficacy of the United Nations.

9. Considerations such as these suggest that, as a first step, we should obtain the views of London, Washington and Paris.<sup>93</sup> We need to know whether they would actively support a Canadian initiative. It would also be valuable to have their judgements on the chances of such an exercise carrying a desirable degree of support in the United Nations.

DESPATCH NO. V-226
CONFIDENTIAL

[Ottawa], February 20, 1962

UNITED NATIONS GENERAL ASSEMBLY – SOVIET COLONIALISM

On November 22 the Prime Minister indicated to a Toronto meeting of ethnic groups that he hoped that “the Canadian Government can through consultation secure sufficient international support to bring about United Nations considerations of Soviet colonialism at the next session of the Assembly.” He said that he had been considering “proposing a resolution in the United Nations in condemnation of Soviet communist enslavement of many nations and peoples.”

2. For your background information we are enclosing the following Annexes:†

- (1) Press Release giving the partial notes used by the Prime Minister on November 22.
- (2) General Assembly Resolution 1514 (XV) “Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples.”
3. General Assembly Resolution adopted on November 27, 1961 to set up a Committee of Seventeen to examine into the application of the above declaration.
- (4) General Assembly Document A/4985 of November 25 – United States comments on Soviet colonialism.
- (5) President Kennedy’s references to Soviet colonialism.
- (6) Similar comments by United States spokesman in the General Assembly.
- (7) Similar comments by United Kingdom spokesmen.

3. Our examination of the prospects open for a Canadian initiative on Soviet colonialism indicate that the following factors might militate against a two-thirds vote in support of a condemnatory resolution:

(a) so far as the vast majority of the African and Asian countries are concerned there is only one type of colonialism of any interest, namely, where white races have dominated coloured peoples;

Prime Minister approves. H.B. R[obinson] Feb. 16/62.

(b) although most African-Asian members recognize Soviet hypocrisy for what it is, all members of that group nevertheless cherish Soviet support for their own anti-colonial manoeuvres;

(c) most Africans and Asians, and indeed possibly other members of the United Nations, might suspect that an attack on Soviet colonialism was at worst an attempt to divert attention away from traditional colonialism, and at best a “cold-war” exercise not likely to affect the fate of the “captive peoples” in the Soviet orbit;

(d) Khrushchev’s claim, for example, in a radio broadcast of April 5, 1958 that “the people of East Europe have already solved this problem. They are masters of their own household. They will not allow anyone to interfere in their internal affairs” seems to have gained wide acceptance;<sup>94</sup>

(e) although there is a tendency for the Assembly to overlook Article 2(7) where classical colonialism is concerned, its provisions are jealously respected when the immunity of essentially domestic matters is raised in other contexts;

(f) it is also possible that an attack on Soviet colonialism would be resisted on the grounds of paragraph 6 of Resolution 1514 (XV) which says, “any attempt aimed at the partial or total disruption of the national unity or territorial integrity of a country is incompatible with the purposes and principles of the Charter of the United Nations”;

(g) no doubt continued domination of the three Baltic states would be more readily recognized as offensive to the United Nations than would be either the position of members of the Soviet Union of states, like the Ukraine and Byelorussia or Eastern satellites, like Poland and Czechoslovakia, which are members of the United Nations in their own right;

(h) even some countries, although sharing a belief that it would be useful to uncover Soviet colonialism to public scrutiny, might be wary of joining in such an exercise for fear that they might themselves be open to criticism. (For example, the position of Canadian Indians and Eskimos and the existence of a secessionist minority in Quebec could be misrepresented in the debate.)

4. Factors such as the above undoubtedly could add up to a formidable form of resistance to any move against the Soviet Union. Nevertheless, we strongly believe that it is very unhealthy for the United Nations to shrink from exposing Soviet hypocrisy in respect of colonialism. We suspect that several other countries share this conviction. The Prime Minister’s forceful speech exposing the Soviet situation was well received at the fifteenth Assembly. Several speakers at the sixteenth session also drew attention to the anomalies in the Soviet position. A concerted campaign by interested countries might succeed in persuading a broad group of members that objective truth, the future prestige of the Organization and the welfare of oppressed peoples everywhere are powerful arguments in favour of exposing Soviet colonialism. The objective would be both to have great emphasis in the debate laid on the evils in the Soviet system and, if possible, to have sufficient support for tabling a carefully worded resolution to bring the Soviet empire within the competence of the Committee of Seventeen.

5. The terms of the resolution containing the declaration on the independence of colonial peoples, which speaks not only of Trust and Non-Self-Governing territories but also of “all other territories which have not yet attained independence,” has opened the Soviet Empire to scrutiny in a manner that was not foreseen when the Charter provisions on Non-Self-Governing and Trust territories were drafted. In view of the Soviet part in pushing for a resolution of maximum embarrassment to Western countries, even those of our friends with respectable colonial records, it would be only just if this resolution could in fact be made to work against the Soviet system of colonialism.

6. In our opinion there would be merit in pressing for formal recognition that the turn of the Soviet Empire has come even if a two-thirds majority in favour could not be obtained straight away. Constant application of pressure on the Soviet Union in the Assemblies ahead, while classical colonialism continues to disappear, might eventually lead to a vigorous United Nations stand against the Soviet system. On the other hand, a resounding defeat of a move against the Soviet Union could have very unfortunate repercussions. The hopes that the initiation of an anti-Soviet move would raise among "captive" peoples might be bitterly disappointed. Moreover, a sharp rebuff of a concerted and formal attempt to condemn the Soviet Union's colonialism could be interpreted as absolving the U.S.S.R. from reproach. Such a result would undoubtedly irritate public opinion in many countries, particularly in the U.S.A. and the United Kingdom, and could lead to grave weakening in public support for the Organization.

7. Since we consider that no formal proposal in regard to Soviet colonialism could succeed without the strong and active backing of the United States, the United Kingdom and France, we are anxious for our Missions in the capitals of those countries to take this matter up as a matter of some urgency. We would wish to know whether these three countries were prepared to support Canada vigorously if a Canadian move were pursued. It would also be helpful to know how officials in those capitals assess the prospects of obtaining a worthwhile degree of support for a resolution (a) focusing attention on Soviet colonialism and (b) bringing it within the competence of the Committee of Seventeen.

8. Finally, we should also welcome their views on how best to seek to broaden the international support for any initiative it is desirable to take at the seventeenth session. The Assembly of Captive European Nations, the headquarters of which is in New York, has suggested in a letter to the Prime Minister that we take soundings from the following governments:

Latin America: Chile, Colombia, Guatemala, Peru

Europe: Cyprus, France, Ireland, Luxembourg, the Netherlands

Asia : Philippines, Malaya, Thailand

Africa : Cameroun, Madagascar

We think it would also be desirable at an early stage to consult the Scandinavian countries (Iceland, Norway, Sweden and Denmark), as well as New Zealand, Australia, India, Ceylon, Pakistan, Japan, Argentina, Brazil, Mexico and perhaps even Tunisia. However, before approaching any of these countries we think we must have the reactions from London, Washington and Paris and we hope that our missions in those capitals will be able to reply at an early date.

9. In addition to sending this letter to several Missions for their information, we would ask our Permanent Mission in New York to report on the likely reactions of key delegations in the General Assembly to a determined bid to put Soviet colonialism in the United Nations dock. In this context we have been impressed by a thought-provoking article entitled "Close-Up of the Afro-Asian Bloc," which appeared in the New York Times Sunday Magazine section of December 17, 1961, over the name of Jane Kruger Rosen.

[Ottawa], April 27, 1962

UNITED NATIONS GENERAL ASSEMBLY – SOVIET COLONIALISM

In accordance with the steps outlined in the Minister's memorandum of February 14, consultations have taken place with United States, United Kingdom and French officials in New York, Washington, London and Paris. The three countries agree with the Canadian view that it would be useful to mount in the United Nations a campaign against Soviet colonialism. While General de Gaulle's indifference to the United Nations may prevent French co-operation from being fully effective, and while the United Kingdom's special problems in the colonial field will colour the stand taken by that country, our three major allies should be prepared to lend their support to a carefully staged move to focus United Nations attention on the Soviet domination of subject people.

2. None of the three, and more particularly the United States which has independently studied the matter thoroughly, is yet in a position to endorse the tabling of specific proposals as early as the seventeenth session next September. The fear is that not only such specific proposals, but also a request for a special agenda item under which to consider them, might not receive at this time a desirable measure of support from African and Asian states for reasons familiar to you. The United States and the United Kingdom are concerned to keep the Special Committee of Seventeen on colonialism engaged in a reasonable role of assisting in the transition to independence for existing colonies in Africa and Asia. (That Committee was set up to examine into the implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples, Resolutions 1514(XV) and 1654(XVI).) Understandably all three of our partners would wish to be able to tie the timing and formulation of any specific resolution on Soviet imperialism to their tactical positions at any given moment, to the current status of Western negotiations with the Soviet Bloc and to other initiatives that might be contemplated. Each has also drawn distinctions between Eastern European states and subject territories of the USSR, like the Baltic countries, as well as between the latter and the subject peoples in Soviet Central Asia.

3. We are continuing to explore with the United Kingdom, the United States and France how best to proceed. The next step will be to ascertain which additional United Nations members might most usefully be brought into the consultations. The aim is to arrive at sound recommendations as to the relative advantages and disadvantages of seeking to focus United Nations attention on the question of Soviet colonialism:

- (a) by a resolution condemning Soviet imperialism for what it really is,
- (b) by a more subtle resolution asking the Committee of Seventeen, in effect, to examine whether Soviet colonialism should come within its mandate and the non-self-governing territories provisions of the Charter, or
- (c) by concentrating the approach in the immediate future on a campaign of speeches and documents designed to condition African, Asian and Latin American opinion to support, in due course, a more formal move against the USSR.

4. The United Kingdom sees some possibilities along the lines of (b), but generally seems to favour the more cautious United States view that for the time being it may be necessary to follow course (c). In this latter regard the United States has already inaugurated a concerted programme of education in many countries and will consider circulating at the seventeenth session a further statement of its views on Soviet colonialism similar to that which it circulated at the last session.

5. United Kingdom officials have raised a further tentative suggestion that complaints and petitions to the United Nations from recent refugees from Russian colonial areas might be stimulated by the West. It is recognized that the only likely source of this is the Baltic states. While it is true that this might help to paint a "shameful" picture of Soviet colonialism, it is a line of action that would need to be weighed carefully. United States officials have pointed out, for example, the domestic political repercussions that could follow if the approach were directed at any one specific example of Soviet imperialism.

6. This summary of development thus far may be helpful, if this subject should be raised during the course of Prime Minister Macmillan's visit.

SOVIET COLONIALISM

During past few days Khrushchev and Kuznetsov (First Deputy Foreign Minister) have made references in conversation with me to Prime Minister's charges against Soviet colonialism. Khrushchev's reference was casual and almost jocular, but Kuznetsov spoke about them at some length and rather seriously.

2. Khrushchev's remarks were made to me at reception by President of Mali, Modibo Keita, after latter had made rather extreme speech proposing toast to "victory of socialist camp over camp of imperialists and capitalists." I mentioned to my British and American colleagues that I did not repeat not intend to drink that particular toast, and we three laid our glasses on table. This was done unobtrusively and noticed only by Khrushchev, who came over to me and said teasingly that "apparently colonialists do not repeat not like drinking that toast." I asked him what colonies he thought Canada had. He conceded I had a point there but said that nevertheless Canada supported colonialists. Khrushchev then grinned happily and said "But Prime Minister Diefenbaker even accuses me of being colonialist myself." Khrushchev seemed in high good humour and immediately added that he would not repeat not argue this point now. He then called for small tray of glasses and proposed private toast to each other's health, which he drank with Thompson, Roberts and myself.

3. A few minutes later Khrushchev made speech into microphone roundly condemning colonialism in general, and in Africa in particular, and asserting inevitability that its last vestiges would soon be removed and that within unpredictable but not repeat not very long period now Communism too would inevitably be everywhere triumphant. As not repeat not infrequently happens Khrushchev got increasingly worked up during course of this extempore speech, and made some rather extreme assertions along lines of old-fashioned Marxist dogma. Press report of speech was toned down.

4. I saw Kuznetsov on Tuesday to make representations on behalf of would-be emigrants to Canada. After discussing this question, and also my request that USSR cease discriminating against Canada in refusing our request for telex communications facilities (I am reporting separately on this), we spent an additional hour in general tour d'horizon. Much of the time Kuznetsov sounded regrettably like Pravda and Izvestia editorials and said little that was noteworthy. He seemed more interested in putting blame on USA for deterioration and tension in international situation than in discussing any possible way forward out of the difficulties (other than through Canada and other countries loosening ties with USA and supporting Soviet proposals on disarmament and other questions). He spoke about danger of American nuclear and particularly high altitude testing. He spoke of American aggressiveness, as evidenced in Kennedy's now famous statement to Alsop,<sup>95</sup> but then proceeded to take line that though Kennedy does not repeat not talk about rolling Communism back, as Eisenhower had done, Canada now seems to be advocating this line on America's behalf. He claimed that Prime Minister's charges against Soviet colonialism, and Prime Minister's announced idea of introducing resolution on subject in UN, fitted in to general American campaign about possible need to take nuclear initiative. Kuznetsov added that Prime Minister spoke explicitly about "destroying Communism." I made obvious point to Kuznetsov that Canadian views on Soviet colonialism were based on well known fact of denial of right of self determination to various peoples in Eastern Europe, following from Stalin's postwar policy. I added that I personally thought that Western charges should be understood in Moscow in light of repeated Soviet attacks and charges against Anglo-Saxon and Western colonialism, made despite rapid devolution of former Western empires toward voluntarily negotiated national independence. This contrasted very markedly with situation in Communist empire, and Soviet charges struck Westerners as hypocritical propaganda. At same time I said it would be in my judgment ridiculous for Kuznetsov to think that there was any Canadian or indeed any Western plan to roll back Communism from Eastern Europe. We considered that peoples of Eastern Europe would continue to demand and would eventually obtain increasing national freedom and self determination. But there was no repeat no Western intention to intervene in internal affairs of Eastern Europe.

6. Kuznetsov reiterated that Prime Minister had referred to destruction of Communism. He could not repeat not give me exact reference to which he was referring, but took line that inevitably such suggestions from Canadian government leaders looked ominous in Soviet eyes, and had to be seen in conjunction with American and general Western policy.

7. Kuznetsov also made standard Soviet propaganda point that if Canadian government were really interested in national liberation we should liberate our own people from American economic domination.

8. I might add that two junior members of Foreign Ministry have also recently raised with members of Canadian and Australian embassies, Prime Minister Diefenbaker's remarks on Soviet colonialism. Remarks have obviously disturbed Russians and it would appear that Foreign Ministry officials are being encouraged to raise subject with Canadians and even others. I doubt whether Soviet leaders really believe there is any Western idea of liberating captive peoples of Eastern Europe (or, as they would see it, of "intervening in attempt to disrupt socialist camp"). But it is not repeat not entirely inconceivable that they might try to use Canadian campaign against Soviet colonialism to reinforce their current public propaganda line about possibility of American pre-emptive war initiative, and in attempt to create idea among Soviet public that West is implacably hostile to basic Soviet interests.

17TH UNGA: DISCUSSION IN NATO: COLONIALISM

UN discussion in Council on July 11 and 12 was mainly centred around the problem of colonialism. We have already reported on Council reactions to our proposal on Soviet colonialism and the purpose of this telegram is to report discussion on the general question of colonialism.

2. Cleveland in his introductory remarks said that colonialism would be one of the chief features of the 17th General Assembly. The question would be difficult to deal with as it would stir up the Assembly [over] symbolic issues as against real or operational issues (see our general telegram on this distinction). The Committee of Seventeen was beginning to review the situation territory by territory. This was worrying and the West needed to do some campaigning about it. The enthusiasm of Afro-Asians for rapid action in this field affected the present and future role of UNGA. A persistent tendency to pass resolutions in the UN which did not repeat not appeal to USA public opinion as practical would affect public support for the UN. There was a large job of education to be done by the West in order that delegations of underdeveloped countries at UNGA receive instructions and be not repeat not left to react with their own emotions. A similar preparatory campaign by USA on Chinese representation last year had produced good results.

3. Greek Permanent Representative made a plea against double standards applied to colonial issues. Kashmir and Goa were also cases of colonization. No repeat no doubt the West had to display understanding of new countries and their support was also needed in the UN. These objectives however should not repeat not be pursued by the West to the extent that basic principles of justice were forgotten.

4. Spaak said that the phenomenon of decolonization was too rapid and too complete. A régime of transition between the status of colony and independence would have been preferable. This was however impossible and one could not repeat not oppose the wave of history. What the West could obtain however was that colonial countries should help in the process of decolonization. This could be done only if former colonies and Afro-Asians were convinced that the West believed that colonialism had come to an end.

5. Freedom and poverty would not repeat not last together for long. Needs of economic aid would create again bonds between Africa and Europe. Ways and means to establish these new links should be found. The fourteen former French African colonies had now requested to maintain their links with the EEC and it appeared certain that an agreement to that effect would be found before the end of the year. The core of assistance to least developed countries was to stabilize commodity prices. These links between Europe and Africa were one of the major preoccupations of Khrushchev. With the eventual entry of British into the Common Market these links with former French African colonies could also be extended to former British territories. Economic needs were therefore bringing former colonies back into a relationship with Europe. There should not repeat not be any objection to the African countries remaining neutral in foreign policy even if they were linked to the EEC. The establishment of such relationships between Europe and Africa should be done in cooperation with USA, Canada, the Commonwealth and Latin America.

6. Italian Permanent Representative in his intervention supported his Greek colleague on the idea that the relationships between former colonial territories and the West should be based on the principles of justice and equality. The decolonization process was irreversible and it should be gradual and realistic. USSR was disappointed by the results of decolonization.

7. Portuguese Permanent Representative took the familiar line that they were helping Africa to progress in the field of social justice. Portuguese authorities were working in Africa in all fields with as much success as the new countries themselves. NATO governments which could not repeat not support in UN Portuguese policies vis-à-vis Africa should not repeat not vote against Portugal but abstain: this was the only realistic solution.

8. United Kingdom Permanent Representative said that British attitude towards the colonial issue in UN would be essentially conditioned by the fact that British had still many territories for which no repeat no single constitutional solution was possible. It was therefore essentially a matter of time. UK delegation in New York would try to avoid being made to work on a timetable in the process of decolonization. This would be one of their main concerns.

9. Cleveland in reply to Spaak pointed out that the task of converting old ties between European countries and former colonial territories into new bonds could also be tackled in UN forum. This task of conversion must be done in equality with no repeat no excessive humility on the part of the Western countries.

SOVIET IMPERIALISM AT THE UN

Immediately following telegram† contains working draft of a resolution on this subject proposed for submission to 17th UNGA. Two methods of introducing resolution have been considered: (a) inscription of new item to be debated separately in committee or plenary; or (b) introduction of resolution during the debate of agenda item 22 concerning declaration on colonialism. In view of cool reaction during NATO Council discussions in mid-July to method (a) and of uncertainty about prospects for having new item inscribed, it has been decided to follow method (b). This would be consistent with Prime Minister's statement in general debate at 15th Session and would link the discussion of Soviet domination with the Assembly debate on questions related to traditional colonialism.

2. We recognize that many African-Asian members might resent the injection of resolution on Soviet imperialism into the text of traditional debate on colonialism and that the administering powers might have objections of their own. At past sessions, however, Western powers have sought to expose Soviet attempts to pose as the champion of colonial independence by drawing attention to the evils of Soviet domination. The introduction of a resolution would serve to crystallize such views. Even if African-Asians tend to regard this as an attempt to divert attention from issues which are of more direct interest to them, there would be value in urging that the application of the same principles should be universal.

3. In addition to this main effort under the heading of colonialism, there may be opportunities for making subsidiary moves of a supporting character in various committees of the General Assembly. When such questions as self-determination and peaceful co-existence were under discussion, the Canadian position on them could be related to the main initiative on Soviet imperialism.

4. The Prime Minister has instructed that the text of the resolution be discussed with other governments and missions to whom this telegram is being sent should proceed with such consultation at the appropriate level. Under separate despatch,† other Canadian missions are being instructed to make representations in a selected group of capitals representing all groups at the UN, except the Soviet bloc. The countries concerned are: Sweden, Norway, Denmark, Italy, Belgium, the Netherlands, Australia, New Zealand, Ireland, Argentina, Brazil, Chile, Venezuela, Japan, Malaya, Pakistan, Lebanon, Nigeria, Tanganyika, Cameroun.

5. It has become apparent from Soviet reaction in Ottawa, Geneva and Moscow that there will be a strong counter-attack against Canada which could focus on the separatist movement in Quebec and on the position in Canada of Indians, Eskimos and Doukhobors. The Soviet bloc will seek to attract uncommitted African-Asians to its side and some may be disposed to regard the Canadian initiative as an aggravation of the Cold War. It is intended primarily however as a means of calling attention to the Soviet domination of subject peoples and to persuade all members of the UN that this situation is deserving of international concern and enquiry.

6. The views in this telegram should be used in discussing the draft resolution with appropriate officials in Washington, London and Paris. We are most anxious to have their reactions, both to the text of the resolution and to the suggested tactics.

SOVIET IMPERIALISM AT UNGA

At a meeting with State Department officials yesterday I was given preliminary reactions to the plan to submit a draft resolution to the 17th Session of the UNGA. I left copies of the draft resolution and an explanatory memorandum based on your telegram V339.

2. Introductory. The attitude of the officials at the meeting was interested and constructive. I would emphasize, however that the views they expressed were of an interim nature, being subject to further study and to approval at higher levels. From an earlier conversation with Harlan Cleveland, Associate Secretary supervising UN Affairs, I know that he plans to follow this matter personally. It is likely that we shall receive considered comments in written form.

3. USA Reaction. There is no repeat no tendency to disagree with our general purpose. The first comment made was that the State Department sympathized with our approach "in substance," in the sense that they entirely agreed that it was desirable to focus international attention on Soviet domination of dependent peoples. Any doubts they had were on questions of form and tactics. Their experience was that even in matters where there was a good case in principle for introducing a new subject into the Assembly, it was essential to ensure that the climate was favourable in terms of timing, cosponsorship and voting support. As will be clear from the following paragraphs, they consider that a judgment on the feasibility of introducing a resolution cannot repeat not be made at this time.

4. Procedural Questions. Referring to our intention to introduce a resolution in the context of the Committee of Seventeen, the officials pointed out that the Committee had been acting in an extremely irresponsible manner in recent months. This had been a "disappointment" to the USA and a matter of deep concern to the other Western administrative powers (e.g. attitude with regard to Southern Rhodesia, British Guiana and Mozambique). So seriously was this matter regarded that USA, Britain and France had just completed discussions in preparation for an attempt to reconstitute the Committee of Seventeen at the forthcoming session of the Assembly. The objective would be to convince the Assembly that the first year's experience of the Committee had shown that unless it adopted a more moderate approach, it would degenerate into a sheer propaganda forum damaging to colonial evolution and to the prestige of the UN. Final British agreement to this plan had not repeat not been received but was expected shortly, and consultations would then be undertaken with other Western administering powers. It had been decided that in the interest of reconstituting the Committee, USA would be prepared to propose that both USSR and USA be dropped from membership. The officials said that they were by no repeat no means certain that this effort at reconstitution would attract enough support but they could see no repeat no alternative to drastic action if the emphasis of the Committee were to be diverted to moderation.

5. They felt that an effort to inject our proposal into the Committee of Seventeen would run contrary to the arguments which the administering powers were planning to use in their attempt to reconstitute the Committee, accordingly they could not repeat not at this stage promise support for our resolution in its present form. They would not repeat not know until some time after the opening of the session whether their plan would succeed. If it failed and Committee became an arena for verbal combat, Soviet imperialism might turn out to be a useful theme for the Western members to pursue.

6. Timing. The officials enquired whether we had decided how soon we might introduce our resolution. I said that I had no repeat no instructions on this point, but that presumably we would take action as soon as our preparations and the tactical situation permitted. They took the line that we should be wise to wait until the session was under way since the success of our proposal would depend on its not repeat not being submitted until cosponsorship and voting support was assured.<sup>96</sup> In this connection they enquired whether it was the Prime Minister's intention to make a personal appearance in the opening debate.<sup>97</sup> If so the opportunity could be taken to lay the foundation for submitting a resolution at a later stage if conditions appeared favourable.

Yes [Harry Jay?]

7. Soviet Intentions. Another reason for withholding our decisions on tactics was the possibility that Khrushchev might himself raise the Berlin issue at the Assembly. If so, the injection of extreme Soviet charges into the debate would improve the prospects of support for a resolution such as we were proposing.

8. Attitude of Africans and Asians. State Department officials at the meeting were not repeat not unanimous on the likely reaction of the African and Asian delegations. One official said that these delegations would resent an attempt to divert attention from the kind of racial, transoceanic colonialism which was of concern to them. Other officials took issue with this view and said that if we made a good enough case and avoided the appearance of pushing traditional colonialism under the rug, our chances would be fairly good. These remarks were of course not repeat not intended to detract from the procedural factors outlined in paragraphs 4 to 7 above.

9. Suggestions re Contents of Resolution. As the State Department officials had not repeat not previously seen our working draft they had few points to suggest. They thought that the resolution would be strengthened by the introduction of references to self-determination and also to human rights and these were themes on which the Russians were defensive and which appealed to the Afro Asians. They did not repeat not, however suggest that we should attempt to hand the whole resolution on these themes to the exclusion of colonialism or imperialism. They said they had not repeat not had much success in the past with human rights resolutions related to particular areas. With regard to the geographical areas listed in operative paragraph 2 of the resolution, they thought we had been wise to exclude the Eastern European satellites.<sup>98</sup> They were doubtful about the Ukraine but sympathized with the reasons for its inclusion. While they thought the reference to Transcaucasia was legitimate, they questioned the appeal this would have in terms of voting support in the Assembly and one official speculated that it might intensify rather than weaken the loyalty of the transcaucasian republics to Moscow.

10. Additional Points. In casting about for possible alternative approaches, they wondered if our proposal might be introduced under the item on information from non self-governing territories. They wanted to explore this idea before making further comments.<sup>99</sup>

11. Without committing themselves they speculated on the prospects for inscription of our proposal as a separate item.<sup>100</sup> There was some feeling that the response in the Assembly would not repeat not be as negative as some previous assessments have indicated.

12. I hope in the near future to report considered State Department reaction.

COMMENTS ON MINISTER'S SPEECH

We have been approached by a great many delegations which have expressed favourable comments on Secretary of State for External Affairs' speech in general debate.<sup>101</sup> These included UK, France, USA, Afghanistan, Brazil, Ceylon, Chile, Costa Rica, Ghana, Italy, Japan, Libya, Norway, Philippines, Senegal, Sweden, Sudan, Turkey and UAR. We are aware that number of other delegations also spoke of the Minister personally. Most of them have commented on positive and constructive approach in the statement to the problem of disarmament and nuclear testing. They have noted that the speech gained much from the forthright and sincere presentation and was well keyed to the atmosphere of this Assembly.

2. Representatives of Poland and Romania told us they took of course strong objection to remarks in speech on subject of Soviet imperialism but restraint exercised by Secretary of State for External Affairs made it possible for them not repeat not to have to use statements they had prepared for interventions in right of reply.

3. Incidentally you will be interested in article on page one of Christian Science Monitor of September 26 which describes Secretary of State for External Affairs' remarks on Soviet imperialism as an answer to doctrine proclaimed by Gromyko that wars of national liberation are sacrosanct and therefore counter-revolution is immoral. New York TV news broadcasts also commented on Minister's speech in similar vein.

SOVIET IMPERIALISM

When I visited New York October 8, we discussed this question in relation to action which Candel might take in plenary and in various committees in keeping with position enunciated in the Canadian statement in the general debate on September 25. It was agreed that, as occasions presented themselves, Candel would seek to remind UNGA members about the Soviet Union's false position in posing as the champion of human rights and fundamental freedoms. This would mean, for example, that when the Fourth Committee was discussing some colonial issues and particularly if the Soviet bloc were abusively attacking the UK, the Canadian representative should appropriately remind the Committee about the USSR record of domination and in effect place its criticism in proper perspective.

2. Similar opportunities might arise in the Third Committee during any general discussion of human rights and in the Sixth Committee in response to the Soviet attack on principles of international law under the item concerning friendly relations. The main occasion for combating Soviet criticism will probably arise in plenary when the report of the Special Committee of Seventeen is being considered. We have already noted in the draft report several sections which would open the door to comment concerning Soviet imperialism. You should examine the report carefully from this point of view.

3. Much will depend on the context of debate on any particular item. The atmosphere of the committee concerned will also be important; some committees might react strongly against the introduction of this issue, others might expect it to be introduced. While it is not possible to prescribe specific courses of action, the delegation should be planning interventions in the light of possible developments in debates.

4. We hope other delegations will follow suit. You should continue to keep in touch with like-minded group to encourage them to do so. The question of submitting a resolution in appropriate circumstances should not be ruled out. We shall welcome further comments on alternative proposals to the one which we discussed in earlier consultations in New York and elsewhere.

5. The purpose of this telegram is to remind you about the discussion held on October 8 and to give you broad guidelines for delegation action in the appropriate committees. Before taking action, however, the delegation should seek approval of it from Ottawa and, if possible, should submit the text of any intervention proposed. Jay has been sent to New York specifically to assist committee advisers in planning the tactics and substance of possible interventions on this subject.

UNGA: 3RD COMMITTEE – ITEM 12: HUMAN RIGHTS RESOLUTION

On October 22, as envisaged in our telegram 1862 October 20, † subamendments (L1001) to USSR amendments on 15th anniversary declaration draft resolution were tabled by Cameroon, Canada, France, Greece, Iran, Italy, Japan and USA, and amendments (L1000) to Ukrainian text were tabled by Canada, Denmark, Italy and New Zealand.

2. Shortly after tabling it became apparent that list of speakers was running short and that vote might be taken before Canadian intervention if we were to delay speaking. We therefore inscribed to speak afternoon meeting and Brazil followed our lead shortly thereafter. After

Miss Marsh delivered speech (text given in our telegram 1878 October 22†) Brazil, Dominican Republic, USSR, Afghanistan, United Kingdom, Saudi Arabia, Mauritania and Argentina also intervened.

3. Our statement drew favourable comment from friendly delegations including USA, New Zealand, Denmark, Australia and Ceylon (in personal capacity).

4. In right of reply, in conclusion of his main statement, USSR representative in mild terms noted that there had been yet another attack by Canada and Western world to displace question colonialism by other questions (i.e. human rights and self-determination conditions in USSR and Ukraine) and that he thought this to be a "malicious trick." Canadian attack reminded him of Russian fable in which mouse believes it is riding elephant. He warned that his delegation was prepared to meet this attack in more detailed fashion if necessary and suggested that it would be more appropriate for Canadian delegation not repeat not to raise these questions thereby distracting attention of Committee. (We shall forward summary record of USSR intervention as soon as available). We have no repeat no indication yet whether Ukraine representative will exercise right of reply. Unless he does in much stronger language than USSR representative we doubt necessity or desirability of any Canadian response.

5. Favourable conditions in Committee gave us an opportunity to follow up on Minister's lead in his speech in plenary on September 25. We now understand that Denmark, New Zealand and perhaps Italy will speak this afternoon (October 23) calling attention to situation concerning human rights in Soviet bloc, and in particular as regards right of self-determination.

ASSEMBLY ITEM 25: COLONIALISM AND SOVIET IMPERIALISM

This morning I mentioned that a draft statement had been prepared for the Canadian Delegation to the 17th session. This draft is the result of joint efforts by Mr. Parry and the appropriate officers of African and Middle Eastern Division and United Nations Division. I understand from a telephone conversation this afternoon with Mr. Barton that the Delegation is hoping to have the statement delivered by Mr. Macquarrie, who will not be available until the week after next. The debate on the item has begun but after a procedural wrangle, which has been resolved, the debate was adjourned for lack of speakers. The expectation is that the debate will last at least two weeks.

2. You will be aware of our intention that the main effort as regards Soviet imperialism should be made under this item. We understand that some other delegations are intending to take a similar line. This is particularly true of the United Kingdom. The Delegation is considering whether Mr. Ignatieff should be instructed to urge our NATO partners to join with us in this campaign of education which is not expected to be waged violently but which will be keyed to the tone of Soviet attacks on the British and others. The Delegation in New York will be discussing this possibility with representatives of NATO countries there and will recommend accordingly.

3. As regards the time of delivery for the Canadian statement, I doubt whether we should intervene early in the debate because the subject is one which primarily interests the Africans and their Asian supporters. However, in view of our own interest in the debate, we should not delay our intervention until the end of the debate. We may be well-advised to wait until the United Kingdom has made its statement. All this suggests that the Canadian statement might be made early in the week of November 19-24.

4. The attached draft† deals both with the report of the Special Committee of Seventeen and with Soviet imperialism. The two subjects have been linked but the remarks on Soviet imperialism begin about the middle of paragraph 15 of page 6.

5. I assume that, in considering this draft, you may wish to consult with Mr. Glazebrook, who has a copy of it.<sup>102</sup>

Albanian representative who was next speaker following Canada made no repeat no reference to Canadian speech. did Canadian representative not repeat not realize that in speaking in this fashion he was speaking against very basis for existence of UN? This was extent of Byelorussian comment.

3. Statements of remaining speakers were uneventful. Ros (Argentina) agreed with suggestion that colonial questions be concentrated in Committee of 17 and Committee should be enlarged but said Committee on Information from Non Self-Governing Territories should continue to exist. Administration of the Falkland Islands was a crude manifestation of UK imperialism and a violation of Argentine sovereignty. He expressed hope UK would take steps in this territory similar to those it had taken in other regions under its control.

4. On the question of a date for the independence of all colonial peoples only Smirnov (Byelorussia) supported Guinean suggestion that October 24/63 be fixed as overall target date. Budo (Albania) said his government would support any measures which would bring an end to colonialism in all its forms. Nepal and Ceylon suggested that one single target date was not repeat not applicable for all cases. Instead Malalasekera (Ceylon) proposed that Special Committee should recommend a target date for each individual territory. He criticized consensus approach to work of Committee asserting that Committee could not repeat not abandon democratic principle of majority vote.

5. Over thirty speakers remain on the list for next week with UK due to speak Monday morning. At end of meeting President said plenary was falling behind schedule and evening meetings might be necessary. He also said it might be desirable to commence general debate on Angola before conclusion of general debate on colonialism.

GATT TARIFF CONFERENCE – GENEVA

The United States and the European Economic Community have recently reached agreement on their negotiations in Geneva, and the Tariff Conference has entered its final stage. We attended a meeting on Friday of the Ottawa members of our Tariff Delegation to review the situation regarding Canada's negotiations at the Conference, which may be summarized as follows:

2. In December our Delegation in Geneva concluded, ad referendum, a tariff agreement with the United States within the context of the Dillon round covering about $150 million of mutual trade. The area of this agreement is not as extensive as had earlier been hoped, mainly because of our inability to offer sufficient concessions of interest to the United States (e.g. coal), but it still covers an important range of agricultural and industrial products. Our Delegation has also concluded Dillon round agreements with Portugal, Spain and Israel in connection with the accession of these countries to GATT.

3. Our negotiations with the EEC have been carried out under GATT Article XXIV:6; i.e. they have been confined to the readjustment of Canada's contractual rights with individual members of the Community, in order to take account of the fact that the member countries are replacing their individual tariff schedules by the EEC Common External Tariff. Wheat has played an important role in these negotiations. At the beginning, the six member countries withdrew their tariff bindings on wheat and on other cereals and declined to enter into new firm commitments regarding the future common tariff on these products. Their refusal arose from the fact that the Six had not yet agreed among themselves on how cereal imports would be treated under the future common agricultural policy. Among other things, it was envisaged that under the CAP fixed tariffs would be replaced by a system of variable import levies on cereals and some other agricultural imports.

4. Accordingly, our Delegation last spring proposed a temporary settlement with the Six covering hard wheat which would: (a) preserve existing Canadian contractual rights with individual members of the Six until a more permanent settlement could be reached; (b) secure a definite commitment from the Six to negotiate as soon as the CAP had been adopted and in any case before June 30, 1963, a permanent settlement involving the binding of the maximum level of the variable levy; and (c) protect us in the meantime against any deterioration of conditions of access for Canadian wheat to markets of the Six. On this latter point, our proposal involved an undertaking by the Six not to intensify their barriers against wheat, and to take steps to rectify the situation in the event that imports of wheat showed any appreciable decline from the average in the previous three years.

5. Our proposal for a temporary settlement of this kind has been under consideration by the Six for many months, awaiting the results of parallel negotiations between the United States and the Six on wheat. The agreement now reached between the United States and the EEC evidently includes a temporary settlement on wheat along the lines of our proposal, and the way is accordingly opened for the conclusion of our negotiations on wheat with the Six. Today representatives of the EEC Commission will place before our Delegation in Geneva their proposals for a temporary settlement which, it is hoped, will be along the lines of the one we have proposed. The EEC Commission will probably also be submitting proposals covering a few other products on which agreement has not yet been reached: i.e. some coarse grains, some oil seeds, aluminum and canned salmon.

6. Apart from these products, our re-negotiations with the Six under Article XXIV have resulted in settlements which can be regarded as satisfactory. The Six have agreed to bind to us rates in the Common External Tariff for a considerable number of products on which tariff rates were previously bound to Canada by the individual member countries. In some cases reductions in the proposed Common External Tariff rates have been secured.

7. Although the negotiations at the Tariff Conference may be concluded fairly shortly, it is not expected that the detailed results of the Conference can be publicly announced and the protocol opened for signature before the end of February. The results for any particular country depend not only on the agreements it has concluded with its own negotiating partners, but also on concessions exchanged between other pairs of negotiating countries, since these are extended to all other GATT members on an MFN basis. Accordingly, the calculation of the overall results for individual participating countries takes some time. A draft Canadian announcement is being prepared, as the final results of the Geneva negotiations become known and are analysed.<sup>104</sup>

CANADA – E.E.C. TARIFF NEGOTIATIONS

I am pleased to report, on behalf of the Canadian Delegation to the Tariff Conference of 1960-61 at Geneva, successful conclusion of the renegotiations (under Article XXIV:6 of GATT) with the European Economic Community and representatives of its six Member Countries.

As Ministers are aware, these negotiations have been complex and prolonged – far beyond the original expectations of any of the participating countries.

For your convenience of reference, and without going into details with which you are familiar, the results of the renegotiations may be summarized as follows:

1. Instructions to the Delegation of the Government were, in general terms, to secure continuance with a minimum of impairment of those tariff concessions which, in earlier GATT conferences, Canada had negotiated under bilateral agreements with the countries now constituting the E.E.C., and which, by reason of the substitution of a Common External Tariff for the individual national regimes, were inevitably to be affected.<sup>105</sup> This result the Delegation has achieved, to the extent that the concessions now being granted by the Community represent more than 80 per cent of Canada's exports to the territories of the Community. Of these scheduled and bound concessions, some will provide for free entry, as compared with duties leviable under the Common Tariff as originally formulated; others will be reductions from the Common Tariff rates; still others will be bindings (against increase) of the Common Tariff.

2. The Delegation was to negotiate the best possible terms for continuance of access of Canadian wheat to the territories of the E.E.C. The negotiations have resulted in two agreements, covering so-called Quality Wheat and Ordinary Wheat. Under these agreements, the Community and the six Member Countries undertake: (1) to negotiate with Canada not later than in 1963 the terms of access which, by virtue of the Common Agricultural Policy, will displace the existing national regimes; and (2), in the interim, not to intensify or otherwise adversely alter the existing terms of access for Canadian wheat; and (3) in the event that imports of Canadian wheat should fall appreciably below the datum level specified in the agreements, to take steps to rectify the situation.

Annexed to the agreements – which will be signed not only for the Community but also for each of the six Member Governments – will be a letter embodying a precise definition of Quality Wheat in terms of grades specified in Canadian legislation and regulations thereunder. By virtue of these agreements and of the definition thereto applying, the negotiated settlement should cover Canada's normal and traditional exports of wheat to the territories of the E.E.C.

It is expected that the results of the renegotiations with the E.E.C. will be opened for signature at Geneva this week in so far as concerns (a) the schedule of tariff concessions bound to Canada and (b) the Wheat Agreements. The former of these will in due course be part of the Conference Protocol, which will be opened for formal signature some weeks hence.

In accordance with views expressed at a meeting on Friday last by representatives of the Departments of External Affairs, Finance, Trade and Commerce, and Agriculture, I am authorizing Mr. Rodney Grey at Geneva to sign ad referendum the instruments herein referred to. It is the hope and expectation of the Delegation and other senior officials concerned that, unless for last minute alterations of a minor nature, there will be now no changes in the results of these negotiations.

INSTRUCTIONS FOR CANADIAN DELEGATION TO THE TWENTIETH SESSION OF THE CONTRACTING PARTIES TO THE GENERAL AGREEMENT ON TARIFFS AND TRADE

1. The Twentieth Session of the Contracting Parties to the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade opens in Geneva on October 23rd and is expected to last four weeks. Such sessions take place annually to administer the Agreement and to consider current problems of importance in international trade.

2. It is recommended:

(i) that Canada be represented at the Twentieth Session; that Mr. J.H. Warren, Assistant Deputy Minister, Department of Trade and Commerce, be Chairman of Delegation; and that Mr. J.F. Grandy, Director, International Economic Relations, Department of Finance, be Deputy Chairman; and that other members of the Delegation attending from Ottawa be:

G.J. Dobson	–	Department of Agriculture
G.W. Green	–	Department of Trade and Commerce
J.S. Rayner	–	Department of Finance and that R. Campbell Smith, Counsellor and Special Representative to the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade; A.R.A. Gherson, Department of Trade and Commerce – who is presently attending other GATT meetings in Geneva; and J.J. Masterson, Customs Attaché in Brussels, be included in the Delegation;

(ii) that the Canadian Delegation be guided by the following, and, with respect to other items on the agenda, previous instructions. In addition, the United States may raise the recent Canadian action on potatoes. A separate report on this subject is being prepared for Cabinet.

Canadian Import Surcharges:

This item is the subject of a separate Memorandum to Cabinet.

Programme for Expansion of Trade:

The GATT countries have, over the past several years, had before them a programme of action covering three major aspects of international trade:

1. Further progress in the reduction of tariff barriers to trade;
2. Problems of trade in agricultural products, and
3. Obstacles to the trade of less developed countries.

Progress reports on work being done in these areas will be before the Contracting Parties at this Session.

The U.S. Trade Expansion Act, signed into law on October 11th, provides the U.S. Administration with extensive and unprecedented tariff negotiating authority. In the absence of such authority, it has not been possible to take significant forward action in the programme of trade expansion. Uncertainty about the agricultural policy of the European Economic Community and about Britain's negotiations for possible accession to the Community have also impeded effective progress. Recent developments in these matters have laid the basis for a common effort to deal with trading problems in a constructive and positive manner.

This Session provides an opportunity to carry forward the Prime Minister's initiative in co-operation with the United States by proposing an early meeting of Ministers to consider how the great problems of trade can be dealt with to the mutual advantage of all. It is recommended that the Canadian Delegation be authorized to take the initiative, in co-operation with the United States Delegation, in calling for such a meeting.

A good deal of preparatory work will need to be done before the Ministerial meeting. Work has already been set in train to examine new techniques for tariff negotiation. Problems of trade in wheat and other cereals have also been under examination in a special group which is exploring the basis for the negotiation of practical measures for the creation of acceptable conditions of access to world markets for grains. The Canadian Delegation should co-operate with Australia, Argentina and the United States, in efforts to carry this work forward. In this connection, the Canadian objective should be to obtain fair opportunities of access and effective development of Canadian trade in agricultural products through commodity arrangements or otherwise. Action in the agricultural sector should be a part of the programme for the reduction of trade barriers generally.

In view of the important interests of less developed Commonwealth countries and the problems faced by other less developed countries in the free world, Canada should, in this programme of action, recognize the need for providing new export opportunities for the developing countries.

3. Other Matters:

(a) Accession of the United Arab Republic: On both political and commercial grounds the accession of the United Arab Republic is considered desirable. While there are a number of difficulties, particularly those arising out of the U.A.R.'s relations with Israel, it is anticipated there will be general support for the U.A.R.'s accession. On this assumption, and on the understanding that there will be general support, it is recommended that the Canadian delegation be authorized to agree to the accession of the U.A.R. on a provisional basis pending the conclusion of tariff negotiations.

(b) Relations with Yugoslavia: Yugoslavia is seeking a closer form of association. Because of Yugoslavia's present trade structure, in particular its state-trading operations, it is not likely that Yugoslavia will be able to achieve full accession at this time. However, the Canadian Delegation should be authorized to support a closer association.

(c) United States Schedule: The United States, over the past several years, has been engaged in a modernization and simplification of its tariff language. The changes which have now been approved by the U.S. Government generally have not involved modifications in rates of duty. On balance, Canadian exporters may be expected to benefit from these changes in their access to the U.S. market. However, Canadian officials already have identified a number of tariff problems and more may be expected to come to light when we have had some experience in the actual operation of the revised tariff classification. The United States will be seeking authority to implement these changes prior to the completion of renegotiations called for under the General Agreement. In order to have the benefit of actual experience under the revised tariff so as to identify possible areas of difficulty, the Canadian Delegation should support the U.S. request. Under the procedures envisaged, Canadian officials will be proceeding with consultations with U.S. officials.

(d) Association of Greece with the European Economic Community: The Greek agreement on association with the European Common Market constitutes an important precedent for other countries which may seek association with the Community. In order to avoid prejudicing Canadian trade interests which might be affected by such arrangements, the Delegation should seek to avoid any definitive findings with respect to the compatibility of the Agreement of Association with the provisions of the GATT.<sup>106</sup>

TEMPORARY IMPORT SURCHARGES – CONSIDERATION IN GATT

Any trade measures taken for balance of payments reasons by a Contracting Party to the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade are carefully scrutinized by the GATT from the point of view of their justifiability and their trade effects. In respect of our temporary import surcharges<sup>107</sup> there is the added complication that these are not technically the kind of balance of payments measures permitted in the Agreement. Accordingly, the Canadian temporary import surcharges were discussed in the GATT Council in July. At that time the Council concluded that there should be a full review of the surcharges at the 20th Session of the Contracting Parties in the light of the situation prevailing at that time. The Contracting Parties could then take whatever definitive action might be required.

The 20th Session convenes in Geneva on October 23rd and it is necessary to consider what position the Canadian delegation should adopt on this subject.

The GATT looks to the International Monetary Fund for authoritative guidance on the balance of payments and external financial position of any country invoking balance of payments difficulties in justification of exceptional trade measures. The Fund will be invited to make a statement on Canada's situation at the GATT Session. We understand the Fund will be making a statement along the following lines:

“Since the emergency measures were taken on June 24, 1962 the Canadian dollar has been strong and reserves have increased substantially. This increase has, however, been brought about largely by U.S. $650 million of short-term borrowing and a return flow of short-term capital, apparently including substantial amounts of Canadian funds which were exported shortly before the emergency steps were taken, together with seasonal influences. The extent of the inflow of foreign capital which traditionally has covered the deficit in the current account in the coming months is uncertain, especially as concerns long-term capital. The Fund has noted the assurances of the Canadian Government that its temporary financial measures adopted for an emergency were directed to the improvement of Canada's exchange reserves and that the customs surcharges will not be kept on any longer than necessary. The Fund notes that Canada has begun removing the surcharges and believes that if the reserves and payments positions continue to improve over the coming months, Canada should be able to eliminate the remaining surcharges.”

It should be noted that this statement does not claim that Canada is yet in a position to dispense with the surcharges. The fact is that there is not yet sufficient evidence of a lasting improvement in our balance of payments and reserves. Indeed the information so far available indicates that the long-term capital inflow is not sufficient to cover the current account deficit. Therefore it would be premature at this time to give any precise indication as to when the surcharges can be removed.

In connection with the Fund statement on timing it should also be noted that our representative at the Fund has indicated to other Fund members that he interprets the phrase “the coming months” to mean not the next few months but a period that could extend up to twelve months.

It is the practice of the Contracting Parties to examine carefully any balance of payments measures affecting trade, and in past years Canadian representatives have played a leading part in the discussion of restrictive measures adopted by the European countries and others. In the normal course of events it is therefore to be expected that the effects of, and continuing need for, the Canadian import surcharges should similarly be examined by other countries in the GATT.

Since our measures differ in form from those permitted in the General Agreement for dealing with balance of payments difficulties, we are technically in breach of the Agreement unless we obtain a waiver. In order to help remove any danger of possible retaliation against our exports, it would be desirable to seek a waiver at this Session, preferably for a period of a year.

We have had clear indications that some countries, notably the United States and some European countries, will be pressing us strongly for the early removal of the remaining surcharges. We believe such pressure at this time is unreasonable in view of the lack of clear evidence of a lasting improvement in our situation. At the same time modest steps in the direction of relaxation may help us to achieve a satisfactory outcome in Geneva. One important step has now been taken in the field of industrial machinery and equipment not made in Canada and certain other products. There are a number of quantitatively less important items on which convincing representations have been received from Canadians and in some cases from other countries. A recommendation for relaxation on a further group of products will be submitted to Cabinet in time for a decision to have an impact on the GATT discussions.

As regards the duration of a waiver, it seems clear that the maximum period which might be negotiated is one year. It is more likely, however, that the Contracting Parties will think in terms of a much shorter period and may well refuse to agree to a waiver lasting beyond one year from the introduction of these measures, i.e. late June 1963. It is not certain that even this can be obtained, but it is our judgement that it would be unreasonable of the Contracting Parties not to agree to this duration for the waiver. A waiver expiring before June could do more harm than good: it would imply an earlier elimination of the surcharges than the facts as they appear at present would warrant.

It should be borne in mind that if a waiver were due to expire in June and our reserves and balance of payments situation did not warrant the elimination of the surcharges by that time it would be open to us to request an extension.

Recommendations

It is recommended that the Canadian delegation

(a) should seek a waiver extending from the 20th Session of the Contracting Parties to the beginning of the 21st Session, approximately one year;

(b) should be authorized to fall back to a period expiring in June, 1963 if advance consultation in Geneva makes it clear that the longer period cannot be obtained;

(c) should not request a waiver if it becomes clear that the Contracting Parties will insist on an expiry date earlier than June. (In this eventuality they should reiterate the policy as clearly stated by the Prime Minister of Canada that the surcharges will be removed as soon as circumstances permit, and seek to have the Contracting Parties take note of this undertaking.)

TEMPORARY IMPORT SURCHARGES; CONSIDERATION IN GATT

11. The Minister of Finance said that Canada would have to face up to a stiff situation at the 20th Session of GATT to be held in Geneva on October 23rd. A number of member countries could be expected to press strongly for the removal of the import surcharges. Since the measures taken to overcome the balance of payments emergency differed in nature from those permitted by the General Agreement, Canada would technically be in breach of the Agreement. The only way out would be to seek a waiver at this Session, preferably for a period of a year.

An explanatory memorandum had been circulated (Minister's memorandum, Oct. 22 – Cab. Doc. 340-62).

12. During the discussion some said that the best thing to do was to stick to the statement of the Prime Minister that the surcharges would be removed as soon as circumstances permit. It would be unwise to accept a shorter waiver than one year. It would be better to have no waiver even if this meant being in default.

13. The Cabinet agreed that the Delegation to the October 23rd session of the G.A.T.T. in the consideration of the Canadian import surcharges,

(a) should seek a waiver extending from the 20th Session of the Contracting Parties to the beginning of the 21st Session, approximately one year;

(b) should be authorized to agree, if necessary, to a period in June, 1963 if advance consultation in Geneva made it clear that the longer period could not be obtained; and,

(c) should not request a waiver if it became clear that the Contracting Parties would insist on an expiry date earlier than June. In this eventuality they should reiterate the policy as clearly stated by the Prime Minister of Canada that the surcharges would be removed as soon as circumstances permitted, and seek to have the Contracting Parties take note of this undertaking.

20TH SESSION OF G.A.T.T.; DRAFT DECISION OF CONTRACTING PARTIES ON IMPORT SURCHARGES
 (Previous reference Oct. 25)

4. The Prime Minister said that the Canadian representatives at the G.A.T.T. meeting in Geneva had reported on the stand being taken by certain countries on the question of Canada's import surcharges.

5. The Minister of Finance said that the British and other European countries had been most helpful but the U.S. representatives had been impossible to move. A telegram from the Canadian representatives had asked for instructions, following the most recent private discussions with the U.S. representatives. A formula for a draft decision of the contracting parties had been worked out jointly by the Canadian and U.S. representatives wherein it was noted that Canada had given notice on June 25th last of the imposition of import surcharges; explanations had been given that the purpose had been to safeguard Canada's balance of payments situation; import surcharges had been used rather than quota restrictions; the International Monetary Fund had voiced its understanding and had acted accordingly.

The draft statement also noted the need for long-term measures and expressed regret that Canada had been obliged to take the steps it had. Satisfaction would be recorded over the progress made to date in removing the surcharges and Canada's expressed intention to continue in this direction. The statement would recommend the expeditious elimination of the balance of import surcharges and call for a report in early 1963. The Canadian representatives had reported that the U.S. representatives felt there would be objection by their government to the reference to the International Monetary Fund. The final sentences of the text had been the hardest to settle, particularly the portion calling for prompt or expeditious removal of the balance of surcharges. It had been recommended that Canada accept this draft if it proved to be acceptable in Washington.

6. During the discussion the following points were raised,

(a) Some said that the indications were that the U.S. authorities might possibly accept as they seemed to have weakened on their original stand. However, word had it that the objections stemmed from the White House where the pressures against Canadian lumber and other imports were steady and strong.

(b) Others said that the jointly prepared draft seemed the best Canada could hope for and should be accepted if the U.S. authorities approved.

7. The Cabinet agreed that the Canadian representatives attending the 20th session of the G.A.T.T. be authorized to agree to a draft decision by the contracting parties to the G.A.T.T. along the lines of the draft prepared by the Canadian and U.S. delegations, provided this draft was also acceptable to U.S. authorities.

17TH UNGA: SECOND COMMITTEE: ITEM 36: UN TRADE CONFERENCE

It is most important that there should be no misunderstanding at Assembly regarding nature of Prime Minister's initiative in London in September<sup>108</sup> for a trade conference of likeminded countries and subsequent joint Canada-USA proposals now being made in Geneva for a GATT ministerial meeting; there should also be no misunderstanding regarding relation of these initiatives to the proposed UN conference on trade and development. We see no conflict whatsoever between the proposals now being carried forward in the Assembly and the proposals for a GATT ministerial meeting – indeed the two initiatives are in parallel especially as they relate to efforts to seek solutions to trade problems of less-developed countries.

See "Commonwealth Prime Ministers' Meeting 1962," External Affairs, Vol. 14, No. 10 (October 1962), p. 276.

2. In reply to questions regarding Canada's initiative and in any statement on this subject you might recall that Canadian Prime Minister in London at meeting of Commonwealth Prime Ministers suggested convening of a conference of countries with similar trading interests to prepare way for prospective non-discriminatory tariff negotiations on most-favoured-nation basis; to find solutions to the special difficulties in world trade in agricultural products and to give attention to trade in tropical products and trade of developing countries generally (reference Hansard October 19 page 699). Subsequently it was agreed by Prime Minister and President Kennedy in an exchange of messages at time of congressional enactment of Trade Expansion Act, that two countries should take initiative at current 20th Session of GATT Contracting Parties for convening of special meeting of GATT ministers in an effort to deal with these problems in a constructive and positive manner. Action along these lines is accordingly now being taken by Canada and USA in GATT.

3. As will be evident we envisage that such a GATT ministerial meeting would have as its primary purpose laying basis for new round of tariff negotiations aimed at expanding opportunities for world trade and taking advantage of new far-reaching tariff negotiating authority of USA resulting from its new trade legislation. This new round of negotiations would be another in series of similar multilateral tariff negotiations held under GATT since 1947 which have made outstanding contribution to freeing and expansion of world trade.

4. GATT ministerial meeting along lines being proposed by Canada and USA would we hope recognize that significant progress must be made in other fields besides tariffs. Many difficult problems remain in regard to trade in agricultural products. Trade in tropical products and raw materials require special attention. There is wide recognition of urgent need for wider export markets and trading opportunities for developing countries. In recent years GATT member countries have given special attention to these trade problems. Efforts to seek solutions to these problems have also concurrently been made in other forums of UN, notably ECOSOC, CICT and FAO. Urgency attached to solutions to trade problems of this kind has resulted in present proposals being considered by the Assembly for convening of UN conference on trade and development.

5. In your discussions and in statement to Second Committee you should seek to dispel any possible misunderstanding regarding relationship of GATT efforts being made to solutions to many of same problems in wider context of UN. Importance and urgency of these problems, particularly as they relate to trading interests of developing countries, are such as to require their continued attention in UN, in GATT and in other international forums concerned with world trade. Far from there being conflict between GATT initiatives and proposed UN conference, Canadian government hopes that two approaches would be in parallel, would reinforce each other and thereby increase prospects for early solutions.

6. You can definitely inform the Committee that Canada attaches importance to UN activities in trade field, including UN conference. We also, however, attach importance to GATT, which clearly has important role to play in current search for solution to world trade problems. We are therefore opposed to any initiatives having the effect of weakening GATT machinery or subjecting it to outside interference, which might be the effect of the Brazilian amendment to Resolution L648 (your telegram 2026† of November 1/62).

Report on Twentieth Session

GENERAL AGREEMENT ON TARIFFS AND TRADE
20TH SESSION, GENEVA, 1962

The 20th Session of the Contracting Parties to the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade (GATT) was held in Geneva from October 23 to November 16, 1962. (For a report on the 19th Session, 1961, see External Affairs, Volume XIV, No. 1, March, 1962.) At this meeting, the Contracting Parties dealt with a number of broad issues, the most important of which related to the convening of a GATT Ministerial meeting.

GATT Ministerial Meeting

Prior to the opening of the 20th Session, Prime Minister Diefenbaker and President Kennedy, in an exchange of letters in mid-October, agreed that it would be useful if a meeting of GATT ministers were to be held to consider how the major problems of trade could be dealt with to the mutual advantage of all. (The text of the letters are reproduced at the end of this article.)<sup>109</sup> The Delegations of Canada and the United States joined in putting such a proposal before the Contracting Parties at the 20th Session.

The Contracting Parties accepted this joint Canada-United States initiative, and agreed that a Ministerial meeting should be held in the early part of 1963<sup>110</sup> to consider a programme for effective liberalization and expansion of trade in both primary and secondary products. In this connection, full weight would be attached to the importance and urgency of negotiating solutions to the problems of trade in primary products, and to the additional trade problems of less-developed countries. The GATT Council will be convened at an early date, so that it may make adequate preparation, propose an agenda, and establish the precise date for the meeting of GATT Ministers.

The Prime Minister, in announcing the decision of the GATT Contracting Parties in the House of Commons on November 15, 1962, said that:

“Arrangements will be made for Canada to be represented at this very important meeting by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and possibly by other Ministers as well. I believe that a meeting at this time will have the most far reaching and beneficial results throughout the free world, and will open great possibilities for expanding trade, and in consequence, expansion in the Canadian economy.”

Prior to the GATT Ministerial meeting, a Working Party on Tariff Reductions will meet to give consideration to new techniques which might be followed in any future GATT tariff negotiations. The Working Party, under the chairmanship of a Canadian official, Mr. R. Y. Grey of the Department of Finance, will then report to the Ministerial meeting. (Mr. Grey formerly served with the Department of External Affairs from 1956 to 1960.)

The meeting was held in May 1963.

Trade Problems of Less-Developed Countries

The standing GATT Committee (Committee III) concerned with the trade problems of less-developed countries, submitted a report to the Contracting Parties at the 20th Session. This report reviewed the progress made over the past year in the reduction of tariffs and non-tariff barriers to the expansion of trade in less-developed countries. The report indicated that the less-developed countries were not satisfied with progress to date, and were determined to ensure that their problems were brought to the attention of the industrialized countries at the 1963 GATT Ministerial meeting.

In addition, during the 20th Session, the Contracting Parties considered a proposal to explore ways and means by which less-developed countries which are not now parties to GATT, but consider that GATT is the appropriate place to deal with trade problems, may contribute to and participate in the work of GATT of particular interest to them. However, in view of the shortness of time and the importance of the matter involved, it was decided to refer this question to the GATT Council for examination. The Council will consider this matter when it turns its attention to preparations for the GATT Ministerial Meeting.

GATT Membership

At the opening meeting of the 20th Session, two new members were welcomed into the General Agreement. Trinidad and Tobago and Uganda, for which the Government of the United Kingdom had been responsible, acquired independence in 1962, and gained full autonomy in the conduct of their external commercial relations. Both had applied to participate in the Agreement as full members, and became the 43rd and 44th Contracting Parties.

In addition, Yugoslavia and the United Arab Republic had made formal requests to accede to the General Agreement. Since 1959 Yugoslavia has been in close relationship with the GATT, and the General Agreement has served as a basis for the trade relations between Yugoslavia and most Contracting Parties. The Contracting Parties adopted declarations granting provisional accession to both Yugoslavia and the UAR; in the case of Yugoslavia, until December 31, 1965, and for the UAR, until December 31, 1964, or earlier for both if the necessary tariff negotiations are completed before those dates.

The Contracting Parties also extended the termination of the provisional accession of Argentina until December 31, 1964, to allow further time to complete tariff negotiations leading to full accession. The special arrangement permitting Spain to participate in the work of the Contracting Parties was also extended to July 31, 1963, by which time it is expected that Spain will have acceded to the General Agreement.

The Contracting Parties also reviewed the decision taken in 1960, under which the continuance of GATT commitments made on behalf of African states by their former metropolitan countries, was provided for after the territories became independent. The 1960 decision recognized that newly independent territories would normally require some time to consider their commercial policies and their relations with GATT. The Contracting Parties agreed at that time to continue to apply the General Agreement de facto in their relations with such territories, provided there was reciprocity. At the 20th Session, the Contracting Parties decided to extend this arrangement until the close of the last ordinary session in 1963, and to review the status of the GATT relationship with the states in question in 1963.

Examination of EEC Common Agricultural Policy

The Contracting Parties considered a report of another of GATT's standing committees (Committee II) on the effects of trade in agricultural products which would result from the progressive implementation of the Common Market Agricultural Policy. They examined five groups of products – cereals, pig meat, eggs, poultry, and fruit and vegetables. The principal exporting countries, including Canada, expressed concern with the import system envisaged in the EEC proposals, combined with a high level of internal price supports, would generate increased levels of production, which, in turn, would lead to a serious displacement of imports from third countries, and eventually create problems of surplus production within the EEC itself. It was pointed out that, if the EEC area were to be enlarged, it would increasingly be able to exert a predominant influence on world trade in agricultural products. The Committee stressed that the main element in determining the impact on international trade of the Common Agricultural Policy was the general price policy to be laid down by the EEC Commission. It received assurances from the representative of the EEC that the Community would be willing to discuss with third countries any difficulties arising from the implementation of the CAP regulations, and that the Community was prepared to discuss with GATT Committee II regulations on other agricultural products as they came into force.

Canadian Import Surcharges

The Contracting Parties considered the action taken by the Canadian Government in June, 1962, in imposing temporary import surcharges and the circumstances which necessitated this action. The Contracting Parties welcomed the steps already taken by Canada in the elimination of the temporary surcharges and the stated intention of Canada to eliminate the remainder as quickly as circumstances permitted. They also recommended that the remaining surcharges be eliminated expeditiously, and requested that Canada report to the Contracting Parties in the early part of 1963 on action taken to this end.

The Minister of Finance informed the House of Commons on November 15 of the decision of the GATT Contracting Parties, and said that the Canadian Delegation was instructed to support this decision, which was fully in accord with the policy of the Canadian Government.

Election of Officers

At the conclusion of the 20th Session, the Contracting Parties elected Mr. J.H. Warren as their Chairman for the 21st Session. Mr. Warren, who served in the Department of External Affairs from 1945 to 1954, and from 1957 to 1958, is Assistant Deputy Minister of the Department of Trade and Commerce.

21st Session

The Contracting Parties decided to hold the 21st Session in Geneva from October 22 to November 15, 1963.

NATO DEFENCE PLANNING – ATHENS MINISTERIAL MEETING

In a long session March 30 Council discussed the various elements of NATO's defence problems as they have been distinguished in the course of Council meetings over the past two months. We shall deal in this message only with that part of the discussion which bore directly upon the spring Ministerial Meeting. In the light of what happened it should be borne in mind that this part of the discussion came at the end of a difficult afternoon.

2. Secretary-General began this part of the meeting with a fair and objective summary of where matters stood with respect to the discussion of defence questions at Athens. There had, he thought, been considerable progress on the broad subject of guarantees (i.e. those matters covered in paragraph 7 of NDP/62/2) and on the matter of nuclear information to be provided primarily by the USA. He was now less certain however that the question of guidelines could be brought before the Ministers.<sup>1</sup> He reminded the Council that his whole approach to discussion of defence questions had been on the basis of a step by step consideration of the various interdependent elements. Until a week ago this method of approach had seemed to be achieving its purpose. As a result primarily of the USA statement of March 21 (our telegram 757 March 21†) which linked the questions of guidelines, an increase in conventional forces and a revision of NATO strategy,<sup>2</sup> we seemed once again to be turning in circles. In the

circumstances it would be very difficult for him as Secretary-General to include in his annual appraisal an outline of where we stood on the question of guidelines which would be acceptable to all members of the Council. It would also be extremely difficult for him and for the Ministers to deal with the inevitable press questions which would arise. He was convinced that real progress had been made but that progress would seem non-existent if Ministers were forced to explain the differences which had arisen with respect to guidelines. In the circumstances therefore he was not repeat not certain that it would be wise to discuss guidelines at Athens. Perhaps the discussion at Athens on defence questions should better be concentrated on the guarantees which had been forthcoming and on questions connected with the receipt of additional nuclear information. Progress in these fields could not repeat not, however, easily be communicated to the press. In the circumstances therefore the question arose as to whether it would be wise to have Ministers of National Defence attend the meeting since their attendance was bound to attract the special attention of the press. He believed it was his duty to bring these thoughts to the attention of Council at this stage and to ask for guidance as to what might be included in his annual report.

3. A number of Permanent Representatives including those of Germany, Denmark, Norway, Italy and France either directly or indirectly expressed doubts as to the desirability in the circumstances of the attendance of Defence Ministers. All who spoke in this sense however did emphasize that there should be a separate meeting of Defence Ministers, perhaps in Paris in the not repeat not too distant future.

4. The UK Permanent Representative entered a very strong dissent. He agreed with Secretary-General that a good deal of ground had been cleared in the consideration of what NATO strategy should be and a great deal of progress had been recorded on guarantees and on the question of information which would permit the Alliance to deal more systematically and more efficiently with nuclear questions in general. Some difficulties had become apparent now on the matter of guidelines. The Council should not repeat not however despair simply because it had run into these difficulties. A position on guidelines had been recorded in the April 1961 statement on behalf of President of USA. In the UK view Council should take note of this statement (at one point in his remarks he went further to suggest that Council should "accept" these USA guidelines). There seemed to be a tendency to shy away from seeking the collective advice of Ministers. This in the UK view was a very negative way of going at the problem. For the very reason that difficulties had become apparent the advice of Ministers was required or the question would go into "cold storage" until the December Ministerial Meeting. So far as public relations were concerned defence questions were in the mind of the press and if Defence Ministers were not repeat not present the press would speculate as to why they were not repeat not and as to why the Alliance was not repeat not facing up to the real problems which existed in the defence field. He went so far as to say that it would be "disastrous" to take the view that there would not repeat not be enough of substance to warrant the attendance of Defence Ministers at Athens.

5. The French Representative said that while his authorities were prepared to agree to the attendance of Defence Ministers they had done so with some reservation. He was inclined to doubt that there had been sufficient progress as yet to warrant attracting special press attention to Athens by the attendance of Defence Ministers. The press would not repeat not be particularly interested in the general guarantees or in the fact that the Alliance was to receive additional nuclear information. What the press would wish to hear about and would not repeat not hear about was the question of MRBMs and a NATO nuclear deterrent. This would be especially true in the light of the presence of Defence Ministers. USA Permanent Representative said that his authorities favoured a joint meeting but that he could always refer the contrary views of his colleagues to Washington DC if that was desired. He fully subscribed to the UK statement as to the importance of continuing discussions in the light of progress which had been made. He thought there was a good deal of merit in the Secretary-General's suggestion for a somewhat restricted agenda on defence questions at Athens. He agreed that problems of public presentation might arise at Athens but that we would simply not be in a position to "satisfy the press by spectacular announcements." (The implication of Finletter's statement in context seemed to be that, so far as USA was concerned at least, the Athens meeting would not repeat not be seized of the question of a NATO nuclear force.)

6. At this point the Secretary-General boiled over. It was not repeat not in his view wise to go to Athens with subjects which had been insufficiently prepared. The USA statement, whatever its purpose, had really raised the basic issue of NATO strategy. As Secretary-General he no repeat no longer knew where the Council stood. It was very well to talk of progress in general terms but he had certain deadlines for the production of a report acceptable to all. He also had the traditional commitments at Athens to speak to the press and he had no repeat no idea what he could say. He had tried patiently to construct a step by step approach which would permit all members of the Alliance to move in harmony. He had tried to cover up the differences which existed and to bridge those differences slowly and carefully. Now the whole problem of NATO strategy had been dumped on the Council in one package and the slow and careful approach to the most central of all problems of the Alliance had been destroyed. If it was the intention of the USA to press European governments to go to their parliaments and ask for the increase of conventional forces to meet MC/26/4 and MC/55/1 in full, he knew as a political certainty that seven governments would fall. Was this the objective of USA policy? Secretary-General was taken with a slight seizure and had to leave the meeting.

7. In the course of the discussion which followed the Belgian Permanent Representative asked whether the USA was setting the condition of total acceptance by its European allies of the conventional requirements in MC/26/4 and MC/55/1 in return for its nuclear guarantee. USA representative admitted that perhaps the statement made on March 21 could have been better drafted. Yet the misapprehensions which it had raised were only valid if one assumed that the USA was a foolish government. USA was setting no repeat no absolute conditions. Before it would put any proposals to the Council with respect to military requirements there would be the fullest study of their implications. In all likelihood the proposals would not repeat not be based on MC/26/4. The proposals would be put "in the spirit of consultation" as well as and not repeat not as arbitrary requirements [sic]. The authoritative statement of USA thinking with respect to NATO defence policy was that made by Mr. McNamara on December 14 at the Ministerial Meeting.<sup>3</sup> He implied that perhaps it would be best to try to forget the March 21 statement.

8. The rest of the meeting was devoted to a further inconclusive discussion of the attendance of Defence Ministers. From what was said it is clear that the following members are doubtful on the subject: Denmark, France, Germany, Italy and perhaps to a lesser degree Norway and The Netherlands. All of these would accept and indeed many would urge a separate meeting of Defence Ministers at another time in the course of the year. The UK and USA favour the attendance of Defence Ministers at Athens. The rest have indicated a willingness to go along with whatever majority view developed. I put myself in the latter group against the background that the attitude of our Defence Minister would be affected by the substance or lack of it of the defence agenda for Athens. It was left that Council would come back to the subject on Tuesday morning April 3. I believe the instructions which we have are adequate for our needs at that meeting although I would welcome any additional comments you might wish to make in light of the discussion reported above.

They are: (a) NDP/62/4 which sets out the various amendments to guidelines including our own (your telegram DL-556 March 24†); (b) NDP/62/5 which is in our view an unfortunate attempt to cost the build up of conventional forces; and (c) NDP/62/6 which is concerned with the establishment of a nuclear committee on information.

NATO DEFENCE PLANNING – ATHENS MINISTERIAL MEETING

There have been meetings over the weekend between Stikker, Finletter and Norstad in an attempt to clear up some of the misunderstandings which led to the unfortunate developments at Council's Meeting March 30. Secretary-General has now circulated to Council draft conclusions concerning NATO defence questions which might appear in his annual political appraisal and which might be formally adopted by the Ministers at Athens. These draft conclusions and his comments thereon have just appeared in document NDP/62/8. In view of the importance of this document we are including the full text below. Preliminary consideration will be given to it at Council's meeting tomorrow April 3. We realize you will not repeat not be in a position to offer comments for use at tomorrow's meeting, but should be glad to have your comments as soon as feasible.

2. Text of covering note begins:

NATO DEFENCE POLICY

DRAFT CONCLUSIONS TO REPORT FOR ATHENS MINISTERIAL MEETING

As Permanent Representatives will be aware, I intend to record progress so far achieved in our exam of NATO defence policy, in particular the question of the control of nuclear weapons, in my annual political appraisal. I believe that the most satisfactory way of obtaining ministerial endorsement of our work would be to set out in the form of conclusions to my appraisal a summary of the main points on which we have reached agreement in the Permanent Council. These would cover the question of guarantees, the provision of information on nuclear weapons, the decision to set up a NATO nuclear committee and special security arrangements, and finally, the guidelines. Council could invite Ministers to signify their formal agreement to these conclusions.

2. The attached draft shows what I have in mind and might perhaps serve as the main basis for discussion at our meeting on April 3.

3. As regards the guidelines, you will note that I am now proposing a single text for consideration and, I hope, approval by Council. Following discussions which I have held since

Council Meeting on March 30 with a number of Permanent Representatives, I believe that the text in the enclosure, which is based very largely on the USA's proposal set out in the Annex to NDP/62/4, is likely to command general support. It incorporates the proposed UK amendment to (a) which does not repeat not seem to me in any [way] controversial, but shows the Canadian amendment to (c) as an alternative to the existing wording since Council has not repeat not yet had an opportunity for discussing the point.

4. I am also asking Council to decide in (b) between the words "if necessary" and the later, more explicit wording suggested for this passage by USA Permanent Representative.

5. The other changes I will explain orally and the only observation I would add here is that under (a) it seems to me that we ought to provide, however indirectly, for a possible contingency in which only one or two nuclear weapons were used by the USSR with no repeat no nuclear follow up and to which an automatic nuclear response would not repeat not necessarily be appropriate.

Ends.

3. Text of draft conclusions begins:

Against this background the Permanent Council suggested that in order to mark the progress achieved in its review of NATO defence policy, Ministers should be invited to agree as follows:

"1. That the Alliance has received the most satisfactory assurances, first that the USA will continue to place at the disposal of NATO nuclear weapons adequate in number and kind to meet the needs of NATO defence; and second, that the USA and the UK strategic forces will continue to cover as fully as possible in combination with NATO forces all key elements of Soviet nuclear striking power, including MRBM sites, giving equal priority to those threatening the mainland of Europe as to those threatening USA and UK.

2. Council welcomes intention of the USA and UK governments to furnish their NATO allies with the fullest amount of information compatible with the requirements of security on the nuclear weapons and external forces referred to in the preceding paragraph, with a view to assisting their allies in obtaining a full insight into the overall problem of the organization and control of NATO nuclear defence.

3. In order to enable the flow of information to begin, a NATO nuclear committee, consisting of the Permanent Representatives, has been established to receive and study on a permanent and systematic basis nuclear information relating to NATO defence. Committee should give consideration in the light of experience to problems of its own internal organization as well as to the possibility of defining more closely the scope and nature of the information of which it would be the recipient, and of extending its function into the consultative field.

4. Special security procedures shall be observed for the handling of all documentation of NATO nuclear committee in accordance with rules already established by the Permanent Council.

5. As regards the possible recourse by NATO to nuclear weapons in its self-defence:

(a) In the event of an unmistakable Soviet attack with nuclear weapons in the NATO area, the forces of the Alliance should respond with nuclear weapons on the scale appropriate to the circumstances. The possibilities for consultation in this context are extremely limited.

(b) In the event of a full-scale attack by the USSR with conventional forces, indicating the opening of general hostilities on any sector of the NATO area, the forces of the Alliance should (if the integrity of the forces and the territory attacked cannot repeat not be protected by other means) (if necessary) respond with nuclear weapons on the scale appropriate to the circumstances. It is anticipated that time will in this case permit consultation.

(c) In the event of a Soviet attack not repeat not fulfilling those conditions described in (a) and (b) above but which threatened the integrity of the forces and the territory attacked and which could not repeat not be successfully held with the existing conventional forces, the decision to use nuclear weapons would be subject to prior consultation (in the Council) (with NATO governments through the Council).

6. That the Council notes with deep satisfaction the intention of the President of the USA to consult in NATO on the use anywhere of the USA's external strike force if time permitted.

7. That the Permanent Council should press forward as rapidly as possible with its exam of the MRBM question and the conventional forces requirement.

Ends.

DEFENCE – NATO DEFENCE POLICY

As you know Mr. Harkness and I have been from the beginning lukewarm about having a joint meeting of Defence and Foreign Ministers in Athens. Our lack of enthusiasm stemmed basically from our estimate that there appeared to be insufficient matters of substantive importance to warrant the presence of Defence Ministers. We were however prepared to accept the view of the majority in the belief that majority support for a joint meeting would reflect a satisfactory degree of progress on the main defence area of substantive importance i.e. NATO defence policy which, we understand, was to be covered under some five headings beginning with the control of nuclear weapons.

2. We also believed it was important to consider the presentational aspects. The presence of Defence Ministers for the first time at a meeting which traditionally has been devoted to non-military questions would undoubtedly lead to expectations and speculation in the press about the military questions being discussed. We felt that if in fact little of substance on the military side were ready for consideration by ministers this could create embarrassment and could serve to give a misleading emphasis to the defence aspects of the meeting.

3. Our impression from reading your report on the meeting of March 30 and earlier meetings is that members are far from agreement on the central aspect of Mr. Stikker's paper on control of nuclear weapons i.e. on the question of guidelines. While it is certainly true that some advances have been made in respect of the questions of assurances from the U.S.A. and the U.K., and information on nuclear weapons, we think it is relevant to keep in mind that little if any discussion has been devoted directly to the other readings suggested earlier by the Secretary-General e.g. NATO strategic concept, commitment of U.S.A. Polaris submarines to NATO, MRBMs and NATO requirements of conventional forces. In effect, the progress to date has been pretty well related to only a section of one part of the Secretary-General's proposed step by step approach to NATO defence policy. The big issues raised by the USA in Finletter's statement to Council of March 21 will obviously have to be considered but could hardly be ripe for discussion by Ministers at Athens.

4. In the circumstances and in the light of our earlier preoccupations about the presentational aspects which we continue to share, we are still doubtful about the wisdom of having a joint meeting. While we would still be prepared to go along if the majority favours a joint meeting, we do not believe that sufficient progress has been made on substantive defence questions to warrant such a course.

NATO DEFENCE PLANNING – ATHENS MINISTERIAL MEETING

We believe the Secretary-General has prepared a good summary (document NDP/62/8) of the discussions to date and is acceptable as a basis for discussion by Ministers at Athens.

2. We also think that the section on guidelines reflects the general consensus to date and that they should be regarded as a "constructive interpretation of the political directive and the strategic concept" set out in earlier guidance papers. With regard to the alternative language set out in subparagraph 5(b), we would prefer the language "if the integrity of the forces and the territory attacked could not be protected by other means" but we would be prepared to accept the majority view.

3. Regarding subparagraph 5(c), we attach great importance to the alternative language which we submitted. We realize the general understanding is that Permanent Representatives cannot commit their governments except on the basis of formal instructions but we believe that in a matter of this importance we should employ unambiguous language. It is relevant to recall that last fall during the discussion of NATO planning for the Berlin emergency (which dealt in part with plans concerning the possible employment of nuclear weapons) the procedure agreed to in the Council emphasized the basic role and responsibility of governments: e.g. "the plans (to be drawn up by the NATO military authorities will be ... forwarded to the North Atlantic Council for approval by governments through the Permanent Representatives." "The execution of approved plans will be the subject of decisions by governments at the time" (paragraphs 7 and 8 of PO/61/808). If there continues to be a division of views on this aspect of the text I would prefer if it could be left open for Ministers to consider at Athens.

4. On the reference to the "MRBM question" in paragraph 7, we are prepared to accept the inclusion of the present wording provided it is understood it is not repeat not intended that there should be any substantive discussion of this matter at the Ministerial Meeting and that the purpose of this draft conclusion is simply to indicate that this matter will be considered by the Permanent Council at an early date.

5. We are giving some thought to the question of the compatibility of the proposed guidelines with MC95, and, in particular, the points set out in Standing Group's letter, the text of which was contained in paragraph 4 of your telegram 870 of April 2.† We hope to be able to provide you with our views on this matter at an early date.

NATO MINISTERIAL MEETING – ATHENS, MAY 4-6, 1962

The spring NATO Ministerial Meeting, normally attended only by Foreign Ministers, is to be a joint meeting of Foreign and Defence Ministers this year. This is mainly because the Council will be asked to give formal approval to draft conclusions on NATO defence policy, including the question of control of nuclear weapons which have already been thoroughly discussed and generally endorsed by governments. Also, at USA and UK initiative, Defence Ministers will discuss a progress report from the Armaments Committee on 20 special projects under the NATO Research, Development and Production Programme.

No formal agenda has yet been circulated but discussions in the Permanent Council indicate that the main headings will be as follows:

- I. Review of the International Situation;
- II. Secretary-General's Annual Political Appraisal;
- III. Defence questions;
- IV. NATO Research Development and Production Programme;
- V. Economic Problems of Greece and Turkey.

It is expected that Ministers will be asked to take decisions under Items III and V and will discuss matters raised under the other headings.

In the discussions under I the following subjects are expected to come up: Germany and Berlin, with particular reference to the current negotiations on an international access authority; disarmament, with particular reference to the current problems under discussions at Geneva having a direct effect on NATO security arrangements. During the discussion of these items the Canadian Delegation will be guided by instructions approved by Ministers. There will also be the usual review of area problems which, having regard to the location of the meeting, will probably be with particular reference to the Middle East.

In connection with the discussion on Germany and Berlin the Secretary-General has given notice that he will draw attention to the absence of agreement on a total economic embargo as an appropriate response to a Soviet blockage of access to Berlin because Greece, Turkey, Norway, Iceland and Portugal have refused to accept the Secretary-General's formula unless all members of NATO accept the principle of mitigation payments. Existing Cabinet authority precludes Canadian acceptance of the mitigation proposals.

The Secretary-General's Annual Political appraisal is expected to cover a wide variety of subjects such as the "Sino-Soviet Economic Offensive" and the Killian report<sup>4</sup> recommending the establishment of an international institute of science and technology. The discussion will consist of an exchange of views; no decisions or new commitments are envisaged.

The only specific recommendation requiring ministerial decision at Athens arising under Item III will concern NATO nuclear policy. Draft conclusions are to be found in Appendix 1† which also includes appropriate guidance as set out in telegram DL-683 of April 6.<sup>5</sup> In particular the Canadian view regarding the need to consult governments through the Council on the possible use of nuclear weapons should be clearly registered at the Athens meeting.

The only other item possibly involving a new commitment which may come up would be the report on the economic problems of Greece and Turkey referred to in V. As indicated in Appendix 2,† separate guidance on this item will be sought from Ministers in the light of the preliminary discussion in the Permanent Council and after the report has been examined by the Departments concerned for its implications for Canada.

The concurrence of the Cabinet is requested on the guidance for the Canadian Delegation outlined above. The Minister of National Defence concurs.<sup>6</sup>

Paris, April 16, 1962

Dear George [Ignatieff],

The following points might be worth bearing in mind in preparing the drafts for Athens:

(a) The discussion on NATO defence planning will centre on NDP/62/9 of April 13. On the guide-lines the Minister will be expected to refer to the Canadian amendment in paragraph 5(c) on the method of consultation. We do not expect much opposition to this amendment; some Ministers may take the line that it is redundant and that it would be sufficient to refer in 5(c) to consultation "in the Council";

(b) We have not been able to find out how the Americans intend to go about it in making it known that the Council will be consulted "if time permits, concerning the use of nuclear weapons, not only within the Alliance area but anywhere – within or without the territory of the Alliance." (I am quoting from NDP/62/9 of April 13 which is the latest version of this document although, as you are aware, a new draft is in the course of preparation as a result of the United Kingdom's decision to align its policy with that of the United States on this issue.) As a result of the last Council meeting on April 13 the United States now have a fairly free hand in developing this idea since no opposition of any consequence has been raised in Council. It can now be taken [sic] that Norway and Denmark have withdrawn the mild reservation they had advanced at earlier Council meetings. Whether or not the Minister will intend to refer to this matter will naturally depend on the timing and substance of any announcement. On the whole I should think that most of our European partners will publicly welcome this move by the United States. Now that the Scandinavians have fallen in line the only dissent will come from the French;

(c) It is not possible at this stage to predict what the situation will be in Athens in relation to the nuclear test ban discussions in Geneva. Whatever the outcome, however, I have been wondering if some lead could not be taken by the Minister at Athens to suggest that the resources of NATO be applied positively to the problems of disarmament and particularly to the problem of nuclear tests. Could it be suggested for example that the member countries co-operate in establishing a pilot project in the field of verification which would cover exactly within the NATO area what the United States has put forward to the Soviet Union, that is that member countries take all steps envisaged in the Western plan for verification of nuclear tests? Perhaps the Council could play some role as the centre to which reports could be made; perhaps the military authorities could be given the task of inspection. The first stage of this process would be to conduct a NATO exercise designed to test the machinery required by the Western position. A second stage might be to envisage the possibility of offering to make available to the Soviet Union, on a reciprocal basis, the information and experience gained from such exercise. This second stage would have to be left vague for some little time yet.

There are, I am sure, technical, financial, security and political difficulties involved in a scheme like this but you may think it worth pursuing in the context of what the Minister will wish to say on the subject at Athens.<sup>7</sup>

Yours sincerely,

JULES LÉGER

NATO MINISTERIAL MEETING – ATHENS – MAY 3-6

The outcome of the meeting was generally satisfactory from a Canadian standpoint. The prevailing mood was one of moderation reflecting the current lull in the Cold War and there was a relative absence of open disagreement on major issues.

[Une note en marge d'Ignatieff est illisible.]
[A marginal note by Ignatieff is illegible.]

2. During their review of the international situation Ministers devoted most of their discussion to disarmament and Germany and Berlin. There also were short statements along expected lines on regional area problems e.g. U.S.A. on Latin America and the Far East, Turkey on the Middle East, The Netherlands on New Guinea, and Portugal on Angola. There was virtually no discussion and no special U.S.A. statement on Cuba.

Disarmament and Nuclear Tests

3. In reviewing developments at Geneva there was general support for the aims of the conference and for the positions taken by the Western powers at it. Some Ministers and in particular the Greek and German Ministers mentioned the absence of progress at Geneva but were prepared to acknowledge along with their colleagues the essential importance and urgency of the Western representatives at Geneva continuing to work towards agreement.

4. It was the Canadian view which was shared by the other three Western powers attending the Geneva Conference on disarmament that the maximum support from NATO should be forthcoming for the Geneva Conference and that nothing should be said which might prejudice or complicate negotiations. The French delegation attempted without success to include in the communiqué language which would have cast doubt on the possibility of a successful outcome of the disarmament negotiations in view of the past record of the USSR on the question of control. Canada took the lead in opposing such language on the grounds that it was not for NATO to take a public position which would make more difficult the efforts of the negotiators at Geneva to reach agreement and would give the USSR an excuse to accuse the West of insincerity at Geneva.

5. Germany and Berlin. Mr. Rusk and Lord Home took the line in their review of the international situation that for various reasons the Soviet Union seemed to be content to have a lull. In the circumstances they were agreed on the desirability of proceeding with exploratory talks on Germany and Berlin in the hope of arriving at a modus vivendi. The Germans had, through private consultations with the USA, given their consent to the continuation of the exploratory talks on the lines proposed by Mr. Rusk to the Soviet Ambassador in Washington.

6. The German Foreign Minister indicated support for the USA position on the basis of the "Rusk principles" (i.e., international authority on access to Berlin, non-aggression arrangements between NATO and the Warsaw powers, and USSR-USA agreement on non-diffusion of nuclear weapons). M. Couve de Murville voiced no French objections to continued probings but warned of the dangers of their turning into actual negotiations which could lead to the compromise of essential Western interests, to the possible neutralization of West Germany and the break-up of the Alliance.

7. NATO Defence Policy. The Secretary-General's conclusions on the results of the discussions to date on NATO defence policy (i.e. on USA and UK undertakings re deployment of their strategic forces, USA willingness to share a greater amount of nuclear information, and guidelines re consultations and circumstances regarding possible use of nuclear weapons) were endorsed by all members except France (which had reserved earlier in the Permanent Council its position on guidelines and on taking note of USA willingness to consult with its allies on use of nuclear weapons anywhere in world) and Italy which for "constitutional reasons" was not in a position to indicate formal governmental agreement. The discussion was limited to an exchange between M. Couve de Murville who argued that the conclusions represented no change from previous position and M. Spaak who explained in a quiet but effective way the advances reflected in the Secretary-General's conclusions. In the Canadian intervention the point was made that it was our understanding that references in the guidelines to "consultation in the Council" meant consultation with governments through the Council and this was agreed by all.

8. Ministers also heard in restricted session a statement by USA Secretary of Defence during which he reviewed USA nuclear strategy based on an assessment of Soviet capabilities and intentions and went on to indicate the nuclear strength available for the protection of the European region of NATO. In this connection he stressed the need for coordination in targeting of all nuclear capabilities of the Alliance and formally committed to NATO five Polaris submarines indicating more would be added as they became available. He went on to underline the need for the reinforcement of NATO conventional strength in Europe as a means of reducing the danger that a Soviet conventional attack might force a nuclear response by NATO. His statement and short discussion which followed left the impression that the idea of NATO multilateral missile force would be relegated to the background.

9. Scientific Cooperation. In the discussion of scientific cooperation Ministers considered the need to establish an international institute for scientific cooperation but no attempt was made to reach agreement on the recommendations set out in the Killian Report. It was agreed that this matter should be pursued further in the Permanent Council. The Canadian delegation indicated that because Canada had not been represented on the working group which had dealt with this matter to date, the Canadian authorities were not yet in a position to express any views. Our understanding was that no final decisions had yet been made on the recommendations in the Killian Report and we wished to ensure that the Canadian Permanent Delegation to NATO would have an opportunity to express Canadian views before any final conclusions were arrived at.

10. Special Economic Problems of Greece and Turkey. On economic assistance for Greece and Turkey resolutions were adopted which recognized the need for external assistance to these two countries. Approval of these resolutions was regarded by some, and particularly by the United States, as a commitment in principle, for those countries which are in a position to do so, to examine urgently the manner of establishing consortia to coordinate the mobilization of resources needed to ensure the economic development of Greece and Turkey at a satisfactory rate. Ministers also agreed to establish a study group to consider further the special defence problems of Greece.

11. The Canadian delegation expressed general support for the resolutions but made no commitment regarding Canadian assistance or participation in any consortium which might be established. We indicated Canadian preference that the coordination of assistance for these countries should be dealt with by international organizations such as the OECD which have special competence and experience in such matters and this was generally agreed.

12. A report on the special meeting of Defence Ministers which convened on May 3 to discuss the NATO research development and production programme<sup>8</sup> was contained in a separate message.

13. The text of the final communiqué<sup>9</sup> is contained in NATO meeting Athens telegram No. 8 of May 6.†

LONG-TERM PLANNING – ASSESSMENT OF THE THREAT TO NATO

The NATO Council, as you know, are engaged in a review of the whole strategy of NATO in the context of its long-term planning. As part of this study (originally suggested by Mr. Herter) the NATO Standing Group have begun a paper which will attempt to assess the long-term threat to NATO over the next ten years. A copy of the draft outline of their proposed paper (S.G.M.-681-61) is attached.†

Quite properly, however, they have come to the Council for (1) guidance on their basic draft assumptions and (2) on the general framework of the paper and for (3) political, economic and demographic information relevant to any long-term study of this character.

To assist the Council in its discussion of this paper, the Secretary-General (see attached paper PO/61/951†) has made certain minor suggestions regarding the wording of the assumptions and has given his personal support to the overall approach set out in the paper. He has also suggested that the task of collecting the relevant political, economic and demographic material should be given to the Atlantic Policy Advisory Group, the terms of reference for which were approved, you will recall, last November; preliminary discussion in the Council indicates general support for this suggestion.

This matter has been referred for comment to the Chairman, Chiefs of Staff, who has had the benefit of the views of the Joint Intelligence Committee. His reply, copy of which is attached,† indicates that he approves of the general framework of the study (set out in paragraph seven of S.G.M.-681-61), that he has no comment on the assumptions suggested by the Standing Group (set out in paragraph four) and that he approves of the idea that the Atlantic Policy Advisory Group be given the task of collecting the relevant political, economic and demographic information.

For our part we do not share the Chairman's views on the acceptability of the proposed assumptions and of the general framework mainly because neither appears to make provision for possible long-term changes in the character and scope of the Soviet threat to North America. For example the only relevant assumption refers to an increasing military threat "to the Atlantic Ocean areas." The relevant part of the proposed framework for the study is described as "the Atlantic" and an examination of the enclosure (No. 3) dealing with this part indicates that the study will be concerned exclusively with the Soviet threat to sea communications in the Atlantic. Also the proposed section on "other areas" does not appear to allow for any assessment of the future role and influence of Communist China in world affairs.

The Secretary-General appears to have recognized the need to take such considerations into account and has noted in his paper (paragraph three of PO/61/951) that the three suggested assumptions "may require some amplification to allow for the various permutations of the Soviet threat with which the Alliance may be faced in an international situation that is likely to remain fluid for some time to come." Moreover, it seems to us that in the light of some of President Kennedy's recent statements and Mr. McNamara's recent statement at NATO Ministerial meeting on the relationship between the Soviet capability to attack North America and the need for improved conventional forces in Europe, that it would be completely unrealistic not to include in any long-term assessment of the threat to NATO the problem of the probable future Soviet threat to North America.

However, since we assume you would wish any guidance sent to Mr. Léger to be agreed to with National Defence we will, if you agree, take these points up with the Chairman before preparing any instructions on these parts of the Standing Group's study for your signature. The matter, in any event, is still in the stage of preliminary discussion in the Council. In the meantime I suggest we might provide Mr. Léger with some comments on the role of the Atlantic Policy Advisory Group for tomorrow's Council meeting.

In that connection we would agree with the Chairman that the Advisory Group might be able to take on the task of collecting the relevant political, economic and demographic information. At the same time we would agree with Mr. Léger's comment, see attached NATO telegram 71 of January 10,† that a good deal more clarity is required as to what its procedures should be. While there may be some advantage in allowing for flexibility we think the important point to stress is that it should operate at all times under the continuous supervision of the Council and that it should be made clear that any reports or other information which it prepares should be at least noted by the Council before it is sent forward to the Standing Group.

A telegram setting out preliminary comments on the idea of the study and on the role of the Atlantic Policy Advisory Group is attached for your signature, if you agree.<sup>10</sup>

LONG-TERM PLANNING – ASSESSMENT OF THREAT

We have no objections in principle to the Standing Group undertaking a long-term study of this type provided it is clearly tied in with the Council's long-term study of NATO defence planning and strategy. We also agree that it is appropriate for the Council to provide guidance on the points outlined in the Secretary-General's memorandum.

2. We are still considering in consultation with the Department of National Defence the general framework of the proposed paper (paragraph seven) and the proposed assumptions set out in paragraph four. We hope it will be possible to provide you with some guidance on these aspects for next week's meeting.

3. We can accept the Secretary-General's suggestion that the Atlantic Policy Advisory Group be given the task of assembling the political, economic and demographic information required for the Standing Group's study provided it is clearly understood that the Advisory Group will be working at all times under the authority of the Council and that any reports it prepares must be brought to the attention of the Council before transmittal to the Standing Group. In this connection we consider it important to keep in mind the agreed terms of reference for the Advisory Group and in particular that it "should provide the North Atlantic Council with studies on long term policy problems referred to it by the Council" and that "there is a clear understanding that the group would be subordinate to the Council."

LONG-TERM PLANNING – ASSESSMENT OF THREAT

In consultation with National Defence we have considered the proposed general assumptions set out in paragraph 4 of S.G.M.-681-61 and the framework outlined in paragraph (7), taking into account the national comments expressed to date (as reported in your reference telegrams) and in particular the view that the greatest flexibility should be permitted to the Standing Group in the military field and to an "expert group" which might assist with the study in the civilian field. We also appreciate the point made by the USA Permanent Representative that it is the normal task of the military authorities to study the long-term military trends and that what the Standing Group is asking for is assistance in fields in which it is not competent. However, from our study of the Standing Group paper, we are still not clear as to the procedure the Standing Group intends to pursue in actually writing their paper based on the assumptions. Any clarification you may be able to obtain as to how the Standing Group intends to proceed in this regard would be appreciated. In the meantime we are setting out below our preliminary comments.

2. The Standing Group, by inviting the Council to make comments on the general assumptions and on the proposed framework for the paper, within which both military and political trends will be examined, has opened the way for members to indicate any obvious omissions. We could regard both the general assumptions and the framework of an assessment of the long-term threat to NATO as incomplete and misleading if they were not to include North America in an assessment of the possible long-term changes in the character and scope of the Soviet threat. For example, the main relevant assumption (listed as (c)) refers only to an increasing military threat in "the Atlantic Ocean areas." What presumably is intended as the corresponding part of the proposed framework (listed as 3) is described as "the Atlantic" and an examination of the relevant enclosure (3) implies that the study will be concerned exclusively with the Soviet threat to sea communications in the Atlantic.

3. While we would agree (pending clarification of the point raised at end of paragraph 1 above) that it would not be advisable to attempt to establish priorities as between the various assumptions, or to concentrate on one and exclude the rest, we believe that some suitable language should be found to remedy what we would regard as a significant omission. Especially when we recall that the main themes of Mr. McNamara's statement at the December Ministerial Meeting were the indivisibility of the defence of Europe and North America and the new emphasis on the build-up of conventional forces in the interest of more flexible strategy in Europe, it would seem to us to be unrealistic not to make provision for the inclusion in any long-term study of an assessment of the probable future Soviet threat to North America.

4. In the circumstances we would favour a revision of assumption c(2) to read along the following lines: "A Soviet missile and long-range bomber threat to North America as well as a military threat in the Atlantic Ocean areas."

5. On paragraph 7 we would recommend that a new sub-heading (a)4 be added which for section a(3) should read as follows: "the Canada-United States region of NATO and the Atlantic area"; and re-numbering "other areas" as (a)5.

6. A second important omission in our view is that no provision has been made in the general framework for any assessment of the future role and influence of Communist China in world affairs or for an assessment of its future military capabilities. In view of signs of a growing difference of views between Communist China and the Soviet Union on their relations with the West and on their attitudes to world problems and bearing in mind the possibility that China may have in a few years a nuclear capability of its own, we think some provision should be made for an assessment of such considerations in the section dealing with "other areas." While no specific amendment to paragraph 7 would seem necessary and the Council is not being asked to amend the enclosures, we think it would be sufficient if a general understanding could be reached that the Standing Group will take these points into account when it turns its attention to the study of "other areas."

7. Our intention is that you should speak along the above lines and circulate the text of our proposed amendments with an explanatory note. However, because of our special arrangement with the U.S. under NORAD and the fact that such defensive arrangements involve joint Canada-USA intelligence appreciations of the Soviet threat to North America, you should consult first with your U.S. colleague before raising the points contained in paragraphs 2-5 above. In the event he has strong objections to introducing the points you should defer raising this aspect of the long-term study in Council and report back on your discussions with Mr. Finletter. You may however at your discretion raise the second point about Communist China.

For Washington. You might let the State Department know of our views.

NATO – MILITARY PLANNING

Bearing in mind the reports we have received on discussions at the NATO Ministerial Meeting in December I took the opportunity yesterday morning to ask Kohler (Assistant Secretary European Affairs) for an outline of the views and hopes of the Administration particularly in the field of NATO military planning. He described the general USA approach to long-term military planning in this way: from a military viewpoint the fact was that USA had sufficient nuclear weapons and means of delivery for every need of the Alliance. Also, USA had the will to use these weapons in the proper circumstances. It would be “simpler” if the situation could remain thus. However there was the real political problem of reassuring and satisfying the Europeans that the situation was as represented. To this end there had been the commitment of Polaris submarines. For the use of these, and other NATO nuclear weapons as well, the President was prepared to have NATO “guidelines” govern, if the Alliance could work them out. The President was also prepared to see a NATO multilateral MRBM force come into existence, in which NATO would own the weapons and for which NATO would determine the targets. While USA authorities were studying these problems, they had adopted the view that the Europeans should take the initiative in indicating what they would consider to be adequate reassurance for use and control.

2. At the same time, in USA view, Kohler continued, any plans regarding NATO nuclear weapons had to be related to the changed situation, in particular to the serious existing imbalance between conventional and nuclear forces. The Alliance depended excessively on nuclear weapons. It was fundamental that the West should not repeat not deprive itself of a choice between some lesser degree of military response and nuclear holocaust. For this reason the conventional build up should have clear priority over the nuclear weapons problem.

3. Parenthetically, Kohler thought the British failure to maintain the levels of their conventional forces a serious problem here. He pointed out that the British had even fallen below their WEU treaty commitment which had been revised downward to 55,000. This, in his view, was not repeat not for reasons of balance of payments since the Germans were sharing the costs of maintaining the British divisions; the real difficulty was the unavailability of British reserves for an emergency; these could not repeat not be provided without conscription, he thought.

4. Returning to military planning, Kohler said that the NATO MRBM force was less urgent. Norstad’s requirements for MRBMs were not repeat not intended to take effect until 1963. Furthermore, Polaris submarines were already getting on station. The commitment of Polaris submarines to NATO could be worked out with facility once their targeting had been coordinated. In any event an independent European nuclear war was unthinkable. Essentially the nuclear problem was political and psychological.

5. USA, Kohler told us, was preparing to go into the question of NATO control of nuclear weapons. This was important largely in trying to head off tendencies toward independent national forces (first of all, frankly, France) and increased spread of nuclear weapons. If NATO discussion of this subject were to be meaningful it would be necessary to ensure that individuals of competence and experience were available in Paris for the job. USA therefore proposed to send to Paris a high ranking officer from the Pentagon (yet to be designated) and Gerard Smith, formerly Special Assistant to Secretary of State on Atomic Energy matters. Kohler understood that the British foreign representative would be Ramsbotham. He expressed the hope that we too should be able to provide senior experts for these studies.

6. Kohler told us that discussions would be held with Stikker in Washington next week on how to move forward with military planning. USA did not repeat not agree that there should be a "frontal attack" on existing strategic doctrine. On the other hand, after the various questions of nuclear and conventional armament had been studied, some alteration in the political directive was likely to be indicated, he thought. USA however preferred to approach the problem pragmatically rather than by seeking now an agreed revision of the political directive and the strategic concept.

NATO DEFENCE POLICY – CONTROL OF NUCLEAR WEAPONS

In accordance with the decision reached at the recent NATO Ministerial meeting, the Permanent Representatives have resumed their discussion of NATO defence policy. Among the various aspects to be considered are NATO strategy, control of nuclear weapons, MRBMs, commitment of U.S. Polaris submarines to NATO and conventional forces. It now seems clear that the majority of NATO members favour having a joint meeting of Foreign and Defence Ministers in Athens in May and plan to discuss at that time some or all of these aspects of NATO defence policy.

Done Feb. 1. H.B. R[obinson]

2. Background papers are being prepared by the Secretary-General. The first one up for discussion by the Permanent Representatives deals with the control of nuclear weapons (copy attached†). Mr. Léger has asked for our comments.

3. Three central ideas are developed in Mr. Stikker's paper:

(1) Formal assurances on the part of the United States Government that an agreed level of nuclear weapons would continue to be deployed in support of the Alliance; and assurances on the part of the United States and the United Kingdom that their strategic air and naval forces intend to cover all Soviet missile launching bases that are beyond the capacity of NATO strike forces.

(2) Four possible arrangements for political control, the first of which involves a delegation of authority to a select group of countries; the second an automatic commitment by the United States to release nuclear weapons in response to a request from a country attacked and from SACEUR; and the last two involving schemes for arriving at decisions by weighted voting.

(3) Agreed guide-lines to govern any decision to be taken by the President of the United States in regard to the use of nuclear weapons by NATO forces.

Possible Canadian Position

4. The assurances referred to under (1) above are, we believe, chiefly of interest to the European members of the Alliance whose confidence in U.S.A. long-term intentions would probably be reinforced if the U.S.A. were to give such an undertaking. As Mr. Stikker points out in his paper, the statements of Mr. McNamara and Mr. Rusk at the recent NATO Ministerial meeting clearly imply U.S.A. willingness to give such assurances. No Canadian comment would therefore appear to be called for.

Political Control Arrangements

5. The delegation of authority to a select group of countries which would include the United States, the United Kingdom and France as permanent members and other members on a rotational basis would undoubtedly be unacceptable to Canada and many other NATO members. Not only would it set up two classes of NATO members, but it would involve delegating to a small group the right to make a decision which would be of vital consequence to the Alliance as a whole. The second concept involves an undertaking by the United States to grant or order the release of nuclear weapons at the disposal of SACEUR when the government of the country attacked so requests and the request is supported by SACEUR. This could in fact be considered as a retrograde step insofar as it would remove to a considerable extent the discretionary power of the President of the United States and leave it up to the government of the country attacked and SACEUR to decide whether nuclear weapons should be used. Under the present bilateral arrangements (agreements between the United States and national governments whose forces have means of delivery) decisions by the two governments are required before NATO tactical nuclear weapons could be used. However under existing arrangements, the main decision rests with the President of the U.S.A. Short of an amendment to the relevant U.S.A. legislation, we would doubt whether any dilution of Presidential authority, as envisaged under the second concept, would be possible assuming it were considered advisable.

6. The main assumption underlying the system of weighted voting is that it would be unacceptable to the larger powers concerned and impracticable to apply the accepted basic NATO principles of equality of membership and unanimity to decisions involving use of nuclear weapons. The purpose is to broaden the area of responsibility and to offset some of the disadvantages of the present system of bilateral arrangements whereby a decision to use tactical nuclear weapons could be taken by the United States and the country (having a bilateral agreement with the U.S.A.) with forces equipped with the means of delivery.

7. Some of the main difficulties inherent in the system of weighted voting are:

(a) An affirmative decision by the four major powers, the U.S.A., the U.K., France and the Federal Republic, would still have the effect of committing the Alliance as a whole.

(b) By giving voting weights equivalent to size or strength, it cuts right across the long established principle of equality in NATO and could lead to the actual establishment of a big power directorate.

(c) With a decision of this magnitude, involving not only war or peace, but the likely destruction of major European cities, it is possible that the governments of the smaller countries would not wish to put themselves formally in the position of exercising virtually negligible control in respect of such a decision. While it can be pointed out that those countries without weapons don't have any control now, if they were to agree to such a system such action could be regarded as recording formally their willingness to put their fate in the hands of their partners, especially the larger powers.

(d) A serious problem could arise in attempting to decide on the criteria to be applied in determining the weight to be accorded each country's vote. Why, for example, should Canada, which is recognized as having a small but highly efficient force in Europe and naval forces which are essential to the defence of the Atlantic sea lanes, have a vote less than Italy which has often in the past not fulfilled its agreed NATO commitments? (In an earlier paper on weighted voting Mr. Stikker suggested that out of a total of 61 votes, the U.S.A. would have 14; the U.K. and France 7 each; West Germany and Italy 5 each; Canada 4; of the remainder 3 each would be allotted to Turkey, Belgium and Holland down to 1 for Iceland.) While some solution might be possible, the discussions would probably not only prove to be highly complicated but extremely delicate in terms of national pride and sensitivity. It is conceivable that the Alliance might emerge weaker rather than stronger in terms of unity as a result.

8. On the other hand, as there are grave risks in any use of nuclear weapons in Europe, each country is entitled to a voice in any decision to use a weapon which would likely lead to an all-out nuclear war. At the moment, the countries with bilateral agreements with the United States (Italy, Turkey, the Federal Republic, the Netherlands, Greece, Belgium and France) each have a veto in respect of the use of the weapons by their own national forces. They have, however, no control over the use of weapons by any of their partners, except possibly under the general understanding whereby SACEUR has indicated he would consult the NATO Council "if there is time." The present situation is obviously unsatisfactory.

Agreed Guide-Lines

9. You will recall that during a meeting of the Canadian Delegation at the recent NATO Ministerial meeting in Paris Mr. Harkness expressed interest in devising "rules of engagement" to facilitate agreement on an acceptable means of political control over nuclear weapons in NATO. The Secretary-General's suggestions (see Section 13 of attached paper) in this respect appear to be close to what Mr. Harkness had in mind. The Secretary-General's idea is that consideration might be given to such guide-lines in the event that his four suggestions, including his scheme for weighted voting, do not obtain general support.

10. One of the main advantages of having agreed guide-lines would be that the governments of NATO would know with greater certainty the conditions under which the President of the United States would agree to the release of nuclear weapons for use by NATO forces. Under the present NATO guidance directives the problems of when and on what scale nuclear weapons could be used are dealt with only indirectly and in very general terms. For example, the relevant portion of the military directive reads as follows:

“If the Soviets were involved in a local hostile action and sought to broaden the scope of such an incident or to prolong it, the situation would call for the utilization of all weapons and forces at NATO disposal.”

11. This directive, drawn at a time when the Soviet Union lacked the power to strike directly at the source of nuclear weapons and at the bases of the deterrent in the U.S.A., obviously needs to be recast or replaced. Secondly, the suggestions put forward by the Secretary-General involve an element of “automaticity” only in respect of the specific situations described, i.e. (a) first use of nuclear weapons by Soviet forces and (b) full-scale Soviet conventional attack which clearly cannot be contained by NATO conventional forces. In the case of either (a) or (b) the President would “wherever time and circumstances permitted” consult the NATO Council before implementing his decision. In the event of a Soviet attack not fulfilling the conditions described in (a) or (b), the President would be obliged to consult the NATO Council before authorizing the use of nuclear weapons. It is because of the greater likelihood of contingency (b) facing the Alliance that the emphasis in U.S.A. defence thinking has been on giving first priority to the strengthening of conventional forces in Europe to the point where they could contain a massive Soviet conventional attack without recourse to nuclear weapons.

12. Finally, agreed guide-lines would constitute a check on the U.S.A. in the existing situation where the United States is not only the sole supplier and custodian of the nuclear warheads but has in fact the final authority in deciding on whether or not they should be used.

13. A disadvantage of relying on agreed “guide-lines” is that it might not meet adequately the growing demands of certain European countries, and particularly West Germany, for a greater voice in any decision to use nuclear weapons. If these demands continue and are not adequately satisfied, it is conceivable that the West German Government may in the long run be encouraged to follow the French example or form a consortium with the French Government in the development of an independent nuclear force.

14. On balance there is a case for at least going along with an exploration of the guide-line approach as a means of underlining (a) that nuclear weapons should be used only as a last resort and (b) then only under direct political authority.

15. If you agree,<sup>12</sup> we will work out with the Department of National Defence instructions for Mr. Léger on Mr. Stikker’s paper as a whole examining in particular some of the possible advantages of having guide-lines. From Mr. Léger’s report on yesterday’s discussions which has just been received (see attached telegram 270 from NATO†), the majority seem to favour concentrating on the guide-lines concept. We must recognize however that it will be difficult to arrive at any conclusion in NATO on control of nuclear weapons until more progress has been made in obtaining agreement on NATO strategy. To date U.S.A. views on the role of conventional forces have not been fully discussed, nor has the limited discussion to date revealed unmixed support for the U.S.A. position. Also, we shall probably know more about U.S.A. views on the points raised in Mr. Stikker’s paper following his visit to Washington next week.

NATO DEFENCE POLICY

While it is certainly true that the role of the NATO Council in the nuclear field has never been defined, the central fact underlying the present arrangement as we see it is that the United States retains custody and ownership of the warheads and has the final controlling decision regarding their use. Countries with bilateral agreements, of course, exercise an element of joint control but in the final analysis the crucial decision rests with the U.S. The question is whether and to what extent existing U.S.A. authority can or should be shared on a wider basis.

2. President Kennedy's Ottawa speech<sup>13</sup> and other U.S.A. statements indicate a willingness to join with other NATO members in working out "suitable arrangements" for political control provided a practicable sharing can be devised within an acceptable strategic pattern. The U.S. is evidently now prepared to consider NATO guide-lines to govern the use of both strategic weapons (e.g. MRBMs) and other NATO nuclear weapons as well. At the same time, they consider that the main onus is on the Europeans to take the initiative in indicating what they would consider to be adequate reassurances for use and control (see Washington telegram 259 January 30).

3. The problem for consideration is whether it is in the interests of the Alliance to make radical changes in the present arrangements for political control. From our preliminary examination we can see advantages from a Canadian point of view in maintaining existing procedures. However if, as would appear to be the case, pressure is developing from the European members of the Alliance for a wider sharing of control, we would agree with you that it would be advisable to move slowly and to avoid all-embracing schemes. In our view such an approach is advisable not only because of practical considerations but also because of the need to relate any new control arrangements to Western policy on disarmament and particularly to the dissemination of nuclear weapons.

4. We are not attracted by the four suggestions set out in paragraph 12 of the Secretary-General's paper. We would therefore agree with the idea of focussing the discussion in the first instance on the suggestions for guide-lines set out in paragraph 13. These obviously can be linked to the proposals in paragraph 7 for assurances from the U.S. and the U.K. regarding the agreed level of nuclear weapons and the targets which would be covered by the U.S. and the U.K. strategic air and naval forces. We are setting out below our preliminary comments on these two sections:

<sup>13</sup> Voir/See "Address Before the Canadian Parliament in Ottawa, May 17, 1961," in Public Papers of the Presidents of the United States: John F. Kennedy, 1961 (Washington: United States Government Printing Office, 1962), pp. 382-387.

Paragraph 7

5. The assurances referred to in this paragraph are mainly of interest to the European members of the Alliance whose confidence in the U.S. long-term intentions would probably be reinforced if the U.S.A. were to give such an undertaking regarding an agreed level of nuclear weapons which would remain assigned to NATO. A similar purpose would be served if the U.S. and the U.K. were able to give the assurances set out in 7(b) regarding the operational plans of their strategic air and naval forces and the priorities to be assigned certain categories of targets. No Canadian comment would therefore appear to be necessary.

6. In accordance with the view expressed in paragraph 3 (i.e. that we are not convinced of the need for radical changes in the present arrangements) we can see some advantage in the Council seeking the formal agreement of the U.S. Government that the President's decision would be governed by certain understandings or "guide-lines" governing the release of nuclear weapons to NATO forces.

7. As regards the circumstances outlined in subparagraph (a) the main problem would be to identify an "unmistakable" Soviet attack with nuclear weapons. In the confusion likely to surround the opening of hostilities it would be essential to avoid any possible errors or misjudgement as to the first use of nuclear weapons by the other side.

8. In considering the circumstances set out in subparagraph (b) account should be taken of the importance attached by the U.S. (and General Norstad) to the "pause concept" whereby NATO needs to be able to respond to any conventional attack with conventional resistance which will be effective at least long enough to force a pause for a period sufficient to cause the Soviet Union to realize the gravity of the course upon which it has embarked and for Western counter moves as to level of response to be deliberated. In his statement to the December Ministerial Meeting Mr. McNamara stressed that it is [not] within the capability of the Alliance "during the course of the present tensions" to provide sufficient conventional strength for this purpose and that highest priority should be given to acquiring this capability. Related to this concept is the concern that the use of tactical nuclear weapons by NATO shield forces could lead to full-scale nuclear war. In the circumstances we would recommend that in considering the formula set out in subparagraph (b) account should be taken of the need to arrive at an agreed understanding of NATO strategy.

9. Assuming acceptance of the concept of "guide-lines" we attach importance to the proposed arrangements for the U.S.A. to consult other NATO governments. In principle the arrangements for consultation suggested by the Secretary-General are acceptable. There are however two main points which you may wish to bring up in the discussion:

(1) From an examination of existing political and military guidance papers it is apparent that the role of the NATO Council in respect of the employment of NATO conventional forces has also never been defined. Therefore before attempting to deal with the much more complex problem of political control over nuclear weapons it may be worth considering whether any advantage would be served in clarifying what would be the role of the NATO Council, if any, in exercising a degree of political control or guidance in respect of the employment of NATO conventional forces in dealing with some of the situations envisaged in paragraph 6 of the political directive (e.g. local conventional attacks mentioned in paragraph 6(b) of C-M(56)138 Final). For example, in the event of a limited local Soviet or satellite conventional attack on the periphery of the NATO area, would SACEUR be obligated to consult the Council and/or governments, assuming there were time for such consultation, before sending any reinforcements which he might consider necessary.

(2) In view of the importance of the time factor in any emergency, as brought out in previous discussions in the Council, are the Permanent Delegations equipped (e.g. communications with national governments) to permit the Council to be the effective forum for the intergovernmental consultations envisaged by the Secretary-General?

Clarification of these points would, we feel, assist considerably in furthering a useful discussion of possible arrangements for consultation regarding the use of nuclear weapons.

10. It would seem sensible to start with possible Council control (through "guide-lines") over nuclear systems designed to serve fundamentally tactical purposes currently available to forces assigned to or earmarked for NATO under SACEUR.

NATO DEFENCE POLICY

As Mr. Stikker is away today on a visit to Amsterdam I spoke to George Vest, Director of Secretary-General's Office, about halting the trend towards using shorthand of "Ottawa Force." He told me that he fully expected this approach and that he realized how misleading such a term might be. He would immediately bring it to Secretary-General's attention and he thought that nothing more would need to be said (2 groups corrupt) discussion in private Council meeting on NATO defence policy on Monday, Vest said that approach was very timely. If Secretary-General uses the term again I will of course speak to him personally.

2. Later today I had opportunity of a brief talk with Ambassador Finletter and told him of my talk with Vest reported above. He fully agreed and went on to explain that USA Government had an open mind on an MRBM force in Europe, whether it be along lines suggested by President Kennedy at Ottawa or in response to SACEUR's "requirement" for MRBMs in Europe. In considering both issues in NATO they would wish to have political and other non-military factors taken into account, as well as military. It was primarily because of likelihood that if MRBMs were land-based at present time they would be concentrated in Germany that USA had put emphasis on concept of a seaborne missile force. He emphasized however that it was for others to take up and develop the idea but that US would not repeat not press it. He expressed some surprise that no repeat no one had taken up President Kennedy's proposals and he hoped that current discussions on NATO military policy would serve to clarify issue.

3. As you know, Mr. Lange has come out publicly questioning the practicality of NATO multilateral force.<sup>14</sup> I was informed today by Boyesen that Secretary-General was so disturbed by what seemed to him a public rejection of proposed force before it was examined in NATO, that he has asked for a private meeting with Messrs Lange and Krag. This has now been arranged to take place in Copenhagen next weekend. Boyesen tells me that Stikker will mainly outline discussions he had in Washington stressing that neither he nor USA are committed to a multilateral NATO force but that he believes its possibilities should be examined on their merits.

NATO DEFENCE POLICY FORWARD DEFENCE STRATEGY

I had an hour's conversation with General Norstad on March 2 which provided him with an opportunity to elaborate on his comments to Council with respect to Forward Defence Strategy (our reference telegram).

2. I said that I was interested in the relationship between what he had said on February 23 with respect to Forward Strategy and what Mr. Rusk had said at the Ministerial Meeting on December 14 (page 19 of CVR(61)69). Norstad said that there was no repeat no direct relationship between his comments and any new USA policy. He had been somewhat embarrassed at the appearance that as Allied Commander he had “cooked up” something with USA Government. In fact as an Allied Commander he had been urging a build up of conventional forces in terms of MC-70 at least since 1957. It was in his headquarters that the words “pause” and “threshold” had been coined. The concepts could not repeat not be too wrong in that they had been tested against the comments of many experts. The forward strategy had been agreed NATO policy for many years and its stated purpose was to defend the integrity of the NATO area and the peoples in that area. In the early stages a real forward strategy had been impossible because of the lack of forces. He and his predecessors had however continued to move the line of defence as Far East as the forces provided permitted. It was now within sight over the next year or 18 months to implement fully the forward strategy which supreme commanders had been directed for many years to implement.

This is a reference to comments Lange made in the Norwegian Storting (parliament) on February 8. For the relevant portion of the speech, see Oslo to External telegram 40, February 9, 1962, † DEA/50219-AL-2-40.

3. He said that Izvestia had already referred to the subject as a “new Speidel Plan<sup>15</sup> dictated by Strauss” and would probably continue to condemn it. The fact of the matter was that there was nothing new. The strategy continued to be purely defensive. The main change would be in orders given to troops rather than in their physical disposition, if an attack developed the main forces would be ordered to move up to the covering forces in the vicinity of the Iron Curtain rather than the covering forces moving back to the Weser. There would be, over the next few months, a gradual deployment of forces forward but it would not repeat not be a mass movement nor repeat nor would there be deployment to a new solid line on the Iron Curtain. An essential attribute of defensive deployment in the light of nuclear weapons was that there should be depth dispersal and mobility. This he could plan to achieve in the area between the Weser and the Iron Curtain.

4. The further implementation of the Forward Strategy had been affected by two recent developments. The first was that as a result of the Berlin crisis new strength had been put at the disposal of the Alliance which made planning for a move forward in the face of an attack reasonable in military terms, at least within the next year or so. The second factor was the experience gained with Live Oak planning. Live Oak planning was essentially directed to the possibility of selected operations designed to prevent a major conflict. It had become apparent however what could happen if these limited operations were carried out under present planning. The Soviets could take action against an uncovered portion of the defences which would result in the loss of “up to 100 cities” while our gains might be to clear “a few kilometres on the road to Berlin.” This made no repeat no military sense and he doubted that it could be accepted in political terms. He corrected the impression left in his presentation to Council (paragraph 3 of our reference telegram) that he might ask for a new directive to plan for a different deployment of troops. He said that he had, like his predecessors, all the necessary directives. All he needed was the cooperation of countries in providing for new deployments and some additional strength. In Norstad’s view the only change which would be involved in terms of policy would come if the Alliance were to tell him not repeat not to take advantage of increased strength to implement the forward strategy.

5. I asked Norstad what assurances existed from a military point of view that the new deployments which he proposed would not repeat not be used by the Soviet Union to justify similar action on their side of the Iron Curtain. Norstad said that from the military point of view he saw no repeat no advantage for the Soviet Union in doing anything. They already were deployed in depth in East Germany and in a position to reinforce their forward troops within a matter of days. He emphasised that the new deployments which he had in mind would not repeat not bring NATO forces physically into closer contact with Soviet forces than they were at the present since already covering forces were stationed along the Iron Curtain.

6. I then asked him to relate his presentation to what he himself had said in the past about the necessity of being able to force a pause after the outset of any military action. Would it be his intention that the initial shock as far as possible should be taken by conventional weapons? Norstad in response said that he retained military command over any use of nuclear weapons in NATO. In military terms nuclear weapons could be used only if he ordered them to be used. He went over ground which he had covered in previous briefings to Council last year. It will be sufficient in this report to summarize the main points which he made. There were two systems of military control, one arising from the chain of military command of operations itself, and the other through logistics channels, i.e. the marrying up of warheads after their release from stockpiles with carriers. It was his view that, physically, subordinate forces and subordinate commanders should not repeat not be in a position to take any decision to use nuclear weapons. He said that if there was a battalion commander in charge of troops which were being destroyed who had the ability to use nuclear weapons he would not repeat not be worth his salt if he did not repeat not use them. It was therefore essential that such field commanders should physically be deprived from being able to take that decision. He had assured to the best of his ability that this was the case. Hundreds of experts from USA had examined his military control system and their only criticism had been that it might be too stringent. The control system could be changed in time of war but not repeat not at any prior stage, i.e. there was a flexibility in the system which could be introduced but change certainly would not repeat not be introduced in the event of an incident prior to general war. (This explanation is consistent with earlier explanations given by Norstad to Council, e.g. our letter 142 January 30/61.) Norstad went on to say that so far as the use of nuclear weapons was concerned after their release by political authority, he had himself issued instructions that his instructions to field commanders should be issued only in the presence of one of four other officers at SHAPE. (Incidentally he said he would not repeat not have accepted an order from anyone to make these arrangements since they impinged upon his military responsibilities, but he had made these precautionary arrangements voluntarily.) In addition throughout the system of military control two or three people were involved at every stage in carrying out instructions. Finally there was a requirement for "positive action" on the part of responsible officers which would ensure that those receiving the instructions would be aware that the particular officer was not repeat not under duress of local circumstances in issuing his instructions. (Prior to our meeting I had lunch with a Canadian officer in SHAPE whose responsibility it is to test the military control system; he confirmed the tightness of the control which Norstad later outlined.)

7. Turning then to the control questions being considered in Council, I suggested that the present discussions were important in that they were clarifying for the first time the implications of directives given by member governments in 1954 and in 1957. It seemed to me that the problem of control was related directly to the strategy which was to be followed and [we] should try to eliminate elements of automaticity in that strategy. In this context Norstad's stated desire to be able to force a pause in a developing military situation was of considerable interest. Was it militarily possible to have a pause? Norstad replied that the control problem had always existed and had become more vital with the introduction of the first atomic weapon into the shield forces. It was only more apparent and complex since his command was the "third greatest atomic power in the world." These weapons had been provided for the defence of the treaty area. Up to now governments had not repeat not shown any willingness to take a share in control. Control could not repeat not exist simply on a piece of paper. It meant nothing if governments did not accept responsibility and provide a mechanism for exercising that responsibility. It seemed to him that if a decision to assume control were taken through Council it could only mean that some authority would be taken away from SACEUR. He would heartily welcome such a development. It was his view that the problem should be met in the first instance at least by way of guidelines or of rules of engagement. He said that paragraph 13 of NDP/62/2 was in effect his proposal which he had convinced the Secretary-General to include. He did not repeat not believe that the various systems of control outlined in paragraph 12 could be accepted. He reemphasised that in his view the important thing was for governments to decide to accept responsibility for some measure of political control and their first step in this direction could be in extremely general terms such as guidelines. (He said that perhaps he might illustrate his own convictions facetiously: even if governments were to decide on the use of nuclear weapons in some such context as "never on Sunday" the situation would be an advance from his point of view for at least governments would then be sharing some of his responsibilities.) He thought it most likely that in the first instance if governments were to decide that some delegation of responsibility were required they would choose what he called the source of the greatest political and power responsibilities to act on their behalf. This pointed to the President of USA. However as an Allied Commander he would hope that the respective governments of the Alliance would be prepared to assume greater responsibility than at present.

8. Finally the conversation moved to the idea of a NATO multilateral force. Norstad said it was his view that "some people" might be confusing three separate subjects for reasons which seemed sensible to them but did not repeat not make SACEUR's job easier. The first of these was the question of control itself. As he had indicated before, the control problem existed no repeat no matter what new weapons were introduced; or conversely, even if the present nuclear weapons were reduced to one tenth of one percent of what they were, the problem of control remained. The second question had to do with the modernization of existing forces. At present he was being asked to carry out tasks with obsolescent weapons. These had to be replaced by modern weapons systems to do the tasks which he had been given. It was in this category that his request for MRBMs was made to substitute missiles for aircraft. He was not repeat not asking for any new functions or any new role. Finally the third question was that of a strategic force under multilateral command. This was not repeat not a suggestion which he as SACEUR had made. In his view it presented serious difficulties and it involved essentially a reorganization of NATO forces. Some people were attempting to kill the modernization programme which was a necessity by mixing it with the concept of a NATO strategic force which was something entirely different. So far as the strategic force was concerned he was relatively neutral. The essential [thing] with respect to this force in his mind was whether or not repeat not NATO countries wished to take the political decision to exercise a new role. If that decision were taken he would have military views as to what the force should consist of. If it were to be developed it was essential in his view that it be a mixture of land and sea based weapons. He held the view that positive control was far easier to exercise from land than from sea. The political implications of the weapon would have to be considered as well as the military characteristics. It would have to be mobile, remotely controlled and operated by small crews who had no repeat no knowledge of the targets at which they were directing their fire. It would require weapons capable of being precisely controlled at the highest level. In fact he used much of the same argumentation as he had used a year ago on this subject (our letter 171 January 31/61). (You may in this context wish to review Norstad's briefing to Council in January of last year which was reported in a series of messages including our telegram 196 January 27 and our letters 142, 143 and 171, all in January.)

9. Our interview ended with Norstad's critical comments on UK suggestions concerning a NATO nuclear committee which have already been reported to you in our telegram 591 March 3.†

NATO DEFENCE POLICY – CONTROL OF NUCLEAR WEAPONS

The discussion of NATO defence policy in the NATO Council, starting with the problem of the control of nuclear weapons, is now well underway. For the past month the NATO Permanent Representatives have been engaged in a round of discussions on various aspects of the problem of control of nuclear weapons. Because of the complexity and delicate nature of the problem, and to avoid rigidity in the discussion, it was agreed earlier that these discussions should be regarded as informal with the remarks of the Permanent Representatives not to be construed as representing the official views of their governments, unless the speaker were to make it clear to the contrary. At the same time it is taken for granted that when speaking on these questions most, if not all, of the Permanent Representatives are aware of at least the preliminary views of their national authorities.

It is now expected that a preliminary progress report on this question will be submitted for the consideration of Ministers at the forthcoming meeting in Athens, May 3-5. The majority view in the Council now favours the idea of a joint meeting of Defence and Foreign Ministers in Athens in order that consideration can be given to NATO defence policy. The United States, in particular, wants to have a joint meeting mainly so that the present momentum behind the review of NATO defence policy can be maintained.

There have been a number of detailed reports from our NATO delegation on the discussions to date which have been centred mainly on a paper prepared by the Secretary-General. The Acting Canadian Permanent Representative, Mr. Ignatieff, participated in the discussion on the basis of preliminary guidance prepared in this Department in consultation with the Department of National Defence.

The attached memorandum attempts to summarize for your information the main points in the Secretary-General's Paper and the highlights of the discussion to date.<sup>16</sup>

[Ottawa], March 8, 1962

In accordance with the decision reached at the December NATO Ministerial meeting, the Permanent Representatives have resumed their discussion of NATO defence policy. Among the various aspects to be considered are NATO strategy, control of nuclear weapons, MRBMs, commitment of U.S. Polaris submarines to NATO and conventional forces. Depending on the amount of progress achieved during these discussions it is possible that a report on some aspects of NATO defence policy will be submitted for the consideration of Ministers at the spring meeting scheduled to be held in Athens from May 3-5.

Returned Mar. 26/62. [H.B. Robinson]

2. Background papers are being prepared by the Secretary-General. The first deals with the control of nuclear weapons (copy attached†). This has been the basis for a series of meetings of the Permanent Representatives which were held during the past month.

3. Three central ideas are developed in Mr. Stikker's paper:

(a) Formal assurances on the part of the United States Government that an agreed level of nuclear weapons would continue to be deployed in support of the Alliance; and assurances on the part of the United States and the United Kingdom that their strategic air and naval forces intend to cover all Soviet missile launching bases that are beyond the capacity of NATO strike forces.

(b) Four possible arrangements for political control, the first of which involves a delegation of authority to a select group of countries; the second an automatic commitment by the United States to release nuclear weapons in response to a request from a country attacked and from SACEUR; and the last two involving schemes for arriving at decisions by weighted voting.

(c) Agreed guide-lines to govern any decision to be taken by the President of the United States in regard to the use of nuclear weapons by NATO forces.

Formal Assurances

4. On (a) above, the United States Permanent Representative said during one of his first interventions that he would not envisage any difficulty in providing the assurances mentioned. At the same time he indicated that it would be a mistake to attempt to establish a fixed agreed level of nuclear weapons since the primary purpose was to have the right number for the job at hand. In response to requests for clarification he said that the U.S.A. envisaged a level of nuclear weapons "adequate for the execution of approved NATO plans." Two additional points which he made were (i) all bases from which Soviet nuclear strength might be launched against NATO Europe were included in the strategic forces; (ii) no concept existed in U.S.A. thinking for delaying the strikes against these targets until the U.S.A. itself was under attack.

5. At a later stage in the discussion he made, on instructions, a long statement which constituted, in effect, assurances that the operational plans of U.S.A. strategic strike forces specifically provided for striking Soviet missile launching bases which directly threatened NATO Europe. Related points which he made were:

(i) Soviet MRBM sites were included in the top priority class of targets. There was no concept in U.S.A. thinking of delaying their destruction until Soviet installations directly threatening North America had been destroyed,

(ii) The operational plans of SACEUR, SACLANT and strike forces external to NATO Europe were coordinated in one targeting operation,

(iii) Strategic retaliatory forces (external to NATO Europe) were fully capable of attacking the Soviet target system as a whole, even after absorbing an initial Soviet surprise attack. These forces could carry about 1,300 weapons with a combined yield of more than 100,000 Hiroshima-sized explosions.

(iv) In the U.S.A. view, despite the growth of Soviet power, we would expect to maintain a Western preponderance of strategic striking power even if it had to survive a first attack. It was true, nevertheless, that even under the most favourable military circumstances, the destruction of all elements of Soviet striking power could not be assured. It must be recognized that even a small surviving Soviet force could accomplish massive destruction.

Arrangements for Political Control Through Restricted Groups or Weighted Voting.

6. The discussion on (b) above revealed that no member of the Council favoured either restricted groups or weighted voting for the purpose of exercising political control over nuclear weapons. It was apparent that members of the Council supported the idea of restricted groups only so long as they were part of the groups. It was also pointed out that a limited group would be subject to many of the same drawbacks which were involved in attempting to exercise control through the Council itself e.g., the possibility of physical destruction or problems of communication in times of crisis. Similarly on the concept of unanimity versus weighted voting, there was the possibility of disagreement to be faced no matter how small the group might be. In addition, the discussion showed that no matter what groups might be established, all member governments of the Alliance would wish to be in a position to make their own judgments with respect to the use of nuclear weapons.

7. In summing up the discussion, the Secretary-General said he hoped that as far as methods of political control were concerned, the matter of restricted membership and weighted voting had been disposed of once and for all. He thought that if there was a problem of "fifteen fingers on the trigger" it was clearly going to have to be solved by some other method.

Guidelines

8. The majority of Council members have expressed support for the principle of establishing guidelines (point (c) above). None, however, committed themselves to any exact language. There was also little evidence of support for the concept of formally delegating responsibility to the President of the United States to act for the NATO nations; the French definitely opposed it. Also there were further appeals for the provision by the U.S.A. of further information concerning nuclear weapons at the disposal of the Alliance and an obvious desire on the part of many members to make improvements in the matter of consultation between the U.S.A. and member countries concerning the possible use of nuclear weapons. It was also generally agreed:

- (i) That the draft guidelines set out in paragraph 13 of the Secretary-General's paper were intended to apply to existing nuclear weapons which were earmarked for NATO forces and not to further weapons which might be provided (e.g. any multilateral MRBM force) and
- (ii) That the situation at the present time was that the President of the U.S.A. must take the first action with respect to the use of nuclear weapons by way of a decision to release them.

9. The highlight of the discussion on guidelines was contained in two interventions by the U.S.A. Permanent Representative dealing with the guidelines themselves and the "external forces" of the Alliance (i.e. SAC, ICBMs, etc.). Since the language of the guidelines was acknowledged to be of considerable importance and would take considerable time to draft, Mr. Finletter said his authorities hoped that pending completion of this drafting process, the Alliance would be satisfied with the points made by Mr. Rusk at the 1961 December Ministerial Meeting and by himself at a Council meeting in April 1961. These points, which had been approved by the President, were:

"Until some such North Atlantic Council agreement (on guidelines) was reached, the President wishes to make clear his intention to direct or to authorize as appropriate the use of nuclear weapons in the event that the Alliance is subject to an unmistakable nuclear attack, or that NATO forces are subjected to a non-nuclear attack with which they cannot cope."

Mr. Finletter suggested it should be part of the process of elaborating guidelines for agreement to be reached in the Council on the exact meaning of the phrase "with which they cannot cope."

10. The U.S.A. Permanent Representative said he thought those countries in direct contact with the Soviet Union (Norway, Germany, Greece and Turkey) had a special interest in the language of the guidelines, since they were all more subject to conventional attack than other members of the Alliance. The United States, he said, still believed the Alliance should give renewed attention to developing its forward conventional strategy. There was a balance of judgment involved. In the U.S.A. view, a build-up in conventional forces would help in establishing this balance. Two elements made up the balance:

- (i) in the event of a limited attack the process of consultation could not be allowed to be so protracted as to allow that attack to succeed;
- (ii) the U.S.A., however, desired to consult its allies and to have an opportunity to use all non-military resources which might affect the situation before deciding to use nuclear weapons.

Mr. Finletter said there was deep concern on the part of the U.S.A. Government for the more exposed members of the Alliance and for the integrity of their forces and their territories. The means had to exist, however, which would allow for a best judgment to be made at the critical time. The importance of conventional forces in this context was apparent to the U.S.A. authorities.

11. On U.S.A. intentions regarding the use of its "external forces" (SAC, ICBMs etc.) Mr. Finletter referred again to his statement of last April and the indication therein of the indivisibility of the defence of Europe and North America and of the U.S.A. intention to continue to provide for the nuclear defence of Europe with weapons and forces stationed outside the European Theatre. He said he felt certain the President would agree that he would consult members of the Alliance through the Council, if time permitted, concerning the use of U.S.A. strategic forces external to the Treaty area. He thought that at some stage in the Council's discussion it might be possible to develop a "more perfect guideline" in this respect.

12. A number of Permanent Representatives welcomed Mr. Finletter's interventions as a great step forward towards a real sharing of responsibility on the part of the Alliance with the President of the U.S.A. for the use of nuclear weapons. Those who spoke admitted that the facts of the case were that only the President had the ability to release nuclear weapons; they seemed anxious to underline the fact that the President should not be so hamstrung that he could not make the necessary decisions. On the other hand, the offer by the U.S.A. to share additional information and to commit themselves to certain guidelines would to a degree involve all members in the exercise of ultimate responsibility.

13. In response to a number of questions, the United Kingdom Permanent Representative indicated that his authorities were in favour of the principle of guidelines and would prefer the more general language used in Mr. Finletter's statement. On the other hand, his authorities would be prepared to accept any alternative wording "which would not involve automatic nuclear response before the degree of attack had been determined."

Canadian Position

14. The Acting Canadian Permanent Representative Mr. Ignatieff took part in the discussions and expressed in three interventions (Feb. 19, 27 and Mar. 2) preliminary Canadian comments on the Secretary-General's paper. He based his remarks on general guidance furnished by the Department of External Affairs in consultation with the Department of National Defence and approved by the Secretary of State for External Affairs. The main points he made were:

- (i) Problem of control of nuclear weapons is primarily and essentially a political problem involving the exercise of responsibility by governments over the use of force and the use of a type of force which must inevitably increase the dangers of escalation towards all-out nuclear war.

(ii) We can see the need for careful study of the problem and welcome the Secretary-General's step by step approach.

(iii) We seriously question the feasibility of any advance delegation of responsibility for decisions to multilateral authority and of concept of decision by weighted voting.

(iv) The question of political control should be related to other considerations affecting the security equation, i.e., build-up of NATO conventional strength; peace-keeping operations; the importance of preventing further dissemination of nuclear weapons; and control arrangements being considered as part of Western policy on disarmament.

(v) The questions of political control and adequate conventional strength are inter-related. Political control is required in order to prevent the premature use of nuclear weapons. Conventional forces in sufficient strength are required so that the decision to use nuclear weapons is not forced on the Alliance because it does not have other means of coping with a given situation. All members of the Alliance have a common interest in trying to ensure that governments have as much opportunity as possible to exercise judgment, control and diplomacy before having to consider resorting to nuclear weapons.

(vi) Assuming acceptance of the concept of guidelines we attach a good deal of importance to the proposed arrangement for consultation by the U.S.A. government with other governments. While, in principle, the arrangements for consultation described in the Secretary-General's paper seem reasonable, further clarification is required as to what the role of the NATO Council would be.

Future Meetings

15. It appears to be generally agreed that the Permanent Representatives have gone about as far as they can usefully go at this stage in considering the Secretary-General's paper. Consequently, the next one or two meetings will be concerned with a United Kingdom proposal for a NATO committee which would act as a clearing house for information on nuclear matters, share in the peacetime administration of nuclear weapons committed to NATO, and be consulted on aspects of nuclear deployment and policy in Europe. Also, the Permanent Representatives may turn their attention soon to a suggestion by General Norstad to implement more fully than has been possible heretofore the agreed NATO concept of a "forward strategy" in Allied Command Europe taking into account the increased amount of forces now available as a result of the recent build-up, and the need to do whatever is possible to avoid an all-or-nothing response to Soviet pressures. These proposals will be dealt with in separate papers.

NATO DEFENCE POLICY – CONTROL OF NUCLEAR WEAPONS

In a memorandum of March 8 we attempted to summarize for your information the highlights of the discussion in the NATO Council up to March 6 on the complex question of control of nuclear weapons. The discussion centred mainly on a paper prepared by the Secretary-General (document NDP(62)2) paragraph 13 of which set out suggested language for guidelines designed to govern any decision to be taken by the President of the United States in regard to the use of nuclear weapons by NATO forces.

2. During the course of the discussion it became clear that the majority of the Permanent Representatives supported the principle of establishing guidelines. None, however, committed themselves to any exact language. As part of the drafting process, the Secretary-General submitted last Thursday a redraft of paragraph 13 (text contained in NATO Tel. 649 of March 9, copy attached†). As we understand them these paragraphs mean that:

(a) the countries having possession of nuclear weapons (U.S.A., U.K. and France) will release them for use without necessarily consulting other governments in the event of

(i) an unmistakable Soviet attack with nuclear weapons on the NATO area,

(ii) a full-scale Soviet conventional attack indicating the opening of general hostilities on any sector of the NATO area;

(b) in all other cases, and where the Soviet attack could not be successfully held with existing conventional forces, the decision to use nuclear weapons would be subject to prior consultation in the Council;

(c) in cases (a) and (b) governments having possession of the weapons have an obligation to consult the other governments, where time and circumstances permit, before releasing the weapons for use.

In our view the new paragraph 13 is more acceptable than the original because (i) the old wording appeared to envisage a decision by the U.S.A. to release nuclear weapons for use, without prior NATO consultation, in the event of a Soviet conventional attack which could not be contained by NATO conventional forces and (ii) the original wording did not appear to include the U.K. and France who as possessors of nuclear weapons, should also be covered by these guidelines. For these reasons we think the new wording represents an improvement and appears to be generally acceptable subject to certain changes which we have suggested in the proposed telegram of guidance referred to below.

3. Since the language of the guidelines is acknowledged to be of considerable importance and considerable time will be required before agreement is reached, the United States Permanent Representative confirmed at the meeting of Permanent Representatives on March 8 that his authorities hoped that the Alliance would be satisfied with the following interim arrangement on the adoption of agreed guidelines. He indicated that the following points were regarded as "existing guidelines" so far as the President of the United States was concerned:

(a) It is the President's intention to direct or to authorize as appropriate the use of nuclear weapons in the event that (i) the Alliance is subject to an unmistakable nuclear attack or (ii) NATO forces are subjected to a non-nuclear attack with which they cannot cope;

(b) If time permitted, the President would consult members of the Alliance through the Council on "the use of nuclear weapons anywhere within or without the territory of the Alliance."

4. Mr. Finletter specifically asked if reaffirmation on an interim basis of these guidelines, and the President's commitments with respect to consultation concerning the use of U.S.A. strategic forces, would be acceptable to the Council.

5. The Secretary-General's redraft is up for discussion at a private meeting of the Permanent Representatives tomorrow, Tuesday, March 13. The Delegation has asked for an indication of our preliminary views. The attached telegram of guidance,† prepared in consultation with the Department of National Defence, is submitted for your consideration and approval, if you agree.

6. You will observe that it does not deal with Mr. Finletter's suggestion that governments might be willing to accept on an interim basis the guidelines by which the President is currently operating. In view of the short time which we have had to consider this question (the telegram came in over the weekend) and the importance of the subject, especially the idea of the President consulting the Council, where time permits, on the use by the U.S.A. of nuclear weapons anywhere in the world, we thought it would be advisable to indicate to our Delegation that we would like to have more time to consider this matter.

NATO DEFENCE PLANNING – GUIDELINES

In the light of the information contained in NATO Paris telegram 723, we would be grateful if you would make informal enquiries at the State Department with a view to determining

(1) The motives underlying U.S.A. offer to consult in NATO on use of nuclear weapons anywhere in the world.

(2) U.S.A. intentions regarding future action in the light of apparent reluctance in the Council (see NATO telegram 704) to sidetrack current discussion of Secretary-General's draft guidelines to consider U.S.A. suggestion.

2. We are inclined to share Delegation's worries about the need to avoid premature decisions or announcements on a matter of this importance. It would seem advisable to concentrate on guidelines relating to use of nuclear weapons by forces assigned to or earmarked for NATO with a view to having a draft available for consideration by Ministers at Athens meeting. With relatively short time remaining before the Ministerial meeting, we can see considerable advantages in not complicating the issue by attempting to consider the U.S.A. proposal.

NATO DEFENCE POLICY – CONTROL OF NUCLEAR WEAPONS

The Permanent Representatives are continuing their round of informal private meetings on various aspects of the problem of control of nuclear weapons. Progress to date has been slow. The intention is to try to have available for the consideration of Foreign and Defence Ministers in Athens in May draft guidelines designed to govern a decision taken by the President of the United States relating to the use of nuclear weapons in the defence of the NATO area, and to describe the circumstances where consultation with other governments through the Council would be required before resorting to the use of nuclear weapons.

2. During the discussion the United States Permanent Representative described the guidelines on the basis of which the President is currently operating. Mr. Finletter's explanation of these guidelines made clear not only the President's intention in respect of weapons to be used by NATO forces but also the President's intention to consult, if time permitted, members of the Alliance through the Council on "the use of nuclear weapons anywhere within or without the territory of the Alliance."

3. The United States Permanent Representative also expressed his government's intention to supply, provided effective security procedures can be devised, the other members with a good deal of detailed and important information relating to the disposition and plans for nuclear weapons in the NATO area as well as information concerning U.S.A. strategic forces and their targets.

4. In view of this U.S.A. willingness to share a greater amount of nuclear information with their partners and in the light of the evident desire of certain members (particularly Germany) for a greater amount of influence in the formulation of NATO nuclear policy, the United Kingdom has suggested the idea of establishing a special committee to receive the information on a systematic basis and possibly to exercise certain advisory functions. The Secretary-General has put forward some refinements of this U.K. proposal. These matters and the question of adequate security procedures are currently under examination.

5. The attached memorandum<sup>17</sup> attempts to summarize the discussion of these questions for your background information.

NATO NUCLEAR POLICY – CONTROL OF NUCLEAR WEAPONS

I attach for your signature, if you agree:

(i) A memorandum to the Prime Minister summarising as briefly as possible the main points put forward by Mr. Stikker which will be considered by Ministers at Athens and the reasons why it would be in the Canadian interest to accept the Secretary-General's proposals as a basis for discussion. A more detailed memorandum is attached to explain the argumentation more fully.

(ii) A telegram of guidance to Mr. Léger for use when the Secretary-General's proposals are discussed next Friday. To date Mr. Léger has had no official guidance on the Secretary-General's paper, text of which was set out in attached NATO telegram 869 of April 2.† The attached telegram to NATO has the support of Mr. Harkness.

NATO DEFENCE POLICY – CONTROL OF NUCLEAR WEAPONS

Agreement was reached this week in the NATO Council that the meeting in Athens should be a joint meeting of Defence and Foreign Ministers and that one of the main subjects for discussion should be NATO defence policy with particular reference to the problem of control of nuclear weapons.

To prepare the ground for the discussion of this question, the Secretary-General has suggested that Ministers at Athens be asked to:

(1) note with satisfaction the assurances received from the U.S.A. regarding the availability of nuclear weapons for the defence of the NATO area and by the U.S.A. and the United Kingdom regarding the targeting of their strategic forces;

(2) welcome the intention of the U.S.A. and U.K. Governments to furnish the NATO allies with the fullest amount of nuclear information compatible with security in order to assist their allies in obtaining a full insight into the overall problem of NATO nuclear defence;

(3) agree to the establishment of a NATO nuclear committee, consisting of all the Permanent Representatives, to receive and study on a permanent and systematic basis nuclear information relating to NATO defence;

(4) agree to the establishment of special security procedures;

(5) accept general guidelines outlining the circumstances under which nuclear weapons would be used and the extent to which there would be prior consultation with governments through the Council. The general sense of these guidelines might be summarized as follows:

A NATO nuclear response on a scale appropriate to the circumstances would be made:

(i) in the event of unmistakable Soviet nuclear attack; in such circumstances the possibilities for consultation would be extremely limited;

(ii) in the event of a full-scale conventional attack indicating the opening of general hostilities; in such circumstances it is anticipated there would be time for consultation.

In the event of a Soviet attack not fulfilling the conditions described in (i) and (ii) the decision to use nuclear weapons would be subject to prior consultation in the Council. We have proposed an amendment which would make it clear that the prior consultation would be with governments through the Council; however, no agreement has yet been reached on the wording of this section.

(6) note with satisfaction U.S.A. intention to consult, if time permitted, in NATO on the use of their strategic forces anywhere in the world;

(7) instruct the Permanent Council to press forward as rapidly as possible with the examination of the conventional forces requirements of NATO and of the "MRBM question."

After consultation with the Department of National Defence we have come to the conclusion that we can accept the above proposals as a basis for discussion by Ministers at Athens. We intend, however, to continue to press for language in the guidelines relating to consultation which will make it perfectly clear that any decision to use nuclear weapons in situations which are not either an unmistakable Soviet nuclear attack or a full-scale conventional attack would be subject to prior consultation with governments through the Council.

We also intend to make it clear that our acceptance of the reference to the "MRBM question" is on the understanding that there will be no substantive discussion of this question by Ministers at Athens since the preparatory work on this has not progressed far enough. In our view the purpose of this draft conclusion is simply to indicate that this matter will be considered by the Council at an early date along with the question of the NATO requirement for conventional forces, which is being stressed by the U.S.A. Government.

A more detailed outline of the argumentation is contained in the attached memorandum.† I believe, and Mr. Harkness concurs, that it is in the Canadian interest to accept the proposals as a basis for discussions at Athens.

NATO DEFENCE POLICY – CONTROL OF NUCLEAR WEAPONS

As part of its consideration of "guidelines" the Council will discuss at its meeting on Friday, April 13, the compatibility between the guidelines set out in the latest paper prepared by the Secretary-General (text contained in paragraph 5 of attached NATO telegram 869 of April 2) and the main points raised in the Military Committee's report on the military aspects of the control of nuclear weapons in NATO. The Standing Group has expressed its concern that this question of compatibility be examined in the Council and has summarized in a letter to the Secretary-General the main aspects of MC95 which require consideration (see attached NATO telegram 870 of April 2†).

2. The Standing Group's summary reads as follows:

“MC95 visualises four broad categories of military action: A nuclear surprise attack; a nuclear attack after strategic warning; a conventional attack and a hostile local action. In the case of the nuclear surprise attack the compression of time will place a severe restriction on decision-making. In the other three cases there will be time for consultation in varying degrees. Therefore, the Standing Group considers that any guidelines developed by the NAC must on the one hand take account of the nuclear surprise attack wherein compression of time places a most severe restriction on any decision-making, and on the other hand permit consultation with varying degrees of available time for the other categories.”

3. We have examined MC95 in consultation with the Department of National Defence and we are generally satisfied that its main conclusions are compatible with the proposed guidelines. There are, however, two additional points which we feel should be included in any instructions for Mr. Léger.

4. The first is that the NATO military authorities should keep in mind the overriding authority of the Council as the channel for expression of views of member Governments and therefore should not go too far in reaching firm conclusions on the military side until the discussion in the Council on guidelines is completed.

5. Second, the political directive of 1956 and the existing military guidance papers clearly imply that NATO military planning should proceed on the basis of the possibility of using nuclear weapons in the event of an attack greater than a local hostile incursion or small scale attack. For example, the military guidance paper (MC14/2) states that if the Soviets were involved in a local hostile action and sought to broaden the scope of such an incident, or to prolong it, the situation would call for the utilization of all weapons and forces at NATO's disposal. Since the Military Committee's report is predicated on these existing guidance papers and refers to them in the section entitled “strategic concept” we think that importance should be attached to the Secretary-General's proposal that when agreement is reached on guidelines in the Council they should be regarded as a “constructive interpretation of the political directive and the strategic concept” which form the basis for current NATO planning.

6. These points are included in the attached telegram of instructions to Mr. Léger† which is submitted for your signature, if you agree. The Department of National Defence has expressed its concurrence.<sup>18</sup>

NATO DEFENCE POLICY – CONTROL OF NUCLEAR WEAPONS

Our NATO Delegation has been informed (see attached NATO telegram 941 of April 11†) that the Secretary-General intends to seek agreement at the meeting of the Permanent Council tomorrow, April 13, on his draft decision (document NDP/62/6) on the establishment of a NATO nuclear committee to receive and study on a permanent and systematic basis nuclear information relating to defence. The substantive part of this draft decision has already been summarized in the Secretary-General's proposed draft conclusions for Athens (document NDP/62/8 – text contained in NATO telegram 869 of April 2) which were dealt with in your memorandum to the Prime Minister of April 6 and in the longer memorandum attached.

2. The proposed committee referred to in the attached draft decision† (as amended) represents a major improvement over the original U.K. idea which was to have a restricted committee composed of the Standing Group countries and to give it certain advisory functions. There was however strong opposition from Canada and other members to the concept of restricting the membership to certain countries. As a result, the present formula of a committee of the whole would appear to be acceptable from a Canadian point of view.

3. Also, the present formula appears satisfactory insofar as it leaves open for further consideration the setting up of regional subcommittees and the question of the committee of the whole exercising advisory functions. This is in line with the position we adopted during the discussions in the Council. It seemed to us advisable to wait and see how the committee of the whole worked in practice before giving it any consultative or advisory functions or setting up any regional subcommittees.

4. The proposed security procedures cover the communication, classification of information, and filing arrangements. They prohibit the transmission of nuclear information by cipher, or any electronic means, and request countries to restrict to an absolute minimum the number of persons who may have access to this information. These procedures have been examined in the Department and in the Department of National Defence and are considered to be generally acceptable from a Canadian point of view.

5. We have discussed the above points and the draft decision NDP/62/6 with National Defence who agree with us that its acceptance should raise no difficulties from a Canadian point of view.

6. If you agree, a telegram advising Mr. Léger to this effect is attached.<sup>19</sup>

NATO DEFENCE POLICY – MRBMs

After a hiatus since the Athens Ministerial Meeting this subject was reopened in restricted session at Council's meeting on June 15 with a most substantial statement of USA position on the creation of MRBM forces. The concluding paragraphs of a long USA statement are included at the end of this message. They summarize the more detailed arguments advanced in the rest of the statement, the full text of which will be sent to you by the next bag.

2. The Secretary-General led off the discussion with a reference to the task set by Ministers at Athens for the continuation of study by the Permanent Council of NATO defence problems. He said in the interim he had been trying to develop primarily procedural suggestions as to how the Permanent Council should tackle the task. He had concluded that the "step by step" approach used in the development of the guidelines which had formed the basis of the discussions in Athens offered once again the best procedural approach. The priority problem was consideration of the MRBM requirement put forward by the military authorities. It seemed to him that [a] problem which was as complex as that presented by this stated requirement should be discussed in stages if progress was to be made. His thoughts had led him to suggest a three-stage approach to the problem consisting of

(a) a detailed study of the military requirement presented, including the numbers and kind of MRBM which might be needed;

(b) a study of the estimated cost of meeting the military requirement; and

(c) a study of the consequences of a political decision –

(a) to accept the military requirement as stated in whole or in part,

(b) to reject the requirement, or

(c) to consider alternative methods of meeting the requirement.

He had a rough draft paper on this subject which he proposed to provide to members of the Council as a basis for discussion if this procedural approach recommended itself. He had discussed his approach with USA delegation and wished to discuss it further with SACEUR before producing a paper for Council's consideration. He hoped that he could produce that paper for consideration at a further meeting of Council on June 21. In the meantime USA delegation had requested that an opportunity be provided for a statement of USA views.

3. Finletter introduced his formal statement with an indication that the procedural suggestions made by the Secretary-General seemed reasonable insofar as USA was concerned. He referred to the past history of the MRBM question and specifically to the reservation entered last fall by USA<sup>20</sup> with respect to SACEUR's stated requirement for MRBMs. He linked his statement therefore directly to Council's decision of October 31/61, the text of which is included in document CM(61)102. The effect of that resolution was to defer for further study action on the proposals of the NATO Commanders for the provision of MRBMs and SSNBs. USA Government position had now been developed and he wished therefore to present "carefully considered USA governmental views" on the subject. In oversimplified terms the burden of the statement was that in USA view there was no repeat no urgent military requirement for the MRBMs proposed by the Military Commanders but that the building up of a multilateral MRBM force could have considerable importance politically. USA was therefore prepared, if her allies wished to participate in an MRBM force, to join them in creating a multilaterally owned, financed, controlled and manned seaborne MRBM force.

4. After Finletter had made his statement the Secretary-General said that it was his understanding that USA was willing to consult further with its allies with respect to what had been set out as a national point of view. He understood as well that consultation on the procedural basis which he the Secretary-General would be suggesting was acceptable to USA. He hoped therefore that discussion on June 21 could be mainly of a procedural nature and he undertook at that time to make his thoughts available in writing. He expressed the hope that firm national positions would not repeat not be taken with respect to the whole subject too early in the discussions since this made correlation of national views so difficult. He believed that the experience gained from discussion leading up to Athens guide lines suggested the desirability of breaking these very complex subjects into manageable elements for a discussion.

No document discussing this USA reservation has been found.

5. Belgian representative emphasised the importance of two elements of USA statement. First was the recognition of the political importance which might be attached by other members of the Alliance to the matter of a multilateral MRBM force. The statement implied recognition of the argument that Europe could no longer exist as a "protected state" but would be granted an opportunity to take part in the production, control and targeting of an MRBM force. The second element was the emphasis in the statement on the seaborne nature of any multilateral force. Speaking for his own country he said that the seaborne concept was the only one which would be acceptable to Belgian Government. Turning then to the procedural suggestions made by the Secretary-General, he believed that intellectually they were sound. He warned however that the separation of elements in this complex [matter] could lead to difficulties. It was for example difficult to talk about the military requirements per se without giving consideration to the political consequences of whether or not repeat not such weapons would be land or sea based.

6. I agreed with my Belgian colleague as to the importance of USA statement and suggested that two priorities should be borne in mind in our future consideration of this topic. The first was the overriding importance of political factors in the consideration of the MRBM problem and the desirability therefore of setting such individual elements as costing, location, etc., in their proper political framework. The second priority which struck me was USA paper itself. While it could be said to be a national viewpoint it was at the same time a paper which only USA Government among the Alliance could produce. In that sense it could be considered at least in part as a draft charter for the atomic policy of the Alliance as a whole. Other national papers were not repeat not likely to be comparable in scope.

7. A number of other Permanent Representatives, including those of Italy and Denmark, welcomed the reopening of the discussion on NATO defence planning and emphasised the high importance which they attached to the statement of USA views. They recognized the advantage of the step by step approach but emphasised as well the need for general instructions from governments on principles which would guide the detailed discussions because of the extreme political importance of the subject matter.

8. It was agreed then that Council would meet on June 21 to hear the more detailed views of the Secretary-General with respect to procedure. It is not repeat not impossible however that the clear expression of USA views may lead some other governments to put forward views of substance even at that early date.

9. The classification given to this message is that given to USA statement by its authors.

10. The following is the text of the concluding paragraphs of USA statement:
Begins:

To Sum up our View on the Military Requirement. The Alliance position on the MRBM should be viewed in the context of global nuclear war. In this context, USA believes that already programmed, rapidly growing, nuclear forces are adequate to meet Alliance needs, and USA is willing to continue to bear the responsibility of dealing with targets which its forces plan to cover, if the other members of the Alliance do not repeat not wish to take part in the building of a NATO force to deal with some of these targets.

We believe that these programmed forces are sufficient to deter any rational Soviet initial resort to nuclear weapons or all-out non-nuclear attack.

If deterrence fails, these programmed forces have the capability to destroy the greater part of Soviet nuclear forces, albeit at high cost in terms of possible resultant damage to the West.

We believe that such a devastating nuclear exchange would bring any advance of Soviet ground forces toward Western Europe to a halt. If not repeat not, the capability of programmed forces of varying kinds and ranges to master their Soviet counterparts and to attack Soviet ground forces and supply lines would meet the Alliance's tactical needs.

Therefore, the coverage of Soviet targets, including SACEUR's threat list, will remain effective, despite the fact that Europe-based strike aircraft will be declining in utility during this period as a means of delivering nuclear weapons.

And we believe that the Alliance forces which can accomplish these tasks represent about the right mix of different systems. USA does not repeat not believe, therefore, that MRBMs are urgently needed for military reasons.

The Multilateral Force

We realize that our views may not repeat not be wholly shared by all members of the Alliance. This difference need not repeat not prevent the Alliance from taking useful action in the MRBM field, if a sufficient desire for such action exists in the Alliance. Such a program for expanding our nuclear striking power would, of course, have military utility; and it could have considerable importance politically.

If our allies wish to add MRBMs to NATO forces and to participate in an MRBM force, USA is prepared to join them in creating a multilaterally owned, financed, controlled, and manned seaborne MRBM force. USA would be prepared to facilitate procurement of MRBMs only under multilateral ownership, control, and manning.

Any such multilateral force should be seaborne to avoid the political problems associated with land-based deployment, to minimize vulnerability and collateral damage, and to permit genuinely multilateral control and manning. When we say a multilaterally manned force, we mean that the manning of each vessel, and of the missiles aboard each vessel, should be genuinely mixed; obviously, this does not repeat not mean that each vessel need have fifteen nationalities aboard – three nationalities should suffice to create a balanced crew in which no repeat not single nationality is predominant.

If such a force were established, presently programmed Alliance nuclear forces should, of course, be reviewed from the standpoint of possible resultant reduction in those programmed forces.

Planning for the use of any such MRBM force could be worked out by the Alliance in the light of its continuing consideration of strategy, the role of the force in that strategy, and other relevant factors. In this process the views of SACEUR – especially concerning targeting – would naturally be taken carefully into account.

It would be essential that construction of such an MRBM force, if it should take place, be undertaken parallel to a continuing vigorous build-up of NATO non-nuclear forces. Establishment of such an MRBM force would be contra-productive if it diverted resources from that build-up. There would, of course, be substantial costs to NATO associated with an MRBM program, even if we cannot repeat not now estimate this magnitude with precision. Because of these substantial costs and the availability of other forces which I have mentioned, we do not repeat not believe that an initial sea-based MRBM force should be larger than about 200 missiles. Whether further steps might eventually be useful is a question which the Alliance need not repeat not decide now. We currently estimate that the cost of 200-250 MRBMs would be about $2 billion. These cost estimates are tentative and preliminary. USA would pay an appropriate share of this cost, but the bulk of this expense would necessarily fall upon European participants in such a force. North Atlantic Council will need to consider how this cost should be met, and how to insure that this undertaking does not repeat not interfere with the necessary appropriations for conventional forces. Ends.

NATO DEFENCE PLANNING – MRBMs

In my judgement, the statements recently made by Mr. Finletter in the Council are completely consistent with those previously made by Messrs Rusk and McNamara at the Paris and Athens meetings. Mr. Finletter's statements are a continuation of the strong American initiative which began in Paris. This initiative reflects the appreciation of the Kennedy Administration concerning the political and military necessities of NATO. The principal American objective seems to be the achievement of MC 70 force goals in quality and quantity. At the same time the USA is going to considerable lengths in order to demonstrate that nuclear forces under US control are and will remain sufficient to satisfy all military requirements of the alliance, and that, if necessary, the USA is prepared to use these forces.

From the American point of view the MRBM seems clearly to be a subordinate issue, but one which, for political reasons, the USA cannot brush aside. The US position also appears to be quite clear. There is no purely military requirement for a NATO MRBM force since the necessary military capability is provided by US forces based outside of Europe. The USA has stated its willingness to assist in the establishment of such a force, subject to certain conditions, of which the most important is "multilateral control." However, the NATO MRBM is, from the American point of view, essentially a political requirement.

In undertaking the present initiative the USA seems to have three specific aims in view:

- (a) To relieve the USA of the charge of failing to take account of the legitimate preoccupations of its allies;
- (b) To place pressure upon the European members of NATO to face up to the problems involved in the control of nuclear weapons, and more specifically to accept the fact of US control or to propose some feasible alternative; and
- (c) As a maximum objective, to provide an alternative to the development of "independent national" deterrents, and to provide a face-saving line of retreat, if not for General de Gaulle, then for some future French government.

In addition, there is the more general aim of maintaining momentum in the Council discussions.

The Secretary-General has proposed that the MRBM be considered in three stages:

- (a) A detailed study of the military requirement, including the numbers and type of MRBM required;
- (b) A study of the estimated cost of meeting the military requirement;

- (c) A study of the political consequences of a political decision:
  - (i) to accept the military requirement as stated in whole or in part;
  - (ii) to reject the requirement; or
  - (iii) to consider alternative methods of meeting the requirement.

The conspicuous omission is the problem of political control of the MRBM force. This might or might not be comprehended under Mr. Stikker's final heading. The ambiguity maintained with regard to this complex and contentious point seems to be deliberate. However, this problem can scarcely be overlooked. The United States has made a condition that the force must be under "multilateral control." The meaning of this condition is, of course, very far from clear, and will presumably at some point require considerable elucidation.

The Canadian Position

The principals in this debate seem to be the USA, the major European nations, especially Britain, France and Germany, and SACEUR. Canada is to some extent a bystander. At any rate it is not yet clear that any unique and distinctive Canadian national interest is involved. Our principal national concern, therefore, lies in the political solidarity and military effectiveness of the alliance.

The specific question confronting us seems to be the course of the debate and the extent to which we are able to influence it in one direction or another. There is no question about whether or not the discussion is going to take place because it is underway. We may, however, possess a certain ability to turn the discussion in directions which from our point of view would be more rather than less desirable.

Generally speaking, the principal aims of the USA seem to be consistent with our major national interests. The situation which would suit us best is that within NATO all nuclear weapons should be wholly and exclusively under the control of the United States. However, we, like the United States, must take account of the preoccupations of the Europeans. Almost any formula or device which would halt the pressures towards the creation of so-called "independent" national deterrents would deserve our support. In this respect, the discussion itself offers certain opportunities, and principally that of encouraging the European members of the alliance to recognize more frankly the mutual advantages involved in American control.

From the point of view of this Department it does not seem appropriate to suggest any particular line to be followed by the Canadian Representative in the Council. However, there are three topics which can be suggested and which you may feel the Canadian Representative could usefully undertake to explore at some stage in the discussion. These are:

- (a) political control over the MRBM force;
- (b) the contradictions between the US National Representative and SACEUR;
- (c) the apparent contradiction in the statement of the US Representative with regard to the adequacy of US nuclear forces to deter conventional attack or if need be defeat it, and the need stated by Mr. Finletter for stronger conventional forces.

Control over MRBM

Political control over the MRBM force represents an intractable and quite possibly insoluble problem. If this were to be the first topic considered, it is likely that the discussion would come to a halt or would bog down in generalities. However, the problem must be considered at some point, and it is most particularly in Canada's interests that it should not be passed over lightly.

It might therefore be advisable for the Canadian Representative to propose that "Political Control of the MRBM Force" should be added as item (d) to the Secretary-General's list. This place on the list can be justified on the grounds that the problem cannot usefully be considered in the abstract; it must be considered in the light of all relevant circumstances including characteristics of the weapon and operational plans for the employment of the force.

The USA might be invited to explain its views with respect to "multilateral control." However, it would seem more advantageous from a Canadian point of view, not to ask this question of the Americans prematurely. We might perhaps hold off until such time as similar questions can be asked of the Europeans. Our basic position might be: those who want something must say what they want.

Differences between the USA and SACEUR

As matters stand there seems to be a flat contradiction between the US National Representative and SACEUR. SACEUR says that he has a valid military requirement for the MRBM. The US National Representative says that he has not. My general impression is that there is no great difference with regard to the military capability required. However, SACEUR says that he must have this capability under his control, while the USA says that this capability can, without military disadvantage, be provided by forces under US national control and based outside of Europe.

When SACEUR appears before the Council it may be worthwhile for the Canadian Representative to bear in mind the following general questions with a view to defining the differences between SACEUR and Mr. Finletter more precisely:

(a) Does SACEUR believe that the present US capability is in some respect inadequate? At present? In the future?

(b) Does SACEUR consider that there is some military disadvantage in relying upon externally based forces under US control? Coverage of targets? Time?

(c) Are SACEUR's reasons primarily political although expressed in the form of a military requirement?

It is possible that the differences between SACEUR and the US National Representative may involve fairly subtle differences in emphasis. It is also possible that SACEUR may shift his ground. In these respects DND has nothing to suggest, but we shall be most interested in the impressions gained by the Canadian Representative.

Conventional Forces

There is an apparent contradiction between certain of the statements made by the US Representative:

.... USA believes that already programmed, rapidly growing, nuclear forces are adequate to meet alliance needs, and USA is willing to continue to bear the responsibility of dealing with targets which its forces plan to cover ....

We believe that these programmed forces are sufficient to deter any rational Soviet initial resort to nuclear weapons or all-out non-nuclear attack.

It would be essential that construction of such an MRBM force, if it should take place, be undertaken parallel to a continuing vigorous build-up of NATO non-nuclear forces ....

The US Representative might be invited to clarify this apparent contradiction. His reply is likely to be along the following lines:

(a) Although the USA has a pronounced advantage in nuclear forces, it must be extremely reluctant to rely upon this superiority in all foreseeable circumstances, such as a renewed Berlin crisis; and

(b) With the passage of time the relative Soviet position will improve.

The aim of the question would be to place the US position on the record, and to develop some pressure upon the European members of the alliance to agree or disagree.

Summary

So far as can be seen Mr. Finletter's statement involves nothing not said by Messrs Rusk and McNamara at the Paris and Athens meetings. In general, although we may disagree with American tactics, there is, from the Canadian point of view, no reason to disagree with American objectives. It now seems clear that the Americans are determined to press forward and that Mr. Finletter is thoroughly briefed. On the latter point there was previously some doubt. The "coming attraction" is likely to be the reaction of the French.

NATO DEFENCE PLANNING – MRBMs

We agree that you may support any consensus in Council to base the next stage of the discussion on the MRBM problem on the U.S. statement of June 15 rather than on the military requirements set forth in MC/4 by General Norstad.

2. For your own information, some of the reasons for supporting the U.S. statement as a basis for a discussion are:

(1) It is in the Canadian interest to encourage any development that will limit the tendency towards national nuclear forces. Since one aim of the U.S. statement is to provide the Europeans with an alternative to national nuclear forces, it would appear advisable to go along with any consensus in Council to use the U.S. statement as a basis for discussion.

(2) The U.S. statement of June 15 emphasizes that first priority is still to be given to the build-up of NATO non-nuclear weapons, an approach which we have supported in the past.

(3) The United States is the senior partner of the Alliance and is the power which will provide the missiles for any eventual NATO MRBM force.

4. We would not wish at this stage to offer detailed comments on the U.S. statement of June 15.

SECRET AND PERSONAL

Ottawa, July 25, 1962

Dear George [Ignatieff],

You will recall that during a meeting of the Panel on Economic Aspects of Defence Questions last April at which you were present, the Chairman, Chiefs of Staff, made the statement that the CF-104 to be supplied to the Air Division was capable of using conventional as well as nuclear bombs. Later on this statement was deleted from the minutes of the meeting.

On June 4 we wrote the Chairman, Chiefs of Staff, to ask for information on the proposed armament systems for the CF-104. The Chairman, Chiefs of Staff, was asked whether the aircraft as they come off the production line will be capable of employing conventional weapons and, if so, what types? If not, he was asked what change in the aircraft or its armament system would be required so that the aircraft could use conventional weapons. The Chairman, Chiefs of Staff, was also asked if the NATO forces were required to contain something short of the large scale Soviet conventional attack in Europe without resorting to nuclear weapons, could the CF-104 be used? There has been no reply to our letter.

Other questions that occur to us are related to the storage of nuclear weapons to be used for the CF-104. On the assumption that the Canadian Cabinet agrees to the Air Division training for a possible nuclear role (with the reservation that the Air Division could not use nuclear weapons without specific Canadian Government authority after consultation) where would NATO/US planners expect to store these weapons and what would be the physical and security conditions of storage? In view of the Canadian policy of requiring consultation through Council with the Canadian Government before the Air Division could be used in a tactical nuclear strike role, do NATO planners believe that the Air Division is vulnerable because of its forward redeployment and do they wish it to be redeployed from the forward areas so that it could still be used if and when Canadian Government approval is received? Would the time lag necessary for a Canadian Government decision (whether the Air Division is redeployed or not), require a change in the operational role of the Air Division and, if so, could the CF-104 be used in any other role than as a tactical strike aircraft? There is also the question of the protection of the CF-104 against surprise attack.

Similar questions have occurred to us with respect to the use by the Canadian Brigade of Honest John surface-to-surface missiles with nuclear warheads. It has been argued in the past that these weapons are not strictly necessary for the Brigade (they are heavy support weapons and the Brigade is highly mobile). As you are aware, however, the Brigade is both logistically and operationally tied to the British Army of the Rhine which itself is heavily dependent on tactical nuclear weapons. Could the Canadian Brigade fight as part of the BAOR without nuclear weapons or could the Brigade be separated from BAOR and used in a conventional role elsewhere? If so, on whom would it depend for logistic support and under whose command would it be?

I thought it might be useful for you in any talks which you or your military adviser might have with SACEUR or other senior SHAPE officers, to have an idea of the kind of questions to which in the coming months we will need the answers. We appreciate that factual information will be difficult to come by but will appreciate anything you can gather.

Yours sincerely,

N.A. ROBERTSON

P.S. I am aware from conversations with Ross Campbell since his return from Geneva that additional problems are posed with respect to the CF-104 by virtue of the practice of rotating units on alert duty and having such units armed when that occurs. This practice would seem to rule out any standby arrangement not backed by an agreement sanctioned by the Government. An additional complicating factor would appear to be the location in France of the Canadian CF-104 bases so long as the French Government refuses to allow on its soil nuclear weapons not under its control.

NATO DEFENCE STRATEGY

Last July Mr. Ignatieff informed us that he had the impression that most members of the Council would wish to base the next stage of the discussion on nuclear strategy on the U.S. statement of June 15 rather than on the military requirements as set forth in MC26/4 by General Norstad.

2. At that time our NATO Delegation was instructed (see flagged telegram DL-1130 of July 23) to support any consensus in Council to base the next stage of the NATO MRBM discussion on the U.S. statement.

3. During the summer recess the Secretary-General took it upon himself to prepare a paper which he now proposes should be the basis for the next stage of the discussion on this subject. For the reasons outlined to Mr. Ignatieff in our DL-1130 of July 23, we would prefer to support any move to base discussion on the U.S. statement of June 15.<sup>21</sup>

4. Now that the Secretary-General has prepared a paper on his own which he will presumably introduce in Council, it would be awkward to try to exclude his paper and to concentrate only on the U.S. statement of June 15 as the basis for the next stage of the discussion on defence strategy. We have, therefore, somewhat revised Mr. Ignatieff's suggested statement (see Telegram 2063 of September 5†) to take the Secretary-General's paper into account.

I agree. [N.A.] R[obertson]

5. Attached for your signature, if you agree, is a letter to the CCOS† asking for his comments on the attached draft telegram to the NATO Delegation† outlining the Canadian statement to be used in the Council discussion of September 18.<sup>22</sup>

6. We have not asked for the CCOS's detailed views on either the U.S. statement of June 15 or the Secretary-General's paper. Since many of the issues involved are of an international political character rather than strictly military, we should prefer that the responsibility for the first draft of any comments that may eventually be required for the discussion on NATO defence strategy remain in this Division.

7. Attached for your information and reference are flagged telegrams:

ARMAMENT SYSTEMS – CF104

1. Reference is made to your letter of 4 June, 1962,† in which you requested clarification with respect to the proposed armament system or systems for the CF104.

2. This aircraft in its original configuration was designed as an interceptor to be armed with a 20 mm gun and the Sidewinder air-to-air missile. In anticipation of a requirement for an aircraft to fulfill a ground attack role, the F104 was further engineered to enable it to carry Center Line and Wing Pylon stores. These included many varieties of general purpose and Napalm bombs. Later, complicated electronic equipment, such as special computers, was added to give the aircraft a nuclear carrying capability. This is the version of the F104 being procured for the RCAF. Technically and financially it was more feasible to leave the previously engineered weapons capability in the aircraft and this was done. However, no provision has been made for conventional weapons and associated support equipment, nor the training of technicians and aircrew in their use. Thus, while it is correct to say that the CF104 has an engineered capability to carry conventional weapons after some modification of the aircraft equipment, the Air Division CF104 squadrons, for the reasons stated, will not have this capability.

Signed by USSEA & sent by hand 13/9. R[oss] C[ampbell]

3. You also asked for my views as to whether or not the CF104 could be used to assist in the containment, without resorting to nuclear weapons, of something short of a large-scale Soviet conventional attack in Europe. In that event the force, as presently planned, could fulfil a very limited reconnaissance role only. To enable the force to take on a wider conventional role it would be necessary to provide support equipment and weapons and train technicians and aircrew in the use of conventional weapons in addition to their primary role.

4. It is perhaps not generally appreciated that, today, given the types of weapons that are available, as well as the very sophisticated delivery systems and techniques required, the effective delivery of one type of weapon on target requires quite different tactics and skills from those required for delivery of another type of weapon. These differences are particularly significant in the case of nuclear versus non-nuclear weapons. In fact, after a pilot has been initially trained in a particular set of techniques during an intensive course at an Operational Training Unit and is assigned to an operational squadron, there is barely sufficient time available for him to both stand his share of the required alerts and to perform the real and simulated flying exercises necessary to maintain proficiency in the delivery techniques previously learned and their application to his several pre-assigned targets. In the case of the RCAF Air Division, which has a secondary role of reconnaissance, the problem will be particularly acute.

5. Your reference to the use of the above information by our NATO Delegation in discussing the re-equipment of the Air Division at the forthcoming Triennial Review is not understood. As far as NATO and the Triennial Review is concerned, Canada has agreed to provide this force as a part of SACEUR's nuclear strike force. This has been stated in former annual reviews. Any change in this commitment is a matter of high policy and not one that should be discussed in the Triennial Review process unless the Canadian Government decides to withdraw its commitment. I do not see that the Canadian Delegation should discuss alternative armament for the CF104 with the International Staff on the Triennial Review at this time.

NATO DEFENCE STRATEGY

Finletter came to see me privately over weekend about handling further discussions on NATO defence strategy.

2. He said that USA concept of effective nuclear defence as put forward by President Kennedy at Ottawa in 1961 and subsequently, represented in USA view an offer to bring European allies of NATO into the fullest possible participation in a centralized and multilaterally controlled nuclear force which was as important in the defence field as the Marshall Plan had been in the economic. This was prompted mainly by political considerations including USA concern about the proliferation of nuclear weapons through independent nuclear deterrent systems which would ultimately weaken and destroy the Alliance. They also recognized that Germany could not repeat not be excluded indefinitely from an appropriate share in nuclear defence.

3. Most disappointing development had been British reaction. Thorneycroft had made it clear in Washington that he would not repeat not favour a multilaterally controlled seaborne force and denied that there was any urgency in trying to meet German pressures to acquire nuclear capability.<sup>23</sup>

4. Finletter said that Germans were willing to go along with an exploration of possibilities of a MRBM seaborne force along the lines suggested by USA. He also claimed that French would at least go along with study without committing themselves. Other European allies were definitely interested in the idea but there was nobody who could pick up the ball and run with it as there had been when the Marshall Plan was launched.

5. Elements in USA paper could be broken down under following heads:

- (a) question of strategic MRBM weapons for Europe;
- (b) question of replacement of obsolescent missiles and aircraft now available to SACEUR by MRBMs;
- (c) question of increasing conventional forces and decreasing reliance on tactical nuclear weapons.

6. Finletter indicated that USA was inclined at present to shelve discussion on (c) to avoid confrontation of strongly differing views particularly between USA and Germans while they tried to find a solution to problem of nuclear defence on the strategic scale by means of a multilateral seaborne force. Finletter stressed that USA views were by no repeat no means fixed and that they were prepared to consider any reasonable solution in an attempt to accommodate British, French and German interests even including an amendment to the McMahon Act. Specifically they would not repeat not even insist on an American veto if sharing of control were worked out on a sensible basis insofar as the multilateral force was concerned.

7. As regards (b) Finletter's thought was to follow up Italian suggestion that question of whether or not repeat not the obsolescence of missiles and aircraft under SACEUR's command required substitution might be remitted for advice to military committee. Obviously Council would have to discuss the political implications in the light of military committee's recommendations.

8. As to (a) Finletter's concern narrowed down to the problem of how to proceed with a discussion of USA concept of effective nuclear defence on the strategic scale in the face of UK opposition as well as the differing views of the other allies. He expected de Staercke to press his demand that USA concept should be the basis for further discussion but he was not repeat not too happy about having the discussion proceed in Council where he thought it would quickly bog down as the result of allied differences. USA he repeated was not repeat not anxious to get early decisions but on the other hand expected some constructive responses to the President's proposals having regard to the important political implications which the absence of a solution would have in terms of proliferation of nuclear weapons and the strains on allied solidarity. The only procedural idea which he came up with was that he might invite some Permanent Representatives to an informal consultation with him to explore USA proposal but frankly asked if we had any ideas to suggest as to how to proceed with the study.

SECRET AND PERSONAL

Paris, October 3, 1962

Dear Norman [Robertson],

In my letter to you of September 12,† I said I would be visiting the Air Division to discuss the CF-104 problem. I did so on October 1. Through discussions with Larry Wray and the Air Division staff at Metz, and through visiting one of the wings of the Division at Grostenquin, I am in a better position to discuss some of the points you raised in your letter of July 25.

2. The picture I have received is this: the Air Division are clearly going ahead on the assumption that all the necessary decisions which would permit them to serve in an offensive role with the CF-104 will somehow be taken. So far as I could see, they have no alternative plans of any kind. The first aircraft is due to arrive this month. Co-operation with the USAF is excellent. Within the limits imposed by United States legislation and the absence of a weapons agreement between Canada and the United States, practical preparations to convert the Division to nuclear-armed CF-104s are going forward. Pilots are undergoing conversion courses at Cold Lake, runways are being repaired and improved to take the faster, more delicate aircraft, and weapons storage bays are being constructed on the German fields used by the Air Division. The staff say that by mid-summer the first squadrons would be able to pass the rigorous U.S. inspections which are required if weapons are actually to be stored on their bases, assuming that a storage agreement had been signed three or four months earlier.

3. Whatever is decided, the air defence rôle of the Division will be dwindling throughout this period. It would disappear entirely by November, 1963. If no new rôle for the Division were agreed to in the meantime, the staff fear that a serious morale problem could arise, because the Division would feel its existence was pointless. At the moment, no such problem exists – rather to the surprise of the senior officers, I think – and none seems likely to arise for half a year or so.

4. However that may be, certain other problems seem inevitable. One is space. The Division at the moment is deployed at two airfields in France and two in Germany, with provision for alternative deployment in an emergency at one other airfield in France and two in Belgium. Since the French Government will not allow nuclear weapons to be stored on their territory, the usefulness of the three French airfields will be sharply reduced once the CF-104 comes into service. The wings will have to be rotated through the two German fields – where nuclear weapons storage is now under construction – in order to fulfill the rôle assigned to them. Because of the general shortage of airfield space in the central area, the Air Division staff consider that they might come under pressure to vacate the German airfields if they were not using them to fulfill their assigned rôle. As to the Belgian airfields, they may possibly be of use in the new rôle, but this is uncertain.

5. Presumably the rotation through the German airfields would of itself add an element of cost, inconvenience and complication to the Division's activities. What is more disturbing, it would increase the Division's vulnerability. As you know, SHAPE has already raised the question of the vulnerability of these fields. With nuclear weapons, it seems that this vulnerability increases in two respects: because weapons will only be available at two fields rather than four or more, and because the nature of the weapons themselves located at an "unhardened" site constitutes temptation to an enemy to attract first. In the event of warning of an attack, the aircraft would presumably have to be got off the ground quickly or risk destruction. The alternative seems to be some elaborate and expensive system for sheltering them.

6. There is also the problem of control. At the moment, the Air Division is assigned to SACEUR. While Air Division headquarters provides administrative control, and has some say in tactical control of the aircraft, they are for all practical purposes a part of the Fourth Tactical Air Force, under command and control of a U.S. general who wears his NATO hat part-time. His headquarters in his NATO capacity are at Ramstein in Germany. If the CF-104 is to have nuclear weapons which cannot be used unless the Canadian government has specifically consented, then the present control system will obviously have to be modified to provide some practical way for this consent to be given.

7. All these, I need hardly say, are extremely difficult and potentially troublesome problems. I hope to have opportunities to discuss them with you personally at some stage, and I hope that opportunities will be taken to obtain Norstad's and Lemnitzer's views when they visit Ottawa. Briefly, my impression is that time is running out on us and that a decision by the Government cannot be long delayed. The choices seem to be to scrap the Air Division, which the cancellation of the conversion to the CF-104 would seem to me to involve; to postpone conversion to gain further time – perhaps no more than a few months – to study the possibility of converting the CF-104 to some other rôle; or to go ahead with a weapons storage agreement with the United States.<sup>24</sup>

Yours sincerely,

GEORGE [IGNATIEFF]

NATO DEFENCE STRATEGY

Pending the resumption of Council consideration of this question, we assume you will be discussing the problem informally with your NATO colleagues. You may wish to use the views expressed in this telegram in these discussions.

Mr. Campbell: we might discuss. [N.A.] R[obertson]

2. We do not believe it would be appropriate for Canada at this stage to make any comments regarding requirement either for land based or seaborne MRBMs during preliminary discussion on NATO defence strategy. For your information, DND is undertaking a preliminary study of relative merits from strictly military point of view of two weapons systems which we hope we shall be able to send you later in year.

3. It appears quite clear that in view of differences amongst Europeans and in view of uncertainty which will continue in Europe until it is known whether or not Britain will join EEC, there will be no decision on a NATO MRBM force for some time to come. Meanwhile discussion of the problem should continue and since Council is to hear the views of General Norstad on October 17 we believe that an opportunity should be provided for the new SACEUR, General Lemnitzer, to address Council on the same subject.

4. At this stage question resolves itself into a procedural one of how to have a full and frank discussion while avoiding a confrontation of differing governmental views. We would wish to see the text of the Belgian procedural proposal before expressing an opinion but the initiative of the Belgian Permanent Representative in attempting to find a procedural basis for consideration of the MRBM problem should be encouraged. You might wish to remind your Belgian colleague that consensus in Council appears to favour an arrangement under which Council itself meeting informally in restricted session would constitute a working group to consider the MRBM problem (see telegram 2168 of September 18†). If this is indeed the case the Belgians might propose that Council establish an open ended working group of those Permanent Representatives who would wish to discuss the problem. If such a working group was established it would have to be on the clear understanding that the views expressed in the group would not commit governments and that the meetings would be restricted.

NATO DEFENCE STRATEGY

Using your useful telegram I had an informal talk with Finletter before he left for Washington today about procedures.

2. I found him entirely in agreement with the ideas in your paragraph 4. The aim he said should be to devise a procedure at this stage which would allow informal exploration of MRBM problem among delegations without commitment of governments. He would prefer in fact that the Working Group of Council should if possible exclude representation from Secretary-General not repeat not only because of the known bias of Secretary-General's views on the subject but also to stress the informality of the discussions. He thought this would not repeat not be acceptable to de Staercke however, whose proposal speaks of the Council constituted as a working group setting up sub-committees as may prove necessary.

3. I will be sending Belgian proposal by bag. In the meantime will discuss the question of procedure in the light of Finletter's comments with de Staercke.

USA PRESENTATION ON SEA-BASED MRBM FORCE

Schaetzel, Deputy Assistant Secretary for Atlantic Affairs, invited me to call November 10 to discuss USA studies on the feasibility of establishing a sea-based multilateral MRBM force. As you are aware a USA briefing team headed by Gerard Smith of State Department and

Seen by P.M. 18/10/62. No comment. O.W. D[jer]

No further action unless Prime Minister expresses a wish to do so. M.N. B[ow]

Admiral Lee of Department of Defence will go to Ottawa November 15 to make a presentation similar to the one given the NATO Council on October 22.

2. Schaetzel said that although the presentation in NATO had been "upstaged" by the arrival of Mr. Acheson shortly after with his statement on Cuban situation, the briefing had gone off remarkably well and had served the purpose which USA had intended. Germans and Belgians in particular have shown considerable interest. French attitude was pretty much as they had expected and, if anything, was less negative than they had anticipated. He said they derived some satisfaction from the fact that French were at least willing to listen and had not repeat not attempted any blocking tactics. The Italians have shown some interest but British attitude, according to Schaetzel, was distinctly puzzling. Smith, who was present during our conversation, said British were more than cool during the briefing in Paris and seemed to go out of their way to point out defects in USA presentation. (The State Department do however appreciate and have respected the British wish to avoid substantive discussions in NATO while EEC negotiations are underway.)

3. Schaetzel said that Turks have shown the most immediate interest in USA proposal particularly insofar as it might be applied to the problem of replacing the Jupiter missiles in Turkey which are becoming increasingly obsolescent as well as of course a subject of Soviet attention. He spoke as if USA authorities were genuinely interested in the possible political advantages of such an arrangement. He said that discussions are underway with the Turks on the possibility of setting up small scale multilateral sea based missile force in the Mediterranean which could serve both as a pilot project for a larger NATO force and provide a means of replacing the missiles in Turkey with a less vulnerable and more modern deterrent force for the defence of the area. Schaetzel said they estimated it would take about two years to set up such a smaller "experimental" Mediterranean force, once agreement were reached. The time required for a larger NATO force would probably be considerably longer mainly because of organizational and training problems.

4. Schaetzel said USA hoped that recent developments in Cuba had brought home to the Europeans the fact that USA possesses enormous deterrent power. Beginning with President Kennedy's Ottawa speech in the spring of 1961, USA had been endeavouring to demonstrate its willingness to participate with its allies in the establishment of a powerful NATO deterrent force which could avoid the necessity of the Europeans attempting to develop a force of their own and which would also greatly increase Atlantic solidarity. They felt it was extremely important however before coming to any decisions that all NATO members should be aware of the facts of USA strategic power and particularly of the complexity and cost of strategic deterrent forces. At the same time USA continued to attach first priority to the build up of adequate conventional forces in NATO and considered that any developments on the strategic side should not repeat not be at the expense of adequate conventional strength in Europe.

5. We asked Schaetzel how he thought the Europeans might be able to cope with both the requirement for increased conventional forces and the heavy expenditures which would seem to be involved in any multilaterally owned and financed missile force. Schaetzel said there appeared to be two possible courses open. The first was for things to remain pretty much as they are with the bulk of strategic deterrent power remaining in USA hands and with the other allies concentrating their efforts more on a mixture of tactical nuclear weapons and conventional forces. Such a course did not repeat not however take into account the facts of life in Europe – the enormously expensive and uneconomical French efforts to develop their own nuclear deterrent which, according to USA calculations, would not repeat not, when completed some years hence, exceed the striking power of one USA strategic aircraft; and the rapid movement towards integration in Europe which in a few years may represent a new third force of some proportions.

6. The second course (which the State Department clearly favours) is designed to take into account the trend of current developments while attempting to preserve and strengthen transatlantic solidarity. In terms of costs Schaetzel thought that it was difficult to envisage a more expensive way of proceeding than to continue on the present course and by way of example he cited General Norstad as saying that French nuclear deterrent would probably cost ten times as much as originally expected. USA hoped that by providing all the facts to the NATO countries on USA strategic forces and detailed studies on a multilateral missile force such information would enable the Europeans to judge whether it was in their interests to proceed along present lines or whether some combined effort on the strategic side was to their long term advantage. Moreover Schaetzel expressed the view that if the European countries were willing to merge their efforts in a combined deterrent force it would be within their economic capabilities to do so concurrently with the necessary build up of conventional forces. The latter were becoming increasingly important in terms of deterring any Soviet threats or adventures in Europe and in terms of preventing the early escalation of any limited hostilities into a nuclear war.

7. Incidentally Dean Acheson whom I saw the other day said that Cuban crisis had shown how in the final analysis USSR was not repeat not prepared to cross the dividing line to nuclear war and he said that this underlined the importance of building up conventional forces in Europe and elsewhere. Acheson attached the highest priority to the build up of conventional forces and clearly questioned the advisability of USA trying to interest its European allies in a joint missile build up involving expenditures possibly so heavy as to limit their capacity to support larger conventional forces. I do not repeat not know however to what extent Acheson's views are shared in the administration.

8. Throughout our conversation Schaetzel and Smith underlined the importance USA attached to the transatlantic aspects of their suggestions for a multilateral force and it seems likely that this consideration will be given considerable weight in Smith's presentation in Ottawa. They felt, however, that governments would require some time to consider the information they have received and thought it would be premature to attempt any substantive discussion at the December Ministerial Meeting on the possibilities of establishing an MRBM force. At the same time, they recognized that some reference may be made to the problem during any discussion of NATO strategy.

9. Judging by this conversation, I would say that there is considerable State Department interest in this project. While its primary purpose at the moment is educational, it looks as if a school of thought is developing which sees some real political advantages in the establishment of a sea-based multilateral force, if only on a pilot basis, now that its technical feasibility has become accepted by USA defence authorities.

10. State Department clearly attaches importance to Canadian reactions and Smith and Lee would like to have opportunity for discussion with responsible senior officials in External (the Under-Secretary in particular) and on the civilian side in National Defence, in addition to the main meeting with Chiefs of Staff.

DOCUMENTS REGARDING A MULTILATERAL SEA-BASED MRBM FORCE

We were surprised on receiving these documents to discover that they are entitled "data regarding an 'Ottawa' multilateral sea-based MRBM force." You will recall that in DL-343 of February 15/62 the Minister asked that the delegation do what it could to halt the trend towards using the shorthand of "Ottawa force" to describe the concept of the NATO multilateral sea-based MRBM force referred to in President Kennedy's Ottawa speech of May 1961. You reported in your telegram 423 of February 16 that you had spoken to both the Executive Secretary, to the Secretary-General, and the USA Permanent Representative and that they agreed that the term "Ottawa force" could be misleading.

2. Neither the Secretariat nor the US Delegation appear to have taken the necessary action to stop the use of the term "Ottawa force." In the circumstances, would you bring this matter to the attention of the Secretary-General's Office and suggest again that this project in future be described in some more appropriate way such as "data regarding a NATO multilateral sea-based MRBM force." You should also have an informal word with Finletter to remind him of the background of this question and explain why we have taken steps to have corrective action taken. We hope this action will make unnecessary any formal statement in Council.

[Ottawa], November 19, 1962

BRIEFING BY U.S. EXPERTS ON A MULTILATERAL
SEABORNE MRBM FORCE – NOVEMBER 15, 1962

The U.S. team, headed by Gerard Smith of the State Department and Admiral Lee of the Department of Defence, gave a briefing on November 15, 1962, to the Chiefs of Staff Committee and a group of senior service officers and officials from the Department of External Affairs. The team also had an informal meeting with the Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs, the Secretary to the Cabinet and the Chairman, Chiefs of Staff. The team covered much the same ground as in the briefing to the NATO Council and this account confines itself to those points on which the U.S. team laid particular stress and to the answers to questions put by Canadian officials.

Reasons for U.S. Policy with Regard to a Multilateral Seaborne MRBM Force

Gerard Smith made clear that the U.S. Government would still prefer to confine the control of nuclear weapons to as few powers as possible and that, ideally, control within the Western Alliance should remain in the hands of the U.S. The U.S. Government realized, however, that with the revival of Europe, the Europeans wished to have a say in their own fate and wished to exercise some control over the use of the nuclear deterrent. In order to meet the pressure from its Allies and, at the same time, stop the proliferation of national nuclear forces and in the absence of international control arrangements with the Soviet Union, the U.S. Government considered that some form of multilateral force as a part of the Western nuclear deterrent was the most responsible method of devolving U.S. nuclear power while keeping control over by far the largest segment of the Western deterrent. At the same time, it was firm U.S. Government policy to insist that the conventional forces of the Alliance be built up sufficiently so that the West would not be as dependent as it now was on tactical nuclear weapons. The U.S. Department of Defence had been ordered to look into the feasibility of creating a multilateral seaborne MRBM force as a first class fighting unit given the will of the Alliance to take part in, to pay for and to supply the continuing logistic support for the force. The answer was that the creation of such a force was practical given the necessary will of the Alliance.

In answer to a question, Smith said that there was no firm U.S. proposal to create the seaborne force but rather that this was one method of having a NATO MRBM force. Smith went on to say that it was his understanding that the type of force outlined by the team was the only way the U.S. Government was willing to support an MRBM force for NATO. The U.S. Government was not prepared to support MRBMs for national forces nor was it prepared to meet SACEUR's request for 400 MRBM missiles as proposed in MC26/4. When asked if the British and French national nuclear forces would be required to form part of this new force as a condition of its formation, Smith said – No, the U.S. realized that this would not be possible and American policy was designed to ensure that no further national nuclear forces (i.e. German) would be created.

Mr. Smith was asked whether it was not a condition of U.S. participation in this force that NATO first complete its build-up of non-nuclear weapons. Mr. Smith said that, while this appeared to have been a prior condition in President Kennedy's speech in Ottawa in May 1961, it was his understanding that the build-up of conventional forces was not a pre-condition for the formation of a multilateral seaborne force and that the U.S. Government envisaged the non-conventional build-up and the creation of the seaborne force going ahead in parallel.

With regard to timing, the U.S. team thought that, in view of the British negotiations with the European Six and the heavy financial commitments necessary to form a seaborne force, it would be premature to reach a decision now. Meanwhile, conversations within the Alliance should continue in order to educate the Alliance as to the commitments necessary to form such a force. Smith said that the more time the Alliance had to experiment with the multilateral aspects of such a force and to deploy the MRBMs in the most rational method possible the better, as the West must try to avoid the problems that arose from the "hurried and irrational deployment of IRBMs in Europe in 1957-58."

Pilot Multilateral MRBM Force in the Mediterranean

The U.S. team confirmed that they were thinking of a small MRBM force in the Mediterranean in the relatively near future (possibly armed in the first instance with Polaris missiles) which would serve as a pilot project for the larger NATO force. Smith said that no policy decision had been taken in Washington though there was serious interest in this project in the Pentagon. Preliminary talks had taken place with the Turks and this pilot force would presumably include the Greeks and the Italians and any other member of the Alliance who wished to take part. One advantage of a pilot MRBM force in the Mediterranean would be that the land-based IRBMs in Turkey and Italy could gradually be phased out. Another advantage would be that this force would be designed to be as similar as possible to the eventual full NATO force so that the various international concepts of the multilateral force could be tested. The Americans expected that the Headquarters for this force would be in the Western Mediterranean (this Headquarters would eventually become the main Headquarters for the NATO force), that the missiles would be provided by the U.S. and that the ships, manpower and real estate would be provided by the European countries.

The U.S. team expected that if it was decided to go ahead with the pilot force there would be no objection on the part of the Mediterranean countries who would indeed welcome such a move. The team thought it likely that the U.S. would maintain control (with the consent of its Mediterranean allies) over the nuclear components of this force but that this would not prejudice the working out of a genuinely multilateral system of control for the nuclear component of the full NATO force, if and when it was created.

Control of the Nuclear Component of a Multilateral Force

In dealing with the problem of political control over the use of the nuclear component of the MRBM force, the U.S. considered the two situations in which this problem could arise:

- (a) A full scale nuclear surprise attack
- (b) A period of limited war leading up to a nuclear conflict.

In case (a) where reaction time is of the essence, the U.S. expects the Alliance to agree that advance authorization to determine the use of the force be given to an individual (presumably the President of the U.S.) or a very small group. In case (b) when the non-nuclear shield should provide time for an Alliance decision to use the force there would be no advance authorization and the decision to use the force would be one of the many decisions facing the Alliance after it was already at war and would be, in effect, an Alliance decision on the conduct of the war.

The problem of military control of the nuclear key to the force would be dealt with in the following manner: The force itself would be controlled for everything other than its nuclear component by a civilian/military NATO MRBM agency with a director and international staff rather like a national ministry of the marine. Targeting for the force would be the responsibility of SACEUR/SACLANT and would be phased into the overall targeting of the Western deterrent. The actual order to fire would be given by the political control authority and would come to the various ships of the force from SACEUR. On the ship itself there would be a nuclear control element made up of a number of personnel which would operate under a system that ensured that no one man could fire the missiles. The Americans evidently have this system on their Polaris submarines and are satisfied that it is foolproof. (Comment: Unfortunately, we were given no details as to how the system works but, if the U.S. is willing, as it has stated, to not share in the manning of the MRBM force if its allies so wish, this is a fair indication that the U.S. authorities consider that this system is satisfactory.)

Vulnerability

The MRBM force would consist of 25 ships (20 operational at any one time) which would be classified as war ships and would not be camouflaged. They would operate in the busy sea lanes of the North Sea, Eastern Atlantic and Mediterranean. The U.S. team were of the opinion that the force would be relatively invulnerable and that, while the Soviet Union had the capability to trail and destroy the force, this would be an extremely difficult operation and bound to compound the Soviet defence problem. The Soviet Union could use nuclear submarines to track the ships (conventional subs would be too slow) but this was an extremely difficult and expensive operation, and the Soviet nuclear submarines had a strike role of their own. The Soviet Union could use planes (the U.S. team said at least 10 per ship would be required) but the problem of overflying NATO territory thus compromising surprise would have to be overcome. Probably the best method would be a fleet of fast fishing trawlers with mother ships but this would require a new Soviet fishing fleet as the present trawlers are not sufficiently fast. The U.S. team appeared to agree that a combination of the above elements could be used against the MRBM force but pointed out that the NATO force itself would only be a small part of the overall Western deterrent and that the Soviet Union probably did not have the forces to deal with the whole deterrent including this new element of it. (Comment: These arguments do not entirely hold water as the Soviet Union has built up a combined air, surface and undersea force to counter the Western carrier strike forces and this force might be expanded to deal with the NATO MRBM ships).

The most convincing argument for the relative invulnerability of this force is that the Soviet Union is in a very difficult position to deal with Western surface forces which have a large numerical advantage and which control the main straits which give access to the North Sea, the Mediterranean and the Western Atlantic. This means that in a period of limited war Western countermeasures could render ineffective any shadowing of the NATO force and in the case of an all out nuclear attack where surprise is essential, it is very unlikely that the Soviet Union could undertake a surprise attack against the force and be sure of destroying more than a segment of it.

Reaction of the Western Allies to the NATO Force and Trans-Atlantic Aspects of the Force

Gerard Smith recognized that the British did not wish to face up to the problem of a multilateral NATO force until their negotiations with the Six were concluded. The British were also not very enthusiastic about such a force and would prefer to maintain their present special relationship with Washington with regard to nuclear weapons, even if this meant including the French. Smith did not think, however, that the British would object to the establishment of a pilot Mediterranean force and he thought that with a sufficiently long period for education and once the EEC negotiations were concluded, the British might be convinced to take part in a NATO force. (Comment: Since the British V-bombers and, therefore, the British nuclear force, will depend on the U.S. Skybolt air-to-ground missile for a prolongation of its life until 1970 and since there does not appear to be any future for the V-bomber force after that date, the U.S. appear to be in a strong position to convince their British allies that they should take part in a NATO force.)

The Mediterranean countries and the Belgians have expressed interest in the NATO force and the Germans also appear to realize that this approach could meet their desire for a European say in the use of the nuclear deterrent without creating concern that the Germans had nuclear weapons and without upsetting the Brussels Treaty which does not permit the manufacture of nuclear weapons by Germany. The U.S. had been pleasantly surprised that the French were at least willing to listen to American suggestions with regard to this force and the U.S. had some hope that, despite the French and British national nuclear deterrents, in time both countries could be persuaded to play a leading part in a multilateral force.

The U.S. Government evidently consider that the minimum membership necessary for U.S. support of a multilateral seaborne force would be all of the Six European nations, though the U.S. hoped the force would be manned by the Six and the U.K. and would prefer manning by all members of the NATO Alliance.

In answer to a question concerning the trans-Atlantic character of the force, the U.S. team said that it was hoped that the NATO force would be manned by U.S. and Canadian personnel as well as European. There were obvious advantages to this politically and it would mean that the force could be co-ordinated as part of the overall Western deterrent rather than being a separate European force. Gerard Smith said that, unfortunately, in the light of present policies in Europe (and by implication in Canada) he thought it much more likely that the multilateral MRBM force would be a European one and the Western deterrent would, therefore, consist of separate European and North American parts.

EQUIPMENT FOR CANADIAN FORCES IN EUROPE

20. The Minister of National Defence said that he, the Secretary of State for External Affairs and Mr. Churchill had held discussions in Ottawa with U.S. government representatives on the possible equipping of the Canadian Air Division in Europe and the Honest John battery with nuclear warheads. The U.S. representatives had given a draft bilateral agreement to the Canadian Ministers, and this agreement appeared to raise no major difficulties. A number of N.A.T.O. allies had previously signed agreements with the United States for the supply of nuclear warheads. Some of these countries had not yet announced the fact that they had entered into such agreements.

21. During the discussion the following points were raised,

(a) More precise information was needed on the terms of the agreements between the U.S. and other N.A.T.O. countries. In some cases the agreements merely permitted the storage of the weapons on the soil of the country, and did not also cover the use of such weapons by the armed forces of that country.

(b) Some said that the government's policy on nuclear equipment for the Canadian forces in Europe should not be detached from the policy on nuclear weapons within Canada. The two questions might be discussed separately, but any future announcement on the subject should cover both aspects.

(c) Most Ministers said that the Canadian forces in Europe should be equipped with nuclear weapons on the same basis as other N.A.T.O. countries. If the U.K. forces were on a better basis than the others, then Canada should follow the U.K. pattern.

22. The Cabinet approved in principle entry by Canada into an agreement with the United States to make nuclear warheads available for the R.C.A.F. Air Division and the Honest John battery in Europe on terms similar to those in agreements between the U.S. and other countries having forces in Europe, subject to further study of the terms and conditions of those agreements.

TOP SECRET AND PERSONAL.

Bonn, December 20, 1962

Dear Norman [Robertson],

As you may know I recently paid my first visit to the 4th Canadian Infantry Brigade Group. In addition to obtaining a broad view of the Brigade's activities and problems I also received from Brigadier Dare an excellent account of the strategic and tactical situation facing him.

From my conversations with Brigadier Dare and with Major General Allard, who was there for part of the time, I obtained various impressions and certain information which I have decided it might be useful to communicate to you personally. I am aware, of course, that George Ignatieff, who preceded me by a few days in a visit to the Brigade, may have discussed with you many of the points which I will try and set out in this letter. On the other hand George did not have an opportunity of speaking to Jean Allard and some of the things Allard said help greatly to fill in the picture.

I would like at the outset to make clear that Mike Dare is an old friend of twenty years' standing. I have hesitated, therefore, to set out on paper things which he may have told me because of our friendship. Certainly in writing to you I would not wish to complicate his already difficult tasks and I would hope that you will regard this letter as being for your background information only. Moreover, not unnaturally, I am leery of my ability completely to have grasped some of the fine points. I should add that Mike Dare told me that until recently (he did not specify but I would judge he was speaking of two or three years ago) the Brigade Commander was forbidden by the Corps Commander (a British general) from giving the Canadian Ambassador in Bonn or indeed even the Chief of the Canadian General Staff any clear idea of the Brigade's role in war.

4. I propose to make my comments under three headings: nuclear capability, intelligence reports and alert procedures, and Berlin contingency planning.

Nuclear Capability

5. I was given a demonstration of the Honest John being hoisted on to its launcher; a very mobile<sup>26</sup> beast. As you may know the Brigade is equipped with four of these launchers. The commander of the unit told me that they had recently completed a firing practice at a relatively nearby range. If I remember correctly they had fired about four rounds with an empty warhead at a range of about 14,000 metres achieving on one shot a strike within 35 yards of the target. The Brigade has not any 8-inch howitzers, which is the other weapon capable of firing tactical nuclear warheads. I gather, although this was not said, that these guns and warheads would be reserved for use at army level.

6. The Brigade's present role is to take up a defensive position well forward of its present barracks area. They would require a good deal of advance notice to reach their positions and adequately to prepare their defences. For example, the engineers would require 90 hours in which to prepare the demolitions which are called for in the advance defensive positions. The front the Brigade group must defend is about 27 kilometres wide; a tremendous area for such a small group.

7. At the moment the plans place the British on their left flank and the Belgians on their right. The British units are seriously under strength and the Belgians are a skeleton force. The plans call for a most complicated manoeuvre to be executed by the Belgians to bring their formations up to battle strength. Units despatched from Belgium would "pass through" the Canadians at the time the Canadian units were advancing to their defensive positions! On the roads available I suspect the chaos would be unbelievable.

8. Given the width of the front assigned to them and the Russian and East German forces known to be opposing them, the Canadian Brigade, to have any hope of fulfilling their assigned role against even a conventional attack if it were all-out, would require nuclear support at the outset, and particularly as their present conventional fire power is deemed too low (their heaviest weapons are 109 mm. guns).

9. Incidentally, Jean Allard, who presently commands the 4th British Infantry Division, and under whose operational command the 4th Canadian Infantry Brigade Group would come, said that if the Canadians did not have their own nuclear support they would get it immediately, as required, from his division and from other higher commands.

10. While I was being shown the Honest John, Mike Dare drew my attention to a building near the parade ground which is nearing completion. He told me it will house members of the United States armed forces and will be occupied by them in January. This is to be the headquarters of the United States group having custody of the nuclear warheads for the Honest John. I understand they have their own communications and separate channels of command. The actual warheads are to be stored in buildings set into the hills nearby. I understand these are completed and ready to receive the warheads.

11. Thus it would seem that the Canadian troops are familiar with the nuclear delivery vehicle they have, the nuclear warheads could be available very soon (in case they are required), and in any event they probably can count on nuclear support from one flank at least.

? [Auteur inconnu/Author unknown]

12. Notwithstanding, the Canadians are in a vulnerable position. They do not themselves have the nuclear weapons or adequate conventional firepower necessary to protect their very long front in the event of an all-out attack. The troops on one flank are virtually non-existent and their other flank is protected by formations some units of which are only at half strength. In some way, although I realize the differences, one is reminded of the words "Hong Kong," and particularly in considering the new Canadian role in the "forward strategy" concept which only recently has been adopted.

13. I think there might be a disposition in looking at the Brigade and its general capabilities to consider it a more flexible force than the Air Division. On the face of it this is so. Certainly the Army with its modern means of reconnaissance (e.g. helicopters), its amphibious capability, and its conventional or nuclear fire power capability can be made a more versatile force than the RCAF units in Europe which are restricted by their aircraft to only one or two roles requiring a nuclear capability. However, the important point is that the 4 CIBG in its present role has very little flexibility, and in some circumstances will have to use nuclear weapons to survive even a conventional attack.

14. These points relating to the equipment and role of the Canadian Brigade and its neighbours in the NATO battle order are as far as I can judge typical of the situation throughout the NATO forces in Western Europe. The general picture seems to be that the forces available are insufficient for the task, and in many cases are below strength in numbers, equipment and effectiveness. Partly because of this situation military authorities concerned in the various national and international headquarters involved are pressing ahead as rapidly as possible with the implementation of agreed NATO plans for the deployment of nuclear weapons to the combat forces, to be held in United States custody but available for immediate use. We have touched on this in recent telegrams concerning the role of the German Air Force; the same situation holds true for the German Army, I believe for the 1st Canadian Air Division, and, as my recent visit has confirmed, for the Canadian Brigade.

Intelligence Reports and Alert Procedures

15. As you may know, the Brigade Commander in Europe has been given the powers of an officer commanding a command. He also enjoys direct communications with Canadian Army Headquarters, no limitation being placed by the Canadian authorities upon his direct channel of communication on any matter with the Chief of the General Staff. While his force is under command of the Commander, Northern Army Group, he also has been instructed "to inform the Chief of the General Staff by the most expeditious means possible of the occurrence of any incident or event involving your force with those of the Soviet bloc. Your report will also include information on any counteraction taken or contemplated by your immediate superior."

16. The Cuban crisis put some of these arrangements to a test and pointed up the unusually difficult and delicate tasks of the Brigade Commander in a period of "tension." Because his Command is relatively junior he does not receive quickly enough through any regular channel the information from higher formations which Army Headquarters expects him to provide. He showed me copies of the situation reports he was able to provide to Army Headquarters. These were good reports but the material in them was obtained by sending his intelligence officer to Northern Army Group Headquarters where he was able through personal connections to find out informally what was going on. At the same time the Brigade Commander has not available to him (in the same way as has the Air Division Commander) the periodic all-source intelligence reports which emanate from Ottawa.

17. The Brigade Commander's official sources of information both from senior formations in Northern Army Group and from Ottawa are almost non-existent. This makes it extremely difficult for the Commander to decide when to take the myriad and important preparatory steps which can and should be carried out short of a declared alert. His ability to take these decisions on the basis of adequate information becomes all the more important in a situation where the different stages of alert are very likely quickly to become telescoped and disorderly.

18. An aspect of these problems which I might mention is the position of dependents. About 12,000 in all, they represent a heavy responsibility and a liability which, in theory at least, should not worry the Brigade Commander as such whose principal concern is operational command of his troops. In practice, of course, in a situation such as that created by the Cuban crisis he is intimately concerned with the problem. At the moment Mike Dare tells me there are no plans for the removal of dependents to Canada. That is to say no procedures have been worked out with the RCAF or the commercial airlines for their emergency evacuation. Given the situation where an all-out nuclear exchange were to take place perhaps it does not matter much where they are. Indeed given the difficulties of reaching the political decision to evacuate dependents possibly the idea ought to be abandoned in any situation which develops rapidly, e.g., Cuba. However, clearly it would be helpful if some agreed policy existed concerning evacuation of dependents from Europe.

Berlin Contingency Planning

19. As far as I could understand it, Jean Allard's task in the event of military action to "defend" Berlin would be to support, virtually in corps strength, other elements of the Northern Army Group, which would advance up the axis of the autobahn. His present command, the 4th British Infantry Brigade,<sup>27</sup> would be expanded for these purposes. The Canadian forces involved would not be engaged at the outset but would form part of his reserve force with the task of striking at a Russian force which it is expected would attempt to hit the British right flank.

20. All this, of course, is predicated on some Russian or East German action to cut the autobahn or to "probe" into West Germany in strength. The German forces, according to Allard, are to form a panzer army which, if hostilities are sustained and broadened, would punch towards Berlin from the left flank between Helmstedt and Lubeck. Allard made it quite clear that present plans do not provide for the use of German forces at the outset.

21. I am aware, of course, that all or part of the matters set out in this letter already may be known to you. However, as some of this information was new to me I thought it possible that it might also be new to you. Moreover, I thought you might find it useful, as I did, to view the various pieces against the background provided by the comments made by Dare and Allard. Needless to say I have kept only one copy of this letter and I have not referred it elsewhere or, indeed, discussed its contents with anyone here other than Kirkwood.<sup>28</sup>

Yours as ever,

JOHN STARNES

SECRET. PRIORITY.

NATO DEFENCE PLANNING – NASSAU AGREEMENT

Nassau Agreement has obvious very important implications for NATO which are considered in a preliminary way in this message. In a talk with Colonna the Acting Secretary-General today I gathered that provided USA can count on a something better than a negative [sic] response from French as well as British, USA intend to report on Nassau to the NATO Council at its first meeting in the new year now scheduled for January 9 or on January 11.

2. Colonna noted that Nassau Agreement and the public airing of UK-USA differences over Skybolt would have serious repercussions on the further discussion of NATO defence planning and that there were bound to be complaints about lack of consultation. On the other hand President Kennedy had in effect offered de Gaulle a special relationship in nuclear matters on a platter and he thought that it was unlikely that French would lose the opportunity to make the most out of this USA offer (a) in the direction of establishing a triumvirate in the control of nuclear weapons; (b) in trying to obtain the information French have been seeking on nuclear warheads. French reaction as well as British would have to be at least in the direction of some degree of cooperation with the Nassau Agreement if NATO discussion were not repeat not to become stalled in recriminations from the start even assuming that the response from other members of NATO were sufficiently favourable to enable the agreement to be studied objectively. In any case Colonna after speaking to Stikker said that the discussion on the Nassau Agreement should not repeat not be "catapulted" into the Council without prior preparation and the discussion may be postponed until January 11 to give more time for tripartite consultation and to allow senior officials to come to Paris from Washington and London.

3. It seems to me that NATO is concerned with two interrelated matters raised at Nassau. In addition to the question of special relationship already claimed by Britain and France on atomic information and in relation to the control of nuclear weapons (and potentially by Germany) there is the important question of the strategic doctrine adopted by Kennedy Administration and aimed at minimizing the risks of having recourse to nuclear weapons. This doctrine which was developed most notably by McNamara at Athens and by Rusk and McNamara at the recent Ministerial Meeting in Paris involves

(a) concentration of control of the strategic nuclear deterrent as far as possible in the hands of USA rather than its dispersion in national deterrent forces;

(b) as a partial alternative or second-best the creation of a multilateral sea-borne MRBM force designed to reassure European allies that they would have an influential voice in the nuclear deterrent, thus avoiding growth of the notion that USA would not repeat not risk nuclear devastation in defence of European interests and

(c) as a necessary adjunct the build-up of conventional forces in Europe in order to enable at least the initial response to Soviet aggression if circumstances permit to be made with non-nuclear weapons.

4. Reaction to USA strategic doctrine on the part of the Europeans has been cool since it seems to involve European governments in providing additional ground forces or the non-nuclear sword, while USA continues to concentrate on the nuclear shield. Moreover the debate over increasing conventional forces tends to bring to the fore European concern that USA would be reluctant to risk nuclear devastation over the defence of a threatened European interest. Europeans tend to argue that only the prospect of an immediate response with nuclear weapons would be effective in deterring Soviet threats of aggression in Europe. It is because of this concern that Europeans and the Germans in particular have also pressed for a land-based MRBM force the control of which would be centered in Europe, i.e. in SACEUR. This concept has the support of Stikker who returns to office at the beginning of the new year.

5. Nassau Agreement was clearly important in that at least one of the opponents of the strategic doctrine of USA may have been brought around to share to some extent USA approach. Much however remains to be clarified in UK position. The most important question of course is in precisely what circumstances British would retain control of separate national nuclear deterrent force particularly since they are now acquiring a more credible form of the deterrent in the form of Polaris. It would be equally interesting to know how far Macmillan has accepted the current USA concept about the importance of "a non-nuclear sword." This striking figure of speech by standing the traditional NATO metaphor on its head is bound to cause controversy. It will be important to see whether in fact British conventional forces in NATO, now below requirements, are going to be strengthened; and whether Britain can within the present level of defence expenditure both acquire a costly form of deterrent and improve its conventional forces. In other words when UK reaction to the Nassau agreement is made known to the NATO Council it will be most important to the further discussion of NATO defence planning whether UK accepts it with significant qualifications or reservations.

6. Although January 9 or January 11 have been tentatively suggested for Council discussion of Nassau Agreement and no repeat no date has yet been fixed, the Council can hardly avoid at least taking note of the Nassau Agreement. Any further discussion of NATO defence planning will depend to a large extent on the kind of reactions which will be forthcoming by that time from UK, France and also Germany. The latter will naturally watch anxiously for any signs of the special relationship previously enjoyed by UK with USA in relation to nuclear weapons being enlarged to include French. French on the other hand are unlikely to accept the offer of a special relationship if it is to be immediately enlarged to include several more or all the members of the Alliance. Thus the discussion of the Nassau Agreement in NATO will be concerned not repeat not only with USA strategic doctrine which underlies the Agreement but also with the highly important political issue of sharing the control of the nuclear deterrent, which affects the status of members of NATO and which will become a more pressing and practical issue than it has been until now if USA and UK actually move to place part of their deterrent forces under NATO command as foreshadowed in the Nassau communiqué.

7. What Canadian interests are at stake in this NATO discussion? I suggest there are mainly two. With Britain apparently partly won over to abandoning its separate deterrent, Canada has an opportunity to support its two closest allies in promoting a process which would help put a stop to the proliferation of nuclear weapons, eliminating all separate nuclear deterrent forces in national hands on the side of the West except USA deterrent. This it is argued would reduce the risk of having recourse to nuclear war and help to keep Germans from trying to build a national deterrent. It could also promote an Alliance or transatlantic rather than European solution to the problem of a multilateral force. This is the second great point of Canadian interest, because such a solution is the only one which could give Canada some voice in the control of a multilateral nuclear deterrent available to the Alliance.

NATO NUCLEAR WEAPONS POLICY: SOME PRELIMINARY COMMENTS ON THE NASSAU AGREEMENT

The Kennedy-Macmillan statement on nuclear weapons systems issued at the conclusion of the Nassau talks on December 21<sup>29</sup> has implications for Canada as a member of NATO. It indicates a revised U.S. approach to NATO nuclear policy. It entails a significant shift in British nuclear policy and may push Britain closer to Europe. On the basis of public statements and the limited confidential reports we have received so far on the agreement, the following preliminary comments have been assembled relating to the implications of the agreement for Britain, France, NATO, the U.S.A., disarmament and for Canada. This paper was cleared in draft form by Mr. Green prior to his departure.

Britain

2. On present calculations the Blue Steel stand-off bomb, with which the British V-bomber force is about to be equipped, will be unable to penetrate expected Russian radar and anti-aircraft screens by about 1965. It was for this reason that the British Government looked to the American 1000-mile stand-off Skybolt missile as a means of maintaining the effectiveness of the V-bomber force in the period 1965-70. The U.S. Administration had shown a strong interest in the Skybolt missile as a means of prolonging the usefulness of its own Strategic Air Command's B-47 and B-52 bomber forces. However, the bringing into operational effectiveness of the solid-fuel Polaris and Minuteman missiles evidently convinced U.S. Secretary of Defense McNamara that the role of the B-47 and B-52 bombers could be safely reduced. (In substantiation of this we have recently learned through service channels that four SAC refuelling bases in Canada are to be phased out by July 1964.) In addition to reducing the enormous overhead costs of operating the SAC bombers, Mr. McNamara evidently decided that the expenditure of approximately $2.5 billion for the further development of the Skybolt missile and the equipping of SAC bombers with it would not be warranted.

3. In spite of the U.S. Administration's decision that it would not proceed with the Skybolt missile project for its own purposes, President Kennedy expressed at Nassau his readiness to continue the development of the missile as a joint undertaking with each country bearing half the future cost. The U.S. had already spent $350 million and it was estimated that at least another $200 million would be required to complete development. Britain might therefore have acquired this weapons system for as little as $100 million for further development and $150 million for Skybolt missiles, very considerably less than the $800 to $900 million six Polaris submarines will cost her.

4. It must be assumed therefore that Mr. Macmillan was convinced on grounds other than financial to switch from Skybolt to Polaris.

5. What were the reasons? There was uncertainty about how effective the Skybolt missile would be, when it would be ready and its ultimate cost. There was the U.S. decision to phase out their strategic bombers. There may have been a question of whether the V-bomber, even with the Skybolt missile, could penetrate Soviet defences for long. The Polaris is a completed, proved and successful weapon on which the U.S. had already spent $800 million for development. Polaris submarines could be built in British yards without large expenditure of foreign exchange. The operating costs of Polaris submarines would be much lower than bombers. Polaris submarines would be virtually invulnerable, whereas the V-bombers and their airfields are becoming increasingly vulnerable to Soviet missiles. Polaris submarines would give Britain an effective nuclear striking force well into the 1970s. In a complete reversal of the previous British opposition to the concept of a multilateral nuclear force, Mr. Macmillan was evidently persuaded of the desirability of taking a part in an initiative to try to solve through the establishment of an integrated force the problem of Europe's desire for a separate nuclear deterrent.

6. What are the conditions under which Britain will acquire Polaris missiles? By supplying only the missile to which a British-made nuclear warhead will be attached, the U.S. Administration is not acting contrary to the U.S. Atomic Energy Act.

7. The "special nuclear relationship" under which the U.S.A. shared certain nuclear secrets with Britain remains. The U.S.A. has not yet offered France the technical nuclear information to enable France to speed up the construction of warheads. However, the offer of Polaris missiles (without warheads) to France on the same terms as to Britain has undoubtedly weakened to some extent the "special relationship" between Britain and the U.S.A. The arrangement enables Britain to survive as an independent nuclear power to the extent that she can use the Polaris missiles independently when she deems that her supreme national interests are at stake. On his return to London on December 24, Mr. Thorneycroft felt able to say, "We shall have British submarines with British crews, British officers and British-controlled." But at the same time Britain has recognized the logic of the McNamara thesis on the indivisibility of nuclear war and accepted the ultimate integration of its Polaris missile submarines into a NATO nuclear force. In this sense Britain has probably been pushed a little further away from its "special relationship" to the U.S.A. and a little closer to Europe. Indeed it seems to have been recognized by both Mr. Kennedy and Mr. Macmillan that Britain should reverse her previous opposition to a NATO nuclear force and take a lead in its formation. More will be known about the British position when the Nassau statement is examined in the NATO Council January 10 to 15 and debated following the reconvening of Parliament on January 22.

France

8. President Kennedy has sent a letter to General de Gaulle offering France the Polaris missile on the same terms as it was offered to Britain. It is reported that General de Gaulle is pleased to have been offered equal treatment with Britain and to be studying the letter carefully, but he is unlikely to accept the offer in its present form. Despite the repeated and logically persuasive U.S. arguments about the excessive cost, dubious value and probable obsolescence of national nuclear forces below the scale of the U.S. and U.S.S.R., General de Gaulle has been unmoved in his determination to build his own nuclear striking force. The Cuban crisis reinforced General de Gaulle's own view that a great power must have the military strength to act independently and a nuclear reserve to serve as a deterrent.

9. The French are prepared to work in harmony with NATO but it is doubtful if they would agree to place French nuclear forces under a NATO commander. It seems more likely that if they respond positively at all and are encouraged to think they may get some of the nuclear technical information they desire in order to accelerate French capacity to build warheads, they may go on to seek to revive General de Gaulle's 1958 proposal for a 3-nation directorate in NATO.

NATO

10. The Nassau statement envisages early steps for the co-ordination of NATO nuclear weapons targeting and gives a new impetus and direction to the concept of a NATO multilateral seaborne MRBM force.

11. For some time now General Norstad has been complaining that he has had at his disposal insufficient nuclear strike forces to cover the key military targets in Central Europe. He has sought IRBM and MRBM units to mix with his strike aircraft. The U.S. Secretary of Defense, Mr. McNamara, on the other hand, has argued that the U.S.A. had in its strategic forces a sufficient capability to cover all significant military targets in Eastern Europe. Up to now, NATO has had no control over the U.S.A. and British strategic forces. At the Athens meeting in May, the U.S.A. and U.K. only went so far as to assure their NATO partners that their strategic forces would give equal priority to covering Soviet nuclear striking forces threatening the mainland of Europe as to those threatening the U.S.A. and U.K.

12. In the Nassau statement it was agreed that an immediate start could be made by assigning, as part of a NATO nuclear force to be targeted in accordance with NATO plans, elements of the U.S.A. strategic forces, U.K. Bomber Command and tactical nuclear forces now in Europe. Later the British Polaris submarines and at least equal U.S.A. forces would be assigned to this NATO nuclear force. Command and control arrangements have not been spelled out but these may be expected to follow the nuclear guidelines agreed at Athens and NATO military command lines, possibly with the addition of special sub-commands for nuclear forces.

13. The proposal to assign U.S.A. and British national nuclear units to a NATO nuclear force alters substantially the U.S.A. outline for a NATO multilateral seaborne MRBM force. This was to be a fleet of surface missile ships which could be built at half the cost of nuclear-powered Polaris submarines. The force was to be truly international in character, i.e., each vessel multi-nationally manned, financed and controlled. A report now suggests that the U.S.A. is apparently thinking it may be possible to create a NATO nuclear force consisting of two parts: (1) U.S.A., British and possibly French national elements, and (2) a truly multilateral unit for the other interested NATO countries including Germany. Germany was not mentioned in the Nassau statement but must have been considered. Whether the new proposals will be satisfactory to Germany remains to be seen. It will depend in part on the influence NATO members have in determining NATO nuclear policy.

U.S.A.

14. The decision to abandon the Skybolt missile project appears to have been based on the technical success of the solid-fuel Minuteman and Polaris missiles and the desirability of avoiding the expenditure of $2.5 billion on equipping the SAC bombers with Skybolt. The U.S. had already shown an awareness of the political demand in Europe for nuclear weapons. The scheme for a NATO multilateral seaborne MRBM force had not been greeted with enthusiasm by Britain and France because they wanted their own national nuclear forces for prestige purposes. In offering Polaris missiles to Britain and France, the U.S.A., while recognizing their determination to retain national nuclear forces, has tried to bring these under NATO command by offering to place at least equal U.S.A. forces under NATO command. The U.S.A. may also hope to get Britain and France to pay for prestige national nuclear forces what they might not have been prepared to subscribe to a multilateral force.

15. Although an increase in conventional capability in Europe remains a central objective of U.S.A. policy, there is no evidence in the Nassau statement that Mr. Kennedy succeeded in persuading Mr. Macmillan to increase the British conventional forces assigned to NATO. Instead there is mention of "increasing the effectiveness of their conventional forces on a worldwide basis."

16. It is interesting that the Nassau statement refers to assigning some U.S.A. strategic forces, some U.K. V-bombers and "tactical nuclear forces now in Europe" as part of a NATO nuclear force. This may represent a concession to the views of General Norstad who has been pressing for NATO to have more nuclear forces under its control.

17. The U.S.A.F., the Douglas Aircraft Company and the Congress are unlikely to give up the fight for Skybolt without a struggle. The testing of the missile at an embarrassing moment just after the Nassau conference was a direct challenge to the Administration. The Department of Defense has since taken steps to cancel the Skybolt development contract in the hope of facing the Congress with a fait accompli when it reconvenes.

Disarmament

18. In recognizing British and French pressures to have their own national nuclear forces, the U.S.A. has evidently given up hope of concentrating control of nuclear weapons in its own hands. In this sense it has surrendered some of its control over negotiations with the U.S.S.R. on nuclear disarmament. At the opening of the recent session of the U.N. General Assembly, the Soviet Union had proposed that the U.S.A. and U.S.S.R. alone should retain minimum nuclear deterrent forces in the first stage of disarmament. While the offer contained a number of unacceptable provisions, it did represent a major change in Soviet policy and a forward step. The U.S.S.R. may be expected to regard the Nassau statement initially as a further obstacle to nuclear disarmament. However, by securing public British recognition of the concept of the essential indivisibility of the West's nuclear deterrent forces, by proposing the assignment of national strategic forces and tactical units to NATO command and control and by giving a further impetus to the concept of a NATO multilateral nuclear force, the U.S.A. has tried to preserve the essence of its opposition to the proliferation of nuclear weapons under independent national control, and it is to be hoped that the Russians will see the Nassau statement in this light.

Canada

19. It is early to try to discern the full implications for Canada of the Nassau statement. However, the following preliminary comments occur:

(a) The decision not to proceed with the development of the Skybolt missile heralds the gradual phasing out, over the next several years, of a major part of the U.S. Strategic Air Command's bomber fleets with all that that will mean for Canada: (i) elimination of refuelling bases by July 1964, (ii) eventual reduction of overflights, communications systems, etc.

(b) Canada and other NATO members will be asked to assume a greater share of responsibility for NATO's planning for use of tactical and strategic nuclear weapons. If we do not wish NATO's nuclear policies to be run by a 3-nation directorate, we shall have to be prepared to devote more attention to these matters. It also follows that NATO members will wish to feel assured that they have a voice in the political direction of the alliance if they are to accept strategic responsibility. This involves increased NATO consultation. This whole subject may be a principal topic for discussion at the May meeting in Ottawa.

(c) The renewed U.S. interest in getting a NATO multilateral nuclear force started may raise, earlier than expected, the question of Canadian participation. In informal discussions, U.S. officials have indicated an interest in Canadian participation to emphasize the trans-Atlantic aspect of the scheme.

(d) The proposal to assign tactical nuclear forces now in Europe to a NATO nuclear force could be applicable to the Canadian CF-104 strike reconnaissance aircraft but it is not clear yet what new arrangements may be intended. The CF-104s, like all other tactical nuclear forces in Europe, are already under SACEUR's operational control and he determines their targets. However, in the bilateral agreements which the U.S. has concluded with individual NATO governments for the supply of nuclear weapons, both the U.S. Government and the national government would have to give their agreement before the nuclear weapons could be used. Under the Nassau concept of assigning tactical nuclear weapons to NATO, it may be intended that a procedure should be examined whereby the U.S. Government and national governments would entrust to the appropriate major NATO commander this eleventh hour control over the use of individual nuclear weapons and exercise their control only through discussions in the Permanent Council on the basis of the Guide Lines. A veto on the use of nuclear weapons by national forces might be retained but it might be phrased in terms of power to refuse authority to use nuclear weapons rather than the requirement to authorize their use, once the NATO Council had agreed. The full implications of the application of this aspect of the Nassau statement to Canadian tactical nuclear weapons systems in Europe will require careful study.

STATEMENTS BY GENERAL NORSTAD

As you are aware members of the Press Gallery are anxious to have your comments on General Norstad's remarks at his press conference yesterday.<sup>30</sup> Mr. Green and Mr. Harkness will no doubt also be asked for their views by the press. The position which you and your colleagues might take, wholly consistent with current policy, might be as follows:

"It has been the consistent policy of the Canadian Government to equip its armed forces with nuclear delivery systems and to train the Canadian armed forces in their use so that they would be able to play their full part in the event of an emergency. We have undertaken that commitment and we intend to fulfil it. If there are any obstacles to the training – and I had not heard before that there were – the matter will be given urgent consideration."<sup>31</sup>

NORSTAD'S PRESS CONFERENCE IN OTTAWA

State Department (Willis Armstrong) has expressed to us in confidence its concern at possible effects of Norstad's remarks regarding Canada's NATO commitments in relation to provision of nuclear weapons for Canadian forces. We do not repeat not expect that actual substance of Norstad's comment will be repudiated because it is considered here to be consistent with agreed NATO policy. On the other hand Armstrong said that State Department press spokesman had been authorized if asked to make it plain that Norstad was not repeat not commenting in the capacity of an official spokesman of USA Government. Armstrong said he hoped that this could be made clear to you. He added that Norstad's remarks had come as a complete surprise to State Department.

We do not repeat not know whether any Canadian correspondents made enquiries of State Department. If any such enquiries were made they would no repeat no doubt be reflected in Canadian newspapers. There has been no repeat no report in Washington Post this morning along lines mentioned by Armstrong.<sup>32</sup>

CONVERSATION WITH SECRETARY-GENERAL JANUARY 7 – DEFENCE PROBLEMS

On the discussion of defence questions at recent Ministerial Meeting Stikker said that NATO could not repeat not ignore the statements made by USA representatives about the gap between requirements and the forces made available to NATO by national governments nor repeat nor could they ignore McNamara's plea that European members of NATO should aim at a twenty percent increase in their financial contributions and a build up of conventional strength. Stikker had therefore instructed international staff to prepare a paper analyzing the statements made and suggesting a procedure which he thought best calculated to deal with the problem. What this procedure amounted to was in fact an analysis country by country of the requirements of NATO military commanders under MC 26/4. International staff would then discuss the implications of these requirements with representatives of each country with a view to clarifying in each case to what extent if any the gap between requirements and available forces might be bridged. The result would be a series of "country studies" to be submitted to Council.

2. Stikker said frankly he did not repeat not expect this exercise would be productive of any increased forces since what was being sought in the main were increased contributions in conventional forces from France and UK. UK was not repeat not in a position to change its position at least until after UK application to EEC had been settled. He did not repeat not count on France changing its attitude and its insistence on giving priority to the build up of its force de frappe.

3. However he hoped the exercise would have the limited effect of identifying what precisely the shortfalls were and the reasons for them and of bringing to the attention of governments the considerations bearing upon the implementation of a forward strategy. Moreover it was necessary for the Alliance to realize that if increased conventional forces were not repeat not forthcoming the proportion of nuclear weapons in allied forces would inevitably rise.

4. He emphasized however that he did not repeat not see any use resuming a debate on NATO strategy in general terms at present time since it would only serve to bring out the significant divergence of views between current thinking of USA Administration and views held by some of their NATO partners.

5. Stikker said that he hoped to have the paper ready for circulation to delegations next week and I shall be sending a résumé of it by telegram and copies by bag.

NASSAU AGREEMENT

During a conversation at lunch yesterday January 7 with Schaezel (Deputy Assistant Secretary Atlantic Affairs) we had an opportunity to obtain further insight into current USA thinking on the problems of implementing the Nassau Agreement. Although interesting memorandum in your reference telegram had not repeat not been received at time of our conversation we believe general import of his remarks accords for most part with exposition of USA approach set out in memorandum.

2. We formed clear impression USA authorities are working intensively to sort out their own views on the many problems involved and are anxious to move ahead as rapidly as practicable in consultation with their partners. At same time we detected from Schaezel's remarks: a marked degree of regret mixed with resignation that Nassau meeting had precipitated into the forefront issues which, particularly for the British (whom he described as being in state of "trauma" over Common Market) added considerably to the complexity of the overall problems facing the Alliance; signs of uncertainty as to how some of the issues should be tackled let alone resolved; concern about British approach and hope that non-nuclear members of NATO, including Canada, will adopt a positive attitude with respect to genuine USA intention to develop the Nassau Agreement as an important step towards the development of a multilateral deterrent force.

3. Schaezel confirmed our earlier impression that Ball's statement on January 11 will be confined largely to general exposition of USA views on Nassau Agreement. He expected Ball would provide a minimum of detail and that the main purpose of his statement would be to underline what USA regards as the essential elements and purpose of the Nassau accord. In their view, the Nassau Agreement provides a focal point of departure for further discussion of the whole concept of multilateralism including the problem of political control, building on the guide lines set out at the Athens meeting. They do not repeat not regard the process as inconsistent with or superseding but rather striking out in a new direction from the presentation made recently to the NATO Council and in national capitals on the possibilities of establishing sea-based MRBM force. Schaezel made it clear that Nassau had marked important turning point in that USA had moved from a position of conditional willingness to accept a multilateral force to one of active promotion thereof. He regarded the Nassau Agreement as a precarious compromise which was the best that probably could have been worked out in the delicate circumstances of the time and which, if there was a general will to make it work, could point the way to attainment of genuine multilateralization of the Western nuclear deterrent.

4. It was necessary to recognize, Schaezel said, that for domestic political reasons British will feel constrained to emphasize publicly, and possibly in the Council, the extent to which the independence of their nuclear deterrent has been preserved. This was something which we would simply have to live with for a few years. More important in USA view was the fact that British at Nassau had publicly subscribed to multilateralism as a guiding principle motivating their approach to Western nuclear defence. He thought that fundamentally Britain knew that the national nuclear deterrent was an anachronism, and because of what we termed British good sense he was not repeat not acutely concerned that British Government should retain the trappings of independent nuclear capacity. He was less content to contemplate French retention of their national deterrent because French did not repeat not in their hearts regard it as an anachronism.

5. Schaezel emphasized that USA Administration is resolutely opposed to the concept of a triumvirate. He was convinced that French have given up the idea because they recognize the impossibility of reconciling such an arrangement with their efforts to develop an intimate relationship with the Federal Republic. Moreover the main purpose of the Nassau Agreement was to move Britain in the right direction in the hope that in the long term France would recognize the impracticability in the terms of cost, and the irrationality in terms of nuclear defence, of proceeding on its present course. He thought it might be many years however before a change of heart on the part of French could be expected. At the same time he acknowledged that there was a considerable practical difference between the offers to British and French (insofar as French do not repeat not have nuclear submarines or warheads for Polaris missiles). Consequently if French should show a willingness to move towards a multilateral approach Schaetzel said then USA for its part might see what could be done to make the terms of the offer more acceptable from a French point of view.

6. Regarding paragraphs of the communiqué on initial allocation from USA strategic forces, UK Bomber Command and other tactical forces now held in Europe, Schaetzel said that this idea had been put forward by Macmillan. One of its main purposes was to devise an arrangement which would not repeat not depend on French concurrence or participation. He seemed a little uncertain however how such an arrangement might be worked out and our impression is that this is one of many points which USA will hope to clarify in further discussions. Schaetzel seemed to have in mind that as a start elements of the UK and USA strategic forces could be put under a NATO command and that consideration might then be given as to how and what tactical nuclear air forces might be included. He said one determining factor could be whether or not repeat not the tactical nuclear forces were "pretargeted." If so they could be legitimately regarded as strategic and eligible for inclusion in such a NATO force.

7. On the problem of political control over use of this force he readily admitted that the present bilateral agreements covering tactical nuclear weapons might prove to be a complicating factor. He doubted however whether there would be any need to scrap the present agreements. He thought that they would still apply to tactical forces which do not repeat not have any preassigned targets. For "pretargeted" forces there might be a separate multilateral agreement covering the political control arrangements.

8. The allocation to NATO of certain strategic and tactical air forces (which together might be called a "NATO nuclear force") might be regarded as the first phase in the development of what could eventually be described as a "NATO multilateral deterrent force." The second phase would be accomplished with the assignment of USA and UK Polaris submarines, nationally manned and operated but under a central command. The third phase, which might or might not repeat not coincide in time with the second would involve the establishment of a multilaterally manned sea-based force. This force might consist either of submarines or merchant vessels. Schaetzel thought that these two options were open in connection with both phase three and the UK contribution to phase two. He implied that for reasons of costs and the time required for construction it was entirely conceivable that Britain might in the event prefer to have a force composed of submarines and merchant vessels rather than concentrate on submarines.

9. On the question of land versus sea-based MRBMs and the well known preference of General Norstad and Stikker for the former, Schaetzel said USA authorities did not repeat not envisage any difficulty in this regard. Stikker apparently has adopted a constructive attitude towards Nassau Agreement and is sympathetic to USA approach. (This accords with information in NATO Paris telegram 32 January 7+).

10. German attitude so far, according to Schaetzel, has been not repeat not unfavourable and understandably has revealed a tendency to ask a number of deep questions. He thought no repeat no more could be expected at this stage and expressed optimism that they would accept an arrangement which was not repeat not discriminatory against the Federal Republic. In reply to our enquiry he thought provision for inclusion of some tactical air forces in NATO nuclear force could be applicable to some of German air forces designed to undertake strike role. It could be assumed of course, that any arrangement along these lines must not repeat not be capable of dangerous exploitation by the Federal Republic.

11. With regard to Finletter's statement of last June and the priority given in it to the build-up of NATO conventional forces, Schaetzel said this was still central to USA approach. USA continued to believe that it should be within the capability of the Alliance to develop and finance a multilateral deterrent force while proceeding concurrently with the improvement and build-up of conventional forces. He thought that the Nassau agreement had adequately emphasized the importance which USA attaches to this question. He strongly contested the suggestion that by consecrating the multilateral concept at Nassau, USA had sacrificed the prospect of a heavier conventional build-up. He did however concede that Britain would have special difficulties and might be driven for economic reasons to accept something less than an unalloyed nuclear submarine programme, viz his speculation that Britain would sooner or later opt in favour of a combined submarine and merchant vessel Polaris force (see paragraph 8 above).

12. As to the method of proceeding in NATO, USA authorities consider the Council, possibly meeting as a committee of the whole, should be the focal point for consideration of the various problems involved. While there would inevitably be further bilateral discussions with British and French, Schaetzel expected that the results of these discussions would be reported to the Council. Separate subcommittees might be set up to consider particular problems, for example, the political control arrangements, command structure etc. It was clear from Schaetzel's remarks that they do not repeat not have any fixed views in this regard.

13. In conclusion Schaetzel emphasized that the course of developments in the months ahead would depend to a considerable extent on the attitude adopted by other non-nuclear members. Their support for the multilateral approach underlying the Nassau Agreement would go a long way towards offsetting other less desirable tendencies within the Alliance. To the extent that other members (and he spoke hopefully of a Canadian voice in this) found it possible to get behind the new approach, the problem of separate national deterrents could be surmounted and whatever life there might still be on the idea of a nuclear triumvirate could be stamped out. On the other hand lack of interest or willingness on the part of other NATO members to explore the avenues opened up at Nassau could, he suggested, reduce significantly the prospects for success of USA efforts to unify and strengthen the Alliance through gradual elimination of separate nuclear deterrent forces and wider sharing of responsibility for decisions relating to use of NATO's nuclear strength. The net effect of such an attitude might not repeat not only serve to reinforce de Gaulle's convictions in the soundness of his approach but conceivably might encourage others possibly in Germany to follow the French example.

14. From the general tone and substance of Schaetzel's remarks, it is clear that USA authorities are conscious of the same reservations and dangers as we feel with regard to the difficulties of giving shape and useful substance to the Nassau Agreement. They see it nonetheless as the least dangerous and most logical choice among awkward alternatives. They are attracted too by the transatlantic element inherent in it, which as they see it could preserve a direct influence for Canada as well as USA in NATO nuclear policy and at the same time promises to forestall the divisive tendencies associated both with a European multilateral force and with separate national deterrents. USA feels however that it is dependent on the cooperation of members other than France and UK to give initial collective impetus to the development of the Nassau concept.<sup>33</sup>

NASSAU AGREEMENT

At conclusion of our conversation Schaetzel (Deputy Assistant Secretary Atlantic Affairs) expressed hope it would be possible for Ball to have a private conversation with Ignatieff prior to meeting of Council on January 11. He said Ball would be in Paris a day in advance of meeting and he felt it would be particularly useful if Ignatieff were able to exchange views with Ball both as to Canadian position and outline of USA presentation.

2. As we have mentioned earlier State Department is anxious to keep in close touch with Canadian authorities because of their hope that Canada will adopt a positive attitude toward USA effort to move forward on basis of multilateral concept underlying Nassau agreement and because of the need to work closely together in preparation for May Ministerial Meeting in Ottawa. Schaetzel said USA hope and expectation was that NATO aspects of initial stage of Nassau agreement (especially paragraph 6) might be sufficiently well wrapped up to permit consideration by NATO Ministers at Ottawa meeting.

NATO DEFENCE PLANNING: NASSAU AGREEMENT

We assume that the meeting of Council on January 11 to be briefed by the USA and Britain on the Nassau Agreement will have little time for substantive discussion. While defence planning will form one of the main items of discussion in the Council in the coming weeks, we believe it would be particularly useful at this stage to have a full airing of preliminary views on the Nassau Agreement and the problems it raises for future NATO strategy. We would hope, therefore, that Council would agree on January 11 to hold as soon as possible a further meeting to hear the questions from other members of the Alliance which would indicate the areas of greatest concern to them. We do not consider that this would be forcing the pace of discussion but should be considered as a useful means of letting USA, Britain and France know what we suspect to be the uncertainties about future NATO defence planning in the minds of most members of NATO before bilateral negotiations begin between the USA and Britain and the USA and France. Such an airing of matters of concern now might also make it easier to decide on the priorities to be given to the various strategic proposals before the Council.

2. The meeting on January 11 should go some way to clearing our minds about the implications of the Nassau Agreement but it may be useful if we set out in this telegram some preliminary thoughts at the official level which you may wish to use in discussion with your colleagues or during the meeting itself with a view to clarifying points for submission to Ministers. Other addressees may use this telegram as well as the useful reports from our NATO delegation as background in their discussions with Foreign Offices about the future course of NATO defence planning.

3. There appears little doubt that Nassau represents a major turning point within the Western Alliance and is bound to have important implications for the manner by which political and military control will be exercised in future within the NATO Alliance. Before Nassau, the Council was discussing the technical aspects of a USA suggestion for a multilateral seaborne force with little expectation of wider discussions until the outcome of the negotiations between Britain and the Six were clearer. There was every likelihood that Britain and France would in any case try to maintain their national nuclear forces. At Nassau, Britain subscribed to a communiqué which supports the concept of a NATO multilateral force. To that extent the maintenance of national nuclear forces outside the NATO context has been weakened.

4. From the British point of view it can be argued that Nassau does not represent any great change in policy. For domestic reasons alone, some replacement for Skybolt had to be found quickly and Polaris represents a more credible deterrent. The acquisition of Polaris also ensures that Britain remains at least one of the senior nuclear partners with the USA whether or not any form of multilateral force is worked out; the commitment of British Polaris submarines to a NATO force is seven or eight years away by which time the future shape of Europe will have been decided and in any case Britain will be the major nuclear power in Europe. The British agreement to commit part of the V-Bomber force to NATO now appears from London telegram 4529 of December 31† to depend on whether NATO command and political control arrangements can be worked out and evidently the British do not expect this to occur until after the V-Bomber force is no longer a strategic carrier (although we would question this judgment). From the British point of view therefore the commitment of part of their V-Bomber force to NATO now is no more than an indication of an intention to play a part in a future NATO nuclear force. The British appear to have ensured that whatever the future of Europe they will continue to play a leading part in the field of nuclear weapons and they can still claim, at least for domestic purposes, that they will continue to have an independent nuclear deterrent which could be used "when the supreme national interests are at stake." The British may consider that the Nassau Agreement will allow greater room for manoeuvre in the coming decade when the shape of the Western Alliance will be changing, for in Europe Britain will remain the pre-eminent nuclear power while vis-à-vis the USA she will still be the most responsible European power with a nuclear capability.

5. The USA appears to regard Nassau as an important breakthrough in its policy of limiting the proliferation of national nuclear forces but by obtaining a commitment from Britain to some form of NATO multilateral force, decisions will have to be reached on the kind of multilateral force, the command structure of the force, political control and, therefore, the whole future shape of military and political control of the Alliance. We have the impression from NATO's telegram 17 of January 4 that some parts of the USA Administration are in a mood to consider that “all is possible” and during the coming months when the USA is making up its mind about these questions they should be open to suggestions from their allies.

Kind of Multilateral Force

6. There appear to be two ways in which the multilateral concept might develop, either by way of a limited NATO nuclear force made up largely of Polaris submarines comprising national components contributed by the USA, Britain and France; possibly with the addition of other Polaris carriers multinationally controlled and financed by other members of the Alliance, or by a force to include all nuclear components committed nationally to NATO under multilateral command and custodial arrangements. The former concept would ensure USA, Britain and France predominance in decisions on strategic questions. This type of multilateral force would have the strong disadvantage of creating a triumvirate and would not solve the problem of what part other member states including Germany are to play in the strategic guidance of the Alliance. The second concept is from the Alliance point of view more acceptable. It would mean that the NATO multilateral nuclear force would range from Polaris submarines to short range strike aircraft and that such countries as West Germany, the Netherlands, Italy and Canada, which have forces with a nuclear capability already assigned to SACEUR, could take responsibility together with the major NATO powers for the control and custodial arrangements for a NATO multilateral nuclear force.

Command, Custody and Control

7. It seems to us that the NATO Alliance will have to decide soon on what type of multilateral force it wants before examining how it would work, how it should be controlled operationally and politically, and who should have custody over its nuclear warheads. It also seems evident that these problems of command and control cannot be decided in the NATO Council alone and that, at the appropriate stage, the NATO military authorities will have to be asked for a military opinion on such questions as command structure, operations, custodial arrangements, commands, joint targeting, etc.

The Future Shape of the Alliance

8. No matter what type [of] multilateral force NATO eventually acquires, the way in which the Alliance is directed is bound to change. Suffice it to say that the broader type of force will give the smaller countries a greater chance to play a part in the strategic direction of the Alliance but they will have at the same time to take a greater responsibility for decisions arising out of this direction [and] play a greater role in the day-to-day consultation within the Alliance.

9. At this stage the following questions appear to us to require clarification:

(a) With reference to paragraph 6 of the Nassau communiqué, we would like to know what forces are specifically meant by “tactical nuclear forces now held in Europe.” We have assumed that this applies to all NATO forces with a nuclear capability now in Europe and this could eventually include Canadian, West German and Netherlands strike reconnaissance aircraft. If these forces are to be assigned as part of a NATO nuclear force are any immediate changes expected in existing arrangements whereby SACEUR is responsible for full control of NATO Europe’s nuclear forces?

(b) We are none too clear about the timing of the various aspects of the Nassau Agreement. The Polaris force to be pledged to NATO is still seven or eight years away but there are NATO nuclear forces that could be brought under some form of multilateral control system now. Is it the USA intention to try to achieve some form of multilateral control with present NATO forces or do they intend to wait until the Polaris force comes into being? (These two questions are the most important for Canada.)

(c) Is the Nassau Agreement to be the point of departure for discussion in Council on the future shape of a NATO multilateral nuclear deterrent? If so, what are USA intentions with regard to their previous proposal for a seaborne multilateral force and a pilot Mediterranean seaborne force? Could some of the studies relating to political control, command structure, operations, etc., for a seaborne force be applied to a NATO Polaris force made up of national components or to a wider type of NATO multilateral force?

(d) If Nassau is to be the point of departure for discussion, what happens to Mr. Stikker's paper of September 3/62 on defence policy?

(e) Is the "Review of procedures in order to secure a closer alignment between NATO military requirements and national force plans as well as an equitable sharing of the common defence burden" which was agreed at the Ministerial Meeting in December to be considered separately from or concurrently with discussion of the Nassau Agreement? What is at stake here is the relative priority to be given to conventional and nuclear weapons and the USA policy of urging other members of the Alliance to build up conventional forces.

(f) Where is the best forum for carrying on future discussions of NATO defence strategy? Should it be in restricted sessions of the full Council or by enlargement of the nuclear information committee or some other forum?

(g) We were interested to learn that the USA Ambassador to France has been instructed to tell General de Gaulle that "France was being offered exactly the same relationship to the USA in nuclear matters as Britain would have." Does this mean that the USA would be willing to negotiate with the French exchange of nuclear information agreements along the lines of those already in force with Britain? Britain has joint targeting arrangements with the USA as well as the intelligence co-operation necessary for this targeting. Will the USA be willing to negotiate the same type of arrangements with France and, if so, how does joint targeting with the British and French fit in with a wider multilateral force?

(h) We were interested by the suggestion in paragraph 6 of NATO telegram 17 of January 4 that the USA might be willing to give up bilateral nuclear arrangements and the two key system in return for a multilateral control system. We would be interested to learn whether in fact Washington would be willing to go this far now.

(i) Are we correct in our assumption that the USA still considers that NATO land-based MRBMs are unnecessary?

(j) Paragraph 6 of the Nassau communiqué is so worded that it appears that it was at British initiative that agreement was reached to make an immediate start in subscribing to NATO part of the USA, SAC and V-Bomber force. This is contrary to what we have known in the past to have been the UK position and it would be useful to know why the British took this initiative. We also understand that SACEUR already has the right to call on all of the Valiants and some of the Vulcans in the V-Bomber force as well as some elements of SAC in support of his targets in Europe. This being so, the assigned forces referred to in paragraph 6 of the communiqué would appear to make little change in the present military position. The real significance of this paragraph would therefore appear to be a political one and it would be useful to know whether it relates to USA policy of creating a multilateral force or whether it was designed as an inducement to the French Government.

NATO DEFENCE PLANNING COUNCIL DISCUSSION OF NASSAU AGREEMENT

CCOS has passed by telephone the following comments on the presentations in the Council made by Ball and Shuckburgh on behalf of the United States and United Kingdom respectively on January 11:

(a) in the Canadian view, SACEUR is the only conceivable commander to whom the proposed new multilateral forces could be assigned. There would be no military justification for the creation of a new NATO command, or for the assignment of the proposed multilateral force to some other NATO commander such as SACLANT;

(b) one important point for Canada is to learn how the command structure would be constituted to which countries now having tactical nuclear weapons in Europe would be assigning those weapons [sic];

(c) like us, CCOS believes that if there were a possibility of arriving reasonably quickly at decisions with regard to command arrangements for a multilateral force, it might offer a convenient solution to the problem now facing Canada with respect to the conclusion of a bilateral agreement with the United States for the arming of the CF-104s.

ATOMIC WARHEADS IN CANADA

Soviet press has occasionally published reports of public discussion in Canada concerning acquisition of nuclear weapons by Canadian armed forces. We do not repeat not recall that these reports have ever contained blunt assertion that Canada now possesses nuclear warheads but we suspect that these have sown this conclusion in some Soviet readers' minds.

2. In commenting on recent Norstad visit to Ottawa, Red Star on January 18 went to considerable and we think unprecedented lengths to suggest that Canada is now in fact acquiring nuclear warheads.

3. Commentator stated Norstad press interview had for first time publicly revealed hitherto secret Canadian nuclear plans. Canada had undertaken specific NATO obligation in 1957 to acquire warheads, had reaffirmed this in 1959, and had bought Bomarc, Honest John and USA jet aircraft, all of which are designed to deliver such warheads. Various statements by Mr.

Harkness indicated it was intention to acquire warheads, including his announcement last year that storage facilities had been built. Article also referred to press reports that nuclear stockpiles are growing at bases in North Bay, Goose Bay and St. Hubert.

4. Article then concluded by assertion that Canadian Government is split on this issue and that Norstad visit was intended to expedite fulfilment of Canadian obligations to NATO.

NATO DEFENCE PLANNING—NASSAU AGREEMENT—COUNCIL DISCUSSION

As you know, we are committed to seeking a clarification of our role in Europe under NATO defence plans and to endeavouring to bring about such clarification by the time of the May Ministerial Meeting.

2. As the defence plans of NATO, with particular reference to nuclear strategy, are themselves under major review at present, your task is in effect to try to speed up the present discussions, insofar as they relate to Canadian forces, to the point where the government would be in a position to make final decisions both on role and armament by May. Your efforts should therefore be primarily directed towards paragraph 6 of the Nassau communiqué.

3. That paragraph proposes that, in making a start on a NATO multilateral nuclear force, some part of forces already in existence may be assigned. This could include allocations from the USA strategic forces, from the UK bomber command, and from tactical nuclear forces now held in Europe. In this original report to the NATO Council on the implications of Nassau, USA Assistant Under-Secretary of State Ball said that "It was possible that certain selected tactical forces not including battlefield weapons could be included as components of a multilateral nuclear force."

4. There would appear to be advantages for the NATO Alliance and for Canada in moving forward as quickly as possible in creating a NATO nuclear force which would contain contributions from a number of member states in addition to those pledged by Britain and the USA. The first step – an inventory of potential force contributions – has already been put in hand by Council. The next step would appear to be to obtain clarification of the command and control system into which a new multilateral force might be fitted.

5. The essential elements of any such NATO force would include

(1) Force contributions by as many states as possible to give real meaning to the multilateral concept.

(2) A Corresponding Multilateral Form of Political Control Over the Force. We would expect states contributing forces to take part in any group or executive committee that may be established to exercise political control over this force.

(3) An Appropriate Nuclear Command. We would expect contributors to the force to be suitably represented.

(4) Multilateral Custodial Arrangements. It would be necessary to work out multilateral arrangements for the custody of the nuclear warheads available to these forces as an alternative to the present bilateral agreements with the USA.

6. Presumably "tactical nuclear forces" are to form part of the early national contributions to the new force and CF-104s would be considered an appropriate weapon system for the purpose. If points (1) to (4) in paragraph 5 above were fully worked out on a satisfactory multilateral basis, contributing states would relinquish to NATO control of their forces to a much greater degree than has been the case so far. The forces, once assigned, and their armament would become operationally the collective responsibility of the Alliance rather than of the individual contributing states. The sort of reservation concerning withdrawal of forces for national purposes such as the British have found necessary to maintain would not be applicable in respect of assigned Canadian forces.

7. In the process of examining whether a NATO nuclear force is to be established, it is almost inevitable that there will be at the same time a review of the balance between NATO nuclear and conventional capabilities, especially of tactical nuclear weapons. We have in mind the views set out by the USA Secretary of Defence at last December's Ministerial Meeting calling for "an effective non-nuclear sword" to complement "a superior nuclear shield." Canada has supported the USA view that it is necessary to ensure that NATO has the capability to conduct a sufficiently wide range of operations with conventional forces to avoid ever having to make the choice between either surrender or nuclear war. In this review it may well be found that the NATO commanders are obliged still to rely too heavily on tactical nuclear weapons for immediate battlefield and support purposes. We realize that to achieve an adequate conventional capability in NATO will take time and will meet many political and financial obstacles, but we consider that this aspect of NATO force disposition should be considered in parallel with the approach to the multilateral concept.

8. As the Dutch and Belgian governments have a similar problem with respect to the arrangements which are to govern the command and control of their F-104 aircraft (even though these are not, we understand, designed for the same role as the CF-104s) I am sure you will find it useful to enter into close collaboration with them in attempting to expedite the discussions in the Council.

NASSAU AGREEMENT – LONDON TALKS

Mr. Ignatieff telephoned today to ask for guidance on the position he should take in his consultations with the Prime Minister in London.<sup>34</sup> While being as circumspect as possible in view of the means of communications being used, I managed to convey to him the following points, which can roughly be divided into two categories – those which he should make to the Prime Minister; and those on which he should try to elicit guidance from the Prime Minister.

2. In the first category, were the following:

(1) To impress upon the Prime Minister that the current discussion in NATO concerning the implementation of Paragraph 6 of the Nassau Communiqué does not really offer any solution to the basic Canadian problem of providing nuclear warheads for our nuclear-capable delivery systems in Europe. The Prime Minister should be under no illusions regarding the limited usefulness of the current talks for that purpose.

(2) To make it clear to the Prime Minister that the May date of the Ministerial Meeting was not likely to have any real significance in relation to the implementation of the Nassau Agreement. The discussions so far had shown that progress on either a multi-national or a multilateral force would be slow and not likely to have reached a stage by May where decisions on new arrangements could be made. This was true despite the fact that it would presumably be a simpler matter to give substance to Paragraph 6 than to Paragraph 8.

(3) To make it clear that United Kingdom preoccupations under the Nassau Agreement, though they paralleled ours to a certain extent in relation to Paragraph 6, were basically of a different kind to ours. I indicated that a brief synopsis of the points of interest to the United Kingdom might be helpful to the Prime Minister for his talks with Mr. Macmillan.

3. As to points on which the Prime Minister's guidance would be appreciated, the following were mentioned:

(1) A clear indication of what the Canadian attitude would be towards assigning forces to a multinational force under Paragraph 6 if it should be decided that the CF-104 was a suitable type of tactical nuclear weapon for inclusion in such a force.

(2) What should be the Canadian attitude towards a quite separate contribution, in either money, men or materials, to the projected multilateral force under Paragraph 8? As U.S. interest was focussed almost exclusively on Paragraph 8, this was a question which we would have to expect to face quite soon, particularly in the light of the decision to pursue the discussions of Paragraphs 6 and 8 in parallel.

<sup>34</sup> Londres a accordé le droit de cité à Diefenbaker le 25 février. Sa visite de trois jours au Royaume-Uni a aussi été pour lui l'occasion de rencontrer Macmillan. Voir "Diefenbaker Talks Trade at Supper with Macmillan," The Globe and Mail, February 25, 1963, pp. 1-2. The Freedom of the City of London was bestowed on Diefenbaker on February 25. His three-day visit to the UK also provided an opportunity to meet with Macmillan. See "Diefenbaker Talks Trade at Supper with Macmillan," The Globe and Mail, February 25, 1963, pp. 1-2.

(3) What should be the Canadian position in the Council with respect to the attendance of defence ministers at the May Ministerial Meeting? Having regard to the probability that the discussions in the Council between now and May would be concentrated almost exclusively on defence questions, and in the light of the advance notice being given in Canada to the importance of the defence decisions to be taken in Ottawa, there was something to be said for taking a positive attitude at an early date to the attendance of defence ministers and their senior military advisers.

4. Mr. Ignatieff agreed that the foregoing covered the basic points for the Prime Minister's consideration. He added two of his own:

(a) That it was not inconceivable that by May sufficient progress might be made in the Council to permit a decision at Ottawa to describe henceforth certain existing forces as components of a multi-national NATO force – even though many details, probably including the question of political control of the force, might still be unsolved at the time.

(b) That providing the nature of the difference between the United Kingdom and Canadian approaches to Paragraph 6 were kept clearly in mind, there might be virtue in soliciting U.K. support for the inclusion in a multi-national force of tactical nuclear weapons (such as the CF-104) in exchange for Canadian support of the early implementation of the Paragraph as a whole, as desired by the United Kingdom.

5. I informed Mr. Ignatieff that I had given to Mr. Bryce an oral briefing along the lines indicated in the early part of this memorandum, of which he had made notes.

[Paris?], February 22, 1963

IMMEDIATE CANADIAN DEFENCE PROBLEMS AS THEY AFFECT NATO

1. The Nassau Agreement and the May Ministerial Meeting in Ottawa

(a) Paragraph 6

Canada is at present participating in an examination of the possibilities of creating a NATO nuclear force, as proposed in the Nassau communiqué. Under paragraph 6 of the communiqué, the components of such a force could include the CF-104 aircraft being supplied to the First Canadian Air Division. It is not certain whether sufficient progress will have been made by the time of the May Ministerial meeting to determine whether there might definitely be a rôle for the Air Division in such a force. Present indications are that certain limited decisions about paragraph 6 are possible by the time of the Ministerial meeting and likely by the end of the year.

If a force under paragraph 6 were created, what would be involved would be the transfer of existing forces to new command and control arrangements. Some, like the British V-bombers, would be transferred from outside NATO; others, like the CF-104s, could be transferred within NATO from the existing command and control arrangements to new arrangements yet to be worked out. The Secretary-General believes that the main change which would emerge would be the creation of an inter-allied consultative committee which would exercise certain limited aspects of control over the force. It should be emphasized that this committee's powers would not extend to the ultimate decisions about arming and firing the weapons in an emergency. On the other hand, governments participating in the committee would receive on a continuing basis basic facts about targeting, and would work together through the committee to develop general policy guide lines for the use of the weapons in the force. Thus, participating governments would be able to know on a more precise and continuing basis than they do at present what missions were being assigned to their forces, and to have a greater voice in these assignments, rather than having to leave decisions of this sort largely to the United States.

In the Secretary-General's view the CF-104s of the First Canadian Air Division would qualify for inclusion in an inter-allied force of this kind. The question is whether we would wish to take advantage of these arrangements. We would gain through our voice on the inter-allied consultative committee; on the other hand, these arrangements would not be a full substitute for the existing system under which control of nuclear weapons is exercised under bilateral agreements between countries owning nuclear carriers and the United States as supplier of warheads.

Even if a reorganization of existing forces along these lines were not to take place, the units of the Air Division would presumably still continue to be needed in their existing role. In view of the shortages in his forces, it is unlikely that SACEUR would say that the Air Division was of no use to him except as a component in an inter-allied force under paragraph 6 of the Nassau communiqué. This means that whether an inter-allied force is created or not, the question of access to United States atomic stockpiles for the Air Division would remain. Access to stockpiles does not involve departure from the essential principle that Canada is opposed to the proliferation of nuclear weapons, since the weapons in the stockpile would remain under United States ownership, custody and control. The problem of access will become urgent about May or June when, as Mr. Churchill has said, the first squadron will have completed their training. Four squadrons are scheduled to arrive by mid-July, 1963; eight will have arrived by the end of January, 1964. Squadrons can do a certain amount of preliminary training before they need to have access to nuclear weapons. This might last about three months from the date the squadron was activated. At the end of that period the squadrons would normally go on to operational training. This means that targets would be assigned to them. Targets cannot be assigned unless an agreement has been signed which permits warheads to be stored at the airfields concerned under United States custody. After three or four months, operational training would be completed, and SACEUR would then require a certain number of aircraft in each squadron to be on quick reaction alert at all times. This means that the aircraft on alert would have to be ready to take off within three minutes. The bombs they carried, including the warheads, would actually have to be on the aircraft. The bombs would not be armed of course, nor the aircraft taken off the ground unless appropriate orders were received. In an emergency the weapons would be armed by United States personnel of the custodial force. These are the normal peacetime arrangements for strike aircraft of any NATO forces assigned to SACEUR.

(b) Paragraph 8

The essential problem posed by the Nassau Agreement is how the United States is to share control of nuclear weapons with its allies, particularly the Europeans. In recent years the United States has become more vulnerable to a nuclear attack by the Soviet Union. In these circumstances some Europeans have come to doubt whether the United States would risk its own destruction in a crisis in which European interests were primarily at stake. Successive United States administrations have attempted to devise ways for reassuring Europeans by assigning U.S. strategic forces to NATO and by proposing different schemes for giving Europeans a greater sense of participation in the strategic defence arrangements of the Alliance.

The latest of these schemes has been the proposal for a multilateral multi-manned sea-borne or submarine force armed with the Polaris missile. The proposal raises problems of great complexity which will take considerable time to clarify. There is the question whether the United States Congress can even be persuaded to amend the McMahon Act so as to permit the United States administration to transfer the ownership and control of nuclear warheads for such a force to some sort of multilateral legal entity under NATO. There is also the question whether satisfactory control arrangements can be devised which would permit a number of members of the Alliance to participate in collective decisions about the use of the weapons in the force.

Insofar as the United States proposal is basically to find a solution to the problem of control of the next generation of relatively invulnerable nuclear carriers, it merits Canadian support. We should not, however, expect early results. In the best circumstances, it is unlikely that such a force could be in service before 1968 or 1969. It could well be that the project will founder either on Congressional opposition or on the inability of the Alliance to devise a viable and credible control system. In the circumstances, all that the Canadian Government is likely to be asked to do during the current year is to agree to participate in continuing studies of the multilateral force.

2. Defence Ministers at the May Ministerial Meeting

There has been no decision yet. The Secretary-General believes that a decision on an inter-allied force under paragraph 6 of the Nassau communiqué might be possible by the time of the May meeting, if it were confined to the limited area described in paragraph 1. At least a progress report on discussions of the Nassau Agreement might be made. Depending on how much progress has been made in discussions of the Nassau Agreement, it might be desirable from the Canadian point of view that Defence Ministers be present. However, it is still uncertain whether the other members of the Alliance would find this desirable or necessary.

Points for discussion with the Prime Minister:

1. Does the Prime Minister want the NATO defence Ministers to be present at the spring Ministerial meeting in Ottawa, or is his attitude one of being prepared to see them come if that is the general wish?
2. How far does the Prime Minister want to go in supporting the Nassau agreement?
3. What are the Prime Minister's views on the assignment of F-104s to the Nassau force (under para. 6)?
4. What are the Prime Minister's views about implementation of para. 8 of the Nassau agreement? Would he contemplate Canadian participation?

Dear George [Drew],

I was delighted at the news that you and Fiorenza will be coming over to stay with us next Friday, March 8. Alison will be in touch with Fiorenza about shows that we might go to.

As promised, I am enclosing [on a] for your own eyes only basis the record I sent to Ross Campbell of my impressions of what I said and heard last week-end in London, including a copy of the memorandum which I gave to the Prime Minister at the conclusion of the meeting at Upper Brook Street last Saturday afternoon. Obviously I do not expect that my record would necessarily coincide with yours, but I would be very grateful if you could let me know some time whether my impressions were significantly out of line.

With warmest best wishes.

[Paris], February 27, 1963

Dear Ross [Campbell],

By the time this reaches you, you may well have got the story about what transpired in the talks on defence in London from Bob Bryce. There were two sets of talks (a) my report on the Nassau Agreement and the May Ministerial Meeting in Ottawa on Saturday February the 23rd and (b) my later talk with Gordon Churchill about the CF-104s on Monday February the 25th. I worked closely with Bob on both occasions and he was present and will tell you in greater detail what happened. In this letter I will merely summarize my impression of it and what I hope will be done to follow these talks up.

My report to the Prime Minister on February the 24th was based on the attached memorandum<sup>35</sup> of which I enclose four copies. I think that there is nothing in it which is inconsistent with your memo of February 21 [22?]. Bob Bryce went over the memorandum and agreed that I should leave a copy with the Prime Minister which I did.

No conclusive comment or discussion followed but it was my impression that the Prime Minister and Mr. Churchill had no objection to us exploring the possibilities of a multi-national NATO nuclear force on the basis that 104s would probably be included and that the expectation that what will emerge will not in so far as command and control is concerned be very different from the arrangements now in effect except that there might be an inter-allied consultative committee on which Canada as a contributor to the force might be represented.

There was very little enthusiasm for a multi-NATO seaborne nuclear force but as I pointed out to the Prime Minister privately if as is probable the Germans will support and offer a substantial subscription to this force it may well be that the rest of us will have to support the force as a better alternative to the development of a separate German national nuclear force which might well emerge as a result of the Franco-German treaty. In any case we are only in an exploratory stage in the NATO discussions and I suppose that we can hardly object to the exploration going forward without commitment but on the understanding that a Canadian contribution if sensible arrangements emerge should not be excluded.

As regards the participation of Defence Ministers at the May Ottawa Meeting, I detected no particular enthusiasm for this and Mr. Churchill seemed to be content to leave it to a consensus in the Council and that we should not press for the participation of Defence Ministers. He mentioned that Thorneycroft expected to come.

My understanding with Bob Bryce is that he, in consultation with you and National Defence, will send me a telegram of further guidance on the points which you suggested that I should raise in London – Bob has a copy of my list of your four points.

Now for my talk with Mr. Gordon Churchill. As Bob will no doubt tell you I was recalled from Paris yesterday as Mr. Churchill wanted to speak to me after visiting the Air Division and the Brigade on Sunday. He told me that he had come to the conclusion that it was in his judgment unnecessary to negotiate a bilateral agreement between Canada and the United States to enable the Air Division or the Brigade to have access to stock piles in Europe since these forces – unlike Canadian forces to be employed in continental defence – have been assigned to NATO and for this reason it is NATO's responsibility to see that nuclear warheads are readily available to our forces as and when required. He argued that the NATO High Command had already made storage arrangements both for warheads for the Honest John and for the 104s and there was no reason why they should not make the arrangements for the warheads as well. I explained that it was my understanding that an agreement was necessary with the United States because SACEUR was an international commander and that the warheads belonged to the USA. However, as Mr. Churchill made it quite clear that he did not intend to depart from the position as stated on February 19th at his nomination convention at Winnipeg South Centre,<sup>36</sup> namely that it was for the NATO High Command to make available nuclear weapons for the 104 squadrons and for the Honest Johns and that Canada had fulfilled her obligations by providing the planes, the pilots and the battery of Honest Johns, I saw no point in continuing the argument especially as I am not absolutely clear still as to the precise legal position. I therefore suggested and Mr. Churchill agreed, that the position should be explored carefully in Ottawa and that I be given a memorandum on the basis of which I could explore the ground with the Secretary-General and SACEUR. I mentioned that I would like to have somebody from the Advocate General's Branch to help me in these talks.

It may well be that some arrangement could be worked out if it can be established that the agreement we signed with the USA in 1958 on the exchange of information is the governing bilateral agreement required by the Atomic Energy Act and that subsequent arrangements can be made by executive agreements on a service to service basis. If this is so then possibly the arrangements covering warheads for the 104s and the Honest John battery could be administrative arrangements made with the appropriate commanders in Allied Command Europe. The fact that these commanders wear US as well as NATO hats could conceivably make it possible that such arrangements would satisfy USA law. One thing Mr. Churchill was quite clear on was that he was not going to ask the USA for the warheads required for Canadian forces which had been assigned to the NATO High Command. He did not seem to attach much importance to the possibilities of effective Canadian political control over these forces which I pointed out might be prejudiced if we accept the idea that the assignment of forces to SACEUR involved acceptance of the principle that SACEUR was then made responsible to provide the warheads. In any case this seems to be a matter which needs examination in the first instance in Ottawa and I am quite prepared to do whatever I can to promote such an arrangement once I am armed with a brief.

Mr. Churchill was also concerned about the unsatisfactory state of affairs concerning the air fields for the 104s. As you know there can be no storage of nuclear weapons on the air fields located in France and he feels that we should try to make arrangements as soon as possible with SACEUR to get air fields with storage facilities in Germany or Belgium. I take it that this is a matter which in the first instance should be taken up through the military.

All in all the talks were not unhelpful and I think it was particularly useful that Mr. Churchill got to see the 104s and the Honest Johns. It was particularly valuable to me to have had such a good opportunity to have a talk with Bob Bryce and we worked together completely in harmony.

Yours as ever,

[GEORGE IGNATIEFF]

P.S. I enclose a copy for Bob Bryce.

P.P.S. I had a preliminary private talk with the Secretary-General about Mr. Churchill's idea that no further agreement may be necessary to enable the Air Division and the Brigade to have access to stock piles. His reaction was that this was certainly worth exploring since according to his records there were two main positions to start from:

(a) The statement in the 1957 Communiqué that "NATO has decided to establish stocks of nuclear warheads which will be readily available for the defence of the Alliance in case of need,"<sup>37</sup> and

(b) The fact that Canada signed a bilateral agreement with the US on May 22, 1959, which enables Canada to have access to nuclear information.<sup>38</sup>

Stikker also mentioned that a statement by SACEUR to the Council on the 30th of April, 1959, may have some bearing on our problem since it deals with NATO stock piles in Europe. I told him that I would not pursue the matter further until I had a brief from Ottawa but he told me that he would be willing to help.

NATO CONSULTATION ON DEFENCE PLANNING
 AND THE NASSAU AGREEMENT AS AT MARCH 8, 1963

Paragraph 6

On February 20 the Council established an ad hoc working group to survey nuclear weapons systems available between now and the end of 1966. The terms of reference of the group call for the establishment of an inventory of

- units equipped with nuclear delivery systems located in the area of Allied Command Europe assigned to NATO, and units outside Allied Command Europe but which governments may in principle be willing to place at the disposal of the NATO nuclear force
- nuclear delivery systems which members plan to introduce into their own forces between now and the end of 1966 and commit to NATO.

The ad hoc working group has met twice and is expected to report back to Council towards the end of March.

In reporting the discussions in Council on February 20, our NATO Representative made it clear that there was uncertainty and opposition to the possible implementation of a multi-national force under Paragraph 6. The French attitude was one of reserve and they would probably only play the role of observers in the discussions, the Danes and Norwegians have remained silent throughout the discussion, the Germans are still uncertain whether to contribute under Paragraph 6 or under Paragraphs 7 and 8, and the USA continues to have serious reservations about including tactical nuclear weapons systems in a force under Paragraph 6.

On February 27th Council discussed the replacement of Jupiter IRBM missiles in Italy and Turkey by three U.S.-manned Polaris submarines. In answer to a question from the NATO Secretary-General as to whether these submarines were to be considered as the USA contribution to a multilateral force under Paragraph 6, the USA NATO Delegate replied that these submarines will be assigned to SACEUR, will be under SACEUR's control and will be targeted by SACEUR. He said there had been no final decision about the USA contribution under Paragraph 6 but that it was likely that these submarines would constitute the USA contribution.

This week the NATO Secretary-General is paying a visit to Washington in order to obtain personal clarification from the U.S. Government of the Nassau Agreement. Mr. Stikker also hopes to obtain USA agreement to a rational plan of work for NATO for the rest of the year because in his view conflicting interpretations of Nassau, in particular between Britain (who wish to go ahead with a multi-national force under Paragraph 6) and the USA (who wish to concentrate on a multilateral force under Paragraphs 7 and 8) have thrown the work of the Council into disarray.

In Council on March 6 the British NATO Representative gave further information on British thinking with regard to a multi-national force under Paragraph 6. He made the following points:

- (a) The multi-national force under Paragraph 6 and the multilateral force under Paragraphs 7 and 8 are not rival plans but essential parts of a general effort to organize, discipline and unite the nuclear capabilities of the Alliance. The NATO nuclear force must be a developing one: it should begin by contributions of national forces already in existence and continue by including other types of weapons systems as they become available in the future.

(b) Initial contributions to the force should be limited to those nuclear delivery systems which are pre-targeted, which would include existing tactical strike aircraft (such as the Canadian CF104s) and the longer range bombardment missiles. The British believe these systems have the special characteristic of being available for tactical support of Allied Command Europe as a whole rather than for close support of the forces of the country they are in and, therefore, they fit naturally into a multilateral scheme.

(c) Any country willing to assign weapons systems of this kind would be a contributor to a NATO nuclear force and be entitled to a voice in the arrangements for the use of the force, i.e. targeting, planning, co-ordination and carrying out of nuclear strikes.

(d) Contributing countries should negotiate individually the terms of assignment of their forces (the British wish to be free to withdraw the V-bomber component of the multi-national force "when supreme national interests are at stake").

(e) The force should be under the supreme command of SACEUR but within SHAPE a nuclear planning and command cell should be formed with an officer in charge directly subordinate to SACEUR. The first holder of this post should be a European and he would be served by a staff drawn from participants in the multi-national nuclear force.

Paragraph 8

On February 27, for the first time, the USA presented its views on Paragraphs 7 and 8 of the Nassau communiqué to the NATO Council. From this presentation, it is clear that the U.S. Government has reverted to a preference for surface vessels rather than submarines as carriers for the Polaris missile in a NATO multilateral force, and that for the present the U.S. Government have decided not to give up the veto in the control body of such a force.

The USA consider that a multilateral force under Paragraphs 7 and 8 might at first be a joint undertaking of a small number of members of NATO but that others could join later. Features of the multilateral force would include - control by a committee of the participating countries in which the rule of unanimity would apply.

- underwriting by the USA of a substantial fraction of the cost of the force including warheads, personnel and Polaris missiles.

Livingston Merchant is now visiting those European countries who have expressed a "solid interest" in the multilateral force (Britain, Germany, Italy and Greece) and will be reporting back to the Council in the next two or three weeks. Meanwhile, our Permanent NATO Representative has indicated that the reaction of the Council to the U.S. presentation was one of reserve. "Members realize, however, that the problems raised by the multilateral force especially its political control, are central to the future of the Alliance and will in any case have to be faced when, towards the end of this decade, we will have to decide whether to renew the North Atlantic Treaty and, if so, in what form."

In a private discussion with Merchant, our NATO Representative reported that

(a) Merchant confirmed the USA had revised its view of the military value of a multilateral force and, as a result, had come to the conclusion that the trend in missile systems was away from fixed vulnerable bases and that Polaris carrying submarines and surface carriers reflected this trend. Invulnerability of the Polaris submarine was not absolute and the Soviet Union was bound to try and develop countermeasures to it. The desirability, therefore, of developing an alternative to the Polaris submarine deserved consideration, particularly as it would force the Soviet Union to divert resources from developing countermeasures against Polaris submarines.

(b) Other advantages of surface carriers are their cheapness, they can be built in other countries, they would be available sooner than submarines and the training of multi-national crews presented less problems than in the case of submarines.

(c) It was the definite intention of the USA to have all 15 NATO nations ultimately contribute to the multilateral force in one way or another whether in money, men or materials.

(d) The U.S. did not consider French participation excluded for all time. They had carefully studied the French nuclear weapons programme and were convinced that the Mirage force would be obsolescent from the moment of coming into service. The USA also believed that economic factors alone would eventually force France to abandon its independent deterrent.

(e) The USA were now concentrating on securing German participation in the multi-lateral force. If West Germany can be persuaded to become a charter member, there was little likelihood that the Germans would be tempted to build their own independent nuclear deterrent.

(f) The USA realizes that Britain is more concerned with Paragraph 6 and not a very enthusiastic supporter of a multilateral force under Paragraph 8. However, the attitude of a British Labour Government might be different.

Future Discussions

Further discussion on Paragraph 6 is not likely to take place until the end of the month when the Ad Hoc Working Group which is drawing up the inventory of nuclear weapons systems has made its report. Discussions on Paragraph 8 are also not likely for a number of weeks until Livingston Merchant has returned from his present round of visits. With regard to a visit to Ottawa, Mr. Merchant informed Mr. Ignatieff

“His team had not sought invitations from NATO governments for bilateral discussions. This initiative was left to governments themselves to decide. There had, he knew, already been contact at the level of officials when the Smith-Lee team visited Ottawa. He believed any additional briefing would only be profitable if it were to include Ministers. He thought it would be useful to have CABAL briefings take place before any further briefing on the multilateral force.”

With regard to the CABAL briefing, we have been informed that the U.S. CABAL briefing team has asked for a postponement of their visit to Ottawa until after April 9 and have suggested consultations on a new date.

under para. 6 of the Nassau Agreement should be supported in order to counteract the United States tendency to emphasize paras. 7 and 8.<sup>41</sup>

2. Subsequently on March 13 the Minister was informed concerning the German reaction to the Merchant Mission which was reported to involve payment by Germany of up to 40 percent of the costs of a multilateral nuclear force. His attention was drawn to the implications of this for the German position in Europe and he was informed that there were, in addition, some indications that the French might not insist on maintenance of the restraints imposed on Germany through the Western European Union. In view of these developments it was suggested that we might soon have to take a position on the concept of a multilateral force in paras. 7 and 8 of the Nassau Agreement. The Minister asked how soon this would be necessary and he was informed that the question would probably come up during consultations prior to the presentation of the results of the Merchant Mission.

3. The Minister was also informed that the SHAPE military authorities had decided that the Canadian F104G aircraft should not be included in the survey that was being completed concerning nuclear weapons systems already available for a multi-national nuclear force under para. 6 of the Nassau Agreement.<sup>42</sup> The Canadian aircraft were being excluded because nuclear warheads were not available for their weapons. The Minister instructed that there should be no reaction to this decision until he returned to Ottawa and had an opportunity to discuss the problem with officials. A few of the implications of allowing this decision to stand in relation to Canada's participation in NATO were mentioned to him but elaboration of these points was left until his return.

NATO NUCLEAR FORCE – UNITED STATES VIEWS

As our conversation with Livingston Merchant on March 21 was held shortly after his return and prior to his meeting with President Kennedy, we saw Robert Schaetzel, Deputy Assistant Secretary for Atlantic Affairs, yesterday March 26, to sound him out on the President's reaction and on the general attitude of the Administration to the results of Merchant's tour. Schaetzel seemed less confident about the future of the multilateral force than when we saw him at the beginning of February. His concern as to prospects of early progress appeared to stem from the existence of unresolved basic issues, delay in reaching firm decisions within the Administration, the need for more effective liaison with Congress, and finally from the extent to which the main European countries interested in the force are currently concerned with domestic political matters.

End '66? [Ross Campbell]

2. With respect to the results of Merchant's tour, Schaetzel gave us the clear impression that President Kennedy has not yet taken any clear decision to authorize officials to proceed with the next stage of actual negotiations. He admitted that the apparent lack of solid support in Washington tended to create doubts abroad about the Administration's real intentions and serious interest in pressing ahead.

3. On Congressional opinion Schaetzel personally thought that not enough was being done by the Administration to place the problem of establishing a multilateral force in the wider political context. He implied that disproportionate attention was being directed by the Administration in the discussions with Congress to the mechanics of the force (and by inference to the necessary amendments to United States legislation) and not enough to the political arguments weighing in favour of its creation. The natural inclination of Congress was to stand pat. He thought the Administration should make greater efforts to emphasize to Congress the political realities of the present situation. In this connection he felt there was a need to draw their attention to the sort of considerations referred to by President Kennedy at his news conference last week<sup>43</sup> when (in reply to a question relating to prospects for a nuclear test ban agreement) the President underlined the danger that a number of countries may soon be in a position to develop an independent nuclear capability.

4. Schaetzel said that one of the real difficulties vis-à-vis Congress was that the Administration could not at the present stage provide them with much more than a hypothesis coupled with a request for an indication as to what the Congressional attitude would be in the event such a hypothetical situation materialized. The tendency in Congress was to reply that the Administration should return when it had more concrete proposals to offer and when it was in a better position to report on what the Europeans really want and can expect to support. On the other hand, Schaetzel said, it was difficult to persuade the Europeans to get down to real negotiations on basic issues involved in the absence of some assurances that United States Congressional support would be forthcoming in the final analysis.

5. Political control and the type of carriers to be employed continue to be the main unresolved issues. Schaetzel thought that the former would pose the most difficulties but he seemed optimistic it would prove possible in the long run to arrive at a formula which would prove to be acceptable to all concerned.

6. With regard to European reactions, Schaetzel, like Merchant, was critical of the United Kingdom's attitude which reflected, in his view, an excessive preoccupation with the maintenance of an independent nuclear deterrent force. Schaetzel clearly implied that its attitude was not only anachronistic but was out of tune with what he took to be prevailing view of responsible opinion (especially the press) in the United Kingdom. At the same time, Schaetzel did not seem to think that much change in the United Kingdom Government's position could be expected. He felt that strong United Kingdom support for the multilateral force would make a great deal of difference in the present situation. In the light of signs of declining support for Macmillan however, the prospects of any United Kingdom move in this direction did not appear to be very good.

7. Schaetzel agreed that the current emphasis by the United Kingdom on the multinational force might have more meaning if some real measure of assignment of national contributions were involved, e.g., if the United Kingdom agreed to the right of withdrawal of its national contribution subject only to "supreme national interests" being at stake. He said the United States had tried unsuccessfully to persuade them to accept such a formula. In the circumstances Schaetzel (who was less derogatory than Merchant in assessing the value of paragraph 6 force) thought that the main advantages in setting it up were (1) that it would represent something tangible in the way of implementing the Nassau Agreement and (2) that it would enable members of the force to share information and planning relating to targeting of NATO strategic forces.

8. On the German attitude Schaetzel confirmed that the Administration has been encouraged by the keen interest expressed in Bonn and he thought that Germans were getting close to a firm commitment. He also had the impression that the Germans were very conscious of the undesirability of moving too far out in front of their other European partners whose reactions to date were relatively lukewarm. Schaetzel added, however, that it was difficult to get German authorities to concentrate their full attention on the multilateral force because of the preoccupation in Bonn with the question of a successor for Chancellor Adenauer.

9. On the Belgian attitude Schaetzel believed that Spaak was genuinely interested in Belgian participation but was confronted with a complicated parliamentary situation. The natural and understandable inclination of a small country like Belgium, Schaetzel observed, was to leave the situation pretty much as it is, with the main Western deterrent power remaining in United States hands and with the Europeans concentrating on the improvement of their conventional forces.

10. Bearing in mind the United States view that the development of the multilateral force should not proceed at the expense of improving NATO's conventional forces, we asked Schaetzel whether the Administration intended to expound further its views on NATO strategy. Schaetzel acknowledged that at some stage in the present process an attempt would have to be made to resolve the underlying differences between the United States and certain European members on this question. He did not dismiss the possibility that this problem might be raised at the Ottawa meeting and he thought that some advantage might be derived from having informal discussions on this question between Ministers either on a bilateral or multilateral basis.

11. With regard to the NATO Ministerial Meeting, Schaetzel thought that sufficient progress will have been made by the date of the meeting to enable Ministers to agree on the establishment of a multinational force under paragraph 6 and to make individual commitments regarding national contributions to this force. On the multilateral force Schaetzel sounded even less optimistic than Merchant and did not seem certain that it would even be possible to request Ministers to take note of progress report. He clearly hoped, however, that something of this nature would prove feasible.

12. It is Schaetzel's habit to speak freely and he has some tendency to respond rather emotionally to encouragement or the reverse. The foregoing report should, therefore, be treated with due caution, although we do consider that it provides a reflection of the inconclusive state of current thinking in Washington as to the possibilities of launching the multilateral nuclear force in 1963.

BERLIN ECONOMIC COUNTER-MEASURES

As you know, on January 15, 1962, when the German Ambassador called on the Prime Minister, this subject was discussed. Our understanding is that Mr. Siegfried said he had received special instructions from Chancellor Adenauer to explain to the Prime Minister of Canada that the Canadian attitude toward economic counter-measures was causing difficulties and to urge withdrawal of the Canadian reservations on the proposed NATO decision. Mr. Siegfried apparently said that Canada was the only country that was not prepared to accept the proposed NATO decision concerning a total economic embargo against the Soviet bloc in the event that military and civilian access, air or ground, to West Berlin is blocked. The Prime Minister undertook to discuss the question again with his colleagues. He suggested that the Ambassador should talk to you about the problem.

2. The United States Embassy and the British High Commissioner's Office have already made similar representations to us on this matter. In addition, as reported in paragraphs 9 and 10 of the attached telegram (No. 38 of January 8, 1962 from NATO Paris†), the Secretary-General of NATO recently enquired about the Canadian position. Mr. Stikker said he was aware of your recent conversation with the Minister-Counsellor of the United States Embassy in Ottawa.

3. Mr. Léger gave Stikker a copy of the attached statement which Canadian Ministers approved during the Council meetings last month and the Secretary-General was informed that this statement would be made in the Council if the matter was raised. Mr. Stikker was pleased by our acceptance of the civil air traffic counter-measures but he said that Canadian reservations on other aspects of the question might undermine the whole scheme by inspiring doubts and opposition among other members of the alliance. Some of these countries would reject any decision which was not acceptable to all members and Mr. Léger commented that seen in this light, in Mr. Stikker's view, our reservations amount to a veto.

4. The Secretary-General must now decide whether to press for the acceptance of the following draft decision on a total embargo which was introduced in the NATO Council on December 7, 1961:

"The Council has decided that in the event military and civilian access, air or ground, to West Berlin is blocked, the immediate imposition of significant counter-measures amounting to a total economic embargo against the Soviet bloc would be an appropriate response. The NATO countries are planning their concerted participation in such an effort. In the event that blockage appears to be substantially complete, the Council will meet and as appropriate, acting under guidance of governments, will consider whether such an embargo should be put into effect."

This formula does not contain the objectionable "automatic" feature of earlier proposals which involved more substantial advance commitments. The present draft states that when access to West Berlin appears to be blocked the Council will decide whether or not to impose an embargo. However, the first sentence of the draft decision involves acknowledgement that a total economic embargo would be an “appropriate response” to blockage of access to West Berlin; and the second sentence involves a commitment to participate in planning for a total embargo.

5. You will recall the Cabinet decision of October 23, 1961, that “... the Government should make no commitment to participate in economic counter-measures with respect to the Berlin situation until access to Berlin was denied ...”<sup>44</sup> On December 7, 1961, when the Cabinet reaffirmed this decision (except so far as it applied to air traffic counter-measures on which the withdrawal of the Canadian reservation was authorized),<sup>45</sup> information concerning the new NATO draft decision of the same date was just being received. The so-called Stikker “compromise formula” has not, therefore, been considered by the Cabinet. In these circumstances do you wish a further Memorandum to the Cabinet to be prepared or do you wish our position to remain as explained in the statement approved by the Ministers attending last month’s meetings in Paris?

BERLIN ECONOMIC COUNTER-MEASURES

Since the subject of economic counter-measures has been raised, I should like to explain briefly why [the] Canadian Government has had reservations about this concept. While the Canadian position has in form been perhaps somewhat different from that of many other members of the alliance, I believe that in fact, some of Canada’s reservations on this subject are shared by a number of other members of the alliance. I want to assure you at once that our misgivings have certainly not been inspired by any preference for military counter action or by any narrow commercial considerations. Rather it is that we have doubts about the efficacy of economic sanctions and we would have real difficulties in imposing them in a situation short of war.

In this Council the hope has been expressed that if a total economic embargo could be imposed as a last resort in order to avoid hostilities, such economic action might be an effective deterrent. In several NATO countries, including Canada, legislative authority does not now exist to take all the measures which would be required to impose a total economic blockade. In a crisis it would, therefore, be necessary to seek Parliamentary authority for the measures which would be involved. If this legislation was to be successfully defended in Parliament and before public opinion, the urgent need for it would have to be clear beyond the shadow of a doubt. In other words, Parliamentary and public opinion in a number of the NATO countries would have to be satisfied that the situation required drastic measures amounting to the penultimate step before war.

In considering this problem, the Canadian Government was impressed by the extreme difficulty of predicting the exact circumstances in which these demands for Parliamentary and public support would have to be made. It is true that, for internal procedural purposes within the alliance, the question of a total blockade has been divorced from the question of a partial or gradual blockade. This may have facilitated planning. But is it realistic? In other words, is it at all likely that a total blockade of West Berlin, which would clearly be seen as the last step before war, will be thrust upon us overnight? If the alliance should agree to a form of words outlining what should be done in the circumstances of a total blockade, would it not be agreeing to do something in a hypothetical situation which is unlikely ever to arise?

If so, then surely the alliance should be concentrating its attention on what it would do if there were a partial or gradual blockade of West Berlin. After all, it is this type of progressive harassment which we are already facing.

The exact form which a partial blockade of West Berlin might take and the precise counter-measures which might be an appropriate response are perhaps the hardest of all to predict and to provide for, especially under our federal system of Government. Within the limits of its present powers, however, the Canadian Government is prepared to do what it can to meet such a situation. It has, therefore, agreed that Canadian reservation on the Council's previous decision on three civil aviation counter-measures can be withdrawn. Beyond that, we remain unable to give general commitments in advance of situations which cannot in their nature be predicted. If a much more serious situation were to occur, and the alliance were to be faced with imminent war, the Canadian Government would promptly take the necessary decisions in the light of that situation.

It would be particularly unfortunate, I would suggest, if mention of the fact that the alliance was considering counter-measures appeared in the press as a result of this meeting at a time when the alliance was trying to focus attention on the vital importance of undertaking negotiations.

[Ottawa], January 18, 1962

GERMAN AMBASSADOR'S CALL REGARDING BERLIN ECONOMIC COUNTERMEASURES

On the afternoon of January 17, the German Ambassador called on the Minister to discuss the views which he had conveyed to the Prime Minister on January 15, on behalf of Chancellor Adenauer.

2. Ambassador Siegfried explained that Chancellor Adenauer was concerned about the situation which would arise in Berlin if access were blocked and was therefore anxious to see the NATO countries reach a "clear and unified attitude" regarding economic countermeasures. Accordingly, the Chancellor hoped very much that the Canadian government might reconsider its attitude.

3. Ambassador Siegfried indicated that economic countermeasures were regarded by the German government as an alternative to war. If it was clear that the NATO powers would be prepared to take economic action, this would reduce the risk of dangerous military action. In this connection the Ambassador mentioned that when the wall was being built between East and West Berlin, the East German police along the border were not issued with ammunition since apparently the Soviet authorities were not prepared to have the East Germans engage in an exchange of gun fire if they were challenged. The implication of the Ambassador's remark on this point seemed to be that it was possible to resist (presumably by economic means) Russian action in Berlin without necessarily precipitating a conflict. In fact, the Soviet authorities might expect some response to their actions as apparently they had anticipated over the building of the wall. All of this seemed to the Ambassador to be a justification for the Western powers making an appropriate response if and when the Russians block access to Berlin.

4. Although the Ambassador insisted that the Stikker formula involved no advance commitment, he argued that acceptance of the formula by all NATO members would save time when the final decisions have to be taken. He said, in fact, that adoption of the formula would "avoid the need" for time-consuming consultations when any denial of access occurred. (No doubt his intention was to say that while the necessity for consultations would not be avoided, the time required for reaching agreement would be lessened somewhat if the principle of an economic embargo were to be accepted ahead of time. Even this line of argument, however, implies that adherence to the formula involves some advance commitment, at least in principle.)

5. The Ambassador was not certain whether the German government would expect any resolution that NATO might adopt on this subject to be made public. He recognized that if some common understanding among the NATO countries was to have any effect as a deterrent, the Russians would have to be aware of its existence. On the other hand, publicity might cause serious concern within some of the NATO countries and might present difficult problems for individual members.

6. The Ambassador re-emphasized his hope that the Canadian government might be able to go along with the Stikker formula. He noted that while from time to time the tensions in Berlin had risen and subsided, the situation was now as tense and dangerous as it had ever been. It was most important that the Western countries should have available some means other than military action for responding to blockage of access by the Russians or East German authorities.

7. The Minister questioned the Ambassador about the extent to which, under the Stikker formula, governments would remain free to take final decisions at the time of an incident and also about the extent to which it was expected that any NATO resolution adopted now would be made public. The Ambassador's comments on these points seemed rather confused. It appeared that he had not been given any detailed indication of his government's intentions.

8. Mr. Green stated that a total economic embargo would probably involve measures coming within the jurisdiction of provincial governments. The Federal Government could not undertake an advance commitment to carry out such measures without the consent of the provinces or without taking special powers under the War Measures Act. If the Canadian government were to agree now to a resolution which implied that it already had the authority to do all of the things involved in an economic embargo, there would be serious criticism in Canada, especially from the provinces. If it were to seek the necessary authority in advance, a public debate would be precipitated that would not be helpful to NATO. The government would not be prepared to invoke the War Measures Act unless and until a war situation existed or was very close. (Mr. Green noted that the willingness of the government to give advance commitments on matters not involving the provinces or the War Measures Act was evident from the attitude which we had recently taken on air countermeasures.)

9. Mr. Green saw no real advantage in the proposed resolution. If it did not involve any advance commitment, it would not really save time. Since it seemed clear from the last sentence of the formula that the guidance of governments would have to be sought in the event that complete blockage of access occurs, it would seem to be wise to leave the whole matter for settlement when and if such an event takes place.

10. Mr. Green also thought the formula was deficient in not making provision for partial countermeasures in response to partial interference with access. Realistically, it seemed most likely that the Russians would take limited steps and would not go in for a complete blockage all at once. As a practical matter, the NATO countries should be thinking about the partial measures which they might take in response to small actions by the Soviets rather than spending so much time on a general formula designed to cover a situation which seemed most unlikely to arise.

11. The Minister recognized that if a total blockage were to occur, it would probably be necessary for the NATO governments to act at once. He did not consider, however, that such a possibility warranted difficulties with the provinces beforehand. He was certain that the Canadian government would not take a different stand from its allies when and if the time comes for some economic action. In such circumstances, the Canadian government would take its decisions as fast as anybody, but those decisions must be taken at that time rather than now. At the end of the interview the Minister asked Ambassador Siegfried to tell the Chancellor that "he did not need to worry about Canada doing its part if the time comes."

12. It should be added that Mr. Siegfried suggested two or three times during the interview that if the Stikker draft was unacceptable to us, perhaps we should indicate the changes which might make it acceptable. The Minister did not take up the suggestion during the conversation but afterwards he expressed the wish that the Department should go into the possibilities and come up with some alternative to Stikker's proposal.

13. The three Divisions to which this memorandum is addressed might consult on the possibilities.<sup>46</sup>

At the end of my call on Carstens, the State Secretary in the German Foreign Ministry, on January 26 Carstens raised this question. He emphasized that it was at Chancellor Adenauer's request that he had instructed the German Ambassador in Ottawa to call on the Prime Minister and you. He said that this question of the NAC agreeing on effective countermeasures is "the thing which exercises Chancellor Adenauer more than anything else." Adenauer considers that if access to Berlin were blocked it would be impossible for the West to do nothing. Economic countermeasures were the least dangerous action for the West to take. The next in order of danger were maritime countermeasures. The use of Western land forces in Germany as a countermeasure was in Adenauer's opinion "extremely dangerous" because of the probability of escalation into a general nuclear war. Adenauer therefore considered it of great importance that the Canadian Government should fall in with the views of the other members of NATO on the question of economic countermeasures.

2. Carstens asked me if I would emphasize in my report to you the very great importance which Adenauer attached to this. I said that I would do this. I could also tell him that the views which the German Ambassador had conveyed to the Prime Minister and you from the Chancellor were being carefully considered by the Canadian Government. I had, however, at the moment nothing to add to the statements which the Prime Minister and you had made to the German Ambassador supplementing Léger's statements in the NAC.

3. Because of the importance which Adenauer attaches to this issue it is not repeat not impossible that he will instruct Strauss to raise it when Mr. O'Hurley and I call on Strauss on February 5. I do hope that by then you will have been able to send me a new statement of the Canadian position.

4. It would be particularly helpful to me if I could have an elaboration of the reference to difficulties in relation to provincial rights. Would it not repeat not be possible to overcome any legal or constitutional difficulties by the passing of a Federal statute along the lines of that passed in 1947 authorizing the Governor in Council to impose a partial or complete economic embargo when so requested by UN Security Council (II George VI Chapter 46)?

BERLIN: ECONOMIC COUNTER-MEASURES

The recent messages which have been received from both your missions have been given careful attention in Ottawa. We are still at a loss to understand the real reasons why this issue is being pressed so hard at this moment; moreover discussion in and out of the NATO Council has raised important and far reaching questions for which we have not found adequate answers. Briefly these are:

(a) Is the NATO resolution intended to involve some degree of automatic commitment? If it is, what are governments left free to decide at the time of denial of access? If it is not, we fail to see why a resolution in these terms is necessary.

(b) Would it be the intention to make public a decision by NATO? If it were not to be made public would it have the deterrent effect used by some to justify it? If it were made public would it not lead to immediate economic and financial repercussions and the danger of disunity in the Alliance? Would not public opinion believe that the world was on the verge of war?

(c) Is it thought that an advance decision of this kind would make countries of the Alliance more determined or less determined to persist in negotiation? Is there not also a real danger that if such a decision was announced the Soviet Union would either regard or represent this as an indication that the West was not serious about negotiation?

(d) Can economic counter-measures really be regarded as a substitute for military action or would they not be more likely quickly to create the political and emotional conditions in which military action would appear logical and even inevitable?

2. These questions indicate some of our unresolved doubts of the wisdom of a formal decision now on the appropriateness of a total embargo as a response to blockage of access. (Some of the other unresolved questions which are naturally very much in our minds, although perhaps not so suitable for discussion with our NATO allies, relate to such matters as the important Canadian trade interests involved, the position of the neutrals and so on.) We realize that some of these questions have been asked before but the answers have not, repeat not, been satisfactory. We would welcome your comments and you should feel free to indicate in discussion that these are the kinds of questions which we are examining in our further consideration of this matter.

3. For NATO Paris: We would not have any objection to your raising these concerns informally with Stikker. You should stress that our position should not be represented as in any sense a veto of discussions in NATO or national action by other members. We wonder whether it would not, repeat not, meet the situation if the Council without attempting to make a formal decision simply agreed that all members should do what they deem necessary and appropriate to prepare themselves for the possibility of economic counter-measures in the event that access to West Berlin is blocked.

BERLIN: ECONOMIC COUNTERMEASURES

In view of recent developments and the bearing of this matter on relations with our NATO allies, I thought you would wish to study carefully where we now stand on the NATO discussions on economic countermeasures.

Cabinet Decisions

2. On October 23, 1961, the Cabinet decided that:

“The Government should make no commitment to participate in economic countermeasures in respect of the Berlin situation until access to Berlin was denied. This would include any advance commitment in respect of the denial of air traffic rights to aircraft from Soviet bloc countries.”

3. On December 7, 1961, the Cabinet again considered this question and decided that:

“... the Canadian position on this subject should not be changed, except in regard to the air traffic measures to be taken in response to partial interdiction of NATO aircraft (civil or military) to or from West Berlin; and agreed in regard to these air traffic measures that the Canadian reservation on the decision of the NATO Council dated October 31, should now be withdrawn ....”

The New Formula for a Total Economic Embargo

4. Since these Cabinet decisions the following new formula for a total economic embargo has been proposed to the NATO Council:

“The Council has decided that in the event military and civilian access, air or ground, to West Berlin is blocked, the immediate imposition of significant countermeasures amounting to a total economic embargo against the Soviet bloc would be an appropriate response. The NATO countries are planning their concerted participation in such an effort. In the event that blockage appears to be substantially complete, the Council will meet and as appropriate, acting under guidance of governments, will consider whether such an embargo should be put into effect.”

Those supporting this resolution assert that it does not contain the “automatic” feature to which we and some other members of NATO had objected; instead, it leaves the decision concerning a total economic embargo until access to Berlin is actually blocked. The formula as it is now worded does not on the face of it impose any obligation to enact legislation or regulations until access to West Berlin is actually denied. It would, however, require preparations to enable prompt legislative and administrative action to be taken if this became necessary. In Canada it is unlikely that preparatory steps could be taken without the public discussion which would arise from consultation with the Provinces and from Parliament's legitimate concern.

Signed by SSEA 1/2 R[oss] C[ampbell]
To H.B. Robinson 2.2.62. R. H.[?]

NATO Council Considerations

5. On January 18 the NATO Council discussed the new formula and the related schemes for mitigating the effects of such a step on the economies of some NATO countries. The Canadian Permanent Representative withdrew the Canadian reservation on the Council decision concerning air traffic countermeasures and he made a statement explaining the Canadian position. While other Representatives expressed doubts about various aspects of economic countermeasures, the Canadian Representative was the only one who did not accept the new formula for a total economic embargo and the principles involved in the aid and co-operation schemes for mitigating the effects on NATO countries.

6. However, Turkey, Greece and Iceland stated that their acceptance of the draft decision concerning a total economic embargo was contingent upon acceptance by all of the other member countries of the two parallel schemes for mitigating the effects of such an embargo on the economies of member countries. These two schemes involve the approval of certain principles of co-operation, of a consultative committee which would be established as soon as it was decided to impose economic countermeasures and of a compensation fund from which interest-free loans might be granted to NATO countries that suffer severe economic damage through loss of export markets as a result of the imposition of economic countermeasures against the Soviet bloc. It has been estimated that this fund might require approximately $70 million of which about $40 million might be recoverable through the location of alternative export markets.

7. During the Council discussion the Secretary-General, Mr. Stikker, said that he could see no contradiction between the new formula for a total embargo and the Canadian position as explained by our Permanent Representative. He suggested that the NATO Council might accept this explanation of the Canadian position if the Canadian authorities would give assurances that draft legislation and other action which might be required in an emergency would be prepared in the appropriate federal departments. No discussion of the latter suggestion took place.

Canadian Position

8. While NATO is now unanimous on civil aviation countermeasures, Canada on the face of it is the only country that is not prepared to approve the formula for a total embargo and the principles of the aid and co-operation schemes. Apparently our position on the aid and co-operation schemes also is claimed as an obstacle to the acceptance of the total embargo proposal by Greece, Turkey and Iceland.

9. We are being pressed very hard on this matter. You will recall that the German Ambassador called on you on instructions from the Chancellor. In addition, we have been approached by both the British and the Americans along similar lines.

10. There has been a great deal of contradiction and illogical presentation on this whole exercise in NATO. From the beginning I think it is fair to say in Ottawa there has been genuine scepticism about the effectiveness of economic countermeasures in the context in which they were being presented in NATO. Chancellor Adenauer has been reported as attaching importance to an agreement on economic countermeasures in NATO since this would represent an alternative to military response in the event of interference with access to West Berlin. On the other hand, in the NATO discussions economic countermeasures have been represented as part of the series of related responses involving both political and military action in the event of blockage to West Berlin.

11. It has also been asserted that the “automatic” feature is now removed in the new proposal. If so, it is difficult to see why there is any need for the resolution and why the Council should not be satisfied with an undertaking that each country would individually be prepared to move as quickly as possible if at a later stage Governments should decide that economic countermeasures should be applied against the Soviet bloc.

12. Our Representative in NATO and our Ambassador in Bonn were recently asked to attempt to clarify some of these uncertainties. I attach a copy of the telegram<sup>48</sup> sent to these missions which I think sets out several points which underline the possibility for misunderstanding and confusion in the handling of this issue by NATO.

13. As you will see from that telegram, I am genuinely disturbed that lying behind the insistence on a formal agreement within NATO is the desire of the United States to announce that agreement has been reached on the use of economic countermeasures if access is blocked to West Berlin. This would be consistent with the wishes of the United States to present a united front in the alliance on a tough line in the negotiations over Berlin. It would also be consistent with the increasing tendency in United States trade policies to isolate the Soviet bloc economically from the West.

14. The pursuance of such a policy short of being on the verge of war would place substantial burdens on many countries in the Alliance. Any discussion of mitigation in NATO has been directed largely to Greece, Turkey and Iceland. For our own part, our stake is considerable (although probably not as great as some other members of NATO who have stronger trade links with the bloc). Our exports to the Soviet bloc are in the order of $60 million per year. In addition we have outstanding credits with these governments of nearly $80 million. If we include China of course something like $150 million per year (largely wheat) would be involved in addition.

15. There is moreover, the serious difficulty that would arise in Parliament and with the Provinces if the Government were to make any move that suggested that the Government might be seeking to acquire arbitrary powers such as the War Measures Act confers.

16. Finally, I seriously doubt that public opinion in this country or indeed in most countries of the Alliance would be ready to accept, without considerable dismay and confusion, that the Alliance was contemplating economic countermeasures at this stage. I would also be concerned that a leak or public discussion of this matter might minimize chances for an effective negotiation with the Soviet Union.

17. In these circumstances, I see merit in standing our ground on this issue. At the same time given the pressure which has been brought on us we must assess how this could affect our relations with our NATO allies. If we hold to our present position (which I believe is desirable), we must anticipate that further efforts will be made to induce us to change our minds.

18. I expect that Mr. Heeney in the course of the next few days may be sending us further views from Washington. Subject to a review of such additional comments, I believe that we should instruct our Representative to NATO to make a further statement to the Council along the following lines:

(a) While Canada is not prepared to accept the present resolution we do not consider that our position represents a veto over any further discussion of this matter in Council.

(b) If eventual access to West Berlin should be blocked and NATO Governments should decide to apply economic countermeasures, Canada would be prepared to act as quickly as any other country.

(c) The Canadian Government questions the need for a formal decision along the lines proposed and would urge that what should now be agreed is that member countries should take whatever action they individually deem appropriate and necessary to prepare themselves for the possibility that economic countermeasures might be applied should access to West Berlin be blocked.

(d) The Canadian Government would urge strongly that no publicity should be given at this time to the discussions in NATO on economic countermeasures and to whatever agreement may be reached. Any decision concerning publicity should be a matter for consideration by all the governments.

19. I would welcome your comments on the points outlined in this memorandum, in particular on the proposed course of action suggested in paragraph 18.<sup>49</sup>

BERLIN: ECONOMIC COUNTERMEASURES

On February 6 the Prime Minister made certain comments on the subject matter of the Minister's memorandum of January 31. On February 7, I submitted to the Prime Minister a draft record of his comments with a view to ensuring that he was accurately reported. The Prime Minister approved the draft record (paragraph two below) but said that the position he set out therein represented his "views" and should not at this stage be taken as final instructions. He would like his views considered in the Department and said that he intended to speak again to Mr. Green on this matter in the near future.

2. The Prime Minister said that, having examined the memorandum, he was not convinced that Canada should continue to withhold its acceptance of the present resolution before the NATO Council. He thought that our acceptance of that resolution should, however, be made contingent on the following understandings:

(a) that there would be no actual implementation of a total economic embargo without prior consultation with and the explicit consent of the Canadian Government;

(b) that the Canadian Government would not be expected to proceed with either the passage or the preparation of legislation because the proclamation of the War Measures Act would permit immediate action to cooperate in an embargo even though Parliament might not be in session at the time;

(c) that no publicity would be given to this matter.

See memo of Feb 7 for P.M.'s views. H.B. R[obinson] Feb. 7

3. I should add that in considering this matter on February 7, the Prime Minister examined telegram 318 of February 6† from NATO Paris dealing with the special position of the United States in NATO with regard to arms for Indonesia. The Prime Minister was also aware, in balancing the pros and cons of maintaining our present position on Economic Countermeasures, that other issues might arise (e.g. trade with Cuba) on which we might again find ourselves somewhat isolated in the NATO Council. He said that the judgment on whether or not we should stick to a minority position would be made in the light of the circumstances of each case, and I understood him to imply that he would feel more comfortable in being isolated on, for instance, the issue of trade with Cuba than he would in respect of the resolution on Economic Countermeasures on Berlin. At the end of his remarks, however, he again said that he intended to review the whole matter with the Minister.

(b) that the Canadian Government would not be expected to proceed meanwhile with the passage of any legislation; and

(c) that no publicity should be given to the NATO decision.

On the latter point you may, if you consider it appropriate, reiterate our misgivings, explaining that public knowledge of a NATO decision on a total embargo would risk a damaging display of disunity in NATO countries where the wisdom of taking such measures at this time might be questioned; would be prejudicial to negotiations toward a settlement of the Berlin question; and might provoke the Soviet Union to take preventive economic or other measures against NATO countries.

BERLIN – AND KHRUSHCHEV'S OTHER DILEMMAS

Relative diplomatic lull on Soviet side during the past two months has now been broken by an appeal to summitry. Most diplomat observers here found the lull perplexing. Some found it worrying, rather as parents of rambunctious children become anxious when they realize that the accustomed noise from the next room has ceased, and do not repeat not know what children may be up to.

2. Observers here have found it difficult to speculate with any confidence about what Russians may be planning next. There have been many theories. My own view is that main reason none of us have felt very sure what Soviet Government may do next is that Khrushchev himself is probably uncertain. In my judgment Khrushchev faces several serious dilemmas.

3. One dilemma relates to Berlin. Others are in fields of Soviet-Chinese relations, and of domestic economic and political policies.

4. On Berlin, Khrushchev may have been surprised as well as disappointed that his ominous threats last summer and autumn, far from causing weakening in Western determination or any fundamental break in Western cohesion, have strengthened both. He may be tempted in due course to try one more build-up of tension to the crisis point, but I hope he realizes that it might be dangerous to push USA much nearer to the brink. Thus far Soviet efforts to weaken Western Alliance by cajolery and blandishments to individual members seem to have proved as unsuccessful as earlier threats. At various times, including on a few occasions during the last ten days, there have been informal Soviet suggestions that Britain should get more directly into the act and that if Macmillan will not repeat not personally intervene, as seems to have been hoped last autumn, his ambassador in Moscow should "take more active role." The more important Soviet effort to lure FGR into separate negotiations, though it apparently had some effect on sections of West German opinion, also seems unlikely to succeed on any terms which USSR has thus far offered. Mere Soviet hints that eventually an improvement in West German-Soviet relations might lead to bigger things, are not repeat not likely in themselves to be enough.

5. On Berlin therefore Khrushchev may eventually have to decide among several alternatives:

(a) potentially dangerous course of signing a separate peace treaty and threatening or at least harassing West Berlin's communications; or

(b) signing a separate peace treaty with DDR but carefully avoiding any such interference with Allied communications and position in Berlin; or

(c) offering West some genuine counter concessions, rather than mere withdrawal of threat to present position of West Berlin, in return for the concessions which West might then be able to give him; or

(d) offering some genuine and substantial concessions to FGR in serious attempt to get more or less bilateral FGR-Soviet understanding.

6. Course (d) would presumably necessitate concessions that would jeopardize or weaken position of DDR régime. This could also have repercussions on other East European satellites. It may be unlikely that in any case Khrushchev could succeed in buying any significant change in FGR policy at price he could afford, although Kroll's personal attitude may lead Khrushchev to think such deal might conceivably in due course prove possible. In any case such offer would lay Khrushchev open to serious criticism from Chinese and their supporters within world Communist movement, as well as possibly affecting Soviet defensive position in Eastern Europe. Progress might be easier on course (c), but this too has its dilemmas for Soviet side. Course (b) would seem possible but rather futile and galling, while not repeat not without some dangers. Course (a) is very risky.

7. Khrushchev may hope that internal developments in France or Italy will gravely disarrange and weaken West. But I think main reason for lull has been uncertainty on Soviet side rather than merely waiting in hope something will turn up. Giving West the time it asked for may be lesser though genuine factor.

8. Meanwhile, as you know, there has thus far been no repeat no sign at all of any weakening or give in Soviet position on Berlin, as shown in Gromyko's talks with Thompson or in Soviet press. Nor has any progress been made toward agreement. Despite recent Soviet try-on in Berlin's air corridors, there has however been little evidence recently of Soviet urgency. I would guess that Soviet Government are unlikely to bring Berlin issue to head prior to meeting of foreign ministers or heads of government in Geneva around March 14. Such prospective meeting at least gives Khrushchev (and West) a little further time. Disarmament might conceivably provide framework for some kind of agreement on force levels and spread of nuclear weapons to West Germany (and other) hands, and thus make it possible for Khrushchev to claim some achievement for his policy on Germany which otherwise may begin to look rather sterile and bankrupt unless either grave risks or costly concessions are accepted on Soviet side. Disarmament meeting might at least conceivably help to divert Communist attention from Berlin issue and to save face.

9. Although it is hard not repeat not to be pessimistic about prospects for genuine progress on disarmament agreements at this time, nevertheless arrangements for disarmament meeting are I think relevant to consideration of tactics and probable procedural developments on German question. For example while it would I think be unwise and unnecessary for West unilaterally to offer Moscow within Berlin framework concessions discriminating against FGR or for UK to try separate compromise initiatives at this time, nevertheless Moscow can be offered prospect within disarmament framework of guarantees about upper limits of German armament, but on multilateral basis involving comparable concessions from other countries. One of Khrushchev's self-created dilemmas is that he has thought Berlin situation gave him opportunity to get something for nothing. He is now finding that to get substantial concessions he will have to pay, or take grave risks. Disarmament framework gives West a chance to make it clear that we are not repeat not merely standing pat, and rejecting any action to allay Russian concern about German rearmament, but that there is genuine prospect of suitable guarantees affecting FGR armaments, within non-discriminatory framework involving corresponding self-denials and guarantees elsewhere. The fact that for some purposes (e.g. nuclear guarantees) reasonable counter concession might have to include China, which Khrushchev might find it hard or impossible to deliver, is of course another of Khrushchev's dilemmas.

10. There have been, as you know, many small indications, from here and (according to reports from friendly missions) from within China that Soviet-Chinese rift has been getting deeper, and more open. Interparty relationships may take further turn for worse following early March Central Committee Plenum in Moscow, and rumoured Plenum at about same time of Chinese Party. Most of us here think it likely that Moscow as well as Peking will make real effort of self-restraint in order to prevent open rupture on either party or state planes; but a few observers, including my American colleague, definitely do not repeat not rule out possibility of open break of party relations and even conceivably of state relations. Such an eventuality if it did occur would of course raise questions inter alia about how West should respond to any overtures from China that might develop. I shall comment on this hypothetical questioning in a subsequent message.

11. Certainly on basic substantive policy there is little likelihood that Moscow will for China's sake abandon its plans to give economic priority to development of Soviet economy rather than to increased aid to China. Today's Soviet press comments on anniversary of Soviet-Chinese treaty refer (but only in past tense) to Soviet economic aid to China, but reiterate that USSR's main contribution in international field to development of world Communism lies in pushing forward to Communism in this country. Nor is Moscow likely to divert aid from neutrals to China.

12. Khrushchev's dilemmas in his relations with China are bound up with those dilemmas he faces regarding Soviet economic policy domestically, and with those on Berlin and German question.

13. Khrushchev's main dilemmas in domestic field are, I think, how to deal with slowly but steadily developing ferment, stimulated by destalinization, centered around demands for (and misgivings about) more freedom etc; and what to do about economic problems particularly in agriculture, but also in consumer goods and light industry. Radical and effective solution of agricultural problem may yet have to involve drastic retreat from collectivization. At present this seems not repeat not on the cards politically. But at minimum significant improvement in agriculture would require early and substantial capital investment, e.g. for chemical industry and fertilizers, and for irrigation and more efficient mechanization and plant. This economic dilemma is of course related to demands for defence budget, and thus also to dilemma on Germany, disarmament, and general state of relations with West.

14. Khrushchev's main dilemmas have of course long been inherent in Soviet situation – dilemma of squaring Moscow's claim to leadership of Communist bloc and world Communist movement with interests of Soviet Russian state; dilemma of adjusting Communist régime domestically, and Soviet relations with other Communist parties and rest of world, with growing physical and spiritual or psychological appetites of Soviet peoples; and dilemma of squaring adherence to superficial Marxist ideological straitjacket with fact of Western economic and political development, including increasing cohesion of Western civilization, and in particular increasing prosperity and cohesion of Western Europe. Though these dilemmas are of long standing, they are I think all becoming more acute, while all our stakes in Soviet Government's responses to them become greater.

15. How Khrushchev and his colleagues decide to resolve these various dilemmas, and the decisions they take on the basic questions posed, will of course be of fundamental significance for West. Soviet leaders are still a long way from abandoning either age-old Russian messianic dream of somehow "saving humanity," or belief inherent in Marxist prognostics of inevitable movement of rest of world toward Communism. This Marxist prognostication coupled with tradition of Moscow primacy in world Communist movement has of course been closely bound up with historical Russian drives toward imperialist expansion, and ideologically the two tendencies of Marxism and traditional Russian thought reinforce each other. Soviet régime is still I think a long way from becoming politically mature and civilized, from abandoning monolithic goal and accepting inevitability and indeed desirability of tolerating many internal tendencies and points of view, and correspondingly from accepting desirability of long-term as opposed to merely tactical cooperation and coexistence with other national societies. But there are forces inside Soviet society moving in this direction. What Communist speakers call “life itself” is helping to create dilemmas which may encourage or even force gradual abandonment of these anti-social and dangerous tendencies, and an eventual normalization or relations with their own people and with other nations.

16. Meanwhile the dilemmas exist, and I suspect that Khrushchev in his own way is wondering how to grapple with them.

DESPATCH NO. N-1009

[Paris], July 30, 1962

This question has not been the subject of much interest in the past few months. Two factors serve to keep it alive. The more important factor is the continuing risk of a crisis over Berlin. If there were increased pressure on Berlin in the next month or two, this would probably have the effect of reviving interest in countermeasures. As you know, these countermeasures could constitute an important element in a non-military response in the event of hostile Soviet action over Berlin.

2. In the meantime, a certain amount of interest in the subject continues to be shown by the Secretary-General and a few delegations. The Secretary-General, while glad of the progress which was made last autumn and winter – which led to agreement on civil aviation countermeasures and on the action to be taken in the event of a total blockade of Berlin – has been conscious of the fact that, despite a wide measure of agreement on several other important aspects of countermeasures, the Council has never actually given expression to this measure of agreement in decisions. Thus, for example, the Council has never decided unanimously on the principle of applying partial economic countermeasures for certain particular situations and as a response to hostile moves by the Soviet bloc. Nor have there ever been final decisions on the proposed parallel schemes for assistance and co-operation to mitigate the economic impact of any embargo, despite the fact that a number of delegations have always maintained that further decisions on these schemes were the indispensable accompaniment to their agreement to the decision on the total blockade. The only decision which the Council has taken on this subject may be found on page 11 of C-R(62)4. You will note that it refers only to the principles of the schemes. The details have never been worked out, because even the original decision in principle has never been accepted by more than “a large majority” of the members of the Alliance. The conditional acceptance by the Danish, Greek, and Icelandic delegations of the related decisions on the total blockade and the means for mitigating its impact should in particular be noted. It is worth noting also that even the delegations which accepted the principles without making detailed statements of their position did so on the understanding that the details were to be worked out in committee. So long as Canada maintains its position, however, this detailed work cannot go forward.

3. The extent to which the work undertaken on this subject has been left incomplete is reflected in the Secretary-General's note PO/62/260. Although this note has never been placed on the agenda – mainly because we have told the Secretariat privately on several occasions that we could not take a positive position on it – several delegations have indicated that they would like to see it amended in certain respects. The amendments so far submitted have been circulated in PO/62/436. Sooner or later these two papers will inevitably appear on the Council's agenda; if the crisis over Berlin is renewed, this could happen quite quickly. In these circumstances, and bearing in mind particularly the Secretary-General's forthcoming visit to Ottawa, I would recommend that our position be reviewed.<sup>50</sup>

4. We are of course aware of the position which you would have authorized us to take had a further discussion of countermeasures taken place either in the Council or at Athens. The position has not altered in any important respect since you prepared the very complete summary and recommendations which you sent to the Minister in Geneva on March 16, in your telegram E-616,† on which the Minister commented in his telegram 436 of March 17.† The position then decided is confirmed in the notes, dated April 27,† which were prepared for the Minister at the time of the Athens meeting but which were not used.

5. So far as the proposed aid and co-operation schemes are concerned, their purpose and broad implications are well set out in paragraphs 3 and 4 of your telegram E-616 of March 16, which makes plain in particular that no immediate financial commitment would be involved, but only a relatively small hypothetical commitment to an amount which would be partially recoverable. So far as the proposed decision on partial countermeasures is concerned (paragraph 6 of PO/62/260), the Secretariat, in commenting earlier to us on the points raised in paragraph 2 of your telegram E-660 of March 23,† confirmed that the “particular situations” referred to in the draft decision are, as you assumed, those listed in the annexes to C-M(61)100. They explained that the British suggestions concerning selective countermeasures on the basis of degrees of severity and of commodities exported to East Germany are included in the proposed agreement in principle – as indeed are all possible forms for the practical application of partial countermeasures. The point of the decision, as they see it, would be to record a formal agreement to the principle, while leaving entirely open the whole question of application to be decided under the guidance of governments in the light of the circumstances of the time. As to the question of what secret administrative and legislative preparation would be involved, we were told what the decision intends is that whatever secret preparation required to implement any or all of the measures listed in Annex II to C-M(61)100 in an emergency would be undertaken in advance.

6. From the amendments to PO/62/260, it is possible to conclude that the Secretary-General's proposals will not emerge entirely unchanged from any future discussion. On the other hand, no amendment yet suggested implies a fundamental opposition to the series of decisions proposed. While I could conceive of the Council's being persuaded to drop or modify certain of the draft decisions put forward – for example, 4(ii) – I think it most unlikely that the substance of what is proposed in 4(i), 5(i)(a) and (b) and 6 will in the end be dropped. If we are required to take a position on the basis of our present instructions, I would judge that Canada would continue to find itself entirely isolated on the aid and co-operation schemes, and on admitting the principle of applying partial countermeasures.<sup>51</sup> We might face in addition an unfavourable reaction from those countries which accepted the earlier decision on the total blockade more or less on the understanding that what in their view are complementary decisions on aid and co-operation would be taken; I think it preferable to try to arrive at some private accommodation on these outstanding items rather than be forced into a position of isolation in the Council should a crisis arise, and I would suggest that an opportunity to arrive at such an accommodation may arise during the Secretary-General's visit. In the meantime, we will continue to try to keep the subject off the Council's agenda.

SECRET AND PERSONAL

Paris, September 24, 1962

Dear Ross [Campbell]:

Thank you for your letters of August 14† and September 6† about economic countermeasures. When I was in London last week, I warned the Minister that this aspect of Berlin contingency planning was likely to come up now that the Council had begun to discuss Berlin and countermeasures again. (You will have noticed from our telegram 2188 of September 20† that the tripartite "preferred sequence" paper has in fact raised the question by making provision for decisions to implement countermeasures in Phase II of a crisis).

I had hoped we could make some progress quietly on this outside the Council, rather than be isolated in a debate, which I fear is the alternative. However, I know how often the Department has raised the question, and I understand why you would be reluctant to make an issue of it again.

In any event, I thought I should give you an indication of several of the arguments we may have to deal with. These affect some of the points raised in your letters.

A. Difficulties of Public Explanation in Canada: Preparations would be secret. Therefore no problem would arise until the time had come for the government to order a measure into effect. By then the crisis would have become so severe that people would presumably be more worried about the prospect of war than the loss of trade. It is true that the fact preparations were being made could leak in advance. What is most likely to cause a leak is a prolonged wrangle in the Council. Circumstances of that sort often tempt one side to take its case to the public as a form of pressure on the other.

B. Geographical Extent of Countermeasures: We told NATO last year that we would not want to apply countermeasures to China. (Ask D.L.(1) to show you AC/202-WP/12/10 of November 22, 1961). So did some others – for example the British because of Hong Kong and the Portuguese because of Macao. No decision has been taken on which countries to apply countermeasures to. The big fight is between the British, who would want to apply them to East Germany first, and the Americans, who think they would have to be applied to the Soviet Union and the Eastern European satellites from the beginning. Anyway, this decision, like all the others, would be up to governments at the time, and the odds are that China would be excluded.

C. Mitigation: The problem here will be how to avoid appearing unreasonable. Assuming China is left out, Canada would have less of its foreign trade at stake than any other NATO country except the United States. Countries like Greece and Iceland, which are much poorer than Canada anyway, stand to suffer twenty to thirty times as heavily as we would so far as trade is concerned. (In 1960, for example, over a fifth of Greek exports went to the Soviet bloc.) When everybody else is prepared to agree now in principle to consider doing something to help these countries if they can really show at the time that they have lost their markets, are we not doing ourselves more harm than it is worth not to agree? We are not being asked to pay anything now. We might be asked to pay $3 or $4 million if the scheme ever had to be implemented. We might get $1.5 to $2.5 million of this back later. The execution of the scheme would in any event be subject to a further decision of governments.

If we are not prepared to go this far now, countries which accepted earlier decisions about countermeasures on condition that compensation schemes would be agreed to could fairly argue that they had been dealt a card off the bottom of the deck.

D. Partial Countermeasures: We agreed last year that if there were a total blockade of West Berlin, governments would decide at the time whether or not to respond with a total embargo. What we are being asked under this heading is to agree that if there were a partial blockade, governments would decide at the time whether or not to respond with a partial embargo. If we swallowed the camel, why are we straining at the gnat? Neither "commitment" seems to involve much of a commitment so far as I can see; both leave the important decision to governments at the time.

If people ask, "Then why bother taking the decisions at all?", the answer seems to be (a) so that we can get on with advance planning and (b) to enable the Alliance to have plans ready so as to avoid confusion and dissension if and when the crisis arises.

I do hope that we shall have a chance to clarify our position when I am back in Ottawa on October 4-11.

Yours sincerely,

G. IGNATIEFF

FOUR POWER PAPER ON RELATIONSHIP BETWEEN MILITARY AND NON-MILITARY ASPECTS OF BERLIN CONTINGENCY PLANNING

The Four Power paper is a welcome step forward and we are particularly pleased that the prerogative of governments to take decisions at each stage on the catalogue of plans is so clearly spelled out.

2. We would, however, wish to have a good deal more information about the diplomatic measures which the tripartite powers would undertake in parallel with "Live Oak" planning. Some of the questions that need answering are – at what stage will the UN be consulted bearing in mind that the General Assembly may well be sitting at the time of the Berlin crisis, what will the West do if the Soviet Union brings Berlin to the UN first, what are the specific plans for keeping open channels of communication to the Soviet Government at all stages of a Berlin crisis and what would NATO's reaction be to the signing of a separate peace treaty and possible follow-on consequences? We would support those in Council who wish to be kept informed on all aspects of tripartite planning on a prompt and regular basis and we would also agree that these questions should be discussed in Council now without waiting for the Four Powers to agree to answers amongst themselves.

3. We are still concerned about the dangers of Soviet miscalculation because Western responses may not be readily identifiable as related directly to access to Berlin. We would not agree with Nitze that this is not a problem in phases one and two of the Four Power plan, indeed some of the responses envisaged in these stages, particularly those relating to alert measures and economic and maritime countermeasures are capable of misinterpretation unless the intention is spelled out directly to the Soviet Union. (This is another instance where our concern about parallel diplomatic measures is directly relevant.)

4. Phase one of the Four Power plan states "control of military operations will remain tripartite, but NATO military and political authorities will be kept informed and consulted if time permits ...." We should like you to reiterate our concern that NATO planning be meshed with tripartite planning at an early stage of a developing Berlin crisis. Phase one of the plan appears too broad and it permits responses such as exercise "Jack Pine" which will commit the NATO Alliance to armed action far too early in a crisis and without adequate consideration by Council. We believe that NATO control of military operations should be established as soon as the intention of the Soviet Government to use force to hinder access to Berlin has been established.

5. The Secretary-General has asked for Council approval of the NATO major commanders' military plans but, before this stage can be reached, we believe fuller answers are needed to some of the questions raised in your statement to Council on September 29. In particular, we would wish to have a more satisfactory answer to our question regarding SACEUR's plans for the “selective use of nuclear weapons.” We believe that the whole concept of “selective use of nuclear weapons” should be more fully discussed in Council.

BERLIN CONTINGENCY PLANNING

Paragraph 8 of your reference telegram suggests that we should concentrate on seeing if there are any features of Bercon/Marcon plans or the tripartite plans on Berlin contingency planning which are totally unacceptable to the Canadian Government in any contingency that might arise over Berlin.

2. It appears more than likely that the “selective use of nuclear weapons” in connection with Berlin contingency planning would be unacceptable to the government under any conditions. However, you have already asked the NATO military authorities for more information about their plans for the selective use of nuclear weapons and we notice from SACEUR's comments on the Bercon/Marcon plans (SHAPE/70-62-10/62) that he believes a nuclear demonstration would have no military advantage. SACEUR also states that “whether or not either of the Bercon/Marcon (nuclear demonstration) plans will achieve the political objective is questionable. They may provide an excuse for the Soviets to retaliate with much greater nuclear responses which could achieve a significant military advantage for the Soviets.”

3. We would hope that the answers to our questions and SACEUR's own views would be sufficient to have plans for the selective use of nuclear weapons deleted from the Berlin contingency plans without having to seek from Cabinet a formal Canadian position.

BERLIN CONTINGENCY PLANNING

Council's discussion in restricted session October 10 took account of PO/62/641. It was unfortunate this useful summary of the complicated accumulation of paper on this subject had not repeat not been circulated earlier. As it is, discussion remains confused. No repeat no decisions have been taken. A further meeting will be held October 12.

2. The Standing Group had no repeat no reply to our question about nuclear weapons. Therefore I gave the statement I sent you in my telegram 2307 October 5,† incorporating both the amendments you suggested in paragraph 1 [of] your reference telegram. This precipitated considerable discussion. We received support from Norwegians and Belgians, but a number of others are opposed. Their chief objection is that to request the exclusion of the nuclear contingency plan at this stage would re-open a question which was debated painfully and at length a year ago in Council. Others understand our objections very well; the difficulty is they do not repeat not share our view. They point out that use of nuclear weapons, like all contingency plans, would be subject to a political decision by governments at the time and if Council agreed to pull out one plan of this catalogue, individual objections could be raised to all the others. From private conversations with a number of my colleagues, I believe this view to be strongly held by some delegations, notably French. It is too early to say what will emerge from the discussion, but we may have a tough fight.

3. The other important point dealt with October 10 was the one raised in paragraph 4 of your reference telegram. Here again, there is a deep division of opinion. At one extreme is Boyesen, Norwegian Permanent Representative, whose personal view is that whole idea of approval is misconceived. He looks on contingency planning as a continuous process, in which ideas will be subject to constant review. He fears that approval of plans in some formal sense will tend to freeze planning. This he thinks would be dangerous because the whole series of plans is built up on a series of assumptions about Soviet reactions which could well be falsified by events. At the same time, he emphasizes that Norwegian authorities are firmly convinced of the need for contingency planning, so long as it does not repeat not lead to closed minds and over-formal results.

4. No repeat no other permanent representative goes this far. Even Dane, who generally supports Norwegian, announced that his authorities approved plans "in principle." Italian used a similar formula. This was despite clear indications that both Italian and Danish authorities have serious reservations about the plans and therefore understand approval in principle in a broad and loose sense. Danes object to approval by governments of plans which include acts contrary to international law. (As legal advisor suggests in PO/62/637 some of the Marcon plans would be.) Italians have serious difficulties about alerts, and like us are still worried over the question of transfer of control from tripartite to NATO command.

5. Discussion of this point will have to be pursued too. Some delegations have not repeat not received instructions yet. At the moment, however, it seems that at least seven delegations – the Four plus Belgium, Italy and Denmark – would probably be prepared to subscribe to some formula approving the plans in principle for planning purposes as a catalogue, the execution of any one plan, or any combination, to be subject to a specific political decision by governments at the time. Boyesen's view is personal; he is not repeat not certain his government would share it. My own view is that, while a number of his comments are well taken, it is really going too far to expect that the Council, having directed a year ago that plans be prepared, would not repeat not react in some formula or another to the plans now they have been presented.

6. This deals with paragraphs 1, 2 and 4 of your instructions; paragraph 3 raises different problems. You mention alerts. I will be reporting on this aspect separately. Your second point was about our question on the transfer of control. On this, I understand from private talks that tripartite planners are reluctant to budge from answer they gave us earlier. However, no repeat no answer to our second pressing of this point has been returned. Chairman recognized at October 10 meeting that a number of delegations could not repeat not be expected to move forward until Standing Group had replied to questions delegations had asked. He pressed Standing Group representative strongly to get the answers quickly. At the moment, the ball is in the planners' court on this point.

7. Finally, your paragraph 3 mentions economic countermeasures. In a formal sense, this question is separate from approval of Bercon/Marcon plans. The Three have now made clear that economic countermeasures would belong largely to phase II of a crisis. All the Bercon/Marcon plans belong to phase III. Thus it would be theoretically possible to approve them without necessarily accepting further decisions on economic countermeasures. However the two forms of response are linked in possible progression of measures. If we take the initiative to raise this question, the result will be immediate pressure on Canada, since Canada has the most reserved position on the whole question of economic countermeasures. Even if we do not repeat not raise the question ourselves, it cannot repeat not be avoided much longer; you will notice paragraph 17 of PO/62/641 says the subject will be placed on the agenda at an early date.

BERLIN CONTINGENCY PLANNING

We hope that at the next meeting answers will be given to our questions concerning the selective use of nuclear weapons. We also hope that there will be a more satisfactory indication from the tripartite planners that they will be willing to give the Council more information on their parallel political and economic contingency plans. Once these answers are forthcoming we believe it would be an appropriate time to ask for ministerial agreement to some formula which would permit the NATO major military commanders to proceed with the detailed preparation of the Bercon/Marcon plans. There appear to us to be two approaches which Cabinet might consider:

(i) A formula along the lines of paragraph 5 of your telegram 2360 to approve the Bercon/Marcon plans in principle for planning purposes as a catalogue the execution of any one plan or any combination of [plans] which would be subject to a specific political decision by governments at the time.

(ii) Council could be asked to take note of the Bercon/Marcon plans; it could instruct the major military commanders to complete preparations so that the specified operations called for in the plans could, subject to approval by governments, be carried out; it could accept the assessment by the Standing Group of the Bercon/Marcon plans. We would appreciate having your views on which of these alternatives is likely to be agreeable to the other NATO governments.

2. Following are comments on the specific issues likely to be discussed at the next meeting of the Council on Berlin contingency planning:

Selective Use of Nuclear Weapons

If the other members of Council still wish this to remain an item in the catalogue of Berlin contingency plans, before the time the Bercon/Marcon plans are sent forward to the major military commanders we would seek Cabinet approval to make a statement in Council along the lines that "in view of agreed guidelines on NATO strategy and SACEUR's own comments on the selective use of nuclear weapons (SHAPE 70-62-10/62), the Canadian Government does not believe that selective use of nuclear weapons has any place in Berlin contingency plans and we would wish to have this view recorded. However, in order to facilitate the work of the major military commanders we would raise no objection to the Bercon/Marcon plans going forward."

Relationship Between NATO and Tripartite Planning

The explanation of the USA Representative is not entirely satisfactory and we would prefer that the transfer of control to NATO took place as soon as the Soviet intention to use force to block access to Berlin is established rather than "when it is clearly established that the Soviets are determined to use force in blocking access and a decision is made to reinforce with intent to expand action on the ground." Subject to the views of the Belgians and Italians who raised a similar question we wonder whether there is much use in pressing this question further at this time, particularly in the light of the helpful explanation by General Baker, Head of the "Live Oak" staff, that no land probe involving a division was contemplated by military planners except under NATO control.

Parallel Political Planning

We agree that firm general assurances to consult the Alliance about diplomatic planning are not enough and together with your colleagues you should press for a parallel catalogue of diplomatic plans. You should also press for the early tabling of the tripartite papers that have been promised on tactics and action to be taken in the U.N. in the event of the signature of a peace treaty, other measures to be taken in the event of the signature of the peace treaty, and measures to be taken in case of interference with West German civilian access to Berlin.

Alerts

We note that SACEUR will be providing a paper shortly which will outline specific alert measures directly related to the various phases of a Berlin crisis. Provided this paper is sufficiently flexible and recognizes the dangers of miscalculation inherent in a too rapid implementation of certain alert measures, we consider that this subject should not hold up Council agreement to forward the Bercon/Marcon plans to the major military commanders.

NATO: ECONOMIC COUNTERMEASURES

If you have not repeat not already done so, you should lift Canadian reservation on the mere inclusion of countermeasures item on Council agenda. As you know we have endeavoured in past to make clear that our objections to particular aspects of countermeasures must not repeat not be interpreted as Canadian veto on discussion of this subject by other members. You should stress once more the importance of avoiding publicity about these discussions.

2. For your own information, we are seeking views of Minister on two outstanding aspects of countermeasures to which we have objected. We will not repeat not be able to provide guidance on substance of the question for Council meeting October 24 but will provide comments as soon as possible.

Ottawa, October 26, 1962

Mr. Ignatieff telephoned this morning to give some background to his telegrams 2487† – Berlin Contingency Planning and 2475† on Berlin Economic Counter-measures. Both telegrams stress the urgent need to put an end to a state of affairs in which Canada appears to be an obstacle to further NATO planning.

2. Mr. Ignatieff believes that we should adjust our position to permit planning to proceed for two reasons:

(a) the present emergency urgently requires new Canadian decisions if Canada is to avoid heavy responsibility for obstructing what the majority consider to be urgently needed planning;

(b) a NATO parliamentary group, which will include Opposition members, is scheduled to arrive in Paris in the first week of November (the date is not yet firm).

If, by the time they arrive, we have not taken steps to remove the impression that Canada is seriously out of line with its allies, particularly with respect to the two aspects of economic counter-measures – the mitigation scheme and partial measures – on which Cabinet has declined to accept the majority views, the Government will expose itself to serious criticism on the return of the Delegation to Canada.

3. Mr. Ignatieff is attempting to obtain a postponement of the next discussion of these problems until at least November 1 in order to give time for a further Cabinet discussion in Ottawa but he is under great pressure to agree to an earlier meeting at which Canada would have revised instructions. Mr. Ignatieff pointed out that at the discussion on October 24, the Secretariat brought out the fact that it was at the Canadian request that the discussion of economic counter-measures had been postponed repeatedly since the beginning of the year.

BERLIN—ECONOMIC COUNTERMEASURES

The members of NATO have agreed that in the event that access to West Berlin is blocked or impeded they may decide that:

(a) civil aviation countermeasures might be taken against Soviet Bloc aircraft and airports; and

(b) a total economic embargo might be imposed against the Soviet Bloc.

These decisions have been taken on the understanding that they will not be implemented until member Governments have agreed that circumstances require such action.

Both of the conclusions were accepted by Canada on the stipulations that no advance legislative preparations were required, that final decisions would be taken by Governments at the time of any crisis and that, in the meantime, no publicity would be given to NATO's examination of these problems. We have attached considerable importance to all three of these points and our position at times has led some of the Council members, particularly the United States and Britain, to press us to conform more closely with the majority view from which we are separated on two major issues.

Greece, Turkey, Iceland and, to a lesser extent, Norway and Denmark, also made their acceptance of the two above-mentioned decisions conditional. They insist that all other members must agree in principle to two parallel schemes for economic cooperation and assistance in mitigating the effects of countermeasures on some member countries in the event of a total economic embargo. These schemes would provide for the formation of a consultative committee, cooperative measures to locate alternative export markets and a compensation fund for interest-free loans to NATO countries suffering severe damage. All NATO countries except Canada have accepted the principle of these mitigation schemes, the details of which have yet to be worked out. (However, apparently because other members are not believed ready to support Iceland if it experiences commercial and economic difficulties as a result of countermeasures, the Government of Iceland refuses to give formal approval to the mitigation schemes and to the other proposals for countermeasures.)

It is reasonable to assume that, should a total economic embargo be decided upon by the members of NATO, the circumstances warranting this step would indeed be serious. It is more than likely that the problems arising out of the loss through the embargo of a relatively unimportant part of members' export markets would be only minor in comparison with the more general difficulties facing all members. Hence a scheme for compensating for such losses would probably be but a part of a more complicated system of cooperation and mutual assistance appropriate to the prevailing circumstances. Meanwhile, in a situation such as the present one in which a total embargo is not envisaged, the problem of mitigation is not a real one. Nevertheless, European members continue to insist that the Council reach some agreement on this question. As a result, and despite the seemingly obvious limitations of the mitigation schemes, consideration of other problems concerning the implementation of a total embargo are inhibited and, more generally, progress on those aspects of planning which are likely to prove fruitful and necessary, should countermeasures ever have to be employed, is seriously impeded.

More recently the NATO Council has also had under discussion the desirability of employing partial economic countermeasures in response to a partial blockage of access to West Berlin. There has been little substantial agreement on either the nature of partial countermeasures or the appropriate situations in which they might be employed. The Canadian delegate has not participated actively in the discussion although he has sought to obtain a more precise idea of the way in which partial countermeasures might be used.

Partly because of the reluctance of the Canadian Delegation, the Council has not in recent months devoted attention to any of the aspects of countermeasures. However, the United States and Britain have now proposed that the Council renew its examination of this subject. As a result of the intensification of concern over the situation in Berlin (which will be aggravated by the Cuban crisis), it is argued that NATO must proceed with its contingency planning and obtain maximum agreement which will enable a rapid response to any attempt by the U.S.S.R. to bring pressure to bear upon Berlin.

For Canada, which remains more or less isolated on the two questions of mitigation and partial countermeasures, it would likely be necessary to move towards the position already adopted by the majority if the outstanding differences are to be settled. In the past, the Canadian Delegation has stated that we have serious doubts as to the wisdom of the proposed mitigation schemes. Moreover, the Canadian Government has not been willing to commit itself in advance to hypothetical schemes and plans, the consequences of which cannot be assessed with any degree of accuracy at this time. On the other hand, the mitigation schemes in question would not, if accepted in principle, lead to any immediate financial commitment and the eventual financial implications would be relatively insignificant in the circumstances, verging on war, in which they might be implemented.

In the same manner, the problems involved in partial countermeasures are mostly hypothetical. Moreover, like other countermeasures proposed or accepted, the partial countermeasures must be specifically approved by member Governments before their implementation. It is of questionable value to try now, as the Council seems to be doing, to fit a particular counter-action to some hypothetical Soviet move, but the real objective of the discussion is simply to prepare a catalogue of possible measures from which, later, Governments will be able to select the one or several appropriate to the action the U.S.S.R. takes to impair access to Berlin.

In view of the mounting concern over Berlin and [the] tension now existing generally and, consequently, of the desirability of eliminating obstacles to the continuation of those parts of NATO contingency planning which may prove productive and prudent, I recommend that the Canadian Permanent Representative to NATO be authorized to state in the Council that Canada is prepared to agree in principle:

(a) to the two parallel proposals for mitigating the effects of economic countermeasures provided that no advance commitment concerning expenditure by the Canadian Government is involved;

(b) to the elaboration of a series of partial countermeasures which might be used in the event that access to Berlin is partially blocked.

I recommend further that the Canadian Permanent Representative be instructed to state explicitly that the Canadian agreement to (a) and (b) above is given on the same understanding as our acceptance of earlier countermeasures, that is, that no advance legislative preparations are required, that final decisions will be taken by Governments at the time of any crisis and that, in the meantime, no publicity will be given to NATO's examination of these problems.

BERLIN CONTINGENCY PLANNING

The Prime Minister has agreed to the form of approval for the Bercon/Marcon plans in the terms set forth in paragraph 8 of PO/62/641 of October 8/62 provided paragraph 8(b)(ii) is amended along the lines you have indicated namely that "the Council approved in principle and for planning purposes the major NATO commanders' plans in the Bercon and Marcon series on the basis that these represent a catalogue of plans for possible action by NATO forces in the event that the efforts of the Three Powers to maintain access to Berlin in accordance with the Live Oak plans are unsuccessful – the selection and execution of any one of these plans being subject to a prior political decision by member governments at the time." You are authorized to accept minor verbal amendments which will not alter the general sense of the foregoing and that are consistent with your earlier instructions.

2. In expressing Canadian agreement you should make the following statement for the record. "The Canadian Government is concerned at the lack of information given to the NATO Council by the tripartite powers on parallel political contingency planning and in agreeing to the approval of the Bercon/Marcon plans in principle and for planning purposes the Canadian Government assumes that in future there will be continuous consultation in Council on a parallel catalogue of political plans."

BERLIN ECONOMIC COUNTERMEASURES

42. The Secretary of State for External Affairs said that, when the question of economic countermeasures, in the event of access to West Berlin being blocked, had been raised some time ago, it had been decided that Canada would agree to the recommended civil aviation countermeasures to be taken against Soviet Bloc aircraft and airports. Canada was, however, to withhold commitment on the question of mitigation or compensation of economic hardships on other NATO countries as a result of their applying an economic embargo against the Soviet Bloc. Greece, Turkey and Iceland were the most concerned about compensation, although others would also suffer, including Canada. The question had been raised again in NATO, and it was now being proposed that Canada should go along with the contingency plan presented. Other countries had gradually swung over to the acceptance of both the civil aviation measures and a total embargo as countermeasures. Canada was, at the moment, in a minority and might soon be alone in its stand.

An explanatory memorandum had been circulated. (Minister's memorandum, Oct. 27 – Cab. Doc. 349/62).

43. During the discussion the following points were raised:

(a) Some said there was no half-way point in the contingency planning of the countermeasures proposed. Once involved, there was little chance of avoiding any of the consequences.

(b) Others pointed out that Canada stood to suffer, as would others, from loss of trade in the event of a countermeasure embargo of the Soviet Bloc. China had wheat orders with Canada and would have about $100 million outstanding at any one moment for several years ahead. There were also other possible additional sales being made in the next year, including sales to Russia. A total embargo would wipe out all these deals.

44. The Cabinet approved the recommendation of the Secretary of State for External Affairs,

(a) that the Canadian Permanent Representative to NATO be authorized to state in the Council that Canada was prepared to agree in principle:

(i) to the two parallel proposals for mitigating the effects of economic countermeasures, provided that no advance commitment concerning expenditure by the Canadian Government was involved,

(ii) to the elaboration of a series of partial countermeasures which might be used in the event that access to Berlin was partially blocked; and

(b) that the Canadian Permanent Representative be instructed to state explicitly that the Canadian agreement to (i) and (ii) above was given on the same understanding as acceptance of earlier countermeasures, that is that no advance legislative preparations were required, that final decisions would be taken by governments at the time of any crisis and that, in the meantime, no publicity would be given to NATO's examination of these problems.

BERLIN: ECONOMIC COUNTERMEASURES

You are authorized to inform Council that Canada is prepared to agree in principle (a) to the two parallel proposals for mitigating effects of economic countermeasures provided that no advance commitment concerning expenditure by Canadian Government is involved and (b) to elaboration of partial countermeasures which might be used in event access to Berlin is partially blocked. Canadian agreement to these two points is conditional on same understanding as our acceptance of earlier countermeasures, namely, that no advance legislative preparations are required, that final decisions will be taken by governments at time of any crisis and that in meantime no publicity will be given to NATO examination of these problems.

2. In light of foregoing you will be able to accept second and third draft decisions your telegram 2478 without difficulty. First draft decision concerning administrative and legislative measures required for implementing total embargo might present a problem if there is debate in Council over interpretation of draft decision. We hope that it will be possible to avoid this. If necessary you should emphasize that you accept decision on understanding earlier attached to Canadian acceptance of concept of total embargo, namely that no advance legislative preparations are involved. If however members of the Council wish to debate the interpretation each member is to give, in the light of its own domestic circumstances, to the language of this draft decision, you might simply say that in the circumstances where it would be agreed by governments that measures were required Canada would be able to move as quickly and effectively as other governments.

TALK WITH KHRUSHCHEV – BERLIN AND GERMANY

I called on Khrushchev this morning and had two and half hour conversation, which covered wide range of subjects on which I shall be reporting separately.

2. After much talk about internal affairs Khrushchev turned to international problems and took initiative in raising German question. Khrushchev said getting peace treaty with Germany was the most important current question in international life. He developed his views at some length. I will supplement this report by deferred telegram.

3. Most significant points he made were:

(a) priority which he attached to this question;

(b) his categoric statement that in practice no repeat no real progress could be expected in disarmament until there was a German peace treaty;

(c) Khrushchev said he knew Sir Frank Roberts had got impression that Khrushchev had suggested he would be prepared to accept continuation of UK, USA and French forces in Germany at present levels of personnel and armaments, without concurrent presence of Soviet forces, providing three Western forces were under UN aegis rather than under present occupation status.<sup>52</sup> (My telegram 832 November 15 refers.†) Khrushchev told me categorically that he had never said this. When I expressed surprise Khrushchev tried to explain that Sir Frank had misunderstood one of his remarks;

(d) Soviet terms had been made clear in earlier discussions with Dean Rusk and President Kennedy. He could agree to temporary presence of police forces in West Berlin on either of three variants:

(i) UK, USA, French plus USSR, or

(ii) contingents of small NATO and Warsaw pact countries together, or

(iii) contingents of neutral countries.

There could be fourth alternative of contingents both from NATO and Warsaw Pact countries and from neutral countries. But Khrushchev said USSR could not repeat not go beyond one of these alternatives. Soviet side had already made all the concessions they could make on this matter.

(e) Berlin was not repeat not Cuba, and it would be dangerous madness to expect a further Soviet retreat. Local tactical and strategic position of Soviet side was vastly stronger in Berlin, since if they had to sign separate peace treaty they could and would cut access for military supplies and replacements. Khrushchev would never repeat Stalin's stupid mistake of imposing civilian blockade, but he would have to cut military access to West Berlin if agreement could not repeat not be reached. This would put onus for escalation on West since only way West could get military access would be by war, in which case Moscow would not repeat not be responsible. I made obvious comment.

(f) Moscow had made reasonable concession in Cuba, but next concession was up to West. "If we don't get reasonable understanding we shall sign treaty separately. If people think Cuban affair will restrain us, they don't know us." Later he said "unless West makes conciliatory effort to reach agreement on German question, then it will take us all back to very unpleasant situation."

(g) Khrushchev said if it comes to test of nerves and character, he would not repeat not back down on Berlin issue. Therefore failure to agree in advance would create very dangerous situation since prestige of USSR would be heavily committed to not repeat not recognizing Western occupation rights after peace treaty, whereas American prestige would be involved in insisting on exercising these rights. Another test of nerves could be profoundly dangerous since accidents might happen and things could get out of hand.

4. Khrushchev maintained therefore that now Cuban crisis is nearly liquidated, he would have to start negotiating soon with West on Berlin. If no repeat no agreement is reached, international temperature would inevitably rise again.

5. Khrushchev's manner was very friendly, and he joked frequently in usual style. But he did not repeat not fail to emphasize vividly his military strength. He said 42 rockets withdrawn from Cuba would be re-deployed against Germany, with some left over to cover France. Moreover even during Cuban crisis there had been plenty of rockets to deal with Germany if necessary.

6. When Khrushchev had spoken of temporary stationing of UN forces in Berlin, I asked him precisely what he meant by temporary. He would not repeat not be drawn on this, but reiterated that stationing of any forces must be limited in time.

7. Khrushchev spent some time analysing what he considered motives of various Western countries on Berlin stand. I will report this separately, together with report of my efforts to make him understand Western motives more realistically.

8. Khrushchev repeatedly emphasized that his basic purpose is to fix and consolidate what already exists, specifically the frontiers of two Germanys and of West Berlin.

9. He said both Germanys, and West Berlin also, should be admitted as members of UN. Khrushchev reiterated his thesis that headquarters should be transferred to West Berlin "then whole world would be guarantor of West Berlin's freedom."

10. Khrushchev spoke about German unity, which he said he did not repeat not oppose, but this was matter for Germans themselves to work out in due course.

11. Khrushchev was not repeat not specific about timetable, but spoke as if he envisaged difficult negotiations within next few months. Once however he said that unless agreement is reached then "today or tomorrow, this year or next year" a very dangerous situation will arise.

12. Khrushchev claimed that once question of West Berlin was settled there would be no repeat no real points of conflict with West, only differences of ideology, which were not repeat not matter for fighting, because although you could kill men you could not repeat not kill ideas.

13. Khrushchev expressed hope that Canada would help find agreed solution for German question. He said he thought Canada, UK, Scandinavian countries might help considerably in this. I said we were helping since we were participants in NATO guarantee of West Berlin's freedom and took full part in frequent NATO consultations.

14. I told Khrushchev I would report what he said, but had neither desire nor authority to negotiate on German question. Americans had been discussing this question with him and his representatives on behalf of Western occupying powers and on behalf of NATO as whole.

15. I expressed hope there would be no repeat no more efforts to bring about sudden and secret change of strategic balance or to roll back either side from established positions in Europe by threats. Berlin question was very difficult and could become dangerous, but we could live with status quo. Khrushchev said we could not repeat not live indefinitely with status quo because it contained microbe of war, being based on remnants of last war.

16. By way of comment I should add that I cannot repeat not believe Sir Frank Roberts really misunderstood what Khrushchev had said to him on November 12. However it seems Khrushchev wants, whether merely for tactical purposes or otherwise, to get back to pre-Cuba position for Berlin negotiations.

17. I will be giving gist of Khrushchev's remarks on this question, for what they may be worth, to my American, British, French and German colleagues, in accordance with standing practice here.

TALK WITH KHRUSHCHEV – BERLIN AND GERMANY

As mentioned in my reference telegram, Khrushchev spoke at some length on motives of various NATO Governments on German question. In reply I tried to clarify Western motives.

2. Khrushchev claimed Adenauer's objectives were identical with those of Hitler although his methods were very different as befits changed world situation. Adenauer's real strategy involved three steps. First was to get German reunification. Once this was achieved, he would press for rectification of frontiers, i.e. reincorporation into Germany of pre-war territories now part of Poland. This in turn would merely be preparatory step towards real German goal which was domination of Europe. It was for this reason that Adenauer was rigidly opposed to any idea of German peace treaty.

3. Khrushchev said de Gaulle's motives were quite different. He had told Khrushchev he did not repeat not want German reunification. What de Gaulle did want was to restore grandeur. He was sick with idea of greatness. Under present circumstances France alone was too small a base for grandeur, hence de Gaulle needed Paris-Bonn axis. This tactical reason alone explained de Gaulle's support of Adenauer's opposition to German peace treaty.

4. Khrushchev claimed USA, UK, Canada, Netherlands and Scandinavia had no repeat no real desire for German reunification. They had to support idea merely because they consider FGR adhesion to NATO necessary for military and strategic reasons, and opposition to peace treaty was price they paid to keep FGR tied to NATO. West Berlin was advanced spearhead of NATO and FGR was main continental spearhead of NATO. Western policy involved risk of war and war cost blood, so West would prefer to pay if necessary with German blood.

4. As against this Khrushchev claimed that his only motives were to fix and consolidate status quo. Logical solution would have been incorporation of West Berlin in DDR. Only difficulty in this was that West Berlin had capitalist structure. For this reason Khrushchev was prepared to allow West Berlin to remain as separate free city.

5. I said I thought there was danger that Khrushchev was misinterpreting Western motives and might misunderstand reasons for and therefore strength of Western determination to defend freedom of West Berliners. West Berlin was not repeat not NATO spearhead, but an obvious military liability. But we were stuck with it. NATO had given solemn guarantee to West Berliners, and if NATO retreated from this pledge under threat, it would create loss of confidence not repeat not only among West Berliners but among all West Germans and among governments and peoples of many other countries in Western Alliance. For this reason no repeat no retreat which would appear to West Berliners as betrayal of their security, was possible for West. I hoped and believed that an accommodation on some basis satisfactory to both sides could be worked out. But Khrushchev should realize that Western motives were defensive and that standing firmly behind fundamental guarantee to West Berliners had become vital Western interest. It would be dangerous to misconstrue this.

6. Khrushchev said at another point that Churchill had once suggested to Stalin that Germany should be split into pieces after war. I said Morgenthau had also advocated this, and that in moment of open options it had been Stalin's insistence on maintaining unity of Germany which had been decisive. It was this Soviet insistence, and misplaced Western trust in Soviet assurances, which had determined rather illogical drawing of zones and sectors, and which created present problem with which we were all stuck.

7. Khrushchev said he agreed with most of this, and commented "Yes that was another of Stalin's grave mistakes." He said "I will tell you a secret. Stalin figured that all Germany would fairly soon become socialist, and that was why he insisted on unity. If this calculation had been correct, I as socialist would of course be delighted. But events have proved Stalin's calculation false."

8. Khrushchev said we must now deal with situation as it is. Key point is to preclude development of West German revanchist strategy.

9. I tried to get across point that Soviet pressure and threats on West Germany and NATO merely make matters worse.

10. Khrushchev repeatedly emphasized extent of guarantees he would give West Berliners, and his usual line that West Berliners' fears were lunatic chimaeras. "Who are they afraid of?" I said they were afraid of Ulbricht and added that Ulbricht's treatment of East Germans makes their fears eminently plausible. Khrushchev did not repeat not reply to this.

11. Khrushchev acknowledged that USSR had no repeat no need to fear Germans. USSR was far stronger. Soviet motive was therefore not repeat not based precisely on fear of revanchism succeeding, but on desire to consolidate status quo so that present dangerous source of tension would be removed and we could get on with peaceful ideological competition.

12. I had said that there was widespread feeling in West that Soviet demands for withdrawal of Western troops from West Berlin were designed to produce precisely the effect which Western acquiescence in these demands would in fact bring about namely loss of mutual confidence between Anglo-Saxons and their European continental allies in general, and the Germans in particular. Inevitably, in view of Western experience with Stalin's actions, and his expansion in Europe, most Westerners tended to regard present Soviet demands as further step in Communist expansion, or as designed to soften up and divide Western countries preliminary to Communist expansion. Whether these Western fears were well founded or not repeat not, I thought Khrushchev should recognize that they genuinely existed. Failure to recognize this could lead to dangerous miscalculation.

13. I expressed disappointment that Khrushchev was reiterating demand that Communist forces share police functions with Western forces in West Berlin. I thought this demand merely increased Western suspicion that Soviet motive was to change present situation as first stage toward more far-reaching developments at Western cost. I said I thought Western Governments could consider joint presence of Communist and Western military contingents in Berlin on all-Berlin basis, but I did not repeat not think West could possibly accept any solution involving West Berlin alone which shared Western police or defence responsibilities with Communist forces, since Russians had already turned over their sector of Berlin to their ally DDR. Westerners do not repeat not like being obvious suckers. No repeat no statesman could ignore this, in my opinion.

14. Khrushchev agreed that testing each other's nerve, especially on an issue such as Berlin which was important and difficult for both sides, could be dangerous. Indeed he called it most dangerous conceivable form of rivalry, since in such a test of nerves things could so easily get out of hand.

15. I shall comment in a further telegram on Khrushchev's remarks on Berlin as reported in my telegram 863 and in this message.

CONVERSATION WITH KHRUSHCHEV – SOME GENERAL COMMENTS

Since my two and a half hour talk with Khrushchev yesterday innumerable points have occurred to me which I could and should have made to him, but which I failed to make. I wish I had. I suppose this sort of regret is to some extent inevitable, and perhaps I shall have further opportunity.

2. Khrushchev's reversion to hard line on Germany, though disappointing, need not repeat not in my view be taken very tragically. I am commenting on this whole question in separate message. In this telegram I shall comment on some general aspects and impressions.

3. There are I think certain positive points. Presumably Khrushchev had been briefed by MFA, mainly on basis of memorandum of which first draft would be prepared by Lavrov, Head of Second European Division. Lavrov has impressed me, as he has impressed British Chargé d'Affaires Barker with whom he also deals, as rather tough unimaginative hardworking Stalinist type. Lavrov's goal has long been to try to create or widen wedge between Canada and USA, either by threats or cajolery. I would guess his draft of brief for Khrushchev had followed this theme, rather along lines of conversation (which seemed to me a sort of dress rehearsal for his briefing of Khrushchev) which Lavrov had with me at November 7 reception (my telegram 815 November 12).<sup>53</sup> This sort of attempt to encourage neutralist attitude in Canada and drive wedge between US and other Western countries has obvious appeal to many Russians. I have tried to steer Russians off this approach to Canada by making them realize that Canadians inevitably and rightly consider our interests bound up with those of other members of Western civilization, but we form our own independent and individual assessment of general interests of our civilization, and that our main international significance therefore lies in role which we can play in helping to influence general attitudes of our coalition and partnership on matters of common interest including major international issues. It has seemed to me that if we could achieve realistic recognition by Russians of this fact of life, this would be in interests of USSR as well as of Canada.

4. I was pleased that Khrushchev himself did not repeat not follow this rather obvious, naïve, and profitless but traditional Soviet line of would-be wedge-driving, which I assume was probably suggested to him. Wedge-driving is of course line Khrushchev as well as lesser Russians habitually take with minor countries, including most Africans [and] Asians but also some relatively big members of NATO (e.g. Italy).

5. Khrushchev's tone and manner throughout, and his substance on all questions except Berlin, were I thought on whole encouraging. On Berlin he treated us as responsible member of Western Alliance.

6. In starting off conversation I had tried to set general shape. I began by mentioning how impressed I was with great progress which USSR had made since my previous tour here under Stalin's régime. I referred not repeat not only to obvious economic, technical and other material improvements, but particularly to political and psychological or spiritual advances. I said that I had got impression when I was here during Stalin's régime that most Russians lived in fear not repeat not only of régime but of each other. Khrushchev interjected that he agreed with this. I said I thought this was definitely no repeat no longer the case. This domestic removal of atmosphere of fear had been to substantial extent Khrushchev's personal achievement, and I expressed hope that since resolution of Cuban crisis we could begin to make real progress also on removing the substantial international fears which still existed and hung over all mankind.

7. I then said that it had been Canada which had first suggested idea of North Atlantic Alliance. We had done this because we were disturbed by some of Stalin's policies, and our motives had been entirely defensive and based on Canada's own long experience. We recognized that our security and welfare was inevitably bound up with that of other parts of Western civilization in particular, and with that of world in general. Sometimes we took very different view of real interests of our civilization, from that adopted by our American neighbours. In these cases we have not repeat not hesitated to act on our different assessment of common North American interest. For example in 1914 we had considered our freedom menaced by German threats to democracy in Western Europe, and we had entered war. We had reached similar conclusion in 1939. In both cases our assessment applied just as much to real interests of USA as to real interests of Canada itself. But it had taken Americans three years, between 1914 and 1917, to come around to share Canadian assessment of common interest. Again in World War II it had taken Americans over two years to come around to share similar Canadian assessment of common interest. Canada's original proposals in 1947-48 about desirability of organizing North Atlantic Alliance had been designed to influence Americans to take more realistic and far-sighted assessment of their real interests, and hence to make timely contribution to preventing war. Our motives throughout had been entirely defensive, and they were so today.

8. Khrushchev seemed interested in these remarks, and I went on to make point that although Canada was not repeat not a small country, we were not repeat not a great power, and we recognized that our best hope of having some influence on basic situation and policies that would affect our future as well as that of our friends lay in playing full part in international organizations such as NATO coalition and UN.

9. I expressed hope that West and Socialist camp could not begin to work out concrete agreements to reduce tension and settle outstanding problems which endangered international society. I mentioned particularly desirability of agreements on nuclear test ban and disarmament, and strengthening of UN. I asked Khrushchev how he saw the prospects.

10. Khrushchev then took over. He said that he wanted first to make some observations about Soviet internal situation, on basis of my remarks with which he was in general agreement. He then spoke at great length on internal development, and his ideas about future domestic policies. I shall be reporting separately on this. Khrushchev's remarks were larded with fascinating stories about political manoeuvres with Stalin, Beria and Malenkov.

11. Khrushchev then spoke about Berlin and German questions. There was dialogue on this subject, as I have reported in my telegrams 863 and 868 November 28-29.

12. Khrushchev then spoke about nuclear test ban prospect and disarmament (my telegram 869 November 29).<sup>54</sup>

13. Khrushchev said that one important question was world position of China, and particularly its position in UN. It was ridiculous that she should be excluded and have no repeat no vote, when countries such as Iceland had a vote. I referred briefly to Chinese attack on India, and Khrushchev indicated that he was embarrassed by this attack but did not repeat not wish to discuss it. I did not repeat not pursue this point.

14. Khrushchev then said that he had one bilateral Soviet-Canadian problem which he wanted to mention. He then spoke of requested over-flights for Cuban planes (my telegram 861 November 28 refers†). I brought up question of telex and communications facilities (my telegram 872 November 29†), my hope to visit Soviet Northern regions (my telegram 870 November 29†) and question of would-be emigrants and repatriates from USSR to Canada (my telegram 871 November [2]9 refers†). Khrushchev's comments on these points were relatively encouraging. There was also brief exchange of remarks expressing interest in development of cultural relations.

15. I mentioned briefly subject of Canadian-Soviet trade, and recent consultations in Moscow between Canadian and Soviet trade delegations. Khrushchev expressed hope that trade could be further developed in both directions.

16. There was some discussion about fact that Canada and USSR were neighbours and both Northern countries with many geographical, climatic and resource problems in common. This gave us opportunity for cooperation in exchanging technical information and experience, and also created some trading opportunities. We both expressed interest in encouraging further development of good neighbourly relations between our two countries by these and other appropriate means.

17. I am reporting separately the brief remarks on UN.†

18. By then it was after one-thirty. Meeting had begun at eleven a.m. Meeting ended with mutual expressions of good will and Khrushchev's kind wishes for pleasant home leave, fruitful consultations in Ottawa, and safe return.

19. Today all Soviet papers have reported meeting prominently, without details, but stating that conversation was friendly and covered a number of points of Canadian-Soviet relations and also several topics of general international concern.

TALK WITH KHRUSHCHEV – BERLIN AND GERMANY – COMMENTS

I do not repeat not think Khrushchev's reiteration of traditional pre-Cuban hard line on Berlin and Germany need be taken to imply early Soviet action. Question obviously remains important and difficult and Khrushchev is clearly reluctant to modify goals. I think many of Khrushchev's remarks were in nature of try-on. I suspect that he does not repeat not know quite what to do about Berlin issue. He was probably trying to see whether by speaking in these terms to Canadian representative he might not repeat not do something to begin to re-establish Soviet bargaining power on Berlin, on tough terms of fear, along lines which he had developed prior to Berlin crisis.

2. Khrushchev's categorical denial that he had suggested new softer terms to Sir Frank Roberts on November 12 is interesting, disappointing, and curious. Conceivably there is some parallel here with his sudden attempt to change terms for Cuban settlement which he had offered on October 26 in unpublished letter to Kennedy, by producing on October 27 demand for reciprocal withdrawal of American rockets from Turkey.<sup>55</sup> In present case too it is conceivable that Khrushchev may now feel, or may have been persuaded by some of his Presidium or Central Committee colleagues, that it was bad tactics under present post-Cuban circumstances to offer softer terms on Berlin and that reestablishment and maintenance of prior demands is best bargaining posture. On other hand it is perhaps just conceivable that Sir Frank Roberts did misunderstand Khrushchev on this key point. But Sir Frank is an outstanding reporter with normally almost perfect recall of salient points.

3. In any case I do not repeat not believe Khrushchev or his colleagues could relish any idea of another showdown crisis with West in near future.

4. I think Khrushchev faces a number of grave dilemmas. In particular he is hard pressed on basic issue of allocation of resources.

(a) There is the great and crying need for money for agriculture. Khrushchev spoke to me at length on this subject, and emphasized his determination to invest the money necessary to increase Soviet output.

(b) There is also growing and ever more vocal and powerful demand by Soviet public for more consumer goods and better standard of living. Urgency of this demand has been illustrated in recent months inter alia by riots in Rostov-on-Don area, strikes in part of Siberia, and earlier demonstrations in Odessa against sending scarce goods as foreign aid (e.g. to Cuba). Move toward greater internal liberalization, and more freedom of expression, which has been rather marked in last few months, and on which I hope to report separately, inevitably increases the urgency of planning some method of meeting these consumer demands. Incidentally Khrushchev also emphasized to me his determination to bring in further measures to democratization and freedom.

(c) There are also claims of military budget, and probably strong pressures for substantial further development and production of ICBMs and of rocket-firing nuclear submarines. Inevitably defence establishment must be pressing for this. Logic of one side of Khrushchev's own thinking, as shown in his 1961 threats against West European NATO members, in Cuban rocket installations in 1962, and I think also in some of Khrushchev's remarks to me Wednesday on Berlin problem suggest a probable inclination to try to meet these very expensive further demands.

5. I doubt whether firm decisions have yet been taken on allocations. It does seem, however, that substantially more money may have to be allocated for agricultural and chemical industry, and that Khrushchev has really decided to do this. TASS story about 30 percent increase in funds devoted to certain branches of these two fields, is significant. But so is failure to report it in main Soviet newspapers (my telegram 849 November 23†). I have since learned however that some reference to this has appeared in relatively minor Selskaya Zhizn. Khrushchev's remarks in his farewell talk with Sir Frank Roberts on November 12 about substantial purchases for chemical industry are also relevant. As reported in my telegram 832 November 19,† Khrushchev was very emphatic to me about his determination to provide the money necessary to improve Soviet agriculture. On the other hand there is probably no repeat no decision yet where this money can come from.

6. There have been several recent signs of uncertainty, in addition to that referred to above. As reported in a separate message Khrushchev told me that he was determined to go ahead with further liberalization and democratization of Soviet life, since progress in this direction was inevitable and necessary and conditions were now ripe.<sup>56</sup> He said that he had intended to announce such steps at last week's plenum, but had been dissuaded from doing so at once because many people had expressed fears lest doing too much at once caused "indigestion."

7. A few days ago small exhibition of abstract art was opened near youth hotel in Moscow. Today at a Yugoslav reception this evening I happened to be talking to Furtseva and Kosygin and when the subject of abstract painting came up Kosygin spoke very vehemently and staunchly against it, suggesting good-humouredly that best solution would be to sell all Soviet abstract and semi-abstract painting to Canadians. Furtseva said she would sell me some if I wished, but appealed to me to agree with her views that she should have say on whether abstract art should be tolerated. I learned only afterwards that exhibition has apparently been suddenly closed by authorities.

8. More freedom for modern artists may seem a far cry from Soviet policy on Berlin, but in present rather tricky stage of development of this still totalitarian but gradually thawing society, I do not repeat not think it is irrelevant.

9. I suspect that Soviet policy on Berlin, as on many other matters, is still undecided and is being subjected to an agonizing reappraisal. This is not repeat not at all a bad thing, though it is too soon to forecast eventual results.<sup>57</sup>

BERLIN: POLITICAL PLANNING

Following are our comments on the Four Power Plan for a Western response to a separate peace treaty contained in your reference telegram.

2. We have been impressed by the basic differences between this paper and its predecessor last year (your telegram 2325 of September 18, 1961). Latter paper, for example, proceeded from the assumption that the USSR was very likely to sign a separate peace treaty with the DDR, and that there was little if anything the West could do to prevent this, although it might hope to discourage all but the Communist bloc countries and perhaps one or two neutrals from signing. It also held that the significance of such a peace treaty could be played down with reasonable prospect of success, provided of course that its implementation did not infringe on any essential aspects of the Western position in Berlin. Moreover, as you have pointed out, this earlier study specifically recognized that the available political or economic countermeasures would be ineffective to prevent signature, and were in addition likely to have unacceptable side effects.

3. Both implicitly and explicitly, the latest paper appears to challenge most of these assumptions. The emphasis placed on preventing the signature of a separate peace treaty as such suggests that prevention has been transformed into an essential element in the Western position. Since this is an essentially negative aim which may lie outside Western power to achieve, this approach seems to us to lack something of the realism in last year's paper. Moreover, in marked contrast with the latter, a range of political, economic and even military countermeasures are contemplated to achieve this end.

4. We think it would be useful to explore more fully the possible reasons for this marked shift in emphasis which has occurred during the last year, particularly since we rather suspect that the other related Four Power papers on political contingency planning which have been promised to council (e.g., on West German access to Berlin) may reflect this same approach. A number of possible reasons occur to us:

(a) a hardening of the USA attitude as a result of indications that the USSR was not sufficiently convinced that the West, and especially USA, would in the final analysis honour its commitments in Berlin;

(b) concern as to the effect of signature of a separate peace treaty on West German morale, in the light of last year's shock to German opinion when the wall was built;

(c) a more optimistic assessment of the likelihood of deterring Soviet action on a separate peace treaty by firm Western response in advance.

5. The net result of this shift in emphasis has been to render the present Four Power paper less a plan in response to the signature of a separate peace treaty than a blueprint for forceful deterrence. While we are inclined to prefer the approach in last year's paper in that it appears to be based on a more realistic assessment of the possibilities of Western influence, we would certainly not wish to dismiss out of hand the possible advantages of the policy now contemplated by the Four, particularly if there are reasonable grounds for believing that this approach might be more successful. For this reason I consider it important that in future discussions you continue, with your Belgian and like-minded colleagues, to press for an explanation of the considerations which prompted these changes. We have noted from Washington telegram 3443 of November 26† that Tyler more or less denied that any such shift had taken place, and USA response to this line of questioning may prove instructive. It occurs to us that the discussion on the lessons to be drawn from the Cuban episode may throw some light on the reasoning behind this new approach.

6. If in fact it is accepted that the main emphasis should now be on prevention as opposed to response, we would hope that Four Powers would be prepared to consider alternative, more positive approaches along the lines of paragraph 6 of your telegram 2678.‡ In particular, Khrushchev's apparent interest in coming to some understanding with the West on Berlin before signing a separate treaty, together with his continuing postponement of latter threat, suggests one constructive alternative. It seems to us that, despite the recent Cuban crisis and consequent interruption of USA-USSR talks on Berlin, USSR has not dismissed this possibility, which could have face saving advantages for both sides not immediately apparent in the hard approach of the Four Power paper.

7. Even on its own terms we would have very real doubts about certain aspects of the Four Power plan in its present form. Insofar as possible, we believe that political contingency planning should be commensurate with other types of countermeasures, and are thus somewhat troubled by the prospect in paragraphs 6-8 of reference telegram of basing even preliminary Western military and economic counter action largely on a statement of Soviet intentions as such. As we recall, in the military plans clearer evidence of a direct threat to essential Western position would be required before these could be implemented. We share the Belgian misgivings that emphasis on preparatory measures of a military and economic character, including an embargo, might well place the West in a position of taking provocative and precipitate action, particularly in the eyes of the uncommitted. We would of course certainly wish to have more details of the nature of such plans as envisaged in paragraphs 6-8. In the circumstances in which they are likely to be implemented, such plans seem to us less likely to deter USSR from course of action embarked on than to precipitate an even more serious crisis. At the same time the references to maintaining contacts with USSR, in the light of the basically possible [sic] approach in the present plan, seems largely perfunctory, and we would prefer to see this strengthened. In short, the present approach, in the absence of continued Western pressure for a negotiated settlement, seems to us to run the risk of placing the West at a serious disadvantage to cope with important problems which would inevitably arise if and when USSR decides to sign its separate peace treaty.

8. Taken by themselves these comments may seem somewhat negative. Basically, however, they reflect the belief expressed in our telegram S-453 that the best way to prevent, or at least to minimize, the undesirable consequences of a separate peace treaty is for the West to seize the initiative in Berlin and other East-West issues. This conviction is only reinforced by our view that, in the wake of the Cuban crisis, the Western negotiating position is unlikely to be stronger than at present, and that if not pressed home in the near future, this momentary advantage will inevitably disappear. Unfortunately, the Four Power paper, which was probably prepared before the Cuban affair, misses this point completely. We believe, however, that if your comments on the paper are set in the framework of this basic theme, our contribution in the discussion will appear more positive and constructive.

ARNOLD SMITH'S TALKS WITH KHRUSHCHEV

Frank Roberts is at present on leave in Cairo and has discussed with me discrepancies between his report of Khrushchev's views on Berlin and Arnold Smith's. Although Foreign Office has probably passed on his comments I am reporting what he said to me as of possible interest.

2. Roberts said there was no repeat no possibility of his having misinterpreted Khrushchev as he was not repeat not alone at meeting; and in addition Gromyko was taking copious notes and could easily have corrected impression he was given of Soviet position. Furthermore he had been under instructions not repeat not to raise Berlin issue in order not repeat not to disturb direct USA-Soviet dialogue. Khrushchev himself brought up subject and Roberts insists he said he would accept continuation of UK, USA and French forces under UN cover. Finally, Head of West European Department in MFA had told Roberts a few days previously that Soviet position had been misunderstood by Western Powers.

3. Roberts thinks Khrushchev, who is compulsive talker, realised he had gone too far; and this was reinforced by Lord Home's talk to Soldatov in London which gave Russians impression British believed that Soviet policy had been radically modified. Khrushchev's idea of bargaining with Americans, of course, was not repeat not to give anything away in advance. In this case he obviously did not repeat not want Americans to think either that he was trying another channel in negotiations, or that he would not repeat not disturb status of Western troops in Berlin. Therefore he felt need to correct this impression and best way to do it was via Arnold Smith.

1962 TRIENNIAL REVIEW: EXAMINATION OF CANADA

The examination of Canada took place in the Annual Review Committee on November 9. This was the first examination of Canada under the Triennial Review procedure. I headed the Canadian team, assisted by Mr. A.F.W. Plumtre, Mr. R.G. MacNeill, A/V/M R.A. Cameron and other civil and military advisers.

2. The agenda for the meeting may be found in AC/19-A/306. The reference documents were TR(62)Canada-D/1 to D/4, and SGM-553-62. Additional documentation was provided by the Canadian delegation in the form of an opening statement based on your telegram DL-1585 of November 2, † and a document containing the texts of the answers to the questions on forces problems and mutual aid (Items II and III of the agenda) based on your telegrams 1586† and 1587† of November 2. The text of a statement made by the Minister of National Defence on August 24, 1962, <sup>58</sup> was also circulated. No written material was circulated under Item IV of the agenda, financial and economic aspects.

3. As we reported in our telegram under reference, the review went along predictable lines. Both in his opening and closing statements, the Chairman indicated an understanding of the effects of the financial emergency of last June<sup>59</sup> on the defence programme. His statements fully recognized the care with which the Canadian authorities had reduced defence expenditure without affecting Canada's basic international military commitments. At the same time, his statements displayed a natural tendency to seize upon the temporary nature of the financial emergency as a ground for arguing for the earliest possible resumption of defence spending at former levels. There was no evidence of any desire on the part of any member of the Committee, or of the NATO military authorities, to press questions about the recent reduction in defence expenditures unduly. On the contrary, we believe that the Canadian position, particularly after additional explanatory statements had been made by the members of the Canadian team, was well understood.

4. I will not report in detail on the discussions under Items II and III of the agenda. Both the questions of the NATO military authorities and the replies of the Canadian team closely followed the documents which had been prepared in advance. Two points left for further clarification with SHAPE were:

(a) Did Canada have any medium artillery in the Divisional organization?

(b) Canada's plans with respect to dispersal airfields and particularly the provision of a fourth one.

So far as Item III on mutual aid was concerned, there were signs of interest on the part of the International Staff in the Canadian answer about the CF-104 programme. While the broader questions raised by this programme could not appropriately be pursued in the Annual Review Committee, we are aware that there is a growing recognition among delegations and in the International Staff of the problems posed for a country with limited resources to maintain a reasonable defence contribution in an era of heavily rising military costs. From this point of view, the reference in the opening statement to the possibilities of increased military procurement by Canada's allies in Canada had some effect. At any rate, the Chairman's statements revealed that the International Staff are aware of and interested in the mutual aid possibilities of Canadian defence production.

5. In dealing with Item IV, economic and financial aspects, Mr. Plumtre said that it was not possible to give firm answers to the questions which the International Staff had posed. Nonetheless, a certain background information might be illuminating. He explained that the Canadian financial crisis, while it had in a sense struck suddenly, had its origins in basic developments in Canada's international and national position going back a number of years. He referred to the consequences in the Canadian context of the two main deficits which had developed on international account and on budgetary account, and described how the government's programme of emergency measures had been designed to re-establish confidence so far as both these deficits were concerned. He said that on October 22, the Minister of Finance had been able to announce a substantial improvement in the budgetary position.<sup>60</sup> The emphasis on the budgetary aspect was significant so far as the defence programme was concerned, in that, when the possibility of making economies had been reviewed, the emphasis had been on the budgetary implications of the defence programme rather than on the international account aspect. Dealing with Canada's present payments position, Mr. Plumtre referred to the latest fragmentary evidence available at the moment about the structure of the current account, and to references to the current account position, both in the Speech from the Throne and in the Minister of Finance's October 22 statement. There had been improvement in the current account position. The lack of confidence seemed to be dissipating. Extensive dependence on inflows of foreign capital could perhaps be considered a thing of the past. Capital inflow seemed to have been resumed at a reduced level. Mr. Plumtre concluded that, while the immediate crisis was over, the government would continue to have to tread cautiously in its financial and economic affairs, both international and domestic, for some time to come. When the time came to consider resumption in expenditure the higher priority military expenditures would take their place along with higher priority civil expenditures.

6. Perhaps the most significant statement during the Canadian examining session was made by Mr. Finletter, Permanent Representative of the United States. He emphasized that his remarks had general application, because of the interdependence of defence expenditures of all NATO countries. He wished to relate the answers which had been given about the Canadian defence programme to this broader problem, while noting with satisfaction that Canada had fulfilled its commitments in the past and had been careful, in dealing with its financial emergency, to avoid measures which reduced the effectiveness of its defence programme. He said that the examining sessions which had taken place so far might be considered as indicating the emergence of different policies or trends between the United States and its allies. NATO countries generally were becoming wealthier year by year but, with few exceptions, were reducing the percentage of their GNP which they devoted to defence. The United States, on the other hand, was increasing its percentage. This difference between the United States and its allies was a source of concern to the Administration, particularly when it confronted the problems of presenting a defence programme to the U.S. Congress and to the electorate. If present trends continue, the disproportion between the United States and its allies would become even greater. Canada, for example, although the second richest country in the Alliance, with a per capita income of $1,780, devoted only 5.4% of its GNP to defence purposes in 1962. Of course Canada had faced a particularly difficult balance of payments position, but the United States had balance of payments difficulties too and had not used these as a justification for cutting back its defence expenditures and overseas commitments.

7. He recognized the interdependence of the defence efforts of the countries of the Alliance. He was aware that if there were marked differences in the percentage of GNP which different countries devoted to defence within the Alliance, this could conceivably give rise to imbalance so far as relative trading positions were concerned. His view was that if this possibility were to be eliminated, it should be done through a general levelling up of defence expenditures not a levelling down. If a country adopted a policy of steadily decreasing the percentage of GNP which it devoted to defence, this could have a chain reaction within the Alliance. It was not a healthy state of affairs that the national shares in the collective effort should be so imbalanced. It was sometimes argued that the United States' share should be greater because of its position as the leading nuclear power, but he did not accept this argument. He understood that the purpose of the Triennial Review was to bring out differences which might exist over basic questions of policy so that these could be followed up at a higher level. Subsequently the Chairman took a somewhat similar line, arguing that the share of the Canadian GNP devoted to defence was relatively low in comparison with a number of other members of the Alliance, and it would take a relatively small increase in that share to permit Canada to fill the modest gap which existed between its present defence programme and a programme which would meet the requirements of the NATO military authorities fully.

8. The weaknesses of this line of argument are, of course, fully familiar to you. While I did not wish to become involved in an argument with Mr. Finletter over propositions that have been a source of greater heat than light in the past, I thought his statement should not pass entirely without comment. I, therefore, reminded the Committee that, as to the recent cuts in Canadian defence expenditure, these had been caused by financial exigencies, were not to be interpreted as indicating any change in the policy of the Canadian government towards NATO, and had in fact been carefully thought out so as to affect Canada's international commitments to the smallest degree possible. I added that the broad problems which Mr. Finletter had raised were by no means peculiar to Canada but related to a greater or lesser degree to other members of the Alliance and would, no doubt, be considered at a higher level when the results of all the examining sessions were available to governments. (Presumably this could be at the forthcoming Ministerial meeting.)

9. In brief, the Canadian examination passed off relatively easily. The International Staff and interested delegations are aware that Canada faces a number of perplexing problems in the defence field, and that the problems involved in meeting our NATO commitments will not become easier in the next few years. Nevertheless, our immediate financial and economic concerns were, I thought, given full weight in this year's examining session, and we were not unduly pressed. Mr. Finletter's statement, of course, raises a series of difficult questions for all the members of the Alliance. From what he said, I would take it that the US authorities are determined to pursue the arguments which he presented during our examination at the level of the Council, and perhaps at the next Ministerial meeting.

NATO MINISTERIAL MEETING, PARIS,
DECEMBER 13-15 – CANADIAN POSITION

The December meeting of the Foreign, Defence and Finance Ministers of NATO will discuss the main issues of international concern and take stock of the defensive strength of the Alliance on the basis of the results of the Triennial Review examinations of the national defence efforts of member countries.

The following is the agenda:

- I. Review of the International Situation
- II. Military Questions
- III. Civil Emergency Planning
- IV. Co-operation in Research, Development and Production
- V. Any Other Business – Special Defence Problems of Greece
- VI. Date and Place of Next Meeting
- VII. Communiqué

The following paragraphs outline in general terms the main items expected to come up during the discussions and suggest the position the Canadian Delegation might take on each.

East-West Relations and Berlin

The central subject under this Item is likely to be the state of East-West relations and in particular whether, as a result of the Cuban episode, the time is now propitious to negotiate with the Soviet Union settlements of outstanding East-West issues including Berlin.

In the Canadian view, in the past the Soviet Union has had the diplomatic initiative on German questions and there has been a natural reluctance on the part of the West to negotiate from weakness. As a result of the Cuban confrontation, the completion of a nuclear test series by the United States and the Soviet Union, and the tensions within the Communist bloc caused by the Sino-Soviet dispute, the West enjoys increased prestige and strength which offers an opportunity for the West to take some initiative on a variety of East-West issues.

It is recommended that Canadian Ministers support any efforts to discover whether the conditions exist for undertaking renewed negotiations with the Soviet Union.

Responsibilities of the Alliance as a whole in respect of Berlin bring with them a corresponding responsibility on the part of the three occupying powers to consult the Council regularly concerning their political as well as military and economic contingency plans on Berlin. This responsibility stems not only from the specific commitments of the Alliance in respect of Berlin but also from the simple fact that three-power action or response in Berlin could directly involve the Alliance as a whole.

It is therefore also recommended that Canadian Ministers support the review in the Permanent Council and, if necessary, revision of the Western negotiating position on Berlin preparatory to the resumption of U.S.A./Soviet discussions on this subject interrupted by the Cuban crisis.

Military Questions

The U.S.A. Government has emerged from the Cuban experience more than ever concerned at the relative lack of progress in the Alliance in developing a military capability for "a measured response." It is the U.S.A. view that NATO forces in Europe remain overly dependent on nuclear weapons, largely as a consequence of the slowness of European members to meet their conventional force goals. They maintain that in recent years the percentage of U.S.A. defence spending in relation to gross national product has risen, while the opposite has been true for all other NATO countries, and the U.S.A. Government is known to be concerned at this evidence of what they believe to be a fundamental divergence in defence policy between the United States and its allies.

It is recommended that the Canadian approach to defence spending be explained along the following lines:

While devoting our efforts on the political front to seeking reasonable settlements with the Soviet Union on East-West issues, including nuclear testing and disarmament, we recognize the need to maintain strong defences.

Canada's defence effort has involved the expenditures of considerable foreign exchange to maintain forces in Europe and for the procurement of military equipment. Canada has absorbed this outlay despite a very large deficit on current international account. However, there is now a need substantially to improve the long-term current account position. Some relief would be achieved by an increase in military procurement in Canada by our NATO partners.

With regard to the differing trends in defence spending between the United States and its NATO allies, Canada has always considered that total defence expenditure policy should be based on a high degree of military preparedness and a requirement to meet force goals rather than on a particular percentage of gross national product. Canada has consistently met its agreed military commitments.

The reduction in total Canadian defence spending as a result of the financial emergency in June 1962<sup>61</sup> was so arranged as to have the minimum effect on the Canadian contribution to NATO defence. The Canadian Government was gratified by the recognition during this year's Triennial Review Examination that the cut in defence spending had not affected Canada's fulfilment of basic military commitments to NATO.

One reason for the United States emphasis on increasing the percentage of G.N.P. spent by others on defence is to off-set its own foreign exchange outlays. Canadian Ministers might wish to make reference to the importance of interdependence in the defence field and the very difficult problems posed for those NATO countries with limited resources in maintaining a reasonable defence contribution in an era of rising military costs.

Progress Report on NATO Defence Policy

It is understood that there will be a progress report on the offer of the United States Government to co-operate in the creation of a multilateral sea-borne MRBM force for NATO.

Such a force is not regarded by the U.S.A. as an urgent military requirement. The proposal has been put forward by the United States in response to political pressure for European participation in the nuclear deterrent. On the one hand the Federal German Republic wishes to have a larger say in NATO nuclear policy while France and Britain, each for their own reasons, wish to maintain national nuclear forces. As this U.S.A. proposal would have to be acceptable to these powers, it is for the European countries to make the principal response.

The U.S.A. is anxious not to force the pace of these discussions pending a clearer indication of the future political shape of Europe and the relationship of Britain to EEC. It is a condition of U.S.A. interest in a multilateral force, that equal importance be given in NATO to the build-up of conventional forces.

It is in the Canadian interest to support the continuation of discussion in the Permanent Council of the U.S.A. proposal for a NATO seaborne MRBM force as an alternative to the proliferation of national nuclear forces.

Civil Emergency Planning

NATO has a responsibility in this field in addition to the national responsibilities of the member states.

In accordance with the views put forward by Canadian representatives at the recent meeting of the Senior Civil Emergency Planning Committee, it is recommended that:

- (a) higher priorities be given to civil emergency planning by the International Secretariat;
- (b) financing by the host country, financing by regions or a combination of these forms for NATO wartime civil agencies should be supported. Common NATO financing should be resisted;
- (c) in principle, a sizeable NATO exercise should be prepared for 1964 to test the capabilities of the NATO wartime civil agencies.

Co-operation in Research, Development and Production

Canada was represented by the Chairman of the Defence Research Board in a high level working group which reviewed the RDP programme. Its report, which will be considered by Defence Ministers at a special meeting, notes the factors which caused difficulty or delay in implementing an effective NATO RDP programme. These impediments include a unanimity rule, national responsibility for selecting equipment for armed forces, and the tendency to protect immediate national economic and commercial interests in armaments production. The report recommends formulation by the Military Committee of realistic and timely statements of NATO basic military requirements for various weapons systems, rationalization of the Armaments Committee machinery, and the strengthening of national representation concerned with RDP. While the recommendations of this report are not very far reaching, they could if followed through result in a significant improvement in the Armaments Committee machinery.

It is recommended that Canada

- (a) accept the report of the high level working group;
- (b) continue to support the proposal for the Armaments Committee to consider the economic aspects of co-operative RDP with the aim of achieving equitable national participation in programmes;
- (c) continue to support the establishment of basic agreements which would provide the framework for co-operative RDP projects;
- (d) recommend that Defence Ministers keep the RDP programme under review.

Any Other Business – Special Defence Problems of Greece

A NATO Working Group reported on September 12 that the Greek defence budget will require supplements of approximately $53 M in 1963 and $60 M in 1964 to implement the military programme considered essential by SACEUR.

The Canadian position with regard to the defence problems of Greece has been made clear on a number of occasions to the Greek authorities. While sympathetic to the problems the Greek Government is facing, in view of our own economic difficulties and the recent cuts in Canadian defence spending, we are unable to provide any budgetary aid to Greece. It is recommended that this attitude be maintained. A request has been received from the Greek Government to extend spares support for 25 F86E and 22 T-33 aircraft (originally supplied by Canada) until March 1964. Since it is understood that this support can be supplied under Mutual Aid, it is recommended that this decision be made known to the NATO Secretary-General for inclusion in his report to the Council.

Date and Place of Next Ministerial Meeting

The Dutch Government has withdrawn its offer to hold the Spring Meeting of NATO Foreign Ministers in The Hague in 1963. The Acting NATO Secretary-General has been informed that Canada would be agreeable to playing host to the 1963 Spring Meeting provided that this is the wish of the other members of the Alliance. For the time being no publicity is being given to this informal intimation.<sup>62</sup>

NOTES FOR DELEGATION MEETING

This meeting offers perhaps the only opportunity we will have to meet as a full delegation and to set the main themes that the delegation is to emphasize in the political discussions, military discussions and in the communiqué drafting.

The order in which you might guide the business of the meeting could be the Council's agenda for the next 3 days, the first item of which is, of course, the main political discussion on December 13 under the heading "Review of International Situation." It is suggested that you might ask Mr. Ignatieff to give an outline of what he expects to be the main issues which will arise. These will likely comprise the following:

A. Political Questions

An assessment of Soviet motives in creating the crisis in Cuba and an assessment of the status of East-West relations in the aftermath of that crisis. In practical terms, this discussion will resolve itself into conflicting opinions as to whether to follow up the Soviet setback in Cuba with an attempt on western initiative to resolve other questions of East-West conflict, and in particular Berlin and related German questions, nuclear testing and disarmament. As noted in the Cabinet memorandum, it is the Canadian view that the West should not simply stand pat but should quickly prepare itself to seek settlements with the Soviet Union. This point of view will probably be resisted by France and Germany. Even the United States may show a tendency to wish to draw a line under the Cuban crisis before contemplating discussions with the Soviet Union on other issues. By this the Americans mean the removal of the remaining Soviet personnel in Cuba rather than an agreement on inspection arrangements, which now seems unattainable owing to Cuban intransigence.

We can uphold American efforts to wind up the Cuban affair, but we do not think that the remaining unresolved problems there should be allowed to frustrate the urgent examination of the elements of a settlement with the Soviet Union in Berlin.

As the West is already negotiating with the Soviet Union on nuclear testing and on disarmament, the focal point of dispute in the NATO Council will be on negotiations over Berlin.

In our view, NATO planning in connection with Berlin can be of two kinds:

- (i) A thorough re-examination of a possible element of a settlement of the Berlin problem with the view to making proposals to the Soviet Union. In particular Spaak's ideas of September 21, 1961, merit careful reconsideration now.<sup>63</sup>

<sup>63</sup> Voir Sydney Gruson, "Spaak Says Soviet Backs Wide Talks with No Deadline," New York Times, September 25, 1961, pp. 1, 3. Pour un compte rendu plus détaillé, voir OTAN Paris aux Affaires extérieures, télégramme 2385, 22 septembre 1961, † MAE/50341-40, partie 20.2. For a fuller account, see NATO Paris to External, telegram 2385, September 22, 1961, † DEA/50341-40, part 20.2.

(ii) Contingency planning in the political sphere in the event that the Soviet Union seizes the initiative again in the Berlin crisis by signing a peace treaty. This would involve preparations for political moves comparable to the plans which have already been made in the military and economic spheres. In the NATO this is largely a task for the Council in permanent session, since the Ambassadors of the three occupying powers in Germany working in Washington, already constitute a political planning group for Berlin. Since the three occupying powers bear the principal responsibilities for Berlin security, it would not be appropriate for Canada to make specific proposals for Berlin settlement at ministerial level.

Apart from Europe, the only other matter on which Canadian views, as a member of the Commonwealth, would be particularly appropriate would be the Sino-Indian dispute. Here we would suggest three principal themes.

(a) The opportunity for a settlement of the India-Pakistani dispute.

(b) The need for NATO support for India while avoiding the NATO label in connection with it.

(c) In the long term, the need for a modus vivendi between India and China.

To a certain extent, your intervention on Thursday will depend upon the themes stressed by those who will precede you. It is possible that we may find it desirable to submit some comments, for example on Indo-China developments. There will be a further political discussion on Friday afternoon where we could re-enter the debate on any point of interest to us, e.g., Congo, United Nations.

N.B. If possible we would like to avoid a detailed paragraph by paragraph examination of your draft statement.

B. Military Questions

Mr. Ignatieff can be expected to include in his remarks the principal problems which he expects to arise in the military sphere. He will probably confirm that the Americans can be expected to pursue their efforts to remedy their own balance of payments difficulties by emphasizing the need for other members of NATO to increase their military spending (with particular reference to percentage of G.N.P.) and to buy more of their military requirements in the United States.

The Canadian response to this campaign should not be defensive. We are experiencing the same balance of payments difficulties as the Americans, have an excellent record of fulfilling our force goals and can reasonably take the position that U.S.A. remarks are not aimed at us but at the European members of the Alliance. The Departments of Finance and National Defence have been working on a statement which Mr. Harkness will probably deliver on December 14.

The Americans can also be expected to make some reference to the proposal for a NATO seaborne MRBM force, a force which they do not regard as an urgent military requirement but which they may nevertheless desire to press in order to head off, or harness in a collective effort, the further development of national nuclear forces.

The Americans can be expected to stress, however, that the seaborne force must not be at the expense of the continued build-up of conventional forces in Europe, for they have concluded from the Cuban experience that a "measured response" involving the use of conventional force only in the early stages of a crisis, is the only way to avoid a nuclear conflict.

At this stage of the consideration of the multilateral nuclear force, it would be best to leave the Europeans and Americans to make the running. We might lend support to an unhurried continued examination of this project in the permanent Council, since such a project is not likely to come to fruition anyway until Britain's future relationship to Europe has been settled. It is just possible that the Americans may announce an intention to proceed in the meantime with a pilot multilateral project in the Mediterranean.

Under military questions, there will also be a discussion of the Special Defence Problems of Greece. While Canada is not in a position to contribute direct budgetary aid to the $1.65 million Greek financial short-fall, we will be in a position to announce the provision of (a) $1 million support for F86 and T33 aircraft originally supplied by Canada; and (b) food aid of $1 million.

C. Civil Emergency Planning

This will be dealt with by National Defence. Canada should support the greater effort in emergency planning by the international secretariat, Paris, but should avoid pressing national governments to speed up their national civil emergency readiness.

Any suggestion of common financing of NATO wartime civil agencies should be resisted.

D. Co-operation in Research Development and Production

This item is also one for National Defence. A report prepared by a high level working group on which Canada was represented by Dr. Hartley Zimmerman, Chairman of Defence Research Board, will be under consideration. The report proposes improvement in the machinery of the armaments committee and other arrangements designed to improve procedure. There is nothing in the report to which we take exception and we can therefore go along with the statement which Mr. Harkness plans to give generally endorsing the report. If Defence Production officials believe that it would be helpful in the context of Canada-U.S. production sharing, some favourable reference could be included in Mr. Harkness' statement to Canada's happy experience with the U.S. in joint projects.

E. Next Ministerial Meeting

As Iceland and Luxembourg have not adequate facilities for a spring meeting and the Netherlands (whose turn it was) has a spring election, Canada has tentatively responded favourably to an informal request that Ottawa be the site for the Spring 1963 meeting. It has been ascertained that the Centre Block will be available for the meetings and that the Chateau Laurier can make available 300 rooms provided that the meeting is not held in the week of May 5 to 11.

Mr. Ignatieff will be in a position to report on his discussions with the acting Secretary-General on this subject.

MINISTERIAL MEETING: DISCUSSION OF DEFENCE QUESTIONS

Discussion of defence questions involving as it does important issues which will be of continuing importance to Permanent Delegation is summarized in this message. This discussion was preceded this year not repeat not only by usual Standing Group intelligence appreciation of Soviet threat but for the first time also by briefings by the three major commanders. These were devoted to painting a sobering picture of the deficiencies in the forces of the Alliance. In discussion, USA were the leading participants. Rusk spoke briefly repeating USA position on multilateral seaborne MRBM force. McNamara spoke at considerably greater length on need to strengthen the conventional forces of the Alliance.<sup>64</sup> (Full text of McNamara's statement was circulated as Cosmic Top Secret document C-M(62)115. Del will have returned with four copies of this document. We have retained one.) Apart from Rusk's brief statement and passing reference by Norstad and Thorneycroft, no repeat no major participant in the discussion dealt with MRBM question. In fact under agenda item II(b) (which was formally the item under which this question could have been discussed) there was no repeat no discussion at all; Ministers simply noted Secretary-General's progress report C-M(62)109 without comment. As for question of conventional forces, McNamara's request for a re-examination of NATO's strategic concepts was accepted. This will presumably provide a continuing task for the Council in the coming months which will have to be related to work being undertaken by Standing Group on instructions of Military Committee. Apart from this however McNamara's arguments were on the whole received in silence. With Strauss no repeat no longer speaking for Germany, German contribution was slight. French did not repeat not speak at all under the item and British contribution contested many of main USA points.

2. Following is a summary of discussion.

3. SACLANT referred to substantial shortfalls in the forces assigned to him. Deficiencies in anti-submarine forces were of particular concern in view of the powerful and growing Soviet submarine threat. His requirements for end of 1966 had been stated as a minimum. Yet there was a potential shortage across the board of about one-third of these forces. Therefore he had to consider assigning priorities within the tasks he had been given. A choice might have to be made between defending the Atlantic shores and defending shipping. Shortages were all the more serious since his requirements had been calculated on the premise that in a general war all enemy naval bases would be eliminated in the initial nuclear exchange. In the event of protracted periods of conventional war or war employing only tactical nuclear weapons short of a full nuclear war, enemy naval bases would not repeat not be eliminated. SACLANT's force requirements could thus increase. He had been closely involved in the Cuban affair as a National Commander. This had been a classic example of selective use of sea power. Opponent had been given time to reconsider and an avenue of escape. Crisis could not repeat not have been successfully resolved without a coordinated conventional military effort in support of the quarantine. Anti-submarine forces had been an important part in this effort. Cuba had dramatized the extent of Soviet conventional submarine threat. As a land power with their internal lines of communications USSR had a permanent advantage on the West. West would always have the greater stake to lose at sea. At moment forces were only assigned to SACLANT on declaration of a reinforced alert. Cuba had shown that ready forces quickly available at an early stage of a crisis could have a deterrent effect. Therefore he might have in future to ask for the assignment of forces before a reinforced alert. Filling gaps in assigned forces was increasingly difficult because of lengthening lead times for ship construction.

Nevertheless state of allied naval preparedness could be improved through speedy completion of infrastructure projects and concentration of naval research on anti-submarine techniques.

4. Commander in Chief Channel also referred to dramatically increasing Soviet submarine threat. If he had today to rewrite the MC26/4 requirements, he would put his own needs 50 percent higher because of increased Soviet submarine construction. A simple totalling of all categories of ships available to him created a satisfactory impression, but in fact there were deficiencies in Category A ships which were particularly serious because his command's priority task would be heaviest at the outset of hostilities. The 3000 ships normally in Northwest European waters would have to be evacuated quickly on the outbreak of war; they would be worth their weight in gold for resupplying Europe after an initial nuclear attack. Qualitative deficiencies in forces available to him were also serious. One-half the maritime patrol aircraft under his command, for example, were not repeat not capable of dealing with modern submarines. Unless radical changes were made there was no repeat no prospect of getting anywhere near the force goals for 1966. Situation gave particular concern since USSR was developing a nuclear missile fleet which could threaten Western Europe from its relatively undefended western and southern flanks. There was no repeat no provision at all in present forces to meet this threat. As a state of nuclear balance approached there was increased risk of limited Soviet aggression with conventional weapons. What better weapon did USSR have for such purposes than its conventional submarine fleet? Major land forces of the Alliance were deployed on what amounted to a bridgehead in Western Europe; it was the sea which gave depth to the Alliance and frequently provided its best lateral communications. Alliance had become accustomed to assuming that it had unchallenged control of the priceless strategic asset. But this could not repeat not much longer be counted on. Balance of power at sea was radically changing to the disadvantage of the Alliance.

5. SACEUR praised Ministers for having over the years resisted the temptation to plan in terms of the forces which could be easily obtained rather than in terms of forces which were needed. Under former plans, Allies' weakness had forced his predecessors to prepare defence positions behind a number of major German population centres. Now however he had ordered the adoption of the forward defence concept. This involved certain risks in assuming that MC26/4 goals would be reached. But the risks of delay in implementing forward strategy were greater. For public consumption he was accustomed to speak of having the equivalent of 25 2/3 M-day divisions. Without naming any countries, he wished to point out privately that seven of these were short one brigade each. In fact he had only 23 1/3 divisions as against the 29 2/3 called for in MC26/4, to say nothing of qualitative deficiencies. His hard conclusion was that the deterrent value of shield forces was not repeat not what it ought to be especially in the Northern and Central areas. Even a relatively modest Soviet attack – arising, for example, out of a miscalculation – could succeed in seizing something of value to the West, and leaving West with the choice of initiating escalation. Air force requirements were vital to the forward defence concept but the Allied position in the period to the end of 1966 would be “weak and becoming relatively weaker.” SACEUR's requirements had been reduced by 700 aircraft from MC/70 to MC26/4, on the assumption that MRBMs would be introduced as a substitute. These weapons were not repeat not forthcoming. Task for which they were needed still had to be done. Requirement was urgent five years ago and was certainly not repeat not less urgent today. He would not repeat not enter into discussion of the means by which this gap might be filled. Nevertheless the gap remained. (This was Norstad's only reference to MRBMs.) If forces under SACEUR's command were not repeat not improved there would be “limited deterrence, little defence and no repeat no effective forward defence.” The important thing was to accept firm force goals, setting aside if necessary preconceptions – including his own – about how these goals might best be met. There should be an end to public philosophizing on either side of the Atlantic about when and in what circumstances certain weapons would be used. Alliance risked confusing itself and dangerously misleading USSR. Hypothetical discussion was in any event unreal. Should Alliance not repeat not simply say that, in event of aggression, Soviet force would be met by whatever means and in whatever degree was required for a successful defence?

6. Rusk said NATO could not repeat not be satisfied with present position of its forces. It should not repeat not postpone meeting the minimum military requirements while continuing to review its strategic concepts. Such a review was necessary because NATO forces in being were of such a nature as to tend to propel the Alliance in an emergency towards recourse to nuclear weapons. Progress had to be made beyond the concept of an immediate thermonuclear response to one of a more flexible, rational response. This meant improving the conventional forces of the Alliance while paying continuing attention to maintaining nuclear forces. The Alliance should undertake an exercise in analysis with a view to arriving at a new consensus on strategic ends and means. This should be related to planning cycle now beginning in the Military Committee for developing 1969 force goals. 1963 should be a year in which the Alliance moved to meet its present force goals; the allies had an obligation to demonstrate to one another that each was pulling its weight and devoting a full share of its growing resources to defence. This affected the signals which West sent to Moscow. It was important to demonstrate unity and determination of Alliance in order "to avoid the crime of tempting thieves." He was deeply concerned about what interpretation Soviet intelligence might be placing on existing allied attitudes towards meeting defence obligations. While USA was not repeat not suggesting inflexible ratios or neglect of particular problems of individual members of the Alliance, governments could hardly expect the share of GNP which they devoted to defence to decline as weapons costs rose. Indeed they should expect that defence expenditures would rise as GNP increased. If others thought USA was too insistent on this point they should remember that USA too was a member of the club. USA maintained a million men outside its borders who would rather be doing something else, supported by taxes which USA citizens would prefer not repeat not to have to pay.

7. USA intended to continue to provide information on nuclear planning to the Alliance and would shortly be ready to convey a further instalment. "Technical" exposition of the seaborne multilateral MRBM force concept was part of USA contribution to discussion within the Alliance on nuclear matters. USA considered that a seaborne force could constitute a useful way to bring about a responsible and effective deployment of MRBMs without raising insuperable political problems. USA would normally expect to participate in such a force, in same way as it participated in all the major forces of the Alliance. On the other hand, the Administration would be prepared to look "with complete sympathy" on the concept of a purely European multilateral force, although he could not repeat not conceive of separate nuclear actions within the Alliance on a national basis and therefore considered that all Alliance nuclear forces would have to be closely integrated. A seaborne force would cost a lot. USA would do its share but "major burdens" would have to be borne by others. These would be in addition to burdens arising from meeting conventional force goals.

8. McNamara's statement was virtually identical with printed text in C-M(62)115. Because of its classification we will not repeat not attempt to give an extended summary here. His thesis was that, with the two major powers approaching a balance in the strategic nuclear deterrent, the significance of conventional forces increased. USA was spending $15 billion a year on maintaining the Western strategic deterrent. It would continue to do so. USA considered that further Western expenditures on strategic deterrence would be a diversion of resources; marginal utility of its own further expenditures on improving the nuclear deterrent was decreasing. Therefore the Alliance should concentrate on improving its conventional forces. If existing goals were met, the forces available would be adequate to repel the form of limited Soviet aggression which was more likely to take place in an age of nuclear balance when there was less risk of either massive nuclear attack or massive conventional attack on a scale which would inevitably provoke a Western nuclear response. At the moment, allied forces in Europe fell between two strategic stools. They were too big if only a tripwire were required; on the other hand they were too small to resist limited Soviet aggression by conventional means. Furthermore, USA was carrying its full share of common defence burden while Europeans were not repeat not. For all these reasons he suggested a review of NATO strategic concepts during the coming year.

9. Thorneycroft's reaction was largely negative. He agreed to the suggestion that there should be a fresh look at NATO strategy. However, he said there were limits to what NATO countries could or ought to spend on defence. UK was actually spending 7.4 percent of its GNP and thought 7 percent about right. Certainly it did not repeat not intend to spend much more than the present GNP share. Communist threat was world-wide. Therefore the defence efforts of NATO countries could not repeat not be entirely concentrated in the narrow West European area no repeat no matter how vital. Present UK action in Borneo showed the need for readily available forces to meet threats outside Europe.<sup>65</sup> Sometimes members of the Alliance were asked to strengthen conventional forces, sometimes nuclear forces, and sometimes both. But all NATO planning since 1957 had been based on unrealistic assumptions about forces to be made available. It was premature to make decisions about the balance between nuclear and conventional forces within the Alliance, and whether certain targets should be covered by NATO forces or non-NATO forces. First step in a strategic reassessment was to complete the standing group's study of the long-term threat. It might turn out that the answer was not repeat not the goals in MC26/4. Realistic plans could only be based on the forces which actually would be available rather than on forces "devoutly to be wished for." Commanders' present force requirements never could and never would be met. Alliance therefore had either to accept a gap or to attempt a reconciliation. For his part he preferred a private confrontation between NATO Commanders and Defence Ministers of the Alliance in some much smaller forum than the Ministerial Meeting. Private talks should be blunt. Both sides might have to move but this was better than pretending that gap did not repeat not exist. Object should be "realizable" force goals.

10. The most important point made by Italian Defence Minister was to reaffirm that his government was in principle in favour of a multilateral MRBM force. Remainder of his statement was largely devoted to describing the progress Italy was making in improving the state of its forces and in arguing that the defence burden fell particularly heavily on countries like Italy with a low per capita income. He suggested that Triennial Review procedures should be modified in order to bring military requirements and national plans more closely into line. German spokesman spoke briefly, did not repeat not raise MRBM question and indicated readiness to accept review of strategic concepts asked for by McNamara. Netherlands Defence Minister supported Thorneycroft's "realistic" approach. He criticized NATO requirements planning as not repeat not effective and flexible enough. As to GNP concept as a measure of burden-sharing, he said that no repeat no single international yardstick was valid. The special difficulties of individual countries had to be taken into account. He stressed difficulties smaller countries faced in acquiring modern military equipment and criticized the slow progress being made in coordinating research development and production within the Alliance. This argument was echoed by Belgian Minister who asked that clear cut strategic decisions be taken, since small countries particularly could not repeat not afford both nuclear and conventional forces.

11. Mr. Harkness accepted McNamara's suggestion for a review of NATO strategic concepts. He said that Canada looked for further information and discussion on MRBM question in Council. He reviewed Canadian foreign exchange crisis and effect of June emergency measures on the defence programme, noting that both in Triennial Review and elsewhere, the NATO military authorities recognized that Canada was meeting its commitments despite the emergency. He referred to need for continuing improvement in Canada's current account position. From this point of view he stressed importance of increased military procurement by the allies in Canada. As to GNP concept, military goals of the Alliance were stated in physical terms. Canada had met its physical commitments and preferred to view the problem from this point of view rather than from the point of view of devoting a particular share of its GNP to defence.

12. Ministers adopted the 1962 resolution on defence in C-M(62)124 (Revised) without change. Acting Secretary-General said that Ministers' statements, particularly where they dealt with suggestions for further studies to be undertaken, would be referred to the Permanent Council for further action.

NATO POLITICAL CONSULTATION AND "CRISIS MANAGEMENT"

Although ministerial political consultation concluded on an optimistic note in view of (a) support given to USA handling of Cuban crisis and consequent general feeling of increased Alliance solidarity as well as (b) obvious signs of disarray in Communist bloc and necessity for Soviets to pause before they could expect their threats to be considered credible after having publicly to withdraw their missiles from Cuba, USA Government at various levels has expressed concern about capability of NATO permanent machinery to cope with an emergency. In this connection please see particularly extracts from record of Rusk's opening statement to Council December 13 given in my immediately following telegram.†

2. I thought that I should also report comments made to me privately by Rusk during Secretary-General's luncheon at which I found myself sitting beside him concerning NATO consultation and what is now currently referred to in Washington as crisis management. Rusk said that experience over Cuban crisis had shown that NATO Council was ill-equipped to keep up with pace of developments in a crisis and that remedies should be sought as a matter of urgency to enable Council to function more effectively in any future emergency.

3. Main features which Rusk thought were apparent in NATO Council were (a) absence of authoritative expression of governmental views in Council and (b) slowness of communication between national representatives and their governments.

4. As regards (a) Rusk wondered whether it might not be necessary to have Cabinet Ministers take over in a crisis. When I pointed out differences between governmental structures among Allies and difficulties even under American system of having spokesmen of President in sufficiently close touch with Washington in view of geographical separation and fact that any minister absent from his home base inevitably gets out of touch in a political sense with his administration, Rusk admitted that perhaps (a) and (b) needed to be considered together and that remedies should be sought primarily through improvements in communication between national representatives and governments.

5. Rusk emphasized requirement that in a crisis authoritative governmental views should be exchanged if policies are to be effectively coordinated through Council and also that governmental authority has to be sought quickly for coordinated action in an emergency including authorization of alerts.

6. My private discussion with Rusk was inconclusive and led only to a comment that he would expect Council to explore improvements in methods of communication between Permanent Representatives and Governments by such methods as trans-Atlantic phone scramblers and/or teleprinter methods. I should stress that Rusk's comment was not repeat not in any way critical of Canada's role but was related to functioning of NATO permanent machinery and to his concern that it should be rendered more efficient if it is to play an effective role in inter-governmental consultations in future emergencies.

7. In addition Finletter had earlier raised question of improved communications between NATO civil and military authorities to enable Council to exercise its responsibilities in an emergency. He suggested that Council study setting up a special communications room in which members of Council could be kept in touch with facts of a developing crisis, getting sitreps from NATO commands by teletype. This would presumably involve common financing.

8. As Rusk made it clear that he intended following this up (and as his remarks in C-VR(62)58 will generate a paper on subject by international staff) I should be grateful if consideration might be given to problems raised in this telegram. In doing so you might care to have following comments. To begin with there was no repeat no real attempt to consult Council over Cuba (or for that matter even to carry on proper consultation under bilateral Canadian/US agreements) so Cuban case cannot repeat not fairly be taken as an example. I should nevertheless be bound to admit that consultation might well not repeat not have proved very fruitful under present arrangements. This is a problem of long standing. Originally there was resistance to consultation on matters outside NATO area, but since Oslo meeting<sup>66</sup> this resistance has virtually disappeared as a matter of principle. In practice however there has been considerable reluctance to consult on grounds of security. Communications problem to which Mr. Rusk referred exists, but save in a few cases it is a problem not repeat not of speed but of security. Until consultations can be kept secret from other side there can be advance planning only at risk of USSR too knowing about what is going on (as over Berlin) as evidence of firmness of purpose. Obviously such security problems can be discussed only in a bilateral or a trilateral context, not repeat not in NATO. Perhaps USA will come forward with proposals in

NATO MINISTERIAL MEETING, PARIS, DECEMBER 1962

The mood of this year's NATO Ministerial Meeting was one of solidarity and of crisis satisfactorily surmounted. The main problems of the future political and military policy of the Alliance remained but on this occasion it was the strengths of the Alliance that held Ministers' attention.

2. Attached for your information is a copy of a Departmental paper which examines, in the light of the recent NATO Ministerial Meeting in Paris, the main problems in the political and military field that are likely to face the Western Alliance in the coming months. This paper outlines what appear to be the likely questions for decisions at the next Ministerial Meeting to be held in Ottawa May 21-23, 1963. You will already have received in Selected Document No. 51 of December 19, 1962,† a summary of the Meeting and the text of the speech made by the Minister in Paris (Telegrams DL-1782 of December 18, 1962,† from Ottawa; 2937 of December 14, 1962,† from NATO Paris; 2935 of December 14, 1962,† from NATO Paris; and 2880 of December 6, 1962†). We are including with this paper the text of the Minister's statement to the House of Commons on December 17, 1962,† and the text of the communiqué issued at the end of the Paris Meeting.<sup>67</sup>

Paris, December, 1962

NATO MINISTERIAL MEETING, PARIS, DECEMBER 1962

Political Discussion

In the field of East-West relations some members of the Alliance urged a new look at Western negotiating positions on Berlin against the day when realistic negotiations could begin, while others suggested that until the Soviet Union indicated a willingness to negotiate realistically, no action should be taken on the part of the Western powers. The set pieces on this subject delivered by the Foreign Ministers were relatively routine and provoked little discussion. There appeared to be four main reasons for this. First, the shape of Europe and therefore the whole future interrelationships of the Western world remained unresolved, pending the outcome of the current negotiations between the Six and Britain. Secondly, many important aspects of relations between members of the Alliance were being dealt with on a bilateral basis and indeed the Ministerial Meeting itself took place at a time when Prime Minister Macmillan was in Paris to see General de Gaulle, Dr. Adenauer had just visited President Kennedy, and Mr. Macmillan and President Kennedy were about to meet in the Bahamas. Thirdly, as a result of the success of the regular consultations on current international problems in the Political Advisers Committee, and because of the lessening of differences within the Alliance on "colonial problems," there was relative agreement on political problems not strictly related to East-West negotiations and the future of Europe. Fourthly, the German Government had in the weeks previous to Paris been undergoing re-organization and therefore the Alliance was not in a position to press for new initiatives on a Berlin settlement.

2. It is likely that the period of transition within the Alliance, caused by the uncertainty over the future of Europe, will continue for some time and will limit the amount of useful work that can be done in the Council on the subject of East-West relations unless there is a major change in the policy of the Soviet Union. With a view to reaching decisions at the Ministerial Meeting in Ottawa in May, it is possible that some progress can be made now on:

(a) political contingency planning for Berlin

(b) reviewing Western negotiating positions on Berlin and perhaps on the wider aspects of European security

(c) improving consultation in Council on global long range policy planning.

3.(a) There appears to be a fair degree of support from the Italians, Scandinavians, Dutch and Belgians for discussions in Council on what political action should be taken to meet a political initiative by the Soviet Union on Berlin such as the signing of a separate peace treaty or the convoking of a German peace conference. Contingency planning until now has remained a responsibility of the Ambassadorial Working Group in Washington (U.S., Britain, France, West Germany) and in this forum France has been able to hold up meaningful consideration of political contingency planning. There appears little likelihood that progress on political contingency planning can be made unless the discussion is somehow brought into the Council. The best method of achieving this objective would appear to be if Canada and likeminded members of the Alliance instead of waiting for the Ambassadorial Working Group to produce papers were themselves to introduce in Council their own views and perhaps plans on what the Alliance might do in the case of Soviet initiative on Berlin. If this were to be done it might circumvent the French, produce a useful clarification of the problems involved and eventually lead to an agreed catalogue of political contingency plans for possible use by the Western powers. It may be a worthwhile objective to try to have this catalogue of contingency plans ready for approval by the time of the Spring Ministerial Meeting in Ottawa.

4.(b) The meeting in Paris brought out fairly clearly the range of views on the subject of whether or not to negotiate with the Soviet Union in the coming months. Mr. Spaak believed the West to be in a favourable diplomatic position and the USSR in a weakened one, and it was possible therefore that sensible suggestions from the West might have some appeal to the Soviet Union. He also thought that despite the contradictory nature of some of Khrushchev's recent remarks, there were some ideas worth following up, that in any case the Alliance should study the proposals on Berlin put forward in 1961 and be prepared to negotiate when the time comes. Mr. Rusk stated that U.S. talks with the Russians on Berlin had shown that the Soviet Union was not prepared to think of any solution that rested upon the continued presence of Western forces in Berlin and, since this was the case, Russia would have to change its position before realistic negotiations could begin. The initiative, therefore, for renewed negotiations rested with the Soviet Union. The French for their part still considered that now was not the time to participate in negotiations with the Soviet Union and that it was far better to wait and see and leave the initiative on Berlin to the Russians.

5. It is clear that at present there is no consensus within the Alliance concerning negotiations with the Soviet Union and also that until the Soviet Union has finished its own policy re-appraisal there is unlikely to be any progress in the U.S.-USSR dialogue on Berlin. It had been hoped that the final communiqué would indicate a more forthcoming attitude on the part of the NATO Alliance with respect to a resumption of the dialogue with the Soviet Union on Berlin. However, the French Delegation in the drafting committee resisted this and in the event the text of the communiqué on East-West relations was relatively meaningless. The most sensible course, therefore, would appear to be to look at the plans put before the Council in 1961, clear our own minds as to whether they remain valid as realistic negotiating positions for the West and, if not, bring them up-to-date.

6.(c) Mr. Rusk suggested that before the next Spring meeting there should be an exchange of views in Council on "how to adapt NATO procedures on consultation in an effort to agree on certain common policies to be carried out by the Alliance in certain eventualities, so that NATO decisions would not be delayed." He suggested that senior policy makers from the USA and other governments might visit the Council regularly to explain the reasons for policy and that more importance should be given to the long-term policy planning discussions in the Atlantic Policy Advisory Group. It appears that the USA envisages improved consultation to mean a regular flow of information to the other members of the Alliance on USA policy so that when the USA asks its allies for support on the basis of these consultations it will expect to receive such support. The arguments against such a concept of consultations are many and we, along with other members of the Alliance, should make clear in Council that, as was stated by the Committee of Three in 1956, "consultation within the Alliance is more than an exchange of information, it is more than letting Council know about national decisions already taken, or trying to enlist support for those decisions. It means discussion of problems in the early stages of policy formation before national positions become fixed."

Military Questions

7. The future direction of NATO military strategy received the main attention at the Paris meeting and Ministers were left in no doubt by the major military commanders that the forces under their command were deficient and well below agreed force plans. The U.S. Delegation made its expected attack on the disparity between USA and European defence efforts; it supported a NATO forward strategy by means of a build-up of conventional forces. As Mr. McNamara put it,

“In our view, no single step open to us could so profoundly affect the strategic balance and enhance the security of us all, and each of us individually, as the creation of the capacity for effective non-nuclear defense. We have a superior nuclear shield and we must forge an effective non-nuclear sword. With these weapons on hand, we shall be better prepared to avoid the disastrous choice between a surrender of our vital interests and the devastation of a nuclear war.”

and [he] asked that the Alliance re-examine NATO's strategic concepts. The European reaction was muted either for reasons of domestic politics (Germany had just acquired a new Minister of Defence), because of bilateral disagreements on defence matters (the Skybolt controversy between the USA and the UK had just become public), because, as in the case of France, of a fundamental disagreement with the USA on defence policy or, as was the case for some of the smaller countries, because of confusion about the meaning of current USA military strategy and an inability to reconcile national defence policies with the increasingly high cost of modern armaments.

8. The meeting agreed to re-examine NATO's strategic concepts and this should prove a well worth while exercise if it can clear the minds of the members of the Alliance as to just what their individual military roles can be in the next decade. The Kennedy administration after it had reviewed the military posture of the USA in 1961 decided to build up conventional forces so that the USA could, anywhere in the world, react quickly, force a pause and avoid having to face the choice of whether or not to use nuclear weapons at the early stages of a crisis. This doctrine appears sound and reasonable when seen from Washington within the context of American leadership of the free world with a responsibility for a global “pax Americana.” However, when applied to Europe it comes up against a number of national factors that must be taken into account by the USA if NATO is to succeed in establishing a true forward strategy particularly in central Europe.

9. The more important factors are: (1) the three European countries who must provide the bulk of the forces for this strategy for differing national reasons disagree with USA policy. Britain for reasons of limited manpower, heavy reliance on tactical nuclear weapons and commitments outside the NATO area does not wish to bring its forces in Europe up to strength with conventional weapons. France is acquiring its own national nuclear forces and has kept a large part of its ground forces within the national borders of France rather than permitting them to move into more forward areas. Germany has had a Defence Minister who fundamentally disagrees with the USA strategy and believes that to have a credible deterrent, NATO nuclear forces must be deployed forward in Central Europe. (2) There is confusion in the minds of many European countries about what is meant by a build-up of conventional forces. Presumably the USA means by this a modernization of present weapons systems to provide increased mobility and fire power to be able to cope with dangerous situations quickly before they begin to escalate. However, to many European countries the build-up of conventional forces conjures up a return to mass land armies of national conscripts. (3) Smaller European countries do not see what their defence role is to be in the next decade and how best they can supply their own small contributions as part of a forward NATO strategy. (4) Many countries have been confused by the changes in USA military doctrine in the last decade. After the crash programme to deploy nuclear warheads and IRBMs in Europe in 1957, they are now being told that what is needed is modern conventional forces. There is some truth in Mr. Thorneycroft's remark that “sometimes we are encouraged to improve our conventional forces, sometimes to improve our nuclear forces and sometimes both.” (5) There is a general feeling amongst most members of NATO that USA has decided its military strategy first and is now trying to sell it to its various allies. They are therefore inclined to view the current review of NATO strategy concepts not so much as a review but as a vehicle for the USA to persuade its NATO allies of a strategy already decided in Washington. (6) The formation of a multilateral nuclear force remains unresolved.

10. The Nassau Declaration, which was issued immediately after the Paris meeting, appears likely to bring about a change in the nature of the discussions on NATO defence planning. One of the main problems in the next six months will be for the Alliance to try to reconcile the discussions on “forward strategy” and the build-up of conventional forces, the study of procedures to reduce the gap between NATO military requirements and national forces, plans [for] the formation of a NATO multilateral nuclear force, and the part to be played by its members in the strategic decisions of the Alliance.

11. In his address to the NATO Council, Mr. McNamara reversed the old concept of “sword and shield” and USA strategic doctrine now calls for “an effective non-nuclear sword” to complement a “superior nuclear shield.” There appears to be little doubt that as a result of Cuba the USA is convinced that the West must have a large range of conventional forces so that the choice of non-nuclear response is sufficiently wide to avoid the extremes of either surrender or nuclear war. The main difficulty for the USA will be to persuade other members of the Alliance to face the necessity of a build-up of conventional forces, particularly now that after the Nassau Agreement discussions in NATO on defence strategy are tending to concentrate on the future shape of NATO nuclear forces.

CALL BY AMBASSADOR BUTTERWORTH ON THE PRIME MINISTER

The new American Ambassador, Mr. W.W. Butterworth, paid his first call on the Prime Minister at 9.00 a.m. on December 17. The conversation lasted about 20 minutes and the atmosphere of the meeting could be described as correct and proper. None of the current Canadian-U.S. bilateral problems was raised by either the Ambassador or the Prime Minister and the conversation centred almost exclusively on the question of British accession to the Common Market.

2. In his introductory remarks welcoming Mr. Butterworth to Ottawa, the Prime Minister commented that the Ambassador would be in the company of a number of other Rhodes scholars in Ottawa, both in the House of Commons and in the Civil Service. Mr. Butterworth noted that in the past in the United States, particularly when the Chicago Sun was carrying on a campaign against Rhodes scholars, this was not always an advantage. This reminded the Prime Minister of Col. McCormick of the Tribune and of the antics of the former Mayor Thompson of that city.<sup>1</sup>

3. The Prime Minister opened serious discussion by asking if the Ambassador could give any information concerning the forthcoming Bahamas talks between President Kennedy and Prime Minister Macmillan. Mr. Butterworth countered by stating that he had left Washington before this meeting had been arranged and therefore knew nothing about the agenda or the briefs being prepared for President Kennedy. In reply to a further question from Mr. Diefenbaker concerning the recent speech by Dean Acheson<sup>2</sup> and its possible effect on this meeting,

Mr. Butterworth said he hoped Mr. Diefenbaker had read the entire statement. He believed that Mr. Acheson's remarks in full context could not possibly create serious difficulties at the Nassau meetings.

4. Again in reply to a question from the Prime Minister, Mr. Butterworth said he had no information concerning the recent Macmillan-de Gaulle conversations<sup>3</sup> but from his personal knowledge of the French leader he could not anticipate a change in the French position, especially after de Gaulle's recent election triumphs.<sup>4</sup>

5. The Prime Minister then asked the Ambassador for his own personal view as to whether or not Britain would join the Common Market. Mr. Butterworth replied that while he realized negotiations would be difficult to the very end he believed the final result would be that Britain would join the Six.

6. On the question of agriculture and temperate foodstuffs, Mr. Butterworth commented that the United States and Canada appear to find themselves in the same position insofar as British entry is concerned. He mentioned wheat specifically and said that if the Six set a high internal price, this could inevitably [sic] result in over-production leading to subsidized exports which would create serious difficulties for other exporting nations. The Ambassador said that in fact one of the key questions which will determine the basic economic philosophy of the Common Market countries is the price to be fixed for the producer of agricultural products. If this is low it will mean the community has adopted an outward-looking constructive attitude; if the price is too high it will indicate that these countries have settled for an inward-looking protective entity which will eventually create economic difficulties for themselves and for the United States and Canada, as well as other countries. At this point he mentioned that the German attitude rather than the French is the key to this particular difficulty, although in his view the way the community is developing if five of the six take a strong stand on such a basic issue, the pattern is that the sixth country will eventually prove accommodating.

7. Mr. Butterworth said that he does not believe the French are any more strongly opposed to British entry than some of the other countries; however, the French have consistently taken the view that Britain must pay the full entrance fee and annual membership dues to the club. At this point the Prime Minister questioned the Ambassador's previous assessment that Britain eventually would join. He asked how the proper safeguards promised at the Commonwealth Prime Ministers' Conference could be reconciled to the present attitude of the Six as exemplified by the French. Mr. Butterworth said that Britain was well aware of the basic terms for entry when application for membership was made and while Britain would certainly work out the best possible arrangement for her Commonwealth and EFTA partners, nevertheless Britain would perforce be required to go a long way toward meeting the terms of the Six. At this point the Prime Minister said there was certainly no such understanding during the September conference of the Prime Ministers in London. He added that while countries outside the Commonwealth have over the years been unhappy with the system of Commonwealth preferences, nevertheless this system had built up a community of interests, the value of which was perhaps under-estimated by other countries. Mr. Butterworth quickly professed that he was not speaking as an advocate for the Six and added he himself had a good understanding of the Commonwealth because of his long service in London and in Ottawa where he had seen the Ottawa Agreements signed in the early thirties.<sup>5</sup>

8. The Prime Minister then asked Mr. Butterworth's views on the transitional arrangements for Commonwealth countries as proposed by the Six. The Ambassador in reply did not go into detail but emphasized that in his assessment the concept of the CET constituted at present the one basic unifying force within the Six. He said each country recognized that it is essential to adhere without deviation to the Common Tariff, at least until other institutions such as the common monetary policy can be developed. He added that there may be differences in emphasis among the Six concerning this principle, but there is no reason to believe that any significant modification can be anticipated for any newcomer wishing to join the Club.

9. The conversation ended at this point with an exchange on deep-sea fishing – the relative merits of tarpon as compared to blue marlin. Mr. Diefenbaker thanked the Ambassador for calling on him and once again wished him well at his new post. Mr. Butterworth in turn expressed his appreciation for the talk and reiterated that he would be at the disposal of the Prime Minister at all times.

My dear Colleague:

I refer to your letter of 30 March, 1961,<sup>7</sup> relative to the proposed agreement with the United States Government governing the provision of stockpiles of nuclear warheads for Canadian forces. In your letter you proposed that appropriate officials of our two departments undertake "to prepare a revision of the draft agreement in such a way that it would deal with this problem as a whole by providing that the detailed procedures governing storage, release from storage, and authorization of use of the various weapons systems should be set out in a series of Schedules, one for each type of warhead to be made available, which would form an integral part of a comprehensive agreement."

Subsequent to receipt of your letter interdepartmental discussions and exchanges of proposed drafts occurred, and it is my understanding that you have given your approval to the latest draft and forwarded it to the Prime Minister for his concurrence. A copy of this latest draft has been made available to my department.

Since the time when the original drafts were prepared, agreement has been reached with the United States whereby Canada acquired F101 aircraft to replace the CF-100 in the Air Defence force. The F101 is equipped to carry bomber-destroying missiles using atomic warheads.

Since nuclear weapons began to be made available for air defence a few years ago, there has been a steady reduction in the numbers of interceptors of various types programmed for the air defence forces of the United States and Canada. You will recall, for example, the very large cut-back effected last year by the United States in the Bomarc B programme. In our case, in addition to accepting a reduction of 75 percent in the missile strength originally contemplated for the two Canadian Bomarc bases, we are now in the process of replacing 162 CF-100 air defence interceptors with only 66 CF-101 interceptors – which number resulted purely from availability and is short of operational requirements. These reductions are to only a small extent justified by a decrease in the estimated bomber threat. The real justification stems from the equipping of these various weapons with nuclear armament. Without such armament, the combined strength of the United States and Canadian air defence forces would be woefully inadequate, resulting in an obvious and serious gap in our deterrent posture.

In addition to significantly increasing the kill potential of any given air defence force, nuclear air defence weapons generally are designed to destroy not only the bomber but also the bombs it is carrying, with only minor release of radioactive fall-out materials. Considering the fact that any bombers brought down by our CF-101 interceptors would most likely be over Canadian territory and in the general vicinity of our most populated areas, and that any bombs these aircraft carried which were not destroyed by the air defence weapons would most likely produce a full-scale ground level nuclear detonation, the desirability of employing nuclear weapons on our interceptors is, it seems to me, most obvious.

One additional point that should be considered is that these F-101 interceptors were made available to Canada by the United States for use in our mutual defence, out of and with a resultant reduction in their own operational air defence inventory. Before their transfer, these aircraft were equipped with nuclear weapons and made a significant contribution to our mutual defence posture. If we should now limit the armament of these aircraft to non-nuclear weapons, the result would be a significant reduction in NORAD's defence capability.

For the foregoing reasons I would ask that the proposed agreement with the United States be expanded to include arrangements for the provision of nuclear air-to-air weapons for Canadian CF-101 interceptors. To that end I enclose herewith a draft Schedule for inclusion in the agreement,† which has been composed to correspond to the form and content of the other Schedule as last drafted by your department.

Yours sincerely,

DOUGLAS S. HARKNESS

PRIME MINISTER'S REQUEST FOR INFORMATION ON DEFENCE MATTERS

I attach an outline which I discussed yesterday with Mr. Ignatieff and D.L.(1) Division and on which I had not then had an opportunity to consult the Prime Minister. Mr. Diefenbaker gave me certain comments this morning.

2. With a view to Parliamentary requirements, the Prime Minister is preparing himself to meet opposition criticism on this matter. The purpose of the present enquiry is to assist him in answering the question: "Why can't we be more decisive?" He wishes to show that, no matter how effectively governments may plan the various aspects of their defence programmes, changing circumstances and requirements often necessitate cancellations and adjustments which could not have been foreseen in the planning stage. Exact future needs cannot always be predicted, and major expenditures on defence weaponry may turn out to be wasted in the light of changes in the threat and in the response required. The Prime Minister is thinking of arms programmes in general and particularly nuclear weapons.

3. To illustrate the dilemma, the Prime Minister would like to have available factual information which would enable him to show that other governments have in the past several years found themselves obliged to abandon major weapons programmes, to embark on fresh allocations of their resources, and to tolerate the financial implications of such decisions. The examples which the Prime Minister gave are the Blue Streak programme in the United Kingdom and, on a smaller scale, the recent British decision not to proceed with the offer of bombs for Canberra aircraft in the Congo. In discussing this, however, the Prime Minister said that he had seen reports of equally relevant and more substantial cancellations and adjustments affecting the United States. He thought he recalled an article (which we should try to trace) in the Christian Science Monitor, analyzing the weapons programmes which had had to be abandoned or cut back at enormous cost to the United States Treasury.<sup>8</sup> The foregoing information should, I think, be prepared in a memorandum, double spaced, in a form which the Prime Minister could readily adapt for use in the House.<sup>9</sup>

BOMARCS — POSSIBLE ALTERNATIVES

The arrangement at present contemplated is that the question of nuclear warheads for the BOMARCS will be one part of a package deal covering various nuclear warheads for the use of the Canadian Armed Forces; that the two BOMARC squadrons will be manned and operated by the RCAF with a small U.S. custodial detachment at each site, the United States retaining ownership of the warheads until such time as they are released from storage for use by the RCAF.

2. Possible alternatives to the foregoing are as follows:

(1) To separate the BOMARCs from the package and to conclude with the United States a separate agreement covering them. This would have the advantage of paving the way to settling the most glaring instance of the dilemma over nuclear weapons. It would also provide evidence of good faith to honour our commitments to strengthen the continental air defence system, and also get us out of an increasingly embarrassing situation in our defence relations with the United States which is contributing $77 million to the project as against Canada's $13 million. On the other hand, the conclusion of a separate agreement would compromise the Canadian Government's position insofar as it rests on the case against the proliferation of nuclear weapons beyond the existing nuclear powers and while disarmament negotiations are going on. There would be immediate pressure from the RCAF presumably to proceed with air-to-air rockets for the Voodoos and the 104s, from the Army for the Honest Johns, and so forth, once the position of principle were breached. A further disadvantage would be the difficulty of explaining convincingly to the public why it is necessary to proceed with the BOMARCs and not with the others, and would leave the Government vulnerable to criticisms of attacking the problem on an ad hoc basis.

However, a very good case – and one capable of effective and convincing public presentation – can be made for considering that the implications of giving the BOMARC a nuclear head would relate exclusively to the armament of the Voodoos. It is quite arguable that the air defence of North America requires, for the protection of Canadian and American cities and of the Strategic Air Command, the use of the more effective protection of nuclear warheads. This same factor does not govern the employment of strike aircraft or tactical ground-to-ground weapons in Europe or anti-submarine weapons; these are separate problems which must be examined separately and to which a different set of governing considerations seem to apply.

(2) To equip the BOMARCs with conventional warheads. This would have the advantage of avoiding the political complications attendant upon the acquisition of nuclear warheads, but would be unacceptable to the RCAF on technical grounds. Moreover, although it appears that a conventional warhead for the BOMARC B was designed, no prototype was ever developed and tested, let alone produced in quantity. To embark upon a programme of conventional warheads would not only take time but would cost a good deal of money. Since according to our information the USAF BOMARC B squadrons are not being equipped with conventional warheads and the USAF is not interested in such warheads, it would be difficult, if not impossible, to work out a cost-sharing formula with the United States.

(3) To turn over the two Canadian squadrons to the USAF. This would enable Canada to maintain a position of principle against the acquisition of nuclear warheads and at the same time would strengthen the continental air defence system in the manner intended. It is conceivable that the USAF, which attach much importance to this matter, would be willing to undertake this commitment. On the other hand, it is open to a number of objections: for example, it would involve stationing more U.S. Forces in Canada, would substantially reduce the degree of control Canada could exercise over the storage arrangements, release and use of the weapons, and might be as difficult to justify publicly as the present proposed arrangement.

(4) To work out an arrangement with the United States whereby the warheads would remain in the United States on the undertaking that in the event the international situation should deteriorate seriously, the two governments would consult immediately with a view to determining whether the risk of an attack were sufficiently great to warrant placing the forces under NORAD in a state of alert, which state would involve as one of its predetermined measures the arming of the BOMARCs with the warheads which would be flown by air from the U.S.A. One advantage of such an arrangement would be that it could be tied to the agreement which already exists with the United States on the question of increasing the state of alert of NORAD forces. Also since the period of warning for a bomber attack is expected to be in terms of hours rather than minutes (as in the case of ICBMs) it might be less objectionable from a military point of view. This idea is based on the kind of arrangement which Norway has with the U.S.A. and might be objectionable to the USAF and RCAF on technical grounds, i.e., the length of time it might take to transport the warheads to the BOMARC sites and have the weapons made ready for firing. It would also be objectionable on more general grounds since it does not take into account the possibility of a surprise attack, in which event the BOMARCs would be caught unarmed.

(5) Leave matters as they are. Such a course can be justified on the grounds that it is wise to acquire the necessary hardware and to be in a position to acquire nuclear warheads if and when circumstances dictate the advisability of such a course. The principle objections to doing nothing are primarily political in nature as the Government is left open to the charge of having acquired an expensive weapon system which could not be used should North America be attacked by manned bombers before the necessary agreements are concluded, and that as a consequence until such time as the BOMARCs are given a nuclear capability the Canadian people are not being provided with any additional defence for the investment the BOMARCs represent.

The foregoing comments are of course based on the assumption that it is too late to reverse the decision to acquire BOMARCs, and that as a consequence they must be considered to be an integral part of the continental air defence system.<sup>11</sup>

NUCLEAR WEAPONS FOR THE CF-101s

You asked that we examine the draft schedule covering nuclear weapons for the CF-101s, forwarded to you by the Minister of National Defence under cover of his letter to you of December 19, with a view to ascertaining whether it is within the letter and spirit of the "Swap Deal" Agreement and whether it is similar in form and content to the other schedules as they stand.

<sup>11</sup> Notes marginales :/Marginal notes:
Noted. [N.A.] R[obertson]
Mr. Ritchie to see. N. [A. Robertson]

The Exchange of Notes of June 12, 1961 (the “Swap Deal”)<sup>12</sup> refers to the question of armament only in paragraph 1A(3) of the Memorandum of Understanding which reads as follows:

“(3) furnish for the 66 F-101B aircraft spares and other related equipment including flight simulators and a mobile training unit, to a total cost of U.S. $32.7 million, and armament as mutually agreed. The cost of all items transferred to Canada under this paragraph (I.(A)(3)) will be shared on the basis of the United States paying one third. Title to all items transferred to Canada under the provisions of this paragraph (I.(A)(3)) shall be vested in Canada.”

The significance of this paragraph derives from the particular circumstances in which the Swap Deal was concluded. You will recall that the final negotiations were only able to proceed once the State Department had been able to convince the United States Department of Defence that nuclear armament for the F-101Bs should not be a pre-condition to the conclusion of the Exchange of Notes. In these final negotiations it was agreed that the interests of each Government would not be served by attempting to draft language which would commit either government to the nature of the armament one way or another, and that this matter should be left for negotiation at a later date.

In a memorandum which you sent to the Prime Minister on the final negotiations of this agreement the above paragraph is commented on as follows:

“Armament of the F-101B

“The question of the armament of the F-101B aircraft is referred to only in Article I(A)(3), wherein provision is made that the cost of the armament will be shared on a two-thirds – one-third basis and that title to the armament furnished will be vested in Canada. By implication the transfer of title means that the armament is conventional, since by U.S. law title to nuclear armaments cannot be transferred. In any case this point could be made explicit in any statement made in the House of Commons on this agreement. Consideration was given to the possibility of designating explicitly the armament to be provided, but this was found not to be feasible since the weapons to be obtained from time to time cannot all be specified in advance.”

You will recall that when the Prime Minister announced the Swap Deal in the House he said that “These aircraft ... will be armed with conventional weapons.”<sup>13</sup>

As to the question of whether the draft schedule is similar to the other schedules, the RCAF have followed closely the format and substance of the others. Most paragraphs are the same. In others certain changes have been introduced, and paragraphs have been borrowed from different schedules to suit the particular weapon system. Attached is a copy of the draft schedule† with the particular changes noted. Passages underlined are additions made by the Department of National Defence. Passages in parenthesis are either words or phrases which have been altered or deleted from the corresponding paragraphs of the other schedules.

The following detailed comments are offered:

Introductory Paragraph

(a) “Canadian” in front of “CF-101 air defence interceptor squadrons” might either be deleted or replaced by “RCAF” for editorial uniformity with the same phrase in paragraph 1.

See Canada, House of Commons, Debates, 1960-61, Vol. 6, pp. 6179-6180.

(b) The second sentence of this paragraph does not have a counterpart in the other schedules. The term, “nuclear weapon,” is not defined in the Annex but it is there stated that, “The term ‘warhead’ includes ‘weapons’ where the two cannot practically be considered as physical separate components.” The RCAF attach importance to the addition of a definition of “nuclear weapons” in this schedule as air-to-air rockets, such as the MB-1, and the warheads for them are readily separable.

Paragraph 1

(a) The words, “the required type of,” have been deleted after “shall provide.” These should perhaps be restored for the sake of editorial uniformity with the other Schedules.

(b) The word, “the,” should be inserted before “RCAF CF-101 interceptor squadrons” for the sake of editorial uniformity with the same phrase in the introductory paragraph.

Paragraph 2

This paragraph as drafted is identical to the corresponding paragraphs in the other Schedules. However, because a “nuclear weapon” has been defined in the Introductory Paragraph, paragraph 2 will require amendment in order not to conflict with paragraph (I(A)(3)) of the Swap Deal Agreement which provides for title to the armament for the F-101s passing to Canada. The first line of the paragraph might be amended to read as follows: “Ownership of all stocks of the nuclear warheads for these weapons made available ...”.

Paragraph 3

(a) The words, “warheads for these,” have been inserted between “nuclear” and “weapons” to make it clear that maintaining and assembling the non-nuclear parts of the missiles would be a Canadian responsibility. This is an improvement.

(b) The last word of the paragraph, “base,” has been used rather than “site” as the warheads would be stored at more than one site at each RCAF station. There would be at least one storage site proper and under the terms of paragraph 4(b) quick reaction alert areas, i.e., areas where aircraft are armed and ready to take off on a moment’s notice, are also deemed to be storage sites. Thus, the U.S. detachment at each station would service both types of sites.

This paragraph corresponds to paragraph 4 of Schedule D. Provision has been made for the mating of the warhead and the rocket to be accomplished inside the inner compound. This would appear to be a useful addition because of the close connection between the warhead and the rocket.

Paragraph 10

Inasmuch as the Canadian and United States release officers are to be at the sites (see paragraphs 7 and 8) and not at “the appropriate Combat Operations Centre,” subparagraphs (b) and (d) require amendment accordingly. The relevant phrases could be altered to read, “... its respective national release officers at each site and its senior officer at the appropriate Combat Operation Centre through appropriate channels.”

Paragraph 17

The above comment applies to this paragraph as well.

Paragraph 21

The last sentence has been added, but you will recall that you asked that a similar sentence be deleted from an earlier draft of the other Schedules.

A number of self-evident editorial changes are required to be made. These can be indicated.

As we were not certain as to the reasons for which certain phrases or words have been used in this draft and to ensure that you have the most accurate information on the passages in question, we obtained clarification directly from the RCAF. We have learned informally that, under instructions from the Chief of the Air Staff, the RCAF is re-examining not only this draft but also the other Schedules of concern to the RCAF with a view to recommending, if necessary, amendments to reflect more accurately the physical arrangements being proposed, particularly as regards the storage sites, communications and security. We do not know whether the Army is similarly examining in detail the Schedule covering the Honest Johns, but you will recall that some time ago at your request we had asked the Department of National Defence to review all the Schedules as we had drafted them precisely in order to see whether they were satisfactory from the technical point of view. This they did not do at the time, mainly, we assume, because they were not prepared to accept the concept of separate Schedules for each type of warhead.

It is possible therefore that before long we may receive a complete new set of drafts of the Schedules from the Department of National Defence. If so, it would of course be necessary to examine all of them closely before the Schedules as they now stand are considered by the Cabinet. Otherwise the Cabinet might be placed in a position of having to consider two different sets of drafts.

CONFIDENTIAL

Victoria, March 7, 1962

Dear Mr. Green:

You will recall the conversation which I had with you at the Rotary Club luncheon last Thursday at Victoria. It was then that I promised to present to you several of my economic graphs, copies of certain of my political editorials and a printing of my report produced at New York on June 1, 1960, covering the cancellation by Washington of the ten American SAGE-SCC (deep-underground) projects which were to be identical in every degree to the Super-Combat-Center now nearing completion at North Bay. The original "chain" was to consist of eleven links.

I forwarded to you on the 2nd economic graphs, etc. which I am sure you will find to be of interest, and I shall enclose herewith for your personal information an additional classified copy of my SAGE-SCC report. I might mention that several copies of my report have been in Ottawa since 1960. Illuminating reports of this nature are not always released because conflicting ideas can often militate against officially accepted programs, thereby failing to separate the wheat from the chaff.

My report on SAGE-SCC, dated June 1, 1960, was the culmination of a series of warnings I had sent to Canada from New York for over a year in which I emphasized my conviction that there would occur the cancellation of ten proposed American SAGE deep-underground projects. The prompt and fearless action of cancellation by Washington should have been the policy of Canada with reference to North Bay. Canada, instead, continued the work which was then in preliminary stage, with the result that there has prevailed confusion and contradictory ambiguities surrounding the whole perplexing issue of BOMARC and nuclear warheads in general.

The turmoil now confronting nuclear weapons can be traced back to imperfect political reasoning and immature defence action which the present Ottawa government inherited to some degree from the previous federal administrators. The Diefenbaker cabinet had the courage to cancel the Avro Arrow and they should have been equally courageous in blotting out the whole North Bay project, and especially when the Department of Transport at Ottawa refused to become involved in that deep-underground operation. The "cease-work" order covering the North Bay SAGE unit could have been attributed to revised technical programs and to the changed concepts in electronics.

Had Canada abandoned the North Bay project no reason would have arisen for consideration of the contentious Bomarc principles and other related hypotheses. Whatever contribution Canada may be in a position to render, in the sphere of nuclear warfare, would be so infinitesimal as to have no practical bearing upon the nuclear offensive and defensive power of the United States in the protection of this continent. Canada should not have joined the nuclear thinking in so far as is concerned the erection of the ineffectual and perilous conception such as Canada unwisely proceeded with at North Bay. If conscience had the power, as it has the right, it would rule the world and, certainly, a combination of pro bono publico and political heroism should have removed the North Bay development from exploitation in 1959 when the United States Atomic Defence Engineering set forth in unequivocal terms that "DEEP TUNNEL PROTECTIVE CONSTRUCTION APPEARS UNWARRANTED."

When Canada's financial outlay at North Bay was considered at Washington it was the consensus that the United States Government would reimburse Ottawa to take care of all expenditures incurred. Technological revisions in electronic and nuclear patterns and programs are understood because of occurring constantly.

It was within my hearing that certain American defence authorities made clear that the SAGE-SCC chain should have been confined to American territory. They emphasized that there was no physical or scientific requirement for the North Bay installation in view of the developing capability to span right across the Canadian area by the full utilization of facilities at Sawyer in Michigan, and units of instrumentality on American soil which would "bridge" Canadian territory.

I am pleased to respond in accordance with your request that this report be sent to you under confidential cover. I have great respect for you as a man, and unbounded regard for your mental and personality faculties, political acumen and penetrating perception in analyzing the conclusions of thinking people. You are a tremendous credit to Canada in the House of Commons, in the hustings and at the United Nations. I can well imagine that you and Charles S.A. Ritchie will be an invincible "team" in dealing with the never-ending problems which are, and which must be, discussed in amicable understanding in the great triangle consisting of Ottawa, Washington and the United Nations.

It was Socrates who said: "Beware of Greeks bearing gifts." I am retired but not retiring, for gardening does not hold appeal for my efforts and energies. I do not seek favours or concessions in any sense from any political level, despite my always being interested in economic and political matters pertaining to the development of Canada. It did appear a short while ago that I would assume on pro tem. basis responsibilities in economic research but, as things stand, it is likely that I shall finish the course of my career and existence in the United States.

I would ask your confidence in maintaining the secrecy of my presentations to you on SAGE-SCC and along such other lines as I have seen fit to deal with in this writing.

With kind regards and every good wish. You and I have in common the friendship of A.C. Ashforth with whom you appeared in [a] photograph a short while ago. While in New York I had correspondence with your former very able Deputy Minister, General Young, whom I regard as being one of the most competent administrators in Canada.

Yours sincerely,

W.H. STUART

Report

REVIEW OF SAGE-SCC OPERATIONS

U.S.-CANADA JOINT DEFENCE W.H. STUART, M.E.I.C.

COVERING PERIOD: MAY 14, 1959 TO MAY 31, 1960

1. My assignment as Manager of the New York office terminated yesterday as a result of Washington having cancelled the ten SAGE-SCC (DUG) projects in the United States.

2. The eleventh link in the SAGE-SCC chain is in Canada and this is the only location at which deep-underground work was commenced prior to the Americans' final decision to cease all operations.

3. Canada, as was said recently by Prime Minister Diefenbaker, is in the foothills and not at the summit. This indicates that the United States is the senior partner, and rightly so, in shaping policies in relation to U.S.-Canada Joint Defence. I desire to record a full and frank assessment for my personal files of the year just completed covering my stewardship of the New York office and the administration directed by my efforts.

4. The pattern of SAGE-SCC appeared to be relatively clear and sound in May 1959. All the conferences which I attended in New York and Washington during the summer and autumn convinced me that there was no unanimity, and little agreement, among the various authorities associated with the innumerable segments of this enlarging circle of electronic developments.

5. It was ascertained that much theory relating to SAGE-SCC could not be reduced to solid and economical practice. The wide divergence of opinion and all the fundamental uncertainties compelled further searching studies of the deep-underground principles. This agonizing period of indecision was understandable amid the perplexities which surrounded this whole question.

6. The United States felt the clear and compelling need to make [a] positive approach to all the problems so as to protect against any disillusionment later on. Further research assessments were sponsored under the direction of the Atomic Energy and Applied Science Branch of the Atomic Defence Engineering and, in September 1959, a summary of conclusions established the condition that a general policy of deep tunnel protective construction appears unwarranted.

7. The United States planned to start with two SAGE-SCC projects, one at Whitehorse Mountain at West Point, and the other at Albuquerque. Tenders were called and the official openings were set for 10 November. On 9 November the U.S. Corps of Engineers received instructions from the Pentagon not to open the tenders. It is significant that the tenders were not opened but were finally returned to the contractors who bid.

8. The entire SAGE-SCC strategy was vague at Washington despite the fact that it remained under continuing review. As early as last October, I expressed my conviction without hesitation that there was lack of coordination of minds which prevented the firming up of IBM and other related components in connection with structural and electronic developments.

9. It became obvious in November that the United States would not proceed with the SCC (deep-underground) features of SAGE, and that the “soft” concepts rather than the “hardened” concepts (deep-underground) would be approved by the Department of Defence at Washington. The cancellation, as was certain from last October, by Washington of SAGE-SCC was officially received by all agencies in the United States on March 18.

10. The pattern of SAGE-SCC continued to be woven but never reached the accepted and finished stage. In carefully and calmly assessing this whole issue, I would point out that no criticism should be aimed at either Washington or Ottawa over what now is the acknowledged “demise” of SAGE-SCC. The speed of technological progress has changed some verdicts of a year ago.

11. New discoveries and changes in technological realms justified revisions of concepts, and other factors have swept certain programs from the scene. The impact of wavering circumstances have drawn fire rather than understanding from uninformed critics who invariably become prone to express their half-baked ideas from a tremendous fund of ignorance.

12. I was neither a Cassandra nor a Pollyanna when I entered upon my duties at New York in early May of last year. But I did become a realist opposed to super-combat-centers underground after studying the viewpoints of USAF, U.S. Corps of Engineers, USN, IBM, MITRE, WECO, Standard Research Foundation, Colorado School of Mines, et al.

13. I recently heard a senior RCAF officer assert that only fools would be opposed to SAGE-SCC ... the greatest lesson in life is, as Churchill once said, to know that fools are right sometimes. The same RCAF officer asked an American of high rank how far advanced were the American underground rock operations at the time of Washington’s cancellation of SAGE-SCC. The Americans had not started on any deep-underground SCC and now, of course, they will not start at all.

14. There was disregard of some important conclusions at the time Canada acted in haste in proceeding with the deep-underground operations at North Bay. Procrastination is rarely said to be a virtue but, in this case, procrastination would have been distinctly advantageous. I think the North Bay operation is following a cul-de-sac and, regardless of the volume of work performed in this hard-rock mining project, I would recommend the immediate cessation of all underground construction and, further, I would suggest that the facility as a whole be proceeded with on the surface for which the steel has been ordered. Should this change-over from “hardened” to “soft” concept be adopted, the completed operation at North Bay will then be a standard link in every way with twenty-seven other links presently in operation in the United States.

15. In the United States, defence is not Republican nor Democratic. It is National, and non-partisanship pretty well prevails when policies are laid down or changed. The mechanics of politics should not pose difficulties when problems of this nature arise. In Canada the Avro Arrow was wisely cancelled, Bomarc “B” has been downgraded, and there should be no political claptraps over the revision of SAGE from “hardened” to “soft” concept. I am speculating over whether or not full measure of thought has been given to all the expense and inconvenience that would be involved in transporting maintenance staffs, equipment and materials in and out of the 6500 ft. tunnel to and from the underground operation at North Bay.

16. Under study by IBM is the “technical feasibility of installing an FSQ-7 in the SCC underground facility at North Bay.” The increased cost, because of differing from “unhardened” facility, will be several million dollars to take care of re-engineering of cabling and all the other costs attributable to this special contract. Delivery of this new Q-7 installation will require from twelve to eighteen months and IBM expresses the opinion that the RCAF will require five additional months for redesign of drawings. IBM sets the tentative operational date at July 1963.

17. I join the increasing number of technical people in the United States who are frankly sceptical over the present deep-underground project at North Bay. It is later than it should be, but it is not too late to lick wounds and remedy this grotesque error. Political and professional pride may well ride for a fall if this ugly situation is not rectified. I am sure that unsound advice is being fed to that very fine, able and honourable Minister of Defence, General Pearkes, who would be justified in defending himself and the Canadian Cabinet for following the course laid down by Washington in cancelling SAGE-SCC as a result of the frustrating uncertainties which surround the issues. The SAGE-SCC (deep-underground) at North Bay is both uneconomical and unnecessary.

18. If more sane judgment does not prevail, and if this monstrous SAGE-SCC is carried through to completion, it will become Canada's greatest "White Elephant" and will be no credit to all and sundry who have been connected in any way with the prosecution of the project. I am personally relieved over the decision to suspend the now unrequired New York office, of which I have acted as Manager since its inception a year ago, in mustering electronic and other criteria for design purposes in Canada. There should now follow the suspension of deep-underground operations at North Bay and there should be undertaken the immediate commencement of construction covering a Direction Center on the surface, such as exists at Sawyer and other points in the United States.

19. Political ferment is the by-product of unfortunate situations involving the cancellation of almost anything undertaken by government. In this case there would be no just cause to criticise Ottawa, for the whole matter could be attributed to the onward-march of science and to the constantly broadening dimensions of defence. We are living in a rapidly changing world. Only a bitter political partisan could hold Ottawa responsible for having started work on the SAGE-SCC project at North Bay.

20. I cannot suspend my responsibilities in New York without paying tribute to the exceptionally fine cooperation which I have received during the past year from personnel on all levels of Western Electric, USAF, U.S. Corps of Engineers, USN, IBM, MITRE, Stanford Research Foundation, Doctor Nathan Newmark, et al.

SAGE SITE VULNERABILITY

You asked for us to look into the substance of a report given you by Mr. W.H. Stuart of Victoria to the effect that Canada should have taken action similar to the United States by way of cancelling the "hardening" of the SAGE centre at North Bay.

According to the information on our files, the basic situation outlined by Mr. Stuart is correct in that, when completed, the SAGE centre at North Bay will be the only "hardened" SAGE centre in the NORAD complex. All the U.S. centres will be "soft," i.e., above ground.

When the system was in the initial planning stages in the early 1950s a “hardening” of all sites had been actively considered. In the event, however, and based on intelligence estimates at that time, on “hardening” cost factors and on a planned dispersal of thirty-two Direction Centres and eight Combat Centres, a decision was made in the mid 1950s to proceed with the construction of “soft” centres capable of withstanding approximately five PSI over-pressures. As the state of the computer art developed, it became apparent in 1958 that the “soft” SAGE system as originally conceived could be significantly improved by conversion of the whole programme to a system of nine Super Combat Centres equipped with transistorized computers. Such a computer would have four times the capacity of the type planned and a higher reliability factor. This caused the question of “hardening” to be examined once more and eventually a decision was taken to put them underground. Since there were to be only nine of them it could be done at less cost. Moreover, the accomplishments of the Soviet Union in the ICBM field indicated the advisability of “hardening.”

By early 1960, however, the combination of higher priority military requirements and the drastic cuts made by the U.S. Congress in appropriations for the SAGE-BOMARC programme made it necessary for the USAF to look at the matter again. The conclusion was reached that the cost of “hardening” for the U.S. sites was considered to be excessive in comparison to the operational gain that could be expected. As a consequence the programme was drastically revised once more and the decision taken to construct in the United States a total of twenty-two “soft” Direction Centres and three “soft” Combat Centres. In the meantime, however, construction of the “hardened” facility at North Bay was well underway and it was agreed between the two Air Forces to proceed with it; instead of installing a computer appropriate to a Super Combat Centre it was decided to install a single computer for both control and direction functions.

Because of the vulnerability of its “soft” sites, the USAF is now proceeding with a programme expected to cost over $100 million to provide a manual back-up system at a number of centres, to be completed this year, and a semi-automatic back-up system at 34 stations, to be completed by 1965. These will be tied in with NORAD Alternate Control Centres.

The situation outlined above provides a good example of the difficulties constantly faced today in the military field when at some stage firm decisions have to be made in the face of continuing technological developments, new intelligence assessments, etc., and the altered concepts these dictate. The fact that Canada will have the only “hardened” safe site, however, is not expected to commit the RCAF to any additional significant expenditures over those originally estimated. Under the terms of the agreement to extend the SAGE-BOMARC programme to Canada, the United States is obligated to pay two thirds of the cost. This formula was accomplished in practice by Canada assuming all construction costs, and the U.S. the cost of all equipment (computers, BOMARCs, etc.). A “soft” SAGE Centre would of course have cost much less to construct, but then Canada might well have been faced with a request to re-negotiate the cost-sharing formula or to assume some share of the cost of the equipment required by the programme.<sup>14</sup>

MAY MEETING OF PERMANENT JOINT BOARD ON DEFENCE

Over the last two years the question of acquisition of nuclear weapons by Canadian forces and the related question of storage of air-to-air defensive weapons in Canada for U.S. use have been on the agenda of the Board. Any statements I have made as Chairman of the Canadian Section have been cleared beforehand with either the Secretary of State for External Affairs and/or the Minister of National Defence.

Prior to the Board's regular quarterly meeting earlier this month, the U.S. Section was informed that, as the Canadian Section would have no statement to make or have nothing to add to those made at previous meetings, it would prefer not to have the item on the agenda. The U.S. Section, however, asked that the item be retained.

It transpired at the meeting that the U.S. Section wished to make a statement for the record on the purely military aspects of the question in relation to North American defence. In introducing his statement Dr. Hannah, the U.S. Chairman, emphasized this.

After pointing out that the forward deployment of the BOMARCs and CF-101 interceptors without nuclear armament lessens defence capabilities below the level which would have been achieved had they been deployed just below the border, the statement went on to say that important industrial centres in both countries are therefore more vulnerable to successful attack and maximum available protection is not provided to the deterrent forces. The point is also made that a nuclear warhead increases the probability of destroying not only a carrier but its weapons as well. From the military point of view weapons should be stored in place if confusion in any emergency is to be avoided and timely engagement of an attacking force is to be ensured. USAF interceptors stationed at Goose Bay are estimated to be doubly effective if equipped with nuclear weapons.<sup>15</sup>

I have been unable to find out at what level of the U.S. Government the statement was approved.

SOVIET "STATEMENT" ON CANADIAN NUCLEAR WEAPONS POLICY

The following paragraphs review the events of yesterday in connection with the above subject, and give a preliminary assessment of the possible significance of the Soviet move. A copy of the text of the Soviet "statement" is attached for reference.†

2. On the evening of June 13 the Soviet Ambassador requested an appointment with you for June 14. On being informed by Mr. Campbell that you would not be available, he arranged to see me but gave no reason as to why he wished to call. He arrived at about 11.30 on the morning of the 14th, and proceeded to hand me what he insisted on describing as a "statement" and not a note, which he said he had been instructed by his Government to transmit to you. Having read it through, I said I thought it an odd and ill-timed communication, and an attempt at interference in Canadian affairs which would be resented by all Canadians. Nevertheless, I would bring it at once to your attention. I told him you were in Vancouver, and that you would be back on Wednesday and would undoubtedly have some observations to make on the "statement." He said nothing whatever about making its contents public.

3. After Mr. Campbell had communicated the contents of the "statement" to you, and we had received your instructions that it should be rejected as unacceptable, I asked the Ambassador to come to the East Block and returned it to him about 2.15 p.m. Also on your instructions, a press release about the incident was issued shortly afterwards.

4. By this time the text of the "statement" had already been released to the press at Soviet initiative.<sup>16</sup> (Subsequently, the Soviet Embassy also published it in their "News Bulletin" which is given wide circulation.) When I drew this fact to the attention of the Soviet Ambassador, he replied that the text had been released by TASS, both in Moscow and here in Ottawa.

5. The motives lying behind the Soviet action are far from clear, but the following reasons may have been at least partly responsible:

(a) It might be tied in with a Soviet calculation that the Canadian Government intended to acquire nuclear weapons from the United States after the election, and that they could encourage public opposition to such a move. In view of recent statements by the Prime Minister and yourself, it is difficult to imagine on what grounds the Soviet authorities might have reached such a conclusion, but it is possible that reports from their Embassy or allegations in the Canadian Communist press had convinced them of the need for action. They might, in other words, have been deluded into believing their own propaganda.

(b) It could be related to the tough line which the Soviet Union has taken recently against the USA and the West generally, alleging that their "warlike actions" (high altitude nuclear tests, President Kennedy's alleged threat that the United States might launch a pre-emptive nuclear war against the Soviet Union, etc.) have sabotaged the disarmament conference and efforts to reduce international tension. The purpose of the Soviet "statement" could then be to tar Canada with the same brush as the United States as pursuing a policy "hostile to peace" while publicly espousing the cause of disarmament. (Compare, for example, the similar Soviet action concerning the United States-Japanese security treaty during a previous Japanese election.) In their eyes, this would also weaken the Canadian position at the Disarmament Conference and blacken our reputation with the neutrals.

(c) It could be designed as retaliation against Canadian statements about Soviet colonialism, which the Soviet leaders may regard as interference in their internal affairs. Recent telegrams from our Ambassador in Moscow have suggested that Mr. Khrushchev and others have been irritated by comments made by the Prime Minister on this subject, and they may have felt that they could suggest by their latest action that they could retaliate in kind if the Government pursued this policy or developed it at the United Nations in the autumn.

(d) It may represent simply a heavy-handed attempt to intervene in the election campaign, possibly to provide ammunition for the Canadian Communist Party. There had been some suggestion earlier that a Communist Party rally was scheduled to be held in Toronto yesterday, and in that event the Soviet "statement" could have provided a starting point for an attack on the Government. However, on further checking, we have learned that no major Communist meeting was held in Toronto yesterday, and that the R.C.M.P. are not aware of plans to hold one. Nevertheless, the Soviet action could still be linked to a desire to provide support for Canadian Communists in the election campaign, or to offer them an excuse for attempting to interfere with or interrupt campaign meetings being held by members of the Government.

6. It is difficult to judge which of the above reasons may have been dominant in Soviet thinking. If the Soviet Union had seriously considered it possible to alter Canadian policy (as they may see it) on the acquisition of nuclear weapons, they would surely have concluded that the poorly drafted "statement" which they in fact delivered was not the way to go about it. Instead, they might have followed their usual procedure of submitting a formal note containing lengthy and at least superficially persuasive arguments. The fact that the Soviet Ambassador did not seem to be very happy with the affair also suggests that this was not a carefully thought out démarche designed to alter Canadian policy.

7. Nor does it seem likely that the Soviet action was intended as simple retaliation on their part for Canadian comments about Soviet colonialism. If this were the case, one would think that the "statement" would have chosen somewhat different language which would have made some effort to link their accusations against Canada with this question, at least indirectly. Nonetheless, it may have been designed as a "shot across the bow" to warn us of the consequences of seeking a quarrel with the Soviet Union.

8. On balance it seems most likely that the main motives behind their action were twofold: first, to weaken the Canadian position on disarmament by alleging that our support for this goal was hypocritical; and second, to increase opposition in Canada to "bellicose" American policy in general, and to possible arrangements with the United States for the acquisition of nuclear weapons in particular. Both these elements may of course have been combined in their thinking with a desire to weaken the Government (and perhaps the major opposition parties as well) at a key moment in the election, when they may have thought it would assist their own supporters in Canada. Certainly the timing of their action could not have been lost on those who decided to transmit the "statement," and equally certainly it must have been at least a few days in preparation. Nevertheless, I do not believe it is possible to say with certainty whether it was primarily a deliberate attempt to intervene in the election, or an attack on the Government for other reasons whose affect it was believed would be reinforced or enhanced by the timing of the action.

9. If you agree, I would propose to send a telegram based on the above assessment to our NATO Delegation and other interested missions.<sup>17</sup>

SOVIET STATEMENT JUNE 14

Dated July 2. Just what Soviet Government hoped to achieve in handing Canadian Government their patronizing and somewhat threatening statement and at once releasing it to press can only be conjectured. Soviet Government clearly wished to influence Canadian thinking on question of nuclear weapons and apparently thought election campaign particularly promising time for this. This illustrates typically ursine heavy-handedness and clumsiness of so much of Russian policy. Another motive was I suspect domestic and related to current propaganda line about Western preparations for initiating nuclear attack and therefore necessity of Soviet public accepting higher food prices.

2. But whether Russians wished to influence Canadian elections in favour of one party rather than another is not repeat not clear and may be doubtful. Soviet Government obviously resents Prime Minister Diefenbaker's charges about Soviet colonialism, and Soviet press recently has suggested that drop in Conservative support in recent Canadian election is due in part to his anti-Soviet policies. On other hand there seems no repeat no reason to think Soviet leaders would prefer Liberal government in Canada. (Their malevolent calculation would I think be based on assessing which of two major Canadian parties would be least likely to cooperate amicably and effectively with USA and Britain in defence and economic and other fields, and least likely to strengthen Western influence in UN etc. They would probably consider that on balance there was little to choose on these criteria between Conservative and Liberal leadership.)

3. Soviet Government might have calculated that their statement could help NDP. Normally Soviet leaders dislike Western Social Democrats, but I understand Canadian Communists supported NDP except where Communist Party itself ran candidates. Despite majority vote in NDP convention, Soviets may well consider an NDP Government might at least weaken and perhaps end Canadian participation in NATO.

4. I am inclined to think, however, that more important than any Soviet calculation about relative merits for them of individual Canadian parties was their desire to encourage anti-nuclear and Minifie-type neutralist sentiments<sup>18</sup> which I suspect they considered as not repeat not unimportant among general public and within sections of all parties except perhaps Social Credit.

OK. H.C. G[reen] 20/6.

5. At my Canada Day reception I mentioned to Malik (Deputy Foreign Minister) the resentment that Soviet statement had caused in Canada and said I was puzzled to understand just what Soviet motive could have been to deliver such "statement" and particularly to release it to press in midst of Canadian election campaign. Malik took line Soviet purpose was to discourage diffusion of nuclear weapons, which he said Soviet Government rightly considered most serious problem of our time. I said Canadians did too and therefore wished Soviet Government would agree to nuclear test ban and disarmament with suitable verification provisions. But what really puzzled me was to guess Soviet purpose in issuing public statements about Canadian leaders and public issues in midst of election campaign. Was Soviet Government trying to assist one party rather than another and if so, which? I suggested that Malik with his long personal experience living in London and New York must realize that Soviet attacks on any policy or person were often counter-productive in West and apt to have directly opposite effect of strengthening public support for whatever Moscow attacked. Malik looked shocked at this, but finally grinned and acquiesced albeit somewhat uncomfortably. But he insisted that Soviet statement had not repeat not been intended to favour any particular party and even asserted that Canadian election campaign was coincidental.

6. I myself think election was very relevant, at least in timing, but I am inclined to credit Malik's disclaimer about any clear party preference. Incidentally Minin, official of Second European Division MFA, recently returned from Ottawa posting, said to Seaborn [that the] fact that position of Liberals and Conservatives on nuclear arms was almost identical proved that Soviet statement could not repeat not properly be construed as interference in election campaign.

7. Timing of Soviet statement in electoral context probably reflected Soviet desire to create maximum impression on Canadian public opinion and perhaps even create fear of Soviet displeasure which would follow on any decision to stockpile nuclear weapons. Russian tactics here as so often were brutish and stupid but I am inclined to take their international purpose mainly at face value.

8. Russians would undoubtedly regret decision to locate nuclear weapons on Canadian territory for obvious reasons of strategy. To extent that such advance storage in Canada would improve North American continental defences and thus increase defence capability of USA, Russian strategists would consider it contrary to their interests, which I think they regard without much sophistication as enhanced by any relative weakness of Western world in general and of North America in particular. I do not repeat not think Russians are yet mature enough to recognize that increased security of other side's second-strike capacity may decrease danger all round, and vice versa. Similarly Russians are always naively trying to discourage any form of cooperation among Western countries and are thus opposed to Western cooperation whether in NATO, NORAD or European Common Market. It is I think basic Soviet doctrinal tenet that the more the rest of world is divided among itself and the weaker it is, the better for Russia. Whether this crude doctrine is ultimately defensive or offensive its underlying motive is a big psychological question, though in a sense probably academic in last analysis.

9. Soviet concern over possibility of decision to store nuclear weapons on Canadian territory is not repeat not new. It has long been favourite subject of conversation for Soviet Foreign Ministry Officials and has also been expressed in Soviet Press (see our letters 338 April 11/61, 569 June 12/61, 665 July 4/61 and 1221 December 8/61). Gist of argument used by Foreign Ministry Officials is that location of nuclear arms in Canada would impede good Soviet-Canadian relations, bring Canada under greater USA dominance and increase danger of massive destruction in Canada should war break out.

<sup>18</sup> Voir/See James M. Minifie, Peacemaker or Powder-Monkey: Canada's Role in a Revolutionary World. Toronto: McClelland & Stewart, 1960.

10. Frequently Russian tactics have been counter-productive precisely because they make obvious naïve and ugly Russian goal of seeking maximum distrust and minimum cohesion within non-communist world. But quite apart from this factor, Russian methods, in June 14 statement, as so often, were singularly crude. Russians find it difficult to recognize even now that threats to NATO countries usually have had boomerang effect, e.g. galvanizing British public opinion last summer by suggesting Britons were Khrushchev's hostages over Berlin question or Khrushchev's contribution to re-election of Greek Prime Minister through his threat to bomb Acropolis. Khrushchev sometimes humorously admits in conversation that his accolade is apt to prove kiss of death in West. But despite this occasional realism at top level, the bear's age-old heavy-handedness continues.

11. Another factor in frequent counter-productivity of Soviet tactics is hypocrisy. This too is illustrated in June 14 statement. But I think here, as often, one-way street aspect underlying so much of Soviet policy is unconscious. Russian communists genuinely lack self-critical ability to see themselves as others see them. Thus I doubt if Russian leaders would necessarily see humorous and hypocritical one-sidedness in their statement that Soviet Government cannot repeat not help being concerned if Canada should stockpile nuclear arms on Canadian territory, since we are neighbours. I doubt if they genuinely realize how vulnerable this argument is to "tu quoque" riposte from Canadians, since it would not repeat not occur to many Russians to equate their territory or policy with ours.

12. Another relevant point may be propensity of Soviet officials to act "for record." When they think consideration is being given to possibility of stockpiling nuclear weapons in Canada, Soviet Foreign Ministry might feel it only proper that they should publicly and formally express their viewpoint. Russians suffer even more than de Gaulle from view that world is divided into two categories of nations (a) great powers and (b) rest of us. Russian leaders tend to think it only right that they should express their viewpoint on affairs of lesser countries without expecting any resentment, still less any impertinent desire of these small powers to demand similar behaviour from USSR as USSR suggests from them. This almost subconscious Russian great power complex is shown not repeat not only in international relations but also in Soviet domestic affairs in relations between Russians and their minority nationalities.

13. For all these reasons I do not repeat not personally think Soviet motives in presenting statement just before Canadian election were particularly subtle in terms of international policy toward Canadian political affairs.

14. Nevertheless I would certainly consider one Machiavellian and cynical aspect of Soviet domestic policy very relevant. As you know I have been emphasizing during past few months importance of recent Soviet propaganda campaign that USA is contemplating possibility of preemptive nuclear war. This irresponsible and dangerous line is I think at present motivated primarily by desire to help sell austerity, including recent thirty percent increase in meat and butter prices, to Soviet public. Unfortunately I think it is having some success in this regard. Given present basic Soviet domestic propaganda line, further news reports and occasionally diplomatic actions designed to dramatize for Soviet public possibility of nuclear encirclement must probably be expected.

U.S.-CANADA DEFENCE RELATIONS

When Mr. Willis Armstrong, the Chargé of the U.S. Embassy, paid his farewell call on the Minister this morning he referred to the fact that some problems existed in our defence relations, particularly in respect of Bomarc's, interceptors, etc.

2. Mr. Armstrong expressed the hope that the Minister and the Prime Minister might have an opportunity to read the paper which the U.S. military authorities had supplied to the recent meeting of the Permanent Joint Board on Defence. This paper expressed the military views of the United States on the problem of atomic warheads for some of these weapons.

3. Mr. Green indicated that the question of the acquisition of nuclear warheads by Canada was even more difficult now than it had been before the election. He remarked that if a Liberal government were to be formed it would take at least as hard a line on these matters.

4. Mr. Green stated that the Government had not discussed these issues since the election but he personally wondered whether it might be possible to work out something which would enable Canada to secure warheads "in a hurry" if that became necessary. While the NDP would no doubt object to even this kind of an arrangement, it seemed possible that the Liberals might be able to go along with it. Mr. Green did not know whether it would be acceptable to the Canadian Government but he thought the possibility worth looking into.

5. Mr. Armstrong considered that the question of atomic weapons was one of the most troublesome issues between the two countries. If some progress could be made on it the atmosphere would be substantially improved.

6. Mr. Green observed that Canada was not alone in having difficulties over the acquisition of nuclear weapons. In fact, much the same kinds of problems had arisen in virtually every case where there had been a suggestion of locating weapons in foreign countries where the governments of those countries were expected to take some responsibility for the control of such weapons. The difficulties had been avoided in only those cases where the United States had been allowed to install weapons which remained under their own control. Mr. Armstrong agreed that the problems relating to the acquisition of nuclear weapons were not peculiar to Canada but they took on a different appearance when they occurred in a country so close as Canada.

7. The Minister enquired again towards the end of the conversation about the possibility of the United States' authorities studying the feasibility of an arrangement for the quick delivery of warheads for use in Canada in an emergency. Mr. Armstrong thought the paper submitted to the PJBD set out quite clearly the military difficulties in such an arrangement. The comments presented to the PJBD were based of course on purely military considerations.<sup>19</sup> If the United States Government were to be asked for its view as a government, those comments might be modified by important political considerations. The political as well as military possibilities might be well worth looking into if the Canadian Government so desired. Mr. Armstrong did not consider, however, that the United States Government could volunteer an appraisal of the case. In his view the initiative now rested with the Canadian Government.<sup>20</sup>

The Minister.

1. The Chiefs of Staff have noted with some concern statements that have been made about the possibility of Canada adopting a policy of readying the nuclear carriers in our air defence forces but not providing for the storage of the warheads on the site in Canada. The suggestion has been made that nuclear warheads need not be stored in Canada but could be moved from storage sites in the United States to the weapons bases in Canada in an emergency. This is not regarded as an acceptable military solution.

2. The air defence system has been designed to take advantage of the greatest possible warning. In normal conditions this would be the two hours afforded by warning of aircraft crossing the DEW Line. There are always chances that they will not be detected in certain areas and that the warning time will be considerably less than this.

3. Under the best of conditions it is estimated that approximately fifteen hours would be required to transport warheads from the United States bases to bases in Canada and fit them to carriers. This time assumes transport aircraft and crews standing by at the bases in the United States twenty-four hours a day every day, it assumes flying weather that would enable aircraft to take off and land at the weapons base, and it assumes fully trained crews at the weapons base that can handle the complex weapons for the first time with the safety that is imperative.

4. You can see from the above why the Canadian Chiefs of Staff cannot support the proposal as a sound military one. I have prepared the attached letter to the Prime Minister for your signature drawing these facts to his attention. I think it is necessary for him to be aware of them so that he is in no doubt as to our views on the merits of this proposal.

[Ottawa], August 17, 1962

My dear Prime Minister:

I do not know whether the minutes of the May meeting of the Canada-United States Permanent Joint Board on Defence have been brought to your attention. At this meeting the United States Chairman made a careful statement on the United States views on the use of nuclear warheads in relation to North American defence. In that statement he established that the United States did not view the stockpiling of nuclear warheads in the United States for use in Canada in an emergency as a satisfactory arrangement. He gives reasons associated with the various weapons for taking this view. Canadian military authorities support this view.

The North American Air defence system has been planned to have the fastest possible reaction capability. The DEW Line and its subsidiary warning systems will provide approximately two hours' warning against bomber aircraft. Under many conditions it is possible that the warning time available will be less than this. Therefore, any part of the system that cannot be ready within two hours cannot be considered as an effective part of the air defences. There is no method of which we are aware that would enable warheads to be transferred from the United States to a site in Canada, attached to weapons, and be ready for firing within this time. Under ideal conditions of transport aircraft availability, weather and training of crews, it has been estimated that at least fifteen hours would be required for this operation.

The arguments that the military authorities have advanced seem to me to be sound and I would counsel that we do not consider adopting a policy requiring the storage of air defence weapons in the United States and their transportation to Canada in an emergency.<sup>21</sup>

VISIT OF MR. RUSK NUCLEAR WEAPONS QUESTIONS

We are aware that Mr. Rusk is carrying a brief which takes as its point of departure the statement on Nuclear Weapons Policy made by Dr. Hannah, Chairman of the United States

Orig[inal] sent by hand Aug. 20.

Section, at the May meeting of the Permanent Joint Board on Defence. This statement presented the military case against non-acquisition and no stand-by arrangements for nuclear warheads. It was made explicitly "without reference to the political considerations involved."

The statement read as follows:

"This agenda item has a complicated political aspect which is properly in the hands of our political authorities in Ottawa and Washington. It is not my intention to comment on that feature of the problem here. On the other hand, it is a function of this Board to provide a continuing exchange of military information on matters of joint defence interest. In this way we help assure that when military information is relevant to political decisions by our Governments, it is available and current.

"This is the basis on which I would like to outline some of the adverse military consequences of our present nuclear posture. The inadequacy of our continental air defence has been of serious concern for a considerable time. It has only become more dramatically apparent with the deployment to North Bay of a BOMARC squadron lacking armament, and the deployment in Canada of 66 F-101B aircraft not armed for maximum effectiveness. Forward deployment of these weapons without nuclear armament not only foregoes planned improvements in North American air defence; it actually degrades our air defence capability below the levels we would have achieved by deployment just below the Canadian border. Because we are not capable of employing our full military capabilities, we cannot be confident of preventing heavy damage, in the event of attack, to important industrial and administrative centres in both our countries. Further, we are not providing the maximum available protection to the Strategic Air Command and to the retaliatory forces of the Navy. These deterrent forces are important to the entire free world and the basic free world strategy is based upon them. It must be assumed that the potential assailant understands the nature and location of this weakness in our air defences, consequently, the credibility of the deterrent is thereby degraded.

"In regard to the BOMARC squadrons, you will recall that these units were originally intended for deployment in the northeastern United States. Militarily, the relocation to North Bay and La Macaza has decided advantages. (1) It brings such Canadian cities as Ottawa, Montreal, and Toronto within the effective defence perimeter. (2) The forward deployment permits an earlier response to high speed attack, using a weapon of 400 mile range, 2.7 mach speed, and effective within 1,000 yards of its target. The nuclear warhead also creates a strong probability that we can destroy not only the carrier, but its nuclear weapons as well. Combined with interceptors based in Canada and the U.S., these BOMARC sites give us a capability for repeated engagement of incoming bombers before important Canadian and U.S. population centres can be reached.

"The F-101B, a high capability aircraft, can carry two MB-1 nuclear and two GAR-2A conventional missiles. The 66 aircraft in question are deployed only with the latter armament. The GAR-2A must strike the carrier to disable it, and its employment is adversely affected by bad weather. The MB-1 is effective up to 500 yards from its target, functions in any weather conditions, and is capable of destroying not only the carrier but its nuclear bomb load. These are critical advantages against high-speed targets. Until they are realized, we must consider that these F-101Bs will be performing at a small fraction of their combat capability.

"A similar analysis could be made of the USAF F-102A aircraft at Goose Bay. In this case, the present armament and capability of the aircraft, which differs from that of the F-101B, are such that conversion to nuclear air defence weapons would more than double its combat capability.

"From the military standpoint, planning emergency transportation of nuclear weapons to forward locations in Canada is not an effective answer to the problem. Nuclear weapons must be in place with trained crews before an emergency arises or they will be employed only after a great deal of confusion and after disruption of priority tasks already assigned to other units.

“Present air defence capabilities in the U.S. were developed taking into consideration the joint planning for nuclear air defence in Canada. Further, reliance on capabilities in the U.S. will not assure timely engagement of an attacker with our best available weapons at the maximum possible range from his objectives. We have reached the conclusion that without arrangements for the employment of our full nuclear air defence capability, major targets in Quebec, Ontario and the western provinces, and major targets in the northeastern, north central, and northwestern United States and particularly our deterrent capability cannot be adequately defended. The survival of our two nations and the general security of the free world is linked to the military security of targets like these.”

NUCLEAR WEAPONS FOR CANADIAN FORCES

A meeting was held in Mr. Campbell's office at 3:00 pm on August 28 attended by Messrs. Menzies, McCardle, and Black, to discuss the question of the armament of the CF-104 aircraft and Canadian Government policy on nuclear weapons for Canadian forces.

2. Mr. McCardle said that Mr. Ignatieff took the view that no agreement with the U.S. on nuclear weapons was possible before another Canadian general election and since the CF-104 aircraft (with a nuclear capability) was due to arrive in Europe in December/62-January/63, the Government would soon be faced with a full scale defence crisis. Mr. Ignatieff suggested, on the assumption that the Canadian Government will not formulate a policy on nuclear weapons now, that a way be found to postpone arrival of the CF-104s in Europe and instead retain the F-86 aircraft due to be phased out of operational use at the end of 1962. Mr. McCardle pointed out that if this was done there would also have to be a modification to the Canadian reply to the Annual Review which commits Canada to the delivery of the CF-104s.<sup>22</sup>

3. Mr. Campbell said that he believed that the logical consequence of the statements made by the Prime Minister in the House of Commons and during the election campaign was that the Prime Minister would agree to the opening of negotiations now for a stand-by agreement with the U.S.<sup>23</sup> Such an agreement would have to ensure that nuclear weapons would not be physically located on Canadian soil in peacetime, but would provide for detailed arrangements whereby Canadian forces either in Canada or Europe could rapidly acquire nuclear weapons in wartime. Mr. Campbell was sure that Mr. Green would agree to a stand-by agreement.

4. It was agreed that stand-by arrangements for Canadian forces in Europe should not prove too difficult to arrange as the nuclear weapons could be stored near Canadian planes and as the weapons themselves were not on Canadian soil. Canadian Voodoo interceptors attached to NORAD could acquire their nuclear weapons in a short period of time from depots in the U.S.

The main problem related to the Bomarc missiles as these weapons would have little operational use if they had to await the delivery of nuclear warheads from the U.S. before being used.

5. It was pointed out that the U.S. has already taken a position in the PJBD that stand-by arrangements are impractical in relation to the defence of North America. It was suggested that the U.S. Government might be persuaded that a second best arrangement whereby Canadian forces could use nuclear weapons subject to certain conditions would be better than none at all.

6. Difficulties arising from CF-104 aircraft being used on "alerts" duty in Europe were not considered insuperable, as, under a stand-by arrangement, while the nuclear bomb would be on the aircraft the nuclear device required to make the bomb operational would still be under U.S. custody. The problem posed by the refusal of France to have nuclear weapons on her territory could probably be overcome by some form of pick-up arrangement between the Canadian Air Force in France and Germany [sic].

7. A stand-by arrangement might involve a detailed agreement signed with SACEUR relating to the physical arrangements for the storage of nuclear weapons and the exercise arrangements necessary to ensure speedy pick-up together with a more general agreement with the U.S. outlining the principles of the stand-by agreement.

8. Mr. Campbell was strongly of the opinion that if a defence crisis was to be avoided the Department of External Affairs should take the initiative now to approach the Government to obtain approval for negotiating a stand-by arrangement with the U.S. It was agreed that the co-operation of the Department of National Defence was essential in approaching the Government. No decision was taken at this meeting as to what would be the next move.

Dear Mr. Green,

I attach for your information a copy of the Journal of the recent meeting of the Permanent Joint Board on Defence.†

On nuclear weapons (Item 1, page 4) you will notice that the United States Chairman, Dr. Hannah, re-emphasized the importance which the U.S. Government attaches to this matter, while I read into the record the statement which had been approved by yourself and Mr. Harkness.

You will also be interested to know that there was a long discussion on Canadian concern at the possible effects of the U.S. Secretary of Defense's recent directives on the defence production sharing programme.<sup>24</sup> I think it fair to say that the U.S. Section fully appreciated the Canadian position, and the impression I gained was that account would be taken of the joint defence production sharing programme in implementing the directives of the Department

NUCLEAR WEAPONS POLICY

The Minister has informed me that the Minister of National Defence has again stated in Cabinet that the lack of an appropriate agreement with the United States is preventing Canadian forces from receiving training and information about the operation and maintenance of the nuclear delivery systems already acquired by the Canadian armed forces from the United States.

2. My recollection is that we have checked this matter before and found that Canada has already signed the same agreement as other NATO members have signed with the United States which permits training and exchange of information on nuclear weapons to proceed on a bilateral basis. According to my records, the agreement in question is the Canada-U.S.A. Agreement for Cooperation on the Use of Atomic Energy for Mutual Defence Purposes, signed on the 22nd of May 1959 and tabled in the House of Commons by the Prime Minister on the 25th of May 1959. While it may well be true that the United States armed forces are withholding certain training facilities and information from the Canadian armed forces as a form of pressure to bring about the acquisition of warheads by Canada, our earlier research into this matter seemed to confirm that, if this were so, it was not for lack of the proper enabling agreement between our two countries.

3. I should be grateful if you would confirm the above facts and prepare an appropriate memorandum for the Minister.

STATUS OF DRAFT AGREEMENT

In August 1961 Cabinet gave preliminary consideration to a draft of a proposed agreement with the United States for the stockpiling of nuclear warheads for Canadian forces.<sup>26</sup> The draft comprised:

- (a) A Note proposing "that this agreement will be brought into effect when both Governments have confirmed, by a further Exchange of Notes, their intention to do so";
- (b) An annex outlining the general principles to govern stockpiling for Canadian forces;
- (c) Schedule (A) containing the detailed arrangements for stockpiling in Canada for Bomarc. (Other schedules were contemplated but were not submitted to Cabinet, viz., Schedule (B) covering nuclear anti-submarine weapons for the RCN and RCAF Maritime Command; Schedule (C) covering nuclear warheads for the 762 MM Rocket (Honest John) for the Canadian Army in Europe; Schedule (D) covering air-to-ground weapons for the First Air Division of the RCAF.)

The attached draft Note, annex and schedules incorporate amendments to the Annex and Schedule (A), which we understand had been discussed in Cabinet. No written Cabinet conclusion was ever received in this Department.

On September 1, 1961, the additional Schedules (B, C and D) were submitted by the Minister to the Prime Minister asking whether he desired that they be submitted to the Cabinet. A minute on a memorandum to the Minister dated September 12, 1961, states that the Prime Minister had informed the Minister that he had decided to take the schedules to the Cabinet. There is no record in this Department of any further consideration by the Cabinet.

On March 30, 1961, prior to Cabinet consideration of the draft agreement, the Minister had written to Mr. Harkness to suggest that appropriate officials of the two Departments undertake "to prepare a revision of the draft agreement in such a way that it would deal with this problem as a whole by providing that the detailed procedures governing storage, release from storage, and authorization of use of the various weapons systems should be set out in a series of schedules, one for each type of warhead to be made available, which would form an integral part of a comprehensive agreement."<sup>27</sup> At that time the Department of National Defence did not accept the concept of a comprehensive agreement. However, in a letter to the Minister dated December 19, 1961, Mr. Harkness explained the importance of providing nuclear weapons for the CF-101 interceptor and proposed that the draft agreement be expanded to include arrangements for the provision of nuclear air-to-air weapons for the CF-101s.<sup>28</sup> To that end, he transmitted a draft schedule, following the format of the existing draft schedules, for inclusion in the agreement.

This seemed to imply that the Department of National Defence had accepted the concept of a comprehensive agreement and there was reason to believe that a new set of draft schedules might be forthcoming. That being so, it was thought that it would be necessary to examine them closely before the schedules as they stood, and as they had been submitted to the Prime Minister, were submitted to Cabinet; otherwise, Cabinet might have two different sets of drafts.

On August 14, 1962, Mr. Harkness again wrote to the Minister proposing:

(a) that draft Schedule (b) be revised to provide for nuclear weapons for Canadian maritime forces in the Pacific area and as well release to Atlantic forces prior to their formal assignment to SACLANT;

(b) revision of the CF-101 schedule which he had submitted to you with his letter of December 19, 1961, "to reflect accurately the understanding shared by the USAF and the RCAF" as to the format of the schedules;

(c) that the other schedules be similarly amended.

This letter seemed to imply that the Department of National Defence had no further suggestions on the schedules.

There were no further developments until October 2 when Mr. Harkness submitted a memorandum to the Cabinet.

NUCLEAR WEAPONS POLICY

Yesterday afternoon Brigadier R.L. Purves, the new Co-ordinator of the Joint Staff, called at the Department to discuss nuclear weapons policy. Brigadier Purves understood from the Chairman, Chiefs of Staff, that Mr. Harkness had in mind submitting to the Cabinet the Draft General Agreement on acquisition of nuclear weapons along with the Schedules (amended as might be agreed between our two Departments). The Schedules, however, would be submitted only for information purposes. The arrangements provided for in the Schedules would constitute agreements to be entered into at the Service level. The General Agreement, as the present draft provides, would only come into force with the signing of a subsequent exchange of Notes. Brigadier Purves understood that Mr. Harkness had in mind thereby that Canada would be entering into a "stand-by" arrangement with the U.S. The Brigadier intimated that a "stand-by," which would provide for weapons to be transported into Canada only in an emergency or in the event of hostilities, was "impractical" from a military point of view.

It was pointed out to Brigadier Purves that, according to our understanding, the Schedules were to form a package with the General Agreement. As far as the Schedules themselves were concerned, there seemed to be some helpful suggestions in the proposals which Mr. Harkness had made to Mr. Green in December and again in August. However, it seemed that, before amending the Schedules and contemplating an Agreement in the form previously considered, clarification would be required of the intention of recent statements by the Prime Minister which had suggested that nuclear weapons would not be acquired for forces in Canada in peacetime. The kind of "stand-by" arrangement which might be envisaged in such a statement might not be the same kind of agreement as had previously been considered. The present draft contemplated its coming into force in peacetime and was a "stand-by" only to the extent that it would come into force following a further Exchange of Notes. Another consideration was that, in the light of the passage of time and also in view of the recent statements by the Prime Minister, the United States would be suspicious of an agreement which was to come into force only at some unspecified time when the Canadian Government should so decide. There was also the consideration that the Government would want to consider very carefully any initiative on nuclear policy in view of the parliamentary situation.

Brigadier Purves agreed that it was important to clarify what was intended, on his own Minister's part, by a "stand-by" arrangement and said that he would endeavour to find out what Mr. Harkness had in mind. Meanwhile, he asked to be provided with a copy of the latest version of the draft agreement, which was supplied.

ACQUISITION OF NUCLEAR WEAPONS

We have obtained from the Cabinet Secretariat the attached copy of a memorandum dated October 2, 1962, which has been submitted by the Minister of National Defence, but has not yet been cleared with the Prime Minister as a Cabinet agenda item. It proposes that negotiations with the United States be opened immediately on the basis of the existing draft general agreement and that you and the Minister of National Defence go to Washington to open the discussions.

2. The draft general agreement and its annex and schedules, to which reference is made in Mr. Harkness's submission, are those which are attached to this memorandum, to which we believe consideration was last given by Cabinet in August, 1961.<sup>29</sup>

3. Mr. Harkness's memorandum draws attention to two points of key significance:

- (1) it stresses "that the general agreement does not provide for warheads"; and,
- (2) it asserts that such a general agreement is "a necessary preliminary step which must be concluded before negotiations of subsequent agreements for the various warheads can be entered into."

4. Point (1) is accurate in the sense that the existing draft agreement did require a further exchange of Notes to bring it into force and permit the actual acquisition of warheads. On the other hand, the agreement as drawn at present contemplated the acquisition of nuclear warheads for Canadian forces in peace time. If it is the Government's intention to proceed with peace time acquisition in mind, the existing draft would form a reasonable basis on which to open negotiations. If however it were the intention to follow the line of policy indicated by the Prime Minister in public statements during the summer to negotiate only a standby agreement making provision for the acquisition of warheads only in time of actual or threatened emergency, the existing draft agreement would not form a suitable point of departure for discussions with the United States. Indeed to use this draft with only war time acquisition in mind would give the United States Government renewed cause to question Canadian good faith in opening negotiations.

5. Before contemplating the opening of negotiations it is essential to have a clear understanding of the kind of arrangement to which the negotiations are intended to lead – to acquisition in peace time as soon as a satisfactory agreement has been negotiated; or a standby agreement making provision for acquisition in time of emergency. In the latter event, something akin to the present schedules would still be required, but the covering general agreement would be of an entirely different character.

6. If it is an emergency standby agreement which the Government intends to negotiate, our present thinking is that it would involve two stages. The first stage, to come into force immediately following signature, would:

(a) define the emergency circumstances in which the Canadian Government would request the transportation into Canada of nuclear warheads. This decision would be related to the Canadian Government's recognition of a general state of emergency under existing NORAD and NATO states of alert;

(b) provide for: technical readiness of the weapons systems, construction of storage facilities in Canada and related financial terms;

(c) training in the use of the system;

(d) detailed practice arrangements for the rapid pick-up and siting in Canada of the warheads for each of the weapons systems.

The second stage would include provisions:

(a) for custody during the time the weapons were on Canadian territory;

(b) for control over their operational use; and,

(c) for related provisions similar to those in the present schedules.

It would, of course, be necessary to negotiate the details of the second-stage agreement in conjunction with the negotiation of the first-stage agreement.

7. The second point made in Mr. Harkness's memorandum concerning the need for the negotiations of "subsequent agreements" is not consistent with what we understood to have been agreed at an earlier stage, viz., that the general agreement and the detailed schedules governing individual weapons systems should be an integral whole and negotiated together on an inter-governmental basis. Mr. Harkness's wording would revive the suggestion that only the covering agreement should be on an intergovernmental basis and the details concerning individual weapons systems left to negotiation on a service-to-service basis.

8. The provision of warheads, either now or on a standby basis for Canadian forces in Europe, presents an entirely different set of problems to those affecting storage on Canadian soil. Adequate arrangements for Europe could be readily incorporated into a two-stage agreement covering acquisition of warheads for all Canadian weapons systems, or could be made the subject of a separate agreement. No copies of agreements which other members of NATO have concluded with the United States are available in Ottawa and it is unlikely that anything but a "pro forma" agreement would be made available. In any event, a Canadian agreement for Europe would not be analogous to those concluded by European countries with the United States inasmuch as we would have a "third country" storage problem probably requiring a three-way agreement.

9. In summary, there are three choices open to the Government on which a decision would have to be taken before contemplating the opening of negotiations with the United States:

(a) to have an agreement along existing lines providing for peacetime acquisition of warheads for Canadian forces;

(b) to draft a new two-stage emergency standby agreement; and/or,

(c) to draft a separate agreement to make provision for the arming of Canadian weapons systems in Europe with warheads. (Having particularly in mind the imminent delivery of the F-104Gs.)

10. Depending on the Government's decision on the foregoing, you might find it useful to suggest:

(a) that an interdepartmental working group be established to either review the existing agreement or to draft a new standby agreement; to make proposals concerning our forces in Europe; and to make recommendations concerning the best method of initiating negotiations with the United States;

(b) that consideration be given to the position to be taken in Parliament and in public regarding the present stage of the Canadian Government's policy on nuclear weapons.

GENERAL AGREEMENT ON ATOMIC WEAPONS

1. On 6 December 1960 the Cabinet decided that:

“discussions (or negotiations) with the U.S. Government concerning arrangements for the essential acquisition of nuclear weapons or warheads for use by the Canadian forces, in the manner already decided, may proceed as soon as they can usefully be undertaken but the acceptance of joint controls to be a basic principle.”

2. Since that time it has not been possible to undertake discussions with the United States Government on this matter. In the meantime, in accordance with Government policy, preparations have gone forward to acquire and deploy the weapons for which atomic warheads are necessary. In many instances these programmes are well advanced and negotiation for the atomic warheads should be instituted as soon as possible.

3. An essential pre-requisite to obtaining nuclear warheads for the weapons systems which Canada has agreed to provide is the negotiation of a general agreement with the United States Government. Cabinet has seen proposed drafts of this agreement. It is possible that, because of the nature of this Canadian draft, considerable time may be required for the negotiation with the United States Government. It is stressed that the general agreement does not provide warheads. It is a necessary preliminary step which must be concluded before negotiations of subsequent agreements for the various warheads can be entered into.

4. It is recommended that we open negotiations immediately with the United States on this general agreement. To ensure that the start of the negotiations is made with the proper understanding by both parties, it is suggested that the Secretary of State for External Affairs and I go to Washington for discussions with the appropriate United States governmental representatives to ensure that the Canadian position is made clear to them.

NUCLEAR WEAPONS POLICY

Messrs. Campbell, Menzies, Nutt and Bow met with the Minister this morning to discuss the Memorandum to the Minister of October 3 on Mr. Harkness' proposal that negotiations be resumed with the United States on an agreement to govern the stockpiling of nuclear warheads for Canadian forces.

2. The Minister said that at a recent Cabinet discussion it was apparent that there were no objections to proceeding to an agreement for the stockpiling of warheads for Canadian forces in Europe, i.e., Honest Johns of the Army and CF104s of the RCAF. As far as acquisition for forces in Canada was concerned, agreement would have to be on the basis of our receiving the warheads as quickly as possible when they were needed and not on the basis of stockpiling them in Canada in peacetime. The Minister believed that we were therefore faced with drawing a new agreement. It was suggested to the Minister that two agreements might be preferable – one covering stockpiling for our NATO forces in Europe which would presumably be of first priority and the other a stand-by agreement for forces in Canada. The latter would be a two stage agreement, the first [stage] to cover the period before the weapons were brought into Canada and [it] would, among other things, define the conditions under which they might be brought in, and the second stage to cover the period after they had been introduced into Canada and, among other things, would deal with matters such as operational use. In re-drafting these agreements it might be desirable to bear in mind the possibility that the Government would wish to table the basic agreements in Parliament.

3. It was also suggested to the Minister that it would be helpful if Cabinet could give a written directive since there had been no directive on weapons policy since 1960. More particularly,

(a) it would be helpful if Canada could indicate readiness to negotiate stockpiling arrangements in respect of Canadian forces in Europe. The United States would then undoubtedly provide the basic pro forma draft agreement for the purpose of negotiations;

(b) it would be necessary to work with National Defence in drafting agreements and an interdepartmental working group would be necessary to draw satisfactory draft agreements;

(c) it would be necessary to reconcile the understandings of the Departments of External Affairs and National Defence as to the type of stand-by agreement which the Government had in mind for forces in Canada. (It was pointed out that the Department of National Defence considered the present draft agreement, which would come into force at a time to be subsequently agreed but which contemplates storage on Canadian territory during peacetime, to be a stand-by agreement, whereas this Department's concept of a stand-by agreement was one which would contemplate storage on U.S. territory and transportation to Canada in an emergency. In this context it was also mentioned that both the Department of National Defence and the U.S. authorities considered such a stand-by arrangement to be impractical and that it might therefore be proposed that a feasibility study be undertaken which would conclude that such arrangements were not militarily feasible.)

3. The Minister agreed that it would be desirable to work with National Defence in drafting agreements for discussion with the United States. Meanwhile, he desired that the Department undertake to prepare [the] first draft of an agreement covering stockpiling for Canadian forces attached to NATO and subsequently a first draft of a stand-by agreement for forces in Canada. The Minister was reminded that there was also outstanding a request by the U.S. to stockpile nuclear weapons forces at Harmon Air Force Base and Goose Bay for use by USA forces. The Minister agreed that this aspect should be left to be raised by the U.S. should they see fit.

PROVISION OF NUCLEAR WARHEADS

As you requested, a memorandum to the Cabinet on this subject has been drafted for your consideration. This draft questions the suitability of the proposal contained in Mr. Harkness' Memorandum to the Cabinet of October 2. In particular it points out the inadequacies of the present draft agreement [and] the requirements of a new draft agreement, and makes some suggestions on the procedure which might be followed in drafting the new agreement and opening negotiations with the United States.

[Ottawa], October 19, 1962

PROVISION OF NUCLEAR WARHEADS

The memorandum of October 2 submitted by the Minister of National Defence recommends that negotiations with the United States be opened immediately on the basis of the draft general agreement given preliminary consideration by Cabinet in August 1961, as a preliminary step before negotiation of subsequent agreements for various warheads.

Inadequacies of the Present Draft

The present draft agreement provides that it will come into force only when both governments have confirmed their intention to bring it into force by a further Exchange of Notes. Such an arrangement would be a suitable basis for negotiation if it were intended to bring into force arrangements for the stockpiling of nuclear weapons for forces in Canada immediately and without reference to the international situation. As an agreement providing for bringing warheads into Canada in an emergency only it has certain shortcomings:

(a) To use this draft agreement, having in mind that warheads would be provided for use of Canadian forces in Canada only in an emergency, would give the United States Government cause to question Canadian good faith, since it would leave unanswered the question as to when warheads would be brought into Canada.

(b) Since the existing draft agreement would not come into force until there had been a further Exchange of Notes at a later date, it would not provide any authority for preliminary arrangements such as training, over and above that which exists at present. The 1959 agreement between Canada and the United States for Cooperation on the Uses of Atomic Information for Mutual Defence Purposes, provides in Article II:

“Each Party will communicate to or exchange with the other Party such classified information as is jointly determined to be necessary to:

- A. the development of defense plans;
- B. the training of personnel in the employment of and defense against atomic weapons and other military applications of atomic energy;
- C. the evaluation of the capabilities of potential enemies in the employment of atomic weapons and other military applications of atomic energy;
- D. the development of delivery systems compatible with the atomic weapons which they carry; and
- E. research, development and design of military reactors to the extent and by such means as may be agreed.”

(c) The existing agreement does not make provision for speedy supply of warheads for Canadian forces: for instance it does not provide for the allocation, in advance, of warheads for eventual use in Canada nor does it provide for their storage at convenient sites in the United States.

It is submitted that in the present circumstances it would be desirable to have an agreement which would provide a clear statement of the framework under which nuclear warheads would be made available for use by Canadian forces. So that Cabinet will see the full implications of such an agreement it is essential that the agreement encompass its practical application in respect of each weapons system. Such a comprehensive agreement would provide the necessary information to enable the Cabinet to take a decision regarding the provision of warheads for various weapons systems; it would avoid misunderstandings between the United States and Canada; and it would provide a surer basis for cooperation in training and other preliminary arrangements. To achieve these purposes the present draft agreement would require to be redrawn.

Requirements of a New Draft Agreement

The premise of such a redraft would be that nuclear warheads would be brought into Canada only on a finding by Cabinet that an emergency exists and a concomitant request to the United States Government to provide the warheads. In brief the agreement would make certain provisions for the period when the warheads earmarked for Canadian forces would be stored on United States territory, e.g. it would:

- (a) outline the circumstances in which the Canadian Government would be prepared to consider requesting transport of the nuclear warheads to Canada;
- (b) provide for the allocation of warheads in advance and their siting at convenient storage depots in the United States;
- (c) provide for the technical readiness of the weapons systems already in Canada, construction of storage sites in Canada and related financial terms;
- (d) provide for the training and readiness of personnel who would be involved in handling and storage of the warheads;
- (e) provide for training in the use of the weapons;

(f) provide for transport and practice arrangements for rapid pick-up and/or delivery to sites in Canada.

In addition the agreement would have a section which would only be brought into operation after the Canadian Government had requested the supply of warheads. This section would make provision for the period when the warheads would be in Canada, e.g. it would provide for:

- (a) custody of the warheads in Canada;
- (b) control over their operational use;
- (c) miscellaneous arrangements relating to security, safety, publicity, claims, command and communications, etc.

The agreement would consist of a statement of principles enunciated in the preceding paragraph and to which would be attached schedules containing detailed provisions relating to the various weapons systems: Bomarc, anti-submarine weapons, the F101 interceptor for Canada; and, if so desired, the Honest John rockets and CF104 aircraft for Europe. The statement of principles could be drafted with a view to their being unclassified and so available for tabling in Parliament.

Canadian Forces Assigned to NATO in Europe

Arrangements for the provision of warheads for Canadian forces in Europe could be incorporated in a general agreement of the sort outlined above either on a standby or immediate basis depending on the Government's decision in this matter. Alternatively, the requirements in Europe could be met by a separate agreement.

Procedure

For the purpose of drafting the requisite agreement or agreements for consideration by the Cabinet it would be desirable to establish an inter-departmental group comprising officials of the Department of External Affairs and National Defence and of other departments as necessary. After Cabinet consideration of the draft Agreement prepared by the interdepartmental group, negotiations could be initiated by presenting to the United States Embassy in Ottawa a Memorandum of the conditions under which the Canadian Government would be prepared to negotiate for the provision of nuclear warheads for Canadian forces. A copy of the draft Agreement would be attached to the Memorandum. To facilitate closer supervision by the Government of negotiations at the official level, it could be proposed that negotiations take place in Ottawa.

Recommendations

The undersigned therefore recommends:

- (a) that a comprehensive agreement be drafted envisaging the provision of nuclear warheads for use by Canadian forces in Canada in an emergency, to serve as a basis for negotiations with the United States;
- (b) that a decision be taken as to (i) whether nuclear warheads should be made available to Canadian forces in Europe on a standby or on an immediate basis and (ii) whether a comprehensive agreement should cover the requirements of forces in Canada only; or Canadian forces in Canada and Europe; or whether a separate agreement should be negotiated for Canadian forces in Europe;
- (c) that an inter-departmental group be established comprising officials of the Departments of External Affairs and National Defence and officers of other departments and agencies as required, and that the group be charged with preparing the required draft agreements for consideration by Cabinet;

(d) that following development of an agreement acceptable to the Cabinet the United States Government be informed by means of a Memorandum delivered to the United States Embassy in Ottawa of the Canadian Government's willingness to negotiate in Ottawa agreements for acquisition of nuclear weapons on the basis outlined in this memorandum.

PROVISION OF NUCLEAR WARHEADS

The Minister of National Defence's Memorandum to the Cabinet of October 2 recommends that negotiations with the United States be opened immediately on the basis of a draft general agreement as a preliminary step before negotiation of subsequent agreements for various warheads, which presumably would be concluded on a service-to-service basis.

2. If you will remember, the draft document under consideration earlier was all-inclusive with schedules concerning the various weapons systems and was designed to be negotiated on a government-to-government basis.

3. Furthermore it was intended to provide for the introduction of nuclear warheads rather than for making them available on a stand-by basis for emergency use only.

4. In my view what is required is a comprehensive agreement which would provide a clear statement of the framework under which nuclear warheads would be made available for use by Canadian forces, with all the necessary information to enable the Cabinet to take a decision regarding the provision of warheads for various weapons systems; it would also avoid misunderstandings between the United States and Canada; and it would provide a surer basis for cooperation in training and other preliminary arrangements.

5. The premise of such a comprehensive agreement would be that nuclear warheads would be brought into Canada only on a finding by Cabinet that an emergency exists and a concomitant request to the United States Government to provide the warheads. Thus the agreement would make certain provisions for the period when the warheads earmarked for Canadian forces would be stored on United States territory, e.g.,

(a) outline the circumstances in which the Canadian Government would be prepared to consider requesting transport of the nuclear warheads to Canada;

(b) provide for the allocation of warheads in advance and their siting at convenient storage depots in the United States;

(c) provide for the technical readiness of the weapons systems already in Canada, construction of storage sites in Canada and related financial terms;

(d) provide for the training and readiness of personnel who would be involved in handling and storage of the warheads;

(e) provide for training in the use of the weapons;

(f) provide for transport and practice arrangements for rapid pick-up and/or delivery to sites in Canada.

In addition the agreement would have a section which would only be brought into operation after the Canadian Government had requested the supply of warheads. This section would make provision for the period when the warheads would be in Canada, e.g. it would provide for:

- (a) custody of the warheads in Canada;
- (b) control over their operational use;
- (c) miscellaneous arrangements relating to security, safety, publicity, claims, command and communications, etc.

The agreement would consist of a statement of principles as enunciated in the preceding paragraph and to which would be attached schedules containing detailed provisions relating to the F101 interceptor and the Bomarc.

6. Arrangements for the provision of warheads for Canadian forces in Europe (the Honest Johns and CF104 aircraft) should be the subject of a separate agreement. This will entail a negotiation, not only with the United States governing the provision of warheads, but also with the NATO Supreme Commander, Europe and/or the host country in respect of storage arrangements.

Procedure

7. For the purpose of drafting the requisite agreements for consideration by the Cabinet it would be desirable to establish an inter-departmental group comprising officials of the Departments of External Affairs, National Defence, and Finance and others as necessary.

8. Mr. Harkness has suggested that he and I go to Washington to start the negotiations to ensure proper understanding by both sides. I think this would attract undue attention. In my view it would be more appropriate to initiate the negotiating process by my calling in the head of the United States Embassy in Ottawa and presenting to him a Memorandum setting out the conditions under which the Canadian Government would be prepared to negotiate for the provision on a stand-by basis of nuclear warheads for Canadian forces in North America and in Europe. A copy of the draft agreements, which by then would have been approved by the Cabinet, would be attached to the Memorandum. To facilitate closer supervision of the negotiations, which I would envisage being conducted by a mixed group of officials and service representatives from both countries, I would recommend that negotiations take place in Ottawa. In respect of forces in Europe it may be necessary to conduct some aspects of the negotiations there.

Recommendations

9. I would therefore recommend for your consideration:

- (a) that a standby agreement, with accompanying schedules covering each kind of warhead, be drafted envisaging the provision of nuclear warheads for use by Canadian forces in Canada in an emergency and their storage in the United States in the meantime;
- (b) that a separate agreement be drafted which would make available warheads for Canadian forces in Europe on the same standby basis;
- (c) that an inter-departmental group be established comprising officials of the Departments of External Affairs, National Defence, Finance and others as required, and that the group be charged with preparing the required draft agreements for consideration by Cabinet;
- (d) that following development of draft agreements acceptable to the Cabinet the United States Government be informed, by means of a Memorandum delivered to the head of the United States Embassy in Ottawa, of the Canadian Government's willingness to negotiate in Ottawa agreements concerning nuclear weapons on the basis I have outlined.

GENERAL AGREEMENT WITH THE UNITED STATES ON NUCLEAR WEAPONS

36. The Minister of National Defence stated that some time before the Cabinet had decided that arrangements might be made by which the nuclear warheads for the Bomarc and the Voodoo aircraft might be held in the United States, to be brought into Canada at the time of a war, to be used by the Canadian forces in the carriers they have ready here, and also that arrangements might be made to have nuclear weapons available for the F-104s in Europe and the warheads for the Honest John rockets. It would be necessary to undertake negotiations to make these arrangements and until these negotiations were carried on, it would not be possible to tell what Canada could get out of them. The Government was in a vulnerable position because it was being asked what arrangements it is making to arm the weapons which it has acquired.

37. The Prime Minister said that he thought it would be necessary to proceed with these negotiations but on the understanding that if there was any leak concerning the negotiations, they would stop forthwith. He had done this with President Eisenhower at one time and it had worked effectively. As a result of the negotiations, a general agreement might well be reached to carry out the decision of December 1960. He referred to some recent press reports concerning divisions of opinion in the Cabinet on this subject.

38. During the course of a lengthy discussion on this subject, the following points were made:

(a) Consideration should be given to the possibility of Canadian forces going to the United States for their warheads if NORAD is alerted. If it is proven that cannot be done, then one should go to the next alternative.

(b) One needs a comprehensive agreement even to hold the weapons in the United States to be brought into Canada if an emergency occurs.

(c) Various suggestions were available for the procedure to be followed in the negotiations but it hardly seemed necessary to discuss them in detail until some agreement had been reached on principles.

(d) The negotiations should take place in Ottawa as quickly as possible.

(e) There would need to be a separate agreement to cover the forces in Europe.

(f) Papers on this subject for the Cabinet at present should not be prepared by officials but by Ministers.

(g) Some questioned the wisdom of starting any negotiations on this subject in view of what had just happened in Cuba and the U.N. efforts to keep the peace.

(h) An account was given of various aspects of the U.N. and NATO considerations of the Cuban crisis and the reaction of various members of the Alliance to it.

(i) The Secretary of State for External Affairs, the Minister of National Defence and Mr. Churchill should represent the Cabinet in approaching the U.S. Ambassador or others on these negotiations.

(j) The negotiations should be based on the storage of the warheads for the Bomarc and the 101s in the United States and the storage of weapons for the Canadian forces in Europe on bases in Europe.

39. The Cabinet agreed:

(1) that negotiations be undertaken with the U.S. Government to work out an agreement or agreements between the two Governments under which:

(a) nuclear warheads would be held in storage for and made available to the Canadian forces in Europe under NATO command for use in CF-104 aircraft and the Honest John rockets; and

(b) nuclear warheads would be held in bases in the United States to be moved to Canada to be available to the R.C.A.F. for use in Bomarc missiles and interceptor aircraft, on request by the Canadian Government when war appears imminent; and

(2) that such negotiations be commenced forthwith by Mr. Green, Mr. Harkness and Mr. Churchill, jointly, with the Chargé d'affaires of the United States in Ottawa.

Excellency:

I have the honour to refer to Articles 20 and 21 of the Communiqué issued by the North Atlantic Council on December 19, 1957<sup>30</sup> and to conversations which have taken place between the Supreme Allied Commander Europe (SACEUR) and the Governments of Canada and of the United States regarding the stockpiling of atomic weapons in Europe for Canadian forces.

It is the understanding of my Government that in the course of these conversations agreement in principle was reached to the establishment of elements of a stockpile of atomic weapons to be provided by the United States in support of Canadian forces in Europe. In order to implement this agreement in principle my Government suggests the following arrangements:

(1) The location of the stocks for the support of Canadian forces assigned to NATO in Europe will be determined by SACEUR in accordance with approved NATO military plans and in agreement with Canadian and United States military authorities and, if necessary, the appropriate authorities of the country in which stocks are to be located.

(2) Except as otherwise agreed, the costs of construction, development and maintenance of the storage sites and associated facilities, including those required for the support of the U.S. special weapons custodial and support personnel, shall be borne by Canada. Arrangements for providing the land involved, without cost to the United States, will be the responsibility of the Canadian Government. To the extent that the North Atlantic Council agrees to the NATO infrastructure funding of NATO atomic stockpile site construction costs, the apportionment of costs will be subject to NATO infrastructure procedures. Installations and facilities for atomic weapons storage and maintenance will be built and maintained at least in accordance with NATO standards and criteria. Installations and facilities for normal logistic support (housing, messing, offices, etc.), which may not be specified under NATO criteria, will be built and maintained as mutually agreed.

(3) It is recognized that the custody of any stocks of atomic weapons provided by the United States will be the responsibility of the United States and that United States personnel will be assigned to the stockpile sites for this purpose.

4. When the weapons are released by appropriate authority, they will be employed in accordance with procedures established by SACEUR.<sup>31</sup>

(5) United States forces will be responsible for the maintenance, surveillance and assembly of the atomic weapons, including the provision of personnel and technical equipment for the performance of these functions.

(6) Except as otherwise agreed, external security of all atomic weapons in storage or during movement within the country concerned will be the responsibility of the Canadian forces. The details of external security arrangements will be determined by the appropriate United States and Canadian military authorities in accordance with directives of SACEUR.

(7) United States forces will be responsible for the movement of the atomic weapons to points of entry in the country concerned and from points of exit. Canadian forces, except as otherwise agreed, will be responsible for the transportation of the weapons within the country concerned, subject to paragraph 3 above.

(8) A reliable means of signal communications will, except as otherwise agreed by the appropriate authorities of the two governments, be provided by the Government of Canada to meet the purposes of this Agreement.

(9) Canada will, in general, provide at no expense to the United States Government reasonable administrative and logistical support for United States forces and dependents in support of Canadian units. This support will include common items of supply, organic transportation, and such other support as may be mutually agreed.

(10) Supplementary Service-to-Service arrangements, within the scope of this agreement pertaining to the various delivery systems and associated installations, will be negotiated separately, as may be appropriate, between the appropriate military authorities of the United States and Canada.

I propose that if the foregoing is acceptable to your Government, this note and your reply indicating such acceptance will constitute an agreement between the two Governments on this subject, the agreement to enter into force on the date of your note in reply.<sup>32</sup>

[Ottawa], December 5, 1962

1. In accordance with Cabinet decision of 30 October 1962, the United States Chargé d'Affaires was invited to prepare a proposal which would meet the requirements set out in the Cabinet decision. In response to this request an American team arrived in Ottawa with copies of a possible agreement on European and Canadian storage arrangements, together with two possible proposals to meet the North American emergency arrangements. In respect of Europe, the form of agreement was the standard one under which warheads, under USA custody, are held available for use by other NATO allies in an emergency.

2. The American officials outlined two possible ways whereby warheads for Canadian weapons could be stored in the USA and transported to Canada in an emergency. This first method, applicable both to the BOMARC and the CF101, involved the cargo airlift of complete warheads. This would entail keeping 26 large transport aircraft on immediate alert at

Left by US negotiating team 21/11/62 [Ross Campbell]

US bases twenty-four hours a day, with warheads and weapons loaded aboard. On specific alert conditions and weather permitting they would take off and fly to Canadian operational sites. On arrival at these sites the Canadian interceptors could be fully armed with the weapons flown in in a period of six to eight hours and the BOMARC within a twenty-four hour period.<sup>33</sup>

3. The second method, applicable to the CF101 aircraft only, involved the tactical ferrying of Canadian fighter aircraft to American weapons storage sites, where they would be armed with nuclear weapons (MB1) and would remain there until a state of emergency was declared (DEFCON 1) which would permit the President to release the weapons to Canadian forces. No time can be estimated for this because aircraft would only return to Canada when released for operational sorties or stood down.

4. As the time interval involved by both these proposed methods failed to come within the stringent warning requirements of the defence system as a whole (maximum three hours for bomber attack), it was decided alternative possibilities should be canvassed and the Americans were asked to examine the possibility of providing nuclear weapons for storage in Canada but less some essential part, that part to be flown in in the event of an emergency. They were also asked to re-examine the possibilities of reducing the time lag by increasing the numbers of handling crews on sites, or by activating the cargo airlift at an earlier stage of an alert, or a combination of both.<sup>34</sup>

5. The Americans reported that in the instance of the removal of an essential part, in the case of the BOMARC one small part which could be replaced without any difficulty in about ten minutes was a possibility, and that the piece was small enough that the requirements of a whole BOMARC station could be carried by one CF100 type aircraft, which could be maintained at instant readiness at an American base. It is estimated that the total time to ferry the part to Canada and to incorporate it into the weapon would be approximately two hours. In the case of the MB1, two possibilities were presented. One involved the removal of a part of the warhead essential to its operation but the reinstallation of which involved a rather lengthy check-out period (one hour and ten minutes); and the other the removal of a part of the aircraft essential to the arming of the weapon which could be replaced in five minutes. Both these parts were small enough that the requirements for a single squadron could be carried by a CF100 type aircraft. The total elapsed time for arming a squadron by flying in these essential parts was, in the case of the weapon, five hours and thirty minutes and in the case of the part of the aircraft in the order of one hour and ten minutes.<sup>35</sup>

6. It was considered that the time interval associated with the replacement of the part of the weapon was longer than desirable in relation to warning time and it was doubtful that the replacement of the part of the aircraft, which did meet the time element, met the terms of reference of the Cabinet decision.<sup>36</sup>

7. It was decided in respect of the MB1 to request the Americans to explore further two alternatives: revised arrangements for tactical ferrying; and the possibility of selecting some part of the MB1 weapon itself, of a size and nature which would improve on the reinstallation time associated with the part they had already selected.

8. There are no obvious obstacles to the conclusion of an agreement for the stockpiling of warheads for Canadian forces in Europe. We consider that the suggested method for dealing with the BOMARC missiles is satisfactory, but possible arrangements for the MB1 still require further investigation and will be reported on as soon as possible.<sup>37</sup>

[Ottawa], December 8, 1962

In accordance with the Cabinet decision of October 30, 1962, the United States Chargé d'Affaires was invited to have the United States authorities prepare a proposal that would meet the requirements set out in the Cabinet decision. In response to this request, an American Defence Department team arrived in Ottawa with the following documentation:

(a) a possible agreement on European storage arrangements. This was the standard agreement under which warheads under U.S.A. custody are held available for use by other NATO allies in an emergency;

(b) a possible agreement on Canadian storage arrangements. This draft agreement did not take account of the requirement that nuclear warheads would be held in bases in the U.S.A. for use by Canada in an emergency;

(c) the results of an American study showing the time lapse, personnel and equipment requirements involved in an arrangement whereby warheads for Canadian weapons could be stored in the U.S.A. and transported to Canada in an emergency.

Under (c) above, two possible methods had been considered: cargo airlift of complete warheads; and tactical ferrying of Canadian fighter aircraft to American weapons storage sites.

Cargo Airlift of Complete Warheads

This method, applicable to both the Bomarc and CF-101, would involve the pre-positioning of ground equipment in Canada, the assignment of the necessary USAF and RCAF loading and technical crews on site and the stationing of RCAF transport aircraft at U.S.A. bases at constant alert, ready to load the warheads.

Draft prepared by DND – not put to Cabinet. [Ross Campbell]

For the purposes of working out estimated times, personnel, etc., support bases in the U.S.A. were chosen on the basis of proximity to RCAF bases and the availability of adequate U.S.A. storage facilities, as follows:

Air Defence Unit	Supporting Base	Distance (miles)	# of Warheads
Chatham	Loring	100	60 MB-1
Bagotville	Loring	150	60 MB-1
Uplands	Kincheloe	370	60 MB-1
North Bay	K.I. Sawyer	350	60 MB-1
Comox	McChord	190	60 MB-1
North Bay	McGuire	420	28 BOMARC
La Macaza	Westover	260	28 BOMARC

The details of the application of cargo airlift to complete warheads were as follows:

A. For BOMARC

Using 4 loading teams, each consisting of 2 RCAF and 2 USAF, at each BOMARC site, each loading crew could install one warhead in 3 hours for a total of 21 hours for loading all BOMARCs. Taking into account 2 to 3 hours air transport time (see chart above) and 1 hour ground transport time at North Bay, the BOMARC unit (28 missiles) at La Macaza could be completely operational in 24 hours; and at North Bay in 25 hours.

B. For CF-101

Using 4 loading teams, consisting of 8 USAF and 16 RCAF maintenance and loading technicians at each base, one squadron (12 aircraft) could be brought to operational readiness (2 MB-1s per aircraft) in 5 hours. Taking into account transport time from the U.S.A. support base, all CF-101s could be brought to operational readiness at their home base in 6 to 8 hours.

Note:

- (1) The above estimates for cargo airlift of both BOMARC warheads and MB-1 missiles would require the stationing of a total of 26 RCAF transport aircraft on 15-minute alert at USAF bases 24 hours a day with warheads and weapons loaded aboard, but still under U.S.A. custody. The latter requirement would necessitate the stationing of USAF air policemen at 5 U.S.A. bases on an around the clock basis who would accompany the weapons on the transport aircraft.
- (2) The times involved in bringing the weapons to operational readiness could be reduced by:
  - (a) increasing the number of loading personnel and technicians at each base;
  - (b) having the cargo airlift inaugurated at an early stage of alert. (In this connection, BOMARCs at 8 sites in the United States are kept at 2-minute alert; USAF fighters are kept 1/3 at 15-minute alert, 2/3 at 3-hour alert.)

Tactical Ferry of MB-1 Missiles

This method, applicable only to the CF-101 aircraft, would involve the flying of the Canadian fighters to weapons storage sites in the U.S.A. at any stage of alert which the Canadian Government might decide. There they would be armed with their nuclear weapons (MB-1s) and remain until released to the Canadian forces under Presidential authority. Without a U.S.A. custodian, such authority could not be granted by the President at a stage of alert earlier than DEFCON-1 (Re-enforced Alert). All of the above propositions would involve the airlifting of complete warheads.

-----

In an effort to improve upon the time factors involved in the above propositions (for BOMARC, 24-25 hours for CF-101, 6-8 hours), the American experts were asked to examine:

- (a) the effect of increasing the numbers of handling and maintenance crews on sites;
- (b) activating the cargo airlift at an earlier stage of alert;
- (c) the possibility of reducing the cargo burden (and therefore transport and handling time) by confining the emergency airlift to some essential part of the warhead without which the part of the warhead pre-positioned in Canada would be inoperable.

(a) Increased Personnel

As transport time would remain constant, increasing the personnel would affect only the loading time at the Canadian site. The basic time data is as follows:

BOMARC: one loading crew (2 RCAF and 2 USAF) can install one warhead in 3 hours. There are 28 BOMARCs to be loaded at each site.

MB-1: one loading crew (2 USAF and 4 RCAF) can load 2 MB-1s in 1 hour 40 minutes. At each of 5 Canadian bases there are 12 CF-101s each carrying 2 MB-1s.

By adding to the loading crews, the time for bringing a complete BOMARC site or CF-101 squadron to a state of operational readiness can be proportionately reduced.

Note: These basic figures do not take account of shift requirements for 24-hour manning, sickness, leave, etc.

(b) Activating the Cargo Airlift at an Earlier Stage of Alert

Providing that U.S.A. custodial personnel were available at all times and accompanied the warheads to their sites in Canada, it would be within the discretion of the Canadian Government to order the cargo airlift at any time. Problems would arise in connection with the CF-101 which is not suitable for the carrying of custodial personnel.

(c) The "Missing Part" Formula

Several alternatives were presented under this heading. The two warheads under consideration are both sealed units. To render them non-operational would require the removal of one essential part. The American experts suggested that this part might be, in the case of the BOMARC, the "warhead arming plug"; and in the case of the MB-1, either the "umbilical power cable" (a part of the warhead) or the "ejector rack cartridge" (a part of the weapon system in the aircraft).

All three parts are small enough that the requirements of a whole BOMARC station or an entire CF-101 squadron could be carried in one CF-100 or T-33 type aircraft. By keeping these aircraft on 15-minute alert at USAF bases 24 hours a day, the missing part could be brought to the BOMARC and interceptor bases in Canada in times ranging from 35 minutes to one hour, depending upon the distance from the support base in the U.S.A. Once the necessary parts were on site, each BOMARC could be rendered operational in 10 minutes and each CF-101 in one hour 35 minutes. As none of the “missing parts” considered is a nuclear component, the problem of U.S.A. custodial personnel during the airlift phase does not arise.

The requirements under this alternative are as follows:

- a. Weapons including warheads minus critical “power plug” on site.
- b. MB-1 storage areas for each RCAF base complete.
- c. USAF and RCAF custody, security, maintenance, load personnel on site (MB-1 site, 40 U.S.) (BOMARC, 26 U.S.).
- d. Six (6) CF-100 standing 15-minute alert at U.S. support base (North Bay dual site) (1 Back-up aircraft at each base) Total 12.
- e. One (1) T-33 standing 15-minute alert at U.S. support base (1 Back-up) Total 2.
- f. Delivery aircraft will average 400 K ground speed.
- g. One (1) helicopter standing alert North Bay.
- h. Each CF-101 base will have four load crews always available.
- i. Each BOMARC site will have four crews always available to install warhead arming plugs.
- j. Each CF-101 base will have 12 aircraft always available, as follows:
  - (1) Four (4) aircraft and eight (8) MB-1s on MF-9 trailers near aircraft (QRA).
  - (2) Eight (8) aircraft – not on alert with their MB-1s on MF-9 trailers in storage sites.

For BOMARC:

10 minutes would be needed to install the missing part in each BOMARC missile using a loading crew of one USAF and one RCAF personnel. With a normal complement of 4 loading crews, the 28 BOMARC missiles at each site could be armed in 1 hour and 10 minutes. This could be reduced to a total loading time of 10 minutes if 28 loading crews were available. To each of these times would have to be added transport time, ranging from approximately 45 minutes to one hour, depending upon the distance from the U.S.A. supporting base.

Thus the total time factors are as follows:

with 4 loading crews all the BOMARCs could be made operational within 1 hour 55 minutes to 2 hours 10 minutes;

with 28 loading crews all the BOMARCs could be made operational within 55 minutes to 1 hour and 10 minutes.

For CF-101:

(a) Using Umbilical Power Cable (part of the missile itself).

This part is small and easily transportable but cannot be installed while the weapon is loaded aboard the aircraft, and after it is installed a series of checks must be carried out to test the missile’s safety and operational readiness.

Using one loading crew (2 USAF and 4 RCAF personnel) these procedures could be accomplished in one hour 10 minutes for the two MB-1 missiles carried by one CF-101.

With a normal complement of 4 loading crews (8 USAF and 16 RCAF personnel) 12 aircraft could be loaded in 4 hours 40 minutes.

Using 12 loading crews (24 USAF and 48 RCAF personnel) this time could be reduced to 1 hour 35 minutes for 12 aircraft.

To each of these times there must be added the time it would take to fly the missing part from the U.S.A. This will range from 35 to 45 minutes depending on the distances involved.

Thus the period in which all the CF-101s could be given an operational capability would be approximately 5 hours 15-20 minutes with 4 crews; 2 hours 20 minutes with 12 crews.

(b) Using the Ejector Rack Cartridge (a part of the aircraft).

This is an integral part of the MB-1 weapon system and essential to the missile's operational capability. Without it, the MB-1 missile cannot be lowered into firing position and would thus be rendered inoperable. It can be installed in each aircraft in 5 minutes. To this loading time would have to be added the time it would take to fly the missing part from the U.S.A. Thus, the period in which all the CF-101s could be given an operational capability using this missing part would range from 40 to 50 minutes. The ejector rack cartridge is not however a part of the warhead and its selection as the "missing part" might not be reconcilable with the Cabinet directive.

-----

In respect of the MB-1 missile, the American experts have been asked to explore further:

- (a) revised arrangements for tactical ferrying, combined with the possibility of instituting the tactical ferry at an early stage of alert; and,
- (b) the possibility of selecting some part of the MB-1 missile itself of a size and nature which would permit a faster installation time.<sup>38</sup>

CLOSING OF U.S. SAGE SITES

A/V/M Annis told me that they had just received today a message from Air Commodore Newsome of the Canadian Joint Staff, Washington, indicating that Secretary McNamara had issued a directive requiring the closing down of six SAGE sites and 17 Prime Radars in the northern United States. These are quite close to the Canadian border and apparently are regarded by the RCAF as part of the ground environment system for air defence.<sup>39</sup>

2. A/V/M Annis did not know whether a notice of this U.S. intention would be transmitted through diplomatic channels.

3. He proposed that this subject should also be discussed at an early date.

PHASING OUT OF U.S. SAGE SITES

SAGE, etc., in Canada

By an exchange of notes, dated September 27, 1961, entitled in the U.S. Treaty Series "Defense: Improvements in the Continental Air Defense System,"<sup>40</sup> Canada and the USA agreed to construct and install in Canada

- (a) seven new heavy radar sites (in the Pinetree system)
- (b) forty-five gap filler radar sites (also in the Pinetree system)
- (c) one SAGE Combat Centre/Direction Centre (at North Bay)
- (d) certain modifications to existing radars
- (e) two Bomarc missile squadrons (approximately 30 missiles to each squadron at North Bay and La Macaza)

The facilities are expected to be fully operational in 1963.

2. The notes recognize that the "facilities in Canada (were) required to strengthen and extend the continental air defence system" and stemmed from "recommendations of the Commander-in-Chief, North American Air Defence Command" and discussions in the Canada-United States Ministerial Committee on Joint Defence. The notes specify that where the two governments do not agree on the continued requirement of the facilities, the PJBD, in considering the question of need, "will take account of the relationship of the facilities to any similar installation established in the mutual defence interest of the two countries."

SAGE in the USA

3. In 1960 a reappraisal of the air defence programme was presented to Congress by the USAF Chief of Staff and supported by the Department of Defense. This reappraisal had been considered by NORAD, including the RCAF, and it was the subject of discussion and correspondence between the Minister of National Defence and the U.S. Secretary of Defense. The correspondence and circumstances suggest that consultation on what was admitted to be "major changes to the air defence structure of North America" was virtually coincidental with the event and perhaps, from the point of view of the opportunity afforded Canada to comment effectively, no more than pro forma. For Canada's part, the main concern was to safeguard the CADIN Agreement. Thus, when at one stage during Congressional consideration funds for the whole programme were deleted, the Canadian Government made representations to the Administration.

4. In the result, the counterpart programme as planned in the USA was drastically curtailed, e.g., Bomarc sites were reduced from 18 to 10. The SAGE units, instead of being underground, were to be built above ground and were to be far less sophisticated.

5. In September of this year, according to information provided us informally yesterday, December 19, by the RCAF (see attached RCAF memoranda†), the RCAF received informally information concerning the revision of air defence planning by NORAD. This report centered on the introduction of the improved manned interceptor (a long range aircraft carrying its own radar devices for detecting aircraft) into the air defence system and the incidental cutting back of existing ground environment systems in the USA. The USAF was cautioned by the RCAF on the need to consult with appropriate Canadian officials.

6. Later (October 2) it was learned that USAF comments on the NORAD report had indicated that the revised plans would require revision of the CADIN and DEW Line Agreements. It was also pointed out that the proposed reduction (as a USA unilateral decision in the NORAD system) could have a serious impact “on Canada’s internal affairs and on Canada/United States relations.” (See paragraphs (d) and (e) of RCAF memorandum of October 2, 1962.) According to information early in December, the NORAD proposals had been submitted to the Secretary of Defense and an analysis of the proposals for the improved manned interceptor concept and a consequent reconfigured ground environment system was being undertaken. It was also inferred that a much broader study of the future air defence of North America was being contemplated. While a decision on the overall system was not anticipated in the near future, the RCAF had concluded that cuts in the existing SAGE environment could come in either USA Fiscal Year ‘64 or ‘65. It was also reported that U.S. Department of Defense was aware of the need to consult prior to taking action which would lead to changes in the NORAD system. (RCAF memorandum of December 3, 1962.)

7. On December 19 the Air Member of CJS(W) reported to CAS that the “Secretary of Defense had returned the USAF budget in the form in which it will go to Congress in early January.” The budget showed a deletion of $35 million based on the proposed phasing out of 6 Direction Centres (out of a total of 23) and 17 radar sites (out of a total of 130) of the United States SAGE system. The main SAGE centres (8) are apparently unaffected at this time. Recommendations as to which sites are to be affected have to be available to USAF HQ by January 15. The USAF will seek RCAF participation “in an observer capacity” to ensure that any system cutbacks are thoroughly aired on a bilateral basis.” (See attached telegrams from CANAIRWASH to CANAIRHED.†)

8. On December 18 the Vice Chief of the Air Staff informed Mr. Menzies of the information received from Washington and proposed that the matter be discussed with us at an early date. Yesterday, December 19, G/C Sheffield left with me a copy of the telegram from Washington and related RCAF memorandum,† for our informal background information pending the proposed meeting.

Comments: It would appear that the RCAF’s watching brief has been overtaken by Secretary McNamara’s decision. Apart from the question of inter-governmental consultation, raised below, and the moot point whether we should not have been alerted sooner, the question is raised of the adequacy and efficacy of the inter-service (RCAF-USAF) consultative process and, more serious, the functioning of NORAD as an integrated command, assuming, as seems to be the case, that the Secretary’s decision stems from NORAD proposals. (Is the answer that NORAD is integrated only for operational purposes and not for planning? The purpose of the Agreement is to establish an integrated headquarters to exercise “operational control” over forces of the two countries made available to it. This surely implies consultation on planning and, in any event, the agreement specifies that the integrated arrangements “increase the importance of fullest possible consultation between the two governments on all matters affecting the joint defence of North America.”) In any event, as far as the RCAF is concerned (and perhaps the Canadian Government also), it is confronted with a fait accompli, being granted only “observer” status in the consequent discussions as to which USA sites should be phased out now.

Questions Posed by the Secretary of Defense Proposals

9. (1) What is the extent of the USA decision and what will be the immediate effect of the phase-out as planned for Fiscal Year '64 on the Canadian element of the Continental Air Defence System (CADIN), i.e., is its completion and subsequent sustained operation supportable militarily?
- (2) What are the longer run defence implications for progressive phasing out of the USA SAGE system and development of the IMI concept for CADIN (e.g., Will BOMARC and Voodoo continue to be supportable defensive weapons?) and for Canada's role in air defence of North America?
- (3) Notwithstanding the actual military implications, what are the likely domestic political implications, assuming the USA decision becomes public, as is likely? It would seem, for one, that the Government could be open to criticism that it is supporting an obsolete system in SAGE and BOMARC (and Voodoo?). The argument against nuclear weapons could be fortified.
- (4) Does this situation permit a valid charge to be levied that the RCAF's participation in NORAD has been rendered ineffective on the planning side as opposed to command, etc.? This depends on whether NORAD is integrated for planning as well as operations. The references to a NORAD report may have strictly meant CONAD (Continental Air Defence). On the other hand, if it were a NORAD report, should it not be submitted to the Minister of National Defence?<sup>41</sup>
- (5) In any event, the report is a NORAD one in effect and the spirit, if not the letter, of the CADIN and NORAD Agreements and of joint defence generally would appear to have been violated by absence of consultation (assuming there has been no formal consultation with Ministers). This is exacerbated by the fact that such consultation was conceded in the NORAD report to be desirable, if not required.
- (6) What are the implications of the USA action in this case on joint defence? Have they decided to go it alone on North American Defence?

Suggested Course of Action

10. (1) An immediate meeting with RCAF (and presumably the Deputy Minister of National Defence's office) to obtain any possible elaboration of the above and to discuss implications and the course to be recommended to Ministers.

Subject to the foregoing:

- (2) Inform the Minister and the Prime Minister.
- (3) Ask the Embassy to enquire formally of the USA Government's intentions and plans regarding publicity.
- (4) In the light of the Embassy's information, reconsider with all departments which might be concerned, e.g., DND, DOT, DDP.
- (5) Consider whether further action – e.g., representations, if any, should be recommended, and on what – e.g., substance of the USA decision, timing of it, lack of consultation.<sup>42</sup>

Aide-mémoire de l'ambassade des États-UnisAide-mémoire by Embassy of United States

Ottawa, January 11, 1963

The Embassy has been authorized to give to the representatives of the Government of Canada the following statement of views in response to questions raised by the Canadian representatives at the last meeting:

1. After a most careful review of the proposal for fly-down, the conclusion has been reached that such an arrangement is not attainable. Aside from tactical disadvantages and serious practicable difficulties, such as the RCAF going at the wrong time in the wrong direction, legal advisers within the United States Government have confirmed the previous view of the impossibility of the United States Government releasing control of the weapons for free flight, including return to Canadian bases, until the military emergency was far advanced. At such stage of emergency the usefulness of RCAF aircraft would be greatly degraded at a critical time for effective defense purposes since they would not be in a normally prescribed defense location.

2. The Department of Defense after a most careful technical study has concluded that there is no practicable alternative to the umbilical cable or the ejector rack for the CF-101 problem if the "missing part" concept has to be adhered to.

3. The official level in Washington believes that very considerable reluctance exists at a high policy level to entering into any contrived agreement on the nuclear question which would not meet urgent and effective defense requirements. In this connection it should be recalled that talks to this date have been exploratory and that no United States Government position has yet been taken on this vital question. In view of this and because the U.S. negotiating team could only report the findings outlined in paragraphs 1 and 2 above, the proposed meeting to discuss the foregoing at this time would not appear useful.

Ottawa, January 15, 1963

It will be recalled that at the informal discussion on January 11, 1963 the representatives of the Canadian Government raised several questions regarding the meaning of numbered paragraph three of the Embassy's Aide-Mémoire of January 11, copy attached. The Canadian representatives requested these clarifications in order that they might inform their principals of current thinking by the United States Government on the question of a nuclear stockpile agreement. In pursuance of this desire on the part of the Canadian representatives, the Embassy has transmitted their questions to the Department of State and has now received a reply as follows:

1. We believe there may not have been full clarity on the Canadian side at Paris as to the basic thrust of United States views. We understand that in the Paris conversation the United States side indicated its preparedness to try to meet the Canadian problem but pointed out that any arrangements reached must provide for an effective defensive posture.<sup>43</sup>

2. The importance of this latter essential continues to prevail in United States thinking. Consequently, while the cartridge approach for the CF-101 and the idea of moving “missing parts” to Canadian bases at a DEFCON level as low as four would represent a considerable improvement in the operation of the missing piece concept, such improvement would be insufficient to meet an urgent and effective defense requirement which really calls for the ability to respond within likely time of any warning without running the risks of possible last minute difficulties in moving missing parts to Canada in time of emergency.

3. While the most practical solution would be the normal stockpile agreement of the type which the United States has with most other allies, the United States Government is prepared to negotiate with Canada an arrangement involving the missing piece concept, provided the missing piece is stored in Canada and is one which can be installed with minimum delay. The missing piece could possibly be under either United States or Canadian custody.

4. With reference to the views expressed in the Aide-Mémoire of January 11 the United States Government had no thought of discontinuing the talks or of changing the channel of talks, but simply saw no need for a team to go to Ottawa at this particular time since the Embassy could convey the substance on the two outstanding factual questions set forth in numbered paragraphs one and two of the Aide-Mémoire under reference.

As a follow-up to the two Aide-Mémoires presented on January 11 and [15], Ivan White called on January 18 to show me the text of a telegram Mr. Rusk had sent to the U.S. Embassy in Ottawa under date of December 20 concerning the Ministerial talks in Paris. The telegram was to the following effect:

Rusk and McNamara met alone with Green and Harkness on December 19 to discuss Canada's nuclear problem. We said we were ready to help the Canadians meet their difficulties so long as the method did not impair the objective of regional defence. In this connection we made clear that there was no point in having a solution so contrived that it would not achieve this objective.

<sup>43</sup> Green, Harkness, Rusk et McNamara se sont rencontrés à Paris le 14 décembre 1962. Les ministres canadiens ont alors eu l'impression que le gouvernement américain souhaitait donner suite au projet de « pièce manquante ». Ulérieurement, McNamara a téléphoné à Harkness pour lui faire savoir que ce projet était en fait considéré comme irréalisable. À l'époque, Green n'a pas été informé de cette conversation : c'est le département d'État qui a mis au courant l'ambassade du Canada à Washington le 25 janvier 1963. Voir H. Basil Robinson, Diefenbaker's World: A Populist in Foreign Affairs (Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1989), p. 299, 334 n.3.

Green, Harkness, Rusk and McNamara met in Paris on December 14, 1962. The Canadian ministers received the impression that the American government was willing to pursue the “missing part” idea. Subsequently, McNamara telephoned Harkness to say that the proposal was in fact considered unworkable. Green was not informed of this conversation at the time; the Canadian Embassy in Washington learned about it from the State Department on January 25, 1963. See H. Basil Robinson, Diefenbaker's World: A Populist in Foreign Affairs (Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1989), pp. 299, 334 n.3.

In short, there was no meeting of minds regarding a satisfactory solution. It was agreed that talks at the official level were to continue.

Attached is a copy of the statement released to the press simultaneously, in Washington by the State in Washington and in Ottawa by the United States Embassy at 6.15 p.m. today concerning United States-Canadian negotiations regarding nuclear weapons.<sup>44</sup> Half an hour before release time, officers of our Embassy in Washington and of the Department of External Affairs in Ottawa were given advance notice that the release was being made and were given the text.

2. In Ottawa, the text was made available by the United States Embassy without comment. In Washington, presentation of the text (to Mr. H.B. Robinson) was accompanied by the following oral comments, after an apology for the shortness of the notice:

(1) There had been four years of discussions between the two governments on the question of nuclear weapons for the Canadian forces. All had proved abortive and not for technical reasons.

(2) With respect to the negotiations relating to nuclear weapons systems in Canada, the U.S. authorities had thoroughly examined the idea of storing some component parts in the U.S.A. but had arrived at the considered view that such an arrangement would be a contrived solution which might not only fail to strengthen continental air defence, but might create added confusion at a time of emergency and might mislead people as to the state of continental defence.

(3) The U.S. authorities do not see the relevance of the references to the Nassau Agreement, in your statement in the House on January 25, in relation to the question of nuclear warheads for Canadian forces in Europe.<sup>45</sup> They do not see that Nassau would justify delays in providing the warheads since the weapons available to Canadian forces in Europe only become effective with nuclear warheads.

(4) Regarding your references to the problem of obsolescence in modern armaments, there is in the United States view a difference between scrapping weapons which are becoming obsolete and immobilizing modern weapons which are not effective without nuclear warheads.

3. In addition to the foregoing points, some of which are touched upon in the public release, Robinson was informed that the following additional factors entered into the United States decision to issue the release:

<sup>44</sup> Voir/See "U.S. and Canadian Negotiations Regarding Nuclear Weapons," Department of State Bulletin, Vol. 48, No. 1234 (February 18, 1963), pp. 243-244.

(a) The United States had felt obliged to set out in factual terms the status of the problem as seen by the United States in the light of your statement of January 25.

(b) There had been considerable public speculation, mainly in Canada but some in the United States, which had made it necessary for the United States to state its side of the case.

(c) The fact that the disclosure about the secret negotiations had been made in Ottawa without prior notice to Washington had caused much concern in Washington, even though no reference was made to this aspect in the public release.

4. Robinson was also informed that the public release had been so drafted as not to preclude further negotiations. United States authorities realized that publication would cause controversy in Canada but they had found it impossible to withhold it after careful consideration of all the circumstances.

5. The Embassy in Washington will be reporting the above oral comments more fully by telegram.

When I heard the news about the USA Statement last night, I phoned Kohaly about the Legion reaction.

He outlined the Legion thinking on the nuclear warheads and gave me the resolution finally accepted. (It backed your stand.) On the Sovereignty issue he thought it would bring strong reaction from the Legion in favour of Canada making its own decision.

Mervyn Woods came down to see [me]. After a long discussion, he thought if the issue was put the right way (the right of Canadians to make own decisions and control own military action) then the soldiers' attitude in 2 wars would rally behind the Government in its efforts to preserve Canadian identification. (In 2 wars we struggled to free ourselves from British control of our military actions.) In his judgment it would be easier to raise this issue against the USA. In other words, the Canadian serviceman would resent British domination less than American domination.

In general I detected a feeling that Pearson made a mistake in changing his policy. Most people are not opposed to nuclear warheads. That is not the issue. The issue now is "Are the Americans pushing us around?"

I thought these observations might be worthwhile. The general political climate in the West is good.

DEFENCE NEGOTIATIONS WITH U.S.A.

The Aide Mémoire of January 11 contained in its third paragraph language which implied that the views of the Ministers of the USA Government had not been ascertained on the various proposals which had been the subject of the negotiations to that date. Because we were aware that Ministerial conversations had taken place in Paris, in which you participated, we asked that this aspect be clarified before any attempt be made to present views in writing. As a result, the second Aide Mémoire dated January 15 was presented. For all practical purposes it is only that memorandum to which consideration need be given. Its main elements are:

- (1) an assertion that the proposal to airlift missing parts to Canada while a "considerable improvement," would still be insufficient to meet operational requirements;
- (2) a counter-proposal that the missing part in respect of each system be stored in Canada;
- (3) a re-affirmation of the intention to continue the negotiations through existing channels.

2. Points (1) and (2) of the USA communication of January 15 raise considerations which ought to be explored further with the USA. These are discussed in detail below.

- (1) The idea of moving missing parts from locations in the United States to Canadian bases, even if the airlift were to take place at as low an alert level as DEFCON-4, is not acceptable because it would be insufficient to meet defence requirements, which are defined as "the ability to respond within likely time of any warning without running the risks of possible last minute difficulties in moving missing parts to Canada in time of emergency."

Comment:

This position can be questioned on several grounds:

(a) The judgment about the military effectiveness of "the missing part" concept was being applied to the "warhead arming plug" in respect of the Bomarc; and to the "ejector rack cartridge" in the case of the MB-1. In so far as the latter is concerned it had already been indicated to the American team that this piece of equipment, because it is not part of the warhead, might not be reconcilable with the Cabinet directive and that their attention should be directed to the search for missing parts of the warhead itself. Thus the USA appear to have included in their rejection a missing part which on our side might not have been acceptable.

(b) The judgment is made that the time in which these two weapons systems could be brought to operational readiness using the above-mentioned two missing parts (with 4 loading crews, for Bomarc 1 hr. 55 min. to 2 hr. 10 min.; for CF-101, 40-50 min.) does not meet operational requirements even if activated at DEFCON-4. This statement can be questioned on two grounds:

- (i) A review of NORAD alerts shows that 3 times in the last six years NORAD has been placed on DEFCON-4 alert. (July 15 to August 2, 1958 – Lebanese crisis; May, 1960 – U-2 incident; October, 1962 – Cuban crisis.) On any of these occasions, which were not followed by immediate transition to higher states of alert, the airlift of the missing parts could in fact have been accomplished without encountering "last minute difficulties ... in time of emergency” as claimed by the Americans. The record demonstrates that NORAD goes on to DEFCON-4 in periods of sharply rising international tension.

(ii) The only contingency in which the missing part concept would not meet operational requirements would be that of surprise, all-out nuclear attack on North America. Quite apart from the unlikelihood of such a contingency arising without any warning through intelligence channels, there has never been an intention on the Canadian side to try to meet that contingency. To do so would require the acquisition and stationing of nuclear warheads in Canada in peacetime, and that alternative was specifically excluded from the terms of reference governing the negotiations to date. Had there been any intention to allow for that contingency, no negotiations would have been needed. Our purpose throughout has been to find a means of satisfying to the greatest degree possible the requirements of effective defence by reducing to the absolute minimum the time lapse in which the warheads could be made available from sources in the USA for Canadian delivery systems. Specifically, the object has been to find a means of arming all the Canadian delivery systems in under 3 hours, the warning time for impending bomber attack – the only kind of attack against which the Canadian nuclear defence weapons would be effective. The whole missing part concept was devoted to this end.

(2) The USA has made a counter-proposal, still purporting to be within “the missing part” concept, that the missing part be stored in Canada separately from the warhead under either USA or Canadian custody.

Comment:

This counter-proposal fails to meet the clearly stated Canadian objective: to find an arrangement which still would not amount to having on Canadian soil in peacetime operational warheads. If both parts were located in Canada, regardless of who held custody of “the missing part,” it would be difficult, if not impossible, to maintain this policy objective.

The only possible attraction of the proposal to locate the missing part in Canada is the offer of Canadian custody of it. If agreed to, such custody might be claimed to give Canada more complete control over the weapons than would the standard “two key” arrangement in use in other NATO countries.

3. To re-start the negotiations, it is recommended:

(a) that if the American counter-proposal to have both parts located in Canada is unacceptable, the USA be so informed with the explanation that it fails to take account of a fundamental Canadian policy objective as outlined above;

(b) that the American assertion that “the missing part” concept, when reduced to an operational readiness time factor of less than two and a half hours for all delivery systems, fails to meet the requirements of effective defence, even when coupled with activation at DEFCON-4, be questioned on the record of this state of alert in the past. It probably should be reiterated to the Americans that we are not seeking through these negotiations to meet the situation of total surprise attack; the objective is the most effective arrangement to meet any emergency short of that single contingency.

4. Before putting those views either orally or in writing to the Americans, it would be necessary for Ministers to consider again whether they were prepared, in relation to the MB-1, to accept the feasibility of using "the ejector rack cartridge" as the missing part or whether they would wish to revert to the earlier position, viz., that the USA experts should continue their search for a suitable part which is a part of the warhead itself.

of Permanent Joint Board on Defence*

San Diego, February 4-8, 1963

8. REDUCTION OF AIR DEFENSE FACILITIES (SECRET)

The U.S. Chairman requested that the USAF Member make a presentation on this subject.

The USAF Member reported that the U.S. Secretary of Defense, in submitting his budget recommendations for FY 1964 to the President, had indicated the desirability of phasing out soft SAGE Direction Centers, which were particularly vulnerable because of their location at SAC bases, and of prime radar locations which would be redundant to the needs of a modified system. This change in the Air Defense program was motivated by the concept that any enemy bomber attack would follow an initial strike performed by missiles. Given their location at some SAC bases, that is, at prime targets, the ability of the Direction Centers to survive was placed in serious doubt. This, in turn, would mean that they could not be counted on to perform their function in defense against any enemy bomber strike. For these reasons, engineering studies were being undertaken to identify which of the facilities would have to be inactivated. All of the Direction Centers in question were located in the United States.

The USAF Member went on to say the USAF and RCAF were working closely together on this problem. The action contemplated was not to be considered as reducing the importance of the overall U.S.-Canadian air defense system, but rather involved a change in the configuration of the system to meet a changing pattern of potential missile and bomber strike threats. The entire air defense system was under scrutiny and the study would embrace weapons as well as ground environment. The USAF Member believed it important that the Board know of this program, not only because it could have an effect on NORAD but also because of its bearing on other aspects of the joint defense effort. He hoped that it would be possible to provide more specific details at the Board's next meeting, since a deadline of May 15, 1963 had been placed on the study. At present, all he was able to report was that six Direction Centers and 17 prime radar sites in the United States would be affected, although their locations had not yet been determined. No budgetary request had been submitted to the U.S. Congress for FY 1964 for these facilities.

The External Affairs Member stated that, naturally, such an important change as was forecast by the proposed overall study would be of concern to Canada, and hence a question for inter-governmental consideration. The External Affairs Member also stressed the sensitivity which might arise from any premature publicity on either side regarding these matters which were, by agreement, for joint consultation.

The RCAF Member said that any substantial change or withdrawal of Air Defence facilities in the U.S.A. would have an effect on Air Defence installations in Canada since the network was so closely tied together. For this reason, when any change was contemplated unilaterally, the impact on the North American Air Defence system as a whole should be considered before any final decisions were made.

The USAF Member acknowledged the importance of Canadian-U.S. coordination on plans and programs and publicity concerning NORAD and believed adequate consultation between the USAF and RCAF was taking place in these matters.

The Board agreed that this was an important question and that it should remain on the Agenda.

NUCLEAR WEAPONS POLICY

39. The Minister without Portfolio said it would be useful if the Secretary of State for External Affairs would report on the status of negotiations with the United States on the subject of nuclear weapons.

40. The Secretary of State for External Affairs said that the situation had not changed since his last report to the Cabinet on the subject. While he and the former Minister of National Defence were in Paris recently they had discussed it with the U.S. Secretaries of State and Defence who had indicated that the proposed arrangement would be acceptable to the United States if the details could be worked out satisfactorily. Later, the U.S. Minister in Ottawa had handed an Aide Mémoire to officials of the Department of External Affairs but had been persuaded to withdraw it. Subsequently, the Aide Mémoire had been accepted by the Canadian Government. It indicated that the U.S. government would not be prepared to enter into an arrangement including the storage in the U.S. of the nuclear warheads for possible use by Canada. Notwithstanding this, one paragraph in the Aide Mémoire had indicated that the U.S. was prepared to continue negotiations.

41. During the discussion the following points were raised:

(a) The Prime Minister, in his recent policy statement in the House of Commons,<sup>47</sup> had expressed the hope that the negotiations would continue and would achieve success. The government should negotiate actively, because the public would be watching with particular interest for signs of progress.

(b) The Associate Minister of National Defence said that the government should inform the public that announcements would be made in due course on the progress of negotiations. The crux of the matter was to state that the agreement would make clear that title to the nuclear weapons would never pass to Canada although such weapons might be used by Canada under conditions of emergency or actual battle. This would make it clear that Canada would not become a nuclear power and would not acquire these weapons in peacetime. This would be so even though the warheads are brought on to Canadian soil. The "little key" idea – keeping a vital component of the warhead in the U.S.A. – cannot be worked. The public would recognize that circumstances are different during actual hostilities.

(c) Other Ministers said that such a proposal would involve a major change of policy and would in practice mean the storage of these weapons on Canadian soil.

 See Canada, House of Commons, Debates, 1962-1963, Vol. 3, p. 3440.

(d) Some said that the Chiefs of Staff were inclined to the view that an arrangement to withhold a key component of a nuclear weapon for purposes of control would not be feasible, because in an emergency the weapons would have to be activated in perhaps an hour. Others said that such an arrangement would be entirely realistic and that the Chairman of the Chiefs of Staff had so described it.

(e) The whole matter of nuclear arms might have been kept out of party politics some time ago if a referendum had been held on it. This might have been desirable because the issue was one on which emotions ran high. Now, however, it was too late to treat the issue non-politically.

(f) The Prime Minister said that his recent statement in the House of Commons had been made on the basis of prior agreement of the whole Cabinet. The government had stated that negotiations would continue. Others noted that it had also been said that it was expected they would be completed satisfactorily, and that under the agreement these weapons would be readily available in case of need. A change of policy at this time would be extremely unwise, and would be regarded as a capitulation to the U.S. The government should make no further statement at this time, but must continue the negotiations.

(g) A group of Ministers had studied the agreements with the U.S. on F101 aircraft and Bomarc weapons, and had tentatively concluded that the government was under some degree of obligation to accept nuclear warheads for them. The question needed further and more careful examination. Some said that the agreement on the F101 aircraft clearly contemplated the possible use of conventional weapons.

(h) Some said the Chiefs of Staff were applying pressure upon the government on this subject. Others said the Chiefs of Staff had merely offered their advice on the military aspect of the question.

(i) Some said that the Canadian electorate should be told that the U.S. government wanted the nuclear weapons to be stored on Canadian soil. Others said that the policy of the U.S. government on this point was still classified as Top Secret and that it should not be disclosed by the Canadian government. Others said that in any case the question was one of basic principle and should not be made a political issue.

(j) This important subject required further consideration by the Cabinet at an early date. To facilitate this discussion a paper should be prepared, outlining the whole course of the negotiations with the U.S.

42. The Cabinet agreed that the Secretary of State for External Affairs would produce a memorandum as soon as possible for consideration by the Cabinet, reporting upon the whole course of the negotiations with the United States on nuclear weapons for Canadian forces in Canada and elsewhere and for U.S. forces in Canada.

Dear Charles [Ritchie],

As you know, negotiations took place in November and December last with a team of American experts who came twice to Ottawa for the purpose of developing a mutually satisfactory arrangement under which nuclear warheads for the Bomarc and CF-101s would be held on bases in the United States available for use by the RCAF on request of the Canadian Government when war appears imminent. So that you may be fully familiar with the stage at which these negotiations had arrived on December 4, 1962, when the negotiating teams last met in Ottawa, I am attaching a copy of a memorandum dated December 8. You will note that by using the "missing part" approach and a normal complement of loading crews at sites in Canada, it had proved possible to devise arrangements which would enable both the Bomarc and the CF-101s to be armed with their nuclear warheads in well under three hours, the likely warning time of any bomber attack on this continent.

At a meeting in Paris last December with Mr. Rusk and Mr. McNamara, in which I participated along with the former Minister of National Defence, the American Ministers indicated that they were prepared to work out with the Canadian Government a stand-by arrangement for the nuclear arming of the Bomarc and CF-101s in case of need. There was no suggestion at the time that the "missing part" proposal was incapable of meeting the requirements of effective defence. Nevertheless, in mid-January the United States Embassy in Ottawa left with the Department two aide mémoires (January 11 and January 15, copies attached) indicating that the proposal to airlift missing parts to Canada would be insufficient to meet operational needs, and counter-proposed that the missing parts in respect of both systems be stored in Canada under either United States or Canadian custody. At the same time, the aide mémoires confirmed the readiness of the United States authorities to continue the negotiations. Subsequently Mr. Rusk at his press conference on February 1 said in reply to questions, "These are matters which have been discussed with the Canadian Government in private talks and I would suppose that these private talks would be resumed."<sup>48</sup>

The Canadian Government is ready to resume the talks. Although the previous channel of communications has been through the United States Embassy in Ottawa, I would prefer to have you take the next step in Washington in order that the Canadian Government's views will be presented direct to the Secretary of State. For this purpose I am attaching the text of an aide mémoire given approval by Cabinet on February 12,† which you are to leave with Mr. Rusk and use in part as a guide in your oral remarks.

There may be a disposition on the part of the United States Government to postpone further negotiations until the Canadian elections are over on the ground that to proceed might have some bearing on the outcome, since nuclear policy has become an election issue. I think you might put it to Rusk that both sides are committed to a continuation of these talks and that any reluctance to resume them now might lead to further misunderstanding. In addition, of course, moving ahead as quickly as possible with these arrangements would demonstrate the concern of both Governments to meet continental defence requirements.

If Mr. Rusk should raise further outstanding questions relating to nuclear armament for Canadian forces in Europe or for United States forces in Canada, you should say that your instructions cover the subject matter of the aide mémoire only.

Yours sincerely,

[HOWARD C. GREEN]

CANADA—US CO-OPERATION

1. Further to telephone conversation CCJS(W)/CCOS Wednesday 13 February, CCJS(W) made a 45 minute call today on Honourable Paul Nitze, Assistant Secretary of Defense (International Security Affairs). All current aspects of Canada-US cooperation were fully and frankly discussed and some interesting new information was revealed.

2. Mr. Nitze stated that on taking up his present position in Kennedy Administration matter of good Canada-US co-operation was number one priority in his estimation. He cited his own active participation in F104 programme in compensation for failure of CL44 programme.

3. It was Mr. Nitze's belief that present Canada-US difficulties had become acute in US eyes following Paris meeting on 14 December 1962 of Messrs McNamara and Rusk with Messrs Harkness and Green at which point US authorities felt there would be no further satisfactory progress toward Canadian acceptance of nuclear weapons. Further he was of the opinion that US State Department statement of 30 January resulted directly from that part of Mr. Diefenbaker's speech in House of Commons on 25 January referring to necessity of undertaking clarification of Canada's role in NATO defence plans as result of Nassau communiqué. Mr. Nitze was firmly of impression that Prime Minister's statement referred to paragraph 8 of Nassau communiqué rather than paragraph 6 wherein tactical nuclear forces are mentioned. It was surprise to him to realize that role of Canada F104Gs in Europe might possibly be altered by assignment to any NATO multilateral nuclear force.

4. Mr. Nitze had no personal knowledge of any request to Canada for large numbers of over-flights of SAC aircraft with nuclear weapons during Cuban crisis, as mentioned by columnist Marcus Childs in Washington Post on 13 February.<sup>49</sup> Mr. Nitze said he would find out about this situation and let me know in due course. On a visit to JCS immediately following my conversation with Mr. Nitze, JCS staff confirmed that they had no knowledge of request for additional over-flights.

5. On other unrelated matters Mr. Nitze confirmed speculation that Italy did not wish to commit herself for or against providing base facilities for three Polaris submarines until after Italian elections at end of April. With regard to Spain, he considered that it was very desirable militarily for Spain to join NATO but that there would probably be overriding political reasons against such steps at this time.

6. Generally Mr. Nitze appeared to be deeply concerned over the Canada-US rift and was most genial in offering to seek and report further facts. He stated that good relations between us were still of top priority in his estimation.

Aide-mémoire de l'ambassade aux États-Unis

Aide-mémoire by Embassy in United States

Washington, February 21, 1963

On January 11, the United States Embassy in Ottawa left with the Department of External Affairs an Aide-Mémoire setting out the replies of the United States Government to a number of questions which had been posed at the last meeting of officials on December 4, 1962. Clarification of certain points made in the U.S. Aide-Mémoire of January 11 was requested by the Canadian side. This was supplied in the further Aide-Mémoire of January 15, 1963. The following Canadian comments are offered in connection with both documents.

(1) Reference has been made to the meetings between Canadian and United States Ministers in Paris on December 14, 1962, in terms which suggest that there may have been a Canadian misunderstanding as to the main U.S. preoccupation. The Canadian understanding of these talks was that the United States was prepared to work out with the Canadian Government a stand-by arrangement for the arming of the Bomarc and CF-101s in case of need. There was no suggestion that the "missing part" proposal was incapable of meeting the requirements of effective defence.

(2) The Aide-Mémoire of January 11 noted that if the "missing part" concept were to be applied, there was no practicable alternative to the umbilical cable or the ejector rack cartridge for the CF-101. The Canadian side is prepared to explore further the best means of reducing to a minimum the time required to make the CF-101 operational with the MB-1 missile. In respect of the Bomarc, the Canadian side understands that the use of the warhead arming plug would provide a practicable solution.

(3) The Aide-Mémoire of January 15 asserted that the movement of missing parts to Canadian bases at a DEFCON level as low as four, while representing a considerable improvement in the operation of the "missing part" concept, would still be insufficient to meet an urgent and effective defence requirement. The latter was defined as "the ability to respond within likely time of any warning without running the risks of possible last-minute difficulties in moving missing parts to Canada in time of emergency." The Canadian side has the following comments to offer in this connection.

(a) A review of NORAD alerts shows that three times in the last six years NORAD has been placed on DEFCON-four alert in periods of sharply rising international tension (July 15 to August 2, 1958 – Lebanese crisis; May 1960 – U2 incident; October 1962 – Cuba crisis). On any of these occasions, which were not followed by immediate transition to higher states of alerts, the airlift of missing parts could in fact have been accomplished without encountering "last-minute difficulties in time of emergency."

(b) Both of the Canadian delivery systems are effective only against bomber attack and the object of the negotiations to date has been to find the most effective arrangement for arming the Canadian delivery systems in under three hours, the likely warning time for impending bomber attack. The proposals under consideration as of the December 4, 1962 meeting of the negotiating teams demonstrated that it is possible to be well within this warning time.

(4) The U.S.A., in its Aide-Mémoire of January 15, has made a counter-proposal that essential missing parts be stored in Canada separately from the warhead, under either U.S.A. or Canadian custody. This counter-proposal fails to meet the Canadian objective of negotiating a stand-by arrangement which would not involve the storage on Canadian soil in peace-time of fully operational warheads.

It is noted from the Aide-Mémoire of January 15, that the United States Government had not thought of discontinuing the talks. On its side, the Canadian Government is ready to continue the negotiations.

Washington, February 21, 1963

I saw Rusk by arrangement this afternoon and gave him the Aide Mémoire on nuclear weapons negotiations. I emphasized that on the Canadian side we felt that the talks so far had been making real progress toward agreement on the basis of the "missing parts" concept. As I understood it, the time element had been sufficiently narrowed to make the concept feasible and we had come close to agreement on what the particular missing parts might be. In putting forward the Aide Mémoire, the Government was in effect confirming its belief that the degree of progress already made warranted continuation of the talks.

After reading the memorandum and listening to my comments, Rusk said with some emphasis that it had not been the United States view that the Ottawa talks had been discontinued. Later he came back twice more to the same theme and said it was important that no impression be left that my interview with him represented some new development. I was able to assure him that there was no difference between the United States and Canadian positions on this score since one of the purposes of the Aide Mémoire was to state the Canadian Government's readiness to continue the negotiations.

On the Aide Mémoire itself, Rusk said that they would study it very carefully and give us a reaction. He went on to say that, without anticipating their reply, he would like to make some comments to explain the United States position as it had developed up to the last United States Aide Mémoire on January 15. He explained that their preoccupation had been to reconcile the Canadian desire for a missing part solution with what they considered to be the requirements of operational efficiency in the probable circumstances of an emergency. He said that the time factor was a matter of very great importance as well as the "simplicity" of the arrangements. It was with these considerations in mind that he had sought, in talking to you in Paris, to suggest some arrangement whereby all the necessary equipment to make the weapons operational would be present in Canada, but the "conditions of non-operability" would be worked out "in Canada, by Canada." He said that they had difficulty in seeing the difference between holding the missing part separately in Canada and having it on a stand-by basis somewhere in the United States. Their preference for having it in Canada was that there could be a significant time differential.

I pointed out that for the Canadian Government there was a considerable difference involved. If the missing part was on Canadian soil it would be virtually impossible for the Canadian Government to say that integrated nuclear weapons were not present in Canada. I said that you had been proceeding on the assumption that there was a basis for further discussion directed toward finding a mutually satisfactory arrangement under which the missing part would not be on Canadian soil. This had been your understanding of the basis of the Paris discussions.

Rusk stressed once again the importance attached by the United States side to an operationally efficient solution. Their technical experts had objected to the use of the umbilical cable for the Voodoo partly because of the time that would be taken in assembling it with the warhead and partly because there was increased danger of explosion if the umbilical cable were attached in other than normal conditions. I then pointed out that we did not exclude the ejector rack cartridge as an alternative to the umbilical cable. I went on to emphasize again that in the talks so far the arming time had been narrowed down to less than three hours and that in the Canadian view there was really not very far to go in reaching an agreement on the basis of the missing part concept which would be applicable to the warning time to be expected in all contingencies except a sudden all-out nuclear attack.

Rusk picked up a reference I made to the series of DEFCON stages and said that the trouble was that the movement through those stages could be extremely rapid since, as he put it, someone else was writing the scenario. He repeated that it was because of their concern over the timing aspect that he had tentatively suggested various ideas in Paris. Here he mentioned the leasing of a site in Canada to the United States and the possibility of putting a chain with two keys on the weapons. In putting forward these ideas he had been groping for an arrangement whereby (a) Canada could accurately contend that it did not have operational warheads on its soil in peacetime but (b) the weapons could be quickly transformed into full operational readiness in an emergency.

After undertaking again to study the whole matter, Rusk said that he wished to raise one related problem which he hoped would not arise but which he thought it desirable to mention. He said that in the next two months or so both the Canadian and United States Governments would be going through a sensitive period, in Canada because of the elections and in the United States because of the deep public interest in the problems confronting the Administration in the broad fields of foreign and strategic policy. He was sure that the Canadian Government would share the hope of the United States that nothing would arise to confuse issues within the Alliance or otherwise cause undesirable repercussions. He thought it only right to say that in view of the importance of avoiding misunderstandings, they would wish to feel free to clarify their own position in the unlikely event that any major confusion as to that position might develop. Rusk emphasized that he did not wish to anticipate difficulties, but explained that the necessity for public explanation of United States attitudes, in Congress and elsewhere, was so demanding that they would not wish to be precluded from clarifying where they stood if the need arose.

As I left there was a brief exchange on what might be said to the press. I explained that I was under instructions to make no comment, and Rusk agreed that nothing would be said from the State Department until there had been an opportunity for me to determine whether some brief statement could be authorized. Subsequently, as you know, it was possible to arrive at an agreed press line.

I am reporting separately on the part of the conversation which was devoted to Laos.<sup>50</sup>

NUCLEAR WEAPONS

The Canadian agreements for the use of Nuclear Warheads were based upon military assumptions which were apparently sound in 1958 before the development of long range missiles had reached either the power or the range they have today. This applies equally to the Americans and the Russians.

The Bomarc was intended as a weapon only to be used from fixed bases for the destruction of long-range aircraft carrying nuclear bombs.

The reason for the use of nuclear warheads, instead of conventional warheads is that the nuclear warhead cooks the aircraft and the nuclear bomb and renders it harmless.

These bombs were not intended to be fired over enemy territory but with[in] Canada itself. When this plan was made there were to have been Bomarc bases right across Canada from coast to coast. The fact is that only two of these bases have been completed.

On the estimate of General Guy Simonds (generally recognized as the best soldier produced in the last war) these would not be effective more than one thousandth of one percent of the weapons for use for attack.<sup>51</sup>

This means that the present Bomarc bases are for all practical purposes – useless.

This development is the result of American and Russian skill in the improvement of nuclear weapons. This is the reality which always must be faced in the constant change of weapons year by year.

The Bomarc bases have become useless and millions of dollars of the taxpayers' money would be thrown away for no purpose whatever if nuclear warheads were permitted for these two isolated bases.

It must be recognized that the limitation on the number of these bases is just as much the responsibility of the United States as it is of Canada.

No question of moral or contractual obligation arises. When weapons become obsolete any Government that has a sense of responsibility must take steps to stop acquiring those weapons. The honouring of a contract which would throw away Canadian money in the suggested fulfillment of an obligation which everyone knows would be nothing more than the purchase of obsolete hardware would not be moral responsibility.

Without elaborating, the same argument applies to the nuclear warheads for the Voodoo (101). If it is a correct assumption that the Russians would not be likely to use long-range bombers, then the meaning of the Voodoo is senseless, and a costly form of insanity.

Then we come to the situation in Europe. When Plan 70 was approved, the long-range missile had not reached its present power. It was thought that what has been described as a tactical nuclear force could be employed, first of all to destroy Russian intermediate missile bases, and also if necessary, to stem the tide of superior line forces.

In discussion on this subject with senior officials including Lord Mountbatten, I have recently found no officer of the opinion that there is such a thing as a [lissé blanc/left blank] nuclear war. They all agree that the moment anyone starts using nuclear weapons of any size then the balloon goes up.

If that is so, then whatever money we may have spent on aircraft in compliance with undertakings made during a period when the whole military concept was different, no longer applies today.

In my opinion, costly through the 104-Gs may have been, nothing can justify the manning of these aircraft with nuclear weapons unless one is prepared to accept the proposition that we are prepared to take our share in the possible beginning of a nuclear war.

I know that the situation now is that there are nuclear weapons which could be used.

We have fulfilled our part of the contract to the letter by providing the carrying aircraft which could use the nuclear warheads now in storage.

I think it goes beyond this. I think that we must recognize the change in the whole military picture and recognize that there is no longer any such thing as a tactical operation – from the ultimate strategic employment of the nuclear weapons.

This all leads to the urgent and compelling necessity for a re-examination of what the real concept of nuclear war really is, or shall we say the possibility of avoiding a nuclear war by deterrents.

President Kennedy talks about having only one finger on the button, and Lord Home has supported him in that statement.

The fact remains, however, that if the new American proposal for nuclear submarines with Polaris missiles, and surface ships, with Polaris missiles, as well as tactical forces in Europe, should be carried out, then it is obvious that if this force is to be effective at all there are many fingers on the trigger, and it is nonsense to talk about only one finger being on the button, because this applies to the long-range strategic weapons as compared to the conventional weapons.

Under these circumstances my contention would be that there should be no attempt to expand or justify our position under the contracts. It should be pointed out that just as in the past these contracts have become obsolete; the weapons have become obsolete; and we should not buy obsolete weapons to put into the junk pile.

PERSONAL AND CONFIDENTIAL

[Ottawa], February 26, 1963

My dear John [Diefenbaker],

You will just be arriving in Ottawa about now,<sup>52</sup> and I hasten to send clippings of last night's and today's papers. I do think that the coverage was excellent. I am sure you realize that speeches are never reported in detail here the way they are in Canada, but it does seem to me that you got your main points over very clearly and that the photographs are excellent.

If there are any of these photographs you would like in their original form, do let me know. Because of the time that it takes to get them printed and their bulk in forwarding them, I would suggest that if there are some you wish for dispatch, you simply get the single copies which I can forward under hard cover and have them reproduced in Ottawa. I particularly like the photographs of Olive and yourself taken in the carriage because this is the first occasion when any Prime Minister of Canada has proceeded to Guildhall with our own RCMP escort in one of The Queen's landaus.

As you know, after I had the opportunity to chat with Gordon Churchill last night following dinner, I dictated a memorandum to Marion setting out some views in regard to nuclear weapons. I went over them in detail with Gordon and he said that he was in entire agreement with my assessment of the situation:

(a) The Bomarc's are only a very small fraction of the screen which was intended to be erected across Canada, and as Guy Simonds pointed out in his statement last week, would be almost 100% ineffective even if the Russians should engage in the supreme folly of sending a heavy bomber force over Canada to the United States;

(b) The 101 (Voodoo) was designed to carry an anti-bomber nuclear weapon only intended to be used within Canada. Precisely the same argument applies to this as applies to the Bomarc. As Simonds pointed out, and after all he has been declared by Eisenhower and Alexander to be the best soldier we produced in the last war, it is unthinkable that with the development in the last two or three years of long-range intercontinental missiles of a power and accuracy not contemplated in 1958, at the time the tentative agreements were signed for the use of what are now obsolete weapons, the Russians would launch an attack with heavy bombers;

(c) When the original decision was made under Plan 70 to equip what is described as a Tactical Force with nuclear warheads, the uncertainty of the long-range intercontinental missile still left some possibility of considering localized nuclear war. It was with this in mind that the 104-Gs were ordered with the idea of being ready to attack Russian missile sites near the frontier if they began an offensive, and on the other hand, having regard to their superior manpower, effectively disorganizing massed army formations. Both of these concepts have been rendered obsolete by events.

No senior officer to whom I have spoken in recent months has suggested for a moment that there is such a thing as a two-stage nuclear war. The explosion of a nuclear bomb discloses itself immediately by the formation of the cloud, and the moment this happens nobody is going to start asking themselves what kind of nuclear bomb it was. Obviously the balloon would then go up. Under these circumstances the agreements of 1958 have no sensible application.

The point I would like to make and to re-emphasize is that no question of morality or the fulfilment of contractual obligations is involved. The whole history of warfare, from the time that the Assyrians first started to use hardened iron spears several thousand years ago, has been one of constant improvement in destructive power of new weapons which have rendered obsolete those already employed. After all, we have had experience of this ourselves. The excellent 25-pounders of the last war which cost in excess of $100,000 apiece with their equipment, were sold for scrap for less than $200. The same applies to other weapons disposed of more recently. The same applies equally to nuclear weapons which it happens are the most expensive and most deadly yet devised.

Only today we have reports of the wide difference of opinion between Britain and the United States in regard to the surface ships to be manned by international crews.<sup>53</sup> Indicative of the unbending attitude of the President of the United States, I heard over the radio this morning that he had said last night in Washington that the Americans were not prepared to consider any other arrangement.<sup>54</sup>

Under all these circumstances I can only repeat my own belief that while in the first instance, if we had been in a position to carry out immediately the terms of Plan 70, we might have been under some obligation to take our share in a programme which is now obsolete, the scientific advances in the United States itself have rendered obsolete the whole concept covered by the 1958 agreement and we would only be buying at very large cost obsolete hardware now ready for the junk pile.

I can't begin to tell you how much Fiorenza and I enjoyed the opportunity, in between all the other events, to chat with Olive and yourself privately, and to learn more of what actually has been happening in the strange sequence of events at home.

All of the best.

Dear Arthur [Menzies]:

REDUCTION OF NORTH AMERICAN AIR DEFENCE FACILITIES

You will recall that at the last PJBD meeting the USAF Member referred to the intention of the United States defence authorities to phase out soft SAGE detection centres and prime radar locations which would be redundant to the needs of a modified system. According to the Journal prepared after the meeting, the USAF Member reported that six direction centres and seventeen prime radar sites in the United States would be affected although their locations had not yet been determined. It was agreed that consultations between the USAF and RCAF on this problem would continue.

You will be interested to know that late last week the Air Member at the Canadian Joint Staff, Air Commodore Newsome, was informed by the USAF that a decision had been taken by the Defence authorities to close out some time around August or September 1963 SAGE detection centres at the following locations:

- (1) Spokane

<sup>54</sup> Aucun document ne fait état d'une telle déclaration faite le 25 février par le président lui-même. Pour plus d'information sur les faits auxquels Drew pourrait faire référence, voir "U.S. Seeking Two Types of A-Force," Globe and Mail, February 26, 1963, p. 1; "U.S. Pressing for Nato Missile Fleet," Times (London), February 27, 1963, p. 7.

No report has been found of such a statement on February 25 by the President himself. For reports on the developments to which Drew may be referring, see "U.S. Seeking Two Types of A-Force," Globe and Mail, February 26, 1963, p. 1; "U.S. Pressing for Nato Missile Fleet," Times (London), February 27, 1963, p. 7.

- (2) Grand Forks
- (3) Minot
- (4) Sault Ste Marie (Michigan)
- (5) Syracuse
- (6) San Francisco

In addition to the fact that one of these stations is located right on the Canadian border, five of them are manned by both Canadian and United States personnel. The Air Member also learned that it was the intention of the United States defence authorities to issue a press release on Friday, March 8, concerning the closing down of these stations. In addition it was planned to send letters to Congressmen representing the constituencies where these sites are located.

On receipt of this information, the Air Member had discussions with USAF authorities the result of which was that they decided to modify their proposed press release so that mention would be made only of [the] two stations at Grand Forks and Minot. The USAF also indicated their intention to play the press release in a "minor key." At the same time, they made it clear that it would be necessary to follow the usual procedure of sending letters to Congressmen concerned.

Attached for your information is a copy of the telegram sent by the Air Member to Air Defence Headquarters in Ottawa which contains text of the press release which was issued on March 8.† A copy of the letter sent to Congressmen in the areas affected is also attached.†

As far as we can determine the press release has not been picked up by any of the local papers nor have any enquiries been made of the Joint Staff or the Pentagon by the Canadian press here.

The State Department were unaware until the eleventh hour of what was afoot. When Carlson learned from us what was going on, he was able to persuade the USAF to delete the word "rapid" from the last paragraph of the press release.

Since Air Commodore Newsome passed us this information on a personal basis, I would be grateful if you could restrict the distribution to Ross Campbell and others directly concerned with this problem.

All good wishes.

Yours sincerely,

H.B. ROBINSON

MEETING OF CANADA-UNITED STATES SENIOR POLICY COMMITTEE ON DEFENCE PRODUCTION SHARING
KEY WEST, FLORIDA, JANUARY 12, 1962

On Friday, January 12, as had been previously agreed with the Department, I attended the meeting of the Senior Policy Committee on Production Sharing at Key West. A copy of the Agenda of the meeting is attached. It is assumed that the Department has copies of other background documents for this meeting.

2. The Canadian group was led by Mr. D.A. Golden, Deputy Minister, Department of Defence Production. He was assisted by officials of his own Department, including his Assistant Deputy Minister, Mr. W.H. Huck, and his representative in Washington, Mr. J.A. Teeter. Representatives of other departments concerned in Ottawa were also present. The American group was led by the Honourable Thomas D. Morris, Assistant Secretary of Defence (Installations and Logistics). He was supported by the Assistant Secretary of the Navy (I and L), the Honourable Mr. K.E. BeLieu, and other officials of OSD and the Departments of the Army, Navy and Air Force.

3. As in the past, a detailed report of the meeting will be prepared and made available to the Department. Meanwhile, the following is a résumé of the highlights of the meeting.

4. The meeting ran very smoothly and it was quite evident that there is excellent rapport between the two sides. Both sides considered the meeting to have been a "good one." From my own personal experience there was a marked contrast between this meeting and an earlier one I attended in 1960. At that time, of course, the groundwork was still being laid and difficulties had to be ironed out. This process is now largely complete, or in hand, and it appears that the stage has been reached wherein the main problem is to keep up the momentum. There would seem to be no doubt about the sincerity and concern of the United States officials involved to accomplish this.

5. In their report, the United States side drew attention to the fact that the amount of United States defence business placed in Canada since the inception of the scheme in 1959 has risen from 96.2 million dollars in that year to a total of 140.8 million in 1961. Other statistics indicating an upsurge of United States defence business in Canada were alluded to including the following: In 1961, 830 prime contracts were awarded in Canada as against 283 in 1959 and 1110 sub-contracts in 1961 as against 365 in 1959. This upward trend of United States business was emphasized in the United States Progress Report and was an obvious source of satisfaction to United States representatives as indeed it was to Canadian representatives. At the same time, the United States representative called attention to the fact that statistics on Canadian defence business placed in the United States were more in the nature of a plane than an incline or a decline. Thus, in 1959, Canadian defence business placed in the United States amounted to 108.2 million dollars and in 1961 it was 95.6 million dollars. (Incidentally the F104 component of the "swap deal" is considered as part of the production sharing programme but it is not included in the 1961 figures.) In 1960, however, the amount was 196.5 million dollars and as Mr. Golden pointed out, this represented roughly 30% of total Canadian defence procurement. The large increase was occasioned by “one shot” purchases of transport aircraft and helicopters. In reply to United States comparison of the trends of United States and Canadian procurement, Mr. Golden contended that it was difficult to draw conclusions from a three-year period as to the probable level of Canadian procurement. Five or six years would, he thought, give a better indication of likely levels.

6. The impression conveyed was that the United States was highly satisfied with the results of the programme to date, with just a hint that a comparison of trends of United States business in Canada and of Canadian defence business in the United States placed the former in more favourable light. However, Mr. Golden’s point that a longer period should be allowed to pass by before drawing conclusions was not denied. At the same time, Mr. Golden also drew attention to the fact that the production sharing programme was one element in the Canadian Government’s decision to allow TCA’s procurement of DC8Fs in the United States over CL44s in Canada. This was not Canadian defence procurement in the United States, as such, though, in a sense, it was on the periphery, in that it was influenced by the defence production programme. Mr. Golden also took the opportunity to comment on the view which seemed to be held by some members of the United States Congress that Canada only bought in the United States what it could not make itself. This was a complete misconception; Canada could make virtually everything it needed in defence though, admittedly, it would take longer and cost more in many cases for Canada to do so. The defence production programme was premised rather, as United States representatives were aware, on a desire not merely to share defence production but to channel it to sources where it could be best handled.

7. Mr. Golden also mentioned that it was the Canadian feeling that United States contracts to Canadian companies came from two main areas. (a) Where the Canadian company was the best or only source e.g., Caribou aircraft and Pratt and Whitney spares. (b) From companies over which Canada had some influence in view of the fact that they had subsidiaries in Canada or that they held large Canadian defence orders e.g. Boeing and Lockheed. Mr. Golden hoped, in order to be completely successful, that the programme might come to apply to companies not falling in the above categories and that there might also be progress in development sharing and, in particular, jointly financed development by the United States and Canada. Mr. Bannerman, Mr. Morris’ Deputy, commented that Canadian companies had been doing a good job of selling in the United States and that he believed for the most part contracts arose from competitive bidding. In connection with this problem, Mr. Morris proposed that an analysis be made of the 1961 programme in order to ascertain what defence business was really attributable to the defence production sharing programme and what business would in any event have found its way to Canadian companies. Mr. Golden welcomed this proposal.

8. A Canadian representative emphasized that the success of the programme depended on a capability in Canada which, in turn, depended upon sharing in the development field. Looking to the future, this was one distinct weakness in the progress which had been made, from a Canadian point of view. Mr. BeLieu said that the United States supported in principle the idea of research and development sharing. The representatives of the three United States services emphasized their willingness to move forward on this aspect of the programme and there was a good deal of detailed discussion of ways and means of facilitating this. It was agreed that it would be useful for Canada to outline areas of interest and capability in the field of research and development as a guide to the United States.

9. There was a brief report on the DDP/USAF Aeronautical Systems Division and Electronics Systems Division Working Groups indicating satisfactory progress in both areas.

10. In a new departure, a substantial portion of the meeting was devoted to a detailed exchange of views on specific aspects of defence procurement. It was agreed that this portion of the discussion had been helpful for both sides and that it should be continued at the next meeting.

11. Mr. Golden suggested that the next meeting be held at a place and date in Canada to be decided.

MCNAMARA DIRECTIVES

As you know, Cabinet has authorized Mr. O'Hurley to go to Washington to take up with Mr. McNamara the question of exempting Canada-U.S. defence production sharing contracts from the effects of the McNamara directives.<sup>55</sup> Through DDP channels, the Embassy in Washington has been asked to make the necessary appointments with Gilpatric and McNamara for Messrs. O'Hurley and Hunter for the week of September 17.

<sup>55</sup> Pour les directives de McNamara sur les approvisionnements militaires, voir Lawrence S. Kaplan, Ronald D. Landa and Edward J. Drea, History of the Office of the Secretary of Defense, Vol. 5: The McNamara Ascendancy, 1961-1965 (Washington: Office of the Secretary of Defense, 2006), pp. 447-474. S'agissant de la décision d'envoyer O'Hurley à Washington, voir Cabinet Conclusions, August 22, 1962. On the McNamara directives for military procurement, see Lawrence S. Kaplan, Ronald D. Landa and Edward J. Drea, History of the Office of the Secretary of Defense, Vol. 5: The McNamara Ascendancy, 1961-1965 (Washington: Office of the Secretary of Defense, 2006), pp. 447-474. On the decision to send O'Hurley to Washington, see Cabinet Conclusions, August 22, 1962.

2. After discussing the matter with Mr. Ritchie, Mr. Robinson telephoned this morning to ask that we bring informally to the attention of Mr. Hunter the following considerations which might influence Mr. O'Hurley's decision to go to Washington:

- (1) Even by September 17, it is unlikely that Mr. McNamara will be able to give any firm assurance concerning U.S. defence procurement in Canada, as the application of the directives generally and to Canada in particular is being most thoroughly studied and no conclusion will have been reached within the next two weeks.
- (2) So far, the discussions have been strictly on a technical level. To raise them to the ministerial level might give McNamara an opportunity to broaden the discussions, e.g. to weapons policy.
- (3) It might be better to have a preliminary round of discussions at the deputy minister level, rather than play our biggest card at ministerial level too soon.
- (4) The visit, if it takes place in the week of September 17, will come hard on the heels of UK-US talks. Mr. Thorneycroft, accompanied by a large staff, is paying his first visit to Washington from September 11 to 16 inclusive, during which the whole field of defence and defence production cooperation between the two countries will be covered. The atmosphere is likely to be highly cooperative and might not form the most suitable background for the kind of representations we wish to make.
- (5) The O'Hurley visit will coincide with a visit by Mr. Fleming, September 16 to 22.
- (6) Whatever the decision on the ministerial visit, Mr. Ritchie thinks that the State Department should be kept informally in the picture, even though no Note is to be delivered. Mr. Ritchie believes that it would be in our interests to have the State Department able to defend Canadian interests in interdepartmental discussions in Washington by being able to invoke wider considerations such as Canadian balance of payments problems, Canada-U.S. relations, etc.

3. I have spoken along the foregoing lines to Mr. Hunter, who is going to have a word with Mr. O'Hurley. Hunter did not, however, think that it would change Mr. O'Hurley's decision to take this matter up as soon as possible direct with Mr. McNamara.

8. Progress Reports (SECRET)

The Service Members submitted progress reports which were read with interest by the Board. The following comments were also offered with regard to the Defense Production Sharing Program and the F104G Program:

a. Instructions of the Secretary of Defense Relative to the Balance of Payments Problem
(CONFIDENTIAL)

The Canadian Chairman referred to the Joint Production Sharing Program Report, and indicated that he had a statement to make on this general question.

The Canadian Chairman recalled that the Defense Production Sharing Program, which would soon have been in effect for almost four years, was agreed upon and implemented by both the U.S. and Canadian Governments in recognition of changing defense conditions and the increasing cooperation of the Canadian and U.S. military forces for North American defense. The Board, he noted, had endorsed the principles of the program and had followed its progress with interest. Continuing satisfactory progress was reflected in the current report to the Board on defense production sharing and it was the belief of the Canadian Section that the program held out even more promise for the future. The Canadian Chairman went on to say that, since one of the achievements of the program had been to orient Canadian defense and industrial development and production toward U.S. requirements, the Canadian government was now concerned over the possible effects of including Canada in the directives issued by the U.S. Secretary of Defense, with regard to the matter of balance of payments, on July 17, 1962 and as amended on August 11, 1962. The Canadian Chairman believed it was difficult to predict the full implication that the instructions of the U.S. Secretary of Defense, concerning procurement outside the U.S., would have for the delicately poised Defense Production Sharing Program. However, it was clear that any indication of U.S. intention not to continue fully to support the program would have a serious effect on the attitude of U.S. production and procurement officials and on the joint objective of a Canada-U.S. climate conducive to long term cooperation for defense. Therefore, the Canadian Section was concerned that much of the effort in Canada and in the U.S. to establish long range cooperation and acceptance of the defense production sharing philosophy might be undone unless there was a firm confirmation to U.S. officials of U.S. Government support.

The Canadian Department of Defence Production, the Canadian Chairman stated, through its normal production sharing channels, was seeking further information from, and making representations to, the U.S. Department of Defense with a view to having high level discussions to insure that the mutual Defense Production Sharing Program were not adversely affected.

The Department of Defence Production representative noted that there would be a meeting in Canada of the Senior Policy Committee of the program on October 4-5, 1962 and that the Department of Defence Production had proposed that the implications of the directives of the Secretary of Defense on the Defense Production Sharing Program be placed on the agenda. Canadian officials, he said, believed this would be a useful occasion upon which to examine this matter thoroughly.

The U.S. Chairman replied that he had listened to the Canadian Chairman's presentation with very great interest and indicated that the U.S. Section was very well aware of Canada's concern on this important program. The U.S. Chairman went on to say, however, that since it appeared that the Minister of Defence Production, Mr. O'Hurley, would be meeting with the Secretary of Defense or the Deputy Secretary of Defense within the next two or three weeks, it would appear inappropriate for the Board to go into this matter in great detail. Nevertheless, the U.S. Chairman recognized that a great deal of effort had been put into the Production Sharing Program and that he thought it certain that it would not be considered lightly when examined within the context of the U.S. balance of payments problem. He restated the thought that one of the purposes of the Board was to examine what could be done to maximize joint U.S.-Canada defense and pointed out that the Board had previously discussed the possibility of maintaining the Canadian industrial base toward this purpose and for the most efficient utilization of the resources of the two countries toward defense purposes.

The U.S. Chairman believed it appropriate, nevertheless, to point out that the U.S. was faced with a real problem in the matter of balance of payments and of the share of the economic burden being carried by the U.S. for the security of the alliance. Gold and other reserves continued to be in negative account, U.S. military costs were increasing all around the world, and a tendency had been noted that the notion was spreading that the U.S. could always in the last analysis bear these burdens. The fact of the matter was, he said, that the U.S. could not carry the entire economic burden by itself, and it was therefore investigating which items of expenditures were of a higher priority than others. The people, as well as the officials, of the U.S. knew very well that their interests were inextricably entwined with those of our closest allies – Canada, United Kingdom, etc. The U.S. Government understood the unique position of Canada in these matters and there was an obvious sincere interest in having Canada maintain a prosperous economy. In other words, the U.S. Chairman stated, the basic situation with regard to our joint efforts had not changed despite the examination of these various priorities, and, with certain caveats, application of any new regulations would probably not be uniform. He thereupon asked the U.S. Air Force Member for any comment on behalf of the Department of Defense.

The USAF member reported that he was not empowered to engage in specifics; however, he did not anticipate that there would be any change in the F104G program. He felt he should emphasize nevertheless, that a very serious effort was being made to staunch the flow of U.S. gold and U.S. reserves. So far, he continued, the Secretary of Defense directives had not affected Canada. However, the USAF member stated that he was not in a position to comment further on any Canadian “letters of intent” on the F104G program. It was his hope that the proposed visit of Defence Production Minister O’Hurley to Washington would clarify the general question of Defence Production Sharing.

The Canadian Chairman thanked the USAF member for his remarks and took advantage of the occasion to say that he could not help but indicate once again the great interest of the Canadian Government in the future of the Defense Production Sharing Program. It was an essential element in the defense relations between the two countries and had resulted in a more or less equal procurement expenditure on both sides of the border. It would be very difficult for Canada to contribute to North American defense if heavy procurement in the U.S. could not be maintained, or if the industrial base in Canada were not to continue to operate at the present level. The Canadian Chairman emphasized that the whole spirit of defense cooperation between the two countries was being brought into question. The Defense Production Sharing Program, it was a view of the Canadian Section, had always been recognized as being desirable to the U.S. and Canada and this was one of the reasons why it had been so closely followed at all recent meetings of the Board. This was the reason for the immediate Canadian concern when word was received of the Secretary of Defense recent directives regarding U.S. expenditures abroad. The Canadian Section was also worried as to the effect the issuance of these directives might have on the officials of U.S. procurement agencies. However, the Canadian Chairman agreed that at this time other officials should probably weigh these matters and said that the Canadian Section merely wished to register its concern on this general question and to express the hope that proper consideration would be given to it.

The Department of Defence Production Representative said he thought it would be a mistake if the Defense Production Sharing Program were to be overshadowed by other problems confronting the U.S. Department of Defense and he expressed the hope that no unilateral action be taken by the U.S. Department of Defense and that the Canadian authorities have the opportunity to examine the program thoroughly with the appropriate U.S. officials. He added that, for Canada, its part of the Defense Production Sharing Program had to be systematized and could not be subjected to rapid, interim alteration without serious economic repercussions for Canada. To date, existing channels of communications had offered the possibility of adjusting problems, in this regard, as they arose between the two countries. He expressed the hope that the Board would continue to support the program.

The U.S. Chairman indicated that naturally what was of concern to Canada was of concern to the U.S., and vice versa, and in this connection asked the Department of State member if he would review the general balance of payments situation as it had developed for the U.S. in recent years.

The Department of State member recalled that the U.S. had seriously approached the question in the period of the first ten years after World War II of how a creditor nation could best assist debtor nations. This had led to concessions having been made by the U.S. in the trade field and in military expenditures abroad. The U.S. had also encouraged the export of private capital to foreign countries. However, a new economic world had appeared more recently and the U.S. had developed a substantial adverse balance of payments. The U.S. had been losing gold and other reserves at a very serious rate. Certain alternatives had presented themselves as how best to cope with this situation and included in these were an export expansion program. This program had been pushed vigorously. At the same time the U.S. had decided not to attempt to reduce imports by restrictive action, since to do so might very well damage the U.S. economy as well as those of allied and friendly countries. The U.S. had therefore resisted protectionism on a general basis. In expanding further on this topic, the Department of State member noted that U.S. exports and imports were reasonably balanced but that the balance of payments problem presented itself in two particular areas – the U.S. foreign economic aid program and U.S. military expenditures abroad. Both these areas involved important policy questions. Policies were designed to assist economically under-developed regions and to provide political benefit and military security for the free world. The U.S. Government had concluded that it would be best not to cut its foreign aid program, but it had concentrated on persuading other nations to increase their own economic aid programs to less developed nations. Generally, these countries had responded to U.S. urgings in this regard, but it was impossible sharply to reduce U.S. foreign aid appropriations. U.S. military expenditures abroad were so large that it was inevitable that the U.S. Government would eventually have to scrutinize them in the hope that they could be reduced or eliminated without causing damage to the objectives of the security programs in support of which the expenditures were made.

The Department of State Member went on to say that he thought he would be less than candid if he did not touch on another element which was troubling officials in Washington with regard to the general question of balance of payments. This was the Canadian surcharges on imports which had been imposed by the Canadian Government in an effort to solve its own balance of payments problem.<sup>57</sup> These surcharges had occasioned very definite reactions within the U.S. business community. U.S. Government officials were being asked when these surcharges were expected to be removed, what was their justification under GATT, and whether the U.S. Government had been consulted with regard to their imposition. The Department of State Member said that he was unaware of any connection between surcharges and the Defense Production Sharing Program, but nevertheless noted that the Canadian surcharges could possibly be considered as unilateral action taken by one country affecting the other. The surcharge problem would come up in October at the GATT meeting, because no government would want to have its economic policies impaired by unilateral action on the part of the other country except in accordance with the provisions of GATT.

The Canadian Chairman thanked the Department of State Member for his review of the overall situation and agreed that balance of payments problems tended to give rise to unfortunate dislocations. He believed he should note, however, that the U.S. was facing a threatened problem but that Canada was faced with the most urgent one. Canada had been forced to act quickly to meet an immediate need. The point the Canadian Section wished to make was that the U.S. balance of payments problem should not affect the Defense Production Sharing Program. It was important that the Canadian industrial base be maintained if the defense efforts of both countries were best to be served. The Defense Production Sharing Program had kept a substantial portion of the Canadian Defense industrial establishment alive. In addition, the program had helped lessen the strain on Canada's balance of payments, but it seemed to him that the principal interest in this program was from the defense viewpoint. The Canadian authorities would certainly be prepared to discuss with the Secretary of Defense and the Senior Policy Committee the proposition that it would be much more difficult for Canada to contribute significantly to joint defense if its defense industry could not be maintained on an effective scale.

The U.S. Chairman reiterated his appreciation of the Canadian Government's position and of the inevitable inter-dependence of the two countries in the field of defense as well as in other matters. The U.S. was faced with a serious problem, but it was certainly hoped that important decisions affecting mutual defense relationships would not be taken without the most serious consideration of them.

Memorandum from Deputy Minister of National Defence to Minister of National Defence*

CONFIDENTIAL

[Ottawa], October 6, 1962

1. You might find it helpful to have on paper the substance of the information I gave you yesterday concerning the Defence Production Sharing Meeting.

2. During the last few weeks Mr. Hunter and Mr. Huck of the Department of Defence Production had some consultations with senior officers in Washington, up to the level of Mr. Gilpatric, who saw them for about fifteen minutes, on the question of the application to Canada of the Secretary of Defence Directives on balance of payments. Canadian officials felt on the basis of these discussions that there would not be too much difficulty in getting agreement that these Directives would not apply to Canada. It was intended to pursue this matter further during the Production Sharing Meeting and one of the items included on the agenda was the "Secretary's Directives." Mr. Morris, Assistant Secretary of Defense (Installations & Logistics), who is senior U.S. representative for production sharing, asked that a small group meet on Thursday evening before the main Production Sharing Meeting to discuss the question of this item being on the agenda.

3. This was agreed and the Honourable Mr. Morris, the Honourable Paul Ignatius, Assistant Secretary of the Army (Installations & Logistics) and Mr. Graeme Bannerman, Deputy Assistant Secretary of Defense (Procurement) met with Mr. Hunter, Mr. Huck and Mr. Teeter of DDP, Mr. Steele and myself on Thursday evening. In the course of the meeting the Honourable Mr. Morris said that he had been authorized by his seniors to read on an informal basis to the Canadian representatives an aide mémoire which he had with him. This was preceded by an explanation that they had made studies of some fifteen countries in relation to their defence balance of payments problem. Mr. Morris was not in a position to leave a copy of the memorandum with us but the following covers the substance of it, including some explanations that came out in the course of the discussion:

The U.S. balance of payments deficit with Canada on defence account currently was $240,000,000 a year which was the largest of all the countries examined. Canada had recently reduced its defence expenditures by approximately 5% and would not meet 1963 force goals by reason of the early withdrawal of the four CF-100 all-weather squadrons from the Air Division. In terms of the percentage of defence expenditures to Gross National Product, Canada's ratio was 4.8% against 7% for the U.K. and France. While Germany's ratio was 4.2%, the expectations were that Germany's would go up whereas Canada's appeared to be going down. Canada had a lower ratio of numbers in the forces to the population than almost any other NATO country. Canada also did not compare favourably, to the U.K. for example, on the basis of defence expenditures to per capita GNP. The size of defence effort as measured by this method suggested Canada would have to increase $400,000,000 to $500,000,000 to be comparable to the UK. In 1964 it appeared that Canada would not meet its NATO force goals by two submarines, four destroyers and eight maritime aircraft. With respect to NORAD, Canada was providing five interceptor squadrons against a NORAD plan that called for nine. Inadequate weaponry was provided for both the Bomarc and the interceptor squadrons in Canada.

4. Mr. Norris said that these considerations were outside the area of the responsibilities of the American officials present. It was agreed that there would be no point in pursuing this question on the agenda of the Defence Production Sharing Meeting.

5. The Canadian officials took the opportunity, in the course of the stay in Halifax, to explain to the American officials who attended the informal meeting some of the facts relating to Canada's own balance of payments problem and the recent reductions in defence estimates, as well as the force goals accepted by Canada. Mr. Teeter, who is the Department of Defence Production's representative in Washington, hopes to obtain a more precise record of the memorandum that Mr. Morris had and pass it on to Mr. Hunter at the beginning of the week. I have arranged that he is to give you a copy. The officials of other departments who are aware of the above and will be briefing their Ministers are Mr. Hunter of the Department of Defence Production, Mr. Steele of the Department of Finance and Mr. Menzies of External. I have briefed Mr. MacNeill to put him in a position to deal with any interdepartmental discussions that might arise in my absence. It was difficult to get any real feel for what all this might mean with respect to the impact of the McNamara Directives on the Defence Production Sharing Program but it seemed to me the Americans did not expect any at the moment. My impression was that the American officials used this method to explain why it had not been possible to get an early decision, which might have been expected from the tone of the earlier discussions with Mr. Hunter and Mr. Huck, and to inform us of the nature of the considerations that would be in the Secretary's mind when discussions took place with him. The American officials obviously did not expect or want any immediate response from the Canadian officials who attended these discussions. They were laying the groundwork for any subsequent discussions at Secretary McNamara's level.

CANADA-U.S. PRODUCTION SHARING PROGRAMME:
ATTITUDE OF U.S. SECRETARY OF DEFENSE

You will recall that at its meeting of August 22, Cabinet considered the possible effects of Secretary McNamara's foreign exchange conserving directives on the Canada-U.S. programme for production sharing and concluded that:

(a) the Deputy Minister of Defence Production should write to his American opposite number;

(b) I should make oral representations to Mr. Rusk during his visit to Ottawa but that a draft Note which had been prepared should not be sent;

(c) the Minister of Defence Production should make further oral representations to the U.S. Secretary of Defense.

Officials in the Department of Defence Production, who have had a number of informal discussions with U.S. Department of Defence officials, thought that it would be well to determine the attitude to be taken by the U.S. delegation at the Senior Production Sharing Meeting in Halifax, October 4-5, before Mr. O'Hurley went to Washington. The subject of the McNamara Directives was, therefore, included on the agenda of this meeting.

When Mr. Tom Morris, Assistant Secretary of Defense (Installations and Logistics), went to clear the exclusion of the Canada-U.S. Research and Development Programme from the application of the McNamara Directives with the Secretary of Defense on September 29, Mr. McNamara said that he would not grant a blanket waiver to Canada except where mutual financing arrangements had been made. The Americans, therefore, asked that the subject of the McNamara Directives be dropped from the agenda of the Halifax meeting and requested a small informal meeting in advance at which they might discuss Mr. McNamara's views.

The small informal meeting was held in Halifax on the night of October 4 and attended on the Canadian side by Mr. Gordon Hunter, Deputy Minister of Defence Production; Mr. Elgin Armstrong, Deputy Minister of National Defence; Mr. E. Steele, Secretary of the Treasury Board; Mr. W. Huck, Assistant Deputy Minister of Defence Production and Mr. John Teeter, DDP Attaché in Washington. On the American side the meeting was attended by Mr. Morris, Mr. Paul Ignatius, Assistant Secretary of the Army (Installations and Logistics) and Mr. Graeme Bannerman, Deputy Assistant Secretary of Defense (Procurement).

At this meeting Mr. Morris read from a memorandum which had the approval of Secretary McNamara. The memorandum stated that the United States balance of payments problem had been exacerbated by defence expenditures overseas. Studies were being made in the office of the Secretary of Defense of U.S. defence expenditures in about fifteen countries and Canada had to be considered along with them. In deciding the application of the foreign exchange conserving directives to Canada, the following considerations would be taken into account:

- (a) Canada has a favourable defence balance of $240 million annually with the United States;
- (b) Certain countries, including Canada, have not made their fullest contribution to NATO, e.g., Canada had withdrawn four CF-100 squadrons a year earlier than programmed. The U.S. assessment was that Canada would be short its force goal in 1964 by two submarines, four destroyers and eight maritime aircraft;
- (c) The Canadian contribution to NORAD was short four squadrons of the nine promised. Furthermore, nuclear warheads had not been placed on the BOMARC missiles and nuclear bombs are not being brought into Canada for the CF-101 squadrons as expected;
- (d) Canadian defence expenditures had been reduced recently by a further five per cent. Canada was spending only 4.8% (1.75 billion out of 36 billion GNP) while Britain and France were spending about seven per cent of their GNP. While Germany was only spending 4.2% on defence, these expenditures were increasing annually while Canadian expenditures were decreasing. The ratio of per capita defence expenditure in Canada to per capita GNP was one of the lowest in the NATO Alliance. The Americans considered that we were under-spending on defence between $400 million and $500 million per annum.

Canadian officials at the small informal meeting indicated that this was neither the time nor the place for a discussion of these subjects. During the balance of the Halifax meetings there were a number of opportunities for Canadian officials to speak privately to senior American officials, particularly to Mr. Morris, to explain the Canadian position on these matters.

Conclusions

The U.S. Secretary of Defense, on instructions from the President, has set himself substantial foreign exchange conservation objectives over the next two year period. In considering how these cuts will be made in the fifteen major countries of expenditure, Secretary McNamara has apparently requested his staff to draw up a short list of considerations relating to the various countries' military efforts. We imagine that this is where the U.S. catalogue of criticisms of the Canadian defence effort originated. The Production Sharing Programme has not yet been obviously adversely affected but may well come in for critical attention after the review of the defence efforts of the fifteen countries has been completed and the U.S. Secretary of Defense sits down to determine where the foreign exchange savings are to be apportioned.

It seems to me inappropriate that the U.S. should have removed the McNamara Directives from the agenda of the Halifax meeting, thereby preventing discussion of this important subject, and then raised these criticisms of Canadian defence policy in a small informal meeting which did not provide an appropriate forum for discussion. The reasons for use of these tactics are unclear. Was this done to exert pressure on us to increase the quantity and quality of our defence effort? Or might it be an attempt to find a justification for curtailing U.S. defence expenditures in Canada?

If consideration of the Production Sharing Programme is not to be confined to its own particular objectives, then there would seem to be no reason why the extraneous considerations introduced should be confined to defence only. We should feel free to introduce our concern over our substantial current account deficit with the United States.

As representations at the official level do not appear to have been successful in having the Production Sharing Programme considered on its own merits, I suggest that:

- (a) the draft official Note dealing with the McNamara Directives in a broader framework, which we considered on August 22,† be now sent forward;
- (b) the Minister of Defence Production not now go to see the U.S. Secretary of Defense, since the latter would be likely to raise again the criticisms of Canadian defence policy conveyed to officials in Halifax;

(c) the Panel on the Economic Aspects of Defence be instructed to review this matter and make any further proposals thought appropriate to rebut the U.S. criticisms.

Dear Mr. Bryce:

CANADA-UNITED STATES PRODUCTION SHARING PROGRAMME

I understand that the Prime Minister has agreed that:

(a) the draft official Note dealing with the McNamara Directives in a broader framework, which was considered on August 22, be now sent forward;

(b) the Minister of Defence Production not now go to see the United States Secretary of Defence, since the latter would be likely to raise again the criticisms of Canadian defence policy conveyed to officials in Halifax;

(c) the Panel on the Economic Aspects of Defence be instructed to review this matter and make any further proposals thought appropriate to rebut the United States criticisms.

I believe that the Panel on the Economic Aspects of Defence is scheduled to meet on Tuesday, October 30. If you agree, this will provide an opportunity to inform other Departments concerned of the Prime Minister's decision. At the same time the Panel could consider the question of rebutting the criticism of Canadian defence contributions made by United States officials during a private meeting held in connection with the recent meeting of the Senior Committee on Production Sharing at Halifax.

The Panel might also consider at the same time whether any consequential changes should be made to the Note which was drafted in August for submission to the State Department through the Embassy in Washington.

In the event that you might wish to circulate background material prior to the Panel meeting, I am attaching a copy of the draft Note† and also a copy of a memorandum, prepared by the Department of Defence Production, recording the statement of United States officials at the private meeting in Halifax.†

Yours sincerely,

Mr. Bow has reported that Mr. Harkness has informed you that he proposes to question in Cabinet this morning the desirability of now sending the general note on Canada-United [States] Production Sharing.<sup>58</sup>

2. You will recall that you sent a memorandum on this subject on October 12 to the Prime Minister (copy attached). On October 22 Mr. Dier informed us that the Prime Minister had approved the recommendations set forth in the final paragraph of your memorandum of October 12.

3. This subject was discussed in a very preliminary way by senior officials in the Panel on the Economic Aspects of Defence on October 30. It was agreed that the general subject would be reconsidered on November 2.

CANADA-UNITED STATES PRODUCTION SHARING PROGRAMME

ATTITUDE OF UNITED STATES SECRETARY OF DEFENCE

In accordance with the Prime Minister's request, the Panel on the Economic Aspects of Defence Questions has considered what further action might be taken in the light of developments at the Halifax Production Sharing meeting. In particular the Panel considered the relative merits of written representations and oral explanations by Ministers. It was the judgment of the Panel that:

(a) United States preoccupation with its own balance of payments problems would not dispose it to be receptive to arguments involving Canada's balance of payments difficulties, particularly when the Canadian deficit was somewhat improved whereas the United States deficit was still deteriorating.

(b) To press anew the intrinsic merit of the defence production sharing programme might prompt the United States Government to express officially dissatisfaction with particular aspects of the Canadian defence effort, which has so far been put forward only informally (at Halifax).

<sup>58</sup> Cette question n'a pas fait l'objet de discussions lors de la réunion du Cabinet.
The matter was not discussed at the Cabinet meeting.

(c) In making either written or oral representations we should be running the risk of provoking a reply which might be more unsatisfactory than the present situation. So far, it appears that any harmful effect the Secretary's directives might have on the production sharing programme is more apprehended than real.

(d) The United States preoccupation with the Cuban crisis might detract from otherwise broad and sympathetic consideration of further Canadian representation at this time.

2. It was the general consensus of the Panel that until such time as the application of the Secretary's directive could be shown to be in fact harming the Production Sharing Programme or until the Government was in a position to discuss outstanding defence questions with the United States Government, the balance of advantage lay neither in presenting a note nor in having a Minister go to Washington for discussions with Secretary McNamara.

II. DEFENCE PRODUCTION-SHARING

5. Mr. Armstrong said the Minister of National Defence had indicated his preference for personal discussions in Washington on this matter rather than the despatch of a Note. A Note was likely to elicit an unfavourable response that might reiterate United States criticisms of the Canadian defence effort. Such a reply would be embarrassing especially if it became public at some stage.

6. Mr. Ritchie said a Note might be sent that stated the Canadian case but was of such a kind that it did not call for a reply. It seemed important to take some action that would broaden the scope of the discussion from the defence area to the area of balance of payments and other matters of general United States and Canadian national interests and that would bring into the discussion on the United States side not just Secretary McNamara but the United States Government as a whole.

7. Mr. Reisman said a United States official who had explained to him the circumstances in which Secretary McNamara had decided that United States officials should raise with Canadian officials the matters of concern to the United States about the Canadian defence effort, had advised that if Canada valued the Defence Production-sharing programme, a Canadian Minister might usefully see Mr. McNamara, but such a meeting would probably not be productive until Canada was in a position to answer effectively some of the criticisms that had been made.

8. Mr. Huck said officials of Defence Production had over the past few months urged upon United States officials up to the Assistant Secretary of Defense level that the Defence Production-sharing programme should stand on its own merits, irrespective of balance of payments problems and other defence issues. It was now clear that no further progress could be made by reiterating this argument. A new approach at a higher level was necessary, and it should be taken soon before Canada was injured by the rejection of a Canadian project contract by the Secretary of Defense.

9. In the course of further discussion, the following main points were made:

(a) It would be useless to argue with the United States in favour of the Defence Production-sharing arrangements on general balance of payments grounds because the United States, taking into consideration reserves positions only, now judged that the Canadian balance of payments position was better than theirs.

(b) The argument had consistently been put to United States officials that the Defence Production-sharing programme had been devised and accepted on the basis of mutual self-interest, and was of benefit not only to Canada.

(c) The Minister of National Defence and the Minister of Defence Production should probably see the United States Secretary of Defense as soon as there were prospects for a productive meeting, because the matter was of some urgency. It was doubtful, however, if a meeting immediately would be useful.

10. The Panel noted the points made in the discussion.

CANADA-U.S. DEFENCE PRODUCTION SHARING

During 1962 the Canada-U.S. Defence Production Sharing Program reached a major turning point in that by the end of September, after three and three-quarter years of joint effort, the accumulated 1959-62 statistics showed a balance of some $45 millions in Canada's favour. This compares with the balance at the end of 1961 of about $47 millions in U.S. favour.

This turning point was achieved in 1962 largely due to the greatly increased United States production sharing business placed in Canada. This U.S. defence procurement in Canada for the twelve months of 1962 (the figures for which are only now available) amounted to $254 millions compared to 1961's total of $143 millions. A large part of this 1962 increase was brought about by the U.S. procurement in 1962 of Caribou aircraft valued at $62 millions, compared to the 1961 Caribou procurement of $7.8 millions, and by the U.S. contribution of $59 millions to the joint F104G mutual assistance program.

These statistics effectively highlight the production sharing achievements resulting from the program momentum generated by the co-operative efforts of both governments. Canada is still very much concerned over the probable future detrimental effects on the program of the U.S. Defence Secretary's Balance of Payment Instructions issued in 1962. Although the statistics do not yet reflect any adverse affects, we have since last Fall been receiving a steady flow of comment from industry and from our representatives in the U.S. as to the difficulties arising due perhaps to misunderstanding of the U.S. government's intent, and misinterpretation of the directives. These have tended to create in some cases an adverse climate for participation in U.S. programs by Canadian defence industry as an integral part of the North American defence production base. The important need now is for the intent of these directives to be clarified with respect to defence production sharing in order that long term planning by both governments and by industry may continue on a confident and orderly basis. Since January 1959, the Canadian government and industry commitment of funds for development projects to meet future U.S. defence requirements has totalled about $45 millions. Continued planning is necessary to ensure that an appropriate level of Canadian industrial development activity is achieved and sustained. Such planning however, can come to fruit only in a long range climate which encourages Canadian participation in both U.S. defence research and development programs and in ultimate hardware production.

The Canadian government is convinced that continued support of these defence production sharing principles, will result not only in better utilization of our procurement and production resources, but also in a fair balance of production sharing business. This program should sensibly expand rather than decline.

In line with the program's objectives and achievements the Canadian government has decided that it will be to the benefit of Canada, as well as the U.S., to make certain major defence procurements in the U.S. in the near future. These include the Tartar Missile System for RCN frigates which will involve our expenditure in the U.S. in excess of $100 millions. In addition we will shortly be placing a contract for RCAF CF104D Trainers amounting to about $18 millions. We are also negotiating for the purchase of Vertol Helicopters for the Canadian Army at an initial cost in U.S. dollars of some $10 millions. These programs, which will be in addition to the normal Canadian reliance on U.S. industrial sources, are estimated eventually to amount to over $130 millions of Canadian defence production sharing business in the U.S. This action is being taken in expectation that the U.S. government will similarly support the program, and that future clarification of the U.S. government's intent will exempt defence production sharing from the U.S. balance of payments restrictions in order that long term planning can be justifiably continued.<sup>59</sup>

(c) Canada-United States Defense Production Sharing Programme (CONFIDENTIAL)

The Canadian Chairman recalled that at the September 1962 meeting of the Board, the United States Members, in connection with the discussion on production sharing, explained the views of the United States Government concerning the defense aspects of the United States balance of payments problem. While this Board was probably not the right body in which to pursue these issues at any length, the Canadian Chairman believed that the United States Section would not object if he were to explain the Canadian outlook on these questions. He did so in the following statement which the Board agreed should be incorporated into the record:

"Let me emphasize at the outset that we in Canada fully recognize that the United States is confronted with serious balance of payments difficulties and that it is essential for the United States and her allies that effective solutions be found to this problem. At the same time we know the United States authorities are aware of the fact that Canada also has a serious balance of payments problem. We consider it also in the general interest of the alliance that Canada should find effective and constructive solutions to its problem.

Not used at meeting [Dana Wilgress?]

The Canadian balance of payments problem is of a different character from the United States problem. In some respects it is more deep-rooted and more serious. The United States enjoys a surplus in her overall international trade in goods and services, but has been losing gold because of her large investments abroad and external Government expenditure. The United States has been acquiring large assets abroad and although gold is lost her fundamental long-term position is being strengthened. Canada, on the other hand, is not losing gold and reserves at present, but is suffering a very large persistent deficit in her overall trade in goods and services. We have been covering this deficit on current account by importing capital. This adds to our international indebtedness and we are incurring obligations which we will have to service for the indefinite future. While much of the capital we import adds to our productive capacity, a substantial part does not. To the extent that the capital inflow does not add to our productive capacity our long-term economic position is being weakened.

Canada has had a current account deficit ranging from $1 billion to $1½ billion for many years. The Canadian deficit on current account has exceeded $10 billion over the past ten years. In terms of the United States economy this would amount to $150 billion. The Canadian authorities have no doubt that the United States, if confronted with a similar situation, could not and would not allow it to continue. Nor can Canada. The United States has a vital stake in the stability of the Canadian dollar. The extensive help which the United States made available to Canada in our recent exchange emergency is clear evidence of this. It is inconceivable that the United States should adopt policies in the defence procurement field designed to deal with the problem which had the effect of intensifying the Canadian problems.

It has sometimes been argued that the imbalance in defence expenditures between Canada and the United States is heavily in favour of Canada. What really matters, however, is the overall payments balance between Canada and the United States, rather than the trade balance in one relatively small sector such as defence. While Canada has been running a current deficit in her total trade of goods and services with all [other] countries of between $1 billion and $1.5 billion per annum, the current deficit with the United States has usually been much larger. We usually have a large surplus with all other countries taken together, and these earnings of foreign exchange help to pay in part for the huge current account [surplus] with the United States. In 1961, for example, when we experienced a current account deficit with the [rest of the] world of just under $1 billion, our deficit with the United States alone was about $1.4 billion. Taking the past ten years together (1953-1962) Canada's deficit on current account with the United States, goods and services included, was about $12.5 billion. Since in that same period our overall [surplus] with the [rest of the] world was some $10.25 billion, we actually spent in the United States about $2.25 billion more, which we earned in our trade with other countries.

Although it is entirely valid and reasonable to discuss our balance of payments position in terms of the current account which is the true measure of how far short we are of "paying our way" from year to year, it can be argued that this way of looking at the problem fails to take into consideration the flow of capital from the United States to Canada which help us to pay for our trading deficit with that country. Nonetheless, even if one takes into account capital obtained from the United States, i.e., the total balance of payments, current as well as capital, it will be seen that Canada has contributed large amounts of foreign exchange and gold to the United States. Taking the past ten years, and lumping the capital account together with the current account, Canada has contributed net to the United States over $4 billion in gold and convertible currencies. These figures make it clear that in no sense can it be said that Canada has in any way contributed to the balance of payments difficulties of the United States. On the contrary, we have helped the United States balance of payments massively and are continuing to do so today. I wish to emphasize this fact, because it does not always seem to be recognized in Washington. It should be quite clear that any change in the production sharing arrangement to Canada's detriment would be damaging not only to Canada but by impairing our payments position, would also damage United States interests over the whole range of our economic and financial relationship including defence.

Although in our view the overall balance of payments position is what really matters, the United States authorities have from time to time focussed attention on their "direct defence expenditure deficit" with Canada. The estimates of this deficit put forward by the United States authorities, while adhering to their annual submission to NATO, do not take into account such important elements as the United States import content of Canadian domestic defence procurement, which is of the order of around 18% of our total domestic procurement. Moreover, the United States estimates include large sums for uranium which is more a raw material than an item of defence procurement, and much of which is presumably used in the United States civil atomic energy programme.

At the last Board meeting the Department of State member went on to discuss one element in the emergency programme adopted by the Canadian Government in the exchange crisis last June, namely the temporary import surcharges. These measures were not directly relevant to the work of this Board, as I think he said himself. Since the matter was raised, however, I would like to make one or two brief comments. First, it was clearly recognized by the competent international organization, the International Monetary Fund, that in Canada's situation at the time emergency measures were essential, and that the action taken by way of import surcharges did not go beyond the extent necessary to stop serious decline in our monetary reserves. Second, there is no doubt whatever that under the provisions of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade, Canada would have been entitled to impose quantitative import restrictions to deal with the exchange emergency. Instead the Government decided to impose the temporary tariff surcharges which it believed would be less disruptive of trade. In the discussions of this matter in the GATT there has been no indication that any country would have preferred to see quantitative restrictions applied. The Canadian temporary surcharges were reviewed in full at the last GATT session and a decision adopted. Clearly, it would be inappropriate to pursue this matter in this Board. The Canadian Government has already begun to remove the surcharges and Ministers have made it clear that the remainder will be removed as quickly as our balance of payments and reserves positions permit."

The State Department Member said that the United States appreciated that its economic relations with Canada produced a plus factor in the net balance of the U.S. payments position. Canada's positive contribution to the U.S.A. balance of payments picture, particularly in the trade and investments field, was fully recognized. Nevertheless, if the United States position were looked at outside the area of goods and services, there was a grave problem in the areas of external aid and military expenditures. In these fields there was continuing apprehension about the net U.S. balance of payments picture and the United States wished to have its Western European Allies, in particular, share the defence and external aid burden.

1. Mr. Fleming welcomed United States members to the seventh meeting of the Joint Committee. He recalled that since the Committee had been established in 1954 it had met regularly in Washington and Ottawa and its meeting had always been characterized by a constructive approach to the issues under discussion. He was confident that the present meeting would once again be carried on in this traditional friendly spirit. He paid tribute to the important initiatives which the Chairman of the United States delegation, Mr. Dillon, had taken over the past few years to promote greater co-operation and better understanding in the Atlantic area.

2. Mr. Dillon thanked the Minister of Finance for his welcome. He recalled that the creation of the Joint Committee was the first time that the United States had set up special consultative machinery to deal with trade and economic matters with another country. It was natural that this country should have been Canada in view of the large reciprocal trade between the two countries and their common interests. The United States attached great importance to these bilateral consultations. The Committee provided a forum where Ministers could discuss not only problems between the two countries, but also broader problems such as those arising from regional developments in Europe.

3. The seventh meeting of the Joint Committee was the first to be held in Ottawa under the new United States Administration. It would strengthen the close cooperation between Canada and the United States which had recently led to the establishment of the OECD and the creation of special resources for the International Monetary Fund.

(After press representatives had left the room, the Committee resumed its meeting in closed session.)

4. Mr. Fleming pointed out that the agenda did not include bilateral items. There were, however, some outstanding bilateral issues between Canada and the United States which could be left to private discussions between Ministers outside the sessions of the Committee. Mr. Fleming also expressed the hope that some time could be found during the Joint Committee's meeting to review economic developments in the United States and Canada.

5. Mr. Dillon agreed that some bilateral items could usefully be discussed informally. He was also prepared to give an assessment of current United States economic developments and future prospects at the afternoon session.

AGENDA ITEM I

EUROPEAN TRADE DEVELOPMENTS AND THEIR SIGNIFICANCE FOR WORLD TRADE

6. Mr. Ball recalled that the United States had given full and enthusiastic support to movements towards integration in Europe. The United States regarded these European developments as constructive, at a time when great forces of destruction were at work in the world. These developments raised both opportunities and difficulties which should be faced by Canada and the United States together.

7. Britain's move into Europe, if successful, would raise new common problems for Canada and the United States. Both were large trading nations and would not be members of the enlarged European arrangement. The United States recognized that there would be particular problems for Canada in view of its historic relations with Britain and the Commonwealth.

8. Mr. Ball reviewed the main features of United States policy on European integration. Their interest had essentially been political. They had welcomed the rapprochement between France and Germany and attached importance to the contribution European integration was making in tying Western Germany to the West. Integration would also increase stability in Europe at a time when France, Germany and other European nations were experiencing political difficulties. Although the integration of Europe had so far been of an economic nature, it had encouraged political cohesion.

9. The United States recognized that integration could result either in the creation of trade or its diversion from third countries to the members of the Community. Serious problems might be raised if European integration resulted in any substantial trade diversion but the present assessment of the United States Administration was that the political benefits more than compensated for the commercial risks.

10. Mr. Ball said that in the United States view the Europe of the Six, because it was incomplete, created elements of instability. As long as Britain was not a member it acted as a magnet pulling on some sectors of the Community, and the division of Europe would remain. Britain's move was regarded as a step towards greater and wider cohesion in the free world. Its application for membership had therefore been welcomed by the United States, although it was appreciated that difficulties would be raised for the United States mainly because of the further extension of preferential arrangements in Europe against them. Mr. Ball emphasized that they considered this decision to be one which only Britain could make. The United States also recognized the problems which British membership in the Community would raise for the Commonwealth. The Commonwealth was highly valued by the United States Government for its contribution to the cohesion and stability of the free world.

11. Mr. Ball said that prospective moves towards greater European integration could lead to wider developments in Atlantic cooperation. There was already a wide area of cooperation among Canada, the United States and Europe in defence through NATO and in economic policy through the OECD. Also, a common responsibility towards the under-developed world had been recognized in the Development Assistance Committee. There were further areas, however, where trans-Atlantic cooperation could be developed. The United States Administration felt a deep desire to strengthen the Atlantic relationship. In the United States view, Canada had always been considered as having an important role to play in these Atlantic relationships.

12. There was nothing contradictory between greater European and Atlantic cohesion. In the past, the disparity of size between individual European countries and the United States had created difficulties in the Atlantic area. Greater cohesion in Europe would facilitate greater Atlantic cooperation.

13. Mr. Ball referred to commercial policy as a major area for improved cooperation. For instance, in GATT the United States had recently undertaken tariff negotiations with a number of countries in Europe. While these negotiations would have significant results, more effective bargaining could take place in the future, employing new techniques, with an enlarged European Economic Community. Further opportunities and incentives for the United States to negotiate with Europe on a wider basis were already emerging, and these considerations underlay the new and more extensive tariff negotiating authority which the President would be asking from Congress. The United States Government felt that if this authority could be secured, their subsequent negotiations with the European Economic Community could help solve trade problems arising for other countries in the world. If Britain joined the Six, the enlarged European Economic Community and the United States would account for about 85% to 90% of the industrial exports of the free world. This percentage would be even higher if Canadian exports were added.

14. Mr. Ball repeated that the United States recognized that current European developments raised special problems for Canada. He hoped that the Canadian Ministers would speak frankly about their concerns. United States members, for their part, would be prepared to comment and indicate ways the United States might be able to help.

15. Mr. Fleming said that Canadian Ministers shared Mr. Ball's view of the importance of current developments in Europe, and recalled his discussions of these matters with Mr. Dillon at recent meetings in Paris.<sup>60</sup> Canada, with a population of 18 million people, was the fourth largest trading country and the first per capita trading country in the world. The Canadian Government had played an active role in the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade and the International Monetary Fund and would continue to support measures aimed at expanding trade on a multilateral and non-discriminatory basis. Mr. Fleming also recalled Canada's support for the United States initiative for establishing the OECD which would lead to an increase in cooperation among Atlantic countries. It was important, however, not to give the impression that countries of the Atlantic area were developing a 'rich men's club.'

16. Mr. Fleming stated that the Canadian Government had always recognized the importance of the political factors related to the creation of the European Economic Community. But Canada also had very large economic and trade interests in Europe. Our sales to the Six were growing and we hoped to expand them still further. The press at times had been mischievous in their interpretation of the Canadian Government's position with respect to the Common Market. They had professed to see some antagonism against the Community which did not exist. However, Canada attached great importance, as the United States did, to the development by the Six of outward-looking trade policies. Referring to the attitude of the Six on agriculture in the GATT tariff negotiations, Mr. Fleming noted that there seemed to be a good deal of room for improvement.

17. Turning to Britain's application for membership in the Community, Mr. Fleming said that, here again, press descriptions of the Canadian Government's position had not always been correct. Canada recognized that the decision whether or not to join the Six was one for Britain alone to make. The views of the Canadian Government had been given when, and only when, the British Government had sought them. This had been done at the meeting of the Commonwealth Economic Consultative Council in London in September, 1960, during Mr. Sandys' visit to Ottawa in July, 1961, at the Commonwealth Ministerial meeting in Accra in September, 1961, during discussions in London in November after the OECD Ministerial meeting, and a few days ago with Mr. Heath in Ottawa.<sup>61</sup>

18. The Canadian Government had on these occasions expressed its views frankly, as had other Commonwealth governments. The trade interest of Commonwealth countries in the British Market was enormous, and Mr. Fleming emphasized the large proportion of this trade which moved under Commonwealth preferences. He noted that Canada's exports to Britain had grown significantly following the removal of their quantitative restrictions a few years ago. Also, the benefits enjoyed by Canada in Britain under the preferential system had been paid for in terms of Britain's access to the Canadian market. However, developments were in prospect which could jeopardize these arrangements.

19. Mr. Fleming recalled that the British Government had given assurances that in negotiating with the Six every effort would be made to safeguard Commonwealth interests. The Canadian Government had accepted these assurances. Recently steps had been taken to improve channels of communications with British negotiators so as to keep them informed of Canada's interests as the negotiations proceeded. The outcome of the negotiations was not yet clear but it was evident that Britain was anxious to bring the negotiations to a successful conclusion. It should not be assumed, however, that Britain would join at any price. While he was confident that if it came to a choice between the Six and the Commonwealth Britain would choose the Commonwealth, there was considerable room for negotiation at the present time. Canada attached the greatest importance to British efforts in the negotiations to safeguard its basic interests, and those of other Commonwealth countries.

20. Mr. Fleming described the Commonwealth as a great constructive and cohesive force in the free world, and emphasized the importance attached by the Canadian Government to its preservation. The Commonwealth was in a process of change, with increasing Asian and African membership. There was a great diversity of interests and views among Commonwealth nations, but their historic ties made the Commonwealth as a whole an important, constructive and stabilizing force in world affairs. The new countries of the Commonwealth were for the most part primary producers, and many were also attempting to industrialize. They were concerned about export markets and viewed the British market as the only dependable export market for their primary products and for their developing manufacturing industries. The meeting at Accra had clearly revealed the importance they attached to the British market. Historic and sentimental ties did not attach these new countries to the Commonwealth as strongly as in the case of Canada and other older members, and some delegations at Accra had questioned the usefulness of Commonwealth membership if traditional economic links were to be broken. Moreover, it was widely felt at Accra that Britain could not join the Six without damaging important trade interests of other Commonwealth countries. Contrary to a number of statements which had recently been made, Commonwealth trade was growing. If Britain's entry into the Community broke up the preferential system the effects would be damaging psychologically as well as economically, and he hoped that this point was fully recognized by the United States. Many of the new Commonwealth countries looked to Canada for leadership within the Commonwealth, and expected Canada to interpret Commonwealth interests to the United States.

21. Mr. Fleming said that the views and policies of the United States exerted tremendous influence in the free world. European decisions were affected, not only by its policies, but by European impressions of United States views. The widespread feeling that the United States Government wished to see Britain in the Common Market undoubtedly was influencing the British negotiations with the Community. The negotiations in Brussels had now entered the stage of hard bargaining, and the Canadian Government hoped that the United States would refrain from actions or statements which would be interpreted as pushing Britain into Europe and which would weaken the British negotiating position with respect to the safeguarding of Commonwealth interests. He referred in this connection to Secretary Freeman's statement in September in which Mr. Freeman had indicated that the United States would not wish to see the Commonwealth system of preferences perpetuated. This statement had caused much concern at the Accra meeting. Canada understood the historic attitude of the United States toward Commonwealth preferences. Nevertheless, it was the considered opinion of Canadian Ministers that great damage would be done to the Commonwealth association, and that the world would be the loser, if Britain were unable to safeguard the interests of Commonwealth countries in its market. He suggested that the United States Government may not have adequately taken into account the role played by tariff preferences in the Commonwealth relationship.

22. Mr. Ball replied that tariff preferences in the United Kingdom market did not seem to be equally important to all members of the Commonwealth. Underdeveloped Commonwealth members were primarily concerned with tropical products and in some cases with exports of low cost manufactures. In these areas Canada was not directly concerned. The chief interest of the more developed Commonwealth members was in temperate agricultural products and, in the case of Canada and Australia, in industrial products. Mr. Ball asked for a more specific description of Canadian interests in the United Kingdom market and of the ways in which they could be harmed.

23. Mr. Hees circulated two statistical tables and asked United States members to examine them. The first indicated the value of Canada's exports to Britain, according to their terms of entry into the British market (subject to duty, free of duty, under preference, not under preference). The second described the effects on Canada's access to the British market of the adoption of the proposed common external tariff by Britain.

24. Mr. Freeman asked whether any assessment had been made of the extent to which markets would be lost in Britain by Canada as the result of Britain's adoption of the common tariff.

25. Mr. Hodges suggested there would be compensating advantages to Canada by reason of the fact that the Common Market tariff for manufactured goods was low. These tariffs were being lowered still further in current GATT negotiations in Geneva. Britain would be adopting the Common Market tariff which was generally lower on manufactured products.

26. Mr. Hees said that Canada's trade with Europe had been growing and would continue to grow. However, preferences played an important role in Canada's trade in these items with Britain. Many firms across the country were exporting to the British market and would suffer seriously if their preferential advantages were impaired. Manufactured goods were playing an increasingly important role in Canadian exports and these exports had important employment effects.

27. Mr. Freeman asked whether Canada expected that Commonwealth preferential access to the British market would be maintained in perpetuity.

28. Mr. Hees replied that the British Government had given assurances that it would safeguard essential Commonwealth interests. Canada was observing the negotiations carefully, and supplying information which would assist the British in their negotiations.

29. Mr. Freeman said it was unrealistic to expect the perpetuation of preferences in their entirety.

30. Mr. Ball said that with respect to industrial materials, the statistical material which had just been circulated indicated there might be problems for aluminum alloys and perhaps also for steel ingots and asbestos. Mr. Ball added that Canada and the United States had a common interest in reducing the Common Market tariff on aluminum alloys.

31. Mr. Hodges remarked that Britain, in its negotiations with the Six, might be able to bring down the level of the common external tariff.

32. Mr. Ball said that judging by the value of Canadian manufactured exports to the United Kingdom, the problem should be of manageable proportion.

33. Mr. Hees stressed the importance which Canada attached to exports of manufactured products to the British market. This was a growing sector of trade with large potential, and one to which the Canadian Government attached great importance in terms of Canadian industrial development and employment.

34. Mr. Hamilton pointed out that Canada did not sell a wide variety of agricultural products to Europe and for most of these had a qualitative advantage. However, this was a most important trade for Canada, accounting for about 33% of our exports to Britain and 40% of our exports to the E.E.C. In this sector of trade, rates of duty were not as great a source of concern as non-tariff restrictions. Also, the Six were planning to use a system of variable levies to control the level of their imports of a range of agricultural products.

35. Mr. Freeman said the U.S. was also very concerned about its exports of agricultural products to Europe. The basic problem was the level of the internal price structure for agriculture within the Common Market. On this would depend the level of the variable levies imposed to protect domestic production. If prices were established at a high level, this would result in an increase in production and decreased imports.

36. Mr. Ball said that the most difficult problem was indeed that of temperate agriculture. The United States would be far more sympathetic to our difficulties in this field than in the field of manufactures. In the latter, the United States was, of course, in direct competition with Canada, and it seemed to him that adjustment to the loss of what was only a potential market would be easier for Canada.

37. Mr. Dillon expressed the view that there was a complete identity of interests in the agricultural field. He added that although the United States did not favour the preservation of the Commonwealth system of preferences, this did not mean that they would not be prepared to help with respect to special commodity problems. It seemed to him that Canada would not be so concerned about preferences if it obtained free entry for its main exports to the Common Market. Turning to the problem of low cost manufactures, Mr. Dillon said that the United States was aware of the special difficulties of the less developed members of the Commonwealth, and was also willing to help.

38. Mr. Fleming said that United States and Canadian views on European developments seemed close, except on the important question of preferences. It was clear that the United States did not attach importance to the maintenance of Commonwealth preferences. He agreed that the impact of Britain's entry into the Common Market would not be equal for all Commonwealth countries. Some would be hurt more than others, and this could have the effect of dividing the Commonwealth.

39. Mr. Ball said that different problems would probably have to be dealt with through different arrangements. With respect to textiles, for instance, it was doubtful that the Six would be prepared to give Hong Kong exports the same degree of access as they enjoyed in the British market. This difficulty might be solved in the context of wider arrangements of the kind recently negotiated for cotton textiles among interested countries under the auspices of the GATT.

40. With respect to tropical products, the United States had last February started discussions with the French and the British of proposals for substituting market stabilization arrangements and financial aid in place of preferences. Thus, new techniques were being explored which could compensate new members of the Commonwealth for the loss of preferences.

41. Mr. Green referred to statements by United States members regarding the strengthening of Europe. In his view, a distinction had to be made between the integration of Europe and the strengthening of Europe. The United States seemed to consider that Britain's entry into the Common Market would make an important contribution to strengthening Europe and to strengthening the free world generally. However, Britain, as the leading member of the Commonwealth, from which Britain largely derived its present position in the world, played an important role in the world, and there was a danger that Britain would lose some of its freedom of action by joining the European Community. There already was evidence that British policy was being unduly influenced by a desire not to antagonize the French. Mr. Green referred to the French attitude towards the United Nations and suggested that the common policies of the Six might not always be of the kind the United States would favour. Once the United Kingdom joined the Community it would have but one voice among other European countries in the formulation of a European policy and this voice might not be predominant. There was the additional danger that Britain's entry into the Community would weaken or even lead to the breakup of the Commonwealth. It was in the interest of both Canada and the United States to recognize the vital importance of the role Britain played as head of the Commonwealth.

42. Mr. Ball emphasized the importance of ensuring that the resources of the Six, and particularly France, were fully committed to the common interests of the West. He expressed confidence that Britain's political genius could help to bring an integrated Europe more nearly into line with the interests of the free world, and could also be relied on to reconcile her role in an integrated Europe with her position as the leading country in the Commonwealth. If Britain had been a member of the EEC it would have been able to control better the internal development of the Community, and perhaps to prevent the disarray that had been experienced at recent NATO meetings. The Western world must combine all its resources to meet the Communist challenge. If there was no possibility of a strong and united Europe, the prospects of the free world would be dark indeed.

43. Mr. Freeman commented that his press statement, which Mr. Fleming mentioned as having caused grave concern at the Commonwealth meeting in Accra, was not meant to be an attack on the Commonwealth preferential system, but had been mainly concerned with the problem of access to the Common Market for agricultural products.

44. The meeting adjourned at 12.50 p.m.

45. The Committee reconvened at 3.00 p.m., with Mr. Fleming in the Chair.

46. Mr. Fleming invited Mr. Dillon to review current developments in the American economy.

47. Mr. Dillon observed that the Committee had met the last time at the turning point of the recession. The United States Government's policy had since then been to reduce unemployment, maintain price stability and contain inflation. Care had, however, been exercised to prevent short term interest rates in the United States from falling too low in order to forestall a serious outflow of short term capital. There had been a large number of new bond issues, and shares valued at about 20 billion dollars had been sold during 1961.

48. Mr. Dillon said that the recession was now over. Unemployment stood at 6.1% as compared with 7% the year before. This was still too high. New records had, however, been achieved in virtually all business indexes. The GNP was running in the last quarter at a rate of $530 billion or 8% over the first quarter rate. For the whole year it would stand at $521 billion, a 3½% increase over 1960. Prices had remained stable, the consumer price index increasing by only ¾ of 1%. Early in 1961 there had been a noticeable increase in exports and a reduction of imports. The 1961 overall deficit in the balance of payments was accordingly expected to be somewhat under $2½ billion, of which $500 million could be regarded as the basic deficit. The short term capital outflow had been substantial but the gold loss of $850 million in 1961 was about half of the 1960 loss and accounted for a smaller percentage of the deficit.

49. Mr. Dillon proceeded with a review of the outlook for the United States economy. With respect to production the pattern was one of a regular upturn with an increase in consumer buying (automobiles), and this pattern was likely to continue. Private economists' estimates of the GNP for 1962 were in the neighbourhood of $565 billion or $5 billion better than had been expected three or four months ago. The Government's own estimate of the 1962 GNP was $570 billion. There was broad agreement between Government and private forecasters that the first half of 1962 would be very good. Their differences related to the speed of recovery over the second half of the year. There was, however, a general feeling that the economy would continue to move ahead. Improved profits and anticipated increases in orders by business for new plant and equipment supported this view. Business investment might also be encouraged by new tax measures affecting depreciation allowances. Mr. Dillon noted that business had a tendency to underestimate the volume of profits they could expect, although he recognized that there had been a squeeze on profits. The additional $5 billion in the Government's GNP forecast would increase Government revenues by about $1¼ billion. No real pressure was expected on prices over the next 5 to 6 months. Unemployment was still substantial and excess capacity existed in most sectors. Pressure on prices could arise, however, if new labour contracts in the steel industry called for substantial wage increases. The present contracts would expire in July. The Government's GNP estimates were based on the assumption that there would not be a steel strike, and the Government would do what it could to prevent a strike. Unemployment was expected to decline to 5% by the end of 1962. If the recovery continued at its current rate it would fall to 4% by the middle of 1963, thus reaching a "full employment" level. Thirty months was roughly the duration of the average boom in the United States since the end of the war. If it followed the same pattern, the present recovery would carry the economy to the middle of 1963.

50. Mr. Dillon said that the fiscal policy of the Government in 1961 had been designed to provide a stimulus to the economy. This policy had led to a deficit of $7 billion for the year ending June 30, 1962, which was much smaller than the $12.5 billion deficit reached during the last recession. Government revenues for the fiscal year 1961-62 were expected to be about the same as revenues over the 1961 calendar year since revenues generally lagged behind recovery by six months or so. If the Government's forecasts proved to be correct and revenues increased by $10 to $11 billion, receipts and expenditures would be balanced in the fiscal year 1962-63. This would be in keeping with the Government's policy of balancing the budget in times of prosperity. The President, in his budget message to Congress, would request Congress to hold down appropriations to recommended levels. The increase in the rate of expenditures was expected to level off during the next fiscal year, which would help in balancing the budget. The situation was quite different from that of a few years ago when the previous Administration had achieved a small surplus by substantial reductions in expenditures.

51. Mr. Dillon said that the Government intended to continue a policy of monetary ease until such time as pressures on prices or wages developed. He noted that short term interest rates had increased by half of one percent to 2¾%, while long term rates had remained stable at 4 to 4½%. This had been helped by changes in regulations allowing banks to pay higher interest on time deposits. If pressure developed on demands for loans, some tightening might be required, but the Government did not wish to pursue a restrictive monetary policy, particularly since it was at the same time carrying out a relatively conservative fiscal policy.

53. Mr. Dillon said that the outflow of short term capital in 1961 had been in the neighbourhood of $1.8 billion. This was the second year that a large outflow had taken place. He indicated that their figures for the fourth quarter of 1961 would reveal a substantial short term outflow. This was explained by a sharp increase in trade with Japan financed by short term borrowing, and also a short term flow to Canada of the order of $300 million. United States officials were unable to account fully for the latter. They thought, however, that some United States funds were probably attracted by higher short term interest rates in Canada. The outflow might also be the result of changes in taxation introduced in Canada in December, 1960. The gross take of Canadian taxes on the profits of United States subsidiaries in Canada was 57%, which was higher than the 52% deductible for United States taxation purposes. Some United States corporations had perhaps found some advantage in investing part of their profits in Canadian short term securities, the interest of which was taxable at a rate of 15% only. The outflow of short term capital to Canada might also partly be explained by shifts in deposits from United States to Canadian banks in New York, which would appear on United States balance of payments figures because of the United States accounting system. United States short term interest rates were still not competitive with London rates, but the short term outflow might well cease if there was no crisis of confidence.

54. With respect to the basic balance in international accounts, Mr. Dillon said that both imports and exports had risen considerably over the past six months, the latter to a figure of $20 billion for 1961. He expected exports to continue rising and remarked that the Administration was trying to improve depreciation provisions for industries. The United States was moving closer to a trade balance with Europe. Improvement in the payment situation with Germany was expected to continue with increased German Government procurement in the United States. The Government had made arrangements with Germany whereby United States military expenditures in Germany would be offset by German military procurement in the United States. Similar offset arrangements would be negotiated with France. While the basic balance might not be quite as good in 1962 as it had been in 1961, because of increased imports, the outflow of short term capital was expected to decrease in 1962 and a substantially lower overall deficit should be experienced in 1963. Indeed, a balance might be achieved in 1964. In brief, the policy of the United States Government was to maintain growth without inflation, improve the state of the balance of payment, increase exports and negotiate military offset agreements. Natural forces were working for expansion and a GNP increase of 8% was expected during 1962. The United States Government would, nonetheless, request several anti-recession measures from the Congress, the most important of which were:

- (1) A permanent long term unemployment compensation Act;
- (2) Standby authority for the President to initiate public works, if unemployment increased substantially; and
- (3) Presidential authority to reduce taxes by 5 percentage points, subject to Congressional veto, for a six-month period.

Mr. Dillon remarked that this latter authority was generally recognized as providing more effective means of combating a recession than increased spending programmes which took some time to implement. It might, however, run into considerable opposition in the Congress because of its novel character and the traditional fiscal powers of the Congress under the United States Constitution.

55. Mr. Fleming thanked Mr. Dillon for his comprehensive survey of the United States economic situation and prospects. Regarding the Canadian economic situation, Mr. Fleming said that in 1961 the Gross National Product reached $37 billion, the low first quarter having been at an annual rate of $35.7 billion and the last quarter having reached a high of $38.1 billion. The Gross National Product at the end of 1961 was therefore 7 per cent above the rate at the beginning of the year. The Gross National Product in 1962 was expected to be from 6 to 7 per cent above 1961. Canada had had the same general experience in employment as the United States. Employment had not expanded as rapidly as had the economy generally but the unemployment picture was materially better than it had been a year ago. On the fiscal side, in view of the slack in the Canadian economy the Government had budgeted for a deficit of $650 million. Canada had had for some time a serious balance of payments problem and for this reason action was taken in the last two budgets affecting the exchange rate. As a result, the Canadian dollar had moved to a discount of about 4½ per cent. This action affecting the rate in no sense constituted currency manipulation but was an attempt to deal with the serious balance of payments problem. Canada had for several years been running a current account imbalance of over a billion dollars. The Canadian Government had never objected to capital inflows of a productive nature. It had recognized their importance to the economy and had tried to maintain a climate hospitable to foreign investment capital. The government had been following a policy of monetary ease. The money supply had been increased over the past year by about $1 billion, or by 8 to 9 per cent. The commodity trade balance had improved considerably over the past year and there would be a surplus on commodity trade in 1961, the first such surplus since 1952. Medium and long-term interest rates had declined moderately over the past several months and the spread between Canadian and United States interest rates had been reduced. Mr. Fleming commented that Mr. Dillon's reference to large short-term capital outflows from the United States to Canada was puzzling. They had not shown up in the Canadian balance of payments.

56. Mr. Dillon explained that much of the movement of short-term capital was in the nature of a shift of savings from United States to Canadian banks in New York where they could earn a higher interest. It was shown on the United States accounts as a capital outflow because of their very conservative system of bookkeeping. It would not show up in Canadian statistics. Mr. Dillon said that he was not suggesting that anything needed to be done about this capital movement.

57. Mr. Hodges read a series of statistics demonstrating the important increase in activity in a number of sectors of the United States economy over the past year. He went on to say that while exports were about $20 billion annually they represented less than 4 per cent of the Gross National Product. United States exports were only about $111 per caput compared with exports of about $220 per caput for Canada.

AGENDA ITEM 2

UNITED STATES TRADE PROGRAM

58. Mr. Ball outlined briefly the history of the existing Trade Agreements Legislation. He then went on to observe that if the British were to join the European Economic Community, 85 to 90 per cent of the free world's industrial production and trade would be concentrated in the Community and the United States. Europe would be speaking with one voice in trade and economic affairs and would have an economy of about the size of the United States. A new sort of trading world would exist. Consequently the Administration had set about to redesign their trade legislation. The new bill would be radically different in style, terminology and approach, as well as in substance, from its predecessor, although it would still be based on a mutual exchange of benefits in tariff negotiations with other countries. A general authority would be requested to reduce tariffs by 50 per cent for large categories of items, because this seemed like a sensible way to make further reductions in tariffs and because the European Community was better able to negotiate on broad categories than on particular items. In addition several special authorities would be requested. First, the Administration would seek authority to negotiate tariffs to zero for categories of products where 80 per cent of the export value of these categories in relation to exports of the whole of the free world constituted trade between the United States and the Community. All the negotiations would take place on a most favoured nation basis. Countries receiving substantial indirect benefits from such negotiations would, of course, be expected to contribute to the exchange of benefits. Second, on agricultural items where the United States was in a strong competitive position and where tariff reductions by other countries could be effectively utilized to expand United States trade, authority would be sought to move to free. Third, the proposed legislation would provide for granting free access to United States markets for tropical agricultural and forest products, if Britain and the Community would do the same. Fourth, authority would be sought to move to free where the level of the existing tariff did not exceed 5 per cent.

59. The "safeguards" in the present legislation would also be altered. As was the case in existing legislation, the President would be required to request the advice of the Tariff Commission on proposed tariff reductions, but there would be no fixing of precise peril points. The national security clause would be retained in its present form. The escape clause would be substantially amended to provide for adjustment assistance for industries and labour as an alternative to increasing tariffs to previous levels. It was not intended that this assistance would provide large federal subsidies. Estimates suggested that expenditures would run between $50 and $100 million annually. The new legislation would have a life of five years. Regarding the problem of low cost imports, Mr. Ball said that Presidential power to reduce or eliminate tariffs would be limited to those commodities that could be produced most efficiently in the United States, Britain, the European Community and Canada. Congress could not be expected to hand over powers to reduce tariffs on goods produced by low cost countries.

60. The powers being sought would obviously be limited in their effect if the British negotiations with the Community failed. The new trade programme was constructed on the assumption of a European Community including the United Kingdom. Although it was not the intention to exert pressure on Britain, the legislation should not be regarded as providing an alternative to Britain's entry into the Community. While the legislation was being developed in such a way that it would not directly influence the negotiations in Europe, it was designed to ease future problems of adjustment for other countries, including the Commonwealth, should Britain join the Common Market.

61. There was some feeling in Washington that because of the state of the negotiations in Europe it might be better to wait for another year before introducing the new legislation. However, the view prevailed that it was necessary for the United States to exercise leadership at the present time in the move for greater trade liberalization, and that the existing momentum for liberalization should not be lost.

62. The envisaged reductions in world tariff barriers would be helpful in resolving not only some United States problems but also some Canadian problems. These initiatives would be strengthened if Canada participated in a similar programme of tariff reductions. Success depended on the creation of an environment of general commitment by the world trading community to further trade liberalization. The resulting expansion of world trade would lead to greater cooperation among the Western countries in the utilization of resources for the cold war, and to higher living standards everywhere.

63. Mr. Hodges pointed out the similarity of the interests of Canada and the United States in further progress toward trade liberalization, while recognizing that Canada had the problem of smaller industrial units. He expressed the view that protectionist sentiment in Canada was no stronger than it was in the United States. The Administration had had some recent indications that protectionist pressures in the United States were weakening somewhat. He had seen the vitality of Europe and was most impressed by it. He wanted the United States to share in this vitality by increasing their trade with Europe. The Administration would emphasize that the new programme was a "trade expansion programme" and was designed to increase economic activity and employment in the United States. They would try to demonstrate that only a very small proportion of potential imports were competitive with products of domestic industries. Although wages in the United States were relatively higher than in Europe, output per man was still higher. Now was the time to take an initiative in liberalizing trade. This trade liberalization should also include the dismantlement of restrictions on trade in agricultural products. Under the new programme the Canadian adjustment would be somewhat greater than would be the case in most countries, since Canada would be giving up preferences not enjoyed by others.

64. Mr. Freeman emphasized that the Administration would be seeking maximum access to the markets of the Community for agricultural products. They were very concerned about the problem of access at the present time. It was expected that the Six would work out a common price system this weekend. For many products internal prices would be safeguarded by the use of variable import fees enabling a rigid control on imports. If prices in the Community were established at a level that would bring forth uneconomic production, this would be very damaging to Canadian and United States export markets. The United States would press very strongly for assurances that their historic access for agricultural products should be guaranteed.

65. Mr. Ball said that the Administration hoped that the new trade bill would help to obtain improved access to European markets for agricultural products.

66. Mr. Green asked about the effect of the United States trade programme on the Commonwealth.

67. Mr. Ball said that industrial raw materials, which constitute the major sector of Canada's trade with Europe, for the most part already entered the Common Market free of duty. Aluminum constituted an outstanding exception, and it was the United States' intention to try to persuade the Six to move aluminum to the free list. If they were successful Canada would benefit considerably. The Administration had not yet received any very definite reaction from the Six to its proposed trade programme but in general discussions of this type of programme their response had been favourable. Recent discussions with Mr. Heath and Doctor Erhardt in Washington indicated they welcomed the Administration's new plans. In reply to a question by Mr. Hees, Mr. Ball said that hearings on the proposed legislation would start early in March, but it would be July or August before Congressional action could be expected.

68. Mr. Fleming thanked Mr. Ball for his outline of the programme. He welcomed the opportunity presented by the meeting of the Joint Committee to discuss the Administration's plans, to the extent that they envisaged an international initiative by the United States in the trade field having important bilateral aspects. A United States trade programme of this kind was recognized in Canada as of the highest importance for the world generally and for Canada. It was also apparent that the present was the most appropriate time for launching such an initiative. He personally felt that the GATT had not lost momentum and was playing an important role in developing initiatives for trade expansion on a multilateral basis. He noted that Mr. Heath had expressed the view, on his recent visit to Canada, that Congressional action on Administration's initiative and the resulting negotiations would come too late to affect the current negotiations in Europe.

69. Mr. Ball commented the Administration did not intend or wish that their programme would delay British negotiations with the European Community. However, their initiative might lead to the settlement of some problems in the negotiations on a provisional basis. It would be unfortunate if at the conclusion of the European negotiations the trade and economic pattern in Europe were fixed indefinitely.

70. Mr. Fleming said that Canadians still remembered the Hawley-Smoot tariff of the early 1930's and that they would want some assurance that the proposed trade programme would be a firm and lasting part of United States policy. Mr. Fleming then read a section from a speech he had given in Windsor, Ontario, on November 9, 1961, in which he had stressed that the United States as the leading world power could not be indifferent to the ramifications which the negotiations in Europe would have in so many parts of the world.<sup>62</sup> For example could the United States afford to overlook the effects of a weakening of the Commonwealth trading system or the political solidarity of the Commonwealth in Asia and Africa or their important trading interests in Japan? "Constructive and imaginative leadership was required if the system of world trade and payments which the United States had done so much to develop was to continue to provide an effective framework. Under any circumstances the course of action of the United States in commercial policy would have been of the utmost importance to world trade. In the present situation the scope and character of the tariff negotiating authority which the Administration would obtain from Congress might well influence the course of history, both economic and political, for years to come." Mr. Fleming assured the United States members that Canada was with them in looking for opportunities for freer trade. Canadian trade policy was based on its position as a world trader and on the GATT principles of multilateralism and non-discrimination. Canada has supported these principles in giving support to the establishment of the OECD and in contributing to the new resources of the IMF which would help to buttress the world payments system. Canada would not be found wanting in its contribution to a stronger and freer trading world.

71. Mr. Hamilton noted that Canada and the United States had been following the same lines in their search for solutions to agricultural trade problems. Agricultural problems were world-wide and could not be solved within the Six. Most of the industrialized nations could soon be in a net surplus position in agriculture, and the number of countries in this position would increase as the mechanization of agriculture spread. The International Wheat Agreement and the Wheat Utilization Committee proved how effectively countries could work together to help resolve surplus commodity problems. At the OECD Agricultural Ministers' meeting in Paris a few months ago he had pointed out that European countries except Greece and Turkey had or would eventually have a surplus of agricultural products. As a result they would be faced with three courses of action. First they could subsidize exports of agricultural products, which experience has proved to be both a costly and inefficient solution. Canada and the United States should give the lead in the OECD to the introduction of the rule of law for trade in agricultural products. There was precedence for this in the International Wheat Agreement in which producers were guaranteed a minimum price and consumers were protected by a maximum price. An additional solution was to increase the purchasing power of the underdeveloped countries by arranging commodity agreements which would ensure them a fair price for their output. Second, surpluses could be used as a basis for developing a new programme to assist the underdeveloped countries. In such a world food programme cash payments would demonstrate that the programme was based on humanitarian rather than selfish goals. Finally, governments could encourage alternative land use programmes. Canada and the United States were following constructive policies in this area and should continue to work together to persuade other countries to do the same.

72. Mr. Freeman agreed that the two countries should continue to work closely together to achieve the goals mentioned by Mr. Hamilton. Two steps were being taken by the Administration in this regard. First, United States food aid programmes would be integrated with the recipient countries' development programmes. Second, the farm programme to be sent to Congress would be the toughest in history. Among other things it would propose both acreage and production controls. There would be a real problem getting this programme through Congress.

73. Mr. Udall said that President Kennedy with his sense of history saw the new United States trade programme as a turning point in international trading relationships. The United States delegation was optimistic about the chance of success for the new programme. It was their belief that the risks of trying to initiate a new trading system were far less than the risks of retaining the old one.

75. Mr. Fleming noted with regret the absence of Mr. Merchant as a result of the sickness of his son.

AGENDA ITEM 2 (Cont'd.)

76. Mr. Fleming asked Mr. Ball whether he had any further comments on United States trade programme as it would relate to trade with low cost countries, and also with respect to "safeguards" – the peril points, the escape clause, and the national security amendment.

77. Mr. Ball said that all negotiated tariff reductions under the proposed legislation would be extended to third countries on a most favoured nation basis. Consequently to the extent that tariffs were lowered under the 50 per cent reduction authority on products which they exported, low cost producers would benefit. The authority to eliminate tariffs under the 80 per cent of world trade provisions would mainly affect manufactured goods produced in the industrialized countries of the West and would probably not have much relevance to exports of the less developed countries at the present time. As their production turned to more capital intensive manufactures, however, they would benefit by the zero tariff that would exist on these products in Europe and the United States. The movement to free of tariffs of 5 per cent or less would also benefit low cost countries, and the solution to the problem of trade in tropical agricultural and forest products along the lines envisaged in the new programme would definitely be of benefit to them. Study of the problem of low cost imports was taking place within the GATT framework. While the trade programme did not deal directly with this problem, the Administration would continue to feel its way in this area in the hope that the industrialized countries would find it possible to relax restrictions on these products, the export of which was so essential to the economic strength of the less developed countries. If these countries were going to have strong economies they would have to develop labour intensive industries and find market for their output.

78. On the question of safeguards, Mr. Ball referred to the President's State of the Union Message of January 11 in which he said that the existing safeguards would not be neglected in the new legislation.<sup>63</sup> Mr. Ball explained that the peril point provisions of the present legislation required the President to ask for and receive the views of the Tariff Commission on tariff reductions being planned. This was a method of giving assurances to Congress that the Executive would act only after having received the advice of an impartial body. The Administration, in its review of the peril point and escape clauses, was trying to move away from the concept of "injury." Every producer in a dynamic economy was faced with the need to adapt his production to changes in consumer taste, shifts in population, technological changes, substitution of materials, etc. In adjusting to such changes, only on very rare occasions did producers get assistance from the government. Similarly, while changes in the level of tariffs would require adjustments by industry, it was expected that most of those adjustments would be made without governmental assistance. Where adaptation involved the idling of plant and labour, relief could be provided either by a temporary adjustment of the tariff or by direct government assistance to industries to help them diversify or shift their output from one product to another. Tariff adjustments would only take place when other lines of defence were ineffective. The national security clause would remain unchanged in the new legislation. It had only been used once and that was in the case of oil.

79. Mr. Hodges said, with respect to the 80 per cent of world trade criterion for moving tariffs to free, that if Japan, for example, became a major exporter of products in one of the categories which originally met this criterion, it might develop that the United States and the European Community would cease to export between them 80 per cent of world trade. The course to be followed in such circumstances was one of the problems being considered in Washington.

80. Mr. Ball said that the base period for the 80 per cent of world trade calculation was not finally settled, although the year 1957 was currently being considered. Similarly, the categories for which tariffs would be reduced or eliminated were not yet determined. However, in the industrial sector the current plan included about 100 categories. In the legislation the President might be given the power to determine what these categories would be.

81. Mr. Ball said, in reply to a question by Mr. Fleming, that the Trade Agreement Legislation specified that tariff agreements entered into must be for mutual benefit and that this in effect ruled out unilateral tariff reductions by the United States.

TRADE IN AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTS

82. Mr. Hamilton said that the Canadian Government supported the United States programmes for providing foodstuffs to less developed countries on the basis of the requirements of their development programmes. The Canadians in turn wanted United States support for the food bank programme which Canada had proposed and which had now been accepted in principle by FAO and the U.N. General Assembly.<sup>64</sup> It was important that there should be a wide participation, particularly by European countries, in the new United Nations food programme. It was the Canadian intention to emphasize the aid nature of this programme by including in it provision for cash donations. It was essential that the programme be organized on the basis of the needs of the less developed countries, and that it should not be regarded as a programme for dumping surplus agricultural production.

83. Mr. Freeman agreed that the philosophy and psychology of the Food for Peace programme and the proposed World Food Programme must be that of aid to the underdeveloped countries. These should not be regarded as programmes to resolve domestic problems of surplus producers. The Administration would seek legislation that would permit a cash contribution to the proposed World Food Programme. The contributors to the programme should include all countries that exported agricultural commodities, even although their participation was only on a token basis.

COMMUNIQUÉ

84. The Committee then turned to the subject of a communiqué and, after some discussion, the text of a communiqué was approved.<sup>65</sup>

CLOSING REMARKS

85. Mr. Fleming said that it had been a great pleasure to receive the United States delegation in Ottawa. The meeting had been most useful and could not have been held at a more opportune time. The Canadians were particularly grateful for the opportunity to have a first hand description of the new United States trade programme which was so well thought out and would be so important to world developments. Mr. Fleming commented on the importance of personal relations in international affairs and on the high value which Canadian Ministers placed on the close and friendly relations with their United States colleagues.

86. Mr. Dillon shared Mr. Fleming's sentiments about the importance of working closely together. The meeting had been most useful and the United States members welcomed this opportunity to understand more deeply and fully Canadian problems arising out of the British negotiations with the Six. They recognized that Canada was in a special category. Mr. Dillon looked forward to continued close relationships. In conclusion he conveyed a personal message from the President to the Prime Minister extending the President's best wishes to the people of Canada.

87. The meeting was adjourned at 11.30 a.m., following which the communiqué was released to the press.

NOTE NO. 183

Ottawa, February 21, 1962

CONFIDENTIAL

The Embassy of the United States of America presents its compliments to the Department of External Affairs and has the honor to make known the continuing deep concern with which the United States Government views the plans of the Canadian Government to introduce legislation affecting foreign periodicals and to express the strong apprehensions of the United States Government with regard to the potentially adverse effects of the proposed legislation upon United States publications produced in or exported to Canada.

The United States Government observes that its carefully considered views on those recommendations of the Royal Commission on Publications affecting foreign periodicals were first expressed on August 4, 1961 in the United States Embassy's Note No. 27.<sup>66</sup> The Canadian Government's response (Department of External Affairs Note No. 12) was delivered on January 22, 1962,† following the announcement in the Canadian Parliament on that date of the Canadian Government's plans to introduce legislation to implement the Royal Commission's recommendations.<sup>67</sup>

The Canadian Government announced that it would introduce legislation to ban the entry into Canada of foreign periodicals containing advertising directed primarily to the Canadian market. In view of the long history of the support by the Canadian Government for the removal of barriers to international trade and particularly its opposition to quantitative import restrictions, the United States Government is surprised that the Canadian Government now plans to introduce a complete ban on the entry of certain foreign periodicals, particularly since the ban is to be imposed in an area involving the free flow of information and ideas.

See Canada, House of Commons, Debates, 1962, Vol. 1, pp. 58-60.

The United States Government considers that the proposed import prohibitions would be clearly contrary to Canada's international obligations under Article XI of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade. As the Canadian Government is aware, Article XI states that no contracting party to the General Agreement shall institute prohibitions on the importation of any product of the territory of any other contracting party. Such action by the Canadian Government might well be used as a precedent by other governments to ban the inflow of periodicals in areas where it is particularly important that the aims, ideals and activities of Canada, the United States and their Free World allies should be better known. The United States believes, therefore, that the proposed import ban would be both a violation of Canada's international obligations and a harmful precedent.

The United States Government believes that the proposed import ban will have the effect of depriving the United States publishing industry of the privilege generally enjoyed by exporting industries of adapting their product to the taste of potential consumers. The recognition of this privilege is the basis of international agreements to which the United States and Canada subscribe.

The United States Government is pleased to note that the Canadian Government is prepared to enter into conversations with the United States concerning compensation to the United States for any impairment of existing tariff concessions that the proposed import ban would create. However, even the provision of such satisfactory compensation would not make the proposed import ban any less inconsistent with Canada's obligations under Article XI of the General Agreement.

The Canadian Government also announced that it would introduce legislation to disallow as deductible business expenditures under the Canadian income tax 50 percent of the costs of domestic advertising in non-Canadian magazines now published in Canada, as well as all of the costs of advertising in magazines published outside of Canada. The United States Government notes that according to the figures given in the report of the Royal Commission on Publications the result of the proposed tax measure would be to increase by approximately 50 percent the costs to Canadian advertisers of domestic advertising in non-Canadian magazines published in Canada. It is obvious that the measure would seriously reduce the advertising revenues of those United States firms now publishing Canadian editions of their periodicals. The proposed tax measure is so discriminatory and its injury may well be so great that these United States firms may have to cease publication of their special editions for the Canadian reading public.

The United States Government believes that if the proposed tax measure is enacted Canadian advertisers are more likely to turn to other advertising media which reach a massive audience than to the Canadian periodicals which the measure is designed to help. It is axiomatic in the magazine industry that advertising is dependent upon circulation, and not the other way around. Advertisers buy circulation and they have a choice of many competitive media, both print and broadcast; if the choice of periodicals circulating in Canada is limited, the advertisers are likely to spend their money in newspapers, on direct mail, or for broadcast or telecast time. The United States Government believes, therefore, that the measure would not only be injurious to United States publishing interests now providing a special service to the Canadian reading public, but that it would not effectively assist Canadian periodicals.

Furthermore, the proposed tax measure would appear under some circumstances to contravene a commitment made by Canada to the United States in the double taxation convention between the two countries.<sup>68</sup> This commitment is to allow as deductions, in determining for the purposes of Canadian income tax on the net industrial and commercial profits of a United States enterprise permanently established in Canada, all “reasonably allocable” expenses of such enterprises, wherever the expenses may be incurred and including executive and general administrative expenses. The commitment is contained in paragraph 1 of Article III of the 1942 convention, as modified by the sentence added to that paragraph by Article I(a) of the 1950 convention. The proposed tax measure would appear to mean that an enterprise of United States origin, permanently established in Canada, would be allowed to deduct as a business expense only fifty percent of the expenses of that enterprise for advertising in a foreign periodical published in Canada. It would seem normal for such a United States enterprise to advertise its products to Canadian consumers in those periodicals published in Canada that the enterprise prefers to use, and consequently, the full expenses of such advertising would appear to be deductible under the double taxation convention.

It is the hope of the United States Government that the Canadian Government will, upon further consideration of the highly restrictive character of the proposed tax measure, decide to refrain from imposing the substantial, indirect disadvantage that the measure would create for the continued operation of the United States firms now engaged in producing periodicals for the Canadian reading public, and that the Canadian Government will continue the existing equality of tax treatment already operating in Canada. The United States Government hopes that consideration will be given to finding an alternative method, consonant with Canada’s international obligations, of attaining the Canadian Government’s objective in the cultural field.

ROYAL COMMISSION ON PUBLICATIONS

Officials of the departments involved in drafting the law and regulations to implement the recommendations of the O’Leary Report in accordance with your announcement in the House have produced the attached alternative draft resolutions for amendment to the prohibitory section of the Customs Tariff.

An important question of substance has arisen in these efforts to give effect to the decision to prohibit entry to Canada of foreign periodicals containing Canadian domestic advertising. The question at issue is the extent to which it is intended the prohibition apply. The O’Leary recommendation itself is not specific enough to provide the answer. The draft resolutions provide two different lines of demarcation.

The first of the two alternatives (“A” attached) would prohibit entry of special editions of foreign periodicals, including split-runs of regional editions, which carry advertising directed to the Canadian market which does not appear in or which differs from advertising in any edition of the same periodical which circulates in its country of origin. It is clear that these must be excluded if the basic objective of the policy is to be achieved. There are some questions of detail in drafting and in the regulations that will be needed but these can be settled subsequently when the main issue is decided.

The second of the alternative drafts ("B" attached) would also prohibit the entry of foreign periodicals which, although they circulate in their home country and abroad in the same form and with the same content, contain advertising which indicates a specific source of availability in Canada or terms and conditions relating specifically to sales in Canada.

This latter provision is intended to prevent Canadian suppliers securing benefits from "overflow advertising" in Canada to a degree which would either remove or reduce the need for them to advertise in Canadian periodicals. It would not prohibit entry if the advertisement included only a general reference to an office or supply in Canada. It would prevent entry however if, for example, the name and address of a Canadian supplier were spelled out in an advertisement, whether the Canadian supplier were listed by himself or among a number of other suppliers in other countries.

Inclusion of this provision would mean that foreign general or consumer magazines which are distributed in Canada with the same content, including advertising, as is distributed in the home country would have to make changes in some of their advertisements. The instances might not be numerous and the changes in most cases would be minor. From the point of view of Canadian business and trade publications this provision is important since the specific identification of Canadian sources of supply is one of the main services they render. It is the considered opinion of those officials most closely in touch with this question that if Canadian advertisers could identify their role in business and trade publications coming into Canada from abroad, it would seriously impede the ability of Canadian trade and business periodicals to secure the advertising revenue they require.

The question at issue here is whether the government wishes to restrict the prohibition to special editions which differ from those circulated at home or whether it wishes to go farther and encompass any foreign periodical containing advertising of specific sources of availability in Canada. The officials who have prepared these drafts believe that the more comprehensive alternative comes closer to the real intent of the O'Leary Report and the general objective of the government.

I would suggest that an early decision be made to resolve this question and that you should consider placing it before Cabinet. We could circulate copies of this note for the purpose.

LEGISLATION: ROYAL COMMISSION ON PUBLICATIONS
(Previous reference March 8†)

15. The Prime Minister said that two resolutions to implement recommendations of the O'Leary Commission had been placed on the order paper last session. Ministers should consider whether or not the government should proceed this session with this legislation affecting periodicals.

One of these measures would disallow, as income tax deductions by a taxpayer, 50 per cent of expenditures incurred for advertising directed at the Canadian market in the Canadian editions of Time magazine and Reader's Digest. Some Canadian advertisers had criticized the proposed measures as attempts by the government to restrict their freedom of choice in the placing of their advertising. The Canadian Periodical Press had now reconsidered its position and would be prepared to support the treatment of these two periodicals as Canadian periodicals. Ministers should also consider whether the proposed legislation would gain the government any friends among Canadian periodicals.

16. Mr. D. Fleming said that the President of the Reader's Digest and the Vice-President of Time had informed him recently that their companies' earnings had deteriorated seriously in recent months and that the suggested 50 per cent disallowance would be disastrous to their Canadian operations. Both periodicals now printed their Canadian editions in Canada, and in both cases the editorial material relating to Canada was prepared in this country. The essential facts had therefore changed since the Royal Commission had made its inquiry. This proposed 50 per cent disallowance should now be dropped. The government should, however, proceed with the other items, including the resolution on the prevention of the importation of Canadian editions of foreign periodicals, and the proposed amendments to the Post Office Act. The U.S. would probably protest against the ban on the entry of Canadian editions as a violation of the G.A.T.T., but the government should be prepared to face this criticism. Whatever course was adopted, the government should make an early statement that would end the long period of uncertainty in this field.

17. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Nowlan) said that Time and Reader's Digest should be treated as Canadian periodicals, but that the other legislative items should be proceeded with this session. Unless action on this subject were taken soon, there might be no surviving Canadian periodicals to express Canadian viewpoints. The present balance of payments problem was an illustration of the kind of subject on which it was important to develop a national viewpoint.

He went on to say that a basic change should now be made in the government's attitude to financial and general policy. During the past five years the government had given financial help to many different groups in the country, partly to win their support. The recent election had shown that this course had not been effective in winning votes for the government. In its present financial position the government could not afford to offer "handouts." It should therefore take whatever action it thought was right in each case, even if this should mean no more "handouts" or "goodies." This course would be more likely than the other to gain general support from the electorate.

18. During the discussion various opinions were expressed on the desirability or otherwise of proceeding with part or all of this legislation, and in addition the following points were raised:

(a) The Periodical Press believed that periodicals in Canada were now receiving a smaller share of the sums spent on advertising than in earlier years. Radio and television advertising had been increasing.

(b) The government would be severely criticized if it took action that led to the discontinuation of the Canadian editions of Time and Reader's Digest.

(c) If the government postponed all action on the proposals in the O'Leary Report, more foreign periodicals would probably establish Canadian editions.

(d) The proposed legislation might prove troublesome to the government if proceeded with this session. The subject was complex and the debate would probably be confused. It would constitute a poor electoral issue if the House of Commons should reject it. Some thought the proposals would be evidence of an attitude of narrow chauvinism on the part of the government.

19. The Cabinet noted the discussion on proposed legislation to give effect to recommendations of the Royal Commission on Publications.

RESOLUTION FOR PARLIAMENT ON MAGAZINES

8. The Minister of Finance said that on April 12th, 1962, as Minister of National Revenue, he had tabled two resolutions in the House of Commons recommending amendments to the Customs Tariff and the Income Tax Act designed to offer reasonable safeguards to Canadian magazines against undue competition from publications. The suggested amendment to the Customs Tariff would have had the effect of prohibiting the entry into Canada of special editions, including split-run or regional editions, containing advertising specifically directed to the Canadian market. The amendment to the Income Tax Act would have provided that the deductions from income of expenditures incurred by a taxpayer in issues of a non-Canadian periodical be disallowed. In cases of non-Canadian periodicals already established in Canada such deductions from income would have been disallowed in part only.

These resolutions had not been acted upon when Parliament was dissolved. On September 27th, 1962, the Speech from the Throne again forecast the enactment of measures to give effect, with modifications, to certain of the recommendations of the Royal Commission on Publications.

It should be noted that any ban on imports of any type contravenes Canada's obligations under the G.A.T.T. Written representations on this matter had been received from the U.S. Government.

The government had recently received new representations from the Maclean-Hunter Publishing Company urging that early action be taken to give Canadian publications the relief they had been expecting. Moreover they wanted more severe restrictions on the entry of trade papers.

He was proposing to introduce in the House a resolution, attached to his memorandum (Cab. Doc. 33/63 of Dec. 17, 1962†), which included the suggestions made by the Maclean-Hunter Publishing Company to restrict severely the entry of trade papers. The resolution embraced both the income tax and tariff aspects of the problem and the same effective date, July 1st, 1963, was provided in each case. This date was chosen because it was the earliest date which would allow the Department of National Revenue to make the necessary administrative arrangements and to give the advertisers and the publications time to adapt to the new situation.

An explanatory memorandum had been circulated. (Minister's memorandum – Cab. Doc. 33/63, Dec. 17, 1962.)

9. The Cabinet approved for introduction in the House of Commons a resolution substantially in the form attached to the Minister's memorandum (Cab. Doc. 33/63).

Dear Mr. President,

With the enactment of the Trade Expansion Act<sup>69</sup> I wish to let you know that the Canadian Government welcomes this important development in U.S. trade policy which holds out promise for significant progress in the expansion of world trade on a multilateral basis. This is indeed an historic accomplishment.

At the Commonwealth Prime Ministers' conference in London last month I proposed that all like-minded nations should meet at an early date to consider how the great problems of trade facing us today can be dealt with to the mutual advantage of all. I would like to follow up this general proposal with a specific suggestion for an early meeting on these matters. It is vitally important that we find effective ways as soon as possible for dealing with these complex and urgent trade problems. It appears that the most convenient way of arranging such a meeting would be to discuss these broad trade questions at a meeting of ministers.

The Canadian Government looks forward to participating fully in these efforts and to working with the U.S. and other nations to achieve the objectives which we hold in common. It is our conviction that the opportunities now opened up for wider cooperation in trade and economic relations will make a major contribution to the further strengthening of the free world.

Trade relations between Canada and the United States are characterized by mutual understanding and a constructive approach to our common objective of freer non-discriminatory trade. These new efforts to expand world trade will provide continuing opportunities for our two countries to work closely together each in a full understanding of the other's interests and aspirations.

Washington, October 18, 1962

Dear Mr. Prime Minister:

Thank you for your letter on the occasion of my signature of the Trade Expansion Act. I am pleased to know that the Canadian Government welcomes this most significant development in the trade policy of the United States.

Ever since World War II, Canada and the United States have been partners in a determined search for a non-discriminatory trading world which affords to all countries of the Free World the best opportunities for economic growth and expansion. Your letter makes clear that we continue to share these common objectives, and I am gratified to have your pledge of close cooperation in moving toward a wider acceptance of our convictions.

I would like to take full advantage of the authority which the Trade Expansion Act confers upon me and I am eager to explore with other like-minded nations as soon as possible the problems and prospects for a new approach to the reduction of obstacles to world trade. In this connection the recent discussions in Ottawa between officials of our two Governments have been most useful. I have been thinking that, after some of the preliminary work has been done and a consensus reached among the principal participants, a ministerial meeting early in 1963 of the Contracting Parties of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade might well be the most suitable way to enlist the participation and support of like-minded nations.

On the basis of your proposal for an international meeting, perhaps we might join forces in recommending a special meeting of the Contracting Parties at the ministerial level, to be held possibly as early as February or March of 1963. I should be interested in your reactions to this suggestion.

I am encouraged by the improvement in Canada's reserve position and welcome the first step you have just taken in the process of removing the special surcharges on imports in response to this improvement. I look forward to your being able to remove the remaining surcharges.<sup>70</sup> This would help us all move forward in our attack on trade barriers.

Sincerely,

JOHN F. KENNEDY

CONFIDENTIAL

Seattle, January 19, 1962

Dear Ed [Ritchie],

According to press reports and other information available to us, there does not yet seem to be any sign of an agreement between Ottawa and Victoria on the Columbia Treaty, which might pave the way to ratification at the present session of Parliament. I realize, of course, there are important political factors involved which will have to be taken into account when considering any move to clear the impasse. However, I thought some informal views on the problem, as it looks from here, and some suggestions might be useful at this time.

2. As you know, some responsible Canadian observers consider that Canada did not get as good a deal as we might have under the Treaty and that it might be in our best long-term interest to re-open it for revision (probably along the McNaughton Plan<sup>71</sup>) or even let it lapse. From our observations this is the last thing the Americans would want to happen. They, and particularly those in the power field here, know that they have a good bargain, as evidenced by their ratification in record time. Despite some of Udall's statements late last year, I am convinced that Americans are anxious to suppress any suggestion that U.S. pressure for Canadian ratification or U.S. interference in our domestic dispute, are being exercised. I am also pretty sure that they would be willing to accept Canadian ratification as late as the end of this year or even next year, even though they might announce, in the interim, alternative plans for hydro development on this side of the border.

3. The method of financing the Columbian project seems to be at the core of our domestic controversy. Premier Bennett wants to finance Canadian construction from the sale in the United States of all or most of Canadian down-stream benefits and to supply the B.C. lower mainland with power developed from the Peace River. On the other hand, Ottawa, in line with the terms of the Treaty, is insisting on preserving all or most of our share of down-stream benefit power for use within Canada, but at the same time is willing to consider the sale of some surplus power as provided for in the Treaty. Leaving out the political factors involved, it seems to me that the two positions are not irreconcilable providing there is some "give and take" on the part of both Federal and Provincial Governments. In this connection I would like to mention three points.

4. The first is the Peace River Project, the development of which has long been one of Bennett's ambitions and main objectives. Notwithstanding the fact that the Province has already allocated a considerable sum for preliminary engineering and construction, and has, in fact, made an initial start on the project, it could still be an important element in the Premier's political tactics to keep Ottawa guessing, and to strike the best possible financial bargain with

Ottawa on the Columbia project. I do not think Bennett feels that he, or his Government, is committed to a rigid schedule for the Peace River project, at least not to the point of no return. In other words, if he saw some encouraging or concrete signs of an agreement with Ottawa on the Columbia it seems to me that he could, without losing face, find ways and means to slow down the present preliminary work, and to delay further construction contracts, if some new development made this necessary or desirable. Being the politician he is, I have no doubt he is quite capable of doing this.

5. The second point is that the Federal policy banning the export of Canadian power has not always been strictly adhered to. Section I of Article VIII in the Treaty and the recent decision of the National Energy Board, approving limited exports of Canadian power<sup>72</sup> would seem to indicate that our historic ban on power exports is subject to modification in the light of circumstances that might prevail from time to time. As you know, some responsible experts in the power field consider that it might be wise for the Canadian Government to consider a revision of our 40-year-old policy on power exports in the light of present-day conditions and the rapid advances being made in the development of nuclear power. All seem to agree that if Canadian power is exported it should be sold at a profitable price; that Canadians must still have the cheapest power available to them; and that there must be iron-clad clauses in any export contracts which would guarantee its return to Canada.

6. The third point is that local power interests here, including the Federally-controlled Bonneville Power Administration, have indicated their willingness to purchase some of the Canadian share of down-stream benefit power under certain conditions, if this would facilitate Canadian ratification of the Treaty. What the American power interest will pay, and what type of contract they would accept, is not yet known in any detail. What we do know is that they are prepared in principle to purchase some of this power.

7. Taking the above three points together, it seems to me a solution to the present impasse might be based on a) the amount of down-stream benefit power Canada might be willing to sell to the U.S., and, b) the terms under which that power would be sold for specified limited periods. Bennett wants to sell all or the great bulk of down-stream benefits on a long-term (20-year) basis. Ottawa will apparently agree to the sale of some power on a short-term (5-year renewable contract) basis. I think it is possible to work out a compromise formula. Contracts with rather complex formulas to cover somewhat similar problems have been successfully negotiated here in the Pacific Northwest between public and private power groups, notwithstanding the fact that many conflicts had to be resolved such as up-stream and down-stream rights, interstate rivalries and politics as well as other difficult matters. Some of these contracts provide, among other things, for the short- and long-term sale of power. If you would like to have a copy of one, I think it is possible for us to get one for you.

8. If a fixed load growth for B.C., say for the next ten or fifteen years, could be agreed upon, it would be possible to determine a specific amount of Canada's share of down-stream benefits which would be considered surplus for Canadian requirements, and therefore available for sale in the United States. This surplus block of energy could be classified into different categories under the terms of any export contract, which would provide adequate flexibility both as to quantities of power and times of delivery. For example, a fixed amount of firm energy could be sold under a 5-year renewable clause – another portion could be sold under a 10-year clause, etc. Provision could also be included for the sale of dump power and for interchanges of power. The price in each case could also vary, depending on the load factor and availability. In other words, I think an export contract could be written in such a way that it would satisfy all parties concerned and, at the same time, safeguard their basic interests. If some arrangement along this line could be agreed upon, there could be a concurrent understanding with the Province that the Peace River development could be phased in such a way that it would fit in with the requirements of the Canadian export contract.

9. Because of Provincial jurisdiction over the physical resources of the Columbia and other factors, some observers and commentators consider that Bennett holds the strongest cards in his present dispute with Ottawa. They feel that if the deadlock is to be broken the initial move must come from Ottawa. It might be to the Federal Government's advantage to take the initiative in offering some compromise solution. If Ottawa agrees to the sale of some of our share of down-stream benefits, provided, of course, that we have iron-clad clauses guaranteeing its recovery at the stipulated periods, it could be argued that this was not going contrary to the traditional Federal policy banning power exports because our share of down-stream benefit power is not power produced in Canada and exported across the line. It is, rather, power produced in the United States and made available to us.

10. As I mentioned earlier, I am quite certain that the Americans would be willing to wait until next year for our ratification. However, if Ottawa has any intention of selling some of our share, I think it is in our interest to conclude an export contract as soon as possible. The longer we wait, the less attractive this power will be, considering the rapid advances being made in developing nuclear energy and for other reasons. The Bonneville Power Administration's latest forecast points to a possible power deficit in this region by 1970. Consequently the greater the amount of power we might make available around that date, the higher will be the price we should get.

11. If you consider some of these thoughts and suggestions have merit, you might wish to discuss them with Norman Robertson and the Minister.<sup>73</sup>

Kindest regards.

Yours sincerely,

K.J. BURBRIDGE

COLUMBIA RIVER TREATY

The State Department (Carlson, Canadian Desk) have just phoned me to report that Premier Bennett this afternoon phoned to Luce, the Bonneville Power Administrator, and asked for a letter from him (Luce) requesting commitments to deliver future power in respect of which he (Bennett) said that he was in a position to make commitments at a price of five mills, subject to agreement upon details. According to Luce, Mr. Bennett was speaking of power from Duncan. Carlson mentioned no repeat no amount as having been offered by the Premier.

2. Because USA authorities, Carlson went on, are most anxious to avoid interference in a matter involving federal and provincial authorities in Canada, Luce had replied to Bennett that he was not repeat not in a position to accede to the Premier's request; all that he could do was to refer him to the statement of requirements dated October 17, 1961 (which is apparently in the British Columbia Government's possession and of which, Carlson said, Canadian Government had been given a copy.)<sup>74</sup>

3. According to Carlson, Premier Bennett's reaction to Luce's response was "grim." He said that, if that were the attitude of USA authorities, he (Bennett) was "through with the Treaty." He had "given USA their chance" and, as they were not repeat not taking it, they could "accept the consequences."

4. Carlson said that Luce's conversation with Bennett had only just taken place. USA authorities wanted the Canadian Government to know at once what had transpired. State Department have also phoned their account to Merchant and he also may be in touch with you. In conclusion, Carlson repeated the determination of USA Government to keep out of any dispute between federal and provincial authorities in Canada.

COLUMBIA RIVER; TERMS OF REFERENCE FOR MINISTER OF FINANCE
 IN MEETING WITH PREMIER OF BRITISH COLUMBIA
 (Previous reference December 20, 1961)<sup>75</sup>

23. The Secretary of State for External Affairs said that the basis for the Columbia River Treaty with the United States had been that water would be released by Canada for production of power in the United States. In return, Canada would get back half the power generated. The agreement had been a difficult one to negotiate. The Deputy Minister of Lands, British Columbia, had participated, and all had agreed that half of the residual power would be transmitted back to the British Columbia border free. The only attraction in this transaction was the return of power to Canada. Weeks after the terms had been agreed to, the Premier of British Columbia wanted all the power generated to be sold in the U.S. with Canada taking cash instead of free power. His scheme was to get capital to develop the Peace River power. For some time the Provincial Premier had been endeavouring to have the Federal government provide increased financial assistance. The government should offer to pay one-half of the cost of the transmission lines.

24. The Minister of Finance said that a request from the Premier of British Columbia to meet with him had gone unanswered. A reply should be sent before the Dominion-Provincial meeting on March 19th, and perhaps he should be seen before that time.

25. During the discussion the following points were raised:

(a) Some said that a better offer should be made to British Columbia. Others said that it would do no good to increase the offer. It would not be accepted. In any further negotiations, it should be made clear that the interests of the people of British Columbia had to be put first. B.C. consumers should get the benefit of the cheaper power. As long as their needs were met first there should be no objection to any surplus being sold in the U.S. The surplus could be determined by the National Energy Board.

(b) The Columbia River project was sound economically. No subsidy was required and there was no case for an outright grant. To subsidize in these circumstances would be a dangerous precedent. In comparable cases in the Maritimes, loans had been made. Others felt that a grant would be in order but they would be prepared to offer an increased advance subject to repayment. However, a loan would not likely be accepted as British Columbia would not want to create more debts. Their biggest cost at present was interest on borrowed money.

(c) Some said that the Premier should be seen before he reached Ottawa but that no mention should be made of any offer before the meeting. Others felt that arrangements should be made to discuss the matter with him while he was in Ottawa but to take the initiative by writing to him beforehand. No mention of terms should be made until the meeting between him and the Minister of Finance.

26. The Cabinet agreed,—

(a) that the Minister of Finance write to the Premier of British Columbia saying that he wished to discuss the Columbia River project on the occasion of Mr. Bennett's visit to Ottawa on March 19th and,

(b) to consider later possible terms which the Minister might propose or accept at that time.

COLUMBIA RIVER DEVELOPMENT; PLANS FOR DISCUSSION WITH THE PREMIER OF BRITISH COLUMBIA
 (Previous reference March 13†)

16. The Minister of Finance said he hoped the Cabinet would give him clear instructions for his meeting with the Premier of British Columbia on Sunday, March 18th. It had been rumoured in Victoria on Friday, March 9th that the Federal government was going to increase substantially its offer of financial assistance to the province for Columbia River development. There was no foundation to the rumour, but it coincided with what government members of Parliament from British Columbia were hoping would happen. Premier Bennett had called a press conference and was manifestly upset. He had said that such offers were plain bribery and that the province did not need federal aid but could proceed with the development of both the Columbia and Peace Rivers on its own. It was reported that the Premier had said he would resign if it were necessary for Canada to buy back downstream power developed on the Columbia River. He had proof that this would not be necessary and that it was nonsense to say that downstream Columbia power could be sold more cheaply than power developed in Canada.

17. Mr. Fleming said he wondered what the government's position should be on the sale in the United States of downstream benefits rather than bringing them back into Canada.

18. During the brief discussion it was said that, so long as the bulk of the power, 50.1 per cent, was available to Canada, the balance could be sold if the needs of the lower mainland of B.C. were met, and provided the National Energy Board determined the quantities available for sale and the period over which it would be available.

19. The Cabinet agreed that the Minister of Finance should,

(a) confirm with the Premier of British Columbia when he meets him on Sunday, March 18th, the provincial policy he had announced at a press conference on Friday, March 9th, i.e., that the province did not require any money from the Federal government and could finance the Columbia River and Peace River developments without federal aid; and,

(b) inform Premier Bennett that the Federal government would agree to sell up to 49.9 per cent of available power, subject to certification by the National Energy Board that the power was surplus to Canadian requirements for the period of the contracts.

Note de l'ambassade des États-Unis

Note by Embassy of United States

NOTE NO. 206

Ottawa, March 17, 1962

The Chargé d' Affaires ad interim of the United States of America presents his compliments to the Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs and has the honor to refer to the common interest of the United States and Canada in the development of the resources of the Columbia River. It will be recalled that the Columbia River Treaty was signed on January 17, 1961 and that the United States Senate gave its advice and consent to ratification on March 16, 1961. The United States Government understands that Canada's ratification of the Treaty is now still pending because of differences within Canada over the manner of carrying out certain of Canada's undertakings under the terms of the Treaty.

The United States Government had assumed that the Treaty would be ratified by both countries at a reasonably early date, as seemed to be the prospect at the time the Treaty was signed by the Heads of Government of the two countries. It has been on this expectation that the United States has been basing its planning for additional power resources with which to meet the strong rise in predicted future power needs in the Pacific Northwest region of the United States. The possibility of resolving these future power needs through the most efficient utilization of the Columbia River Basin's water resources by cooperative development with Canada was, naturally, a prime consideration during the negotiation of the Columbia River Treaty. Even with the share of the power to which the United States would be entitled under the Columbia River Treaty, it appears that the power situation on the West Coast of the United States will be tight during the 1965-66 period.

Another primary consideration in the position taken by the United States Government during the negotiations was the fact that the development of the Canadian storage dams as contemplated in the Treaty, together with the development of the Libby Dam project, would permit the attainment of a long-time objective for flood control in the Columbia River Basin. The importance of the need for flood control may be judged by the fact that in 1948, during the largest recent flood in the region, thirty-four persons lost their lives, seven persons were reported missing, and property damage was estimated to have been over $100 million. It will be recalled that the Treaty provides for payment by the United States Government to Canada of lump sums aggregating $64,400,000 for the flood control benefits which the dams in Canada would provide. Additionally, the Libby Dam project would virtually eliminate the serious flooding that takes place at intervals on the Kootenai River from the vicinity of Bonner's Ferry, Idaho to Kootenay Lake in British Columbia. These devastating floods have caused great damage to highly productive farm land and have repeatedly threatened the town of Bonner's Ferry.

The possibility of attaining these flood control objectives at an early date by means of the Columbia River Treaty, as well as the possibility of meeting future power needs in the most efficient manner, was an important consideration in the United States' decision to agree to the kind of division of benefits with Canada which the Treaty contains. The pressing need to meet the power and flood control deficiencies was also a major factor in the relatively early approval of the Treaty by the United States Senate.

The United States Government trusts that the Canadian Government will understand the need on the part of the United States for firm assurances that the Columbia River Treaty will enter into force at an early date. The United States, therefore, hopes that full consideration will be given to the possibility of proceeding with ratification, leaving, if necessary, national problems to be resolved while construction is under way. On the other hand, if it would be helpful and should Canada so desire, the United States would be willing to engage now in discussions as to price and terms of disposition in the United States of any Canadian power, as a preliminary step leading to the exchange of notes mentioned in Article VIII of the Treaty, provided Canada is prepared to discuss quantity, period of disposition, kind of power and similar matters which are solely Canada's to determine.

In any event, its own pressing needs force the United States to note, regretfully, that in the absence of any substantial indication of ratification and implementation of the Treaty at an early date it necessarily will have to give serious consideration to possible alternative solutions. The United States Government would, therefore, be most appreciative if it could receive a current appraisal from the Canadian Government regarding the prospects for early ratification.

COLUMBIA RIVER

Following for Minister only.

In subsequent message† we are reporting the text of a note which was delivered to the Department on Saturday morning by the Chargé of the USA Embassy. This note has been drawn to the attention of the Prime Minister and has been discussed in a preliminary way with Mr. Fleming and Mr. Fulton. We have been assured by the USA Embassy that there is no intention to publish the note and that we would of course be consulted if publication seems desirable at a later stage. Since, however, there were already rumours last week in Washington that some communication might be coming from the USA Government on this subject, it is thought best that an early reply should be made to the note in order that our position may be on record against the possibility of a leak. Accordingly, it is expected that ministers will be considering on Monday morning a draft reply along the lines indicated below. If you have views on this procedure or on this particular draft you may wish to let us have them before the Cabinet meeting on Monday morning. You will of course appreciate the specially sensitive nature of this USA note in relation to talks which Mr. Fleming will be having with Premier Bennett on Sunday and which will also be taking place at the Federal Provincial Power Conference on Monday.

2. The following is a draft of the proposed reply to the USA note: Text Begins:

The Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs presents his compliments to the Chargé d'Affaires ad interim of the United States of America and has the honour to refer to the Embassy's Note No. 206 of March 17 concerning the Columbia River Treaty.

The Canadian Government observes that the note from the Embassy is concerned primarily with the urgent need to complete ratification of the Treaty. The Canadian Government shares this view and has repeatedly indicated its desire to proceed with ratification as soon as possible. It has urged the Provincial Government of British Columbia, where the Columbia River is located, to do its part to enable early ratification to take place.

The Canadian Government would not be showing a proper sense of responsibility if it were to carry through the formalities of ratification without having ensured that the necessary arrangements had been made within Canada to bring about its effective implementation.

The Canadian Government notes the offer of the USA Government to engage in discussions regarding the disposition in the USA of any Canadian power "if it would be helpful and should Canada so desire." The Canadian Government considers that it would be improvident and would place the Canadian negotiators in a most unfavourable position if they were to enter into discussions with the USA authorities on this subject before the internal matters had been settled within Canada. In the absence of a firm and dependable arrangement with the Provincial Government of British Columbia, the Canadian Government would not be in a position in such discussions with the USA to protect the interests of Canada and to preserve for the people of British Columbia the benefits provided by the terms of the Treaty. The Canadian Government therefore continues to consider, as the USA authorities themselves have indicated on several recent occasions, that it would be premature to initiate discussions on this subject at this time.

The Canadian Government fully understand the anxieties of the USA Government regarding future flood control and power supplies on the West Coast of the USA. The USA Government can be assured that it is the hope of the Canadian Government that ratification of the Treaty on the mutually advantageous basis originally contemplated will become possible at an early date.

USA note delivered on March 17 contains one serious misrepresentation of the facts which makes me wonder whether the note is not repeat not in fact a squeeze play. I refer to the phrase in the first paragraph of the note to the effect that Canadian ratification of the Treaty is still pending because of differences within Canada “over manner of carrying out certain of Canada’s undertakings” under the terms of the Treaty.

2. I believe that our reply should explain that the differences within Canada are over the disposal of Canada’s share of downstream benefits which, under the Treaty, must be transmitted by USA to Canadian border free of cost to Canada.

3. In other respects the draft reply contained in your G48 is satisfactory, but I would like you to draw to the attention of the Prime Minister and the other ministers concerned the point I have raised above.

DRAFT REPLY TO THE NOTE OF THE UNITED STATES EMBASSY

The Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs presents his compliments to the Chargé d’Affaires ad interim of the United States of America and has the honour to refer to the Embassy’s Note No. 206 of March 17 concerning the Columbia River Treaty.

The Canadian Government observes that the Note from the Embassy is concerned primarily with the urgent need to complete ratification of the treaty. The Canadian Government shares this view and has repeatedly indicated its desire to proceed with ratification as soon as possible. It has urged the Provincial Government of British Columbia, where the Columbia River is located, to do its part to enable early ratification to take place.

In this connection the Canadian Government would stress that the difficulties impeding the completion of arrangements within Canada have not related to any “differences . . . over the manner of carrying out certain of Canada’s undertakings under the terms of the Treaty,” as the Embassy’s Note suggests. Canada’s undertakings have not in fact been questioned. The difficulties have arisen over differences regarding the disposal of Canadian down-stream power benefits arising in the United States which under Article V of the Treaty the United States undertakes to deliver free of charge to the Canadian border except insofar as other arrangements may be made under Article VIII. The Canadian Government would not be showing a proper sense of responsibility if it were to carry through the formalities of ratification without having ensured that these difficulties had been overcome and that the necessary arrangements were being made within Canada to bring about its effective implementation.

The Canadian Government notes the offer of the United States Government to engage in discussions regarding the disposition in the United States of any Canadian power “if it would be helpful and should Canada so desire.” The Canadian Government considers that it would be improvident and would place the Canadian negotiators in a most unfavourable position if they were to enter into discussions with the United States authorities on this subject before the internal matters had been settled within Canada. In the absence of a firm and dependable arrangement with the Provincial Government of British Columbia, the Canadian Government would not be in a position in such discussions with the United States to protect the interests of Canada and to preserve for the people of British Columbia the benefits provided by the terms of the treaty. The Canadian Government therefore continues to consider, as the United States authorities themselves have indicated on several recent occasions, that it would be premature to initiate discussions on this subject at this time.

The Canadian Government fully understands the anxieties of the United States Government regarding future flood control and power supplies on the West Coast of the United States. The United States Government can be assured that it is the hope of the Canadian Government that ratification of the treaty on the mutually advantageous basis originally contemplated will become possible at an early date.

Ottawa, March 20, 1962

Dear Arnold [Heeney],

I am enclosing a copy of a Note regarding the Columbia River Treaty which was delivered to me last Saturday by Rufus Smith, in his capacity as Chargé of the United States Embassy.

I have delayed sending you this copy in the hope that I might also be able to send you our proposed reply at the same time. Unfortunately, the reply has not yet been completely cleared although it is under discussion at ministerial level.

My reason for giving this document special security treatment may or may not be evident to you on first reading of the text. If, however, you re-read pages 3 and 4 (together with the pointed reference to "Heads of Government" on the first page) you may be able to get some picture of how this communication has been taken here. I can assure you that the initial reactions were very strong indeed, especially since the paragraph at the bottom of page 3 was saying just the opposite of what Udall had indicated when he and Fulton were discussing the possibility of an exchange of letters which would have recorded the view of the United States Government that it would be "premature" to initiate the kind of discussions which the B.C. government had proposed regarding disposals of down-stream benefits in the United States.<sup>76</sup> The possibility of carrying through the proposed exchange of letters between Fulton and Udall was still being discussed as recently as last Thursday when Rufus Smith had given me orally the rather negative view which had developed in Washington over the proposed correspondence. As you can imagine, it was surprising – to say the least – when we received this Note on a Saturday morning – and particularly on the Saturday morning preceding Sunday's discussions between Premier Bennett and Mr. Fleming and Monday's federal-provincial meeting on the power grid where it was known that Premier Bennett would be raising questions about the Columbia.

We are trying to play this in a fairly low key here; we may not be successful, however, since this Note and the circumstances surrounding it really invite a pretty sharp response.

I do not think that you should say anything at this stage to the State Department about this Note. Naturally we also consider it essential that no word should leak out about the fact that such a communication has been received. The press stories last week and the related question asked by Mr. Herridge in the House of Commons concerning the possibility of some kind of communication on this subject<sup>77</sup> may indicate that there is little chance of keeping this story out of the press. We intend, however, to do our best.

Warm regards.

Yours sincerely,

COLUMBIA RIVER DEVELOPMENT; REPORT BY THE MINISTER OF FINANCE
 (Previous reference March 19†)

14. The Minister of Finance said he had had a further meeting with the Premier of British Columbia on the afternoon of March 19th. It had been fruitful and, at the conclusion of it, the press had been called in. They had been told that both the Federal government and the provincial government were trying to arrive at an understanding, and that a further meeting was planned but that no time or place had been set.

15. Mr. Fleming said that the crux of the difference between the two parties was the economics of bringing downstream benefits back to Canada. Premier Bennett contended that this would be most expensive power. It was agreed that experts of both sides should get together to review the provincial and federal assessments of the cost of these benefits. Mr. Bennett had wanted only one expert from each side but had agreed that there would be more than one. Mr. Fleming was to let him know within 48 hours the number of experts who would represent the federal side. The meeting of experts should be arranged quickly. No mention of this meeting was to be made in the press. The Prime Minister had been told of these developments and had approved. Mr. Bennett had said he would not buy power developed downstream on the Columbia, and the province would not develop power on the Columbia if the Federal government insisted on bringing it back to Canada.

16. In the discussion it was said:

(a) It would not be advisable to engage Montreal Engineering Company experts for the federal side of the discussions, but they might provide technical assistance to the civil service experts who were chosen.

(b) Would such a meeting get anywhere if each team of experts was biased in favour of its own government?

(c) The experts likely to be chosen had worked closely together for months and were quite unbiased in their views on Columbia power.

17. The Cabinet noted with approval the report of the Minister of Finance on his meetings with Premier Bennett of British Columbia about the Columbia River development and agreed that Messrs. D.M. Fleming, Fulton and Dinsdale should meet to determine the number and identity of the federal technical and economic experts who would meet with provincial experts to examine the differences between the federal and provincial assessments of the costs of downstream power benefits on the Columbia River.

CONFIDENTIAL

COLUMBIA RIVER POWER DISCUSSIONS

In accordance with instructions from you and your colleagues, the undersigned met on April 5 and 6 with representatives of British Columbia: Messrs. Shrum, Keenleyside, Kidd and Purcell.

A. TERMS OF REFERENCE FOR THE MEETING

We opened by indicating our understanding that the purpose of the meeting was to examine the costs of power that would be derived from downstream benefits, at-site development on the Columbia, and the Peace River respectively, in order to ensure that any differences were clearly understood. We referred to the fact that Mr. Bennett had indicated to you his belief that downstream benefits were not the cheapest source of power.

The British Columbia group immediately said that they had been given quite different instructions about the purpose of the meeting. They said their government was of the view that the "long-distance" debate over the development of the Columbia had gone on far too long. They had come, on the instructions of the Premier, prepared to make specific suggestions for arrangements that they hoped could be recommended to both governments in order that the Columbia development could begin at the earliest possible date. Dr. Shrum said that there was no purpose in discussing costs of Peace River power. It was going ahead and there was no room for doubt on this point. The real need was to arrive at arrangements for the Columbia. He said that there was no difference between British Columbia and the federal government on cost calculations and there seemed nothing to discuss there.

Expanding on the province's attitude on the Columbia, Dr. Shrum said that they proposed to outline proposals for the sale of Canada's downstream benefits in the United States. The province had no intention that that sale should subsidize the Peace or any other provincial development. It wanted to work out the basis for a sale before ratification of the Treaty took place because the bargaining position would be very much stronger if the United States recognized that they would not get ratification (and therefore would not secure their own share of downstream benefits) unless acceptable terms of purchase were worked out with Canada. The Treaty would not need any modification; it was entirely acceptable to British Columbia as it was.

We advised the British Columbia representatives that their terms of reference differed markedly from ours. We had no authority to discuss arrangements for sale of downstream benefits to be recommended to governments. We indicated that we felt we could hear what they had to suggest and ask questions for clarification, in order that Ministers here could know what the province proposed, but it had to be understood that we could not agree to or recommend anything. Mr. Parkinson and I reported this to you at noon on Thursday and you agreed that we should follow this course and carry on the meetings so there could be no suggestion that the federal government was not prepared to receive the B.C. suggestions.

B. COST OF DOWNSTREAM BENEFITS

Although the British Columbia people had said there were no cost differences between them and us, we asked where Mr. Bennett's impression had been derived that the downstream benefits were not the cheapest power – particularly, where he had secured a figure of some 6 mills?

Dr. Shrum said they had not supplied any such figure to Mr. Bennett but they thought they knew the basis on which it had been worked out. Mr. Purcell explained that a figure of 6 mills could be derived by taking the cost of the treaty projects on the Columbia and charging them entirely against downstream benefits at a point of time before any at-site power was being produced to carry a share of the costs. On questioning it turned out that this calculation also involved the omission of the $64 million of flood control benefits; the omission of all West Kootenay benefits (but the inclusion of Libby flowage costs); and also the inclusion of $2 million for the stand-by per year.

It was clear that the British Columbia group did not attach any importance to this calculation and they repeated that they had no difference, except on minor points, with the figures produced here or by the Montreal Engineering Company.

To get as much certainty on this matter as possible, we gave them copies of a paper that listed the assumptions used by us and Montreal Engineering, together with the cost figures for projects, downstream power and total project power. (See Appendix A.) This is the paper under reference in paragraph 2 of the final paper they left (Appendix D) where they refer to "no significant difference of view on the costs of the various projects." They also indicated no difference of view on the power costs listed.

C. PROPOSED ARRANGEMENT FOR THE SALE OF DOWNSTREAM BENEFITS

Dr. Keenleyside outlined four principal points involved in the plan B.C. wished to propose:

- (1) Interim purchase from B.P.A. of power to meet provincial requirements until the first stage of the Peace came into production in 1968. He said they had an understanding with B.P.A. to get such power at a very low figure (probably the B.P.A. base rate) or alternatively to pay for it in kind after Columbia power is available.

(2) Sale of all downstream benefits in the United States at a price to be negotiated before ratification of the Treaty.

(3) The Peace River to go ahead and the province to undertake that a national power grid in Canada would have a first call on Peace River power at a price less than the price that British Columbia could secure for Peace or Columbia power in the United States. Also Peace River power “would not bump Columbia power out of the natural Columbia service area.”

(4) All the income from the sale of downstream benefits would be used exclusively for the development of the Columbia.

The British Columbia representatives then presented a paper (Appendix B) setting forth the argument and the economics relating to Point No. 2 (sale of downstream benefits).

In brief, the argument is as follows:

1. The average cost of power from the full Columbia development “has been estimated by various agencies as approximately 4 mills.” (Our figure has been 4.3 mills.)
2. If part of the power can be sold outside the province at a price greater than the average cost of power, there is a profit. (The only qualification on this proposition is that if there was not a surplus of power in B.C., and if the power sold had to be replaced with very expensive power, the profit would be reduced to that degree or, theoretically, could be wiped out.)
3. If there is a net profit, and it is ploughed into the operation it “would result in a reduction of the 4 mills costs applied to the remaining power sold in British Columbia.” (There is no question about the validity of this proposition as a straight “dollars-and-cents” matter. It is the same argument as was outlined in the Cabinet Committee at the meeting of October 31, 1961, to show the economic advantage of selling half the downstream benefits at various prices.)

The British Columbia representatives argued that there would be other financial advantages in addition to the direct profit on each unit of power sold:

1. Our downstream benefits could be sold in the U.S. immediately they are available, whereas if sold in Canada there would be surpluses at various times, with losses of revenue.
2. The cost of transmission lines to carry the power from the U.S. border is saved, and also the stand-by charge in the U.S.
3. The loss of power in transmission (variously estimated at 4%, 6% and 12% in different studies) is avoided and all power is saleable at the generators.

Additional arguments are set forth in section 4 of Appendix B.

The B.C. paper presents the results of a sale at 5 mills in the following terms:

(a) The net profit could pay the total costs of the 3 treaty projects in 23 years (assuming borrowing at 4½%, sinking fund earnings of 5% and amortization over 50 years). Alternatively:

(b) The average cost of Columbia power in Canada could be reduced by 1.4 mills. (For their study they took an average cost of 4.6 mills without sale, and ended up with 3.2 mills with a sale.)

The economics of the argument, with comments, are set forth more fully in Appendix C. In discussion and under questioning by us, the following further points emerged:

(i) Term of sale to be 20 years or more (10 years plus 10 years notice). They said there is no interest in anything less and no good price could be secured for a shorter term. The longer the term, the better the price.

(ii) They maintained that their government is confident that a price of 5 mills per kilowatt hour can be secured. An essential part of the calculation is that the United States will pay more than the cost of alternative thermal power to get their own share of downstream benefits. (They referred to the U.S. share costing 1.5 mills. A price of 5 mills for our share would mean an average price of 3.25 mills for all the downstream benefit power – cheaper than any other U.S. power.)

(iii) If there is a contract for sale in the United States, British Columbia is confident that it can get financing in the United States for the Treaty projects at 4½% or 5% at most. They could not say whether the province might still want partial financing by the federal government as offered.

(iv) While the B.C. representatives did not have authority to commit the province definitely to use the $64 million flood control benefits for the Columbia project in such a way as to reduce its costs or the price of power, they made it clear that they thought Mr. Bennett would concede this if necessary.

(v) B.C. Hydro had spent $6 million on March 31 on Columbia engineering, and has authority to go to $7,750,000 by June 30. They could start physical construction at Duncan by July 1, 1962, and at High Arrow by September 1, 1962. Mica studies are not complete, but it could be started by the autumn of 1963.

(vi) The prospect of selling at 5 mills did not emerge until December, 1961. Prior to that time it had been considered that B.P.A. could not buy, and that any sale would have to be to private utilities, which would have no incentive to pay more than thermal costs. In December it had been ruled that Canadian downstream benefits would be power produced by a “public agency,” and therefore B.P.A. could buy. That was when sale of all benefits at a high price became a possibility. A sale of all downstream benefits at 5 mills would amount to about $35 million per year in the Canadian balance of payments.

(vii) A further element that changed the situation was the expropriation of B.C. Electric and the taking over of Peace River Power. Peace River could not be financed as a private scheme and its power was too expensive. Now it was definitely going ahead, no matter what happened to the Columbia. The B.C. representatives argued that it made no sense to bring back downstream benefit power when it would be surplus in British Columbia.

(viii) British Columbia is convinced that there is no point in investigating price in the United States further until British Columbia and Canada can go with a firm offer. They say B.P.A. will not negotiate with British Columbia without the commitment of the Canadian government, and will not disclose its best terms except in a real negotiation to buy and sell.

(ix) If a sale for less than 20 years would be more palatable to the federal government, British Columbia would accept 19 or 18, but there is no point in a short term as the price would be much lower.

In discussion of Dr. Keenleyside's Point 3 (see page 2) on the morning of April 5 we pointed out that it meant nothing to say Peace River power "would not bump Columbia power" out of its natural service area if the Peace had in the meantime gone ahead and there was a large surplus. When in fact would Mica be machined? Dr. Shrum indicated it would depend on load growth; the outside date to absorb all the power involved would be 1983. We pointed out that to say Peace River would not "bump Columbia power" out was meaningless if it was qualified by a load growth question.

In the afternoon Dr. Shrum advised that he had talked on the telephone to Mr. Williston who, after clearing with Mr. Bennett, had authorized him to say definitely that Mica would be started on schedule and would be machined as soon as it was built and the reservoir filled – which would be 1973. On questioning he made it clear that if this involved deferring later stages of the Peace, that would be done. Dr. Shrum said he did not think this was a wise commitment; he would prefer that the province did not give it, but Mr. Bennett was prepared to do it as a concession in order to get agreement and get the Columbia under way.

In the course of the two days, the B.C. representatives apparently had several telephone discussions with Mr. Williston and Mr. Bennett. They indicated, when the meetings concluded at one o'clock on April 6, that they had authority to put certain of the commitments in writing. This was done in a hand-written document, a copy of which is attached as Appendix D.

At the end of the meetings, the B.C. representatives stressed the urgency that B.C. attached to arriving at an agreement. They said this was not because it would affect the Peace in any way: that was going ahead on schedule and there was no intention or need for Columbia revenues to help it. The urgency was because the U.S. would turn to other sources of power; the value of our storage to them would steadily diminish; and our downstream benefits would be less in total and in value the longer we waited. The other urgency was in the employment and investment that would stimulate the B.C. economy. They pressed for a decisive meeting in the week of April 9.

We explained the pressures on federal ministers at this time; that the B.C. suggestions were new and would have to be examined with care; that the matter was of very great importance and they should not be surprised if a little time would be required to go into them fully. No time commitment whatever was given, but it is clear that the province will press for a very early reaction.

STATEMENT OF FEDERAL GOVERNMENT ASSUMPTIONS
USED IN ESTIMATING THE COST OF COLUMBIA RIVER DOWNSTREAM BENEFITS

Estimates of the cost of Columbia River downstream benefits delivered to Southern British Columbia load centres have been prepared for the federal government by engineers of the Water Resources Branch of the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources, and by the Montreal Engineering Company. The assumptions employed by these two agencies in arriving at their estimates of unit power costs are as follows:

Assumption with Regard to:	Water Resources Branch	Montreal Engineering Company
(a) Interest rate	5½%	5½%
(b) Load growth in B.C.	8%	8%
(c) Load forecast assumed for the United States Pacific Northwest	Maximum	Maximum
(d) Standby transmission charge continued for the life of the Treaty	Yes	Yes
(e) Load factor in B.C.	70%	65%
(f) Energy-capacity trade in downstream benefits	Yes	No
(g) Limit of thermal development in B.C.	I.O.C.O. #4	I.O.C.O. #4
(h) Surplus energy used as thermal replacement energy in B.C.	No	Yes
(i) Transmission losses of downstream benefits from the United States	6%	12%
(j) Mica dam machined by	1973	1973
(k) Mica storage costs assessed against at-site power after machining	Yes	Yes
(l) Loads of the West Kootenay area considered	Yes	Yes
(m) West Kootenay benefits from Duncan and Libby storage considered as downstream benefits	Yes	Yes
(n) Treaty flood control payments used to offset Treaty project costs	Yes	Yes

The cost estimates contained in the May 1961 report of the Montreal Engineering Company on "Factors Affecting the Cost of Columbia River Power in Canada" have been adopted by the Water Resources Branch in its recent studies. These estimated costs for projects and associated transmission are listed below:

SUMMARY OF ESTIMATED CAPITAL COSTS

Projects	Project Cost	Transmission Cost
Arrow Lakes Storage	$ 81,200,000	$ 82,000,000
Duncan Lake Storage	28,700,000	1,300,000
Mica Storage	288,100,000	46,000,000
Canal Project & Brilliant #4 & #5	36,628,000	4,000,000
Murphy Creek and Waneta #3	104,596,000	8,000,000
Mica Generation	78,800,000	154,000,000
Revelstoke Canyon	125,300,000	28,000,000
Downie Creek	148,600,000	87,000,000
Seven Mile & Waneta #4	58,996,000	27,000,000
Calamity Curve	35,400,000	10,000,000
Canal Flats Diversion	5,000,000	-
Libby Flowage	10,000,000	-
TOTALS	$1,001,320,000	$447,300,000

These cost estimates and assumptions result in the following unit costs for downstream energy benefits delivered to Southern British Columbia loads:

Water Resources Branch estimate	- 3.29 mills per kilowatt hour
Montreal Engineering estimate	- 3.60 mills per kilowatt hour

While these estimates fluctuate with varying assumptions, the federal government is satisfied that they offer substantial proof that the Treaty can provide large quantities of downstream energy benefits to British Columbia loads at a cost of less than 4 mills per kilowatt hour. We therefore feel that the Treaty not only develops an energy resource which would not otherwise be available to the province, but that it enables this energy to be delivered to British Columbia loads at a cost which is less than the cost of developing any other major energy resource existing in British Columbia today. By so doing it permits a full development of the Columbia River in Canada which, including downstream benefits, is capable of delivering over 27 billion kilowatt hours of energy annually to British Columbia loads at an average cost of 4.3 mills per kilowatt hour.

OUTLINE OF A PROPOSAL FOR THE SALE OF DOWNSTREAM BENEFITS
AS SUBMITTED BY BRITISH COLUMBIA REPRESENTATIVES APRIL 5, 1962

ASSESSMENT OF SELLING DOWNSTREAM BENEFITS IN THE UNITED STATES

1. INTRODUCTION

The unit cost of power produced by the Columbia River development has been estimated by various agencies as approximately 4.0 mills/kwh delivered at the load centres in British Columbia. This estimate assumes that all the energy developed, including downstream benefits originating at United States generators, would be sold at the British Columbia load centres.

If we assume that the selling price to the consumer would consist of the 4.0 mills, plus distribution costs, it follows that the sale of any of this Columbia power outside the Province at a price high enough to yield a profit would result in a reduction of the 4.0 mills costs applied to the remaining power sold in British Columbia.

It can be shown that the sale in the United States of the entire amount of downstream benefit power and energy can be carried out without detriment to the continuing development of the Columbia River power resources in the Province and will accelerate the development of other provincial resources. Moreover, it can also be shown that the margin of profit available from the sale of downstream benefits in the United States is very significant.

2. CAPITAL COSTS OF TREATY PROJECTS

The Columbia River development has been assessed by various agencies and as a result a variety of cost estimates have been prepared. Examination of the estimates show that they vary in detail with respect to the individual projects but in total are in about the same order. This is best illustrated by comparing the various cost estimates prepared for the three Treaty projects as follows:

(a) I.C.R.E.B. Report	$ 346 million
(b) Prime Minister's Treaty Announcement	345 million
(c) Montreal Engineering	398 million
(d) B.C. Energy Board	362 million
(e) B.C. Hydro	338 million

The differences in cost estimates are not so great that the use of one or the other of them would have a significant effect on the unit cost of power or change the validity of the assessments that follow.

3. ADVANTAGES OF IMMEDIATE COMPLETE SALE OF DOWNSTREAM BENEFITS

It is obvious that if all the downstream power benefits can be sold immediately they become available, the resulting unit cost will be less than if the benefits are gradually used to meet a load growth.

(i) Initial Development – Treaty Projects

Examples of the advantage of being able to sell downstream power benefits immediately they are available are given in the B.C. Energy Board Consultants' Report. On Page 114 of the report the average unit power costs for the full development of the Columbia River are reduced by being able to sell the surplus downstream benefits. The results are summarized as follows:

AVERAGE UNIT COST OF POWER – FULL COLUMBIA DEVELOPMENT

With and Without Sale of Surplus Downstream Benefits

Selling price of surplus downstream benefits mills/kwh	0	2	4
With Cominco and new industries	3.61	3.54	3.47
Without Cominco and without new industries	4.40	4.29	4.18

Further reductions would be achieved if the surplus downstream power benefits could be sold at the generators for 5 mills/kwh.

Although the reductions do not seem large it must be realized they apply to the output of the full Columbia development totalling more than 20 billion kwh. A reduction in cost of 0.1 mills/kwh on this quantity of power amounts to $2,000,000 per year.

The advantage of sale of downstream benefits at the generators can be further illustrated by the following tabulation. Costs and loads are taken from Tables 13 and 15 of the B.C. Energy Board Consultants' Report.

COSTS AND REVENUES – DOWNSTREAM POWER BENEFITS

Without Cominco &amp; New Industries

	1967	1968	1969	1970	1971
B.C. Energy load at-site – mw	291	386	487	545	708
At-Site
Annual Costs – $ million	8.88	8.98	10.05	10.09	26.50
– mills/kwh	3.48	2.65	2.35	1.99	4.27
At Load
Annual Costs – $ million	18.00	18.11	19.24	20.05	36.94
– mills/kwh	7.25	5.52	4.63	3.94	6.08
Gross Revenue @ 4.4 mills/kwh at load in B.C. – $ millions	10.60	14.1	17.8	19.9	25.9
New Revenue @ 4.4 mills/kwh at load in B.C. – $ millions	-7.4	-4.0	-1.4	-0.15	-10.0
Gross Revenue if available Energy sold at 5.0 mills/kwh At generator – $ millions	24.5	24.5	24.5	24.5	33.4
New Revenue @ 5 mills/kwh $ millions	15.6	15.5	14.5	14.4	6.9

In the five years illustrated above, if all available downstream benefits are sold at-site for 5.0 mills/kwh the net surplus of revenue over costs amounts to a total of $66.9 million.

If sold as required to meet the estimated load in British Columbia at a cost of 4.4 mills (average cost given in B.C. Energy Board Report for Columbia Development without Cominco and without special industry) the net result would be a substantial deficit amounting to $22.9 million without including re-financing.

This is illustrated by the attached Plate No. 1.†

If all the downstream benefits were sold at 5.0 mills on a continuous basis, rather than only the amounts surplus to B.C. requirements, our studies have shown that the total costs of the three Treaty Storage projects could be paid off in about 23 years, assuming borrowing at 4½% and sinking fund earning at 5% with amortization over 50 years. If only the annual costs are paid on the projects a profit of $310 million would result at the end of 20 years and $440 million at the end of 30 years. These are the financing terms that B.C. can get if the downstream benefits can be sold in the United States at 5.0 mills/kwh.

Even if money is borrowed at 5% and sinking fund earning at the same rate over a 40-year amortization period a profit of $220 million would result after 20 years and would become very large after 40 years.

These results are illustrated on the attached Plate 2.†

(ii) Full Columbia Development with Sale of All Downstream Benefits at Generation

Downstream power benefits on the Columbia River in the United States are only one product of the capital invested in the three Treaty projects. They are benefits clearly separable from the other products of the Columbia developments, such as the power and energy to be generated at Mica and other projects in Canada or the flood control benefits to be produced in the United States. However, the cost of the downstream power benefits cannot be separated from the total costs of the Columbia development except in the most arbitrary manner. For example, at a stage of development where only the three Treaty projects have been constructed and the only power being produced for Canada is the Treaty entitlement, the downstream benefit power would cost British Columbia about 4 mills/kwh at the generators in the United States, and about 6 mills/kwh at the British Columbia load centres.

After this stage has passed it would become impossible to establish a “unit cost of downstream benefit power.” The only unit cost figure with any real meaning would be the average unit cost of power sold in British Columbia after taking account of the revenue from the sale of downstream benefits.

In the light of the above it would appear that one method of assessing the merit or otherwise of selling the downstream power benefits in the United States is to carry out two studies: one with all of the downstream power benefits which can be used in British Columbia returned to the Province and the other with all of the downstream power benefits sold in the United States. A comparison of the respective unit costs of power derived from these two studies will indicate a measure of the relative merits.

Plate 3 following,† which is based on preliminary studies, indicates the following:

(a) With all downstream benefits used in British Columbia the average costs of power from the Columbia would be about 4.5 mills.

(b) The average cost of power in British Columbia would be about 3 mills with all downstream benefits sold in the United States at 5 mills/kwh.

(c) The net annual reduction in cost between the schemes if all downstream benefits were sold in the United States at 5 mills would be about $250 million over a period of 15 years without allowing for any earnings on these savings.

4. OTHER ADVANTAGES FROM SALE OF DOWNSTREAM BENEFITS IN THE UNITED STATES

(i) By selling all the downstream benefits in the United States the domestic markets will be met by Columbia at-site power assuming speedy development of the Columbia in Canada.

Thus the large costs that are “sunk” into Mica storage projects in preparation for at-site power are paying dividends as rapidly as possible.

(ii) By selling all the downstream benefits in the United States the downstream benefits will decrease at a slower rate. Thus the income from the downstream benefits will not decrease as rapidly as estimated and the costs of power in British Columbia will be further decreased.

The drop in Canada’s adjusted downstream power benefits assumed in all analyses so far is about 30% in between 1970 and 1985 with all the power and energy used in Canada. If all the power and energy were used in the United States it is estimated that the drop in adjusted benefits would be 20% over the same period. This would increase the estimated revenue for 1985 by about $3.5 million.

(iii) Sale of all the downstream benefits in the United States at 5.0 mills/kwh will assure revenues for the Treaty projects and make it possible to obtain attractive financing terms. The resulting large net revenues, when re-invested in the British Columbia power development, makes it possible to obtain very cheap power at every stage of development.

(iv) Sale of the downstream benefits in the U.S. allows a logical and economic build-up of Provincial transmission without incurring the risk of having to build costly lines from Oliver to load centres which may have little use in the future.

(v) The sale of the Canadian entitlement to United States agencies at a relatively high price would probably cause an increase in the average selling price of the whole Columbia downstream power benefits in the United States, thus removing to some extent the criticism that implementation of the Treaty would give power consumptive industry in the United States a significant economic advantage over Canadian competition.

(vi) The development of power resources in the Province would be simplified by the removal of the variable source of power represented by the entitlement to downstream benefits and the annual assessments of the downstream benefits would not be a factor in planning to meet provincial power requirements.

COMMENTS ON THE BRITISH COLUMBIA TECHNICAL PRESENTATION IN SUPPORT OF THE SALE TO THE UNITED STATES OF CANADA’S DOWNSTREAM POWER BENEFITS

A thorough review of the British Columbia presentation would require more detailed information concerning load growth, project costs, etc. However, a preliminary study of their calculations has indicated three areas of objection:

- (1) They suggest a 20-year sale period (10 + 10) but only study the initial 15 years.
- (2) They omit the cost of replacing downstream benefits on the British Columbia load in the years 1979 to 1986.
- (3) They omit the thermal replacement market which downstream benefits could meet in British Columbia.

Points (1) and (2) have been corrected for in this review. Point (3) would decrease to some extent the attractiveness of selling the downstream benefits in the United States, but would by no means alter the conclusion reached by the study.

Table 1 sets forth the British Columbia presentation adjusted to take account of points (1) and (2) noted above.

TABLE 1

Study By	Period of Sale to the U.S.	Average Cost of Columbia River*		Average Reduction In Cost
		Power in British Columbia Without Sale to the U.S.	With Sale to the U.S.	Mills Per KWH	Per Cent
British Columbia	20 yrs.	4.59 mills/kwh	3.43 mills/kwh	1.16	25%

* Flood control benefits excluded.

The British Columbia authorities state that if downstream benefits are sold in the United States they can finance the Treaty projects at 4½% interest rather than the 5½% used in deriving the answers in Table 1. They also feel that in the early years of development energy can be obtained at Blaine from the Bonneville Power Administration at 2.5 mills per kwh rather than the 5 mills used in their calculations. Allowing for these two factors results in a 32% saving in power costs rather than the 25% shown on Table 1.

While there has not been sufficient time or information to permit a detailed check of the British Columbia presentation, the Water Resources Branch, on the basis of its own studies carried out over the past few months, subscribes to the general conclusion that a sale of downstream benefits at 5 mills per kilowatt hour can reduce the cost of the remaining Columbia River potential by at least 25%. This conclusion depends upon the assumption that the United States will pay 5 mills per kilowatt hour at the generators for our downstream benefits. We have no way of knowing the validity of this claim and therefore our agreement with the mathematics of the British Columbia presentation is conditional on this very important item.

Plates 1 and 2 show in graphical form the savings indicated by the British Columbia presentation. These benefits are given in tabular form in Table 2.

CONFIDENTIAL

[Ottawa], April 6, 1962

A meeting on the Columbia Treaty Projects was held in Ottawa on the 5th and 6th April, 1962, between officials representing the Federal Government (Messrs. Robertson, Parkinson, Patterson and MacNabb) and officials representing the Government of British Columbia (Messrs. Shrum, Kidd, Purcell and Keenleyside).

Following an exchange of papers and subsequent discussion, it was agreed that there was no significant difference of view on the costs of the various projects.

The Provincial representatives emphasized the great urgency of immediate action on the Columbia project.

They then presented the following points as a basis of agreement and compromise between the two governments which will permit the immediate ratification of the Treaty and the early commencement of construction.

- I. All downstream benefits will be sold in the United States at a price of approximately 5 mills KWH. The term of such sale to be sought by the Government of British Columbia will be 10 years firm with a 10-year period of notice of termination at any time thereafter.

- II. The Peace River development, already under way, will continue.
- III. For the interim period, prior to the availability of Peace power, the British Columbia Hydro and Power Authority will meet its current needs by purchase from the Bonneville Power Association at Blaine or other points where it may be needed on the British Columbia border. Consideration will be given to proposals already discussed with and agreed by the Bonneville Power Association for the payment for this power in kind.
- IV. All income from the sale of downstream benefits will be used exclusively for the development of the Columbia River project in Canada.
- V. Mica will be machined as soon as possible to meet incremental needs in British Columbia. It is expected that this will be not later than 1973. This will be effected by postponing the later stages of the Peace River development, if necessary.
- VI. Subject to provincial requirements, energy from the Peace River, the Columbia and other sources in British Columbia will be made available on a first call basis to the proposed national grid at prices not higher than those obtainable from the United States for British Columbia power exported to the United States.
- VII. British Columbia will endeavour to obtain the agreement of the U.S. entity to the inclusion of an escalator clause in the agreement covering the sale of the downstream benefits.
- VIII. Subject to agreement between the governments and to immediate ratification of the Treaty the Provincial Government will be prepared to start physical construction on Duncan by July 1962, on Arrow by September 1962, and Mica as soon as possible in 1963. The later start in the case of Mica is due entirely to investigations and engineering studies which are actively under way but are not yet complete.
- IX. British Columbia will undertake to use the funds received from the United States in payment for flood control for the rehabilitation and economic development of areas adversely affected by the projects included in the Columbia River Treaty.

This is submitted as a confidential document with the understanding that its contents will not be made public.

Washington, April 16, 1962

Dear Ed [Ritchie],

Rumours were circulating here last week to the effect that a "blueprint" would shortly be released by the Administration which would set out the plans for development within the United States of a number of projects on the Columbia and its tributaries. The projects were supposed to be of a character which would allow them to be integrated with developments called for by the Treaty when these were undertaken after ratification. The timing of the release was supposed, in some quarters, to have some significance vis-à-vis delays of ratification in Canada and the recent submission of the United States Embassy note to the Department.

We were able to determine that the so-called blueprint was, in fact, a series of recommendations, based on a memorandum of agreement between the Corps of Engineers and the Bureau of Reclamation, under which responsibility for planning, construction and operation of a number of projects in Alaska, the Columbia River basin and the Missouri River basin was divided between the two agencies. Attached are eight copies of a White House press release of April 10 announcing the terms of this agreement.† An apparently accurate account of the agreement appeared in The New York Times of April 5, 1962, to which we drew the attention of U.S.A. Division.<sup>78</sup> We are trying to obtain a copy of the agreement itself for forwarding to the Department.

I don't believe we should read too much into the timing of this release since the terms of the memorandum of agreement between the Corps and the Bureau have apparently been under discussion for some time. In addition, the projects themselves were selected as a result of a comprehensive review of the plan for the Columbia River basin authorized by Congress in 1955. I think you will agree that what is important is that the Corps is recommending construction of eight water resources projects in the basin based on its study, and if early starts are made on these, it may mean a lessening in the interest in ratification of the Treaty. (An article in the Globe and Mail of April 11, makes this same point.)<sup>79</sup>

In addition, Norm Chappell has heard from his sources that both public and private power interests in the Pacific Northwest are planning on the assumption that the Treaty will not be implemented – or that it will be implemented too late to provide the power required to meet anticipated demands in the next few years. The public power groups in the area are considering arrangements for harnessing Hanford reactor energy at the 800,000 kw. level, and it seems they would not be considering this at this time if they were satisfied that Treaty power would be available in the near future.

It is possible to conceive of a situation developing where projects were sufficiently far advanced as to ensure firm power requirements apart from Treaty benefits. In that case the United States might feel that the basis on which the Treaty was negotiated had altered sufficiently to warrant a review of its terms. While the flood control provisions would still be important to them the power aspects would presumably take a somewhat lower priority.

This is, of course, all rather speculative and it would be difficult for us to get an expression of opinion from officials here. We would, however, be prepared to see what we could find out in the way of Administration thinking on these projects and their significance in relation to the Treaty if you thought this would be desirable.

Yours sincerely,

CONFIDENTIAL

Ottawa, May 1, 1962

Dear Mr. Fulton,

Some two weeks ago when we were discussing the possible basis of an arrangement on the Columbia River that would involve a sale of downstream benefits in the United States, you mentioned that you felt it would be essential to have some provision that the power from Mica at-site generation would be used in British Columbia. Shortly after that discussion Mr. Alvin Hamilton spoke to me about a proposal he had made that, if we agree to the sale of downstream benefits, it should be part of an arrangement that would include an option for Canada to buy back from the United States an equivalent amount of power (i.e. equivalent to the downstream benefits we had sold) – the option to be exercisable at some time after our sale of power had been completed. Mr. Hamilton's point was twofold: that such an option could be valuable in itself, and that it would permit the sale of downstream benefits to be regarded as a part of an exchange of power rather than an outright alienation.

On the basis of the two conversations referred to above, I asked the Water Resources Branch to undertake a study to see how the power involved could fit into a load growth projection and also to work out what the consequences in revenues and power costs would be. I have just received a copy of a memorandum dated April 30th from Mr. MacNabb on this matter and am enclosing one herewith, together with the attached plates.† I am also sending a copy to Mr. Hamilton.

I think you will find the results of this study – while subject to the qualifications that Mr. MacNabb has indicated in paragraph 4 – most interesting. It suggests that the points made by both you and Mr. Hamilton could be accommodated and that the over-all result would be an extremely attractive one.

I am also sending copies of this material to Mr. Parkinson for the information of Mr. Fleming since he may be involved in further discussions with Mr. Bennett. If you think there is any other action that should be taken on this perhaps you could let me know.

Yours sincerely,

CABINET DOCUMENT NO. 219-62
CONFIDENTIAL

Ottawa, July 16, 1962

THE COLUMBIA RIVER TREATY

Consideration has been given in recent weeks to the outstanding policy decisions on the Columbia River Treaty in relation to the current economic situation. It seems apparent that, under certain arrangements that could be entered into, early action on the Treaty could do a good deal to stimulate a substantial inflow of U.S. funds. Decisions on the Treaty must be taken in the very near future and it seems desirable to have the possible economic contributions toward solution of the present problems in mind in taking them.

SITUATION IN RELATION TO BRITISH COLUMBIA

Since the signing of the Treaty on January 17, 1961, it is differences with British Columbia that have held up progress on the treaty. While the position of the British Columbia Government in relation to financing, sale of power in the United States and the relationship between the Columbia and the Peace River development was quite obscure for many months, it was greatly clarified in meetings held on April 5th and 6th between officials of the two governments. The main points that had involved difficulty or that were obscure up to that time were the following:

(a) Acceptability of the Treaty as it Stands

There had been some indications that British Columbia doubted whether Columbia power was the lowest cost power available and whether the Treaty was acceptable to it. It was made clear in April that B.C. does not challenge the cost figures for downstream benefits or for Columbia power as a whole. It was also made clear that the Treaty is acceptable to British Columbia as it stands.

(b) Peace River Development

It had been feared that British Columbia intended to push ahead with the Peace River and to pre-empt B.C. markets for Peace power. This would have left the Columbia River development with no market for power other than the United States. It was also feared that British Columbia would refrain from the machining of Mica Dam and from the development of the power potential of the Columbia River in Canada in order to make room for the Peace. At the meetings in April the British Columbia Government representatives made it clear that, while British Columbia intended to proceed with the Peace River, it would commit itself (1) to start construction of the treaty projects in Canada at the earliest possible date; (2) to machine Mica as soon as the growth of demand for power made it possible (probably by 1973); and (3) to postpone the later stages of the Peace River development if necessary to make room for Mica.

(c) Financing

The federal government had offered to provide the financing for 50% of the cost of the storage projects. Initially British Columbia had taken the position that this was not a sufficiently generous offer and that a substantial federal grant should be made. At the meetings in April, the British Columbia representatives did not press for any improvement in the federal financial provisions. They said that, if agreement could be reached on the sale of downstream benefit power in the United States, British Columbia would be able to finance the entire scheme without any federal assistance and would prefer to do so by borrowing money in the United States at lower interest rates than are available in Canada. While recent financial problems in British Columbia might affect this position somewhat, the Columbia is an economic self-financing operation and under appropriate conditions financing in the United States at reasonable rates should be quite feasible.

(d) Sale of Power in the United States

It was for some time not clear whether British Columbia was pressing for the sale in the United States only of the downstream benefits to which Canada is entitled there or also of power that would be produced at site in Canada in the Columbia system. It appeared that they might be pressing for a total sale of Columbia power in order to facilitate development of the Peace River. At the meeting in April it was made clear (as indicated above) that the latter is no longer the British Columbia position: it is pressing now only for the sale of downstream benefits. Originally it had been feared that a satisfactory price could not be secured in the United States since it was thought that only the private utilities and not Bonneville Power Administration would be legally able to purchase. It now appears that Bonneville Power Administration will have the legal capacity to buy and may be prepared to pay a good price (possibly as much as 5 mills) if this is the only way in which it can secure implementation of the Treaty and thus get its own share of downstream benefit power.

(e) Application of the Proceeds of Power Sales

It has originally been feared that the B.C. intention was to use the revenues from any sales of power in the United States to help finance the Peace River development. At the meeting in April the British Columbia representatives made the commitment in writing that "all income from the sale of downstream benefits will be used exclusively for the development of the Columbia River project in Canada."

(f) Flood Control Payment

Canada is entitled to a payment of $64 million (U.S.) for flood control benefits. British Columbia had originally indicated that the payment would be appropriated by the province as compensation to it for other resources taken out of production by the creation of the Columbia reservoirs (even though full compensation to all owners is provided for). At the meeting in April it was indicated that British Columbia would undertake to use the funds "for the rehabilitation and economic development of areas adversely affected by the projects included in the Columbia River Treaty." It was also made apparent that British Columbia would probably be prepared, if pressed, to allocate the payment against construction costs for the treaty projects themselves.

As the above points indicate, British Columbia has clarified its position substantially in the direction of meeting federal objections. It seems apparent that agreement can be reached under which the project can go ahead at once if the federal government is prepared to agree to the sale of downstream benefits.

THE QUESTION OF SELLING DOWNSTREAM BENEFITS

The objection of the federal government to the sale of downstream benefits in the United States has been related essentially to two considerations: (a) the traditional Canadian fears about the long-term export of electric power and (b) the desirability of securing the lowest cost power for the benefit of Canadian industries and consumers. It would appear possible to meet both these points if a price of 5 mills and other suitable terms can be secured.

Fears about power exports have largely stemmed from unfortunate experiences in World War I. The problems then arose out of contracts for unduly long terms (usually 50 years) for sales at fixed prices (with no escalation to protect against increases in price levels) and at extremely low figures (well below alternative power costs in the United States). All of these can be protected against. A 20-year term has been proposed and a 5-mill price is not below but probably equal to or even slightly above alternative power costs. An escalation clause might be possible, if it is considered important, in return for some concession on the basic price. The fact that 5 mills is not below alternative power costs would rule out any chance of objection at terminating the sale when a contract provided for it.

There is a further point of difference between a sale to B.P.A. and early export contracts. One of the difficulties in connection with them was that the Canadian exporter was selling power to specific industries which were built up around and relied upon that one single source of power supply. Under present-day circumstances in the Columbia River basin the exported power would be fitted into the Bonneville Power Grid which receives supplies from dozens of sources and distributes these supplies through many outlets. No one customer knows the original source of the power which he is utilizing at any particular moment. So far as B.P.A. is concerned, any power sold by us would be a small part of this total system.

With regard to the cost of power in Canada, it is correct that downstream benefit power is the lowest-cost power that we can produce. (The Water Resources Branch of this department estimated the delivered cost of such power in British Columbia at 3.29 mills per kwh.; the Montreal Engineering Col. set the figure at 3.6 mills.) There was, thus, justification for the argument that it should be used in Canada for Canadian benefit. However, if a good enough price can be got for it, and if the profits are ploughed into the Columbia development so as to reduce the cost of at-site power in Canada, just as low a cost can result for an even larger amount of power for Canadian use. The downstream benefits are relatively small part of the total power output of the Columbia development and it is the average cost of the power used in Canada from the entire project that is of major significance. The average cost, with no sale of downstream benefits, has been calculated at 4.3 mills. If the proceeds of a sale are used to defray project costs, the following figures result:

	U.S. funds at an 8% premium
20-year sale of one-half of our downstream benefits at 5 mills per kwh.	3.9 mills per kwh
20-year sale of all of our downstream benefits at 5 mills per kwh	3.2 mills per kwh

(The above figures assume borrowing in the United States at 5% for the projects.)

It is apparent from the above that a 20-year sale of all our downstream benefits at 5 mills could reduce the average cost of the Columbia power that would be used in Canada to the cost of our downstream benefit power if we do not sell it. The argument about keeping our lowest cost power is thus met.

There is a further technical consideration of importance. The sale of our downstream benefits to the United States limits the new generating installations required by that country. Through the methods of calculation applicable under the Treaty this has the effect of increasing our entitlement to downstream benefits. While this effect has not been included in the preceding data, it is quite substantial and could increase our annual revenues from the United States by more than $5 million (U.S.) in 1985.

The above arguments turn essentially on price. If 5 mills can be secured, there is no doubt about the economic advantage of a sale of downstream benefits.

FINANCIAL CONSIDERATIONS

As has been indicated at the outset the desirability of an early decision on policy has become more urgent as a result of the current financial difficulties. Quick action on the Treaty could be one of the most impressive and effective of the “longer-term measures of a positive and constructive nature” envisaged in the Government’s statement of June 24.<sup>80</sup> The mere announcement of the Government’s decision to proceed with early ratification would in itself be taken as foreshadowing expansive and work-creating policies to follow the present inevitable restrictions. The prospect of Canada and the United States working together on this cooperative project would greatly strengthen the international confidence which the emergency program is designed to develop.

The financing in the United States of the construction program in the Treaty would attract substantial amounts of capital from outside Canada. Not only would this capital inflow be large in amount but it would also be of the right kind for a country in Canada’s position. It would be of a kind which would not involve any transfer of ownership to the United States. If part or all of the downstream benefits can be sold in the United States, the capital would readily pay for itself in foreign exchange earnings. The year-by-year results with U.S. financing and sales of (a) one half and (b) all our downstream benefits in the United States are set out in the Appendix. In brief, these indicate that if the Treaty projects were financed by means of funds raised in the United States, it could involve an inflow of over $11 million (U.S.) in the first year and over $200 million (U.S.) in the first 5 years after ratification. If Canada’s share of downstream benefits were sold in the U.S. at 5 mills per kwh. for 20 years, the revenues in U.S. dollars could amount to over $558 million (U.S.) over the period – an average of $27,900,000 (U.S.) per year in added export earnings – and could more than cover the operational cost of the projects plus the re-payment of the borrowed U.S. funds. The total net inflow of U.S. funds in the first 5 years would exceed $290 million (U.S.)

Recommendation

In the light of the above considerations, the undersigned recommends that:

- (a) steps be taken at the earliest possible date to reach agreement with British Columbia on a basis for action on the Columbia River Treaty that would involve
  - (i) the initiation of construction immediately upon ratification of the Treaty;
  - (ii) machining of Mica Dam for production of power in Canada at the earliest possible date and with priority over the development of Peace River power if load growth in British Columbia will not absorb both; and
  - (iii) the sale of Canadian downstream benefits in the United States for a term not exceeding 20 years provided a satisfactory price can be negotiated and the proceeds of the sale are allocated solely to the Columbia River development; and
- (b) the Cabinet Committee on the Columbia River be directed to submit for Cabinet approval detailed proposals as to possible terms for an arrangement with British Columbia on the basis of which negotiations should be undertaken through the British Columbia-Canada Policy Liaison Committee.

COLUMBIA RIVER TREATY – CONVERSATION WITH MR. WILLIS ARMSTRONG

When Mr. Armstrong, the Chargé of the United States Embassy, paid his farewell call on the Minister this morning, he mentioned that the main bilateral problem between the two countries (apart from defence questions) is the matter of the Columbia River Treaty. He noted certain statements by Secretary Udall and others that if the treaty was going to be of much value to the United States, it was pretty well necessary that it be ratified in time for the next construction season (presumably by the spring of 1963). Mr. Armstrong enquired whether the Minister could say anything about the prospects for the treaty.

2. Mr. Green remarked that two of the political parties had indicated during the recent election campaign that they would expect the treaty to be renegotiated (i.e. the Liberal and New Democratic parties). Mr. Green asked Mr. Armstrong what his view was of the possibility of such a renegotiation.

3. Mr. Armstrong suggested that minor changes in the treaty might be open for renegotiation (and presumably the results could be passed through the Senate within a reasonable period of time). On the other hand he considered that any major renegotiation (for example any change in the Libby Project) was virtually out of the question since the United States would have to do something about its power supplies in the Pacific Northwest within the near future. The United States would still have the problem of flood controls at Bonners Ferry but this would have to be dealt with in some other way if the treaty were to be long delayed.

4. Mr. Green said that the Government had not really examined this matter since the election but his own thought was that the treaty might be thrown into the External Affairs Committee and all the opponents and supporters of the treaty should be given a chance to express themselves there. The Government would be required to defend the treaty against its critics.

5. Mr. Green recalled that the Federal Government had been on the verge of concluding a treaty which would have avoided the Libby Project, but the Provincial Government had reversed itself and opposed such an arrangement. In fact, generally, the main difficulties had been with the Provincial Government and not with the United States, in Mr. Green's view. Mr. Green noted that the main remaining problem also related to the Provincial Government's position, since the British Columbia Government wished to sell all the power benefits in the United States whereas the Federal Government wanted them brought back to British Columbia. Mr. Green remarked that if the benefits were to be sold in the United States, the United States Government would presumably be relieved of the expense of the line for transmitting these benefits to Canada.

6. Mr. Armstrong asked whether there was anything which the United States Administration could helpfully say. Mr. Green suggested that "in fourteen different languages" the best thing would be for the United States to be as quiet as possible about the treaty and not to get involved.

COLUMBIA

Yesterday, Sunday August 19th, I had a long interview with the Honourable Howard Green. I don't think I made any particular headway. He can't understand Mr. Fulton's change of attitude<sup>81</sup> and in that I agreed with him. I pointed out that if Mr. Fulton could swallow the dish of crow that he had provided for himself then Mr. Green's position should be less difficult. However he pointed out that one thing above everything else that he valued was his reputation and that he could not do other than withdraw from the Cabinet.

I argued that if 5 Mill rate could be secured on the downstream benefits it would be of tremendous value to Canada, that the essence of the Treaty was that the United States should construct the transmission line to the Canadian boundary. He insisted that this should be gone ahead with now. I asked him when the power would be produced and he said five years hence. The order of construction would be

(1) Upper Arrow, and would end with No. 3 – Mica Dam.

I asked him what purpose there would be in constructing it now and he said he had argued so frequently in the Cabinet and been turned down that the Canadian Government should promise to pay one-half of the transmission costs from the boundary to Vancouver.

While he was here I discussed the question on the phone with Senator McCutcheon who called me and I so advised Mr. Green. I made no impression on him in support of a compromise.

COLUMBIA RIVER DEVELOPMENT POLICY

(Previous reference May 12†)

36. The Prime Minister said immediate consideration must be given to the government's policy with respect to the development of the Columbia River.

37. The Secretary of State for External Affairs read from Hansard of January 26th, 1962, a letter from Mr. Fleming to the Premier of British Columbia on the Columbia development.<sup>82</sup> It was pointed out in the letter that Premier Bennett had said that all of Canada's share of the downstream benefits should be disposed of in the United States. This was contrary to the fundamental purpose of the Treaty which was to secure for the people of British Columbia directly and immediately the cheapest and most abundant electrical power available. All through the negotiations on the Treaty, discussions between Canada and British Columbia were based on the intention that the bulk of Canada's share of the low cost downstream benefits should be delivered to Canada for the use and benefit of consumers in British Columbia. The Treaty itself reflected this principle, and the letter quoted sections from the Treaty in support of this view. The Treaty set out specifically that a portion of the downstream benefits to which Canada was entitled might be disposed of within the United States. The letter from which Mr. Green read, had been approved by the Cabinet before it was sent.

38. Mr. Green went on to say that Canada had negotiated for the return to Canada of half the downstream benefits and that only temporary surpluses would be sold in the United States. To agree at the meeting on Monday, with Premier Bennett, that all of Canada's share of the downstream benefits should be sold in the United States would be contrary to everything he had said before and during the election campaign. He then read extracts from newspaper reports of speeches by himself and other Ministers which supported the view that the purpose of the Treaty was to bring back low-cost downstream benefits to the people of British Columbia. In one case it was reported that Premier Bennett had said in the Legislature that he would resign before he would bring downstream benefits all the way back to Vancouver and Mr. Green had said there was no chance of Ottawa changing its position.

39. During the discussion the following points were made,

(a) In view of what had been said, how could Canada change its position? There would have to be a compromise between Canada and British Columbia if the Treaty was to be implemented.

(b) The proposals put forward by the B.C. officials in April should be examined on their face value. They appeared to be a reasonable compromise on the part of the province. The province needed the Columbia development and, although the speeches quoted would be brought up in the press to embarrass the government, it was better to try to move ahead with the project.

(c) The U.S. had also changed its position. It did not appear in the beginning that Canada's share of downstream benefits could be sold in the U.S. at 5 mills per KWH. Now this seemed possible but would have to be checked.

(d) The sale of half the Canadian downstream benefits would not be an effective compromise. It would not be economically sound. The entire transmission facilities would have to be built to carry only half the available power. The U.S. might not pay 5 mills per KWH for only half the available power since they would have to create facilities to carry the other half back to Canada.

(e) There was an obligation on the U.S. to deliver Canada's share of the downstream benefits to the border but they had not agreed to deliver it free, as the International Joint Commission had suggested. A formula had been worked out whereby no direct charge for transmission was made but the U.S. was to be paid a fee for stand-by transmission facilities on an alternative route to Vancouver.

(f) It would be to Canada's advantage economically to sell all of its downstream benefits rather than half. Premier Bennett had said income from the sale of downstream benefits would go into the Columbia development rather than to the Peace development. He would have to give assurance, however, that, notwithstanding the present state of the province's credit, he could still finance the work on the Peace River in the manner he had previously expected.

(g) Premier Bennett had said he would defer the later stages of the Peace development to machine the Mica section of the Columbia.

(h) The sale of Canada's downstream benefits would bring in large amounts of foreign exchange. The arrangement could be terminated after 10 years on 10 years' notice if the situation changed to warrant this action. Canada's failure to ratify the Treaty was becoming embarrassing in the United States. The U.S. Senate was now talking about the U.S. developing the Columbia basin alone.

(i) Some felt that the present proposals were not the best for Canada. General McNaughton's were considered to be better. Other Ministers did not agree with this view. General McNaughton's proposals were not acceptable to the people of British Columbia affected by them.

(j) If Canadian downstream benefits were sold in the U.S., the U.S. would not build transmission facilities to the border and, if Canada later decided to bring them back, there was a question whether the U.S. would then be obliged to build the necessary transportation facilities.

(k) It was suggested that Mr. Fleming and Mr. Green verify with Mr. Ivan White of the U.S. Columbia River Negotiations delegation what the U.S. would pay,

- (i) for half of Canada's share of the downstream benefits; and,
- (ii) for all of them;

and that Mr. Fleming at his meeting with Premier Bennett on Monday should put forward first of all the idea of selling half Canada's downstream benefits together with the other proposals of the B.C. officials at the meeting of April 5th and 6th.

40. Mr. Fulton drew to the attention of the Ministers an article which was to be published soon in an engineering magazine written by General McNaughton setting forth his position on the Columbia River development.<sup>83</sup> It was suggested that no reply should be prepared to this article for the time being.

41. The Cabinet decided,

(a) that the Minister of Justice and the Secretary of State for External Affairs should meet immediately with Mr. Ivan B. White, Deputy Assistant Secretary of State, and Member of the United States Delegation, Canada-United States Columbia River Negotiations, and get from him the best estimate of the price the U.S. government would pay,

(i) for one-half of the Canadian downstream benefits developed on the Columbia; and,

(ii) for all of the Canadian downstream benefits developed on the Columbia;

(b) that Mr. D. Fleming, when discussing the Columbia River Development with the Premier of British Columbia on Monday next, should not agree to selling in the United States more than one-half of the Canadian share of the downstream benefits but should base his discussions otherwise on the other terms of the British Columbia plan put forward at the meeting of federal and provincial officials in Ottawa on April 5th and 6th last, i.e.,

(i) All downstream benefits will be sold in the United States at a price of approximately 5 mills per KWH. The term of such sale to be sought by the Government of British Columbia will be 10 years firm with a 10-year period of notice of termination at any time thereafter.

(ii) The Peace River development, already under way, will continue.

(iii) For the interim period, prior to the availability of Peace power, the British Columbia Hydro and Power Authority will meet its current needs by purchase from the Bonneville Power Association at Blaine or other points where it may be needed on the British Columbia border. Consideration will be given to proposals already discussed with and agreed by the Bonneville Power Association for the payment for this power in kind.

(iv) All income from the sale of downstream benefits will be used exclusively for the development of the Columbia River project in Canada.

(v) Mica will be machined as soon as possible to meet incremental needs in British Columbia. It is expected that this will be not later than 1973. This will be effected by postponing the later stages of the Peace River development, if necessary.

(vi) Subject to provincial requirements, energy from the Peace River, the Columbia and other sources in British Columbia will be made available on a first call basis to the proposed national grid at prices not higher than those obtainable from the United States for British Columbia power exported to the United States.

(vii) British Columbia will endeavour to obtain the agreement of the U.S. entity to the inclusion of an escalator clause in the agreement covering the sale of the downstream benefits.

(viii) Subject to agreement between the governments and to immediate ratification of the Treaty the Provincial Government will be prepared to start physical construction on Duncan by July 1962, on Arrow by September, 1962, and Mica as soon as possible in 1963. The

COLUMBIA RIVER TREATY: DISCUSSIONS WITH BRITISH COLUMBIA

Along with Mr. Parkinson and Mr. MacNabb, I was asked yesterday morning by Mr. Fleming, the Minister of Justice, to come to a meeting in his office with Premier Bennett of British Columbia. Mr. Budd, the Premier's Executive Assistant, was also present. The meeting was to carry further the discussions that Mr. Fleming had had with Mr. Bennett about the Columbia River treaty.

In opening the meeting at 10:30, Mr. Fleming said that he felt that a good deal had been accomplished in the meeting of officials on April 5th and 6th. He felt that the governments of Canada and the province were a good deal closer to agreement on a possible basis of approach to get the treaty implemented. Mr. Bennett promptly took the initiative. He fully agreed that the April meeting had been productive and hoped that further liaison between British Columbia and Canada could be carried on by the same committee: he much preferred it to the old policy liaison committee or technical liaison committee. He hoped that with one further meeting of advisers, which he hoped could take place in the immediate future, it would be possible to enter into discussions with the United States to arrive at an exchange of notes for sale of downstream benefits in the United States. With such a sale at 5 mills it should be possible to proceed to ratification and implementation of the treaty in the near future.

Mr. Bennett expanded on his proposals with regard to sale. It should be of the entire Canadian entitlement to downstream benefits, including both the energy entitlement and the capacity entitlement. When a five-mill price had been talked about with B.P.A., it had been on the basis of a 60% load factor. British Columbia would like to have a higher load factor – possibly 85%, but would be prepared to settle for 70%. The price of five mills had been calculated in relation to financing of the projects at 4½% interest rate. What British Columbia wanted to secure was an agreement under which the payments for power sold would be enough to completely service and discharge the financing for three storage dams in Canada, plus the machining of Mica to produce 2 million horsepower. He said that he understood that the policy of the Canadian government was that the export of electric power could be authorized on the same basis as the export of oil and gas – namely, in any case where it was shown to be in excess of the Canadian requirements. Mr. Fleming agreed that that was the position of the Canadian government. There had been misunderstanding at certain stages but it was clear that the same principles would apply to electric power as to oil and gas.

With regard to the exchange of notes and agreement with the United States, Mr. Bennett said that the sale of power should be on a basis that would commit the United States for the full life of the treaty: it should not have any option of prior cancellation. Canada, on the other hand, should be entitled to give ten years' notice of termination of the sale arrangement at any time after ten years of life of the sale agreement. In other words, the sale would commit Canada for twenty years minimum, but would allow us to be sure of a commitment by the United States to purchase beyond that period if we so desired. In response to a question as to whether he thought the United States would be prepared to enter into any such one-sided agreement, Mr. Bennett said that he thought they would if it was the only basis on which they would be able to secure the increased power deriving from the Columbia treaty. Moreover, a firm commitment by them for the life of the treaty was not altogether unfair since Canada had to make investments in the storage projects that could only be amortized over the life of the treaty. The United States did not have to undertake any comparable financial commitments.

The agreement for sale should be with B.P.A. and not with any private companies. It would be quite unsatisfactory to have an agreement that did not involve the clear commitment of the United States government. To arrive at an agreement it would be desirable to have a meeting with the United States representatives before the session of Parliament opening on September 27th and before the Congressional elections in November.

With regard to payment for the power sold, it might be desirable to try to have this made on the basis of equal annual payments spread over the life of the treaty. This would remove the necessity of checking in detail on the exact quantity of Canadian downstream benefits year by year. Such an arrangement would also be particularly satisfactory in order to ensure the servicing of the financial obligation for the storage and machining of Mica.

In commenting on Mr. Bennett's proposals, Mr. Fleming reiterated the federal government's position on the export of electric power. As far as the treaty was concerned, the federal government still stood behind it and would like to see it implemented. Any arrangement to achieve that effect would have to be on the understanding that it represented genuine concessions by both the province and the federal government to achieve a sensible action in the interests of the country as a whole. It would not be possible to achieve progress if it were to be presented as a triumph by either side. Mr. Bennett expressed full agreement.

Mr. Fleming said that he had understood from the meetings in April that there was no difference in view between Canada and the province concerning the costs of downstream benefits and Columbia power generally. Mr. Bennett confirmed that that was so.

With regard to finances, Mr. Fleming asked Mr. Bennett whether he had explored seriously the possibilities of floating the necessary issues in the United States. He said that the federal government would have no objection to borrowing in the United States for the purposes contemplated. At this point Mr. Bennett said that he had reason to believe that B.P.A. would be in a position to advance the funds for the Canadian storages and Mica machining. They would be able to do this at a lower interest rate than could be secured through financing on the market and that was what British Columbia wanted. The interest rate on the financing would be a very large part of the costs of power and the price at which downstream benefits could be attractively sold was clearly related to the interest rate payable on financing. Mr. Fleming expressed great surprise at the idea that a United States government agency might be in a position to do any of the financing of the Canadian costs and said that this was a completely new suggestion as far as the federal government was concerned.

Mr. Fleming said that one suggestion that had been made since the discussions last April was that it might be desirable for Canada, if it sold its downstream benefits, to secure an option from the United States under which it would be entitled (but not committed) to secure an amount of power from the United States equal to the amount of power it had sold. The option would be exercisable only if it were desirable as far as Canada was concerned and if a price could be agreed on. Mr. Bennett did not like this proposal. He thought that any such option would involve the likelihood of some commitment to take power at a price comparable to what we hoped to get for our downstream benefits: this would be quite disadvantageous. It was, moreover, unrealistic for a country with a surplus of power to be securing an option to buy it from a country with a power deficiency.

Mr. Fleming referred to difficulties that would still have to be faced with the treaty by the federal government. The Secretary of State for External Affairs had made a commitment that the treaty would go before the External Affairs Committee. General McNaughton and others would certainly level strenuous criticisms. Would British Columbia be prepared to have someone be present to deal with such points as its unwillingness to flood the East Kootenay? Mr. Bennett said that he assumed that the federal government would be supporting its own treaty. Assuming that it was, he was quite prepared to have British Columbia representatives, such as Dr. Shrum and Dr. Keenleyside, attend the Committee sessions to deal with matters of particular interest to British Columbia.

Following the above exchange Mr. Fleming said that he would like to clarify some points relating to the ones that had been laid down by the British Columbia representatives following the meeting of April 5th and 6th. (These appear as Appendix "D" to the memorandum to the Minister of Finance dated April 7th.) The points that were dealt with in relation to the enumeration in that document were as follows:

#I- This point referred to the term of sale "to be sought by the government of British Columbia." It also referred to "all" the downstream benefits. Mr. Bennett said that he clearly understood that the federal government would have to handle the negotiations with the United States but he assumed that British Columbia would be party to the negotiations and would be the actual party to the sale agreement to B.P.A. With regard to "all" downstream benefits, he pointed out that there would be no real advantage in a sale of less than "all" as there would have to be transmission lines to transmit any unsold portion of the power to Canada: this would involve Canada in the obligation to pay the stand-by charge. Mr. Fleming agreed that this would be so but he also pointed out that there would be no real saving if the United States would have to install transmission lines to transmit the power to Canada after, say, twenty years. Mr. Bennett said that to him it was entirely a question of price: if the downstream benefits could be sold at five mills and British Columbia could produce the power it needed at less than five mills, why bring any of it back? Apart from the straight price advantage, there was also the fact that the larger our sale to the United States was and the longer it lasted, the less they would turn to other sources of power and the less our entitlement to downstream benefits would diminish.

Mr. Fleming asked what the position of British Columbia would be if it were finally decided that only a part of downstream benefits should be sold to the United States – or if the United States should indicate a willingness to buy on a basis that would cover only part of the financing. Mr. Bennett said that British Columbia would not go ahead on any such basis. If the federal government did not want all the power sold, British Columbia would expect a grant (not a loan) to make up the deficiency in the revenue that would be forthcoming to service the financial obligations. He reiterated that British Columbia wanted annual payments to cover the total annual costs of the three storages plus Mica financing.

(The meeting broke off at the above point and resumed at 4:00 p.m.)

- #II- Mr. Fleming said as he understood it British Columbia would go ahead with the Peace River development but would carry on only the first stage and would postpone later stages if necessary (see point No. V). What did “first stage” mean? Mr. Bennett confirmed that the above was British Columbia’s position and said that “first stage” meant the Portage Mountain dam. Nothing further would be done on the Peace River development until Mica machining was completed. Mr. Fleming referred to a statement by Dr. Keenleyside on April 5th to the effect that Peace River power “would not bump Columbia power out of the natural Columbia service area.” Did that mean that British Columbia would not take Peace River power into Vancouver? Mr. Bennett said that that was not the meaning: they could not exclude Peace River power from Vancouver. Their intention was to “dovetail” Peace and Columbia output and to take care of the surplus by exporting. As surpluses developed they would make application to the National Energy Board for export permits.
- #III- Mr. Bennett’s only comment here was to object to the words “in kind.” British Columbia expected to be able to buy interim power from B.P.A. at a very favourable price that would make it better to pay for it in cash than to provide power in exchange.
- #IV- Mr. Fleming stressed that this was of very great importance to the federal government. Mr. Bennett confirmed the statement in the enumeration and said that British Columbia included transmission lines as well as storages and generators in “development” of the Columbia.
- #V- Mr. Fleming asked if Mr. Bennett would be prepared to make the date for the machining of Mica firm. Mr. Bennett said that as far as he was concerned it was a purely technical point: if the experts could advise on a specific date, he would be quite prepared to specify it.
- #VI- Mr. Bennett confirmed this.
- #VII- There was some discussion on what any escalation might be related to. Mr. Bennett said that if the United States would agree on an arrangement that would provide fixed annual payments plus fixed finance charges over the lifetime of the treaty, an escalation clause would not be necessary.
- #VIII- It was agreed that the treaty clauses provided their own timetable for the structures.
- #IX- There was a good deal of discussion over Mr. Bennett’s concept that the land taken out of other use to provide the reservoirs required “compensation” over and above the compensation paid to private owners. He took the position that in addition to the effect on private owners there was a loss to the community in perpetuity. He said that he wanted to hold the $64.4 million as a capital sum to provide interest revenues that could be used for economic development in the Kootenays: this would considerably reduce objection there to the whole Columbia development. He said he particularly did not want to have the $64.4 million credited to the storage structures at the time of negotiation with the United States since it would reduce the claim that Canada might make for financial payment. At the end of the discussion Mr. Bennett said that if the payment by the United States for our power were not sufficient to cover the financing of the three storages plus Mica machining, he would not object to having the $64.4 million used to bring Mica into generation.

Following the above clarifications there was some discussion about the handling of negotiations with the United States. Mr. Bennett said that they should be undertaken by Mr. Fleming and himself, together with federal and provincial officials as needed and that they should be in Washington at the earliest possible date.

Mr. Fleming raised a question as to what assurance the federal government would have about the implementation of treaty obligations by the provincial government in future and what sanctions there might be against non-implementation. Mr. Bennett said that he would be quite prepared to have the committee of officials made permanent as an advisory group to check on all aspects of implementation. He also said that there should be provincial legislation to tie in with the federal legislation. If the Minister of Justice and the Attorney General of the Province could produce any other suggestions he would be glad to comply with them.

In reply to an enquiry about a joint entity, Mr. Bennett indicated his complete opposition. British Columbia Power and Hydro would be the entity to implement the project. All contracts would be open to competitive bidding and the joint committee could look at both tenders and contracts. He would be prepared to have a preference given to Canadian workmen and materials, but he thought a 10% preference would be too great.

At the conclusion of the discussions Mr. Bennett indicated his desire to have something said to the press that would indicate that the provincial and federal governments had arrived at a basis of understanding – say, a “meeting of minds” and that meetings of experts and meetings with the United States were contemplated. Mr. Fleming made it clear that he could not go that far and would have to report to his colleagues in the Cabinet on the positions that Premier Bennett had taken. He would get in touch with Premier Bennett thereafter. The situation was left on that basis with Premier Bennett reiterating his desire to see action at the earliest possible date.

(Previous reference Aug. 29†)

28. The Secretary of State for External Affairs said the proper way to get the Columbia Treaty before a committee of the House of Commons was simply to state in the Speech from the Throne that it would be made available to the Standing Committee of the House on External Affairs for examination. The Committee could not be directed as to what to do about the Treaty but would have its own time to examine it in its own way. There would be no debate on a resolution to refer the matter to the Committee. When evidence was given before the Committee, the whole story would come out and the pressure would be off the government. The estimates of the Department of External Affairs would be referred to the Committee and when the departmental items had been dealt with, the International Joint Commission item could be examined. During the hearings there would be an opportunity to impress the Premier of British Columbia with the necessity of coming around to the view of the Federal government.

29. During the discussion it was said:

(a) The government would have to decide on the position it would take before the Committee.

(b) What would the government's position be if the Committee concluded that the Treaty was unsatisfactory to Canada?

(c) The government could not ratify the Treaty until it had come to an agreement with Premier Bennett.

(d) Premier Bennett would not sign an agreement on the whole Treaty until there had been an agreement with him on the terms he laid before Mr. Fleming and until he knew the U.S. was prepared to agree also.

(e) If Canada were to ratify the Treaty before an agreement had been reached, the Federal government would then be in the Premier's hands.

(f) The Treaty should be ratified, taken into the House and then supported there by the government. There would be two steps – (i) it would be ratified by resolution of the House; (ii) a bill would be introduced to approve the agreement with British Columbia.

(g) The Treaty could not be given to a Committee until there had been a tentative agreement with British Columbia and it could not be ratified until there had been agreements with both British Columbia and the United States.

(h) All other considerations were premature until it had been decided:

(i) to what extent Premier Bennett's terms were acceptable to the government; and,

(ii) what the government's position would be if it was impossible to get agreement with the Premier on the terms set out by him or on a modification of them.

It would be better to tell the Premier that the government could not agree with his terms, rather than to continue floundering around. If he did not hear from the government soon he would go to the press and tell them that Canada had let the Treaty go by default. He would say that Ottawa had prevented Canada from getting three dams built for nothing as well as free Mica power because it insisted on bringing back Canada's downstream power.

(i) There could be no objection to officials exploring with U.S. officials the question of the sale of Canada's downstream benefits in whole or in part, as well as financing, but the government should not be committed until it had seen what the U.S. could do on these two points. Premier Bennett, however, was asking that Canada agree now to his terms, whereas it was not known for certain what price Canada would receive for all or part of its downstream power.

(j) Premier Bennett should be told that the Federal government would explore the sale of downstream benefits in Washington but would not agree to financing by the Bonneville Power Administration.

(k) It was suggested that Canadian officials go to Washington with B.C. officials to assess the situation with respect to sale of downstream benefits and financing, without making any commitments, and that Ministers might go to Washington after they had seen the report of the officials on their discussions. Others said that Canada would not get a satisfactory answer if officials went to Washington alone.

30. The Cabinet agreed to give further consideration to a decision along the following lines:

(a) that officials representing the Federal government and the government of British Columbia should go to Washington immediately to endeavour to ascertain from U.S. officials the terms on which Canada's downstream benefits under the Columbia River treaty could be sold in the United States;

(b) that the officials should make no commitment on behalf of the government of Canada; and,

(c) that Ministers of Canada and British Columbia should go to Washington to discuss the sale of downstream benefits after the report of the officials on their discussions had been considered.

21. The Prime Minister said that the tentative decision reached on the previous day on the Columbia River development should be further reviewed. His own absence and that of Mr. Green should not delay the efforts to reach firm agreements on this subject. The Ministers concerned could keep in touch with him by telephone.

22. During the discussion the following points were raised:

(a) Some said it should be made clear that the proposed sale of Canadian downstream benefits to the United States should be discussed on the basis of a term of years and not of a sale in perpetuity.

(b) Others said the decision whether Ministers of the Federal government and the British Columbia government should go to Washington ought to be postponed until after the report of officials had been reviewed by the Cabinet.

(c) Premier Bennett was unlikely to permit his officials to proceed to Washington on the basis suggested. U.S. officials would not give answers to Canadian officials on such a matter of high policy. This exploration would in reality become an active negotiation, and the Premier wished to participate directly in the negotiations and to drive a hard bargain.

(d) Some said that if two successive journeys were to be made to Washington as proposed, no firm decision could be taken in time for insertion in the Speech from the Throne. Others said that there was no need to complete negotiations this month, and that the government should not permit Premier Bennett to "put a gun to our heads."

23. The Cabinet agreed,

(a) that officials representing the Federal government and the government of British Columbia should go to Washington immediately to endeavour to ascertain from U.S. officials the terms on which Canada's downstream benefits under the Columbia River treaty could be sold for a term of years in the United States;

(b) that the officials should make no commitment on behalf of the government of Canada; and,

COLUMBIA RIVER TREATY

Pursuant to the decision of the Cabinet on September 6th meetings were held this week in Washington to discuss the Columbia River treaty. The following is the text of a report that I have received from the officials who represented the Canadian Government:

Ottawa, 13 September, 1962

Memorandum for the Minister of Justice

DISCUSSIONS ON THE COLUMBIA RIVER TREATY

According to the official record of Cabinet decisions, the Cabinet at the meeting of September 6th discussed Columbia River development policy and agreed as follows:

(a) that officials representing the Federal government and the government of British Columbia should go to Washington immediately to endeavour to ascertain from U.S. officials the terms on which Canada's downstream benefits under the Columbia River treaty could be sold for a term of years in the United States;

(b) that the officials should make no commitment on behalf of the government of Canada.

Pursuant to the above decision which followed upon your report of your discussions with the Premier of British Columbia on August 27th, there was a meeting in your office on September 7th at which Messrs. Robertson, Parkinson and MacNabb were present. You directed that we carry out the above decision of the Cabinet at a meeting which was thereafter arranged to take place in Washington beginning September 11th at 9:00 a.m. You indicated to us the understanding that the Cabinet decision had reference to the possibility of United States acceptance of the British Columbia proposal as outlined to you by Premier Bennett on August 27th, including the possibility of financing of the storage projects by funds advanced by a United States federal agency.

The meetings in Washington took place on the morning and afternoon of September 11th and the morning of September 12th. In order to make clear the Canadian government's position, Mr. Robertson, who acted as chairman of the Canadian group, said at the outset of discussions that, in order to ascertain the possibility of arriving at an arrangement that would be acceptable to all governments under which the Columbia Treaty could be implemented, Canada had requested the meeting so that certain proposals by the Province of British Columbia could be put forward for consideration by the United States. If it emerged that the proposals were acceptable to the United States, the Government of Canada would give the matter further and careful consideration. It was made perfectly clear that the federal government was not committed to accepting the proposal and that no other commitment could be made by the officials representing the Canadian government.

Following upon the above statement, Dr. Keenleyside set forth the British Columbia proposal in five points:

(a) There should be a contract between Bonneville Power Administration and the Canadian entity (the British Columbia Hydro and Power Authority) under which B.P.A. would undertake to buy the Canadian share of downstream benefits.

(b) the contract should be for the life of the treaty but with a clause that would enable Canada at any time after ten years to give ten years' notice that it would reduce the amount of power to be sold under the agreement.

(c) the sale would comprise the entire Canadian entitlement both of energy and capacity. There should be a formula for conversion of capacity to energy (as provided in the treaty) such that the entirety of the Canadian entitlement would be sold at the equivalent of five mills per kilowatt hour. (Dr. Keenleyside added that this figure was completely essential and that there was "no leeway for bargaining at all").

(d) the contract should be a straight commercial arrangement between the two entities themselves under the authority of or comprising a part of an exchange of notes as provided for in the treaty.

(e) for the financing of construction of the storages, British Columbia would like to obtain funds from the United States, preferably from a federal agency such as B.P.A., at a rate of interest that was normal for the financing of similar developments in the United States.

Following some clarification of the British Columbia proposition the United States group withdrew to consider the matter. At the next stage of the meetings they indicated various difficulties that they thought stood in the way of achieving anything like the price that British Columbia had proposed and the problem of absorbing the total Canadian entitlement in the United States. B.P.A. is required to give priority to the requirements of public agencies and hence might have difficulties in handling the resale of Canadian downstream benefit power to the private companies on the best terms. It would also be difficult to get the best price when the amount of Canadian power to be sold was not constant (our downstream benefits diminish over time) and there was at least the theoretical contingency of a Canadian decision to reduce amounts sold at the end of twenty years. On the latter points the British Columbia representatives said they felt that reduction in Canadian entitlement could be made up by exports of Canadian power and also that the reduction in sales at the end of twenty years was most improbable – both being because British Columbia would have “a great surplus of power twenty years from now.” On the price question, the B.P.A. representatives indicated that California was the highest market and that both for price and also for absorption of additional quantities of power the possibility of constructing a tie line to California (which could be completed in a few years) was important.

With regard to financing of construction by B.P.A., the United States side said there had been no opportunity to discuss the matter with the Bureau of the Budget. If funds could be provided at an interest rate determined in the same way as the rate used to arrive at the flood control payment under present market conditions, it would be 4% per annum. They pointed out that if money could be provided at this rate the reduction in cost from the 5½% rate used in Canadian calculations would amount to $5 million per year on the cost of the three storages. If the Bureau of the Budget agreed that such financing could be provided it would require legislation to authorize the action, plus one or more appropriations Acts to advance the funds. No legislation could be completed before the spring of 1963 at the earliest.

Technical sessions were held to discuss possible formulae for conversion of energy to capacity and to work out the equivalents of various capacity prices in energy terms. It appeared at the end of September 11th that the best B.P.A. were prepared to consider at that time amounted to about four mills per kilowatt hour on the Canadian entitlement.

On the morning of September 12th Mr. White for the United States indicated their position as follows:

(a) With regard to the possibility of financing of construction by B.P.A. they would need to talk to the Bureau of the Budget and the Secretary of the Interior. He also mentioned the difficulties which now existed with respect to the balance of payments and the need to create new employment in the United States.

(b) With regard to the best terms of purchase of power, B.P.A. would have to undertake immediate discussions with private utilities in the Pacific northwest. They had deliberately refrained from doing so thus far. They would undertake such discussion in the course of the next week and would also look into the California situation. They would be prepared to indicate the best terms they could provide if a further meeting could be held in Portland, Oregon, on September 21st.

The British Columbia representatives indicated that they would be prepared to attend a meeting as proposed. The federal representatives said that they would report the situation to the Canadian government and indicate as soon as possible whether they could attend the meeting on September 21st.

Up to the above point there had been no exploration of the possibility of selling something less than the full Canadian entitlement in the United States. Although the British Columbia representatives indicated clearly that anything less than the total entitlement would not meet the British Columbia position, the Canadian group, with the concurrence of the B.C. representatives, raised the matter in order that all possibilities might be explored.

The United States group indicated that it would definitely ease their marketing position if something less than the full Canadian entitlement were being sold to them and it might make possible some improvement in the unit price. The British Columbia representatives indicated that there might be room in the B.C. market for some of Canadian entitlement during the initial few years but not thereafter: after the Peace River project came in about 1968 or 1969, they would have a surplus of power.

The United States representatives said that they would, before September 21st, investigate what the situation would be if they were to purchase less than the total Canadian entitlement at least in initial years with a gradual increase to possibly the full Canadian entitlement after surplus power existed in Canada and a market for added power was available in the United States.

The discussions adjourned on the above basis.

Since the above report was submitted yesterday, the United States Embassy have advised that it now appears that the necessary information for the proposed meeting in Portland cannot be available before October 4th at the earliest, or possibly the week beginning October 8th. Whatever the date, it is apparent that there would be no advantage in having a meeting at the ministerial level before the further meeting of officials takes place.

Recommendation:

In order that the discussions that were authorized by the Cabinet on September 6th at the official level can be carried to completion, I recommend that the officials who represented the Canadian government at the meetings on September 11th and 12th should be authorized to attend the proposed meeting in Portland on whatever date can be arranged with the United States and British Columbia representatives.

COLUMBIA RIVER TREATY

The attached papers contain the report of the Canadian federal officials on the tripartite talks which took place this week in Portland Oregon.†

2. The following would seem to be the main points of particular interest to you:

(a) The talks were not finished on this recent occasion but are expected to go on for at least another session.

(b) Insofar as any conclusion has been reached it would seem to be that Premier Bennett's original proposal is viewed pretty unsympathetically by the United States in many respects (price, U.S. Government financing, etc.).

(c) While the U.S. proposals would involve the sale in the United States of all of Canada's share of the downstream power benefits, the second alternative put forward by the U.S. in appendix E would permit the retention in Canada of about one-half of Canada's total power benefits (including power generated immediately in Canada at locations such as Mica).

3. Although it may be premature and presumptuous to attempt to sketch a settlement which would be beneficial to Canada as a whole and at the same time politically tolerable to both the Federal and British Columbia Governments, I wonder whether it might be possible to get consideration of a compromise along the lines of the second alternative in appendix E. Such a compromise would of course require major concessions from Premier Bennett. For example, he would have to admit that the terms stated publicly by him are unattainable. He would also have to accept a substantial delay on the Peace River Project. At the same time, he would have to be prepared to get ahead rapidly with the "construction and machining" of the Mica Project with which the Federal Government is identified. Against these concessions on his part, Premier Bennett would naturally get some credit for enabling the Columbia development to get under way.

4. This compromise might appear to entail some concessions from the Federal Government as well. In particular the Federal Government would have to be willing to allow the sale in the United States of most or all of the downstream benefits, and perhaps to allow some export of power from Canadian sites. This concession might not, however, seem to be so substantial since it might not appear to go significantly beyond the point apparently reached in the Speech from the Throne. Moreover, as noted in paragraph (c) above, it can be quite reasonably represented that under this compromise half or more of Canada's total power benefits would be available for use in Canada in addition to the very substantial financial payments which Canada would receive for downstream benefits sold in the United States. The Federal Government could also take a good deal of satisfaction from the fact that the development of Mica would proceed at an even faster pace than originally contemplated. Finally, under this proposal, it would become economic to install generating equipment in the High Arrow Dam to produce power for export or for local use and thus remove any impression that this dam was simply devised for holding back water to be released for use by the Americans. (See paragraph (a) on page 5 of the report of the federal officials.)

5. It should perhaps be mentioned that Dr. Shrum was not able to be present at the meeting in Portland. If he had been present, he might have reacted more strongly than Dr. Keenleyside to the suggestion that the Peace River Project might be deferred.

COLUMBIA RIVER DISCUSSIONS

I had a telephone call just before noon today from Dr. Keenleyside. He had just returned to Vancouver from New York where he had been reporting to Mr. Bennett on the Columbia River discussions.

Apparently Mr. Bennett is not prepared to accept the negative results of the Portland discussions as being final. He appears to feel that when the Congressional elections that are now under way in the United States are over it will be possible to get the most senior officers in the United States to direct their attention to the Columbia problem and perhaps to extend more liberal possibilities than the officials who have been dealing with the matter are in a position to do. Dr. Keenleyside said there had also been some indication by "political leaders most concerned" of reluctance to have anything done at this stage. I assume by this he means Senator Magnuson and some others in the Pacific Northwest who are anxious to see the Columbia treaty ratified. In any event, in the light of the above considerations Mr. Bennett feels that some time about the end of November would be the earliest at which it would be profitable to have a further meeting with the United States.

I asked Dr. Keenleyside whether Mr. Bennett had given any reaction to the four alternatives that had been put forward by the United States delegation for consideration in lieu of Mr. Bennett's proposal. Dr. Keenleyside said that it was his impression that Mr. Bennett was not prepared to look at any other possibility until he was sure that there was no chance of securing the kind of arrangement he has been working toward.

According to Dr. Keenleyside, Mr. Godhammer (who is the right-hand man to Mr. Luce – the head of B.P.A.) and Mr. Kidd (on the engineering side of B.C. Hydro) have been working on the possibility of establishing a corporation in the United States which would have some relationship to B.P.A. but would be separate enough from it that it would not be subject to some of the difficulties that stand in the way of B.P.A. buying power at as high a price as Mr. Bennett has been hoping for. Such a corporation would buy our downstream benefits and resell them to the utilities in the United States. The idea behind this is essentially one I think that has been applied in handling the power from the new Hanford plant that is being constructed to use waste head from the production of plutonium. Whether it would in fact permit any better price to be paid for Canadian power I do not know but in any event it is apparently being considered.

Apparently Mr. Bennett has also not entirely given up his hope that some special means of securing United States financing might be possible.

All in all, Mr. Bennett feels that Canada has nothing to lose by waiting to see what kind of climate there may be after the United States elections.

I reported the above to Mr. Fleming immediately after hearing it from Dr. Keenleyside and he felt that it would be best if the United States were to receive the above reaction from the British Columbia representatives rather than from us. I so advised Dr. Keenleyside and he said that he would get in touch with Mr. White of the United States Embassy this afternoon.

My report to Mr. Fleming was after the Cabinet considered the memorandum that was sent forward on Wednesday. Mr. Fleming advised me that the Cabinet had come to the conclusion that the Canadian official group should be authorized to attend the further meeting on the Columbia that we thought might take place in the coming week. In view of the substantial delay that there will now be there will, of course, be a further opportunity to review the situation when we see what new suggestion Mr. Bennett comes forward with at the end of November. Mr. Fleming was of the view that since the delay was at the suggestion of British Columbia the proper course would be not only for them to intimate that fact to the United States but also for us to wait for British Columbia to take some new initiative.

CONFIDENTIAL

Ottawa, November 7, 1962

My dear Colleague,

I am enclosing herewith a copy of an item that appeared in the Vancouver Province on October 22nd concerning the Columbia River development.<sup>84</sup> I do not know whether it will have come to your attention but if not, I think it should.

There are two things that appear to be significant in Mr. Bennett's statement. One is his emphatic declaration that the Peace River is "for sure" and that "the contract is going right ahead." This seems to suggest that he is not going to permit any flexibility on this point so as to reach an agreement with the United States along one of the lines that was held out as a possibility in the meetings in Portland.

The more important statement is the one saying that "unless arrangements can be made to sell our share of the Columbia River power to the United States for enough money to give us 2 million h.p. free from Mica Creek, somebody else will build the Columbia, but not us." Since the Portland discussions made it pretty clear that Mr. Bennett cannot get the amount of money referred to in the above statement, he may be preparing to take a position that would put the Columbia completely in the lap of the federal government. He would, as I see it, be able to say that he very much wanted to go ahead with the Columbia and would be glad to do so if suitable terms could be arranged. Since they cannot be arranged, he is not going to stand in the way of the federal government: if it regards the matter as being of national interest it can build the Columbia projects and sell the power either in British Columbia or in the United States as it thinks best. This would enable him to say that it was not he who had rejected the treaty development: it would be the federal government if it did not choose to go ahead at its own expense.

A move along the above lines could put us in quite a dilemma. It would obviously be awkward if it appeared that it was the federal government that was deciding not to proceed with the treaty development. On the other hand, if we went ahead we would be doing it in very unfavourable circumstances: Mr. Bennett would be a monopoly buyer for the power in Canada and the only alternative would be the export of all or nearly all the power to the United States.

I doubt if there is anything that can or should be done with regard to this before the further meeting of officials that is now contemplated for the latter part of November or early December. It might however be something to which some thought should be given and I am sending copies of this letter to our colleagues, Mr. Green and Mr. Fulton for their attention.

Yours sincerely,

WALTER DINSDALE

PERSONAL AND CONFIDENTIAL

Ottawa, November 13, 1962

My dear Prime Minister:

I met with Mr. Ivan White, United States Chargé d'Affaires, yesterday at lunch at his invitation. It did not surprise me that he opened discussion on the Columbia River project.

You will recall that Premier Bennett was quoted in the British Columbia press on October 22nd stating in effect that unless Canada's share of the downstream benefits could be sold for sufficient to pay the cost of construction of the storage dams and power development projects in Canada there would be no development of the Columbia unless the Federal Government chose to undertake it. Premier Bennett also intimated that he was proceeding with the first stage of the development of the Peace River power project and was making headway with his plans for financing this stage.

Mr. White expressed himself as being pleased with Premier Bennett's statement and as hoping that the Federal Government would proceed with the Columbia River development as a federal project. I at once made it clear that it was very doubtful if the Federal Government would or could undertake such a development on its own. I pointed out that as Mr. Bennett controls the sale of power for consumption in British Columbia there would be no market in B.C. for power developed on the Columbia under federal auspices.

Mr. White countered by suggesting that the Federal Government might export the power to the United States or link it with the proposed Canadian grid. I stated that I doubted that the Federal Government would propose to undertake the development of a resource, which normally is strictly within provincial jurisdiction, for the purpose merely of export, and that it would be very difficult to tie power generated on the Columbia River to a national grid because of the topographical problems.

Mr. White argued that Peace River power is bound to be more expensive than Columbia River power, and that both may be needed by British Columbia by 1972. My answer was that this was essentially a question for the Province and its government, and I could foresee no likelihood of Mr. Bennett abandoning his plans for development of the Peace River.

Mr. White referred to the fact that there had been press reports that Premier Bennett anticipates an expenditure of $400 million on the development of the first stage of the Peace River project. He expressed the opinion that the cost would really amount to $600 million. He is under the impression that Premier Bennett has succeeded only in raising some very short-term credit in the United States to finance the Peace River project. He intends to make enquiries with a view to ascertaining, if possible, what credit arrangements Premier Bennett has succeeded in making.

I pointed out the difficulties created by the position taken by the American technical representatives at the meeting in Portland a month ago. If Bonneville Power Corporation, which is the United States Government agency, will not itself purchase the Canadian share of the downstream benefits, and if there is no hope of obtaining a price of five mills per k.w.h., and if financing is not available at 4½% interest, I now see little likelihood of Mr. Bennett agreeing to terms. I asked if the terms put forward by the Americans at the Portland meeting were final. Mr. White intimated that they were virtually so, and that there was very little room for modification of them. I expressed to Mr. White the opinion that the position taken by the United States representatives appeared in the light of the position taken by Premier Bennett, to doom the entire Columbia project.

In the meantime there have been some technical exchanges between the United States and British Columbia experts. The next meeting of the technical experts of the three governments will probably be held about December 10th.

I shall be prepared to bring this report to Cabinet should you so decide.

Yours sincerely,

Dear Mr. Fleming,

I am enclosing herewith a copy of a letter that I am sending today to Mr. Ritchie in the Department of External Affairs, together with a copy of its enclosure. I think they are self-explanatory.

It seems to me, as the letter states, that the proposed discussions in Vancouver on December 19th and 20th could be critical for the prospects of the Columbia Treaty. In the circumstances, you may agree that some assessment of the situation in the terms suggested would be desirable. If you have any comments or views on the matter it would be most helpful if you could let me know.<sup>85</sup>

CONFIDENTIAL

Ottawa, November 28, 1962

Dear Mr. Ritchie,

I refer to our telephone conversation of Monday last, in the course of which you advised me of Mr. Green's view that it would be desirable to have a paper prepared for possible submission to the Cabinet on the Columbia River Treaty. You told me that Mr. Green particularly had in mind examination of the possibility of trying to provide a solution to the present impasse through an offer by the federal government to provide 50% of the cost of transmission of power from the Columbia sites to the lower mainland of British Columbia.

I mentioned to you that Mr. MacNabb had just returned from the Coast and was preparing a report covering the information and conclusions he derived there. I have now received it and I am enclosing a copy herewith.† I think you will agree that it is an extremely capable and valuable document.

It is apparent that from the general position we are approaching in our unofficial discussions, from public comments in the press, and from the conclusions in Mr. MacNabb's report, that we are at a decisive point as far as the Columbia Treaty is concerned. It seems to me that the meeting now planned for December 19th - 20th could well be conclusive as to the likelihood of the Treaty coming into effect or being definitely dropped. In these circumstances I have asked the Water Resources Branch to develop the paper that would include Mr. Green's suggestion into a comprehensive document that will set forth the picture as it now appears in order that Ministers can give it their careful consideration and take such decisions as they think desirable.

With regard to the essential nature of the position I am asking that the paper include in very brief form the substance of the conclusions in Mr. MacNabb's report, with which I fully agree. The first line that must be explored – in effect it is the one we are exploring in our discussions – is the one referred to in recommendation (b) on page 3. I am asking that the paper set forth the most realistic assessment we can make at this stage of the best possible agreement from our point of view for the sale of power in the United States. The closest approach to Premier Bennett's requirements will, I think, involve the assumption of a sale of all downstream benefits for a thirty year period at a price of approximately 4 mills and with payment by a lump sum in advance in order to facilitate financing of the Treaty structures. The paper will try to set forth not only the results of such a sale in direct financial terms for the Treaty and power production in British Columbia, but also the consequences for our balance of payments in the immediate and more distant future.

The Branch will prepare the paper just as quickly as it is possible to do it but it obviously will take a little time. It seems to me that it might be desirable to have a meeting of the Cabinet Committee on the Columbia just as soon as it is ready so that the Ministers on the Committee can have a chance to discuss it with officials present before the matter goes to the Cabinet itself. It might, I hope, be possible to have such a meeting if Ministers so wish by the end of next week. This would give the following week for Cabinet consideration in advance of our departure for Vancouver.

I am sending copies of this letter together with its enclosure to my own Minister and Mr. Fulton. I assume that you will discuss it with Mr. Green. I am also sending copies to Mr. Bryce and Mr. Parkinson. While Mr. Fleming has not been on the Cabinet Committee on the Columbia it is clear that he too will want to consider this matter in view of the critical state at which we are now arriving. I am accordingly sending a copy to him.

If there are any comments or suggestions that you have in relation to the above proposals or to the paper that is under contemplation, I should appreciate it if you would let me know just as soon as possible.

Yours sincerely,

URGENT. PERSONAL AND CONFIDENTIAL

Ottawa, December 14, 1962

My dear Prime Minister,

I have just received a copy of the letter to you of December 14th from our Colleague Walter Dinsdale,† in which he recommends that there be a meeting of the Cabinet Committee on Columbia River prior to the departure of our officials for the meeting with British Columbia and United States officials on December 19th and 20th.

I fully concur in the desirability, indeed the necessity of having a meeting of the Cabinet Committee for this purpose. However, I am very much concerned at the implication that appears to be contained in paragraph (a) of Mr. Dinsdale's letter. While it is of course necessary that our officials should listen to any proposal put forward by the United States for the purchase of the Canadian downstream entitlement, I am strongly of the view that we should make no reference, even in our own instructions to them, to any possibility of a price of less than five mills; and we should certainly not, even by implication, in such an instruction, suggest that we could be interested in a price of four mills.

I understand that the Americans feel that the best price they can offer is 3 and 3/4 mills U.S. which would work out at four mills Canadian. If the whole Canadian entitlement to downstream power is to be sold to the United States at such a price, this means that it is being sold for not more than it would cost to deliver it to Vancouver. I do not see how we could agree to what would be in effect flooding Canadian territory in order to sell power to the United States at a price no better than what would be the cost of the same power delivered to our own load centre.

There are other features of what I understand to be the developing American proposal which would require that our officials exercise the greatest caution at this meeting. My main concern at the moment however is that we should not, inadvertently or by implication, commit ourselves to the price of four mills. My own view is that the form of instructions to our officials envisaged in para. (a) should stop at the word "entitlement" in the second last line, thus deleting all reference to a possible price. This is the view I shall put forward on this point in the Cabinet Committee.

Yours sincerely,

[E. DAVIE FULTON]

Memorandum to Minister of Justice

CONFIDENTIAL

Ottawa, December 27, 1962

COLUMBIA TREATY DISCUSSIONS IN VANCOUVER,
DECEMBER 19 AND 20, 1962

The main item at the meeting in Vancouver on December 19 and 20, was the formal presentation by the United States of an offer along the lines of the one that had been forecast at the meeting in your office on December 14 with the U.S. Ambassador and Messrs. Johnston and White. The paper submitted by the United States side is attached as an appendix to this memorandum. The essential features of the proposal appear beginning at page 6. A few matters were clarified in discussion as follows (the numbers refer to the points as enumerated on pages 6 and 7 of the United States paper):

1. Purchase by the United States of the Canadian entitlement at 3.75 mills (U.S.) per kilowatt hour (4 mills, Canadian Funds)

In reply to questions, the United States representatives confirmed that their offer is in terms of the purchase of the entire Canadian downstream entitlement plus enough export power in the later stages to maintain the quantity of power at a constant figure. The arithmetic to which various other items in the paper refer is done on that basis. They said that if Canada wanted something less than the entire entitlement to be purchased, they had no fixed views and would be glad to look into it. (From the Canadian point of view the difficulty about any sale of less than our full downstream entitlement is that, with the Peace River project under development, we will have a surplus of power. Any return of a portion of our downstream benefits will add to it.)

2. Export of at-site power to maintain a constant quantity

Calculations done by the Water Resources Branch, and substantially confirmed by the British Columbia experts, indicate that it is very doubtful whether it would be advantageous for Canada to sell power at the border at a price of 4 mills in Canadian funds. We accordingly asked whether the United States regarded this as an essential feature of the proposal. They said they did not know whether they could offer the same price for a diminishing amount of power as for a firm amount: it would require further study. After discussion it appeared that the most likely possibility (if there were to be no export of at-site power) might be to arrange a sale in two "slices": part of the power would be sold for twenty years and another part would be sold for thirty years. Adjustment of load factors and exchange of energy and capacity could facilitate such an arrangement. On such a basis there would be a reduction in our commitment at the end of twenty years and there would thus be no, or a much reduced amount, of at-site power to be exported to maintain the respective “slices” at constant levels. It seemed apparent that something along these lines could be worked out if it seemed desirable. At the same time, Dr. Shrum for British Columbia registered the objection that this would reduce the total amount of revenue that would derive from the Canadian sale and thus would reduce the adequacy of the arrangement to cover the costs of construction of the Canadian storages as Mr. Bennett desires.

3. Thirty year term

We enquired whether a twenty year term could be acceptable. The United States’ side gave the impression that it would be but that the price would not be quite as favourable – probably .25 of a mill (U.S.) less. It was not entirely clear whether this lower price (3.5 mills U.S.) would have to apply to the twenty year “slice” if a contract were arranged on the basis referred to above. The better price for a thirty year term is apparently not related particularly to the amortization of the tie line that would have to be built to California. It relates rather to the preference of utilities to have power committed at a firm price for as long a period as possible and their willingness to pay a premium for a longer term.

5. (a) Purchase of the part of our entitlement produced at private plants (26%)

The United States representatives appeared to be quite confident that this portion of the power could be paid for in advance with discounting at a 4 to 4½% interest rate. (At 4 mills and 4% this would amount to $84 million in Canadian funds.)

(b) Loan to cover flood control benefits

The advance payment of the $63 million for flood control benefits from High Arrow and Duncan Dams apparently can be handled under a special arrangement by the Export-Import Bank. What might be done is to utilize a portion of the $150 million standby credit that was arranged with the Bank to strengthen our reserve position last June. While normally Export-Import loans are at 5½% interest, the rate under a possible arrangement might be as favourable as 4% and would not be worse than 4½%. The loan would have to involve the Government of Canada and could not be to the Provincial Government alone. (The payment, discounted at 4% would amount to $59 million. This, plus the payment under (a) would thus come to $143 million. The estimated cost of the High Arrow and Duncan storages is $148 million.)

6. Re-scheduling of Mica Dam

It is quite apparent that the load growth in British Columbia will not justify both the completion of the first stage of the Peace River Project on its present schedule and the immediate installation of the generators at the Mica project when it is completed on the schedule called for by the treaty. (The schedule for the Mica project assumed that it would be machined very shortly after construction in order to assist in covering the heavy costs of the dam. If there is no requirement for its machining, early construction of the storage alone is a heavy financial burden.) We enquired whether the “first-added” credit position of Mica would be preserved if it were postponed. The United States representatives said they would be prepared to preserve its priority over the Libby storage. They would not be prepared to protect its position in relation to other projects that might have to be constructed in the United States before Mica was built. It would have to take whatever credit position was factually justified at the time of its construction. If Mica were postponed and, as seems probable, both Knowles and Bruce’s Eddy storage projects in the United States were completed during the postponement period, Mica’s estimated energy credit would be reduced 12% and its capacity credit 23%.

7. Financing based on power sold to California (74% of our entitlement)

The United States side did not rule out the possibility that the potential customers in California for the 74% of our power not produced at private plants in the Pacific northwest (probably Los Angeles and Sacramento) would be prepared to arrange financing and make an advance payment for the power sold to them. As indicated, the United States would be prepared to explore this but it is not clear to what extent it can be relied on.

Mr. White, who presented the United States proposal, emphasized on several occasions that it was a final and maximum effort by the United States to make it possible for the treaty to come into effect. He did not rule out discussion of points of detail and possible adjustment on them but both he and Mr. Luce (head of Bonneville Power Administration) emphasized that the price and the general arrangements were the best they could offer. If it did not prove possible to work out an acceptable arrangement they would have to explain the situation to Congress and would table the offer they have made in order to make clear how far the United States had been prepared to go to provide a workable scheme.

Both Mr. White and Mr. Luce also emphasized that time was important to the United States. If the Columbia treaty is not to come into effect they must make alternative provision for power and, so far as is possible, for flood control, in the United States. They will be presenting proposals to Congress in February or March, including recommendations for authorization of certain storages and they must know the situation by that time.

General

Following the meetings with the United States there were discussions by the Federal and Provincial representatives. It appeared to be generally the view that:

(a) It would be desirable if an arrangement were made on the lines of the United States proposal, to try to avoid a commitment that requires an export of power from Canada at 4 mills.

(b) A plan adjusted for maximum economy would require that either the Peace River project or Mica at-site generation be postponed. From preliminary calculations it appeared that if the Peace goes ahead on its present schedule, Mica generation should be postponed about 6-8 years. Alternatively, if Mica goes ahead on schedule, and is machined immediately, the Peace should be postponed about 6 years.

It was agreed that Mr. MacNabb of the Water Resources Branch and the Provincial engineers should undertake work to provide at the earliest possible date figures on:

(a) The economics of the United States' proposal including possible modifications on points such as those referred to above;

(b) The cost of energy under a development with early Mica machining and postponement of the first stage of the Peace River project;

(c) The cost of energy under a development with the first stage of the Peace on schedule and postponement of Mica generation; and

(d) The same as (c) but with the Mica storage as well as generation postponed (including possible loss on its downstream benefit entitlement).

It is not expected that the results of such calculations can be available before January 15.

Dr. Keenleyside was to report to Mr. Bennett at once on the result of the meetings. Either before or immediately after the above calculations are available, you and your colleagues may want to ascertain what position the provincial government takes with regard to this definite offer by the United States in response to their proposals that have now been under discussion since last September.

LIMITED OFFICIAL USE

December 18, 1962

PROPOSAL OF UNITED STATES REPRESENTATIVES RELATIVE TO IMPLEMENTATION OF THE COLUMBIA RIVER TREATY

In considering at this time still further efforts to find a solution to the problem of Canadian ratification and implementation of the Columbia River Treaty, it would be useful to recall briefly the background and status of this Treaty in order that suggestions for implementation may be viewed in perspective.

In 1944 the United States and Canada requested the International Joint Commission to investigate whether cooperative development of the water resources of the Columbia River Basin would be practicable and in the public interest from the points of view of the two countries. In response to that request, the International Joint Commission carried out extensive technical studies with particular emphasis on possibilities of power generation and flood control. It was confirmed that cooperative development was both practicable and in the public interest. In January 1959, Canada and the United States requested the International Joint Commission to recommend principles to determine and apportion the benefits which would result from cooperative development of the Columbia River Basin. In January 1960, Canada and the United States appointed delegations to negotiate a Treaty covering cooperative development of the Columbia River Basin for the mutual benefit of both countries. A representative of the British Columbia Government was a member of the Canadian delegation.

By the end of 1960, a Treaty had been negotiated after a year of exhaustive mutual consideration and careful work. The result was generally acknowledged to be a balanced, equitable, and practical instrument. The Canadian and United States delegations reported that in arriving at terms which would be acceptable to both countries in a development of such far-reaching significance, it was not possible for either of them to adopt a position that took no account of the interests and aims of the other.

The Treaty offers mutual advantages to both countries in flood control and power production. It requires that Canada build three storage dams on the headwaters of the Columbia River (High Arrow, Duncan, and Mica Creek), and it authorizes the United States to build a fourth dam (Libby) which, though located in Montana, would back water into Canada. Upon commencement of operation of all Canadian storage, the United States agrees to pay Canada $64,400,000 for the flood control benefits, of which $63,200,000 is assigned to High Arrow and Duncan dams. It also agrees to deliver to the Canadian border 50% of the additional power which downstream dams in the United States can generate because of the three Canadian storage dams when next added to a United States "Base System" defined in the Treaty. Canada's total initial power entitlement would be about 1,300,000 kilowatts of firm power at about a 60% load factor; from High Arrow and Duncan dams only, it would be about 900,000 kilowatts. The Treaty contemplates that each country will finance the projects it agrees to build and will make its own arrangements for use of its power benefits.

On January 17, 1961, the Prime Minister of Canada and the President of the United States signed the Treaty for cooperative development of the Columbia River Basin. The Treaty was generally regarded as an important step toward achieving optimum development of the water resources of the Columbia River Basin as a whole from which the United States and Canada would receive benefits materially larger than either could obtain independently. This Treaty was subsequently approved by the United States Senate, and ratification by Canada has been pending largely because of differences within Canada over disposition of the Canadian share of the benefits.

The United States Government would like to reiterate for purposes of the record that the United States is still prepared to see the Treaty ratified in its present form and in accordance with the original concept that the Canadian power entitlement would be used in the British Columbia market in meeting domestic requirements (with the possibility that initial surpluses in this situation might for temporary periods be sold in the United States). In fact, the United States would prefer that the Canadian power entitlement be used in Canada, and that the Canadian projects be financed by Canada, as contemplated by the Canadian and United States governments at the time the Treaty was negotiated.

It appears, however, that Canada and British Columbia cannot agree upon a program of using the Canadian power entitlement to meet load growth in Canada as contemplated during Treaty negotiations. British Columbia has proposed that, instead, the Canadian power entitlement be sold in the United States on long-term contracts, and that the Peace River be developed immediately to meet load growth in Canada. It has further proposed that the United States Government finance the construction of the Canadian projects. The British Columbia proposals would place upon the United States major obligations not contemplated in the Treaty.

Specifically, the British Columbia Government in September 1962 made a proposal, the most important points of which were that the entire Canadian downstream entitlement be sold in the United States on long-term contracts at an effective price of more than 5 mills per kilowatt-hour at the point of generation, 73% load factor, and that the United States make available funds (approximately $400 million) for construction of the Columbia River projects in Canada at the interest rate charged by the United States when supplying funds for hydroelectric projects in the United States. (The current interest rate is 2½%). After thorough exploration, it was concluded that the Canadian proposal would require the United States to pay more for the Canadian entitlement than the United States market would justify on the basis of the cost of alternative sources of power. These alternative sources of power in the United States are available at a cost substantially less than a 5-mill rate for the Canadian entitlement (at 60% load factor, which is average utility load factor, other than BPA, both in the Pacific Northwest and California). Additionally, United States officials observed that the purchase of the Canadian entitlement at a price unilaterally fixed above the fair market value would, in effect, amount to a derogation of the principle of the equal sharing of benefits upon which the Treaty was negotiated. Extensive discussions with potential customers in the United States have again confirmed that an over-all price of 5 mills at a 60% load factor exclusive of transmission costs is not possible.

Likewise, it will be recalled that United States officials reported that it would not appear possible for the United States Government to finance the construction in Canada of the storage projects under the Treaty. It could not be anticipated that the United States Congress would appropriate funds for public works investment in developed countries, particularly in light of the United States balance of payments problem.

It will be recalled that the United States representatives, in view of the new concept to sell the Canadian share of the power in the United States, offered to explore several alternative approaches in hope of a solution which might be advantageous to all the governmental entities concerned. None of these alternative approaches has apparently been considered acceptable by both British Columbia and Canadian government representatives. The United States representatives, therefore, have decided to make one more attempt to offer a solution.

This U.S. offer has been formulated as a maximum one because of the pressure of time. It has now been nearly 20 years since Canada and the United States decided that cooperative development of the Columbia River basin deserved attention. In January it will be two years since the Treaty was signed. For at least two reasons the need for a prompt decision as to whether this Treaty is going to be implemented has become increasingly urgent: (1) In the U.S. both governmental and nongovernmental agencies have reached the point where action will have to be taken in the immediate future to meet future power needs, either under the Treaty or from alternative sources; and (2) if alternative power and storage projects should proceed prior to Canadian ratification of the Treaty, the benefits from the Canadian storage would be substantially reduced and it would be necessary to modify the Treaty accordingly at such time in the future as Canada may desire to develop storage and share in the resulting downstream benefits in the United States.

In 1962, the Congress of the United States authorized the start of construction of a multipurpose storage project, Bruce's Eddy, on the Clearwater River in Idaho, which has substantial downstream benefits. At the forthcoming session of Congress, within the next three to four months, it is expected that hearings will commence on the authorization of at least one more large storage project, Knowles-Paradise, near the confluence of the Flathead and Clark Fork Rivers, Montana. This project, like Bruce's Eddy, has important downstream benefits. Pending before the Federal Power Commission are competing applications by two non-federal agencies to construct a third large storage project, either Nez Percé or High Mountain Sheep on the Snake River, Idaho-Oregon. Decision on this controversy may be made within 1963.

The Treaty assumes that the first two Canadian storage dams would be constructed before any of these three storage dams in the United States. If delays in ratification and implementation make this assumption incorrect, the downstream benefits from the Canadian projects would be materially reduced.

Under construction, or active consideration, are a number of other new power projects in the Pacific Northwest. Though not including storage reservoirs, they can supply large quantities of power. Such projects include Lower Monumental, Little Goose, Lower Granite, Asotin, and China Gardens dams on the Snake River; Wells dam on the Columbia; Boundary dam on the Pend Oreille; and the Hanford and Cle Elum steam-electric plants.

The estimated cost of power from these various projects, assuming the same financing as the federal Columbia River System, ranges from less than two mills per kilowatt-hour for the most efficient to 3¾ mills per kilowatt-hour for the higher cost projects, 60% load factor, at the generator. Altogether, they would represent an additional power supply of about 5,400,000 kilowatts.

It is in the light of all the circumstances outlined above that the U.S. offers the following proposal for consideration:

1. The United States, after a careful survey of the market, believes that the maximum obtainable price for the Canadian power entitlement in the United States is 3.75 mills per KWH at a 60% load factor at the point of generation in the United States. We will proceed to attempt to secure firm assurances from prospective purchasers of this power in the United States prior to exchanges of ratification.

2. As the Canadian part of the entitlement decreases in the future, Canada will deliver at the Canada-United States border at the same price that amount of power from other sources necessary to keep constant the quantity sold in the United States.

3. The term of the contract will be 30 years from initial delivery of power.

4. The Administration will request from Congress in the 1964 budget the necessary funds to build an extra-high voltage interconnection from the Columbia River to Southern California markets.

5. The United States will use its best efforts to secure firm assurances of:

(a) Long-term non-federal financing from sources in the United States at about 4 to 4½% interest equal to approximately 25% of the present value of Canada's Treaty entitlement. Since non-federal dams on the middle Columbia River will account for about one-fourth of the power generated from water stored in Canada, it appears possible that the public agency licensees of these dams might finance one-fourth of the cost of the Canadian storage projects by an advance payment for power.

(b) A short-term loan from a United States lending institution in the amount of the flood control benefits assigned to High Arrow and Duncan Lakes (approximately $63 million).

6. The United States is prepared to work out a rescheduling of the Mica project if Canada decides that such rescheduling is necessary to meet more closely the marketing possibilities for power to be generated at Mica.

7. The United States also is prepared to explore the possibility of additional financing of the cost of construction of Canadian storage facilities by prospective purchasers of the Canadian power entitlement. It should be recognized, however, that the possibility of such additional financing in the United States cannot be considered as strong.

The proposal as outlined above is considered to be the maximum the United States can do in assisting Canada to dispose of its power entitlements under the Treaty and to finance, in part, the construction of the Canadian projects.

If the above appears satisfactory, we suggest that Canada ratify the Treaty but the exchange of ratifications be held until such time as the sale of the Canadian entitlement in the United States has been completed and the financing outlined above has been arranged. Ratification is desirable so that United States interests can proceed with water and power resource development, taking the Treaty potential into account. Also, ratification would be necessary in order that the United States proceed with the sales and financing arrangements described above.

Our proposal, in effect, offers a means by which the governments of Canada and British Columbia can obtain at low interest rates all or more of the capital necessary to construct the High Arrow and Duncan dams. It proposes a price for Canada's power entitlement which is as high or higher than the cost of power from numerous alternative projects in the Columbia Basin in the United States. At this price, the proceeds from the sale of Canada's power entitlement would completely pay for High Arrow and Duncan dams in less than nine years, even assuming the new, higher cost estimates for these dams made by the B.C. Hydro and Power Authority in the past several months. Over the 30-year life of the sales contracts, Canada could reasonably anticipate a profit of about $160,000,000 from the sale of its share of downstream benefits from High Arrow and Duncan. In addition, Canada would receive from Libby dam important flood control benefits and improved regulation of stream flows on the Kootenay which could produce about 200,000 kilowatts of additional power at about 2 mills per kilowatt-hour.

The proposal indicates a willingness on the part of the United States to agree to a rescheduling of the Mica project to coincide with the need for new power supplies in Canada. The problem of relating the construction schedule of Mica dam on the Columbia and the Portage Mountain dam on the Peace could be resolved between the governments of Canada and British Columbia. The United States would agree to any reasonable construction schedule that Canada and British Columbia propose.

For many reasons, familiar to all who have been concerned with the negotiations of the Treaty for cooperative development of the Columbia River, we hope this great international resource development program will go forward. We stand ready to take every reasonable measure to assure its success. We believe that the proposal herein set forth offers the best chance of resolving the difficulties in Canada which thus far have delayed its ratification.

CONFIDENTIAL

Ottawa, January 28, 1963

COLUMBIA RIVER TREATY: GENERAL PERSPECTIVE

There has been so much attention in the months since the signing of the Columbia River treaty to points of detail and alternative power possibilities that there may be some danger of losing sight of the general values of the treaty and the development it contemplates. This memorandum has been prepared with a view to giving, in brief and summary form, an assessment of the broad importance of the treaty and the possible consequences to Canada if it does not proceed.

If an arrangement cannot be worked out with British Columbia within the limits of the United States offer, the following would appear to be the results:

(1) There appears to be no serious likelihood that the United States will substantially improve the offer it has made.

It has been made clear that the offer of December 19th, 1962, is a "maximum one." It is specifically stated that "the proposal ... is considered to be the maximum the United States can do ...". There may be modifications of detail, perhaps some of substantial importance will be possible, but no change in general level appears to be a realistic possibility.

(2) If an arrangement for the present treaty cannot be worked out there appears to be no likelihood that any other joint agreement with the United States can be reached.

It took a year of active negotiation to agree on the first treaty – and that was under very great pressure. The United States requirements for power are such that they almost certainly would not be prepared to wait for further negotiations to be completed before beginning alternative developments on their side. Recent engineering studies indicate that the two projects the United States is presently considering (one is already authorized by Congress) would cut our present downstream benefit entitlement by one-half if introduced before our Treaty dams. If that happened the present Treaty would become uneconomic and the chances of any successful negotiation of a new Treaty would be poor because of the increased costs and reduced benefits of cooperative development at that time. One has also to consider whether the United States would be disposed to try to work out another arrangement when the first, after approval at all stages up to and including signature, had failed. There are, of course, problems for the U.S. in providing equivalent flood control entirely on their own side and in the loss of the Libby dam. Flood control can be provided by them in most locations without the Treaty, although at greater cost. The interest in Libby appears to be less than it was. Altogether, neither problem appears to be insurmountable for them and the likelihood that they would be prepared to enter into a completely new series of negotiations seems very dubious.

(3) If the above two points are correct and there is no arrangement with the United States, the Columbia River will probably never be developed for power at all.

It has frequently been assumed or implied that we need not proceed with the Columbia treaty and can in our own time and at our own volition proceed to develop the Columbia for Canadian purposes. The engineers of the Water Resources Branch and of the B.C. Hydro and Power Authority are generally of the view that this is unrealistic. If joint development does not occur, there appears to be a strong possibility that the Columbia as a purely Canadian project will never be economic. This view is supported by two separate reports of consulting engineers.

The 1957 report of the Montreal Engineering Company indicated that 65% load factor energy could be produced by thermal-electric plants at Vancouver for 7.3 mills per kwh using coal as fuel and 6.4 mills per kwh using gas. Their estimate of the cost of power from a fully developed independent program on the Columbia was 7.1 mills per kwh, with the initial portions of this development costing 12.9 mills per kwh. They concluded that:

“Hydro-electric development of the Canadian Columbia River for integrated operation with United States plants would provide the cheapest source of power for British Columbia for many years to come if a satisfactory agreement for sharing of benefits can be reached. Otherwise, steam would provide the cheapest power.”

The Government of British Columbia, as a completely separate matter, commissioned Crippen Wright Engineering Limited to do a report for them in 1959. That report states:

“The best initial project available to British Columbia on the Upper Columbia River on the basis of independent planning is the Low Mica Development which would cost $278,000,000 in one construction phase and deliver power to load centres at a cost of 7.06 mills per kilowatt hour. Development of power on the Columbia would not necessarily be competitive or at all attractive on this basis.”

Construction costs for hydro projects are trending upward. Thermal costs are trending downward. If the above conclusions were correct in 1957 and 1959 they will be reinforced by developments in the next few years.

(4) Fraser River Diversion

A diversion of Columbia River water to the Fraser River will not improve the economics of an independent development of the Columbia River. A detailed study by the B.C. Engineering Company in 1956 indicated that the incremental energy provided by such a diversion would cost 7.1 mills per kwh. If this is correct, it would appear that, apart altogether from the unresolved fisheries problem associated with the diversion, the proposal is not economic.

(5) The “McNaughton Plan”

The “McNaughton Plan” for Columbia development is not acceptable to British Columbia, the owner of the resource. It was not acceptable to the United States during Treaty negotiations without Canadian acceptance of subsidized power sales to the United States.

Even without such sales to the United States, it is highly doubtful if the plan would be an economic development for Canada. Many details about it have never been made entirely clear by General McNaughton, including the financing [of] the very high costs at the outset and the method of disposing of the very large initial surpluses of power. The Plan would, however, by flooding the East Kootenay valley, inundate more land than the Treaty proposal. The extra 7% of energy it could produce in Canada could be developed at a lower cost by other resources. Altogether, the McNaughton Plan does not appear to be a practical proposition, particularly for cooperative development under a Treaty.

(6) If the Columbia is not developed the loss of low cost power to Canada will be very great indeed.

The annual output of a full Columbia River development (including downstream benefits under the treaty) at 70% load factor is estimated at 27 billion k.w.h. This is approximately double the total present power production in British Columbia. Of this, over 75% (21 billion kw.h.) would be at-site production in Canada available in perpetuity and not subject to any diminution. British Columbia may not show too much concern over this potential loss of power, since it may feel that the resources of the Peace River are sufficient to meet the needs of the Province for the next ten or fifteen years. However, this would be a very short-sighted approach.

The downstream benefits have been seriously under-rated by some critics because of a long term diminution in magnitude. They will diminish at some time as the introduction of more thermal power plants in the Pacific Northwest makes the area less dependent on hydro plants – and therefore on our storages – to adjust their output of power to meet demands at any particular time. Present estimates are that in 1972 our downstream benefits could amount to as much as 1,375,000 kilowatts of capacity and that by 1985 they would still be in excess of 1,200,000 kilowatts. Load growth in the Pacific Northwest has not proceeded as rapidly as originally estimated. If this continues, they will not introduce thermal power as rapidly as had been estimated. They will then remain dependent on our storages and, as a result, the diminution of our downstream benefits will be much slower than had been thought.

If the Columbia does not go ahead, the power lost will be the lowest cost power available in British Columbia. The consulting engineers retained by British Columbia to compare the Peace and Columbia developments (Sir Alexander Gibb and Partners and Merz and McLellan) estimated the delivered cost of Peace power at 4.2 mills. Using their assumptions and in addition taking into account (i) the flood control payment, (ii) West Kootenay developments and (iii) sale of short term surplus downstream benefits to the United States at 4 mills, the power from the Columbia would be available to Canada at an average cost of 3.26 mills per k.w.h. This is 80% of the unit cost of Peace energy and applies to a quantity some 60% greater than the Peace River potential.

(7) The loss in employment possibilities is substantial

Direct employment on the treaty projects alone would be very great and last over a period of years. In addition to such direct employment there would be a very large amount of indirect employment for manufacturers of equipment. The stimulus to the B.C. economy from the certainty of having available large amounts of low cost power would also have substantial results for employment and the prosperity of the province generally.

(8) The loss to Canada of remunerative investment if the Columbia is not developed will be very great and the loss to our balance of payments will be substantial.

At the time the treaty was signed the investment for the storages called for by it was estimated at approximately $350 million. With transmission and extensions in the West Kootenay the total investment was estimated at $540 million. For full Columbia River development, plus transmission, the investment was estimated at $1,511,000,000. No other project designed to provide an alternative source of power for British Columbia would be as effective in drawing in United States financing quickly and in large volume. No other project would provide its own automatic means of repayment as the treaty projects would under the United States proposal.

Under the United States proposal there would be a cash payment to Canada immediately upon the commencement of construction of approximately $137 million in Canadian terms ($127 million U.S.). If the power sold to California could also be financed on the same basis it would result in a total outright cash payment of $340 million U.S. in 1963 or the equivalent of about $23 million U.S. per year for the 30-year sale period. These amounts are not subject to repayment and therefore to any reverse flow at a later date because they are a payment for power sold and for flood control and not an obligation incurred. Apart from the Columbia there are no other major hydro projects in British Columbia which appear to be capable of earning export income from the sale of power.

The above assessment is presented in an effort to complete the picture that has to be considered in the light of the exchanges over the last year or so.

Altogether it appears the Columbia project is so large in scale; so important in employment, industrial and general economic consequences; and potentially of such great value in meeting some of the most pressing problems of our balance of payments that it is essential for the government to consider the Treaty in the broadest perspective. It is apparent that if it is not implemented the loss to Canada will be of major importance.

COLUMBIA RIVER DEVELOPMENT POLICY
(Previous reference January 24, 1963†)

13. The Minister of Justice said that a team of four experts had made an evaluation of the U.S. proposals of December 19th relative to implementation of the Columbia River Treaty. The findings of their report were summarized as follows:

(1) The U.S. proposal is attractive, especially when allowance is made for the fringe benefits and intangible benefits listed in Chapter 6 of the report.

(2) The proposal results in total revenues equal to a unit payment of 4.6 mills per kwh, for our Treaty energy if the need to provide firming energy to the United States is overcome.

(3) The advance payment for the High Arrow and Duncan flood control credit and for 26% of the power sales will pay for the construction of the High Arrow and Duncan Lake projects; revenues from 74% of the power sales can therefore be applied against Mica storage and generation.

(4) Mica generation in all of the alternatives studied in connection with this offer is believed to be the lowest cost energy available in British Columbia and should therefore not be needlessly postponed.

(5) If construction of the Peace River project continues and Mica generation must be deferred, very careful study should be made of the advantages and disadvantages of postponing the Mica storage project as well.

(6) If a decision is made to defer Mica storage as well as its generation, no commitment should be made at this time to sell its downstream benefits. Sales to the United States should be limited to the benefits provided by High Arrow and Duncan.

(7) If the Treaty is ratified early enough in 1963 the United States proposal would mean an inflow of 130 million U.S. dollars in late 1963 and a total of approximately $350 million (U.S.) by 1970. There would be no corresponding outflow of dollars in later years as advance payments and loans would be met by downstream benefit sales.

(8) The possibility of any development of the Columbia River in Canada may depend upon decisions made on the present U.S. offer, or some modification of it. There is no evidence available at this time that independent development of the Columbia River after 1978 would be economically feasible.

The four Canadian officials who attended the Columbia discussions drew the following conclusions from this report:

(a) The present U.S. proposal is sufficiently attractive to warrant the most serious consideration of the federal government.

(b) The proposal, with its requirement to provide firming energy removed, presents a basis for an advantageous development of the Columbia River in Canada as envisaged by the Columbia River Treaty.

(c) A decision on the Columbia River Treaty is required at an early date to permit a profitable co-operative arrangement. The alternative may very well be no economic development of the River in Canada now or at any time.

(d) Federal ministers may wish to ascertain as a matter of urgency the views of the British Columbia government, as that government will have also received copies of the report of federal and provincial engineers.

After reviewing the report and the conclusions of the federal officials, Mr. Fleming recommended:

- (a) that the Cabinet approve the U.S. proposal in principle as the basis for further negotiations with British Columbia and the United States in order to secure such modifications in detail as will make the arrangement as advantageous as possible for Canada;
- (b) that a Minister be authorized to get in touch with the Premier of British Columbia immediately in order to ascertain the position of the province with regard to the U.S. proposal;
- (c) that if the Premier is prepared to have a meeting between the provincial and federal governments, such Minister be authorized to make the necessary arrangements in the hope of getting agreement at the earliest possible date.

An explanatory memorandum had been circulated. (Minister's memorandum, Jan. 28 – Cab. Doc. 38/63).

14. Mr. Fleming then referred to a memorandum (Cab. Doc. 39/63, Jan. 28)<sup>86</sup> which placed the Columbia River Treaty and the development it contemplates in perspective. The main points to be borne in mind were as follows:

- (1) There appears to be no serious likelihood that the United States will substantially improve the offer it has made.
- (2) If an arrangement for the present treaty cannot be worked out there appears to be no likelihood that any other joint agreement with the United States can be reached.
- (3) If the above two judgements are correct and there is no arrangement with the United States, the Columbia River in Canada will probably never be developed for power at all.
- (4) A diversion of Columbia River water to the Fraser River will not improve the economics of an independent development of the Columbia River.
- (5) The "McNaughton Plan" for Columbia development is not acceptable to British Columbia, the owner of the resource. It was not acceptable to the United States during Treaty negotiations without Canadian agreement to subsidize power sales to the United States. Even without such sales to the United States, it is highly doubtful if the plan would be a development of economic value for Canada.
- (6) If the Columbia is not developed the loss of low cost power to Canada will be very great indeed.
- (7) The loss in employment opportunities would be substantial.
- (8) The loss to Canada of remunerative investment if the Columbia is not developed will be very great and the loss to our balance of payments will be substantial.

15. Mr. Fleming said that it was important that the United States be informed of Canada's decision in February.

16. During the long discussion it was said that it was the view of the Canadian and B.C. experts that Premier Bennett would be prepared to reach a compromise agreement but it would be difficult to get him to agree to the sale of downstream benefits on these terms. B.C. was going ahead with the construction of the first dam on the Peace, but if the Columbia development was begun, the construction of the subsequent dams on the Peace would be held up.

17. Mr. Fulton said that he did not agree that we should accept the U.S. offer even as a basis for negotiation. Canada should not be taking the initiative in favour of proposals which Premier Bennett had already said were not good enough. He did not agree with the two main assumptions of the experts concerning the price at which the power would be sold and that the exchange rate would remain where it is for 30 years.

Under the present proposals, dams would be built in Canada to develop power of which Canada would be entitled to half. It was now proposed that this be sold to the U.S. on a thirty-year contract at less than the price of power in Canada. For this purpose, great areas of Canadian territory would be flooded. Added to this was the possibility that the Mica dam, which was designed to develop power for consumption in Canada, might be postponed for 15 years. Taken together, these factors would create a situation which would not sit well with the Canadian people.

It was far better to let Premier Bennett turn down the U.S. proposals. The responsibility then for the failure of the Treaty would be his. He had not yet secured financing of the Peace project. He was putting up a dam on a navigable river in defiance of the Navigable Waters Protection Act. Canada could impose a delay on the construction of this dam. A new Treaty could be negotiated with the U.S. later on when Premier Bennett was no longer in power. He would rather see the Treaty fail than proceed on this basis.

The present U.S. offer was in direct conflict with both the original concept of the Treaty and Canada's economic interests. The Federal government's intention had been to provide low-cost power from the Columbia to the lower mainland of British Columbia, but the current proposal would involve the use in the United States of Canada's power entitlement on the Columbia, and the use of the more expensive power from the Peace River to meet the load growth requirement of B.C.

Others said the project was consistent with Canada's economic interests, and that Canada would enjoy the use of the cheap on-site power that would be obtained by machining Mica. The suggestion that the province be prevented by injunction from developing the Peace River was unrealistic, and the taking of injunctions against the Crown in right of the Province would introduce new difficulties. The province had obtained enough financing to enable it to proceed with work on the Peace River development for perhaps a year. If the Federal government "declared war" on the province over the development of the Peace River, any agreement with the province on the Columbia would then be out of the question.

Premier Bennett had not rejected the U.S. offer, but had merely taken a negotiating position. The press quoted him as having said that the U.S. proposal was "a good offer as a starter," but that it would have to be improved. There was no intention that the Federal government should urge the province to accept the offer, but only that the Federal government should approve the offer in principle and obtain the views of the province. The province had the primary responsibility for the Columbia, and would own the power if development proceeded. If the treaty should collapse, it should be made clear to the Canadian public that the province was responsible.

Time was running out, and it was therefore important to ascertain the province's views. The negotiations with the U.S. must be completed during February, because the U.S. would have to develop other power sources if the Columbia development was not assured by that time. The subject bristled with difficulties for the Federal government, but unless the deal was completed very soon, the Columbia development would be dead for all time.

Some said that if the province refused to proceed with the development of the Columbia under the terms of the Treaty, the Federal government should give serious consideration to the desirability of declaring the project to be for the general advantage of Canada, and developing it as a national project under Federal government direction.

Others said that the selection of Mr. Fulton as Conservative leader in British Columbia had introduced an important new factor. Experience had demonstrated the impossibility of making binding agreements with the present provincial régime. During the Columbia negotiations the province had broken faith on many occasions and would doubtless do so in the future. Mr. Fulton could defeat Premier Bennett in a general election, and a new provincial premier was an essential prerequisite to a sound agreement on the Columbia. The public in B.C. were criticizing Premier Bennett at this time because he had failed to obtain a price of 5 mills in the U.S. for the Canadian share of downstream benefits and had failed to obtain financing from the U.S. for the whole development. If the Federal government now approved the U.S. offer, Premier Bennett's hand would be immensely strengthened, and it would become impossible for Mr. Fulton to defeat him at the polls.

Some said that one possible course might be to abstain from approving the U.S. proposal at this time, but to authorize Mr. Fleming to discuss it with Premier Bennett in order to obtain the views of the province. Others said that if the Federal government should now reopen discussions with the province, Premier Bennett would issue misleading statements to the press in order to transfer his present difficulties to the Federal government.

18. The Cabinet agreed to give further consideration, at another meeting, to its policy on the development of the Columbia River.

PROJET NIMBUS (SATELLITES MÉTÉOROLOGIQUES)
PROJECT NIMBUS (WEATHER SATELLITES)

DEA/12798-C-2-40

*Le sous-ministre des Transports

Deputy Minister of Transport to Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs

Ottawa, February 2, 1962

Dear Sir:

U.S. METEOROLOGICAL SATELLITE PROGRAMME
(PROJECT NIMBUS) – CANADIAN PARTICIPATION

You will recall that some months ago, the Deputy Minister of Transport, accompanied by senior officials from the Telecommunications and Meteorological Branches of that Department as well as representatives of the National Research Board and the Defence Research Board, visited Washington for a briefing session with NASA, including discussions on the possible Canadian role in regard to civil use of satellites.

These discussions were followed up further by discussions, on several occasions, between representatives of the two branches of the Department and representatives of NASA and of the U.S. Weather Bureau with reference to both the field of communications and of meteorological satellites. Prospects for useful Canadian participation in regard to the operational meteorological satellite programme, known as Project Nimbus, developed actively. It became apparent that advantages could accrue if a ground station could be located in north-eastern Canada. Indeed, this might not only reduce the total of ground stations required to two, but also provide for better coverage from the Nimbus satellites. Informal indications were that the United States would welcome an offer of Canadian participation on some sort of joint basis in this connection.

The Department of Transport has now received authority to enter into arrangements with the appropriate U.S. agencies, based generally on the idea of Canada sharing in the cost of construction and operation of a ground station in Canada for this programme. The detailed arrangements, when worked out, would be confirmed by exchange of notes either directly between the entities concerned or through diplomatic channels, whichever might be appropriate.

As a next step, we now propose to make a direct approach to the U.S. Weather Bureau and to NASA, outlining our readiness to enter into discussions. For this purpose we would propose to have the Director of the Meteorological Branch send a letter to the U.S. Weather Bureau along the lines of the attached,† with a copy being provided by our Telecommunications Branch to Mr. Frutkin of NASA. We felt that you might wish to inform the Canadian Embassy in Washington of the foregoing situation so that they would be aware of what is proposed. We understand equally that the U.S. Weather Bureau and/or NASA have kept State Department informed in regard to the possible Canadian role and of our intent to approach the working agencies in this connection.

Because of the urgency of the situation, it is planned to have the letter to the U.S. Weather Bureau go forward on February 12th. If the Canadian Embassy has any comment that it wishes to offer in this connection, it would be appreciated if this could be received before that date. There is considerable urgency in regard to the development of the programme.

Yours sincerely,

J.R. BALDWIN

PROJECT NIMBUS

We have been informed by the Deputy Minister of Transport that while the discussions which took place in Washington on March 7-8, and in Montreal on March 20, were most satisfactory in the scientific cooperation and operating phases, NASA representatives did not feel disposed to agree to Canadian participation in engineering and equipment production to the degree that we had hoped would be commensurate with our proposed financial contribution. It will be remembered that participation in a real and important way as a method of entry into this new field by Canada was one of the prime considerations in deciding upon the desirability of financial contribution of some magnitude (up to $4 million capital and up to $800,000 per annum operating expenses. Approximately half the cost of the Canadian station.) It is Department of Transport's understanding that a station in Eastern Canada would greatly enhance the results of the whole U.S. Nimbus Project.

2. It may be that the NASA representatives, while expressing the technical viewpoint of a project team, may not be aware of the general political and economic considerations of mobilization of Western resources, and that an approach to the State Department might assist in bringing these considerations to the fore. It is proposed that this might be done by having Mr. C.M. Brant, Deputy Director, Air Services, visit Washington as soon as this can be arranged. It is proposed that he might accompany one of your officers to the State Department where this question could be discussed and where an aide mémoire or a memorandum based on the following draft could be left:

“Representatives of Canada and the United States have met and have reached a very satisfactory agreement on the scientific cooperation and operational phases and the provision of personnel for operation of a ground read-out station for Project Nimbus in Canada. Difficulty has been encountered in selecting mutually acceptable areas for Canadian participation in the engineering and development of some important part of the station in Canada which would enhance Canada’s knowledge and experience. It was with this kind of participation in mind that Canada proposed to participate in capital expenditures.

It is unfortunate that this attempt to cooperate has occurred at such a late stage of the Nimbus Project, at a time when quite understandably NASA is already well launched on the engineering and design of other portions of the whole Nimbus Project. However, it was for this reason that the proposal for Canadian participation was limited both in area and magnitude so that Canada’s ability to meet both performance and timing requirements would be beyond any reasonable doubt. The Canadian participation as proposed by NASA falls considerably short of Canada’s legitimate national objectives insofar as engineering and production is concerned.

Canada, as a relatively small country and in common with many other medium-sized nations, cannot, at least within the immediate foreseeable future, expect to originate its own space programs. The practical difficulties of international cooperation have to date precluded the effective participation of all but the largest countries in such programs, in spite of the oft expressed objective of accomplishing this kind of cooperation. This situation might well result in a large percentage of the western world’s potential being left undeveloped.

Although there is no doubt concerning the value of the scientific and research phases of a station being established in Canada or of the understanding in these phases reached by our respective delegations, it is the Canadian view that effective cooperation only arises when both parties are contributing in all phases, including the engineering and the development and production of equipment.

Careful examination has been given to the various packages of engineering and production into which the read-out station can be resolved in relation to the timetable as well as the ability of Canadian industry. It is the Canadian view that the data acquisition sub-system, less the antennae, is a package which could be engineered, produced and installed by Canadian resources without any appreciable effect upon the timetable. The value of this package is approximately $3 million of which $2,300,000 would be Canadian content. If the USA position could be adjusted to permit this work to be done in Canada, in addition to that portion already agreed in the discussions, discounting for the moment the uncertainty concerning the radome which is not considered as meeting Canada’s desire to participate in the engineering, an equitable balance would have been reached.

At the same time Canada would be prepared to consider other suggestions which the USA might be able to put forward, aimed at effective cooperation in the development, engineering and production areas, either on this or other related programs. It is obvious that any such alternative task would have to be carefully selected if it were to provide adequate scope for encouraging the development of Canadian engineering and production potentialities.

The acceleration of any agreement which would forward the Nimbus program while at the same time providing a basis for continuing cooperation in the space field, would be appreciated by Canada. It is the Canadian view that a solution in keeping with Canada’s objectives as stated above is both desirable and possible and that early action is in our mutual interests. Canada would welcome informal discussion with USA officials which might serve to clarify any points outstanding and to lead to an early agreement which would be to the mutual benefit of the two countries.”

3. We will appreciate learning as soon as possible whether such a meeting could be set up for Friday or early next week. Timing of the Nimbus Project makes it imperative that the meeting take place as soon as possible.

Aide-mémoire du département d'État des États-Unis
Aide-Mémoire by Department of State of United States

CONFIDENTIAL

Washington, June 4, 1962

The Department of State refers (1) to the technical discussions which were held in Washington and Montreal in early 1962 between representatives of the Canadian Ministry of Transport, the Canadian Defence Production Board, the US National Aeronautics and Space Administration (NASA), and the US Weather Bureau regarding the joint establishment in Canada of a project NIMBUS command and data acquisition station as an essential element of the NIMBUS operational meteorological satellite system, and (2) to the recent conversations on this same matter which were held at the Department of State on May 4 and May 23, 1962 with representatives of the Canadian Embassy and the Canadian Ministry of Transport.

The Department notes that the earlier discussions had resulted in agreement among the technical representatives regarding the scientific and operational aspects of the proposal, but that, subsequent to those discussions, Canadian authorities had concluded that the specific proposals for Canadian participation in the construction of the station did not satisfy the requirement for mobilization of Canadian industrial resources which they had since indicated to be the basis for their offer to allocate up to $4 million for construction of the station and up to $800,000 annually for operating expenses. Canadian representatives stated in their proposal to the Department of State on May 4, 1962 that Canada be assigned the task of developing and constructing the data acquisition subsystem at the station, and requested that NASA be urged to reconsider the earlier proposals so as to permit Canadian participation in this specific task or, as a complete alternative, in some other project which would meet fully Canadian development and engineering objectives.

As stated during the conversation on May 23, 1962, this proposal has been given very careful consideration and with the understanding that the Canadian offer to make a capital investment in the construction of the station was made on the assumption that Canadian participation in the engineering and development phase of the project would be of the sort envisaged in this proposal. The US agencies have concluded that it is not practicable, in connection with the currently planned NIMBUS station in Canada, to proceed on the basis of this proposal.

After careful examination, NASA has concluded that initiation by Canadian firms at this time of both the development and engineering of a major subsystem for the proposed station would entail a delay of at least one year in achieving operational status. This estimate is based upon NASA's extensive experience in the establishment of elaborate data acquisition facilities.

If, as an alternative, NASA were to undertake the assembly of drawings and specifications from US contractors to whom responsibility for the development of major equipments for this and related projects has already been given, in order that a Canadian firm could undertake the fabrication of similar equipments for the Canadian station, it is estimated that there would be a delay of at least six months which might well run into a delay of a full year because of the short work season. In any event, such an alternative arrangement would not afford the engineering and development experience which Canada desires.

In these circumstances the Department and the interested agencies recognize the justification for Canadian capital expenditures will not have been met. Accordingly, the US agencies are prepared to assume full responsibility for all capital expenditures in the establishment of the proposed station and will undertake the maximum procurement of services and components in Canada consistent with technical and schedule requirements. They continue to hope for full participation by Canadian personnel in the operation of the facility. Canadian sharing in the operating costs to the extent which Canada regards as appropriate and feasible would be welcome, but would not be essential.

In addition, NASA has indicated its readiness to examine other future programs with a view to identifying projects in which it might be possible to arrange participation by Canadian industry in development and engineering tasks of the sort desired by Canada in connection with project NIMBUS. NASA is prepared to explore such possibilities mutually with Canadian representatives.

In view of the fact that delay in initiating site development will require that an additional winter season be passed, losing a full year in the operating schedules of the station, and in view of the expressed desire of the UNGA that the operational utility of meteorological satellites be exploited without delay, the US now asks permission to proceed forthwith at its own expense with construction of a NIMBUS station in Canada. In the event of Canadian approval in principle, the US would earnestly hope that the interested agencies could be authorized to proceed with initiation of site development and construction now pending completion of a formal agreement.

It is envisaged, of course, that terms for the construction and operation of the station would be formally expressed in an exchange of notes between the two governments, as supplemented by implementing arrangements between the appropriate agencies.<sup>87</sup>

CANADIAN PARTICIPATION IN PROJECT NIMBUS

11. The Secretary of State for External Affairs referred to a paper prepared by his department and the department of Transport concerning Canadian participation in a project called "Nimbus." The United States had plans to launch artificial satellites designated "Nimbus" for the continuous observation of world-wide meteorological conditions. To realize the full potential of the system, one or two ground stations would be required in Canada. The U.S. had therefore sought Canadian participation in the project. The U.S. would assume full responsibility for capital expenditures and undertake maximum procurement of services and components in Canada consistent with technical and schedule requirements. They also hoped Canadian personnel would participate in the operation of the station, and would leave it to Canada to decide whether it wished to share in the costs of operation.

An explanatory memorandum had been circulated (Joint memorandum, Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Minister of Transport, June 8 – Cab. Doc. 196-62.†)

12. During the discussion the following points were raised,

(a) Some questioned whether it was a good principle to have Americans building and operating an American Nimbus satellite station on Canadian soil. Others said that in the present instance the Americans had offered to operate the station along with Canadians and that, in any case, the station would be subject to control by the Department of Transport.

(b) Some said that the U.S. authorities would not allow Canadian participation or contracts, on the grounds that Canadians were not sufficiently competent for this kind of work. This kind of criticism often seemed to justify their establishing units in Canada for any kind of scientific research. It would be preferable to allow U.S. civilian rather than defence projects, but, in either case, Canada seemed to get only fringe benefits and to lose some of its sovereignty. If the reason for accepting the stations in Canada was for purposes of training Canadians, perhaps an exchange of personnel would be more suitable. Canadians could then be trained in the more advanced research centres in the U.S.

(c) Others said that there was a severe shortage of suitably trained Canadians for such work as this. It would be better to train them here. The only alternative seemed to be to accept the American offer or do nothing. The cost of such research was prohibitive for Canada. It would be a good bargain. Canada had already made a start in space research, with some manufacturing being done in Canada.

13. The Cabinet agreed that the United States Government be informed of Canada's willingness to conclude a formal agreement with the United States for the location, construction, equipping and operation of a read-out station for use in the artificial satellite project known as Nimbus, in accordance with the provisions recommended in the joint memorandum of the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Minister of Transport of June 8th (Cab. Doc. 196-62).<sup>88</sup>

GUT DAM CLAIMS

At the request of the Minister, the Interdepartmental Group on Gut Dam Claims met recently to study developments in this matter since its memorandum of August 2 last to the Cabinet Committee on these claims. In its memorandum, the group recommended as a majority view that Canada had a commitment to provide a forum in which these claims could be heard and disposed of on a substantive basis and that, therefore, negotiations should be resumed with the USA for the purpose of establishing, by international agreement, an international tribunal to hear and dispose of the claims. However, the Minister decided not to submit this memorandum to his colleagues of the Cabinet Committee on Gut Dam Claims, although he did not object to it being circulated to departments of government concerned.

2. Since then the USA Embassy has on a number of occasions made inquiries concerning the status of this matter, the latest by Mr. Merchant in the course of a call on the Minister on April 3. The Minister, in reply, stated that the matter was still being examined interdepartmentally. At its meeting the Interdepartmental Group considered these various inquiries from the USA Embassy and examined also the possible implications of Bill S.2978<sup>89</sup> introduced by Senator Keating, representative of New York on March 13 and which has since been referred to the committee on the judiciary. You may recall that the intent of this bill is to authorize the Foreign Claims Settlement Commission of the US to investigate the Gut Dam claims and to submit a detailed report on each of them to the President for such action as he may deem appropriate. We understand that a bill along similar lines might be introduced in the House of representatives by Congressman Ostertag, also a Republican of the State of New York.

3. The Interdepartmental Group agreed that this development should be brought to the attention of the Cabinet Committee for the following reasons: (1) It might arouse anti-Canadian sentiment in Congress with damaging results for Canada since, if information available here is correct, the Foreign Claims Settlement Commission is generally concerned with claims of United States citizens and corporations resulting from arbitrary decisions of foreign governments. (2) A determination of the amount of the claims by the Foreign Claims Settlement Commission is likely to bind the Administration, thus leaving no freedom of manoeuvre to the State Department in their dealings with us. (3) The United States claimants would be in a position to put their own interpretation of the facts before the Commission without the Canadian Government being able to question that interpretation. However the view was also put forward at the meeting that a reference of these claims to the Foreign Claims Settlement Commission could possibly be to our advantage in that it would provide a forum in the United States where their validity could be assessed without any intervention or commitment on our part. It was readily recognized at the same time that any advantage so gained might prove detrimental in the possible event that the Commission made a decision which would be unfavourable to Canadian interests.

4. So that the recommendations of the Interdepartmental Group to the Cabinet Committee on Gut Dam Claims might be as authoritative as possible, it was agreed that we would submit to you for an assessment the following questions:

(a) Is the discussion of this bill in the U.S. Congress liable to trigger any serious anti-Canadian bias which might impair relations between Canada and the U.S.A.?

(b) If so can the effect be assessed and in that event what would be the nature of the injury that Canada might suffer?

(c) What is the likelihood of Bill S.2978 (or any other similar bill that may have been introduced since in the House of Representatives) being passed by Congress at its present session and becoming law?

(d) On the basis of its past record, composition and rules of procedure, is the Foreign Claims Settlement Commission an impartial quasi-judicial body from which we could expect a serious and objective examination of the Gut Dam claims?

5. The importance of this last question is paramount. Although we would not be bound by the Commission's recommendations, the State Department would probably not be in a position to negotiate on any other terms than those set by the Commission in its report to the President. If the Commission has very strict standards, chances are that our contention (which apparently is shared by the U.S.A. Corps of Engineers) that these claims are frivolous would be confirmed by an independent United States agency without any intervention on our part. On the other hand, if the Commission cannot be relied upon to bring forward equitable findings, some means would need to be found to protect Canadian interests in this matter.

6. We realize that it might be difficult to provide a definite reply to these questions. However, your considered assessment would be of great help to us in formulating recommendations to the Minister and to the Cabinet Committee on Gut Dam Claims.

GUT DAM CLAIMS

Thank you for providing background information to the questions raised in your reference telegram on which you requested our assessment. We have given this matter a good deal of thought and have discussed the general question informally with USA officials in an attempt to provide you with helpful comments. We will be forwarding a fuller report later this week together with some material we have collected on the Foreign Claims Settlement Commission, but in the meantime, the following summary may be of some assistance.

2. It is the general view of officials here that Senator Keating's bill (of which an identical companion bill has been introduced in the House by Congressman Ostertag) is a serious submission which if pressed would undoubtedly pass through Congress. The main uncertainty as to its passage is with regard to the pressure of business since private bills of this kind are normally passed in the dying days of the Congressional Session. Senator Keating is an influential and respected member of Congress and, although a Republican, is on close terms with the President. In any event, the bill is essentially non-controversial and should not repeat not give rise to any opposition in Congress.

3. At the same time, the Administration we understand has so far seen no repeat no grounds for opposing the bill and although the Bureau of the Budget has the final say in these matters, the Department of State and the Department of Justice have not repeat not opposed its passage.

4. Discussion of the bill either in Committee or in Congress would not repeat not in itself, we think, give rise to acrimonious debate since there would likely be little or no repeat no opposition to it, but congressmen in an election year might be expected to use the opportunity of a debate to further their campaigns in areas bordering the Great Lakes, particularly in the upper New York State. It is difficult to indicate the effect that any such discussion might have on Canada-USA relations but we would expect that some members of Congress would go a good deal further in their remarks than did Senator Keating in the short speech he made upon introducing the bill.

5. So far as the nature of the injury that Canada might suffer from any serious anti-Canadian bias in the course of congressional discussion, we would expect the main burden of congressional criticism would be directed towards the time that had elapsed since these questions were first raised with Canadian Government. Some of this criticism would also undoubtedly be directed toward the Department of State. At the same time we cannot repeat not rule out the possibility that with mid-term elections in prospect rather more might be made of "frustrations" of the damaged parties and the inability to reach a settlement with Canada. On the whole, however, we do not repeat not think that the effect on Canada-USA relations would be either serious or lasting. Although a congressional debate would raise this issue in a national forum, we doubt that it would create much interest outside [New York] State.

6. From all that we have been able to learn, it would seem that the Foreign Claims Settlement Commission enjoys a high reputation as an impartial quasi-judicial body. Certainly the present

Chairman of the Commission is held in very high regard as a lawyer with national and international reputation and a considerable background in the field of international claims settlement. In the past, the Commission had apparently been used as a means of political patronage but the general consensus of opinion is that the present commissioners are qualified for their tasks.

7. We were able to sound out Spangler, Assistant Legal Adviser for International Claims, State Department, on this point and it was his judgement that it could be expected that the Commissioner would make a serious and objective examination of the Gut Dam claims.

8. Spangler, who has been concerned with the Gut Dam claims question for some years, gave it as his view that the Commission would adopt very strict standards although he intimated that they might be expected on the whole to err, if at all, on the generous side. At least in part they would be influenced by the length of time that had passed since the damages were sustained and the not repeat not inconsiderable expense that the parties had incurred over the years. He agreed that State Department's area of manoeuvrability would to some extent be circumscribed by the Commission's recommendations to the President.

9. It was Spangler's personal view, which he implied was widely held in the Administration, that it might, in the circumstances, be to Canada's advantage to seek means to reach a settlement of this question before the Commission became involved. He is recommending that the bill be amended so as to make it possible for the Commission to suspend its studies should agreement be reached between the two governments on a negotiated settlement. Spangler emphasized to us the seriousness with which the State Department viewed this question and intimated that perhaps this had not repeat not been sufficiently stressed in the past.

Ottawa, December 5, 1962

CONFIDENTIAL

REPORT OF CABINET COMMITTEE ON GUT DAM CLAIMS

On March 29, 1960, the Cabinet directed that efforts be made to persuade the United States Government to drop its espousal of claims against Canada by certain U.S. residents arising from property damage on the south shore of Lake Ontario in 1951 and 1952. The owners had claimed that their properties had been damaged because of high water levels, which they attributed to the construction by the Canadian Government at the beginning of the century of a small navigation improvement known as the Gut Dam in the international section of the river. The claimants took their dispute before courts in the United States where Canada pleaded sovereign immunity, and the actions were rejected on procedural grounds. Since 1952 intergovernmental negotiations have been in progress. The claims originally exceeded $50 million, but the U.S. indicated informally in 1959 that the claimants would compromise for $875,000.

Officials have not been able to persuade the U.S. authorities to drop their espousal of the claims, and indeed the U.S. is pressing for an early settlement or for the establishment of an international Gut Dam tribunal to deal with the claims on their merits. The U.S. Government has made it clear that it is not asserting a view that Canada is under an obligation to pay the claims; it does assert, however, on the basis of the U.S.-Canadian agreement pursuant to which Gut Dam was constructed in 1903-4, that Canada is under an obligation, failing a settlement, to provide a suitable forum in which the claims can be disposed of on their merits.

Meanwhile this summer an Act of Congress was passed authorizing the U.S. Foreign Claims Settlement Commission to examine the claims and report on each of them to the President. The U.S. State Department has stated to the Canadian Embassy that it would be to Canada's advantage to settle the problem before the Commission goes far with its work. The U.S. statute provides for suspension of the Commission's studies if agreement should be reached between the two governments on a settlement.

The Cabinet Committee has reviewed the report of officials on this subject, and is submitting the alternatives to the Cabinet without recommendation. The choice appears to lie between the following courses:

A. Settlement on a Lump Sum Basis. This would be a speedy solution, and would cost little, but it would virtually admit liability without proof of damage, and it would constitute a very dangerous precedent for future claims of this nature. In stating that a dangerous precedent would be created, regard is being had in particular to the fact that the levels of boundary waters are progressively being made subject more and more to the influence of artificial operations, thereby providing a much broader basis for making claims for alleged damages.

B. Denial of Liability and Refusal of a Special Forum. This alternative allows for consideration of the claims in the Canadian courts in the usual way. It guarantees that Canadian law would apply to any such proceedings both from a procedural and a substantive standpoint, in place of whatever alternative basis of law might be adopted were the claims to be heard and disposed of by an international tribunal. Moreover, the Minister of Justice has expressed the view that on the basis of Canadian law, Canada is under no liability in respect to these claims.

On the other hand, the adoption of this alternative would involve declining to take any step to meet the request of the United States Government. If these claims were to be considered in the Canadian courts in the usual way, it appears more than probable that they would be barred on procedural grounds without the claimants having the opportunity to obtain a hearing on their merits even according to Canadian law.

It is very difficult to assess what effect the adoption of this alternative would have on United States-Canadian relations generally. It cannot be assumed that the United States administration would be prepared simply to accept such a decision without doing something about it, having in mind in particular pressure that is likely to be brought to bear through Congressional channels. Also, the President would be faced with the problem of how to implement any recommendation from the Foreign Claims Settlement Commission which might at least in part support the Gut Dam claimants' position. Furthermore, Canada would be embarrassed were it required to have to respond to any recommendation adverse to Canadian interests transmitted through the President of the United States.

Moreover, a decision of this kind could be interpreted as a flat refusal to arbitrate in any manner whatsoever a question which is in danger of being characterized as a dispute between the governments of the two nations. This in turn would certainly tend to reflect adversely the image that Canada has been at pains to create in its international relations that it stands for the settlement of all disputes through arbitration machinery appropriate for the occasion. Attention is particularly drawn in this connection to the recent Cabinet decision calling for Canada to file a new declaration with the Secretary General binding Canada to accept the compulsory jurisdiction of the International Court of Justice without reservations.<sup>90</sup>

It should be further noted that the adoption of this alternative is inconsistent with the previous position taken by the Government of Canada. In 1952 and 1953 the Government of Canada announced that it stood ready to compensate United States citizens for any damage directly attributable to the Gut Dam and that it was prepared to co-operate in the adjudication of these claims by an international tribunal.<sup>91</sup>

C. Agreement to Creation of an International Gut Dam Tribunal. The tribunal would have jurisdiction to hear and deal with all aspects of the claims on their merits including making an assessment as to the amount of damages payable, if any, in each case. This course would immediately relieve the pressure from the U.S., and would lead to suspension of the examination of the claims by the Foreign Claims Settlement Commission. It would demonstrate Canada's willingness to settle international claims through arbitration machinery. On the other hand, it would involve surrender of part of Canada's very strong procedural and substantive defences. In addition to granting a tribunal, it could be regarded as granting a cause of action where none exists under Canadian law.

D. Establish an International Tribunal Limited to Determining Purely Questions of Law. Such a tribunal would not be concerned with determining the causes nor the quantum of the damages, but only with the question whether the international agreements and other relevant documents place any unconditional obligation upon Canada to pay damages for the operation of Gut Dam. This course would go at least part way to satisfy the U.S. request.

E. Reference of the Questions of Law to the Supreme Court of Canada to determine whether the documents, when interpreted under the laws of Canada, impose an obligation upon Canada to pay damages for the operation of Gut Dam. This course might show Canada's desire to respond to the U.S. request. On the other hand, it would not avert the serious dilemma that could arise if the Foreign Claims Settlement Commission should render an opinion that would be inconsistent with the judgment of the Supreme Court.

One position repeatedly advanced during the discussions in the Cabinet Committee was that the Government of Canada should not respond favourably to the United States Government's representations in regard to the Gut Dam claims unless a failure to do so would work to the detriment of maintaining good Canada-United States relations.

GUT DAM CLAIMS; REPORT OF CABINET COMMITTEE

7. The Minister of Justice said that Canada had constructed the Gut Dam on the St. Lawrence River at the beginning of this century. It had been alleged by property owners on the south shore of Lake Ontario that this dam was the cause of high water levels which had caused damage to their property. They had tried unsuccessfully to sue the Canadian government in the U.S. courts. They had also brought strong pressures to bear on the State Department in Washington with a view to having their claims settled.

Inter-governmental negotiations had been in progress since 1952. The claims had originally exceeded $50 million but the State Department indicated informally in 1959 that they might be settled for about $875,000.

In 1962 an Act of Congress was passed authorizing the U.S. Foreign Claims Settlement Commission to examine the claims and report on each of them to the President. The State Department had indicated that it would be to Canada's advantage to arrange a settlement before the Commission proceeded very far with examination of these claims. The Chairman of the Canadian Section of the International Joint Commission also took the view that the claims could be settled quickly.

The Minister went on to say if the Canadian government were to admit responsibility for damage caused by these water levels, other claims would undoubtedly be lodged against the government. The view of the Department of Justice was that the claims are not justified. The dam was constructed under an agreement between the two governments. Provision was made for compensation to property owners on a particular island. One claim was made and this was duly settled. In the view of the Department of Justice, that was the end of the matter.

The Cabinet Committee had met from time to time to consider ways of removing this troublesome feature in the relations between Canada and the United States. The Committee had submitted the following alternatives but without making a recommendation,

- A. Settlement on a lump sum basis.
- B. Denial of liability and refusal of a special forum.
- C. Agreement to creation of an international Gut Dam Tribunal.
- D. Establish an international tribunal limited to determining purely questions of law.
- E. Reference of the questions of law to the Supreme Court of Canada.

An explanatory memorandum had been circulated (Memorandum, Chairman, Cabinet Committee on Gut Dam Claims, Dec. 5, 1962 – Cab. Doc. 414-62).

8. Mr. Fleming said there was no reason why this government should give up a clear immunity which it now enjoys with respect to these claims.

9. During the discussion some said that since there was no court to which the claimants might appeal, a good compromise settlement could be provided by alternative C, an agreement to create an international Gut Dam tribunal. Others said this would be cumbersome technically and would create widespread and possibly undesirable publicity. Moreover, if the claims were admitted, other claims would shortly arise around the Great Lakes system. The western end of Lake Ontario, it was said, was sinking and the consequences of this might cause property damage.

10. The Cabinet agreed that no action be taken for the time being on the report of the Cabinet Committee on Gut Dam Claims.

CONFIDENTIAL

MICHIGAN DIVERSIONS

Peter Pfund called me this morning to confirm the points on which we would like information or views in connection with this question. He said that the United States Solicitor General would be opening his case before the Special Master on March 18, 1963. As to United States views on various questions we had raised informally with the State Department about Canadian tactics (on the basis of External telegram X-7 of January 18†) I confirmed that

(a) We would like to know as much as possible about the position the United States intended to take before the Special Master, and that we hoped the United States would be able to endorse our position as much as possible and avoid any major conflict with our views.

(b) Since the Canadian Parliament would not be in session prior to March 18, it would be unnecessary to assess the Special Master's or the Supreme Court's possible reaction to a statement in the House of Commons.

(c) We would, however, wish to know about the possibility and desirability of a Canadian intervention amicus curiae before the Special Master or the Supreme Court.

2. Pfund said that State Department officials would be consulting with the Solicitor General's office on February 21. He hoped to be able to phone us immediately afterwards to suggest a time for consultations between State Department officials and representatives of this Embassy. He hoped this would be on February 25 or 26. I agreed to try to reserve time on both afternoons for this purpose.

3. In the course of subsequent discussion Pfund outlined preliminary State Department thinking as follows:

(a) The general United States objective would probably be to avoid a decision by the Special Master that would involve a determination of international legal issues arising out of treaties and agreements relating to boundary waters. Speaking frankly he said that, as we knew, the United States and Canadian interpretations of the legal effect of these agreements differed. He thought the Solicitor General would hope to skirt this question entirely.

(b) The United States Solicitor General's presentation would, therefore, probably be simply to place before the Special Master this Embassy's Note of November 2, 1961, together with the State Department's letter of transmission to the Special Master and copies of the international treaties and agreements cited in the Canadian Note. The basis for having these documents received in evidence (they had already been passed to the Special Master, but were, as he put it, "in limbo") would be to draw attention to the importance of "maintenance of friendly relations with Canada."

(c) The Solicitor General would probably, however, take any necessary action to head off an assumption by the Special Master that the United States Government was putting in issue the legal implications of the treaties and agreements referred to.

(d) It was not yet clear to Pfund, however, what the Solicitor General might do to prevent any such assumption. The Solicitor General could simply introduce the evidentiary material, refer to the maintenance of friendly relations with Canada and then let the documents speak for themselves. Alternatively the Solicitor General could state positively that he did not intend the Special Master to take into account the international legal implications of the treaties and agreements.

(e) There was also the question of how to deal with the intention of the Attorneys-General of Minnesota, Wisconsin, Michigan and Ohio to submit voluminous material concerning the international interests involved in the diversions. Pfund thought that the first effort of the Administration would be to try to persuade these representatives not to submit the material in question. If these efforts were unsuccessful then it might become necessary for the Solicitor General to argue that the material proposed for inclusion was irrelevant to a determination of the issues before the Special Master, except insofar as they represented evidence related to the maintenance of friendly relations with Canada.

(f) It was also possible that, anticipating the submission by the four attorneys-general, the Solicitor General might find it necessary at the time of making his own submission to argue against the relevance of his own evidentiary material or analogous material except to the question of maintenance of friendly relations with Canada.

(g) In general, therefore, Pfund thought that there was a chance that the Special Master would determine the issues involved on the basis of a general theory of "equitable apportionment" among the United States riparian states and that this would effectively protect Canadian interests. He could not at the present stage give even an educated guess as to how great this prospect was. However, he thought it was in the common interest of our two governments to see whether the Special Master took his decision on this basis or on this basis plus consideration of maintenance of friendly relations with Canada; and to avoid disclosing our different positions in regard to the international legal questions posed by the various relevant treaties.

4. I asked Pfund whether the Special Master would be bound under his terms of reference to take judicial notice of the existence of these treaties and to take them into account in determining the outcome of the issues before him. Pfund was inclined to think that the Special Master could take judicial notice of the treaties. However, it was unclear whether he would be fully obliged to apply them as regards their legal effect (as opposed to their effect as evidence relating to maintenance of friendly relations with Canada), unless either the United States or the Canadian Government requested him to do so. It was also unclear whether any of the states could insist on his examining the legal implications of the treaties. There were some authorities that could be cited against the existence of any right in the parties (other than governments) to assert the legal effect of the treaties. He referred me in particular to Shiriot v. Florida 313 US69 (1941) in which the state of Florida successfully challenged appellant's argument that Florida regulations prohibiting sponge fishing could not be applied outside the territorial waters of the state of Florida because these were coincident with United States territorial waters and extraterritorial effect could not be given to these regulations. The Supreme Court apparently held that such an assertion would not lie in the mouth of private individuals but only third parties, being governments whose interest might be adversely affected if such regulations were applied against them or their nationals.

5. I also asked Pfund to explore whether the Canadian Government could be assured of an opportunity to intervene amicus before the Supreme Court in the event that the Special Master's report were not satisfactory from the point of view of protecting Canadian interests. In other words, if we adopted the same attitude as the United States Government and decided to await the outcome of the Special Master's findings before getting into the international legal implications of the various treaties, would we thereby be estopped from a later intervention amicus? Pfund said that at the moment his understanding was that the Canadian Government could intervene at either or both stages, but he hoped to obtain further enlightenment during the talks with the Solicitor General on February 21.

MEETING OF COMMONWEALTH PRIME MINISTERS

The Prime Minister would be grateful if you would convey the following message to Prime Minister Macmillan. Text Begins.

At the conclusion of the talks we had in Ottawa earlier this year with the Lord Privy Seal,<sup>1</sup> it was agreed that when the discussions with the EEC regarding Britain's application for membership had advanced further it might be desirable to examine what additional arrangements for consultation with Commonwealth countries would be necessary. It seems to me that the time may have come to give these arrangements further thought.

Canadian representatives in London and Brussels have been in close touch with those responsible for the British side in the negotiations with the EEC. We have cooperated with your delegation in Brussels by providing complete information on all aspects of Canadian trade interests relevant to your negotiations. We value these exchanges. However, the implications for the Commonwealth of Britain's membership in the EEC are so great that it is my view that a meeting of Commonwealth Prime Ministers should be held before a final decision is reached. I was pleased to note the indication you gave on February 6 in the British House of Commons that you would welcome a conference if Commonwealth countries thought it desirable. We have also had indications from a number of Commonwealth countries that such a proposal would be well received and I hope it will commend itself to you.

I look forward very much to reviewing these matters with you at the end of April.

[London], March 30, 1962

My colleagues and I have been giving a good deal of thought in the light of what is happening in the Brussels negotiations to the question when it will be most useful and convenient to arrange for collective consultation with the Commonwealth by means of a meeting of Prime Ministers on the major issues involved. I would like to take this opportunity of letting you know how we see the position.

2. My first thought was to suggest such a meeting some time during the next two or three months. But after reviewing the position I have come to the conclusion that if, as I understand it, the purpose of our meeting is to consider together the pattern which is emerging from the negotiations, a meeting at a somewhat later date would be more useful. Those negotiations have hitherto been largely confined to what may be called the essential ground work. They will now enter a new stage in that in the months immediately ahead, both sides will get to grips with the discussion of the main issues which are at the core of the negotiations – the nature and extent of the special arrangements which we must seek in respect of Commonwealth trade and on behalf of certain United Kingdom interests (mainly agriculture). Our expectation is that it will not be before the end of July or middle of August that we shall be able to see clearly the general nature of the arrangements which we should be able to secure and thus be in a position to make a broad judgment on whether or not an acceptable agreement is in sight.

3. If the momentum of the negotiations is not to be lost we should, I think, aim to hold our Commonwealth meeting as soon as practicable thereafter. Accordingly I would suggest that we might plan for a week's meeting in London beginning on say the 10th September. Although the formal business of the meeting would be mainly concerned with the subject of our relations with the EEC, Commonwealth Prime Ministers would no doubt wish to take this opportunity to discuss together the world situation.

4. No doubt on this occasion my colleagues might like to bring with them their Finance or Trade Ministers. In that case it might be convenient to regard the meeting as replacing the meeting of Commonwealth Finance Ministers which normally takes place at that time of the year.

5. It would be very helpful to us if you could let me know whether you agree that a Prime Ministers' meeting for this purpose is desirable and if so whether you could manage the date I have suggested. I realise how difficult it is to arrive at a date which is convenient for us all, but I would hope that given the great significance of the matters which we shall have to discuss and the importance of getting the right timing in relation to the Brussels negotiations, a meeting in early September will prove possible.

6. I shall probably be announcing in Parliament next week that I am proposing to other Commonwealth Prime Ministers that a meeting should be convened for this purpose later in the year.

7. We are very grateful to Commonwealth Governments for all the help which they have given us in the consultations which have taken place during the period since the Brussels negotiations began (and indeed before they began). It will of course be our purpose to continue those consultations as fully as possible during the months of intensified negotiations which lie ahead. It may well be that we ought to think of new ways in which to improve our methods of consultation during this period. My colleagues and I would welcome any suggestions which Commonwealth Governments may care to put forward to this end. For instance, it might well be desirable to arrange for more frequent bilateral discussions at the Ministerial level by means of ad hoc visits either of Commonwealth Ministers to London (Mr. McEwen's present visit is a most helpful case in point) or of a United Kingdom Minister to Commonwealth countries (like the Lord Privy Seal's recent visit to Ottawa). The point which I wish to emphasise is that we here will be very willing to do whatever we can to improvise during this 'intermediate' phase whatever revised arrangements may be thought desirable to facilitate the fullest possible consultation with Commonwealth Governments without sacrificing the important time element in the Brussels negotiations.

GHANA AND COMMONWEALTH

In anticipation of Commonwealth Prime Ministers' meeting President Nkrumah now seems to be thinking seriously about whether Ghana should stay in Commonwealth. His thinking is undoubtedly based on the supposition that Britain has definitely decided to join EEC. There is very real possibility that he will make such a British decision the occasion for Ghana to leave Commonwealth. As matters stand now it is virtually certain that he will consider unacceptable each and any arrangement for Commonwealth countries negotiated by Britain with EEC. I have recently witnessed the vigorous and outright rejection of British High Commissioner's latest brief for the Common Market by Dei Anang, the President's closest adviser on international affairs. Conceivably Ghana might threaten to leave Commonwealth as a bluff to stir up pro-Commonwealth and anti-European sentiment in Britain and thus force the British Government to stay out of EEC. But this is probably too subtle a manoeuvre for Ghana. I am afraid that Dr. Nkrumah has made up his mind that the Common Market is a neo-imperialist conspiracy and that Britain's application to join is in a class with what he thinks of as British policy in Katanga, Rhodesia and Angola.

2. I do not repeat not want to be alarmist but the consequences of Ghana's departure from Commonwealth could be disastrous. Ghana might well be followed out by Tanganyika, in which case Kenya probably would not repeat not join at all. Nigeria and even Sierra Leone would come under serious domestic pressure to follow suit. The loss of its African members would be a grievous blow to the continued existence of Commonwealth and to its utility.

3. You know that President Nkrumah's attitude toward Commonwealth has always been ambivalent. I am convinced that now is the time to try to influence his thinking and that Mr. Diefenbaker is perhaps the only person at this time to whom he will listen on this subject. I urge that you give careful thought to recommending that Prime Minister write to Dr. Nkrumah about the future of Commonwealth, to begin with seeking his views. In response to these our own case could be put. In my Letter 195 April 18† I pointed out the essential weakness of the anglocentric concept of Commonwealth now that Britain is turning toward Europe. If we want the Commonwealth to survive in a multiracial form it is, I think, up to Canada to bring it home at least to Ghana that there is more to Commonwealth than simply British connection. We must also remind President Nkrumah that his African associations need not repeat not conflict with Commonwealth membership. This needs saying because I think he is being told, particularly by his Arab friends, that they do. Nor should we neglect the positive aspect that Commonwealth membership is a means by which access can be had to the thinking of leaders on every continent.

4. I realize that because of the election Prime Minister will be much preoccupied. I hope he would agree, however, that the importance of the issue justifies special consideration.

GHANA AND COMMONWEALTH: DRAFT LETTER,
PRIME MINISTER TO PRESIDENT

In Accra telegrams 175 and 176† of May 2, Bruce Williams discussed President Nkrumah's uncertainties about Ghana's remaining in the Commonwealth, particularly in the light of the possibility of Britain's entry into the E.E.C. He suggested that a message from our Prime Minister to President Nkrumah might have a salutary effect at this time.

2. The Prime Minister was apparently interested enough in Mr. Williams' suggestions to indicate that he would wish to write to Dr. Nkrumah but in more general terms than Accra indicated.

3. I attach a draft letter† for your consideration. It is the product of consultation with Basil Robinson, Economic Division and African and Middle Eastern Division.

4. In an earlier draft we had suggested attaching the text of the Prime Minister's address to the Royal Commonwealth Society in Toronto<sup>2</sup> to the letter. On second thought, however, it might be more attractive to have the High Commissioner hand this text over. It would also give him an excuse to see Dr. Nkrumah personally.

5. Some thought was given to sending this message by telegram for delivery by Mr. Williams. On balance, however, it would seem more personal and relaxed to have a signed letter go forward by bag. We would let Accra know by telegram that it was coming.

6. Mr. Robinson hopes we might be able to process this draft today for presentation to the Prime Minister tomorrow.

Ottawa, May 14, 1962

My dear Mr. President,

Now that a date has been set for the next meeting of Heads of Commonwealth Governments, I have been giving thought, as I am sure you have, to the course the discussions will follow and the range of topics which we might profitably consider. While there are many important international matters which it would be valuable to talk over, I believe that undoubtedly the subject of greatest importance and concern at this meeting will be the possibility of Britain's entry into the European Economic Community and its implications for the Commonwealth. In the light of this problem I have been devoting a good deal of thought to the future of the Commonwealth and have been thinking of how it may develop, what character it should take on as its membership grows and how we may be able to direct and strengthen it so that it will continue and increase its power for good in the world. In this connection, I am asking the High Commissioner to provide you with a copy of notes for an address I gave recently which sets out some of my ideas on the significance of the Commonwealth and the lines along which it might develop.

I know that you must have been giving serious thought to these problems. At the moment the picture is not too clear. However, as negotiations in Brussels progress and as arrangements for the Commonwealth meeting become firmer, I see merit in our exchanging views. It would be of particular interest to me to learn of any ideas you have for the Commonwealth's future.

I am much looking forward to seeing you again in September and resuming personal discussions with you.

Yours sincerely,

COMMONWEALTH PRIME MINISTERS' MEETING

Prime Minister Macmillan's Private Secretary for Overseas Affairs, de Zulueta, in recent luncheon conversation speculated regarding handling of Common Market problem at Commonwealth Prime Ministers' meeting. To begin with, he said that there was a possibility that negotiations with the Six would not repeat not have reached a stage that would enable British Government to present Commonwealth Prime Ministers with outline of terms of a possible agreement with Six. He did not repeat not suggest what Prime Ministers might discuss in these circumstances.

2. Continuing, he said that it was also possible that British Government would have concluded that it would not repeat not be possible to reach an agreement with Six that it could recommend to its Commonwealth partners: in other words, the deal would be off. In these circumstances the conference might discuss "Where do we go from here?"

3. De Zulueta then said that the possibility that would be most likely, in his view, was that the outline of a possible agreement with Six would be presented. In this case he thought it unrealistic to expect that Prime Ministers of other Commonwealth countries would be able to express positive approval. The best that Britain might hope for was more or less grudging consent to Britain's entry into agreement with Six. He then went on to say that Commonwealth Prime Ministers might in some way indicate that Britain's entry into EEC would be tolerable if proposed terms could be improved in certain respects. British Government might then go back to Six, say that in light of Commonwealth reactions they would have great difficulty in persuading Parliament to accept the terms tentatively agreed upon, and ask that they be improved. The advantages of such a development would be that Commonwealth countries would not repeat not be presented with a fait accompli; the greatest possible pressure would be exerted on the Six for better terms; and better terms might very well be obtained.

4. In the course of conversation, de Zulueta said that he thought British Government would have to make plain to Commonwealth partners that it was seeking their views on a proposed line of action but that in the end British Government would have to take its final decision in light of comments of Commonwealth Prime Ministers: the Commonwealth countries would not repeat not be able to veto action by British Government.

5. De Zulueta echoed Garner's suggestion that it might be found [desirable] for the conference to break up into committees for detailed discussions on such problems as temperate foodstuffs, tropical products, etc. (see paragraph 4 of reference telegram). One objection to such a procedure was that the conference would in effect break up into racial blocs.

6. Anticipating that the forthcoming conference would be a very difficult one, de Zulueta agreed that there was some possibility that some Commonwealth countries particularly African ones might withdraw from Commonwealth; Ghana might, for instance, start an unravelling process. This prospect did not repeat not seem to perturb him in the least: in fact, he said that it might not repeat not be a bad idea if some of the new members were to withdraw.

7. The opinions expressed by de Zulueta were presumably personal. We think it significant, however, that a man in his position should express them.

Accra, July, 1962

My dear Prime Minister,

I am writing to acknowledge receipt of your letter of the 14th May, 1962, regarding the next meeting of Commonwealth Prime Ministers. I also thank you for the copy of the notes on your address which sets out some of your own ideas on the significance of the Commonwealth and the lines along which it might develop in future.

I need not bother you much, at this stage, with my own ideas on the Commonwealth which, as you know, are almost identical with yours. For this reason, I have found your address not only interesting, but also illuminating. I am happy that you share the same fears about the future role of the Commonwealth as I do, and with this as a basis, I am sure we can find a common solution when we meet next.

I have for some time now been thinking of the repercussions on the Commonwealth of Britain participating in the European Economic Community, the inter-racial question in the Rhodesias, Kenya and Tanganyika and the advisability of a Commonwealth stand on the major issue of disarmament.

These are the main points which have engaged my attention recently, and I hope to be able to send you some notes on my ideas regarding them in the near future, when I also hope to touch on the other aspects you referred to in your address.

Yours sincerely,

COMMONWEALTH PRIME MINISTERS' CONFERENCE;
PROCEDURAL QUESTIONS

As a result of a number of telegrams that we have received in recent weeks from London, it now appears that it is desirable to formulate at least preliminary views on several points relating to the agenda and procedure of the meeting.

In regard to agenda, the United Kingdom are assuming that Prime Ministers will wish to discuss mainly the proposed terms of Britain's entering the EEC and the problems it raises, but also international affairs in general and the entrance of Uganda to the Commonwealth.

The entrance of Uganda should not occasion much discussion and seems to present no problem in finding room on the agenda. The discussion of international affairs in the growing group could take any amount of time that Prime Ministers wish to devote to it and I would think it desirable to postpone it until after the United Kingdom – EEC matter has been pretty largely disposed of. This would mean commencing with this latter item and then going on to Uganda, say, and then the international situation. I would suggest we tell Mr. Drew that this would be your preference.

In regard to programme, the British are suggesting that the first week be primarily devoted to the Common Market problem, opening with a discussion, with the Prime Ministers only at the table, of the political implications and following with discussions of economic implications, first in general sessions and then possibly in groups dealing with particular subjects, such as the temperate agricultural products, low cost manufactures, possible association of African territories, etc.

I would suggest that we might reasonably agree to this general arrangement. There will be problems arising out of division into groups but I do not see that we should have particular objections to them. Moreover, it seems to me tactically desirable that we should be as agreeable as possible on these procedural matters and save our comments for the matters of substance.

The United Kingdom have also suggested that the Secretary of State, as he now is, for Commonwealth Relations and Colonies might have colonial representatives present to speak if called upon in the discussion of the economic implications. It seems to me it would be better that this would be limited to the group or committee meetings rather than the plenary sessions. I think this is primarily desirable because of the possible effect on the Asiatic and African members who are jealous of their independence. Sandys should be able to speak to the problems relating to the colonies from the vantage point of his rather ambiguous position now.

Sir Norman Brook has suggested it might be desirable not to have a communiqué. I think he has this in mind not only because of the substantial division of opinion and the danger of having to record a lot of dissenting opinions, but also with the increasing number of Prime Ministers it will get progressively more difficult to reach agreement on anything worth saying in the communiqué.

I think it would be undesirable to make such a serious break with tradition as to have no communiqué at this conference and this might be twisted in Parliament here and in other circles to suggest that there was so much disagreement that no communiqué was possible.<sup>3</sup> On the other hand, there is something in Brook's view. I would therefore suggest that it be decided and announced at the beginning that the communiqué will be short and factual without containing expression of views on the matters of substance to be discussed and that this is being done to save time for the substantive discussions and to avoid the expenditure of time and effort on the part of Prime Ministers that would be necessary to reach agreed phraseology on matters that inevitably involve considerable divergence of view at this time. I think this would create a situation that makes it more difficult to attack and easier to defend.<sup>4</sup>

P.M. not sure. Don't bind ourselves. [R.B. Bryce]

In general, of course, there is some suggestion that the conference may have to be postponed because the British will not have concluded their negotiations with the Europeans nor carried them far enough to be able to outline all the matters of importance to Commonwealth countries. While we will know more about this in another two or three days following the present Ministerial meetings, I would suggest as a preliminary view that it is better not to postpone the conference but to go ahead and have the talks at this time despite the lack of some important details. Indeed, we might capitalize on this situation to put forward the view which has been outlined in a paper from External Affairs† that these negotiations over the terms of entry should be combined now with trade negotiations in which the United States, EEC, Commonwealth members of GATT and others would be involved, taking advantage of the new U.S. trade legislation and endeavouring to solve by multilateral negotiation some of the problems that are inevitable if and when the United Kingdom enters the Common Market.

LETTER NO. 503

New Delhi, August 6, 1962

COMMONWEALTH PRIME MINISTERS' CONFERENCE –
INDIA'S PRESENT INTERNATIONAL POSTURE

When the Commonwealth Prime Ministers assemble in London in September, I understand that discussions will not be confined to the Common Market and that, in any event, there will be opportunities for informal exchanges of views on various international questions. As a result of [the] firm Canadian position on South African membership and the good will which the Indian Prime Minister feels towards Mr. Diefenbaker and Canada generally, our Prime Minister may find himself in a special position vis-à-vis Mr. Nehru during the London talks. Unfortunately, developments since the Prime Ministers last met have served not only to foster disillusionment in some Western quarters regarding Indian good faith and impartiality, but also to enhance Indian suspicions of Western motives. The meeting may provide an opportunity to mend some fences, particularly between the United Kingdom and India, and also to re-establish, at least in the Commonwealth context, some of the mutual trust which I am afraid has been lost in the interval. It seems pertinent, therefore, to attempt to place in perspective those events of the past eighteen months which appear to have put India on the defensive in the conduct of her foreign affairs and to have brought into question her policy of nonalignment.

2. The last Conference of Commonwealth Prime Ministers was able to reach general agreement on such subjects as disarmament, nuclear tests, U.N. action in the Congo, and the need for a solution in Laos. Of these subjects only the Laos problem has been brought to some sort of satisfactory solution and the part played by the British co-chairman has been recognized in India. On the other hand, events in the Congo, for example, have during the past year tended to sour Indo-British relations. The Indians, who feel with justification that they are making a major contribution to the carrying out of the U.N. mandate in the Congo, are not convinced that the British Government is equally firm in its resolve to bring about a reunification of the country. British financial interest in Katanga, the controversy about bombs for the Indian Canberras, and Southern Rhodesian support for Tshombe, are only some of the factors which have prompted Indian suspicions.

3. From the Western point of view India failed to react appropriately on two major international issues last summer. The first occasion was the East German problem and the construction of the Berlin wall. Although Mr. Nehru showed an understanding and sympathy for the human problems created by the wall, his stand on the question of German reunification and self-determination for the German people continued to be equivocal, to the detriment of India's relations with West Germany. The Indian Government has continued, however, to avoid any action with regard to East Germany which might upset its diplomatic relations with the Federal Republic and, although the West Germans are frustrated by Indian failure to recognize self-determination as a valid concept outside colonial areas, they appreciate Indian correctness in dealing with the two Germans. Soon after the construction of the Berlin wall, the Soviet Union administered a further shock to Western governments and public opinion by the breaking of the nuclear test ban. Once again, the Indian Government failed to make as clear cut a denunciation of the Soviet action as the West would have liked. Mr. Nehru was, of course, restricted to some extent in his freedom of action at that particular time by the fact that right after Belgrade he was to make an official visit to the Soviet Union. His qualified expressions of regret over Soviet action, which were perhaps as much as he could produce in the circumstances if he wished his Russian visit to be at all productive, were not satisfying, however, to a Western public genuinely upset by the violation of the test ban and accustomed to Mr. Nehru taking a firm stand on this issue. In subsequent U.N. discussion it was fortunate for Indo-Canadian relations that Canada was able to support the Indian initiative for an immediate cessation of all nuclear testing.

4. At the Belgrade Conference India played an important moderating role and was largely responsible, with the help of certain other delegations, for preventing the Conference from degenerating into a violent attack on the old colonial powers and thus further souring already bitter international feeling.<sup>5</sup> One of the complementary results of the Indian attitude at Belgrade was, however, the creation of a suspicion in a number of Afro-Asian countries that India was not as dedicated an anti-colonial power as she should be if she hoped to maintain her position of leadership in that group. There were many other domestic and international factors which contributed to the Indian decision to occupy Goa, but the effect of Afro-Asian opinion and the strength of anti-colonial feeling prevailing at Belgrade should not be discounted.

5. The explosion of Indian nationalism and sudden impatience which Goa represented had a most detrimental effect on India's relations with the West. The West may perhaps be excused for not realizing the importance of Goa to India because India had not mounted any notable political and diplomatic campaign which would suggest that her patience with Portugal was reaching an end. Nor did it seem in keeping with the course of Indian policy that resort to military measures would be made in the absence of serious provocation. Indian leaders not only failed to create a favourable international climate by appearing to exhaust peaceful means before they began the movement of troops but also they did not foresee that that failure would involve intense emotional reaction to their military measures on the part of Western governments, press and public.

6. The injection of the Kashmir issue into international debate could not have been timed more inappropriately from the point of view of Indo-Western relations already exacerbated by the Goa incident. Pakistan had, of course, indicated its intention of reactivating the Kashmir question before India's seizure of Goa, but clearly regarded that seizure as an asset to its cause.

Although the Indian Government was certainly well aware that neither the British nor the Americans had been enthusiastic about a Kashmir debate either before or after the Goa incident, this sort of private knowledge is difficult to communicate to a general public already emotionally worked up about Indo-Pakistani relations and ready to impute the worst motives to the leading Western powers. The course of the last Security Council discussions on this subject and the wide newspaper coverage of the manoeuvres which preceded the tabling of the Irish resolution provided excellent public evidence (which sensitive Indian opinion is often deliberately seeking) that the U.S.A. was determined to back the position of its military ally, Pakistan, regardless of the cost in terms of Indo-U.S.A. friendship. The only winner in the Kashmir fracas was the Soviet Union which had already taken a few laurels as a result of its stand on Goa.

7. Without embarking upon a discussion whether SEATO or CENTO have been instrumental in frustrating Soviet designs in South Asia, it seems safe to say that the inevitable and surely foreseeable result of U.S. policy towards Pakistan has been Indian determination to keep abreast of Pakistan in modern armaments. This determination has culminated, at a most unfortunate time, in Indian interest in the supply of MiG aircraft by the Soviet Union. The leak regarding Indian intentions occurred when the U.S. Aid Bill was making its shaky way through a Congress upset by Goa and Mr. Krishna Menon. It is unlikely that the Indians anticipated publicity at that moment for enquiries which apparently were only then in a preliminary stage and one should not dismiss the suspicion that some of Mr. Menon's enemies may have been responsible for the leak, knowing full well the effect it would have abroad. Regardless of what one may think of the advisability, in terms of India's independence and political future, of a decision to buy and subsequently manufacture Soviet MiG aircraft, it is necessary not to lose sight of the fact that India's actions in this matter have been affected primarily by U.S. policy in Pakistan, by Western and particularly British apparent indifference to public political pressures on the Indian Government to match Pakistan, and by the increasingly serious foreign exchange problems which this country is facing. More recently there has been the additional factor of the unambiguously critical situation on the China border which has made apparent the desirability of developing warmer relations with the Soviet Union.

8. In the foregoing paragraphs, we have been discussing the events of the past year which have most closely affected India's relations with the West. It is not only in this field that India has been having its difficulties. In her relations with her immediate neighbours, India has also been plagued with problems and there is little to show in the way of progress in this balance sheet either. Chinese pressure on India's northern borders has continued unabated and, with the expiration of the Sino-Indian Treaty of Friendship in June of this year, the last traces of the Panch Sheel relationship<sup>6</sup> between India and China disappeared. Until a month ago most of the Sino-Indian exchanges continued to be verbal and written rather than physical, but the most recent incidents in Ladakh indicate a potentially explosive situation.<sup>7</sup> There is no sign that the Chinese intend to slacken their pressure on India and the constant Indian worry regarding Chinese intentions already shows signs of affecting Indian foreign policy decisions on matters other than MiGs of interest to the Soviet Union.

13. Thus, although India received a record number of heads of state over the past eighteen months and sent a record number of ministers and diplomatic representatives to the four corners of the world, the present overall picture of Indian foreign relations is not a happy one, either from the Indian or the Western point of view. In the context of East-West relations, India is encountering increasing difficulty in appearing to pursue a non-aligned foreign policy. Perhaps this is mainly the result of the fact that such a policy, if it is to be active rather than passive, must by each move produce negative reactions from one side or the other. Unlike the situation in countries which are firmly bound to one bloc or the other or are of minor importance in international terms, India starts out with two strikes against her. It is the dawning and rather bitter realization of this fact which accounts in large part for Indian reaction to criticism abroad – a reaction which is sometimes pained but often (and this has been increasingly evident in recent months) defiant. I have no doubt that Prime Minister Nehru has every intention of continuing the policy of nonalignment upon which rests his whole concept of India's world position and that his interpretation of what may be considered deviations from this policy would not be the same interpretation which might be made in Western capitals. It is worth noting as a factor in Indian psychology that it is a long time since India has been publicly attacked for pro-Western attitudes by the Soviet Union or European satellites (although China and North Viet Nam have been vigorous) and that this provides a contrast with Western reactions to apparently pro-Soviet moves.

14. India's quarrel with China has made it essential for India to placate the Soviet Union, and thus to take steps which seem to veer away from nonalignment. In a somewhat similar fashion, India's desire to play a leading role in the Afro-Asian bloc – not least in order to consolidate her position before China has the means to play a fuller role in the destinies of this group – has forced India into taking a more rabid anti-colonial line than previously. The Indians are, of course, basically anti-colonial but in the past they have taken a moderate approach to the question of time-tables for independence and the need for adequate preparations and safeguards. It now appears, however, that they have decided that they must adopt a stronger line, and, after the liberation of Goa, India's attitudes on African colonial questions in the United Nations have hardened. It is on the question of Southern Rhodesia, for example, that Canadian and Indian views seem most likely to diverge at the XVII Session of the General Assembly.

15. A further difficulty which seems to plague the Indian Government in the conduct of its foreign affairs is its apparent inability to develop and carry to fruition long term foreign policy objectives in various fields. There seems to be a gap between the rhetorical enunciation of principles such as non-alignment or the Panch Sheel and the approach to individual decisions, which has yet to be filled by coherent broad policies. Indeed the tendency to take pragmatic decisions on the basis of existing circumstances often seems to interfere with the development of a consistent policy or even to be considered as an effective substitute for such a policy. India's relations with her immediate neighbours provide excellent examples of how the pendulum swings back and forth without any evidence of a clear goal or a planned attempt either to inspire confidence or to maintain fundamentally good relations. In a broader field India's attitude towards South-East Asian problems is another example of apparently inconsistent and essentially expedient decisions which do not reveal any basic pattern governing Indian interests apart from a desire somehow to maintain the uneasy status quo and resist the spread of Chinese influence. The Indian decision to push ahead with the subversion question in the Vietnam Commission<sup>8</sup> was an acknowledgement (delivered tardily and somewhat grudgingly) of the facts of the situation. Their decision was, for them, a big step forward and in Canadian-Indian terms was a milestone in the history of cooperation in the Indo-China Commissions. On the other hand, the subsequent Indian dismay at the adverse reaction from the Communist Bloc countries to the Commission's Special Report would indicate that India is still reluctant to take any radical decision to play a more active role in the counteracting of Chinese influence or expansion in South-East Asia.

16. It is this seemingly unplanned nature of Indian foreign policy which I think provides evidence for presuming that the current swing in favour of the Soviet Union is the result not of any deliberate Indian intention to forsake its Western connections, but rather of circumstances which have both forced India into seeking Soviet assistance and moral support and provided the Russians with convenient opportunities to play the role of the disinterested helper. Some of the circumstances are ones over which Western countries have little or no control, i.e. Sino-Indian border problems, and others are undoubtedly the fault of the Indians themselves in that they have been too engrossed with their own internal problems and perhaps too confident (where their own interests are involved) that "might is right" to take adequate steps to establish good relations with their immediate neighbours. However, both the U.S. and the U.K. in recent months have made it easy for India to turn towards the Soviet Union.

17. One other factor which must be mentioned in connection with the trends in Indian foreign policy in recent months is the question of Prime Minister Nehru's health and whether he is, as a result of his recent illness, losing his grip on the conduct of Indian affairs. A suspicion has been growing in the minds of various observers that Mr. Nehru's strength and influence is in fact declining and that as this decline takes place, Mr. Krishna Menon is having his way more and more in foreign policy matters. Frankly, I believe that it is too early to tell whether such a situation exists although there is some evidence that the Prime Minister has been less decisive in recent months. It is certainly true that Menon had his way in the handling of the Kashmir debate after the Prime Minister was taken ill, that his views have probably had a strong influence on the attitude of the Indian Delegation to the disarmament talks in Geneva, and that, as Defence Minister, he has been intimately connected with promoting the MiG deal.<sup>9</sup> Menon is one of the stronger and more decisive members of the Cabinet, and the fact that he has, in contrast to his Cabinet colleagues, consistently taken an interest in foreign affairs, would naturally place him in a position of authority and influence if the Prime Minister were not in control of the situation himself. I believe, however, that it would be misleading to suppose that there is any basic difference of view between Mr. Nehru and Mr. Menon or that Mr. Nehru's frequent defences of Mr. Menon are not sincere and genuine. Perhaps the main point to be borne in mind about Mr. Menon is that, although he is still looked upon with suspicion in many Indian circles both in and out of the Congress Party, he has been able to develop, particularly in the last year, an image of himself in the Indian public mind as being associated with Indian national causes. Goa and Kashmir are two of the more prominent examples. More recently, the Indian right to buy military aircraft from whatever source was upheld by all Indian political parties and the press. These three are all subjects on which there has been widespread criticism of the Indian attitude in Western circles. Thus it would seem that Western reactions sometimes help Mr. Menon's cause. It seems to me that one of the main ingredients in an improvement of Indo-Western relations would be a willingness on the part of the Western countries to accept the Indians for what they are, i.e. a developing country whose national interests come first, rather than for what the Gandhian heritage would have them be, i.e. a nation which is capable of submerging its national interests in order to play a special role in international affairs.

<sup>9</sup> Voir/See Ian C.C. Graham, "The Indo-Soviet MiG Deal and Its International Repercussions," Asian Survey, Vol. 4, No. 5 (May, 1964), pp. 823-832.

18. The situation on the eve of the Commonwealth Prime Ministers' Conference may be summed up as follows:

- (1) Indo-British relations have been strained by events in the Congo, the MiG controversy, the Indian attitude on colonial questions at the United Nations, the Common Market negotiations, problems of aid and the passing of the Commonwealth immigration bill;
- (2) India's conduct of her foreign relations has been the subject of much criticism in the West the net result of which has been to put India on the defensive and to engender almost an aggressive attitude in reply to Western criticism;
- (3) These factors are aggravated by:
  - (a) India's nervousness regarding Chinese intentions and her consequent desire to keep the Soviet Union, if not on her side of the fence, at least astride it;
  - (b) India's financial difficulties and her concern about aid in the short term and trade in the long term;
  - (c) The basic instability in foreign policy which is threatened if Mr. Nehru is in fact losing his grip and a struggle for power is starting.

Canadian-Indian relations have suffered no serious reverses in the period since the last Commonwealth Prime Ministers' Conference. They may be affected negatively by:

- (a) Different points of view caused by different primary product problems arising out of Britain's entry into the Common Market although there is common interest in manufactured goods;
- (b) Canada's present inability to do much to assist in solving India's financial difficulties;
- (c) The differing Canadian approach to the problem of how to achieve a satisfactory solution in the Central African Federation.

On the credit side of Canadian-Indian relations are the following:

- (a) We have not been publicly associated with the Kashmir controversy, nor have the motives behind our aid been questioned, nor did the Indians impute to us the motives which they believed were behind the American reaction to Goa;
- (b) Canadian-Indian cooperation in Indo-China continues and provides a solid basis for further close relations now that our differences on Laos have disappeared;
- (c) Canadian and Indian policies towards U.N. action in the Congo may differ in emphasis and method but are fundamentally the same;
- (d) Canadian and Indian views are close to each other on the subject of nuclear testing;
- (e) There is still a reserve of good will for Canada in India and a strong and pleasant recollection of Canada's role on the question of South Africa. Only a few weeks ago Foreign Secretary Desai told me that Mr. Nehru can, in present circumstances, talk more frankly and easily to Mr. Diefenbaker on India's difficulties in particular and world problems in general than he can with Mr. Macmillan or any other Commonwealth Prime Minister.

COMMONWEALTH PRIME MINISTERS' CONFERENCE SEPTEMBER – VARIOUS POSSIBILITIES

Now that first phase of Britain's negotiations with six members of EEC on possible terms of British entry into European Community has ended, certain matters relating to Commonwealth Prime Ministers' Conference are becoming clearer than they were. First point is that British Government has no repeat no thought of proposing a postponement of the conference: this was made perfectly clear by Heath, speaking with Prime Minister's authority, at briefing of Commonwealth representatives yesterday. Second point is that, judging from Heath's attitude yesterday and other indications, it is most unlikely that British Government will decide either before or during the conference that negotiations with Six cannot repeat not be brought to a conclusion that British Government would regard as acceptable. It appears that British Government's intentions are as follows:

(a) To present to Commonwealth Prime Ministers the results to date of its negotiations with Six;

(b) To discuss with Commonwealth Prime Ministers the proposal for Britain's participation in European economic and political integration; the terms of Britain's entry into EEC that have been agreed tentatively with Six; and points on which there is as yet no repeat no tentative agreement;

(c) After Prime Ministers' Conference to engage in further negotiations with Six and further consultations with Commonwealth and EFTA countries (in answer to a question Heath said yesterday that it would be for Prime Ministers themselves to decide whether another Commonwealth Prime Ministers' Conference should be held); and

(d) Eventually to decide whether or not repeat not to recommend to British Parliament that Britain enter EEC. (British Government's decision will doubtless be based on its assessment of what Parliament and British people can be persuaded to accept. British Government will certainly take into account views that may be expressed by governments of other Commonwealth countries, but it does not repeat not recognize that they have a right to veto its action.)

2. At Commonwealth Prime Ministers' Conference, British Government may well attempt to turn to its own advantage incomplete nature of provisional terms that have been worked out with Six. By presenting Prime Ministers with an incomplete picture, British Government may hope to inhibit their adopting extreme negative positions. When it resumes negotiations with Six after Prime Ministers' Conference it may hope to use such objections as Commonwealth Prime Ministers might have expressed to exert pressure on the Six for better terms. In this connection it is worth pointing out that Heath emphasized yesterday that agreements reached with Six are all provisional agreements. From this it may be inferred that various elements on provisional agreements might be re-opened by either side. Heath implied that if Commonwealth Prime Ministers should urge British Government to seek better terms in any particular case, British Government would be prepared to express its judgment as to whether the matter was negotiable or not repeat not. Heath made it clear that British Government would seek the advice of Commonwealth Prime Ministers on particular issues that have not repeat not yet been tentatively resolved in negotiations with Six. Taking aluminium as an example, he said that British Government would like to know whether we would prefer an arrangement that would give us free entry into British market with no repeat no change in CET, or a lower tariff applicable to whole Community including Britain.

3. It is to be expected that British Prime Minister will place before his colleagues:

- (a) Economic arguments of a general character in favour of Britain's entering EEC;
- (b) Economic arguments of a particular character addressed to individual Prime Ministers (e.g. that in any case Britain would not repeat not be able to tolerate indefinitely free entry of Canadian manufactured goods); and
- (c) Arguments in support of Britain's participation in European political integration. We are working on a paper setting forth some of political arguments that British Prime Minister is likely to use.

4. Possibility that British Prime Minister may ask for alternative proposals re Commonwealth trade if reactions of Commonwealth Prime Ministers to British proposals are negative should not repeat not be excluded.

CONFIDENTIAL

[London], August 13, 1962

You will have received from your High Commissioner in London as well as from your representatives in Brussels full and detailed accounts of the Brussels negotiations as they have proceeded day by day. Now that we are within a very few weeks of the opening of the Prime Ministers' Meeting, I feel I should write to you about the general position that has been reached.

2. When we were trying to find the best date for the Prime Ministers to meet, I was conscious of two factors which we had to bear in mind. First it was not going to be easy to find a date suited to the different political commitments of no less than 16 Prime Ministers. I am deeply grateful to you and our other colleagues for falling in with the date which seemed to be generally convenient. The second difficulty was to foresee six months ago the date by which the negotiations would have reached the point at which this Commonwealth Meeting would be most fruitful. In the event I think that things have worked out reasonably well. I have always wanted to avoid a situation in which we might have appeared to be presenting some cut and dried scheme. On the other hand I have always felt that the Meeting would be of little value if the proposition were so little defined that there was nothing that anybody could really get hold of. I am glad to think that as things have turned out we have steered successfully between Scylla and Charybdis.

3. We have not yet been able in the Brussels negotiations to bring matters to a provisional conclusion on every one of the issues which would have to be settled before we could make our final decision about joining the European Economic Community. But we have been able to reach provisional conclusions on most of the important sectors which are of concern to other Commonwealth Governments and we have had useful preliminary discussions on most of the remaining topics. We shall thus be able to put before you and the other Commonwealth Prime Ministers at our meeting in September a reasonably comprehensive outline of the terms on which we might be able to join the Community, if we decided to do so. I am having a paper prepared containing this outline and it will be sent to you at the earliest practicable moment. It will consist in the main of the conclusions reached on the various sectors of the negotiations and much of it will already be familiar to you as a result of the close contacts we have maintained with your representatives both in London and in Brussels.

4. The general position is as follows. We shall have in front of us proposals covering the treatment of manufactures from the developed Commonwealth countries and the broad principles to be applied in the field of temperate agricultural products, although the detailed treatment of most individual commodities still remains to be discussed. With the exception of processed agricultural products and certain important industrial materials this covers most of the matters of concern to Canada, Australia and New Zealand.

5. We shall also have in front of us proposals on the treatment of the trade of India, Pakistan and Ceylon (with the exception of certain items).

6. In addition we shall have available for consideration a statement regarding the association with the Community under Part IV of the Treaty of those independent Commonwealth countries in Africa and the Caribbean who desire it as well as of the great majority of those territories who are still British Dependencies.

7. Since there are still some important gaps in the picture as regards the Commonwealth and also as regards some questions of domestic interest to the United Kingdom, particularly agriculture, we should not in any case be able to reach our final decision about joining the Community without further negotiation with the Six after the Commonwealth Meeting in September.

8. We have arranged with the Six that the negotiations will be resumed by the Deputies in the second half of September and at Ministerial level at the beginning of October.

9. As Mr. Heath has explained in the House of Commons, all the proposals which we shall be considering at the September meeting are provisional at this stage. But it is only realistic to recognise that when the negotiations are resumed our room for manoeuvre will be limited. The Six will not be prepared to make radical changes in the existing proposals and we must not expect them to be more forthcoming on the matters that remain to be discussed with them than on those already negotiated.

10. On temperate foodstuffs a very large amount of work was done at Brussels and a considerable measure of common ground was established. As the discussions proceeded a new approach to this problem emerged. This, though different from that on which our original proposals were based, is a wider concept and one which opens up a prospect of fruitful international developments.

11. The first important point to note is the emphasis on the price policy to be pursued in the Common Market countries. In the last resort it is really this that will determine the prospects for the future. It is clearly in the long term interest of us all that the Community should be outward-looking and not pursue inward-looking and self-sufficient policies. On this issue I feel that we have made real progress.

12. The other promising feature is the concept of World Agreements. This is, as I know well, something for which you and your colleagues have worked for many years and something which is very much in line with your own philosophies.

13. We also made some progress as you will see with the arrangements for the transitional period.

14. It would I think be useful if our officials could have discussions with yours on all these points before the meeting opens; and I hope that this can be arranged.

15. As the talks in Brussels were just coming to an end, the Six, as you know, volunteered that they recognised that New Zealand had a special problem (because of its unique degree of dependence on the sale of foodstuffs to Britain) and stated their readiness to look for a solution to it. We do not know what they have in mind. We shall be considering what might be done on this basis.

16. I understand that you expect to get here a few days before the meeting begins. This will give us an opportunity to exchange ideas informally with each other.

[Ottawa], August 31, 1962

I intended to see you this morning but work piled up on me and I did not get in to the office.

There are a couple of matters that should be dealt with at once. I think there should be Cabinet both today and on Monday as well as the Committee Meeting on the Common Market. By the time I return on Tuesday I must have a full summary of all the different phases of the subjects on the Common Market and the Commonwealth so that you and I will be in a position to present Canada's views with the highest degree of certainty while at the same time assuring that taking a strong stand on the preservation of Commonwealth trade and the Commonwealth itself, Canada in no way will be taking the part of the "dog in the manger."

Mr. Bryce and the other officials should be preparing my speech now and have a draft ready.

There should be consideration given to what questions will be asked at the airport at the Press Conference in London, and a general idea of the answers that should be given.

I cannot emphasize strongly enough the importance of the Committee making a final determination of the matters that are still in doubt and of the need of the officials having things ready for me by Tuesday morning.

CANADA'S ATTITUDE TO BRITISH ENTRY INTO THE EUROPEAN ECONOMIC COMMUNITY; VIEWS OF MINISTERS
 (Previous reference August 30†)

1. Mr. Green, as Acting Prime Minister, recalled that the Prime Minister wanted a summary of the views of each Minister as to the attitude Canada should take at the forthcoming meeting of Commonwealth Prime Ministers with respect to Britain's possible entry in the European Economic Community.

2. Mr. Hees said that Canada must continue to bring to the attention of Britain, as had been done over the past year and a half, the importance of present trading arrangements with Britain and how seriously their loss would affect Canadian industry and agriculture. It should be made clear to Britain that it was their decision alone whether they go into the Common Market. But Canada felt that they would want to know how their entry would affect Canadian trading arrangements. He felt that Mr. Macmillan would say that Britain has taken into account Canada's views as expressed in Ottawa and Accra and had done its best for Canada. The Prime Minister should urge that they continue to do so when negotiations begin again. It should be emphasized that Canada was not opposing British entry into the Common Market but only underlining the effects it would have on Canadian trade, and expecting that the U.K. would live up to its promise to safeguard vital interests in the British market.

He felt that it was not easy to take a position on the political aspects. Canada was pulled both ways. If Britain becomes a leader in Europe she would cease to be a leader in the Commonwealth, with a consequent weakening of the Commonwealth, but on the other hand it was important for Britain to establish a strong position in the European Community. Therefore one could not be too definite on that aspect.

In reply to a question, he said that, of Canada's total export trade only 17 per cent was with the United Kingdom but over 50 per cent with the United States. In reply to another question he said that his department had taken no final position on the future of Canada's wheat sales if Britain entered the Common Market because the terms they had set out so far were so vague. There had been talk of world commodity agreements but this was not enough.

3. Mr. Hamilton said that a good deal was known now of the variable levy system that would apply to Canadian wheat exported to the Common Market. He felt that Canada should try to demonstrate to the Common Market countries the quality of bread that can be produced from Canadian flour.

4. Mr. Churchill felt the matter of Canada's trade with the United Kingdom should be kept in perspective. Only 17 per cent of Canada's total exports were to the United Kingdom and, if Britain entered the Common Market, 7 per cent of it would be unaffected so that what Canada was concerned about was only 10 per cent of its export trade. Canada was not in such a difficult position as New Zealand, for example. It must be remembered that what Canada said in the United Kingdom about the effects on Canadian trade will come back to Canada. This should be consistent with what Canada said over the past three years. He agreed with the views stated by Mr. Hees, but that the importance to Canada of a market for wheat might be emphasized.

On the political side there was little that could be said that Britain did not know. They were aware of the effect that political union would have on their sovereignty, independence, and on the administration of justice, for example. It did not seem that Dr. Adenauer or General de Gaulle wanted Britain to join a political union now and it did not appear that political integration was moving ahead very rapidly. The Prime Minister had said that in his talks with Mr. Macmillan, the latter had said he could see the end of the Commonwealth in any case whether or not Britain joined the Common Market. Mr. Churchill said that it was vital to the party that there be no implications in the Prime Minister's speech that Canada was preventing Britain from making her own decision.

5. In a general discussion on the future of the Commonwealth some said that the Commonwealth would be watered down in any case by the many new countries which were coming in. While some of the African members, like Nigeria, felt strongly about the Commonwealth, others were members of it only for the economic gain they could expect.

6. Mr. Harkness felt it was important not to give the impression that Canada was trying to block British entry to the Common Market but the adverse economic effects on Canada should be stated and a strong effort made to secure entry to the market of a selected number of commodities such as wheat which were of vital importance to Canada. Canada should get, as far as possible, entry for these commodities, not quotas. Canada should also use the present provisions of GATT to protect its trade interests in the U.K. and Europe.

The British were politically realistic with regard to the Commonwealth. They know that the new African and Asian members of the Commonwealth were only in it for the military and economic assistance they were receiving. It was only a matter of time until they went their own way. Some of them had a strong hatred for their ex-colonial masters. Canada should not worry too much about the political effects of the breakup of the Commonwealth.

He suggested that the Prime Minister might mention other factors which would bind the Commonwealth together other than trade. For example, cultural and educational exchanges, and the exchange of judges, might be suggested.

7. Mrs. Fairclough thought Mr. Harkness had covered most of what she had to say, but she had been surprised to hear the Prime Minister say that it was clear from his mail that most Canadians opposed the U.K. entry to the Common Market. This was not the case in her own town yet it would undoubtedly be affected by Britain's decision.

She too was a realist and looking ahead could see the breakup of the Commonwealth, but that did not mean that Canada should keep quiet now about the effect of entry on its trade. She felt the Prime Minister should be on the side of the angels and make an initial statement concerning ways and means of making the Commonwealth ties stronger, and expressing regret or sorrow as to the possible damage to Commonwealth relations of British entry into the Common Market. If the Canadian people were showing signs of being opposed to Britain's entry into the Common Market, it was probably because they were realizing that the U.S. might be pushing the U.K. into it.

8. Mr. Harkness warned that Canada should avoid stirring up any anti-Americanism by emphasizing that the U.S. has been putting pressure on the U.K.

9. A short general discussion took place on what Canada's position would be if the Commonwealth broke up. Some said it depended on when the breakup took place. Others said there would be no breakup as such but merely change – evolution and perhaps expansion. Some of the Asian and African countries might leave but the basic older members of the Commonwealth would remain and the new West Indian Island members as well.

10. Mr. Hamilton said the first thing to be done by all Ministers was to give credit publicly to the part the U.K. delegates had played in negotiation on Canada's behalf and say that Canada was backing them to the limit.

11. Mr. Hees said that this would imply that Canada had agreed with what had been done. The pressure on the U.K. negotiators must not be relinquished.

12. Mr. Hamilton said Canada should say the British should “keep on fighting.” He went on to say that “reasonable access” was not good enough for wheat or soybeans. It must be made clear to the Canadian agricultural producers what the effects of the adverse tariffs would be if Britain joined the Common Market. They were not aware of the realities of the situation.

13. Mr. Hees said that a statement covering the amount of our trade at risk had been issued a year ago and a revised statement would be issued shortly.

14. Mr. Hamilton said that the government must think of alternative courses and let the country know that consideration is being given to such things as:

- (a) a multilateral trade approach;
- (b) world commodity agreements;
- (c) a vigorous sales campaign; and,
- (d) alternative markets outside the Common Market area.

He concluded by saying that the Prime Minister should mention various proposals for the strengthening of the Commonwealth, for example, the establishment of a bank of trained technicians for use throughout the Commonwealth, and refer to other intangible benefits already mentioned. Canada should shoot down the idea of an Atlantic free trade area, of a U.S.-Canada free trade area or of a Commonwealth free trade area. These were academic ideas but quite impractical.

15. Mr. O'Hurley agreed with what had been said by Mr. Hees. It should be made perfectly clear, however, that Canada was not blocking the U.K. entry to the Common Market.

16. Mr. Sévigny said that there should be no reference to the fact that the Commonwealth might be dissolving. Canada should not exhibit opposition to U.K. entry to the Common Market but it should be made clear that Canada wished to protect its trading position. He also said that Canada should insist on negotiating directly with the Common Market countries, and that if this was not done the New Democratic Party or the Social Credit Party would say that this government did not wish to expand Canada's trade, while they, on the other hand, were advocating wider trading arrangements.

17. Mr. Hees said that the Common Market countries would be happy to trade with Canada but Canada could sell to them only agricultural products and prime raw materials, whereas they would flood Canada with manufactured goods and Canada's manufacturing industry would be ruined. Canada should avoid making any statement to the effect of wishing to trade on that basis.

18. Mr. Dinsdale said that what would be required was a statesmanlike pronouncement from the Prime Minister which would indicate that he was aware of the underlying problems of the world brought about by the rise of the Soviet Union, the NATO alliance and the changing role of the Commonwealth. The bulk of Canadians were strongly in favour of the maintenance of Commonwealth ties. There should be no mention of dissolution of the Commonwealth but of its evolution. If the Commonwealth went there was not much hope of maintaining a balance between East and West.

Mr. Pearson's suggestion of an Atlantic trading area<sup>10</sup> was academic.

There should be no hard bargaining based on the realization of what Britain in the Common Market would mean to Canadian trade. He agreed with Mr. Hamilton's suggestions for alternative trade efforts.

19. Mr. Dinsdale was impressed by the letter written by Clarence Streit<sup>11</sup> which had suggested that, if Britain went into the Common Market and became a strong force in the heart of Europe, this would slow down the development of an Atlantic Union. However, other Ministers felt that Mr. Streit was wrong.

20. Mr. H.J. Flemming said he had little to add to what had already been said but he wondered whether Mr. Macmillan might ask at the Conference for advice from the other Prime Ministers and what reply the Prime Minister might give. He was prepared to leave this to Mr. Green and the Prime Minister. His own advice would be to leave things as they were.

21. Mr. Halpenny said it was unfortunate that the Prime Minister had to go to the Conference. He did not think the Conference could serve any useful purpose. Canada should repeat what was said in substance at Accra both on the political and economic side, but say it softly and hope for a better press.

22. Senator McCutcheon said Mr. Diefenbaker had some responsibility for calling the Conference; he would be speaking immediately after Prime Minister Macmillan. Regard must be had to this. The Prime Minister should take a positive approach to the Commonwealth. The Conference itself would illustrate one of the important purposes of the Commonwealth – mutual discussion. The Commonwealth was an association of independent members and the Prime Ministers were there not to advise Mr. Macmillan what he should do but to outline what the effect of Britain's entry would be on the members of the Commonwealth. He might then mention the possible adverse effects of U.K. entry but should "take the Englishman at his word," and note that Mr. Macmillan had said that the U.K. would not go into the Common Market without protecting the essential interests of the Commonwealth.

<sup>11</sup> Pour consulter des copies de cette lettre en deux parties de Streit au premier ministre travailliste britannique George Brown, voir J.G.D./MG01/XII/B/45. Pour un exemple publié du point de vue exprimé par Streit, voir Clarence K. Streit, "Prudent Limits to an American Commitment on European Political Union," Annals of the American Academy of Political and Social Science 342 (July 1962), pp. 111-122. For copies of this two-part letter from Streit to British Labour MP George Brown, see J.G.D./MG01/XII/B/45. For a published example of Streit's viewpoint, see Clarence K. Streit, "Prudent Limits to an American Commitment on European Political Union," Annals of the American Academy of Political and Social Science 342 (July 1962), pp. 111-122.

It was necessary to take an optimistic view of the Commonwealth. Its character would change. There would be less trade and more economic aid along Colombo Plan lines. The Prime Minister might well at that point stress the leavening effect on the European political community if the U.K. became a member. He endorsed the position taken by Mr. Wilgress in the report of the Canadian Trade Committee entitled "The Impact of European Integration on Canada."<sup>12</sup>

23. Mr. Martineau said the Prime Minister should make clear the government was not against Britain but only against an economic move being considered by Britain. If Canada opposed Britain's entry into the Common Market it would be identifying itself with a growing section of U.K. public opinion; but Britain must make this choice herself. Canada should make clear where its advantages and disadvantages lay if Britain entered the European community, particularly the loss of preferential tariffs.

There were alternative opportunities in Canadian relations with Commonwealth countries. He referred to a booklet by Mr. Peter Walker, M.P., in which alternative arrangements for trade and other developments within the Commonwealth were mentioned, – including market research, commodity by commodity; commodity price stabilization agreements; a Commonwealth infant industries board; the disposal of surpluses; research into energy and fuel resources, etc.

24. Mr. Bell said that on the economic side Canada should state its case, emphasizing that the U.K. alone must make its decision; there should be no "ganging up" on Britain but pressure should be maintained leading to the safeguarding of Canadian interests. There should be a realization that if the U.K. does go into the Common Market Canada would not be without remedies. Alternatives had already been mentioned.

On the political side, he did not believe that the Commonwealth was on the point of dissolution or breaking up. The Prime Minister should endeavour, through television or some other medium in the U.K., to make ringing declaration of the value of the Commonwealth apart from trade, saying it does not depend on pounds, shillings and pence. There were other more significant aspects. There would be changes in the Commonwealth but it would survive. It was essential to Canada in maintaining her position with respect to the U.S.

25. At this point there was a general agreement by several Ministers that a substantial part of the speech should be an inspiring declaration about the value of the intangible aspects of the Commonwealth.

26. The Cabinet took note of the various comments made on the attitude Canada should take at the meeting of Commonwealth Prime Ministers on Britain's possible entry in the European Economic Community.

COMMONWEALTH PRIME MINISTERS' CONFERENCE

1. The Prime Minister said that the Commonwealth Prime Ministers' Conference had been most interesting from several points of view. If he had been isolated, as reported, it had not been complete isolation, since fourteen other Prime Ministers had been with him all along. There had been complete unanimity with regard to the final communiqué,<sup>13</sup> important parts of which had been advocated by Canada. The British did not want another meeting. All during the Conference the British press had been fighting their next election in anticipation of the Common Market issue. The situation had called for considerable restraint on the part of the visitors. The chances of the Macmillan government winning on the Common Market issue were slim. Mr. Macmillan, however, was looking a thousand years ahead and considered membership in the European Economic Community as the first vital step in this forthcoming period in British history. It might take thirty years for Britain to become strong again, and joining the European community was the way to do it. Britain had changed her mind and decided to go into the EEC after having originally opposed the idea of a federation which would be controlled by Europeans.

The Australian Prime Minister had raised the point that under the EEC there would be created a European bureaucracy which would control tremendous sums of money resulting from the levies on agricultural products.

In the light of what had happened during the Conference, it had been a mistake to adhere to the agreement made by the Conference not to comment on statements made by others. Mr.

<sup>13</sup> Le Premier ministre Diefenbaker annonce la position du Canada au sujet de la conférence dans un discours du 17 Septembre 1962. Voir « Réunion de 1962 des premiers ministres du Commonwealth, » Affaires Extérieures, vol. 14, n° 10 (octobre 1962), pp. 278 à 286. Cet article contient le texte intégral du communiqué qui a été publié après la conférence.

Prime Minister Diefenbaker announced the Canadian position on the conference in a speech on September 17, 1962. See "Commonwealth Prime Ministers' Meeting 1962," External Affairs, Vol. 14, No. 10 (October 1962), pp. 274-281. This article contains the full text of the communiqué issued following the conference.

Sandys had broken confidence in this regard and had misled the public.<sup>14</sup> There had, in fact, been no bitterness or heated statements in the Conference. In this regard, it had been better than the three previous ones. The British government, however, had been in the midst of a political battle at home and had taken advantage of the Conference to colour the situation. Should the British government ever get their proposal to join the Rome Treaty through Parliament, Britain would never be able to repudiate the Treaty. Once entered into, it became irrevocable.

The Canadian attitude was based on the resolution in the British House of August 3rd, 1961, which provided for consultation with the Commonwealth countries. The British appeared, however, to want no more consultation. Mr. Macmillan was determined to enter the European Common Market. Mr. Menzies, who seemed at first to be weakening in his stand, made the finest speech of all. He pointed to the political aspect as the most serious, and envisaged the possibility of Britain ultimately becoming subservient to the other European countries. There was considerable evidence in correspondence and in verbal comments from the man in the street that many hoped Canada might be able to stop the British government. The communiqué issued at the conclusion of the Conference had summarized all the main discussions. Reference in the communiqué to the Canadian proposal for a World Trade Conference as one alternative to the Common Market had been resisted. Mr. Heath had finally agreed to a compromise reference to a steady world-wide expansion of trade. There had been tacit approval of the proposal and it might well come to the surface again in eight or nine months from now.

In his speech to the Conference, he had reviewed the chronology of events, beginning with Britain's refusal to join in the Rome Treaty in 1955, followed by her efforts to create a European Free Trade Area in 1957, and finally Britain's application in 1961. The Canadian government had not taken a position as to whether Britain should or should not enter the Common Market. It had been invited to give its assessment, and had done so, indicating clearly Canada's interests and Canada's own appraisal of the terms so far negotiated by Britain. It had also indicated that "substantial further improvement would be needed in the terms of entry in the light of the undertakings that have been given regarding the safeguarding of Commonwealth interests." In the field of agriculture, much improvement was needed. The same was true of the provisional terms for manufactured products. Hope had been expressed that the views of the Commonwealth countries would assist Britain in obtaining alleviation of some of the terms already formulated. Reference had been made to Canada having sent experts to Brussels to be of assistance to Britain and the willingness to continue this form of consultation. There had been apparent unanimity with Canada's opinion that something had to be done to improve the terms for the Commonwealth countries. Every stand taken by Canada had been accepted by the others, including the British. In the communiqué, all Prime Ministers had noted that the Brussels negotiations were incomplete and that a final judgement could not be made until all the terms had been settled. It had been assumed that there would be further meetings of all Commonwealth Prime Ministers or smaller meetings would be held before Britain made her final decision.

<sup>14</sup> Certains journaux britanniques ont parlé en termes peu flatteurs du rôle du Canada à la conférence. Voir Val Sears, "U.K. Press Hits Dief Hard: 'Muddled on Euromart,'" Toronto Daily Star, September 17, 1962, p. 3; Robert Duffy, "Official Hand Is Detected in Attacks," Globe and Mail, September 17, 1962, pp. 1-2. Canada's role at the conference had been cast in an unflattering light by certain British newspapers. See Val Sears, "U.K. Press Hits Dief Hard: 'Muddled on Euromart,'" Toronto Daily Star, September 17, 1962, p. 3; Robert Duffy, "Official Hand Is Detected in Attacks," Globe and Mail, September 17, 1962, pp. 1-2.

2. The Prime Minister said he didn't think there was much chance of Britain making the grade; de Gaulle would not permit it. The latter had told Adenauer he didn't want Britain around Europe.

3. The Secretary of State for External Affairs gave his impressions of the Conference. He had been surprised to hear the British Prime Minister stress the political objectives rather than the economic aims. Mr. Macmillan seemed to have a fixation on his role as a disciple for the building of a united Europe. Today's papers reported Mr. Macmillan as describing the European Common Market as a customs union like England, Scotland and Wales. The African countries believed that, if they became associates in the EEC, they would in effect be economic colonies of Europe. They were very determined that this should not happen. Nigeria and Tanganyika were solid on this point. India and Pakistan felt that they had been brushed off. They were worried about their need for industrialization and for markets in Europe for their manufactured goods. The big gulf had been in attitudes, with Canada, New Zealand and Australia being concerned with the Commonwealth, and the U.K. being European-minded. It had not been easy to assess British public opinion. Many business people in the U.K. felt that from the economic standpoint the Commonwealth did not mean much to them.

The discussions in the Committee, which had examined the status of negotiations on temperate country produce and processed foodstuffs, showed that Australia and New Zealand were most interested in world commodity agreements. Concern was shown by them over the proposed price system for agricultural products under which levies on imports would be put into a fund to compensate the European producer. Mr. Menzies had previously spoken of the dangers of an inter-community bureaucracy having control of such vast sums. He re-emphasized this more than once. The British believed that there should be remunerative prices to producers under world commodity agreements. Mr. Sandys, who had been chairman of the Committee, had pushed hard to have the Commonwealth countries produce papers. New Zealand put one forward, but Canada had not had time to think one through in time for such early presentation. They were accused by the chairman of holding back and he wanted his accusation recorded. Canada was strongly backed by New Zealand and Australia in its defence. It was following this meeting that Mr. Sandys had breached the agreement that no country would comment publicly on statements of other countries. In talking to the press, he publicly accused Canada of intransigence. In the final meeting of the Committee, conciliatory speeches were made. Mr. Heath had been particularly pleasant. There had, however, been no agreement on the papers presented. Mr. Menzies and others had indicated that they were not satisfied with the safeguards. The British blamed Canada for this dissatisfaction. The fact remained that Canada's agricultural position would be bad. There would not be much protection for temperate foodstuffs. The Prime Minister of New Zealand had said that British entry into the Common Market meant economic disaster for his country. Mr. Menzies had been equally tough, but the press had tagged all the resistance on Canada.

4. During the discussion the following points were raised:

(a) The final communiqué had been intended to be a general statement but finally each country had to have its say. The British had been ruthless in getting into the Press what they wanted to appear.

(b) Some said that it was important that Ministers get the report of the Conference and fight for the stand that Canada had taken. Others felt that a special effort would be required to offset the reports carried by the British Press.

(c) Some said that Canada and the other Commonwealth countries were entitled to further consultations before the British finally decided. The idea of a World Trade Conference should not be allowed to be ridiculed. It might have great hope. There had been spontaneous support for it from Pakistan, India, Tanganyika and others. The proposal had been a constructive one.

5. The Cabinet noted

(a) the oral reports of the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for External Affairs on the recently concluded Commonwealth Prime Ministers' Conference in London; and

(b) that the members of Cabinet should all be prepared to defend the stand taken by Canada during the Conference.

COMMONWEALTH PRIME MINISTERS' MEETING: COMMODITY DISCUSSION

Only draft minutes of London meeting are available. Since Committee of Deputies will be meeting again this week, we thought you should have for background information a record of commodity discussion at Prime Ministers' Conference. You will appreciate sensitive nature of this information which is not for distribution nor attribution.

2. Text of Prime Minister's statement on commodity aspects of British-EEC negotiations was along the following lines:

Turning to economic effects, Mr. Diefenbaker said that it seemed to be the opinion of the British Government that the day of preferences was practically over. To Canada preferential trading arrangements had been of tremendous historical importance and he recalled that they developed long before the Ottawa Conference of 1932. In early colonial times Canada had flourished under the preferences granted by England before the repeal of the Corn Laws. He recalled that in 1957 the present Canadian government advocated an expansion of Commonwealth trade and the highly successful conference at Montreal<sup>15</sup> had taken place as a result. The essence of that conference had been an expanding Commonwealth in an expanding world economy.

Inter-Commonwealth trade was in fact expanding. In 1932 United Kingdom exports to Canada amounted to $80 million. In 1961 they were $618 million. In 1946 total United Kingdom exports to the Commonwealth were £385 million. In 1961 they were £1,476 million. In the same year total United Kingdom exports to the Common Market countries amounted to only £666 million, less than half the exports to the Commonwealth.

Mr. Diefenbaker recalled the attitude of the Montreal Conference towards the EEC and the negotiations for a European Free Trade Area. He referred to Mr. Thorneycroft's 1957 statement to the Prime Ministers' Conference concerning the preservation in full of Commonwealth interests in the export of foodstuffs to the United Kingdom.<sup>16</sup>

<sup>15</sup> Voir/See "Report of the Commonwealth Trade and Economic Conference held in Montreal, 15-26 September 1958," in Nicholas Mansergh, ed., Documents and Speeches on Commonwealth Affairs, 1952-1962 (London: Oxford University Press, 1963), pp. 537-553.

Again, on 25th July, 1960, Mr. Maudling had said in the House of Commons that Britain's entry into the Community would involve putting Commonwealth preference on its head and the giving of preference to Europe and that the Commonwealth countries could rely on the undertaking which Britain had given to safeguard their trading position. Mr. Maudling had pointed out that under the Rome Treaty the Commission would undertake commercial negotiations. The British Government could no longer sign a treaty with Australia or Canada. This would be a formidable step in its political as well as commercial consequences. Here again, he would like United Kingdom Ministers to explain what had changed in their thinking since these remarks were made.

Canada was an important supplier to the British market. Nearly 40 per cent of her overseas exports and 17 per cent of total exports came to Britain and the trade was of enormous value to both sides. Every region of Canada was involved in this trade. Nearly one third of it was in agricultural products; exports of raw materials were very important; manufacturing industries were also important and preferences had played a large part in the development of this trade.

Mr. Diefenbaker said that there were many gaps to be filled in the explanation of the negotiations so far in Brussels. He must express both disappointment and concern: disappointment that the Six had not shown sufficient understanding of Commonwealth trade needs, and concern at the serious damage that seemed likely to be done to Commonwealth trade in both the short and long term. He wished to bring out the facts and not to take an alarmist view, but only a few of the exports of Canada would be unaffected in one degree or another. Could one be confident that it would be possible to maintain traditional sales of Canadian wheat under the levy system? Could Canada continue to share adequately in the growing demand for aluminum if a high tariff were imposed? What about wood manufactures exported to Britain in the face of a preference for European competition? Would sales of canned salmon be maintained when the prices were forced up by the tariff? There were also many other commodities which would be faced with loss of free entry and preference and a substantial tariff and preference in favour of EEC suppliers.

The arrangements at present reached in Brussels, for Canadian manufactured goods, involved no more than a delay in the imposition of the Common External Tariff. The review provisions appeared to give no reliable assurance and the reference to future multilateral tariff negotiations was not encouraging. He felt that firmer assurances should be considered. He would like to ask whether some basic Canadian industrial manufactures could not be considered in the context of the nil duty proposals; also whether the imposition of the Common External Tariff could be delayed – or imposed at only a token rate – until after the major tariff negotiations which might take place in 1964. He also asked whether tariff quotas could be considered in cases of hardship.

Not even provisional agreement had been reached on certain industrial raw materials of great importance to Canada's trade and the same was true of processed agricultural products. He strongly urged that the Six be persuaded of the reasonableness of Britain's objectives in these important and sensitive areas.

He was very conscious of the difficulties over temperate foodstuffs but he would be less than frank if he did not say that the arrangements outlined did not provide any real degree of assurance that Canadian trade would continue at satisfactory levels. There was much that was ambiguous and obscure. Would it be possible to negotiate arrangements for Britain to take unilateral remedial action if sales fell below a certain level, at least until experience showed this to be unnecessary or satisfactory longer term arrangements had been made? As regards international commodity arrangements, Canada had taken a leading part in successive wheat agreements. The role of commodity arrangements had been emphasized at the Montreal Conference. As regards the discussion of long term agreements in Brussels he asked for much more precise formulations with respect to the objectives of such arrangements, as regards price and production policies and concerning economic patterns of production and trade. Experience showed however that such arrangements were not easy to make and not always effective.

He believed that further negotiations and improvements were necessary in Brussels before it could be said that there would not be unacceptable damage to Commonwealth trade inconsistent with the assurances given and which would be inconsistent with the resolution of the United Kingdom Parliament itself on 3rd August, 1961. He was deeply appreciative of British Ministers' assurances that they intended to continue to press for further consideration. Canada believed that more could be gained when the results of this Conference were known and the USA Trade Expansion Act had been passed.

COMMONWEALTH PRIME MINISTERS' MEETING – INTERNATIONAL AFFAIRS

At the 19th meeting of the Conference of Commonwealth Prime Ministers on September 17 there was a general discussion of international developments. There follows an extract from the minutes of this meeting reporting on the Minister's statement on that occasion. The Minister has made a few minor revisions of the reported statement which are included in the version set out below:

"Mr. Green said that although the question of Cuba greatly concerned Canada he thought that it could safely be left to the U.S.A. Canada had not been able to agree to American requests to impose a total trade embargo but had imposed complete restrictions on strategic goods and their transit and on any transshipment of goods from the U.S.A. through Canada. Cubans had for a time increased their direct purchases of non-strategic goods and Canada had been subject to considerable criticism in American papers. However, he had been able to confirm that this criticism was not shared by U.S.A. Administration who were, perhaps, more concerned that some strategic goods were apparently being carried to Cuba in British ships. Purchases by Cuba had now fallen back to the old levels.

2. The last Prime Ministers' Meeting had agreed unanimously on a statement on disarmament and he had been aware that there was perhaps a little dissatisfaction at the results that had followed from this. Nevertheless, he was convinced that the resolution had been of great help in the U.N. and had played its part in persuading the U.S.A. and the U.S.S.R. to resume negotiations. He thought that in the meetings of the Eighteen-Power Disarmament Committee the eight unaligned countries had acted in a very statesmanlike way and that they had made a valuable contribution without which the disarmament negotiations would have broken down. The fact that the Americans and the Russians were acting as co-chairman of the Disarmament Sub-Committee was important and might lead to diminution of the intense distrust of each other's moves which was at the heart of the problem.

3. Mr. Green said that the survival of mankind depended on finding a solution to this great problem and he thought that their present meeting should agree to adopt a further unanimous resolution bringing the previous one up to date and amending it to meet the situation existing today. Such a resolution would be given extra weight by the presence of the new independent members of the Commonwealth.

4. Canada was one of the only three Western countries on the Congo Committee. She did not believe in a resort to force but considered that sanctions should be used if necessary and did not think that such action would necessarily lead to fighting.

5. Canada was also a member of the International Control Commissions in Laos and Vietnam and shared the anxiety expressed by other members about the possibility that financial difficulty might lead to their work being cut down.

6. Turning to the U.N., Mr. Green suggested that the meetings of the Commonwealth representatives there were too perfunctory and that it might help if Britain were to consider rotating the chairmanship in order to give other members a greater sense of responsibility for the meetings' success. Britain had been confronted by a difficult situation in the discussion of colonialism at the present and previous sessions of the U.N. and he sometimes thought that Canada had not come to her aid as vigorously as she might. Possibly Britain's concern about the value of the U.N. arose from the unfair attacks to which she had been subjected over colonialism. Britain had led the world in preparing her colonies for independence, and had displayed statesmanship of the highest order. It would greatly help if other members of the Commonwealth refrained from lending any support to unfair attacks upon her in this context. He hoped that if the Commonwealth were solidly behind Britain, she would be able to take a firmer line in support of the U.N., for if it did not enjoy the backing of the Great Nations it would founder."

Report on Meeting of Commonwealth Prime Ministers

CONFIDENTIAL

[Ottawa], October 4, 1962

CABINET COMMITTEE ON BRITISH-EEC NEGOTIATIONS

1. In discussing the trade implications of British entry Commonwealth representatives expressed the view that present arrangements were by and large inadequate and that the British should endeavour to secure better terms in the Brussels negotiations. (These re-opened on September 26 and will meet at the Ministerial level on October 8.)

2. In addition to the references made by the Prime Minister in his opening and closing statements to the Conference, Canadian views on specific trade aspects were given in the Committee on Temperate Foodstuffs and are fully recorded in the Minutes which are summarized in the attachment to this report.

3. The document on which the Committee based its discussion was the memorandum entitled "British negotiations with the European Economic Community," which was submitted to the Conference by the British Government.

4. In general, the Canadian position was as follows:

(a) Canada, together with Australia and New Zealand, pressed the British to seek more favourable and more precise arrangements for settlement on temperate foodstuffs. The British attitude was that it would be difficult, if not impossible, to obtain significant additional concessions. Canada's position varied from that of Australia and New Zealand in that the latter attached great importance to a declaration by Britain of their intentions with respect to the policy they would follow inside the Community if and when long-term commodity agreements were negotiated. While Canada was prepared to study long-term agreements for agricultural and other products we said that this meeting was not in a position to reach final agreement on principles for world-wide commodity agreements. Moreover, the considerations on which Canada laid importance with respect to a settlement on temperate foodstuffs were broader than those covered by the proposed international agreements. Finally, there should be provision for remedial action if Canadian trade suffered. Generally, we said that the references in the Brussels paper to access fell short of Britain's original position in the negotiations and the wording throughout the paper was too vague to be meaningful. We suggested that the British should return to Brussels and seek better terms.

(b) We urged the British to maintain their request to the Six for zero tariffs; we also urged that the British add to this zero tariff list a number of other materials and manufactured goods which had the nature of basic materials. As regards fully manufactured goods, we also said that the reviews of the development of trade between the enlarged Community and Canada should be tightened up to provide for remedial measures in event of the deterioration of Canadian trade due to the application of the Common External Tariff. Duty free tariff quotas should be considered for especially sensitive products.

(c) We urged the British to maintain their present request for zero tariffs on a number of processed agricultural products and asked them to add additional products to this list. If duty quotas were to prove the only solution, we stressed the importance of providing for growth.

(d) If delayed application of the Common External Tariff should be the solution for certain processed agricultural products, industrial raw materials or manufactured goods, we asked that free entry (or only a token tariff) should be maintained until after the results of the "Kennedy round" were known. The British were attracted by this suggestion and undertook to follow it up.

5. The African countries, with the exception of Rhodesia, rejected the possibility that they might become "associated" with the Common Market on terms comparable to those which the EEC is negotiating with its own Overseas Territories. One or two of the smaller African nations may wish to reconsider their position at a later stage. This surprised and disappointed the British because they felt they had secured a major concession from the Six.

6. India, Pakistan and Ceylon expressed the hope that the comprehensive trade agreements which they would conclude with the enlarged EEC would be undertaken immediately and on more favourable terms than those now envisaged in the Brussels negotiations. They asked that pending the negotiation of these agreements, application of the Common Tariff to their exports should be deferred.

7. The British response generally was that they were prepared to seek better terms where provisional agreements or understandings had not yet been reached with the Six. There was little indication that they would be prepared to re-open other areas (although certain minor improvements might be obtained), partially because they felt they might not be able to maintain as satisfactory arrangements with the Six and partially because they did not wish to complicate the negotiations or detract from their momentum.

8. Apart from the references in the Prime Minister's first speech to an alternative programme, there was no detailed discussion of alternatives. However, in his second intervention the Prime Minister put forward a suggestion for a broad trade conference of like-minded trading countries. The text of a possible alternative programme as drafted in London has been made available to members of the Committee.

9. Reports from London since the end of the Conference confirm that Britain has returned to the negotiations with a view to closing them as soon as possible. They would appear to have no intention of presenting the Six with any kind of consolidated Commonwealth bill. By and large they are looking to the Six to improve the total package in terms of Commonwealth reception by agreeing to more generous solutions in sectors still to be negotiated, plus some minor adjustments in sectors already settled.

10. Finally, as noted in the communiqué, the Conference agreed that when the negotiations were resumed, British Ministers would take full account of the views, both general and particular, which had been expressed on behalf of other Commonwealth Governments at this Meeting and would continue their efforts to safeguard essential Commonwealth interests. The British Government undertook to continue to arrange for the closest consultation with other Commonwealth Governments during the remainder of their negotiations with the European Economic Community.

CONFIDENTIAL

[Ottawa], October 1, 1962

MEETING OF COMMONWEALTH PRIME MINISTERS LONDON 1962
SUMMARY OF CANADIAN COMMENTS ON TRADE ASPECTS

The following are the main points made at the Conference by the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for External Affairs on the trade aspects of Britain's negotiations with the Six.

British Preferences: Intra-Commonwealth Trade

1. Preferential trade arrangements have been of very great historical importance for Canada. An expansion of Commonwealth trade was advocated by the Canadian Government and made the main theme of the Montreal Trade Conference of 1958.

Intra-Commonwealth trade is expanding and Britain's exports to the Commonwealth are more than twice her exports to the Common Market. The British Government has in the past fully recognized the severe consequences for the Commonwealth of British membership in the EEC.

Canadian Trade with Britain

2. Canada is an important supplier to the British market. Every region of Canada benefits from this trade – one-third of it consisting of agricultural products, with important exports of raw materials and manufactured products; preferences play a large part in the development of this trade.

3. Negotiations in Brussels are incomplete. They give rise to disappointment and concern at the serious damage that seems likely to be done to Commonwealth trade both in the short and the long run. Further negotiations and improvements will be necessary if the results are to be consistent with the assurances given by the British Government.

Manufactured Products

4. Present arrangements call for no more than a delay in the imposition of the EEC external tariff. Provisions for review contain no reliable assurances and references to future tariff negotiations are not encouraging. Further safeguards should be sought along the following lines:

(a) For some basic industrial manufactures partaking of the nature of raw materials, nil duties should be considered (paperboard and industrial wrapping paper, rubber masterbatch, copper rods, pentaerythritol, vanillin cellulose acetate, acetic anhydride, acetic acid inconel and incolloy tubing, helium). Tariff reductions should be sought for stainless steel, chain saws, refrigeration and central heating equipment, hardwood flooring, and upper leather, including calf leather. Special consideration for tariff quotas should be given to leather slippers, cotton dresses, match splints, shoe last blocks, electric stoves, and hand saws.

(b) The imposition of common external tariff should be delayed, or imposed at only a token rate until after the next round of GATT tariff negotiations (the “Kennedy round” of negotiations).

(c) Provisions for reviews should ensure that in the event of a deterioration of Canadian trade due to the application of the common external tariff, appropriate remedial measures would be taken.

Industrial Materials

5. Britain should press for acceptance of their zero tariff list. Failing agreement, it should seek free entry for the listed items until after the conclusion of the “Kennedy round” of tariff negotiations or a token tariff only.

Temperate Foodstuffs

6. The arrangements outlined for this sector of trade lack precision and do not provide any real degree of assurance that Canadian trade will continue at satisfactory levels.

7. Unilateral remedial action should be open to Britain if Canadian sales fall below a certain level, at least until experience shows them to be unnecessary or satisfactory long-term arrangements are made.

8. With respect to world-wide commodity agreements, it is doubtful that they can be negotiated for many products. Canada would be willing to examine the possibility of world commodity agreements but cannot be committed to the view that they would necessarily provide suitable solutions.

9. The references to price policies and production contained in the Brussels Conference paper should not only relate to the internal policies of the EEC but also to trading with third countries and avoiding the encouragement of un-economic production.

10. With respect to limited agreements between the EEC and those countries prepared to negotiate worldwide agreements, in the event that these worldwide agreements cannot be concluded, the present wording of the Conference paper implies that the EEC views will predominate in these limited negotiations. The Canadian Government is concerned that the EEC may take positions unacceptable to efficient producers such as Canada and that Commonwealth countries unwilling to accept more limited arrangements would be left out and discriminated against.

Processed Agricultural Products

11. Consideration should be given to the possibility of securing free entry for a number of additional processed agricultural products (frozen halibut, other frozen fish, frozen peas, tomato juice, canned apples, apple juice and honey). For items which are particularly dependent on preferences, arrangements should be made either through tariff free quotas, preferential quotas or postponed application of the common tariff. If it becomes necessary to consider a solution calling for delayed application of the common external tariff for processed agricultural products, the common tariff should not be applied before the conclusion of the "Kennedy round" of tariff negotiations or only at a token rate.

London, October 27, 1962

My dear John [Diefenbaker],

In this letter I shall deal only with the question of the adverse propaganda still being carried on, which I mentioned in our telephone conversation earlier today. There are other subjects I shall deal with on Monday.

Starting with last year's Prime Ministers' Conference in March there was an organized attack on you personally, even before the Conference began, which sought to create, and in fact did create, the impression that your purpose was to drive South Africa out of the Commonwealth. I know that this was fed to the press here on a non-attributable basis from the C.R.O. office. Our own press picked it up. The effect of this was demonstrated by the fact that I was constantly challenged by the most responsible business and professional men. When I told them there was not a word of truth in it and described what had actually taken place, I realized that they found it hard to believe in view of the official tone of the reports by "political correspondents" of some of the most responsible newspapers.

With Macmillan's decision to apply for membership in the Common Market a similar campaign started on a broader front. I am enclosing the addresses of the information agencies in Canada engaged by the British High Commission Office in Ottawa. † I think a vigorous and discreet and for obvious reasons I should add simultaneous enquiry, would indicate that they have been feeding the press in Canada with their interpretation of events.

I need not remind you of what happened here during the Conference in September. But what does concern me is the continued propaganda, in this case mainly with representatives of Canadian newspapers and Canadian business groups which are visiting Britain in increasing numbers.

On Friday I had a reception for a number of Manitoba business men. I was astonished to hear from many of them the reports they had received of the difficulties created by "Diefenbaker's obstruction." In three cases this was attributed directly to Joe Garner. This did not surprise me too much because at a dinner given by Commodore Boulton just before the departure of the First Sea Lord for Canada I had heard him discussing, with the officer to his right who was several seats away from me, the difficulties created by "Canadian obstruction at the recent Conference." But I do not think he is alone in these activities.

For that reason I do urge you not to act until I have made some discreet enquiries through channels upon which I can rely. In any event I would hope that this whole subject would be examined carefully and that before you write to Macmillan you have someone make a planned and simultaneous enquiry into the activities of the agencies listed in the attached list.

In any event the Cuban situation is so completely occupying the attention of all Western governments that it is probably not a good time to raise this point in any event [sic]. But it should be raised as soon as it seems advisable. However I would hope some information on the activities in Canada might be obtained first and I shall forward further information within the next few days.

All the best

Yours ever,

GEORGE [DREW]

P.S. Perhaps George Johnston might be a very good man to conduct the kind of enquiry I have in mind. I need not say that he is a staunch friend and loyal supporter of yours who has the kind of organization which could do this job. He has also stood firmly behind you in his "Little Review" and has dealt very effectively with some of the misinterpretations of your positions in our own press.<sup>17</sup> G[George Drew]

London, February 2, 1962

CONFIDENTIAL

BRITAIN AND THE COMMONWEALTH

Introduction

What may be called the First Commonwealth came to an end shortly after World War II. It comprised countries mainly peopled by Europeans (except South Africa), with political institutions and traditions derived mainly from Britain. The Second Commonwealth, which came into being when India and Pakistan became independent (and India became the first republic within the Commonwealth), is a heterogeneous group of countries, multiracial, with much looser ties than those that bound the members of the First Commonwealth. The thesis of this letter is that the Second Commonwealth is approaching a crisis and that, if it is to survive as a constructive force in the world, it will have to be transformed into a Third Commonwealth with freshly defined purposes and objectives.

2. In recent years Britain's policy of decolonization has been pursued vigorously. Within the last twelve months Cyprus, Sierra Leone and Tanganyika have become independent and have been accepted as members of the Commonwealth. In several of the remaining colonial territories, however, implementation of the policy is running into difficulties. In the Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland the problem is to get the European settlers to accept changes quickly enough to satisfy the Africans, and time is running out. In this area the difficulties are intensified by divisions within the ruling political party in Britain regarding the pace of change, and the problem is further bedevilled by the situation in the adjacent Congo and differences between British and Rhodesian authorities relating thereto. The problems in Kenya are much less acute at the moment but are likely to give rise to much difficulty before they are solved. At a time when the West Indies Federation seemed to be approaching independence, the last-minute decision of Jamaica to opt out of the Federation has caused grave disappointment.

3. The policy of de-colonization is dictated by two main considerations, moral and political. For quite a long time it has been generally accepted that Britain has no moral right to keep other peoples in subjection and, conversely, has a duty to lead subject peoples as quickly as possible to the point at which they can determine their own future and govern themselves. The main political consideration is that colonies, with perhaps a few minor exceptions, nowadays are more trouble than they are worth. In any case the pressure for implementation of the policy – from the subject peoples themselves, from the newly independent members of the Commonwealth, and from their friends in the United Nations – is irresistible, and the policy is irreversible. In practice, Britain's desire to fulfil its responsibilities, and to turn over the reins of power to people who have become ready to govern themselves, comes into conflict with the desire of the colonial peoples for an acceleration of the whole process that may not be in their own best interests but is nevertheless a political fact.

4. Although the policy of de-colonization is almost universally accepted in Britain, albeit for varying reasons and with varying degrees of enthusiasm, the resultant changes in the nature of the Commonwealth are widely misunderstood and give rise to indifference and disenchantment – in effect, to a recrudescence of “little Englandism.” There is nothing new about the indifference. It stems, in the first instance, from the gradual loosening of ties with the “white” members of the Commonwealth as they have become more and more independent since World War I, and by the cutting off of Britain’s responsibilities for the governing of India, Pakistan, Burma and Ceylon after World War II. The relationship between the mother country and the Empire has been transformed into a vague Commonwealth relationship that has itself undergone rapid and subtle changes.

5. Disenchantment is of more recent growth. Basically it arises out of a failure on the part of large numbers of people in Britain to comprehend what the new Commonwealth is all about. Many people in Britain thought of “Commonwealth” as a new word for “Empire” and hoped that the old mother-and-children, hen-and-chickens relationship could be made to persist; but in recent years it has become increasingly clear that this concept is no longer valid.

6. Immediately after World War II Britain, whether she realized it or not, was faced with a choice of policies:

(a) She could strive to consolidate and re-affirm her position as a great power by re-moulding the vast but declining Empire into a meaningful Commonwealth of independent and equal partners, and by enlisting their co-operation in the pursuit of commonly agreed objectives;

(b) She could take the lead in the movement of European reconstruction and integration; or

(c) She could try to do both, that is, combine leadership in Europe with leadership of the Commonwealth.

7. The opportunity to take a lead in Europe was missed, perhaps because Britain did not realize that the opportunity existed, or because she did not believe that European integration was a practical possibility – or perhaps because she had enough problems at home and in India. In any case, motivated by tradition, sentiment and pragmatism rather than by a clear conception of what the end result would or should be, Britain in fact adopted a Commonwealth policy that consisted largely of the negative policy of de-colonization, without at the same time elaborating a positive policy of trying to transform the Commonwealth into a new and constructive force in the world. By the 1950s, Britain was beginning to understand the First Commonwealth of the 1930s, but in the meantime the Second Commonwealth had come into being.

British Conception of the “New” Commonwealth

8. Since World War II Britain has been unable to move far from the mother-and-children concept of the Commonwealth, with Britain at the centre as its moving spirit and guide. In these last fifteen years Britain’s Commonwealth policy appears to have been pursuing the following main objectives:

(a) to endow dependent territories with the institutions of parliamentary democracy, to lead them to independence, and to incorporate them in an expanding Commonwealth family (under British leadership);

(b) in terms of foreign policy or power politics, to secure through consultation general agreement on basic objectives; and

(c) in economic terms, to ensure her own prosperity through the development and expansion of intra-Commonwealth trade and financial relations and, to this end, to contribute aid to the developing countries of the Commonwealth.

Failure of Britain's Commonwealth Policy

9. The pursuit of each of these objectives has met with lesser or greater failure:

(a) A great measure of success has attended British efforts to lead dependent territories to independence and to incorporate them in the Commonwealth, but there have also been some failures: Burma, Sudan, Somalia and the Cameroons decided not to seek Commonwealth membership when they became independent. Those countries that have become members of the Commonwealth since World War II have adopted, or are moving towards, a republican form of government. In doing so they have accepted the Queen as the Head of the Commonwealth and "as such the symbol of their free association"; but the Crown has lost much of its political and emotional significance and the device of Head of the Commonwealth has lost much of its force. Tendencies away from parliamentary democracy are observable in several parts of the Commonwealth, especially in Ghana, Ceylon and Pakistan. The withdrawal of South Africa had a much greater impact in Britain than in other members of the Commonwealth, since it involved the "loss" of substantial numbers of people of British origin (the first of comparable magnitude since the American Revolution), and underlined the failure of the traditional British policy of "fairness" to conquered foes. As the Commonwealth has expanded it has responded less and less to British leadership.

(b) In the field of foreign affairs the failure of Britain's Commonwealth policy was demonstrated dramatically at the time of Suez when Britain found herself isolated from most of her Commonwealth partners. While Britain, as a member of NATO, has taken a stand against the encroachments of the Soviet Union and the advances of communism, the new members of the Commonwealth have adopted a policy of neutrality which, in practice, is often one of respect for Soviet power and of sympathy for the achievements of communism. The new members of the Commonwealth have all refrained from condemning the Soviet Union for its resumption of nuclear tests, and in some cases have gone so far as to lay the blame for it at the door of the United States. Britain has not been able to enlist the support and co-operation of the new members of the Commonwealth for her stand on Germany and Berlin, which she considers to be a matter of major concern: the newly independent African and Asian members of the Commonwealth are clearly not interested in the idea of self-determination for Europeans suffering from Soviet colonialism. While the last conference of Commonwealth Prime Ministers adopted a declaration on disarmament, it remains to be seen whether, in fact, the new members of the Commonwealth will accord effective support to the Western stand on disarmament. Before World War II the principle was established that there would be consultation before a member of the Commonwealth adopted a policy that might adversely affect the interests of another member of the Commonwealth. The new members have shown little inclination to be guided by this principle – and it must be admitted that even Britain herself has disregarded it at times. In the discussion of contentious political and colonial issues, particularly in the UN, the concept and practice of a two-tier Commonwealth has been growing steadily.

(c) From the British point of view developments in the field of Commonwealth trade and economic relations have not been entirely satisfactory. The generally held view in Britain is that the Commonwealth trading system which came into force after the Ottawa Agreements of 1932 was based on the simple and familiar concept of an industrialized Britain supplying manufactured goods to the less-developed Commonwealth countries, which would in return supply the agricultural products and industrial materials required by the British economy. Even now there is little or no true realization in the country at large that in the 1930s Canada and other Commonwealth countries were well on the road to industrialization. Consequently, it came as something of a surprise after World War II to learn that overseas Commonwealth countries had developed their own industrial capacities and were competing effectively with Britain in their own domestic markets, in the British market, and in some instances in traditional British export markets. It had been easy to see the advantages in a trading system based on the concept of complementary economies in which the partners enjoyed special privileges, mainly duty-free entry and tariff preferences, in each other's markets. It was a good deal less easy, however, to see how the system would benefit Britain when her erstwhile customers and suppliers had also become keen competitors. Nor was it easy for the British public to understand why some Commonwealth countries, anxious to gain access to wider world markets and appearing to grow restive within the confines of the Commonwealth system, should renegotiate their trade agreements with Britain so as to reduce the margins of preference accorded to British goods, or why some should adopt protective measures which seemed to be directed primarily against British exports. It was especially difficult for people to try to understand these developments when Britain herself was going from one economic crisis to another. Commonwealth countries which once might have contributed to the strength of Britain's economy now seemed deliberately to be doing quite the opposite. In Canada's case a good deal of comment has been aimed at the imbalance in Canadian trade with Britain and at the fact that increases in Canadian exports to Britain after the removal of most dollar restrictions were followed not much later by a sharp fall in the sales of British cars in the Canadian market. In many quarters this fall was attributed to action by the Canadian Government. Although Britain's exports to Commonwealth countries are greater than ever before and are increasing, the point that has been driven home to the British public is that they represent a declining percentage of Britain's total exports and of the imports of the Commonwealth countries concerned. From these facts many people in this country conclude that the Commonwealth trading system is now operating not to Britain's benefit but to her distinct disadvantage.

10. The seventeen years since World War II have been marked in Britain by recurring economic crises, by what appears to many people to be a reduction in the relative value to Britain of the Commonwealth trading system, and by growing disillusionment with the Commonwealth as a political system. Disillusionment gathered force at the time of the Suez affair in 1956, increased in the succeeding years, and was brought to a head in 1961 by the loss of South Africa, which, though it was received with relief by large numbers of people in this country, also caused a severe emotional shock to many. Whatever the reaction to it, the withdrawal of South Africa gave the coup de grâce to a myth, widely believed in Britain, that the Commonwealth consisted of "Mother" and a happy family of dutiful children. The recurring economic crises and the rapid changes in the character of the Commonwealth and in British attitudes to it have coincided in time with an increasing attraction towards Europe, which has been reinforced in the last few years by the unforeseen success of the European Economic Community – and disillusionment with the Commonwealth makes Europe relatively more attractive than would otherwise be the case. It is unnecessary here to go into all the arguments for and against Britain's joining the European Economic Community and participating in the political integration of Europe. But this much can be said:

(a) Those who favour Britain's entry into the EEC argue that if Britain does not go into Europe she will suffer an economic decline that will reduce her value, politically and economically, to the Commonwealth; and conversely that by going into Europe she will increase in prosperity, that she and her European partners will create an expanding market for goods from overseas (including goods from the Commonwealth), and that as the European member of the Commonwealth Britain will serve as a bridge between two great communities of the free world.

(b) Those who argue against Britain's going into Europe contend not only that it would be contrary to Britain's own interests but also that the economic interests of the other members of the Commonwealth would be adversely affected, and that participation in the political integration of Europe would be incompatible with leadership of the Commonwealth: in short, it is said, Britain's entry into Europe would involve a betrayal of the Commonwealth.

11. If Britain joins the EEC there will obviously be serious repercussions, economic and political, for the Commonwealth. If Britain, for the sake of the Commonwealth, decides not to join the EEC there will henceforth be a tendency in Britain to blame the Commonwealth when economic difficulties arise. In either case a severe strain will be placed on the Commonwealth relationship.

Conclusion

12. In this letter we have drawn attention to the changes that have been taking place in the character of the Commonwealth. It is submitted that these changes have been so rapid and so profound as to give rise to doubts regarding the future of the Commonwealth; that the possibility that Britain will enter the European Economic Community in the near future brings to a head the problem of the survival of the Commonwealth as a constructive force in the world; and that the time has come for a fundamental redefinition of the essential purposes and objectives of the Commonwealth. A heavy responsibility for this process of redefinition rests on the more senior and more mature members of the Commonwealth – in particular, on Canada, Australia, India and Britain.

13. A good deal of thought is being given in certain circles here – and doubtless in Canada and other parts of the Commonwealth as well – to what the purposes and objectives of the Third Commonwealth might be. One of the ideas that is being developed is that of the Commonwealth as a community of free peoples whose members would serve as links through which goodwill and understanding with the other communities of the free world might be promoted. Thus Britain, as the “European member of the Commonwealth,” would serve as a link between the Commonwealth and free Europe; Canada would be a link between the Commonwealth and the United States and, in conjunction with the West Indian members, would be a link between the Commonwealth and Latin America; and so on. Although many people may be disillusioned with the Commonwealth and pessimistic about its future, it should not be forgotten that there still exists a strong sense of community on which to build for the future. The influence of close personal relationships among leaders and moulders of opinion; of practical co-operation in trade, economic development, defence, foreign affairs, education, scientific research and many other fields; of common administrative standards and usages; and of English as a lingua franca, should not be forgotten. Once the more important outstanding colonial issues are resolved, probably within the next two or three years, some of the major stresses and strains will be relieved and it may be possible to create new bases for the Commonwealth association. Meanwhile, much hard thinking is required.

PERSONAL AND CONFIDENTIAL.

London, March 28, 1962

My dear John [Diefenbaker],

I am sure you are aware that over a number of years serious consideration has been given to the recurring attempts by the Commonwealth Relations Office to establish a relationship between the United Kingdom Government and the representatives of the Commonwealth which can best be described as that of the shepherd and his flock. I find that there was a very extensive exchange of memoranda on this subject during the time the previous Government was in office during the post-war years. There have also been exchanges at the official level since 1957.

This is no mere question of the size of the hat worn by the High Commissioners, or a problem of protocol. It goes to the root of the question first raised by Sir John Macdonald immediately after Confederation. He insisted that in its dealings with the British Government, the Canadian Government should deal directly with the various departments concerned with any particular aspect of Canadian affairs. Many of his typically pungent comments are a matter of record.

Since Lord Home went to the Foreign Office there has been a marked tendency in the wrong direction. I was informed quite frankly by one of the Cabinet Ministers that Sandys had obtained an undertaking from other Ministers that he would receive copies of all communications from the High Commissioners to the various Ministers. This has led on more than one occasion to an attempt to sidetrack direct negotiations. Merely as an example, I recall that Sandys tried to divert our discussions regarding the Law of the Sea to his office, although these discussions had been going on directly with the Minister charged with this responsibility since 1958. When I called on him to explain that this had been the course, and that it was the only suitable course to follow, he disclosed very quickly that his own views were opposite to those of the Minister in charge, Mr. Hare. Had we followed Sandys' suggestion and channelled our representations through his office, his personal opinions would have been a barrier to any effective discussions.

Please do not think that I am seeking to raise an issue between the two Governments on this point. I think there is one way of dealing with this indirectly which would prove very effective, and which at the same time might receive public approval for reasons which would be more apparent than real.

Since the Statute of Westminster clearly established that we are all sovereign states, each equal to the other in the responsibility for our own affairs, and since the United Kingdom Government finds it so desirable to have a Secretary of State for Commonwealth Relations, I do suggest that you give consideration to the appointment of a Secretary of State for Commonwealth Relations for Canada. This need not add another Minister to your Cabinet. I think that no reflection can be inferred from my suggestion that the Secretary of State is not over-burdened with work, and that he might well hold the dual Ministerial responsibility of Secretary of State and Secretary of State for Commonwealth Relations. It might be explained with suitable flourish that we are following the same procedure as in London, and that the Minister will deal with all High Commissioners to the same extent that the Secretary of State for Commonwealth Relations deals with High Commissioners here. I am not at all sure that you might not receive a great deal of public acclaim because of the natural assumption that this would be an attempt to establish firmer and wider Commonwealth relations. However, my thought simply is that by this device a problem that has been causing a great deal of concern to the Department of External Affairs, ever since the last war, might be dealt with by a procedure to which the United Kingdom Government could not possibly object, and which might effectively assure that we would return to the long-established practice. In other words, what I am really suggesting is that we smother a bad procedure by kindness instead of with a club. I am not in much doubt as to what Amory's reaction would be to any similar procedure in Ottawa. Nevertheless, if the Statute of Westminster means anything, and the long-established practice started by Sir John Macdonald was sound, then there is just as much reason for a Secretary of State for Commonwealth Relations in Ottawa and Canberra as there is in London.

I am prompted to write this letter because I have just received a letter from the Commonwealth Relations Office, signed incidentally by Sandys' secretary, informing me that "it seems to the Commonwealth Secretary, however, that High Commissioners in London might welcome a chance to hear a first-hand account of the conference from the Foreign Secretary." The practice in the past, and the practice which I am sure is correct for practical as well as traditional reasons, is for the Foreign Secretary to call the High Commissioners to his office for a meeting of this kind. This is the first occasion since I have come to London that we have been called together by the Secretary of State for Commonwealth Relations to hear a report from the Foreign Secretary. It clearly indicates a trend which might well be stopped without any controversy by the procedure I have suggested.

The idea may not be worthy of consideration, but I put it before you as a possible way in which an unsatisfactory trend can be stopped, and at the same time some credit gained for establishing the basis for more effective cooperation in dealing with Commonwealth relations in Ottawa.

Yours ever,

GEORGE DREW

LETTER NO. 195

Accra, April 18, 1962

GHANA AND THE COMMONWEALTH

For most Ghanaians the Commonwealth fundamentally means the British connection in all its ramifications: nostalgia and bitterness, opportunity and frustration, fair play and racialism. When Ghanaians (and I think this includes the President) think of the Commonwealth they think of it in terms of their relations with the United Kingdom almost exclusively, of their relations with Canada and India a little and of their relations with Ceylon or Malaya not at all. As Canada House pointed out, this anglocentrism has, of course, been fostered by the British in the past and in no way discouraged by them since Ghana's independence. It is, of course, the way in which they themselves see the Commonwealth. This is the weakness of the Commonwealth concept in Ghana, because for historical reasons Ghana is still very much more involved with Britain than with any other country, and British and Ghanaian interests, particularly in areas of special importance to Ghana, often conflict. The Ghanaians are, therefore, preoccupied with what Britain does and frequently find themselves casting about for means of expressing dissatisfaction with what it does, or even of retaliation. Naturally enough it occurs to the Ghanaians from time to time that they can best express their annoyance with the British by ignoring or threatening to leave the Commonwealth. In this they are, of course, like Indians or Ugandans or any other Commonwealth peoples who have no emotional identification with the Commonwealth and who have at one time or another wished to bring pressure to bear on the British. They have been told by the British that the Commonwealth is a good thing and they have seen it used as an instrument of British policy. It is natural enough that they should conclude that it exists to serve British interests and on the occasions when they are thinking of the Commonwealth these are usually opposed to their own.

2. For people who think of the Commonwealth in this way the idea of Britain itself turning away from the Commonwealth, as many people think is happening through British negotiations with the EEC, is a new and disturbing experience. It is naturally difficult to imagine the continued existence of the Commonwealth without Britain and such an idea has by no means taken hold in Ghana. Nevertheless it will be remembered that in his July 4th speech last year<sup>18</sup> President Nkrumah referred in scarcely veiled language to the departure of Britain from the Commonwealth. He did so in a way which suggested that he did not believe that such an event would necessarily mean the end of the Commonwealth. With Britain gone there is no doubt that the Commonwealth would come to mean for Ghana first and foremost its relations with Canada. Even now it is likely that Canada and India would be named after Britain as the only other Commonwealth members known to those Ghanaians who know any Commonwealth members at all. Our relations with Ghana were undoubtedly made easier at the beginning by our common Commonwealth membership. Even now Ghanaians are prone to mention the Commonwealth in any discussion of Ghana-Canada relations, although it is probably true that those relations are now more firmly based on bilateral contacts than they could ever have been in a purely Commonwealth context. It has been suggested to us by Ghanaians that if Britain joins the EEC and, as they automatically assume, thereby forfeits its leadership in the Commonwealth, Canada is the natural heir. Nobody has, of course, thought that particular notion through to the point of suggesting what leadership in the Commonwealth entails or indeed whether it is heritable. It does perhaps indicate, however, that among those Ghanaians who conceive of the Commonwealth as anything more than a euphemism for empire (and these are very few) Canada enjoys a special position. Other Commonwealth members are thought of in quite a different sense. Australia seems to be regarded as an extension of Britain and in any case an imperialist country. New Zealand is not thought of at all. The Asian Commonwealth countries – and this means India above all – are thought of in the non-aligned or Afro-Asian setting which [is] United Nations oriented and to which the Commonwealth is notoriously irrelevant. Nigeria, Sierra Leone and Tanganyika are African countries: they are in a category all their own for Ghana, as neighbours and as potential members of the same political unit. Beside the vision of united Africa the Commonwealth pales in Ghanaian eyes into unreality and insignificance. When it comes to African issues the Commonwealth is always negotiable.

3. The Ghanaians have never made any pretence that they would not put Africa first, but if they could be persuaded to think consistently of the Commonwealth as essentially the multilateral association which it becomes at Prime Ministers' meetings, and as which it captivates President Nkrumah on those occasions, then we might reasonably expect to see Ghana stay in the Commonwealth until African unity has become a reality. That will be quite a long time. As it is, because Commonwealth means Britain and because Ghana's relations with Britain are going to be uneven at least until the decolonization process is over, it cannot be confidently predicted that Ghana will stay in the Commonwealth for any given length of time. We are inclined to think that a good many responsible Ghanaians would concur in the judgment given us by a senior Foreign Ministry official that Ghana stays in the Commonwealth now only because if it left, the western world would conclude that it had finally taken the longest step toward Communism.

4. Recognizing, then, that Ghanaian membership in the Commonwealth will not, at the longest, outlast the coming of African political union, what kind of Commonwealth would make sense to Ghana in the meantime? The first requirement, that it be one not in practice monopolized by Britain, could be met easily enough: the holding of Prime Ministers' meetings away from London from time to time and on the initiative of members other than Britain if the occasion arose would be acceptable outward signs of the real and inward change which British EEC membership may bring about. The second, that it be one in which Ghana does not feel itself inhibited and constrained, will be harder to meet, because it depends on an evolution of Ghana's own attitudes. At present Ghana feels free and self-confident in African affairs or at the United Nations or in the non-aligned world – there it can often steal the scene by means and for purposes which looked at in the traditional Commonwealth manner are vaguely disreputable. Rightly or wrongly Ghana is not prepared to be reproved. Although President Nkrumah responds wholeheartedly to the circumstances and atmosphere of a Commonwealth Prime Ministers' meeting he will react most strongly on other occasions against the international respectability Commonwealth membership has been thought to impose. The Commonwealth, therefore, will probably have to be more indulgent of its members than of outsiders if it is to contain Ghana. Part of Canada's success with Ghana has been that Canada has remained sympathetic when the rest of the western world has been quick to condemn. Basically what Ghana wants out of the Commonwealth, or rather what President Nkrumah wants, is the satisfaction of periodic acceptance by his colleagues at Prime Ministers' meetings and their personal, individual support and understanding when he feels the need of it the rest of the time. If the Commonwealth is not personal for Ghana it will be nothing. The idea referred to in the last paragraph of Canada House's letter, that Commonwealth members could be thought of as "links" between different parts of the world, looks very unreal from here. If most Commonwealth members, and especially Ghana, were to set up as somehow representative of their neighbours they would be entirely self-appointed. In any case countries are countries and not links, and thinking in metaphors will not help us to establish what we want of the Commonwealth. As far as Ghana is concerned it wants very little; the Commonwealth is one influence among many and far from the strongest. It will not strengthen Ghana's attachment to the Commonwealth to try to treat it as a more ambitious association than it is.

BRITISH MEMBERSHIP IN COMMON MARKET: POSSIBLE IMPLICATIONS FOR FUTURE OF COMMONWEALTH

A decision by Britain to become a member of the European Economic Community would obviously be of profound historic consequence, not only for Britain's national life but also for its relations with the rest of the world. As the leading member and, to some considerable degree, the architect of the Commonwealth, Britain's relations with the countries of the Commonwealth would be affected and the character of the Commonwealth itself might in time be considerably altered. The terms for British entry into the Common Market have not yet been determined and the scope and nature of the political association within the E.E.C. are still to be established. Therefore, any forecast of implications for the Commonwealth must be highly speculative. However, one is led to a conclusion that British membership in the Common Market would result in some attenuation of the sense of cohesion in the Commonwealth and perhaps eventually a sapping of interest in maintaining the institution.

There is considerable evidence that a substantial body of support for the Commonwealth within some countries that have become members since 1945 was based on expectation of practical advantages to be gained from Commonwealth preferential tariffs as well as from aid programmes. Loss of these preferences could quickly lead such groups to question the value to their countries of continued Commonwealth membership. It is not possible to assess, from country to country, the strength of those who value the Commonwealth largely for bread-and-butter reasons as against those who prize the association for traditional, political and philosophical or sentimental reasons but the estrangement of the former group would be important in any review of the merits of Commonwealth membership.

Perhaps a more important cause of the weakening of the Commonwealth could be a slackening of British effort to sustain it. If Britain joins the E.E.C., the main focus of official and popular interest in the United Kingdom will be likely to switch to the continent of Europe. The required readjustment of British habits of living and thinking will be vast and preoccupying. The problems which the British will have to meet and help to solve in the transitional period and afterwards will be profound and will cover a broad range. These tasks and challenges will demand of Britain the greatest efforts of energy, thought and imagination and it is a real question whether Britain will have enough of these qualities left over to fulfil the role it has heretofore played in the Commonwealth. In the creation of the "second Commonwealth" since 1945 the United Kingdom has been indefatigable in devising formulae for Commonwealth association for the former colonies of Africa and Asia and in trying to smooth the relationships between countries of widely different backgrounds and political philosophies. Whether these efforts have produced a satisfactory result may be a matter of opinion but, without them, it seems unlikely that the present multi-racial Commonwealth would exist today. It is a matter for serious conjecture whether the Commonwealth would continue to be an effective force, in the long term, if British activity for its preservation were to slacken substantially. It is by no means clear that any other Commonwealth country is endowed by history and experience or resolve to succeed the United Kingdom in this role.
